In the NT the word is an important one relative to the permanence of God in contrast to human and earthly mutability. As the OT says, God is the eternal God whose counsel and word abide forever (Is. 7:7; 14:24; 40:8), whose eternal city will also remain in the new heaven and earth (Zech. 14:10; Is. 66:22), and who gives the righteous a share in his enduring (cf. Ps. 112:3, 9). The NT repeats these points. God's counsel endures (Rom. 9:11), his word endures (1 Pet. 1:23, 25), the new covenant endures (2 Cor. 3:11), and faith, hope, and love endure (1 Cor. 13:13). In Jn. 12:34 Christ himself remains forever, and in 1:32 the Spirit does not just visit him but remains on him. Another line of thought occurs in 1 Tim. 2:15 and 2 Tim. 2:15 with their references to the perseverance of believers in faith, love, and holiness, or in what they have learned and believed. In the Johannine writings this becomes a more personal abiding in Christ or in God as the converse of God's abiding in Christ or Christ in them (cf. Jn. 6:56; 15:4ff.; 14:10; 1 Jn. 2:6, 24, 27). In this abiding, eschatological promise is already possession, but the concept of abiding rules out mystical or ecstatic identity. Other uses in the Johannine writings are for abiding in God's word (1 Jn. 3:15), in love (3:17), in truth (2 Jn. 2), in the anointing (1 Jn. 2:27), in God's house (Jn. 8:35), in light (1 Jn. 2:10), and in doctrine (2 Jn. 9). Unbelievers, however, abide in darkness (Jn. 12:46) and death (1 Jn. 3:14).

emménō. This word means a. "to abide in something" and b. "to keep to something," e.g., an agreement. The LXX also has it in Is. 30:18 for waiting on God. In the NT Acts 28:30 uses it for staying in a place. Religiously it denotes perseverance in faith (Acts 14:22) and continuing in covenant with God (Heb. 8:9). In Gal. 3:10 Paul refers to the judgment which rests on those who do not keep to the law.

paraménō. This word means a. "to remain in place," "to stand firm," "to endure," b. "to stand by someone," and c. "to stay in an occupation or state." In the NT Paul tells the Corinthians in 1 Cor. 16:6 that he will stay with them, devoting the time to his work among them. In Phil. 1:25 he prefers continuing at work among believers to the union with Christ for which he longs. Heb. 7:23 uses the term in the negative to contrast the impermanent OT priesthood with the abiding high priesthood of Christ. Jms. 1:25 has in view an abiding in the law which means readiness to do it as compared with a mere glance that results in no transformation of life.

periménō. This word has the sense of expecting, awaiting, or waiting. The only NT instance is in Acts 1:4, where Jesus tells the disciples to wait for the promise of the Father.

prosménō. This word means a. "to stay on," b. "to stay with," and c. "to wait." The NT uses it in sense a. in Acts 18:18. Sense b. occurs in Mk. 8:2, where the crowds stay with Jesus in their desire to hear his teaching and see his works. Acts 11:23 refers to going on with the Lord, with a hint of perseverance in spite of opposition. This faithful continuing in grace stands in contrast to the vacillation that easily lets go (Acts 13:43; cf. Mk. 4:17). In 1 Tim. 5:5 righteous widows, unlike the giddy younger ones, set all their hope in God and thus continue in prayer.

monḗ. monḗ means a. “staying,” “tarrying,” “abiding,” and b. “place to stay,” e.g., inn or watchhouse. In the NT the word occurs only twice in John. In 14:2 it denotes the abiding dwelling (in contrast to our transitory earthly state) that Christ prepares for his people in his Father’s house. In 14:23, however, the abode is on earth, for Christ and the Father will come to believers and make their home with them. God’s dwelling with his people finds cultic expression in the OT (Ex. 25:8). It is promised for the last time (Ezek. 37:26-27). It has now come to spiritual fulfilment in Christ. In both 14:2 and 14:23 the reference is individual rather than universal or eschatological. Salvation consists of union with God and Christ through their dwelling in believers and their taking believers to dwell with them. The monḗ brings out the indestructibility of the union. The idea of a heavenly dwelling for the righteous is found in Iran and then in Talmudic and Mandaean writings. Plato, too, speaks of heavenly dwellings to which the soul returns. The NT reflects the concept in Lk. 16:22; 23:43. As regards indwelling, Philo speaks of the noús, the lógos, or, indeed, God himself dwelling in us.

A. The Greek World. hypoménō has the senses a. “to stay behind,” “to stay alive,” b. “to expect,” c. “to stand firm,” and d. “to endure,” “to bear,” “to suffer.” hypomonḗ means a. “standing fast” and b. ‘“expectation,” “waiting.” While hypoménō is at first ethically neutral, hypomonḗ becomes a prominent virtue in the sense of courageous endurance. As distinct from patience, it has the active significance of energetic if not necessarily successful resistance, e.g., the bearing of pain by the wounded, the calm acceptance of strokes of destiny, heroism in face of bodily chastisement, or the firm refusal of bribes. True hypomonḗ is not motivated outwardly by public opinion or hope of reward but inwardly by love of honor. In the Stoic system it is an important branch of andreía.

B. The OT and Later Judaism.

1. Toward God: Waiting on God or Cleaving to God. Distinctive to the LXX is the use of hypoménein with an accusative or dative of person, so that the idea is not that of standing against but waiting on. In this sense it is used for Hebrew terms expressing tense, steadfast, or patient expectation (cf. Job 3:9; Ps. 37:7; Job 32:4). The noun hypomonḗ similarly denotes either confidence or tense expectation. It is a mark of the righteous in the OT that they wait on God. In distress and opposition, they look to God for deliverance (cf. Ps. 37:9; Mic. 7:7). God is the almighty covenant God on whom they can rely (Is. 51:5; Zeph. 3:8). As the God of Israel (Jer. 14:8), he is also the God of Israelites (Ps. 39:7). Only the wicked abandon hope in him (Sir. 2:4). The final deliverance is eschatological (Hab. 2:3). Those who endure to the end will be saved (Dan. 12:12). The focus here is neither on the hostile forces nor on inward strength but on the power and faithfulness of God. Yet this divinely oriented hypomonḗ confers courage (Ps. 27:14). This is the strength of cleaving to God or waiting for him (Is. 40:31). There need be no fear of weakening it by a link with hope. It focuses on hope and issues in it. What sustains the righteous is that God will establish justice (Ps. 140:12).

2. Toward the World: Enduring, Standing Fast, Bearing Patiently. Standing fast against evils plays a secondary role in the OT. Job is an example, and hypomonḗ plays an important part in this book (for various Hebrew words). Humans cannot endure in their own strength (6:11). They cannot stand against God (9:4). God shatters their expectations (14:19). God himself reminds Job that no one can stand against him (41:3). Yet Job waits for God to intervene (14:14). Later Judaism, taking Job as a model, develops the idea of pious steadfastness more strongly, Abraham, too, is an example of one who stood fast in ten temptations. 4 Maccabees extols the endurance of Noah, the prophets, and the Maccabean martyrs. This endurance shares Stoic features, but it is ultimately higher because it comes from God and evidences fear of God.

C. The NT. hypomonḗ is naturally a basic attitude of NT believers in view of the eschatological orientation of their faith. Over against a hostile world, they wait confidently for the fulfilment of the kingdom and their own salvation. Yet the NT does not describe them in the OT phrase as those who "wait on the Lord" (or "for God"), possibly because of the concentration on faith and hope. The term hypoménein is mostly used in the absolute for "to endure," and only rarely for "to wait on," "to expect."

1. Toward God: Expecting, Waiting. A use similar to that of the LXX may be found in 2 Th. 3:5, where steadfast expectation of Christ, balancing love of God, is the point. The sense is probably the same in Rev. 1:9. Pious waiting for Jesus is the heartheat of the Christian community.

2. Toward the World: Standing Fast, Perseverance.

a. Synoptic Gospels. Jesus uses the term three times. In Lk. 8:15 hypomonḗ characterizes true believers; it is here an active force that finally bears fruit. In Mk. 13:13 endurance will be needed in the trials of the last period if one is to be saved. Lk. 21:19 offers an active formulation of the same thought (cf. Acts 14:22).

b. Paul. Paul sketches the main features of hypomonḗ as a Christian attitude. It does not derive from bravery or insensitivity but from faith and hope (Rom. 8:25). It displays endurance in the present aeon of wickedness and injustice (Rom. 12:2; 1 Cor. 3:7). Actively it produces good works (Rom. 2:7), passively it endures under suffering (2 Th. 1:4; cf. 1 Pet. 2:20). Unlike Greek ethics, which regards the passive suffering of evil as shameful, Christians know that they are called to suffer (Acts 14:22), and they show their faith by persevering all the same (cf. 2 Tim. 2:10). Affliction produces endurance, and endurance character (Rom. 5:3-4). This endurance, which differs from God's forbearance, since God is subject to no external pressure, is never a complaining or despondent endurance. It is given by God (Rom. 15:5) and is closely related to faith and love (1 Tim. 6:11; 2 Tim. 3:10). Tit. 2:2 has the triad faith, love, and (hoping) steadfastness. If hope focuses on the future, the steadfastness of hope is its expression in the present time of affliction. It has the promise that those who die with Christ, if they endure, shall also reign with him (2 Tim. 2:11-12).

c. Hebrews. Written to a persecuted church, Hebrews strongly exhorts to hypomonḗ (10:32, 36; 12:1). The gaze of Christians should be on Christ, who himself endured the cross (12:2). Endurance of trials serves as divine discipline (12:7).

d. James. James, too, shows that trials confirm faith and thus strengthen the steadfastness that makes complete (1:3-4). Job is the great example (cf. the prophets too in 5:10). As in Job's case, the Lord will prove to be compassionate to believers if they are steadfast (5:11; cf. 1:12; Mt. 5:12).

e. Revelation. Revelation, the book of the martyr church, extols hypomonḗ as right and necessary for believers. On the one side, it is waiting for Jesus (1:9; 3:10). On the other, it is the enduring of suffering and persecution (2:2-3; 19). The final clash is the supreme test and demands supreme steadfastness if all is not to be for nought (13:10; 14:12). It is worth noting that in contrast to Revelation, John and 1-3 John do not use hypomonḗ or hypoménein; the focus there is on ménein. [F. HAUCK, IV, 574-88]

merimnáō, promerimnáō, mérimna.

1. Greek Usage. This group covers much the same range of meaning as the English "care": a. "to care for someone or something," b. "to be concerned or anxious," c. "to be intent on or strive after," d. "to be anxiously expectant," e. "to be solicitous," and f. "to brood, speculate, or inquire." The plural mérimnai is often used for the cares of life which disturb sleep, from which refuge is sought in love or drink, and which only death can end.

2. Hellenistic Jewish Use. The group is used in the LXX for intentness, for pondering, and for anxiety or anxious care. Only Ps. 55:22 has theological significance. Philo and Josephus do not use the group.

3. The NT

a. mérimna and merimnán occur several times in the NT but only rarely in post-NT works. The usual Greek meanings are to be found, e.g, caring for in Mt. 6:25ff., intentness in Mt. 6:31, anxiety in 1 Pet. 5:7, sorrow in Lk. 8:14, and pondering in Mt. 10:19.

b. The NT realizes that life is swayed by care. Concern is unavoidable but it is given a new orientation. Liberation from it comes as one casts it upon God, not because God grants every wish, but because prayer grants freedom from care. To be anxious about food or clothing is opposed to concern for the kingdom of God (Mt. 6:26ff.). Naturally we have to work (1 Th. 2:9 etc.), but we cannot secure life by care; our concern must be for the kingdom. To care for the world is to fall victim to it. If care gains control over us, it leads to apostasy (Lk. 21:34). We must focus on the one thing needful (Lk. 10:41-42), confronting worldly ties with a hōs mḗ (1 Cor. 7:29ff.). We belong to the coming aeon and must be ready for it (Lk. 21:34). But this entails care for others as members of the same body (1 Cor. 12:25).

c. In Mt. 6:25ff. merimnán is self-concern relative to the future. The questions show that worry is what is meant. It is this that makes a proper concern foolish by fostering the illusion that concern for the means of life can grant security to life itself. The future is not in our hands. We cannot add one cubit (either length of days or stature) by worrying. The right course is to seek first the kingdom, and God will see to other things, not removing uncertainty, but taking the worry out of it. A bit of secular wisdom drives home the point in v. 34. It is ridiculous to add tomorrow's worry to that of today.

amérimnos. This word, meaning "without care," "unconcerned," occurs in the NT only in 1 Cor. 7:32, where Paul wants his readers to be free from worries, and Mt. 28:14, where the story of the theft of the body will keep the soldiers out of trouble. [R. BULTMANN, IV, 589-93]

méros [part]

A. Outside the NT.

1. Secular Greek. From the root (s)mer, "to get or have a share," méros means "part" in such varied senses as "district," "department," "army division," "political party," "party at law," "portion," "allotted destiny," and "fixed time or place." It is often used with prepositions in the sense of "partially," e.g., apó, ek, epí, katá.

2. The LXX and Philo. méros is common in the LXX for various Hebrew words and in various senses, e.g., architecturally, topographically, sociologically, and mathematically. Thus it may denote the parts of a country, the sides of the altar, the sides of a road, the divisions of an army, and shares or portions, e.g., an inheritance. The LXX does not use it for human or animal parts of the body, but Philo has it in this sense, as well as for parts of the soul or the world. Accepting the unity of the cosmos, Philo teaches the Stoic harmony of the parts. The parts share in the totality only for the sake of the totality, and the truly perfect good is a whole. As a part, man cannot be the direct image of God, only an image of the lógos.

B. The NT.

1. Usage.

a. Part. The NT uses méros for parts of the body (Lk. 11:36), of a competence (15:12), of a garment (Jn. 19:23), of a fish (Lk. 24:42), or of a city (Rev. 11:13). The meaning may also be district (Mt. 2:22 etc.), or side of a ship (Jn. 21:6: the right side.) Another use is for a theological party (Acts 23:6), and we also find méros for a "trade" in Acts 19:27, i.e., part of the business life of the city.

b. Share. One can have a share in Jesus (Jn. 13:8), in a group (Mt. 24:51), in a thing (Rev. 22:19), or in an event (Rev. 20:6).

c. Adverbial Phrases. The NT uses various adverbial phrases, e.g., "after one another" in 1 Cor. 14:27, "partially" in Rom. 15:5, "a little" in Rom. 15:24, "in this case or matter" in 2 Cor. 3:10 and 9:3, and "in detail" in Heb. 9:5.

2. Theologically Important Statements. In 1 Cor. 13:9, 12 the adverbial ek mérous indicates that our present knowledge and prophesying are only partial. The future aeon will bring in what is complete. In Rom. 11:25 a partial hardening has come on Israel while the Gentiles are brought to salvation; only at the end will all Israel be saved. In 1 Cor. 12:27 individual believers belong to the fellowship and therefore their individuality is part of the whole. Eph. 4:16 shows that each part has a contribution to make to the growth of the total body. Jn. 13:8 teaches that only the cleansed disciple can have any part in Jesus. At the end of the aeon fellowship with Jesus will mean participation in the first resurrection (Rev. 20:6) and a share in the tree of life (22:19). The faithful, however, have a place with the hypocrites (Mt. 24:51), and the ungodly are allotted a share in the lake of fire (Rev. 21:8). The "lower parts" of Eph. 4:9 may mean the earth, or possibly the realm of the dead. [F. BÜSCHEL, IV, 594-98]

mesítēs [mediator], mesiteúō [to mediate]

A. Occurrence and Meaning.

1. Hellenistic Usage. 1. A first use of mesítēs is for the trustworthy neutral, e.g., the umpire or guarantor. Thus we find the word for a. the legal arbiter, b. the witness, c. the sequester, d. the pawnbroker, e. the guarantor, and f. a warehouse official. More general senses are 2. "intermediary" and 3. "negotiator." mesiteúō means 1. "to act as umpire" 2. "to occupy a middle place," and 3. "to establish a relation between two hitherto unrelated entities."

II. The Term and Concept in Israelite-Jewish Usage.

1. The OT. mesiteúō does not occur in the LXX and mesítēs only in Job 9:33. Hebrew has no single term for "mediator" but we find words meaning "interpreter" and "negotiator."

2. Rabbinic Judaism. The business world brings the idea of the negotiator or broker into rabbinic thought, in which it takes on a figurative sense.

3. Hellenistic Judaism. Josephus uses the terms only in a secular sense. Philo starts with this but gives added depth to the idea of the "mediator," using both noun and verb mostly in a religious sense.

B. The Theology of Mediatorship outside the Bible.

1. The Deity as Guarantor of Human Agreements. The gods are often viewed as guarantors of agreements. This idea underlies the oath. Mithra is often mentioned in this connection (cf. God in Philo and the rabbis).

2. Cosmic Soteriological Intermediaries. A common idea in ancient thinking is that one's country is the middle point of the earth and that the local deities are thus middle deities who grant temporal or eternal benefits. More spiritually the deity may then be seen as the heart of the cosmos. Another concept is that the middle deities keep heaven and earth apart (cf. Atlas). Philo views the lógos as that which keeps the world in harmony. The title mesítēs is early assigned to Mithra, although there is debate whether this means primarily that he occupies a middle place or that he is personified agreement. Both ideas may well be present. As the middle cosmic force, Mithra is the arbiter between opposing forces, and by the law of sacrifice (i.e., that life comes through death) he is the mediator of salvation to believers in him. Hellenism then assumes that the gods of the cults are mediators between the supreme god and their devotees. We also find impersonal mediators, e.g., sacral fire, and in Gnosticism there are semipersonal hypostases (cf. the complex Manichean system, which, however, uses the term "sent one" rather than mediator). The task of these mediators is to bring saving knowledge, which has an ethical and spiritual component. They do this by fighting darkness and binding evil influences. Often present in such speculation is the idea of the primal man who bears the life of light, falls victim to darkness, and is freed by the redemptive process. Yet the concept of the mediator is not necessarily bound to that of the primal man. Pantheistic notions, too, find a place for personal mediators, although fundamentally pantheistic mysticism rules out mediation.

3. Men as Mediators. Various human beings are also regarded as mediators. Kings are such in view of their divine origin, and priests in view of their sacrificial and intercessory ministry. Above all, founders of religions do a lasting mediatorial work and are usually invested with legendary features. Often the actual founders make no claim to mediate eternal salvation. Their followers develop their sober sense of mission into a supreme mediation of saving wisdom.

C. Mediatorship in the OT.

1. Divine Mediatorship. The OT finds no place for cosmic mediatorship. Even Gen. 1:6-8 does not teach this, for God comes first, not chaos, and God acts with supreme power by the word. Jerusalem may be at the center of the world (Ezek. 5:5; Is. 2:2), but God is not confined to any place (cf. Am. 5:8 etc.). Places receive honor from him, not he from places (Dt. 12:5). As the almighty ruler of the world, God is not its middle point but its supraterrestrial Sovereign (Jer. 23:23-24). As such, however, he serves as an arbiter for Job in the latter's battle against the concept of God in the dogma of retribution. In Job 9:33 Job laments that there is no umpire who might decide in his suit. He decides to press his case in 13:3, achieves the confidence that he has a witness in 16:18-19, and knows that he has a living Redeemer in 19:25ff. God himself, apart from human instruments of revelation, has his own mediators in the angels, the Spirit, and wisdom or lógos.

2. Human Mediators. The OT finds a place for human mediators. Kings play a lesser role except in the future figure of the Messiah. Priests and especially prophets are more important. A tendency develops for the priest and king to flow together, and when the prophet is added the stage is set for the threefold NT mediator. A special mediator at the beginning of Israel's history is Moses. Uniquely called, Moses is a mediator as the divinely commissioned spokesman (cf. Ex. 4:15-16). As such he gives the law and stands between God and the people (cf. Ex. 19:3ff.; 20:19, etc.). As intercessor, Moses includes himself in the prayer for forgiveness and expresses a readiness to be cut off for his people (Ex. 32:11ff.; 34:8-9). The first of the prophets, he is unique as the one with whom God speaks face to face (Ex. 33:11). He fasts for the people (Dt. 9:8-9), wrestles with God for them (9:26ff.), and dies as it were vicariously for them outside the land of promise (3:23ff.). Another special figure in the OT is the Servant of the Lord in Is. 42:1ff., 19:1ff., 50:4ff., and 52:13-53:12. This Servant seems to be a historical figure who has a mission of gentle preaching to Israel and the nations, replacing as such the whole people when it proves deaf and blind to the divine call (42:19). He meets with opposition that he endures vicariously even to the point of a miserable death, but in all this suffering God fulfils his purpose of salvation, so that the suffering itself is a means of blessing for Israel and for the world. Moses, Ezekiel, and Jeremiah are prophetic forerunners in the development of the concept of vicarious mediation (cf. Ezek. 13:5; 22:30; Jer. 15:16ff.; 20:7ff.). The OT problem, of course, is that the mediators themselves are involved in guilt. Yet mediatorship is at the heart of the OT. We cannot approach God as we will. His moral demand is the unconditional basis of fellowship. Yet fellowship means election as well as demand. Thus the mediator carries a twofold but related claim. At the side of the community, he stands in the gap when the people fails to meet God's demand, first by intercession, then by vicarious self-offering. The presupposition of this divinely appointed ministry is the being of God and his saving rule. There can be no glorifying of the mediator as such. The focus is on God, and for this reason the mediatorship finally embraces not merely Israel but all peoples.

D. The Theological Concept of the Mediator in Judaism.

1. Rabbinic Judaism. Judaism introduces the term "mediator" in its theological sense. The basis is the concept of the negotiator or broker or interpreter, and in essentials the term is used exclusively for Moses as God's commissioned agent. Moses is the go-between who brings God and his people together. He is at times associated with Miriam and Aaron, and it is noted that he, too, is fallible, and has to suffer for the people's sins. The Servant of the Lord is taken messianically in early exegesis but with little place for vicarious mediation, since the emphasis (apart from intercession) is on the exalting of Israel and the victory over the nations. This is strange, since the idea of vicarious suffering is not alien to Israel, nor is the thought of a suffering and dying Messiah. In apocalyptic the Messiah serves as an intermediary, but this is a transcendent Messiah developed out of Dan. 7:13ff.

2. Hellenistic Judaism. In Philo angels are heavenly mediators (lógoi) connecting heaven and earth. Moses is also a mediator for Philo either at the human or the cosmological level. Under Hellenistic influences there is a tendency to exalt the mediator of the covenant (e.g., the high priest) almost to semidivine status. The wealth and depth of the OT understanding are grasped only in part.

E. The NT Concept of the Mediator.

1. The Use of the Terms. The words are both rare in the NT. In Gal. 3:19-20 Paul uses the noun in a much debated phrase. He has been showing what is the purpose of the law. It is given by God in order to lead to faith in Christ. But it is ordained by angels through an intermediary. Paul mentions angels here to denote the lesser states of the law rather than its high significance. The intermediary is no doubt Moses. The point of v. 20 is not so much that Moses is the intermediary between two parties but that he is so on behalf of a plurality, i.e., the angels. The law, then, does not come directly from God. This explains the question of v. 21 and the need to show how the law fits in with the divine promises. In 1 Tim. 2:5-6 we find a Christianized use. The one God wills that all people be saved, and there is one Mediator representing God to them and them to God, i.e., Christ Jesus in his sacrificial death (v. 6; cf. Rom. 3:30). The term takes a more Hellenistic turn in Heb. 8:6; 9:15. Linked with diathḗkē, it has the nuance of guarantor as well as mediator. This is also the point of the verb in 6:17, where God is not merely one of the parties but vouches for the promise with an oath. It may be noted, however, that Christ is still the mediator. He does not merely guarantee salvation but also accomplishes it by his vicarious death.

2. The Theology of Mediatorship in the NT.

a. Jesus. Jesus does not use the terms but the concept is present in his demands (Mt. 10:37ff.), his claims (Mt. 11:27), his remission of sins (Mk. 2:1ff.), and his relating of human destiny to confession of himself (Mt. 10:32-33). The Sermon on the Mount reflects Moses' giving of the law at Sinai, and the Last Supper has the exodus as its background. The main form of Jesus' sense of mediatorship is messianic divine and human sonship but in a unique combination of majesty and humility that is strongly oriented to the Servant of Is. 53 (cf. Mk. 10:45).

b. The Primitive Community. The faith of the primitive community plainly rests on Jesus' own synthesis of the Son of Man and the Suffering Servant as this is fulfilled at Good Friday, Easter, and Pentecost and will be consummated at the expected Second Advent. The portrayal is not a creation of the community but accords with the historical actuality.

c. Paul. On his conversion Paul adopts the faith of the primitive community. His gospel is one of mediation with the focus on the cross and resurrection. Baptism is the end of the old aeon and the inauguration of the new as fulfilled in the Mediator (Rom. 4:25; 6:1ff.). The preexistent Christ plays a role in creation (1 Cor. 8:6). A parallel is also drawn between Christ and Adam, but Christ is the last Adam. While Adam, the first man, mediates ruin, Christ, the last Adam, mediates salvation, not as some timeless heavenly man, but as the incarnate Son. His mediation is cosmic (Eph. 1:10), but the plḗrōma is the church. The cosmos, then, is bound to salvation, not salvation to the cosmos.

d. John's Gospel and Epistles. Though the term is not used, these works are full of the belief that Christ fulfils all mediatorship. In contrast to all others (Jn. 10:8), Christ is the way, truth, and life (14:6). Mediation culminates in his intercession (v. 17) and death (10:11), whose atoning significance finds emphasis in 1 John (1:7; 2:2).

e. Other NT Writings. James finds little place for mediation, but tacitly presupposes it. Hebrews uses the concept to show that the church is God's true people in the age of salvation. 1 Peter refers to the sprinkling of Christ's blood and the new birth through his resurrection (1:2-3), and then moves on to the election of the priestly nation (2:9). 2 Peter and Jude contain formulas which prove how deeply rooted the concept of the mediator is (cf. 2 Pet. 1:1, 11; 2:20; Jude 1, 21, 25). In Revelation Christ is the Lion and the slain Lamb, uniting power and humility. Cosmic symbols (the numbers of the planets, the signs of the zodiac, and the glory of the sun, moon, and morning star) are applied to him (1:12ff.; 12:1ff.; 21:14; 22:16). He stands at the center of the cosmos and leads his people through the epochs.

F. The Church. The terms are surprisingly rare in the first writings. mesítēs does not occur until Clement of Alexandria (Paedagogus 3.1.2.1), who also uses mesiteúō (Protrepticus 12.122.3). Even later, although the matter is present, theologians stress other concepts. In the Middle Ages the church ascribes mediatorial functions to its priests, but the Reformation brings a new focus on Christ himself as the one Mediator. [A. OEPKE, IV, 598-624]

mesótoichon [dividing wall]

This uncommon term occurs in the NT only in Eph. 2:14, where vv. 16-17 seem to show that the "partition" or "dividing wall" is not merely the barrier between Jews and Gentiles but ultimately that between God and us. It is when this barrier is removed that earthly barriers fall too. [C. SCHNEIDER, IV, 625]

Messías → Christós; metabaínō → baínō; metáthesis → títhēmi; metakaléomai → kaléō; metakinéō → kinéō; metalambánō, metálēmpsis → lambánō; metallássō → allássō

metamélomai [to feel regret, repent], ametamélētos [without regret]

1. Unlike metanoeín, which means "change of heart," metamélesthai means the "experiencing of remorse." The two may, of course, converge. Aristotle criticizes the latter as a sign of inconstancy, and the Stoics reject both on similar grounds. The preaching of the Cynics and Pythagoreans, however, gives them positive force as it arouses guilt and summons to conversion.

2. The LXX hazards the phrase that God repents, using both words in this connection (1 Sam. 15:35; Am. 7:3). Yet God's repentance does not overthrow his judgment (Num. 23:19 etc.). He may reject in spite of his grace (1 Sam. 15:35) no less than renew his grace in spite of his judgment (1 Chr. 21:15). This tension continues in Judaism, in which God is the God both of judgment and of mercy. In humans the LXX distinguishes between remorse, which may not be pleasing to God (Ex. 13:17), and repentance, although with some assimilation (cf. Jer. 4:28 and 20:16). Remorse sees the bitter end of sin, repentance breaks free from it. The result of sin brings remorse, a divinely commissioned call brings repentance.

3. In general, Judaism distinguishes the narrower metánoia from the more general metaméleia. Philo can call the latter the presupposition and proof of forgiveness, but Josephus senses that metánoia goes further with its implication of a change of will.

4. metanoeín and metánoia take precedence in the NT. The only instances of metamélomai are in Mt. 21:29, 32; 27:3; 2 Cor. 7:8; Heb. 7:21 (quoting Ps. 110:4). In Mt. 21:28ff. the son who refuses to work changes his mind and goes, but the opponents of Jesus refuse to do so when they hear the call of the Baptist. In Mt. 27:3 Judas suffers remorse when he sees the result of his betrayal. His suicide shows that this is no true repentance. In 2 Cor. 7:8ff. Paul does not "regret" sending a severe letter (although he had regretted it), because it has led to "repentance" (metánoian) in the readers-a "repentance" which brings "no regret" (metánoia ametamélētos). In this passage "being sorry" is plainly distinguished from repenting. Paul uses ametamélētos again in Rom. 11:29, where he says that God's gifts and calling are irrevocable. The same thought of God's faithfulness occurs in Heb. 7:21: God has pledged with an oath that the institution of the eternal high priest is unchangeable, and he will not change his mind. The NT, then, has a clear sense of the distinction between the terms; it reserves metánoia for the divinely effected change of heart which leads to salvation. [O. MICHEL, IV, 626-29]

meteōrízomai [to rise up, be anxious]

In the active meteōrízomai means "to lift up," "to suspend," and figuratively "to buoy up," "to encourage," "to stir." In the more common middle and passive we find the two different figurative meanings a. "to rise up," "to exalt oneself," "to be arrogant or greedy," and b. "to be anxious," "to hover between fear and hope." The LXX has only a., and this only in the bad sense (e.g., Ps. 131:1). Indeed, sense b. is generally less common. In the one NT instance in Lk. 12:29 choice is difficult, for "do not be arrogant" yields good sense as well as "do not be anxious." In support of the former one might refer to Rom. 12:16 and 1 Tim. 6:17ff. as well as LXX usage. Yet the context, with the oldest versions, favors the latter. God lavishes even his temporal gifts, and the ultimate gift of his kingdom is secure. There is thus no reason for torturing anxiety (cf. Phil. 4:4ff.). [K. DEISSNER, IV, 630-31]

métron [measure], ámetros [immeasurable], metréō [to measure]

1. Outside the NT. métron means a. "measure," b. "proportion," c. "measure of verse," and d. "what is measured" (both literal and figurative). In philosophy the métron pántōn is the absolute measure of all things (which Protagoras finds in humanity, Plato in God). The LXX uses the term in cultic measurements, for weights and measures, for the measures of the world, and in threats of destruction. metréō means "to measure" and figuratively "to evaluate."

2. The NT. In the NT sense a. occurs in the Gospels, e.g., in the prohibition of judging in Mt. 7:2, or the reference to the measure of sin in Mt. 23:32. We do not find senses b. and c., but d. (figurative) is common (cf. Rom. 12:3; 2 Cor. 10:13; Eph. 4:7, 13). ámetros, meaning "immeasurable," occurs in 2 Cor. 10:13, 15 for "immoderate" boasting. metréō is used symbolically in Rev. 11:1-2; 21:15ff. for the measuring of the temple and the city, and there is a figurative use in 2 Cor. 10:12. In Mt. 7:2 Jesus gives seriousness to the prohibition of judging by referring to the corresponding divine judgment. In Lk. 6:38 forgiveness carries with it the promise of a good measure in return, but judging will bring a corresponding measure of judgment. In Eph. 4:7 and Rom. 12:3 métron expresses the diversity of the gifts that God gives to his people, while in Eph. 4:13 it is then used for the fullness that the gifts are meant to achieve. Christ himself receives the gift of the Spirit without measure or limitation (Jn. 3:34). According to the symbolism of Rev. 11:1-2 what is measured is what is to be preserved. [K. DEISSNER, IV, 632-34]

métōpon, meaning the "brow" or "forehead," occurs in the NT only in Revelation. In 7:3; 9:4; 14:1; 22:4 God's servants bear on their foreheads the seal of God, or the name of Christ and God, which protects them through the apocalyptic woes. In 13:14; 14:9; 20:4 God's enemies have the mark of the beast stamped on their hands and foreheads. This will bring them temporal prosperity but will also expose them to God's wrath and exclude them from the millennial kingdom. There would seem to be in these double markings—on the positive side, allusions to Ezek. 9:4 and Ex. 12:13, and less probably to the mark of Cain, and on the negative side to the marks signifying cultic adherence and also to the branding of slaves as a punishment. In 17:5 the harlot, who signifies worldly abomination, bears a mark that expresses her true nature in an allusion to Babylon. The basis here is the custom whereby Roman harlots had their names on bands around their foreheads. [C. SCHNEIDER, IV, 635-37]

mēlōtḗ [sheepskin]

A mēlōtḗ, or "sheepskin," is a prophetic garment in Heb. 11:37 (cf. Zech. 13:4). The harsh clothing bears witness to the life of loneliness and affliction which God's servants endure (cf. the Baptist in Mk. 1:6). Monasticism later interprets mēlōtḗ as the skin of the goat. [O. MICHEL, IV, 637-38]

mḗn [moon, month], neomēnía [new moon]

1. mḗn is the word for the "moon," then for the "month," which originally begins with the new moon. The new moon (neomēnía) takes on religious significance, for the swelling of waters and ripening of fruits are ascribed to the moon. Those born at the new moon are regarded as lucky, and a cult of the moon (Mḗn) develops which is very common in Asia Minor. Stoicism adopts the popular view of the moon, finding the universal soul or world principle in it. The moon is also supposed to be a transitory station for souls on the way to and from earth.

2. In the LXX mḗn and neomēnía are used for the Hebrew word for "month" or "beginning of the month." The feast of the new moon is one of the biblical feasts, and with the sabbath it is a day to consult the prophets (2 Kgs. 4:23). The community assembles for the offerings of the feast (Ezek. 46:3), and Philo offers a moral rationale for keeping it. In later Judaism the time is set by the observation of as many witnesses as possible. The new moon is then consecrated and proclamation is made by wind instruments. The OT forbids veneration of the moon (Dt. 4:19). Penalties for infringement are severe because of the danger presented by surrounding moon cults (Judg. 8:21, 26). Yet moon worship creeps in (2 Kgs. 23:5) and its enticement is felt (Job 31:26-27). The righteous, however, view the moon only as a measure of time (Ps. 104:19) under the rule of God (Gen. 1:16).

3. The NT

a. The NT mentions the moon in measurements of time (Lk. 1:24; Acts 7:20). Matthew, Mark, and John never mention months, and if Luke shows more interest in dates, this does not extend to detailed events. The NT focuses on the facts rather than the dates, and presents history as a sum of forces rather than a stream of events, i.e., from the standpoint of energy rather than continuity.

b. Revelation engages in calculations of the future but in veiled rather than literal references, as in 9:5, 10. In 11:2 and 13:5 the 42 months are the 1,150 days of Dan. 8:14. The dates may be concealed but they have also been fixed (9:15). The image of the trees bearing fruit each month depicts the wealth of joys in the kingdom.

c. In Gal. 4:10 mḗn occurs in connection with Judaizing errors. neomēnía in Col. 2:16 is parallel, for observation of months goes hand in hand with the new moon festival. Judaizing naturally carries with it regard for the OT feasts, and the new moon festival might well be a special temptation in Asia Minor with its strong cult of the moon god. For Paul, then, the moon is one of the elements from which Christians are liberated (Gal. 4:3, 9; Col. 2:8, 20), and there must be no relapse into its veneration. [G. DELLING, IV, 638-42]

The position of mothers in antiquity does not wholly coincide with the general evaluation of women. Stoicism has a high regard for mothers, and the cult of mother deities exerts a strong influence. Traces of matriarchy may be found. The OT mentions many important mothers. mḗtēr may indeed personify the people (Hos. 4:5), and the LXX uses mētrópolis for a city in 2 Sam. 20:19. In Philo wisdom is the mother of the world and matter is the mother of all things. In the NT Jesus strongly endorses the OT commandment to honor mothers (Mt. 15:4). The demand that we should love Jesus more than father or mother no more negates the fifth commandment than the first commandment does (Mt. 10:37). The Synoptists mention Jesus' own mother only in the infancy stories apart from Mt. 12:46ff. and parallels; Mt. 13:55. In John Mary is present at the wedding in Cana and at the cross, though the name is not given. The only other NT reference to Mary is in Acts 1:14. Other mothers mentioned are the mother of James and John in Mt. 20:20 (the Mary of 27:56); Mary the mother of John Mark in Acts 12:12; the mother at the deathbed in Mk. 5:40; the mother at the bier in Lk. 7:12; and Herodias in Mt. 14:8. The OT phrase "from the mother's womb" occurs in Mt. 19:12; Lk. 1:15; Acts 3:2; Gal. 1:15. Paul never mentions his parents, but respect for one's mother is expressed in Rom. 16:13 (cf. 1 Tim. 5:2; Gal. 4:26). The important religious role of the mother may be seen in the succession from Lois and Eunice to Timothy in 2 Tim. 1:5. [W. MICHAELIS, IV, 642-44]

miaínō [to stain, defile], míasma [defilement], miasmós [defilement], amíantos [undefiled]

miaínō. a. Neutrally this word means "to paint in color." b. Censoriously it means "to stain," first literally, then in a cultic sense, i.e., with guilt or demonic processes. Washings are designed to remove such stains. In the OT defilement is with alien cults, dead bodies, etc., and unclean persons can stain others or holy objects. The LXX uses miaínō for "to declare unclean." Since the NT no longer thinks in cultic terms, the word is very rare. A reference to Jewish practice occurs in Jn. 18:28. Heb. 12:15 develops a figurative sense; apostates may defile others. Inner defilement is at issue in Tit. 1:15, i.e., the defilement of the mind and conscience. Jude 8 carries a reference to licentious sex acts that defile the flesh.

míasma. This means "defilement" as a result of an action, especially cultic pollution, then moral defilement. The only NT instance is in 2 Pet. 2:20, where the world seems to be the ungodly world; hence its defilements are pagan practices.

miasmós. This is "defilement" as an action or state, first cultic, then moral. The one NT use is in 2 Pet. 2:10, in which it is licentious passion that defiles.

amíantos. This word means "undefiled," first physically, then morally. In the NT it has the narrower sense of sexual purity in Heb. 13:4. The sense is broader in Jms. 1:27 (pure religion), 1 Pet. 1:4 (a pure inheritance), and Heb. 7:26 (the moral purity of Christ as high priest). [F. HAUCK, IV, 644-47]

mikrós [small], (eláttōn [smaller], eláchistos [smallest])

1. In the Greek world mikrós means a. "small in size," b. "small in compass," c. "small in significance," and d. "short in time" (or "young" in age).

2. The LXX uses mikrós for various Hebrew terms denoting smallness of size or insignificance. The phrase "small and great" is often used for "all." Stress is laid on smallness (Judg. 6:15; 1 Sam. 9:21) in a humility that also stresses the freedom and majesty of God (cf. also Solomon's reference to his youth in 1 Kgs. 3:7).

3. The rabbis often refer to young scholars as "little" or "insignificant," perhaps in connection with the use of the term "little ones" for children.

4. NT Use I. There is a general use in the NT. Zacchaeus is "short of stature" in Lk. 19:3. James the mikrós in Mk. 15:40 is either "short of stature" or "the younger." The phrase "small and great" occurs frequently. Jesus calls people "these little ones" with no hint of disparagement (cf. Mt. 10:42; 18:6, 10, 14). The reference is not necessarily to children but is more likely to be to disciples (cf. Mt. 10:42). Far from being disparaging, the description hints at a hidden or future dignity. The term "little" implies insignificance in human terms but also conversion (here is the link with children, Mt. 18). God calls the mean and the poor (Mt. 11:25, 29). Those whom he calls become lowly as children (Mt. 18:4). But the small in this aeon will be great in the future aeon (Mt. 18:1; cf. 5:19). The least in the kingdom is greater than the Baptist (Mt. 11:11). Although the reference here is probably to Jesus himself, the saying is in accord with the general teaching of Jesus that greatness in the kingdom differs radically from greatness in human estimation. The change from small to great is the mystery of God's working (Mk. 4:31). Though the flock is little, it need not fear, for the Father will give it the kingdom (Lk. 12:32; cf. 9:48). The sense of littleness is the true humility of conversion that corresponds to the humility of Christ (Mt. 18:4; cf. 11:29). Jesus, then, resists the striving for human greatness but at the same time blunts the temptation implicit in littleness. Paul takes up the message in Phil. 2:3, 8. He sets Christ himself under this rule and adopts it for himself (4:12). Small things can be big with meaning (cf. the little leaven of 1 Cor. 5:6, but also the little member of Jms. 3:5).

5. The NT Use II (Comparative and Superlative). The comparative eláttōn and the superlative eláchistos (Jn. 2:10; Eph. 3:8) correspond to the positive mikrós. Insignificant Bethlehem is by no means least among Judah's rulers (Mt. 2:6). Those who trifle with the least of the commandments will be least in the kingdom (5:19). Jesus identifies himself with the least of the brethren (25:40, 45). In Luke the superlative expresses human weakness (12:26). It also appears in the rule that faithfulness (or the reverse) in what is least means the same in what is much (16:10; cf. 19:17). Paul calls himself the least of the apostles in 1 Cor. 15:9 and the least of the saints in Eph. 3:8. The phrase in 1 Cor. 4:3 means "it is a very small thing" (i.e., "it makes no difference"), and the reference in 1 Cor. 6:2 is to "trivial" cases. The use for very small things (e.g., animals or parts of the body) recurs in the apostolic fathers, where we again find the rule that very little things can exert great force. In Hermas, however, believers are viewed as innocent children in a theme which is common in antiquity but hardly corresponds to what the NT teaches with its sayings about "little ones."

miméomai [to imitate], _mimētḗs_ [imitator], _symmimētḗs_ [fellow imitator]

1. Secular Usage. This group, which arises in the sixth century B.C., means "to imitate," "to mimic." Culture is said to arise with the imitating of animals. Art is called an imitation (in a derogatory sense in Plato). The term can have a bad sense for what is unoriginal. In ethics imitation of good people is a way to goodness, but there is also a danger of imitating wicked people.

2. The Cosmological Concept. In Plato reality is an imitation of the idea, time of eternity, and the visible of the invisible. The creation of living creatures involves imitation, and humans, too, must engage in imitation. The controlling concept here is that of analogy, i.e., the relation between original and copy. Imitation is not, then, the obedient following of a model in ethical responsibility. The thinking of Plato has great influence, e.g., on the Neo-Pythagoreans, the Stoics, and Philo. Later, the more ethical concept seems to break free from the cosmological understanding, e.g., when Seneca says that one should take God as a model.

3. The LXX and Pseudepigrapha. The group is rare in the LXX and occurs only in the Apocrypha. In general the idea of imitation is alien to the OT and there is no thought of imitating God. The situation changes in the pseudepigrapha, which demand that we imitate exemplary people like Joseph, and also that we imitate God by keeping his commandments. Kings should take God as their example in dealing with their subjects.

4. Philo and Josephus. Philo, who often uses the group, is influenced by Plato's view that the heavenly and the earthly worlds correspond. The verb may denote conscious imitation, but it may also be used where there is only comparison. Moses is set up as a model to follow, and children should imitate their fathers. When the lógos imitates God, the idea of original and copy is present. Imitating God is fitting in with his plan at creation, but Philo recognizes that there are limits to this imitation. Resemblance rather than conscious imitation is the point when Joshua is said to be an imitator of the attractive character of Moses. Josephus uses the group in the common sense of copying, imitating, and resembling. He does not speak of imitating God but suggests that creation is a model with its order and regularity.

5. The Word Group in the NT. In the NT we find miméomai, mimētḗs, and symmimētḗs. In 3 Jn. 11 we simply have a general admonition; in context it means taking Demetrius rather than Diotrephes as a model (vv. 9ff.). In Heb. 13:7 (cf. 11:4ff.; 12:1ff.) imitating faith means not merely striving to live up to the faith of others but a readiness to take the same way of faith in full commitment to Christ. In Heb. 6:12 mimētaí has a strongly active thrust, unless the point is a simple comparison, namely, that the readers should inherit the promises like those who have shown faith and patience. Comparison is the point in 1 Th. 2:14; what happened to the churches in Judea has now happened to the Thessalonians and is no exception to the rule. In 2 Th. 3:7, 9 Paul offers himself as an example of earning his own bread and not being a burden to others. týpos here is more than a pattern; it is an authoritative model. týpos also occurs in Phil. 3:17, which demands that the readers join in imitating Paul and also mark those who so walk. Here again Paul is not only a pattern but also an authoritative example. They are to walk as he does, but in so doing to obey. This element of obedience is very clear in 1 Cor. 4:16, for Paul has sent Timothy to remind the Corinthians of his "ways" in Christ, i.e., not merely his conduct but his directions. The same applies in 11:1. To be sure, Paul offers himself as a model in 10:32-33. He himself follows the same criterion that he enjoins on his readers. But imitation involves obeying the rule as well as copying Paul's example. This is why Paul adds: "As I am of Christ." If he simply meant that Christ is a model for him, then he would surely have pointed the Corinthians themselves directly to Christ and explained in what sense Christ is a model. Christ is, of course, a model in this sense in Rom. 15:1ff. and Phil. 2:4ff. But in these passages Paul develops the thought, and in any case it is not certain that Christ as model is really the central concept in Phil. 2:4ff. The point, then, is rather that the Corinthians should imitate Paul by heeding his word as he imitates Christ by understanding the apostolic ministry as Christ wishes. Paul's own authority rests on the superior authority of Christ. (Along these lines 11:2 stands in a closer relation to 11:1 than is sometimes thought.) In 1 Th. 1:6 "and of the Lord" is an intensifying, and the next phrase shows to what degree the Thessalonians are imitators. A question arises, of course, whether the stress in this added phrase is on receiving the word or on much affliction and joy. If it is on the former, then the idea is that in receiving the word the readers become imitators by obeying, and they become a týpos (v. 7) simply by becoming believers and turning to God (v. 8). If the emphasis falls on the affliction and joy, imitation has more of the nature of a comparison. In Eph. 5:1 "therefore" points back to 4:32 and ahead to 5:2. If the point is that God is to be an example, then the same applies to Christ in 5:2. But 5:2 (cf. 4:32) seems rather to be supplying the ethical motive. The point of 5:1, then, is that as children we are to follow God's fatherly will, showing that we are children thereby. To take God as a model is not to be equal with God but to live by his pardoning love. In general, Paul uses the group in three senses: (1) comparison (1 Th. 2:14), (2) following an example (2 Th. 3:7, 9), with a plain implication of Paul's authority, and (3) obeying directions (1 Cor. 4:16; 11:1; 1 Th. 1:6; Eph. 5:1). The NT as a whole does not teach imitation in the primary sense of imitating an example but rather in the predominant sense of discipleship, i.e., of obedience to the word and will of the Lord either directly or by way of the apostles.

6. The Apostolic Fathers. The group is more common and more important in these writings. The usage is fluid in Ignatius and 1 Clement and still contains the thought of obedience. Ignatius stresses discipleship in suffering, but without restricting the idea of imitation to martyrdom. The imitation of the passion, even externally, is a key concept in the Martyrdom of Polycarp. Polycarp himself (1.1) calls imprisoned brethren mimḗmata of true love either in a portrayal or a copying of Christ. [W. MICHAELIS, IV, 659-74]

mimnḗskomai.

1. This word, meaning "to remember," is an important one in the LXX, for when God remembers people in grace and mercy (Gen. 8:1; 19:29, etc.), this is a creative event. God remembers the covenant (Gen. 9: 15ff.; Ex. 2:24) and the patriarchs (Ex. 32:13). The converse is that Israel remembers God's past acts and commandments (Num. 15:39-40). She is summoned to remember the visitation in Egypt (Dt. 15:15 etc.), not remembering the fleshpots (Num. 11:5), but remembering her own guilt (Dt. 9:7) and God's mercy. In prayer she may call on God to remember (Judg. 16:28; Job 7:7; Ps. 74:2, etc.). If he remembers his people, he also remembers her foes and punishes them (Ps. 137:7). The prayers of Nehemiah combine various facets of remembering (1:8ff.; 5:19, etc.). God can summon Israel to remember and therefore to repent (Mic. 6:5), and one person can ask another to remember and return a favor (Gen. 40:14).

2. In the NT "to remember" is not just a mental act. A word or action serves to kindle the memory. Recollection may strike (Mt. 5:23) or be continually present (1 Cor. 11:2). The Lucan infancy stories link God's remembering and his saving acts, as in the OT (1:54 etc.). In Heb. 8:12 God no longer remembers sin. In Acts 10:4 he remembers the prayers and alms of Cornelius. On the other hand, his remembering means judgment for Babylon in Rev. 16:19. Abraham tells Dives to remember the good things he had enjoyed in this life (Lk. 16:25), and the dying thief asks Jesus to remember him in his kingdom (23:42). The word of Jesus is alive in the disciples through recollection (Mk. 14:72 etc.). At Easter remembrance means understanding (Lk. 24:6, 8). Indeed, as new and true knowledge, remembrance belongs to the work of the Spirit (cf. Jn. 2:22; 12:16; especially 14:26). The gospel also demands recollection (1 Cor. 4:17). The church is to remember the apostle and his teaching (11:2). This remembering is not just intellectualistic (cf. 2 Pet. 3:1ff.). To remind others is to bear witness to the word of God; to remind oneself is to place oneself totally under this word. Recollection of the sayings of Jesus is central (Acts 11:16), not out of purely historical concern, but in self-judgment, self-dedication, and concern for the brethren (Heb. 13:3).

mneía. This word means “recollection” or “mention.” It often occurs in the phrase “to make mention” (Rom. 1:9) or “to have in remembrance” (1 Th. 3:6). Mentioning in prayer is part of Paul’s apostolic ministry. The kindly remembering of 1 Th. 3:6 denotes unruffled relationship.

mnḗmē. An important word in Greek thought, mnḗmē occurs in the NT only in 2 Pet. 1:15 in a general phrase: “to recall or recollect these things.”

mnḗma. This word means “memorial,” and may even mean the grave. In antiquity the grave or tomb is a lonely and sinister place. Judaism forbids living in tombs. To lodge in them is a sign of madness or of sacrificing to demons, and brings defilement. In Mk. 5:3 the Gerasene demoniac lives in the tombs. In Mk. 15:46 Jesus is buried in a new tomb hewn out of the rock. It is situated in a garden according to Jn. 19:41. The empty tomb confirms the gospel message of the resurrection of Jesus (Mk. 16:2ff.). Acts 2:29 and 7:16 refer to the tombs of David and the patriarchs; these tombs are memorials for later generations. In Rev. 11:9 (cf. Ps. 79:3) the two witnesses are dishonored by being left unburied.

mnēmeíon. This word means “memorial” and then “grave.” The graves of the righteous are adorned (Mt. 23:29); the scribes honor the prophets in their tombs but reject their word. The opponents of Jesus are like whitewashed tombs (Mt. 23:27; Lk. 11:44). Those resting in their graves will hear the voice of Jesus and rise again at the resurrection (Jn. 5:28). The raising of Lazarus anticipates and confirms this (Jn. 11:1ff.). Many come out of their tombs after the death of Jesus (Mt. 27:52-53). While Mark and Luke use mnḗma and mnēmeíon together, Matthew and John prefer the latter (though Matthew sometimes has táphos in the same sense).

mnēmoneúō. This word means “to remember,” “to mention.” God’s works are remembered in the OT in praise and confession (cf. Ps. 6:5). The feasts are appointed for remembrance (Ex. 13:3). God’s remembrance will be to all generations (Ex. 3:15). Words and narratives assist it (Ex. 17:14). God protects the remembrance of the righteous but blots out that of sinners (Pss. 112:6; 9:5-6). In the Gospels the disciples are to remember not only God’s past acts but also the words and acts of Jesus (cf. Jn. 15:20; 16:4). A new cultic action is appointed for remembrance (mnēmósynon, or anámnēsis, Mk. 14:9; Mt. 26:13; 1 Cor. 11:24-25; Lk. 22:19). Paul recalls the sayings of Jesus (Acts 20:35). The church is to remember Jesus (2 Tim. 2:8) and its leaders (Heb. 13:7). It should also remember the poor (Gal. 2:10). Remembrance of God’s saving acts (Eph. 2:11-12) ought to lead to confession in penitence and gratitude. Faith itself is remembrance. In the apostolic fathers remembrance takes various forms. One is to remember God’s commandments, Jesus’ words, others in prayer, and Christ and his messengers. [O. MICHEL, IV, 675-83]

miséō [to hate]

1. Secular Greek. This term is found from an early period in the sense “to dislike,” “to hate.” The idea of being hated by the gods is ancient. In Aeschylus the gods hate evil deeds and those who do them. Comedy does not take this so seriously but still retains the thought that the gods are averse to disreputable passions. As a human impulse, hatred can and should be overcome according to Epictetus. Prohibitions of hatred occur in the Mandaean writings along with the golden rule that what is hateful to us we should not do to our neighbor.

2. The OT and LXX.

a. Human Aversion and Hostility. The group is common in the LXX for human dislike or hatred. This may come out in overt acts (Gen. 26:27; Dt. 4:42; 21:15). It can take a political form (Dan. 4:16). To love is its opposite (Dt. 21:15). Love can turn into hatred (Judg. 14:16; 2 Sam. 13:15). God commands that hatred should be overcome (Lev. 19:17). The Psalms often refer to the hatred of enemies and ask God, or praise God, for deliverance from it (25:19; 106:10). The wicked hate the righteous without a cause (34:21; 35:19), but they will suffer for it (34:21). Hatred of God's people is hatred of God himself (Num. 10:35).

b. God's Hating. God hates various things, e.g., alien worship (Dt. 12:31), the true cultus without heart worship (Am. 5:21), wickedness in all its forms (Prov. 8:13), and the members that commit it (Prov. 6:16ff.). The righteous hate what God hates (Ps. 97:10; Am. 5:15, etc.). This is not an emotional hatred but a disowning of evil and of those who commit it. As the wicked love evil and hate the good, so the righteous love the good and hate evil (Mic. 3:2). Implied is a rejection in will and deed.

c. Hatred of God and the Righteous. To this hatred of the wicked by God and the righteous corresponds the hatred of the wicked. God visits sins to the third and fourth generation of those who hate him (Ex. 20:5). Hating God means ignoring his commands and persecuting his people. Those who hate God may be strong, and they show their hatred by repaying evil for good, but in the long run their opposition to God is doomed to failure (Pss. 34:21; 35:19; 38:19-20; 69:4; 86:17).

d. Fraternal Hatred. This is forbidden by the OT (Lev. 19:17) and the rabbis. Hating one's neighbor is equivalent to the shedding of blood (cf. Dt. 19:11). God blotted out Sodom because its inhabitants hated one another.

3. Palestinian Judaism. Like the OT, the rabbis are aware of a hatred that is both legitimate and imperative. Thus one must hate seducers, traitors, and freethinkers. Yet hatred within the people is a heinous sin that brings down divine punishment. The battle against its poison is important in apocalyptic. Hatred is wicked, sides with falsehood, and fights against the truth. But it will ultimately be overthrown.

4. Philo. Philo's usage is close to the Greek. God has declared desire and the body to be worthy of hate. Humans hate virtue but God honors it. There is a forbidden hate, but also a proper hate of the passions of youth and the vices of age. By amendment sinful hate may be turned into love.

5. The NT.

a. Human Hatred. Only miséō occurs in the NT. This can denote ordinary human hatred, as in Mt. 5:43. Hating one's enemy is not actually commanded in the OT, and Jesus enjoins love instead (Lk. 6:27). In Mt. 6:24 and Lk. 16:13 loving and hating express the thought of preferring the one master to the other.

b. Hatred of God's Community. There is a present and future hatred of the community. The righteous are hated in Lk. 1:71. The disciples will be hated according to Lk. 6:22, 27. Hatred is an apocalyptic sign (Mt. 10:22; Lk. 21:17). The coming of Jesus delivers from it (Lk. 1:71) but also increases it (Mt. 10:22).

c. Hatred in Discipleship. To be a true disciple one must hate all others for Jesus‘ sake. This is not psychological hatred but a total commitment that gives absolute priority to Jesus. It is to be understood pneumatologically and christologically.

d. God's Hatred. Rejection by God is described as being hated by God in Rom. 9:13 (cf. Mal. 1:2-3). At issue is God's office as Judge. This is a hatred that disowns what is evil (cf. Rev. 2:6). Jesus himself loves righteousness but hates, i.e., repudiates, iniquity (Heb. 1:9 quoting Ps. 45:7).

e. Love and Hate in John. In John divine love conflicts with cosmic hate. The world's hatred for God, Christ, and God's people is sin. The world is blinded and impelled by darkness and therefore hates the light (Jn. 3:20). Since Jesus is the light, the world hates Jesus (7:7). In so doing it hates God (15:23-24). It also hates the disciples (15:18). To live in the light is to be a target of hate. To hate the brethren is to live in darkness (1 Jn. 2:9, 11). Yet there is a proper hatred, as in Jn. 12:25, which states that one must hate one's life in this world in order to keep it for eternal life.

f. Rom. 7:15. In this verse "to hate" is the negative equivalent of "to will." We are forced by sin (7:17), and hence we have no power either to do what we will or not to do what we hate (i.e., do not will).

g. Various Facets. In Lk. 19:14 and Rev. 17:16 hatred means political enmity. The sense in Rev. 18:2 is "hateful." Eph. 5:28ff. shows how unnatural it is not to love one's wife, for people do not hate their own bodies. In Tit. 3:3 hatred is of the very essence of the old aeon. Jude 23 warns against contact with false teachers, probably with licentiousness in view. Whether the hatred extends to those guilty of it as well as their works may be debated, but since the cause of Christ differs so radically from the wickedness of the present aeon, false teachers are certainly to be shunned.

h. Distinctive Elements. Jesus forbids his disciples to hate (Lk. 6:27). Hatred means bondage to the old aeon (1 Jn. 2:9). There is still a holy hatred in the sense of the repudiation of evil, but this is directed primarily against the wrong, not the person (cf. Rev. 2:6). The unconditional claim of Jesus means that earthly ties must be put second, but obviously this is not to be construed as psychological hatred. In the NT even holy repudiation is embraced by divine love. It thus involves a repudiation of all personal hatred.

6. The Post-Apostolic Age. The apostolic fathers preserve the NT emphasis. Did. 2:7 forbids hate (cf. Ignatius Ephesians 14.2 and Hermas Similitudes 9.15.3). There is perhaps a new stress on the beneficial results of loving others, as in Did. 1.3. The church realizes that it is hated by the world and prays for deliverance (1 Clem. 60.3). Wickedness and error are to be hated (Barn. 4. 1; 19.2). A new trend, however, appears in 2 Clem. 6.6 which contrasts transitory things (which are to be hated) with eternal things (which are to be loved). Diog. 6.5-6 uses a dualistic image to explain the world's hatred for the church, comparing it to the hatred of the flesh for the soul. But the soul repays this hatred with love. [O. MICHEL, IV, 683-94]

misthós [reward], misthóō [to hire], místhios [day laborer], misthōtós [hired hand], misthapodótēs [rewarder], misthapodosía [reward, retribution], antimisthía [reward, penalty]

A. The Use of the Group.

1. Outside the NT.

(1) The Graeco-Roman World. a. misthós means first "reward for work." b. It then means professional "fee." c. A third sense is soldiers' "pay." d. We then find the meaning "rent." e. Another use is for the "honorarium" of a priest. f. "Payment" for visiting an assembly is another meaning. g. We also find the sense "expenses." h. "Bribe" is sometimes the meaning. i. Human or divine "reward" is another sense, although the Greeks do not normally use the term outside the commercial sphere. Divine reward may take the form of "punishment." The verb misthóō means "to hire or let." The misthōtós is "one who is hired for pay." místhios means "hired" or "hired hand." misthapodótēs means "one who hires for service."

(2) The LXX. The LXX contains examples of misthós in most of the senses listed above. God rewards the righteous in this life as a sign of his grace and blessing (Gen. 15:1; Is. 40:10). "Penal recompense" occurs in Ezek. 27:33. misthóō means a. "to hire for reward" (Judg. 9:4), b. "to bribe," and c. "to buy." We find misthōtós for "hired hand" in Ex. 12:45 etc., also for "mercenary." místhios means "hired worker" in Lev. 19:13 (A).

NT New Testament

LXX Septuagint

(3) Philo and Josephus. Philo uses misthós for "payment" and "priestly honorarium." He also has misthōtós for "laborer." Josephus has misthós mostly for ordinary payments, though occasionally for divine rewards based on God's justice.

2. The NT.

(1) misthós. The NT uses misthós for "pay" in Lk. 10:7 and 1 Tim. 5:18. The laborer is worth his pay (cf. Mt. 10:10). Wages not paid are an accusation against the rich (Jms. 5:4). Wages are paid at the end of the day in Mt. 20:8. The "reward of iniquity" is a fixed expression in Acts 1:8 etc. The iniquity is greed for money in 2 Pet. 2:15. The false teachers want to profit from their wrongdoing, and judgment will overtake them. The use in Jn. 4:36 is figurative, i.e., the reward of fruit for spiritual labor (cf. 1 Cor. 9:18), where Paul finds his reward in making the gospel free to those to whom he brings it. Divine reward is the point in Mt. 5:11-12. This does not come through seeking earthly gain or recognition, but through pure, unselfish obedience (Mt. 6:2ff.). There is a great reward in heaven only where there is unlimited love (Mt. 5:46; Lk. 6:35). Paul sees a relation between the reward of service and the inner commitment to it (1 Cor. 3:8). This is an eschatological reward, not the reward of outward success. Those whose work endures will be rewarded (1 Cor. 3:14). Reward for Paul is not a matter of achievement but of grace (Rom. 4:4). 2 Jn. 8 and Rev. 11:18 both express expectation of reward. But there may also be reward in the sense of punishment for the wicked (Rev. 22:12).

(2) Derivatives. misthóō occurs twice for "to hire" in Mt. 20:1ff. misthōtós means a "hired sailor" in Mk. 1:20 and a "hired shepherd" in Jn. 10:12. místhios means "day laborer" in Lk. 15:17. misthapodótēs in Heb. 11:6 refers to the God who rewards those who seek him, i.e., who accept his transcendent reality. misthapodosía in Heb. 10:35 means "recompense of reward," i.e., the promise of salvation which is given to those who confidently persevere. In Heb. 11:6, 40 this reward is integrated into the divine purpose. In 11:26, therefore, it is a powerful motive in the moral struggle. Moses can prefer Christ to the treasures of Egypt because he has the promise of eschatological glory. Yet the same word can bear a negative sense in Heb. 2:2, where transgression of the law is said to bring a just punishment or "retribution." antimisthía, too, is an ambivalent term. It means "recompense" or "return" in 2 Cor. 6:13, where Paul asks his readers to open up their hearts in childlike response to him. In Rom. 1:27, however, it is the just "penalty" for unnatural conduct. 2 Clem. 6. 13 uses it in the good sense as the response to Christ or God for his saving work. In 2 Clem. 11.6 it has the sense of the final reward for righteous acts.

B. The Concept of Reward.

I. The Graeco-Roman World.

(1) The Basic View of Greek Ethics. Greek ethics teaches that goodness and happiness coincide. Happiness is the supreme good, and good acts contribute to it. Harmony is of the essence of happiness, and this may be achieved in this life. Just kings enjoy it, the gods promote it, and knowledge leads to it. Evil acts are punished by madness, lightning, sickness, etc. Retribution here and now makes the belief in future reward or punishment unnecessary. True goodness is sought for its own sake.

(2) Absence of the Biblical Concept of Reward. In rejecting the idea of reward, or of doing good for the sake of reward, the teaching of Socrates and Plato differs from that of the OT and NT. Plato may refer to

rewards, but only along the lines of the immanent laws of being, and not in the context of motive. Aristotle, too, believes that reason leads the soul to virtue, supported by the indwelling desire for happiness. For Stoicism morality is obedience to deity as cosmic law. Omnipresent deity sees all things, but happiness resides in virtue, and there is neither reward nor punishment beyond virtue or vice. The only reward is to fulfil the goal of this life; there is no other.

(3) The Mysteries. In contrast, the mysteries are oriented to a future life and reward. Eternal salvation is assured by cultic participation. In Orphic circles asceticism is demanded as a test, but a final judgment will decide between heavenly reward and eternal torment.

(4) The Hellenistic Cults. These cults find a considerable place for future rewards. Egypt in particular shows great concern for the after-life. Whether good or evil deeds predominate will decide the soul's destiny. In Mithraism, too, those whose merits outweigh their sins will be conveyed safely to the heavenly spheres of light.

(5) Roman Religion. Roman religion makes much of a contractual relation to the gods in which there are vows and offerings in return for assistance. In sacrifice worshippers remind the deity of their gifts and expect to be heard in return.

(6) Death as Reward. In antiquity supreme recognition by the deity takes the form of being taken up to the deity. Early death may thus be seen as a reward. Death may also entail deification by a mystical vision that comes to a climax in the heavenly journey. [H. PREISKER, IV, 695-706]

2. The OT Belief in Recompense.

(1) The Origin. The OT belief in recompense is an ancient one that perhaps has its origin in the idea that good actions bring happy results and bad ones unhappy results. The belief in a personal God gives this thought the shape of recompense in the stricter sense. It is God who relates acts to destiny. A just God, he accords to deeds the due rewards or punishments.

(2) The Meaning and Significance. In Judg. 9:23-24 the quarrel between Abimelech and the Shechemites is interpreted as divine retribution for the sin against the sons of Jerubbaal. In 1 Sam. 15:2-3 the war on Amalek is construed as a divine visitation. In both cases God uses human instruments to serve the purpose of recompense. The concept links and explains historical events. God is at work in these events, and their inner justification thus comes to light. History is not arbitrary. As one may see from Gen. 2:4-11:9, human sin is responsible for the pitiable state of humanity, for it comes up against the divine righteousness. The main thought, then, is not so much that God rewards good acts as that he punishes evil ones. God's saving initiative in the call of Abraham goes far beyond the idea of recompense.

(3) The Belief in the Prophets. In the prophets the holy God is against all sin and his annihilating judgment falls upon it. God never overlooks sin, not even in his elect people (Am. 1:3-2:16). The relation between God and Israel is a personal relation in which obedience and disobedience mean decision, and recompense rules out a frivolous view of election. The divine retribution proclaims the reality of God and the unconditional nature of his claim. Acceptance or rejection of this claim signifies decision for the future. Since Israel is a unit, recompense is at first collective, falling on the innocent as well as the guilty and children as well as parents. Yet, if applied too strictly, this principle can inhibit repentance. Hence the prophets proclaim that God, too, will "repent" of his judgments if the people repents (Jer. 18:1ff.). Ezekiel carries this thought to the point of an individual retribution that does not permit any blaming of others for one's own fate (Ezek. 18:21 ff.). Yet this is not a doctrinaire position but an assurance that God is always willing and ready to deliver the penitent from impending disaster.

(4) Twofold Recompense. The thought of reward as well as retribution is strong in Deuteronomy (cf. ch. 28). The stress is now a positive one, i.e., so to live as not merely to escape judgment but to receive blessing. The history of Israel as told in Judges and Chronicles illustrates the principle. Even the wicked Manasseh is allowed a long life in view of his tardy repentance (2 Chr. 33).

(5) The Wisdom Literature. The idea of twofold recompense is an important one in Proverbs (cf. 11:21, 31; 19:17). Happiness is the goal here, and obeying God is the way to it. Job, however, shows that there is a danger of serving God with the ulterior motive of achieving happiness (Job 1:9). If Ecclesiastes points out that ultimately the good may suffer and the wicked flourish (8:14), Job makes it plain that God himself is not to be bound by the principles of recompense, and Ps. 73 totally transcends the principle with its faith that fellowship with God means more than all recompense in either heaven or earth (73:25-26). [E. WÜRTHWEIN, IV, 706-12]

3. The Concept of Reward in Later Judaism. Later Judaism adopts the principle of recompense and combines it with eschatological expectation. Eternal life is promised to the righteous as a reward. There are already rewards and penalties in this life, but death also serves to punish the wicked and to atone for the sins of the righteous. Sometimes the idea of recompense is presented in commercial images, but the thought of divine grace and mercy is also present. Reward provides a strong incentive for keeping the law, although some rabbis insist strongly that the law is to be kept for its own sake and not just for the rewards it brings. While salvation will ultimately depend on God's forgiveness, the stress on human achievement introduces a common note of uncertainty and leads in some circles to the legalistic piling up of merits in order to counterbalance offenses.

4. The Concept of Reward in the NT.

(1) The Synoptists.

a. The Synoptic Gospels refer freely to both rewards and punishments. To do God's will is to lay up treasure in heaven (Mt. 6:19ff.). Faithful disciples will be rewarded (Mt. 5:12). The rich young ruler may find treasure in heaven (Mk. 10:21). Rewards are offered for service (Mt. 20:2; 24:45ff.; 19:27). Reward is either recompense for achievement (Mt. 5:7) or compensation for what is renounced (Mt. 10:39). The reward is God's kingdom. Like the punishment that is also threatened (cf. Mt. 11:20ff.; 18:23ff.; Mk. 12:9), it is future; the lot of disciples in this life is persecution. The one exception is in Mk. 10:29-30, where those who give up family for the gospel will find a new family in the community of faith. The community is the sign of the irruption of God's lordship with the coming of Christ and his raising from the dead.

b. Many of the sayings about reward and punishment have obvious parallels in Judaism. Scholars have thus raised the question how far they derive from Jesus himself and how far they may be fashioned or adapted by the community. Mk. 10:29-30; 11:25 Mt. 13:36ff.; 25:14ff., and Lk. 16:19ff. have all been subjected to minute analysis. Yet sayings like Mk 9:43ff.; 3:28-29; 12:1ff., Mt. 7:13-14; 10:28; 18:23ff., and Lk. 13:1ff. seem to be undeniably authentic.

c. The concept of reward is important for Jesus. Yet God rewards as a father, not as a judge (Mt. 6:1ff.; 25:34). He demands obedience, but the reward far exceeds what is deserved, and it is thus a matter of divine generosity rather than human merit. This lifts the concept out of the sphere of calculation. In Mt. 20:1 ff. the equal treatment of the laborers shows that reward is not according to achievement but according to the prodigality of love. Lk. 17:7ff. makes it plain that the concept of merit is totally repudiated. The promise of the kingdom to children in Mk. 10:15 strengthens this thought. God alone is good (Mk. 10:18), and this means that like children we must simply let the kingdom be granted to us. In Jesus the kingdom has already broken into time and it catches up the disciples in its living power, so that their moral actions are not autonomous achievements that deserve a reward but manifestations of a divine power that moves on to future fulfilment. For Jesus, disciples stand under the eyes of a holy God and owe obedience to him, but salvation is God's own work and in his generosity God grants to receptive hearts a reward which finds in the kingdom its commencement and consummation. The concept of reward is thus taken up into that of the kingdom as the divine glory undeservedly received.

a. Paul, too, speaks of twofold recompense (cf. 2 Cor. 5:10; Gal. 6:7-8; Rom. 2:1ff.). He adds promises and threats to his admonitions (cf. Gal. 5:21). He compares himself to a runner seeking a prize (1 Cor.

9:24ff.). Judgment is according to works (1 Cor. 3:13ff.). Paul himself seeks praise from God (1 Cor. 9:14-15). At the same time, the day of judgment is for Paul a day of victory and joy, for the reward is according to grace (Rom. 4:4). The fact that justification is by faith, and that faith itself is God's work, rules out any idea of merit. A new reality has come with Christ's life, death, and resurrection. The Spirit imparts this reality to believers, so that Christian life and work are no longer a matter of their own volition or achievement but of the Spirit's infilling and impulsion (Rom. 8:14; Gal. 5:22; Phil. 2:13). Thus, if Paul does more than all others, it is not he, but the grace of God that is with him (1 Cor. 15:10). There is no place for human boasting (Rom. 3:27). God in his grace gives the incomparable reward of his kingdom (1 Cor. 15:50), of the glory of Christ (Col. 3:4).

b. If a certain tension may thus be seen in Paul, it should be noted that he still speaks of reward and retribution because God is the holy God who demands obedience, because the Spirit manifests himself primarily in the ethical rather than the ecstatic sphere (Gal. 5:22), and because justification itself implies the seriousness of divine judgment. For Paul, then, twofold recompense is a safeguard against libertinism, ecstaticism, and moral passivity. Yet within the framework of grace and faith it involves no dependence on merit. It can accompany, then, a joyous assurance of salvation which need not add up achievements but even in the midst of moral struggle knows the grace of God and stands in the living power of his kingdom. Paul often speaks in traditional terms, but he lifts the concept of reward into the pure air of grace and faith, of the Spirit and joy, where no place remains for externalism or legalism.

c. Ephesians is wholly Pauline in its thinking about reward. The life of believers is grounded in God's saving work (2:5). Only as children of light can they do the works that God expects of them (2:8-9). Only in Christ is there power for truth and love (4:13). The divine election rules out all idea of claim or merit (1:4). Assurance of the inheritance rests on the indwelling of the Spirit (1:13-14). It is in this context that the admonition of 6:8 contains the thought of a divine recompense.

d. The Pastorals. These epistles, too, emphasize that God did not send the Savior because of works (Tit. 3:5; 2 Tim. 1:9). Yet the reverse of works is now God's pity rather than faith (Tit. 3:5). Practical moral concerns, then, are more prominent. God judges on the basis of works (1 Tim. 5:24-25) and there is a reward both in this world (1 Tim. 4:8) and the next (4:16). Yet works are possible only on the basis of the relation to Christ (1 Tim. 2:15).

(3) The Johannine Writings.

a. An echo of the idea of recompense may be caught in Jn. 9:31, but in general all thought of reward is transcended, for the resurrection corresponds to the life that is already present (6:39-40), eternal life fulfils the new birth from above (3:3, 6), all that disciples achieve derives from grace (1:12, 16), and sin and death are overcome by the gift of divine life (1 Jn. 3:9-10; Jn. 5:24ff.).

b. In Revelation judgment is the eschatological expression of the divine majesty. Sinners receive punishment on earth (2:22-23), but supremely at the judgment (11:18 etc.), when the righteous will receive the full blessings of the kingdom (2:7; 7:15-16; 11:12, etc.). Judgment is by works (20:12-13), and good works follow those who die in the Lord (14:13; cf. 7:9ff.; 14:4; 2:19). Yet Revelation is not legalistic, for the names of believers are in the book of life from all eternity (17:8), and already on earth they are kings and priests (1:6) and witnesses. Works, then, are an outworking of redemption and the reward is a public declaration of what they are. Being sealed, they do not fear the judgment but await the manifestation of the glory of God and their hidden kingship.

(4) Post-Pauline Writings.

a. Acts. Acts speaks of the reward of the Spirit for obedience (1:5; 2:1ff.). The presence of the same Spirit brings punishment even on earth to those who set themselves in deceitful and selfish opposition (5:4-5, 9-10; 8:20ff.). Judgment is proclaimed (10:42; 17:31; 24:15), but the Christian life rests on Christ's life, death, and resurrection, and on the ministry of the Spirit, so that grace replaces merit. The inheritance of 20:32 is God's gift rather than an earned payment (cf. the role of forgiveness and faith in 26:18).

b. Hebrews. As Hebrews warns its readers against relapse, the idea of recompense takes on great importance. There is punishment for apostasy, but rest is the reward of faithfulness (4:3), along with salvation (9:28) and the kingdom (12:28). Faith insures a part in the consummation. As faithfulness, it is rewarded; as hope it becomes fulfilment. Yet faith has already experienced the future reality (6:19). Christians live by the Spirit of grace (10:29) and bear the powers of the new aeon (6:5). For them the last judgment is grace (4:16), so that they move toward it with confident joy (10:19ff.). They do not have to rely on meritorious achievement but rest on grace (4:16).

c. James. Christians are regenerated by the word of truth (1:18). It is faith that expresses itself in works (2:14ff.), leads to prayer (1:6), and is confirmed in affliction (1:2). Suffering, not reward, comes in this life, and although faith is futile without works, there is no place for merit, since faith is God’s gift (2:5), election is the basis of the reward (2:5), and salvation rests on the implanted word (1:21) and the indwelling Spirit (4:5).

d. 1 Peter. This work, designed to strengthen believers in face of persecution, refers to the future inheritance as a recompense (5:6) and issues a plain reminder of the judgment. Yet again the basis of the Christian life is faith in Christ (1:3), Christians are regenerate (2:2) and set in the reality of the resurrection (1:3-4), and their salvation (1:9) or glorification (1:11) is the consummation of their calling rather than a merited payment.

e. Jude and 2 Peter. In their warnings against heretics, these epistles stress divine judgment (Jude 4, 6-7; 2 Pet. 2:3, 9) and expectation of the kingdom (2 Pet. 3:13). Here too, however, divine power is the basis of godliness (2 Pet. 1:3-4), and as partakers of the divine nature (1:4) believers may be at peace (3:14). In faith, prayer, and the love of God they look forward to being presented faultless before the presence of God’s glory with rejoicing (Jude 20ff.).

(5) The Meaning of Reward for Jesus and Primitive Christianity. The NT speaks freely of reward but transcends the concept. Strict recompense would mean judgment for all of us. Reward, then, is a term for God’s gracious generosity. It reminds us that we are set before God and it gives us an awareness of the gift of the kingdom. It implies, however, the indwelling of the Spirit, so that calculation is ruled out, and the reality of faith and the Spirit is the true incentive to moral action. Reward is the loving gift of the Father toward which believers may move with confident and childlike trust in the love that will perfect their calling in the glory of the kingdom.

A. Use of the Group. moicheúō in the active means “to commit adultery” or “to seduce,” and in the passive or middle “to be seduced” or (in the case of a woman) “to commit adultery” (cf. Mt. 5:27-28, 32). moicháō means “to commit adultery” or “to adulterate.” moicheía is “adultery,” “illicit intercourse,” while moíchos means “adulterer” or “lover,” and moichalís “adulterous” and as a noun “adulteress,” “mistress,” “harlot.”

B. Adultery in the OT and Judaism.

1. The Decalogue protects marriage (Ex. 20:14; Dt. 5:18) and thus forbids its violation by adultery; death is the penalty for transgression (Dt. 22:22). Where a wife is suspected of adultery, the husband may request trial by bitter water (Num. 5:16ff.), but he is not obliged to take steps against her (cf. Mt. 1:19).

2. Hosea compares the apostasy of Israel against God to adultery (2:4ff.; 3:1-2; 4:12ff.). Jeremiah uses the same comparison in 2:1; 5:7; 9:1. Israel breaks the marriage bond, and Jerusalem will bear the punishment of an adulteress (13:22). Ezekiel interprets Israel's history as a story of constant adultery (16:32; 23:37ff.).

3. Proverbs contains many warnings against marital infidelity (2:16ff.; 6:26ff.). Wine and strange women are to be avoided (23:31ff.; 7:5ff.). In Sirach the adulteress is a threefold transgressor: against God, her husband, and the children she may bear to another. Adulterous old men are especially offensive. Philo thinks adultery corrupts the soul as well as the body and sows a blameworthy seed.

4. Judaism gives more precise definitions of the act and the penalties. It distinguishes between adultery with Jews and non-Jews, and lays down that there must be warnings and witnesses if there are to be penalties. Divorce replaces death as the main punishment, and confession replaces the ceremony of bitter water. Adultery is a serious sin, the thought is equated with the act, and eternal judgment is the final penalty.

C. Adultery in the Greek and Roman World. Greek law strictly forbids adultery by women and grants to the husband or family the right of revenge (though this is limited by public law, and may be waived in favor of a public complaint). Guilty wives are to be put away. Ideally, moralists urge fidelity on husbands too, but in practice intercourse with the hetaíra is accepted. Roman law allows the husband to punish an adulterous wife (even by death), and a father has similar rights of punishment or revenge. Later, adultery becomes a penal offense with banishment as the punishment, but in the moral degeneration of the imperial period the infidelity of both husbands and wives is common.

D. The Group in the NT.

l. Literal Use. The NT puts the husband as well as the wife under the obligation of fidelity. Marriage is a lifelong partnership, divorce is contrary to God's original purpose (Mt. 19:6ff.), and remarriage after divorce is adultery (Mt. 5:32; 19:9; Mk. 10:11-12; Lk. 16:18). Adultery is present even in the desire (Mt. 5:28), so absolute is the divine requirement. Yet Jesus rejects hypocritical self-righteousness and proclaims forgiveness even for the adulterer (cf. Jn. 8:1ff.), although on the plain presupposition of repentance, and therefore without sapping the validity of the divine command (Jn. 8:11). Paul upholds the teaching of Jesus in the lax Hellenistic world (1 Cor. 5:1ff.; 6:9). Adultery is not just a matter of civil law but conflicts with God's holy will (1 Th. 4:3). Women are joint heirs of life and thus have the same honor as men (1 Pet. 3:7). Adultery excludes from the kingdom (1 Cor. 6:9), and marital fidelity must be kept intact (Heb. 13:4). Even the lustful glance is sinful (2 Pet. 2:14). The love of spouses is the positive relation that the prohibition of adultery protects (Rom. 13:9).

2. Figurative Use. The NT, too, uses the group figuratively for infidelity to God. Those who resist Jesus are an adulterous generation (Mt. 12:39). Love of the world is adultery against God (Jms. 4:4). Adultery is a figure for acceptance of the false teaching of the prophetess in Rev. 2:20; the children are her followers. [F. HAUCK, IV, 729-35]

mólis [hardly], mógis [hardly]

Both mólis and mógis mean "hardly," "with difficulty" (the two forms are interchangeable). In Rom. 5:7 mólis occurs in a parenthetical note. In human life people are unlikely to die even for the good, though perhaps some would do so. In contrast, Christ offers his life even for the ungodly. In 1 Pet. 4:18 we have a quotation from Prov. 11:31 LXX. The sufferings of the age make great demands on believers, so that it is only with difficulty that they will survive the test and stand in the judgment. The author's aim is to spur them on to faithfulness and impress on them their responsibility. [J. SCHNEIDER, IV, 735-36]

molýnō [to soil, defile], molysmós [defilement]

molýnō. a. This means “to soil,” “to smear.” b. Religiously it means “to defile.” It occurs three times for religious or cultic defilement in the NT. Contact with paganism defiles the conscience of the weak in 1 Cor. 8:7. In Rev. 3:4 and 14:4 the reference is not just to sexual continence in the strict sense but to the faithfulness of the community (cf. 14:1) as the bride of Christ (cf. 2 Cor. 11:2).

molysmós. This word means “defilement” in either a physical or a religious sense. In the one instance in the NT (2 Cor. 7:1) the reference is to defilement by sharing a pagan way of life; believers are to separate themselves from paganism (6: 14ff.). [F. HAUCK, IV, 736-37]

monogenḗs [only begotten]

A. The Usage outside the NT. In compounds with genēs, adverbs describe the nature rather than the source of derivation. Hence monogenēs is used for the only child. More generally it means “unique” or “incomparable.” The LXX has the first sense in Judg. 11:34 and the second in Ps. 22:20. agapētós occurs in Gen. 22:2, 12 where monogenḗs might have been used (cf. Mk. 1:11), but while the only child may be “beloved,” the terms are not synonymous. Philo refers to the lógos as prōtógonos rather than monogenḗs. Ps. Sol. 18:4 refers to God’s chastisement coming on Israel as his firstborn and only-begotten son.

B. The Use in the NT.

1. In the NT the term occurs only in Luke, John, and Hebrews. Isaac is monogenēs in Heb. 11:7, and the son of the widow at Nain (Lk. 7:12), the daughter of Jairus (8:42), and the demoniac boy (8:42) are all only children.

2. Only John uses the term for Jesus. John calls Christians the tékna of God rather than his huioí (cf. 1:12; 11:52; 1 Jn. 3:1). Jesus is the only huiós; his unique relation to God is thus given emphasis. God is the patḗr ídios of Jesus; no others stand in the same relationship (Jn. 5:18). It is thus that Jesus is monogenḗs (Jn. 1:14; 3:16; 1 Jn. 4:9). Because he is the only-begotten Son, his sending into the world is a supreme proof of God’s love (Jn. 3:16). But it also means that decision for life or death takes place in relation to him (3:18). As the only-begotten Son he shares all things with the Father. His glory is not merely like that of an only child; it is that of the only-begotten Son (1:14). He is not just unique; he is the Son, for combined with huiós the term describes his origin. The risen Lord is also the preexistent Lord, who is with God, is loved by him, and shares his glory from all eternity (17:5, 24). Whether or not this implies actual begetting by God is debated by some, but 1 Jn. 5:18 definitely teaches this, for sonship is here presented in terms of begetting. John does not lift the veil of mystery that lies over the eternal begetting, for he aims to awaken faith rather than give systematic knowledge. Yet eternal begetting is an implication of monogenḗs in its distinctive application to Jesus. [F. BÜSCHEL, IV, 737-41] morphḗ [form], morphóō [to form, fashion], mórphōsis [form], metamorphóō [to transform] morphḗ.

A. Greek Usage.

1. The Meaning. morphḗ means a. “form,” “external appearance” (humans, animals, plants, statues, etc.), b. “good pleasure,” and c. “kind,” “manner.”

2. Synonyms. In its basic meaning morphḗ is synonymous with eídos, idéa, and schḗma, but as the form proper to a being in its objective reality it has its own nuance for all the interchangeability.

3. Philosophical Use. morphḗ has no unequivocal sense in philosophy. Thus it is used for light and darkness as forms of being, for the forms of appearance of numbers, or for distinctive forms of a concept. Aristotle distinguishes between form and matter, but there is a relation between essence (or nature) and form, and ultimately there is a unity of form and matter. Aristotle can also use form for the various kinds of a virtue like courage. The term never achieves any fixity that influences ordinary usage, and from Stoicism onward it is rare in philosophy. Philo contrasts unformed matter with the creation, in which all things have received their forms. In general morphḗ in all its nuances represents what may be seen by the senses and not what is mentally apprehended.

4. The LXX. morphḗ is rare in the LXX. It occurs for "form" in Job 4:16 and "expression" in Dan. 3:19. Another rendering has it for "color" (of the face) in Dan. 5:6.

B. morphḗ theoú in the Greek World.

1. The idea that deity has form occurs frequently in Greek religion (cf. the concept of epiphany). The gods take shifting forms in Homer, and legends narrate the presence of gods or spirits or heroes in bodily form. In magic, spiritual forces are asked to take bodily form, and in Hermes mysticism the primal man, as the son of the father of all things, is of the same form.

2. Doubts. Doubts soon arise as to whether one should think of deity assuming bodily form. While popular belief retains the concept, philosophy censures such anthropomorphism as unworthy of the gods. Socrates looks for deity in its works, and Plato argues that the gods remain in their own perfect forms. With the belief in immortality, the idea is present that the gods have a supraterrestrial form that believers will share after death. Thus, while there is criticism of the idea that gods take various terrestrial forms, philosophy sublimates the concept by ascribing to gods their own forms.

C. The Form of God in the OT and Judaism.

1. In the OT the idea of God having a perceptible form is totally alien. For this reason anthropomorphisms may be used freely. The theomorphic view of humanity is more important than the anthropomorphic view of deity. When God manifests himself in sensory form (cf. Gen. 15:17; Ex. 3:2ff.), this sets limits as well as giving expression. Not even the prophets may see God face to face, and no image of God may be made. The personal and ethical concept of God resists sensory objectification.

2. Judaism, too, finds no place for statements about the form of God. Philo says emphatically that God is not anthrōpómorphos, and Josephus accepts the philosophical criticism of Greek anthropomorphisms and scoffs at attempts by painters or sculptors to depict the deity. The rabbis have a clear sense that one can speak about the form of God only in a figurative way.

D. The morphḗ of Christ in the NT.

1. The "another form" of Mk. 16:12 is a human form but different from that which Jesus bore during his earthly life (cf. Lk. 24:16).

2. Jesus undergoes a change of form at the transfiguration.

3. Phil. 2:6-7 speaks in hymnic style of the "form" of Christ. Exhorting to unselfish humility, the passage says that Jesus took the form of a doúlos in an act of exemplary renunciation. Prior to the incarnation he is in the form of God, i.e., he bears the image of the divine majesty, and after the incarnation he is exalted again as the kýrios. In antithesis to the earlier and the later glory, his incarnation is a time of humble service when he bends his own will to that of others. His self-denial is not just the opposite of a selfish exploitation of his position but stands in the sharpest possible contrast to his former mode of being in divine power and splendor. He comes down from the height of glory to the abyss of lowliness as the Redeemer who is both above history and in history. There is here no mythical concept of a god in human form, nor is there any idea of a metamorphosis. Materially the phrase morphē theoú is wholly in the biblical tradition; it is not the same as the eikṓn toú theoú of, e.g., 2 Cor. 4:4; Col. 1:15.

morphóō. In the active this word means “to form,” “to fashion,” e.g., artists their materials, and in the passive “to take on form” (especially in the womb). The only NT instance is in Gal. 4:19, where the growth of Christ in believers is compared to development in the womb. This growth is an ongoing process, both open and secret, and both a gift and a task, with maturity as the goal.

mórphōsis. This word means “forming” or “shaping” (e.g., shaping trees), and then, as the result of this activity, “form” or “figure.” In Rom. 2:17ff. the law is the representation or embodiment of knowledge and truth in Jewish eyes. In 2 Tim. 3:5 the reference is to an external form of religion with no inner power, i.e., a mere appearance without the corresponding reality.

A. Linguistic Data. This word, predominantly middle or passive, means “to change into another form.” The change may be an external one, or a change of state, or an inner change.

B. Comparative Religion. A common religious belief is that the gods can change into other forms. In apocalyptic and mysticism humans change into a supraterrestrial form. In Judaism such a change is a gift of eschatological salvation. In the mysteries it involves liberation from the body and deification. Magic promises a change into divine form, and magicians claim a godlike nature through union with the divine form.

C. The NT. A transformation into supraterrestrial form takes place at the transfiguration in Mk. 9:2 and Mt. 17:2. The context is eschatological. What is promised to believers takes place already for Jesus as the bearer of a unique call. It does so as the anticipation and guarantee of the new reality. It shows that the glory of consummation is the goal of his way of suffering and death. As regards believers, transformation begins already in this life. Seeing the glory of the Lord in the Spirit, they are changed into the image of him whose glory they see (2 Cor. 3:18). This is not mystical deification but a reattainment of the divine likeness. It does not take place by rituals but by the ministry of the Spirit. It is not for an elite few but for all Christians. It is not just a hope for the future (cf. 1 Cor. 15:44ff.) but begins already with the coming of the Spirit as a deposit. It carries with it an imperative (Rom. 12:2). Set in the new aeon, Christians must reshape their conduct in accordance with it. This takes place as their minds and wills are renewed by the Spirit. They are thus to become what they are. [J. BEHM, IV, 742-59]

móschos [calf]

The calf figures a good deal in the sacrificial rules of Leviticus. The making of a golden calf is the great sin of Israel at Sinai (Ex. 32:4). One of the creatures of the vision of Ezek. 1:4ff. has the face of a móschos (cf. also taúros in Dt. 32:14; Is. 1:11; Heb. 9:13). In Lk. 15:1lff. a fatted calf is killed in honor of the returning prodigal. The blood of goats and calves is mentioned in Heb. 9:12, 19 (bulls in 9:13 and 10:4). The scene in Rev. 4 is based on Ezek. 1:4ff. (cf. also Is. 6:1ff.). The creatures are angelic powers attesting to God’s presence in the visible world. 1 Clem. 52 quotes Pss. 7:16; 50:14-15, etc. to show that God prefers confession to the offering of bullocks. Barn. 8.1ff. tries to give a christological sense to the red heifer of

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

Num. 19 and to relate the rite as a whole to the saving work of Christ and the apostolic preaching. [O. MICHEL, IV, 760-62]

mýthos [myth]

A. Problems Raised by the Term.

a. The word mýthos, or myth, can be highly regarded when it is taken to express a total view of things or to have the dignity of supreme religious value. Basic here is the opinion that life can be expressed only in terms of myth.

b. Myth also enjoys high regard when, as a unity of form and content, it is viewed as a symbol whereby philosophical systems can be found in primitive antiquity.

c. Divorced from history, myth may also be accorded high religious value when it is seen as the absolute expression of religious institutions, experiences, or ideas.

d. For those who think that historical reality and truth are essential to genuine revelation, myth has no religious value. Thus the NT opposes myth to history (2 Pet. 1:16) and truth (2 Tim. 4:4), and declares it to be incompatible with the divine oikonomía and with true piety (1 Tim. 1:4; 4:7). Many skeptics who dismiss the NT stories themselves as myths agree with this evaluation.

B. The Development of the Meaning.

1. "Thought." The etymology is much debated. Derivation from mýō ("to close"), myéō ("to initiate"), or the cry mý! does not commend itself. The stem is probably an Indo-European word with the basic meaning "thought." The use of the verb mythéomai supports this theory, as does the use in Homer.

2. When they are merely thought, mýthoi may be intentions, opinions, ideas, reasons, or counsels.

3. Thoughts, however, have an urge to express themselves. The term mýthos can thus take on the senses a. "saying" (with such nuances as proverb, statement, reply, proposal, speech, report, or discussion), b. "word," and c. "story" (either as a story of facts, i.e., a report etc., or as an unauthenticated story, i.e., a rumor, legend, fairy tale, fable, plot of a play or poem, or myth in the narrower sense of a story about the gods).

C. Myth in the Greek World and Hellenism.

1. The Many Senses. Writers sense the tension in a word that can mean both factual story (or even fact) on the one side and invented story on the other. This tension comes to light in translation and involves the possibility of mistranslation.

2. Antonyms. On the analogy of épos, mýthos becomes an antonym of érgon. On the other hand, it also stands in antithesis to lógos, which is more closely associated with truth (alḗtheia). As distinct from lógos, mýthos is a. the fairy story in contrast to credible history, b. the mythical form of an idea in contrast to its dialectical presentation, or c. popular myth in contrast to the kernel of truth that it contains.

3. mýthoi in the Intellectual World of Greece.

a. The Cultus and Religious Teaching. Cultus and myth are originally a unity as religious experience takes shape both as cultic action that represents deity and as stories that proclaim it. The guardians of cultus and myth are the priestly theologians and the poets (in religious drama). Yet the poets, like the philosophers, treat the myths with some skepticism (cf. the humorous scenes in Homer and the rough handling in Euripides and Aristophanes). Aristotle finds in myths a symbolic expression of pantheistic theology, but the ideas of fate and right tend to dispel their authority. The enlightened thus treat myths either as crafty inventions or as exaggerations of real history. Yet myths retain their religious force even into the Hellenistic period.

b. Poetry. Even when it loses its religious power myth can evoke fear and pity and it thus remains the raw material of poetry. As Plato says, there is no poetry without myths. Myth dies only when it loses, not its credibility, but its force as an ideal and example.

c. Philosophy. Philosophers, too, make use of myths. Plato refuses to scorn them; they are for him the symbolical reality of the sphere that is accessible only to faith. He does not accept them as they are, for only fragments fit into this view. With great inventive power he uses these fragments to create new philosophical statements. He also produces new mythical constructs as vehicles for his rich and varied thinking. Myth carries the line of lógos beyond the frontiers of conceptual knowledge. The union of mýthos and lógos is linked to the fact that Plato's philosophy is also a doctrine of salvation concerned with human destiny.

d. Spiritual Direction and Education. Both traditional and newly invented myths serve an educational purpose. This is true in Hesiod and Plato. It is less true in Aristotle, who gives a higher place to lógos, and later mýthos is used only in the interests of morality or as a first stage in rhetorical instruction. Plato finds a special place for the fairy tale, which with its mixture of the invented and the true is well adapted for the teaching of children.

4. The Allegorical Interpretation of Myth. Whereas Plato uses myths to embody truths, a later age seeks to discover truth in traditional myths, thereby warding off attacks on their irrationality and immorality. Stoicism in particular produces masters in the art of allegorizing.

5. The Evaluation and Use of Myth.

a. Stoicism. The Stoics present myths as primitive philosophy in historical dress. They find in them their own natural philosophy and ethical instruction.

b. For Stoicism myth is valid as a symbol. Poseidonius goes further, regarding it as the expression of the higher needs of the mind which thought alone cannot meet.

c. The mystery religions treat myth as the representation of experiences that either cannot or should not be given rational expression. Later, however, even the mysteries put the meaning of myth in words by means of allegorical exposition.

d. In connection with the mysteries mythical themes play a symbolical role on monuments and sarcophagi.

e. Gnosticism dethrones both ancient myth and history alike. Allegory is here a revolutionary instrument for the transvaluation of all values, both pagan and biblical. It blends the two in the new myth of Gnostic speculation.

6. Criticism and Repudiation of Myth. Plato is openly critical of traditional myths, and will allow mythical poets no place in his ideal state. Aristotle, Epicurus, Plutarch, and others follow a similar line and disqualify even allegorical exegesis. In their eyes myth is childish, untrue, and of little moral worth.

7. Conclusion. The ancient world treats myth in many different ways including joyous acceptance, profound interpretation, allegorical exegesis, and frivolous mockery, but there is no basic repudiation on religious grounds outside the biblical sphere.

D. mýthos and Myths in the OT (LXX) and Judaism.

1. The word mýthos is an alien one to the OT.

2. Whether myth itself is alien has been much debated. Some scholars think the stories of Gen. 1ff. are myths, but if the OT adopts mythical materials it historicizes them, or, as in the case of the prophets, simply uses them as poetic images (cf. Is. 14; Ezek. 29). Apocalyptic relates several myths to the last time, and Wisdom literature possibly has a hidden basis in the Sophia myth. The rabbis use even Greek myths as parables.

E. mýthoi in the NT.

1. Myth as an Alien Body in the NT The NT uses the term only in the negative statements of 1 Tim. 1:4; 4:7; Tit. 1:14; 2 Pet. 1:16; 2 Tim. 4:4. The gospel proclaims God's great acts in history (Acts 2:11). It is thus lógos, not mýthos (cf. 2 Pet. 1:19).

2. The Problem of NT mýthoi. What are the mýthoi that the NT repudiates?

(1) A first question is whether one is to distinguish between the mýthoi of present and future heretics (1 Tim. 4 and 2 Tim. 4). There is no good reason to do so. A further question is whether the mýthoi of 1 and 2 Timothy and those of Titus are the same. Both seem to have the same derivation, both threaten the truth of the gospel (2 Tim. 4:4; Tit. 1:14), and both involve moral defects (1 Tim. 4:7; Tit. 1:16).

(2) But are these Hellenistic or Jewish mýthoi? Some commentators think they are stories of the gods in the Greek sense, others think they are of a Gnostic type, relating the genealogies to the Gnostic aeons, but it is more likely that we are to see in them Jewish fables, most likely connected with a Jewish Gnostic sect.

(3) The reference in 2 Peter is eschatological, and here again it seems that we have mýthoi of a Jewish type which the author contrasts with the apostolic proclamation of Christ's coming glory.

3. Myth, Truth, and History.

(1) Myth and Truth for the Greeks. The Greeks can speak of the truth in mýthos, but Plato, while regarding mýthos as a reflection of truth, thinks that it is in itself only an uncertain or false lógos. Hence the term comes to be regarded as the opposite of truth.

(2) Myth and History in Antiquity. At first myth is regarded as a first stage of historical writing, and even later it is seen as an element in history, and history itself is turned into myth (cf. the exploits of Alexander).

(3) Myth, Truth, and History in the NT. The NT gives new depth to the distinction between myth and truth by way of the historical actualizing of truth in Christ. Truth is here divine fact with the force of historical reality. A word or history cannot contain truth if it has no relation to reality. There is thus a sharp antithesis between myth and truth.

4. Designations and Relations of NT mýthoi.

(1) 2 Tim. 4:4. Myths here, scornfully called "the" myths, are opposed to the lógos of the gospel and are spread by people who cater to human likings. The lógos is the incarnate word; if it is replaced by myth, all is lost, and even if it is only linked with myth, it is betrayed. The teachers now are philosophers rather than the original poets of antiquity.

(2) 1 Tim. 4:7. Myths here are called ungodly and foolish. They have nothing to do with the true God and are indeed unholy and immoral, as the Greeks themselves come to perceive (cf. Plato). They are also silly, i.e., old wives' tales rather than educationally valuable fairy stories.

(3) 1 Tim. 1:4. The point in this verse is that interest in mýthoi and genealogies, while possibly harmless in itself, does not serve the divine work of salvation that builds on faith but leads to speculation, perhaps by way of allegorical exposition.

(4) Tit. 1:14. This sharp warning identifies the mýthoi as Jewish (probably the allegorical development of haggadic and halakic pieces), and argues that they are a human wresting of the truth which turns away from sound faith.

(5) 2 Pet. 1:16. The author has himself seen the glory of the Lord which will one day be manifested to the world. He thus rejects proclamation in the form of self-invented speculation and resists the accusation that the apostolic message, based on OT prophecy and the gospel history, itself contains mýthoi. As regards the first point, it is a feature of myths that they are poetic inventions, and that as such they may be freely altered or adapted by philosophers and priests. As regards the second point, Philo, too, sees that biblical religion differs from pagan religion by reason of its basis in history rather than myth, although he himself, with his allegorizing, treats the biblical history as though it were myth when he finds difficult passages. Origen follows a similar course, especially in answer to the charge of Celsus that the biblical stories are inferior and valueless even as myths (the common accusation of educated pagans; cf. Porphyry and Julian). 2 Peter, however, insists on the historical reality of the Christian message on the basis of the prophetic word and the apostolic eyewitness.

5. Myths in the Gospel? In the light of comparative religion, it is sometimes argued that there are mythical elements in the Gospels and that causal connections exist between the ideas of Paul and John and the mythical concepts of the age. The NT authors obviously make use of the ideas and vocabulary of their time, but there is more analogy than borrowing. Furthermore, as in the OT, what is analogous is historicized, or integrated into the sphere of God’s kingdom. The apostles preach the mighty reality of Christ by which all else is transformed.

F. The Evaluation of Myths in the Early Church.

1. The Apologists mock pagans for their own myths and reject their right to allegorize them. Origen argues that pagan myths are inseparable from a pagan view of God. Ancient church orders view teachers with great reserve because they have to teach myths, and a primary objection to Gnosticism is that its stories are mýthoi.

2. Christian (like Jewish) art makes some use of pagan myth, e.g., in the depiction of the Good Shepherd as Hermes. Here, then, is some impulse, by way of allegorizing, toward the development of a Christian mythology. In the main, however, the church insists that there is no relation between NT lógos and myth.

G. Conclusions.

1. Myth as a Form of Religious Communication. Antiquity uses myth to teach children (the fairy story) and then to teach adults (philosophical allegorizing). The NT, however, is from first to last the narration of facts. The form may vary (cf. the Synoptists and John), but the theme is always what God says and does.

2. Myth as parable. In its later stages paganism uses myths as parables. The NT, too, is full of illustrations, but these are pure parables that never lay claim to historical truth but are likenesses of the kingdom. In the long run, they can be dispensed with (Jn. 16:25).

3. Myth as Symbol. Paganism finally regards myth as a symbol of eternal realities. In the NT, however, the central symbol is the harsh reality of the cross, which cannot be divorced from its personal representative and its historical setting, with which no myth can be integrated, and on which no myth can be imposed.

4. A New Use of the Term? In two ways an attempt might be made to bring myth into the context of the biblical data. The first is by construing myth as an account of facts in the divine realm. But this involves an almost impossible reorienting of the term. It also carries with it the risk of a dehistoricizing which will negate the incarnation, i.e., the intersection of divine and earthly history, on which everything depends. The second way is to regard the gospel as fulfilled myth. But this is to presuppose that myth is not just a product of human longing and to bring the mythical theologians of paganism into dubious proximity to the prophetic theologians of the old covenant. Can one truly say, in the light of Jn. 14:6, that there are traces of the Logos in myth?

myktērízō. This word, which literally means "to suffer from nose-bleeding," takes on the sense "to turn up one's nose." It is thus a common term for scorn in the LXX, e.g., scorn of enemies in 2 Kgs. 19:21, of the slothful in Prov. 12:8, of pagan gods in 1 Kgs. 18:27. It is a sin when directed against God's messengers (2 Chr. 36:16) or chastisements (Prov. 1:30) or against parents (Prov. 15:5). The only NT instance is in Gal. 6:7, where it is a term for the mocking of God by a life that will not accept the lordship of the Spirit (cf. 5:25). The reference is not to verbal scoffing but to despising God by a whole way of life. [H. PREISKER, IV, 796]

A. In the LXX. This word, too, means "to turn up one's nose." In the LXX it is the rendering of many Hebrew originals. It relates 1. to the scorning of God and his messengers and followers by the ungodly (cf. Prov. 1:30; 23:9). Fools are scoffers, and this is their real offense (Prov. 11:12; 15:5, 20). 2. There is then a scorning of the wicked by the righteous and even by God himself (cf. Is. 37:22; Ps. 2:4; Prov. 1:26). 3. The present situation is that the righteous are exposed to the scorn of the wicked, partly as chastisement, partly as blessing.

B. In the NT. Lk. 23:35 quotes Ps. 22:7-8 in the story of the passion. It thus gives historical concreteness to a general phenomenon. Mt. 27:41 and Mk. 15:31 use empaízein (cf. Lk. 23:36), which refers more to the outward action, while ekmyktērízein denotes the inward attitude. Another instance is in Lk. 16:14, where the Pharisees scoff at the sayings of Jesus about mammon. While the Pharisees are lovers of money, they can hardly be scoffing at the fact that Jesus, although poor, teaches about poverty and wealth, or at the idea that wealth and piety are incompatible. More probably (cf. v. 15) they are expressing an attitude of conceited superiority which a priori rejects the bearer of revelation. The point is not, then, a psychological one, but rather that (as in the OT) mockery is an integral burden of discipleship, or, in this instance, of the messianic mission of Jesus and the suffering it entails.

mýron [ointment], myrízō [to anoint]

The use of ointment (vegetable oil to which sweet-smelling materials are added) is of great antiquity, e.g., in medicine, the cultus, magic, embalming, feminine adornment, and festal decoration. The main NT use is in the stories of anointing. The costly ointment is spikenard in Mk. 14:3 par. Jn. 12:3. The head of Jesus is anointed in Matthew and Mark, while Mary anoints the feet in John (cf. also Lk. 7:6ff.). The ointment is carried in the customary alabaster box, and this is probably opened at the neck (Mk. 14:3). Jesus explains that the anointing points ahead to his burial (Mt. 26:12; Mk. 14:8; Jn. 12:7). In Lk. 23:56 the women prepare spices and ointments to give fragrance to the tomb. In Rev. 18:13 mýron is included in the cargo of the great fleet. The verb myrízō occurs only in Mk. 14:8 in the sense "to anoint."

mystḗrion [mystery, secret], myéō [to be initiated, learn the secret]

v. verse

par. paragraph

mystērion.

A. The Mysteries in the Greek World and Hellenism.

1. The Cultic Concept.

a. The word mystḗrion is used for many mystery cults which enjoined silence on their devotees, so that our knowledge of them is fragmentary. They are cultic rites portraying the destinies of a god in such a way as to give the devotees a share in them.

b. Those who wish to participate must undergo initiation in a ceremony which embraces various offerings and purifications, which may itself be called a mystery, and which involves certain conditions and new relationships.

c. The mysteries promise initiates salvation (sōtēría) by the dispensing of cosmic life. The deities are chthonic deities, the mysteries are connected with the seasons, and in general the gods undergo sufferings that are enacted in cultic dramas expressing joy and sorrow, birth and death, ending and new beginning. The priests and initiates enter into the drama and effect union with the gods by various sacramental actions, e.g., meals, fertility rites, baptisms, investitures, and symbolical journeys. What is denoted is a change which, by way of participation with the deity, insures them of future salvation. The mysteries are rituals of death and life that prepare the devotees for the life to come. Examples from Eleusis, the Dionysus rite, and the Attis and Isis mysteries all support this.

d. In all mysteries the vow of silence expresses the distinction between initiates and others. This vow is an essential feature, as all the evidence goes to show. It does not seem to extend to the essential message, but rather to the rites, symbols, formulas, etc. These must be protected against profanation, e.g., by frivolous imitation. The special sanctity of the cultic actions is thus the true reason for the command of silence.

2. The Mysteries in Philosophy. Plato adopts the ideas and terminology of the mysteries when he speaks of a divinely appointed way to the goal of the vision of true being. In Plato mysteries are hidden teachings rather than cultic actions. This opens the door for philosophy to represent itself as a special way of knowledge whereby initiates are given an understanding of doctrines that are concealed from others. The aim in this mystagogic philosophy is to distinguish between real truth and its symbolical appearance. The knowledge itself is divinely inspired and its theme is the allegorical interpretation of names, rites, myths, etc. The mysteries express the truth that the divine cannot be declared openly but only symbolically. This establishes the new use of the term mystḗria for secret teachings. The cultic mysteries are no longer true mystḗria, for what the term really implies is the divine ground of being rather than cultic encounter with deity.

3. The Mysteries in Magic. The magical texts offer a rich use of the term mystḗria for magical actions, for formulas that effect magic, for magically potent mystery writing, and for other means employed in magic, e.g., ointments, animals, and amulets.

4. The Mysteries in Secular Usage. By way of figurative usage based on the cults, the term comes into the secular sphere for private secrets, family secrets, and secrets or mysteries in general. But instances are rare and late. The religious use maintains its dominance.

5. The Mysteries in Gnosticism. Gnosticism presupposes and fosters an intermingling and interpreting of ancient mystery cults. A redemption myth governs the understanding of the mysteries and makes possible the adoption of their various symbols. The mystery remains inasmuch as only special people can receive the divine message. But it is also disclosure inasmuch as the message may be imparted to others. Everything belonging to the heavenly world, to human origin and redemption, is mystery. In contrast to the mystery religions, however, the cultus is now the by-product of the myth, not the myth of the cultus. Mystery belongs to the heavenly sphere. The bringer of it to us is the redeemed Redeemer. The disclosure is itself an enactment of redemption; hence the supreme significance of gnṓsis. The concept of the mysteries may then find an extended use in relation to sacred books, rites, and conjurations. These are powerful secret instruments which lose their potency if they are disclosed. They are opposed by the mysteries of evil forces; the Redeemer brings these mysteries to light and thus robs them of their power.

B. mystḗrion in the LXX, Apocalyptic, and Rabbinic Judaism.

l. LXX Usage. In the LXX the word occurs only in the Hellenistic period. It may refer to the mystery cults (Wis. 14:15) or show their influence (Wis. 6:22; 8:4, etc.). The secular sense also occurs, e.g., in Tob. 12:7 (the secret plans of a king) or Sir. 22:22 (the secrets of a friend). The word takes on a special sense in Daniel, namely, as the concealed intimation of future events that will be disclosed or interpreted only by God or by those whom he inspires (2:28-29; 4:9).

2. Apocalyptic. Apocalyptic is the disclosure of divine secrets. Hence the concept of mystḗrion is important in it. God's being and rule are unsearchable. Apocalyptic speaks objectively of prepared and hidden realities that are shown to the seer as he is led through the heavenly spheres by an angel. As the hidden basis of reality, the mysteries are those of heaven, creation, the aeon, storm, etc., as well as of the law, the righteous, and sinners. Disclosure of the mysteries involves names, measurements, times, etc. The seer has a vision of what will come to pass and of the final destinies of sinners and the righteous. The mysteries are God's present counsels that will ultimately be manifested. They are made known to the seer by signs or rapture, but only in enigmatic visions. The mysteries made known by prying angels are responsible for human possession of forbidden powers and magical arts. Common to the mystery cults and apocalyptic are the demand for silence, the role of the angel (or mystagogue), and the heavenly journey. But in apocalyptic the mysteries deal with a destiny that the deity ordains rather than suffers, reception of the mysteries does not bring deification, and the orientation of the mysteries is to eschatological revelation on a cosmic scale.

3. Rabbinic Judaism. Rabbinic Judaism has little time for apocalyptic after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, but earlier we find some discussion of secret doctrines, the understanding of oral tradition, circumcision etc. as a mystery, the promise that the secrets of the law will be revealed to those who study it for its own sake, and the obligation laid on Israel to keep its secrets.

C. mystḗrion in the NT.

1. The Mystery of the Divine Lordship in Mk. 4:11-12 and Parallels. The only Synoptic use of mystḗrion is in the saying about the purpose of the parables that comes between the parable of the sower and its interpretation. The saying distinguishes the disciples from those who are without comprehension and are thus taught in parables alone. This method conceals the mystery of the divine rule from all but the disciples, who are also taught in parables, but to whom an explanation is given. The context shows what the mystery is that is generally intimated in the parables. It is the fact of the coming of the kingdom, which only faith can grasp. The eyes of the disciples are open to the dawn of the messianic age (Mt. 13:16-17). Hence the parables teach them about the incursion of God's rule in the word and work of Jesus. By grace they perceive that the mystery is Jesus himself as the Messiah. The parables are ultimately a veiling of the mystery because they are so simple. The fact of the sower going out to sow is itself the new world of God.

2. The Mystery of Christ. In Paul the mystḗrion is connected with the kḗrygma (1 Cor. 1:23; 2:1, 7). Paul uses Gnostic terminology but links the mystḗrion to the word of the cross which is the divine wisdom (sophía). The mystḗrion is the eternal counsel of God which is hidden from the world but eschatologically fulfilled in the cross of the Lord of glory and which carries with it the glorification of believers. This mystḗrion is before the world (1 Cor. 2:7), hidden from the aeons (2:8), hidden in God (Eph. 3:9), but fulfilled in Christ. The times reach their end with its manifestation (Eph. 1:10). The mystḗrion embraces the historical enactment of God’s purpose. In Christ the heavenly reality breaks into this world. It not only achieves the victory of the cross but carries with it an indwelling in believers (Col. 1:27). It also unites Jews and Gentiles in the one body of Christ (Eph. 1:9-10; 3:4ff.). The mystḗron is not itself revelation; it is the object of revelation. It does not declare itself; God in his free grace discloses it to his elect. The term thus occurs with terms for revelation (Rom. 16:25; Eph. 3:3, 5; 1 Cor. 2:10, etc.). Its proclamation belongs to the event of the mystḗrion and its manifestation. The apostolic oikonomía is part of the oikonomía of the mystery (Eph. 3:2, 9). The apostles, then, are bearers of revelation. In the reception of their message the calling of believers and their setting in the heavenly sphere take place (Eph. 2:5-6). The concealment of the mystḗrion is also present with its manifestation in an antithesis of the then and the now (Rom. 16:25), the rulers of this world and believers (1 Cor. 2:6ff.), and the now and the one day. Even as it is now revealed, the mystḗrion conceals the consummation (cf. Col. 1:24-25; Eph. 3:13). The more formal use in 1 Tim. 3:9 and 3:16 (the mystery of faith and religion) derives its point from the reference to the eschatological enactment in Christ, as the rest of v. 16 shows.

3. The General Use in Paul and the Rest of the NT.

a. To penetrate the mysteries of God is the special gift of the prophet (1 Cor. 13:2). The contents of tongue-speaking are also mysteries (1 Cor. 14:2). The destiny of Israel is a mystery (Rom. 11:25). The present obduracy of Israel has eschatological significance. The transformation that takes place at the parousia is a mystery, too, in 1 Cor. 15:51.

b. In Eph. 5:31-32 the mystḗrion is not marriage itself but the prophecy of the relation between Christ and the church which lies hid in Gen. 2:24.

c. The mystḗrion of lawlessness in 2 Th. 2:3ff. is eschatological; the mark of the present time is that in hidden form the lawless one, who will finally be manifested, is already at work in it. Rev. 15:5, 7 speaks similarly of the mystḗrion of the harlot Babylon, whose name holds the mystery of her power, but the unmasking of whose secret shows that she is marked for destruction. There is a mystḗrion of ungodly forces only because the hidden plan of God moves to its fulfilment (cf. 10:7). In the light of this fulfilment the divine understands the mystery of the seven stars in the right hand of Christ (1:16, 20). Christ, who holds the symbol of dominion, will be the Lord of the new world. It may be noted that in the NT mystḗrion always has an eschatological reference, is never a secret discipline that is to be protected against profanation, and carries no express connections with the mystery cults.

D. mystḗrion in the Early Church.

1. The Apostolic Fathers. In these works mystḗrion is rare. The reference in Ignatius (Ephesians 19.1) is to the arrangements for salvation that are prepared in heaven and then revealed. Did. 11:11 is a difficult passage; the allusion is perhaps to the spiritual marriage of a prophet that represents the heavenly mystery of the marriage between Christ and the church.

2. The Apologists.

a. The Apologists use the term for the mystery cults (e.g., Justin Apology 1.25.27), or for the secret teachings of the Gnostics (cf. Irenaeus Against Heresies, Preface).

b. They also apply it in various ways to Christianity, e.g., for the facts of salvation (Justin Apology 1.13), or for OT types (Justin Dialogue 44) such as the name of Joshua (111) or the Passover lamb (40).

3. Alexandrian Theology. Adopting the Greek concept, this theology regards Christian truths as mysteries. Believers are led by Christ through the little mysteries to the great ones that are to be passed on only in veiled form (Clement Stromateis 4.162.3; 4.3.1; 5.57.2; 6.124.6). Thus we move through Proverbs and Ecclesiastes to the hidden truths of Canticles (Origen Homily on Canticles). Later, dogma is sometimes called mystḗrion because it is not fully disclosed and is profaned by discussion.

4. mystḗrion as a Term for the Sacraments. Cultic ideas return with the use of mystḗrion for the sacraments, although pagan mysteries are naturally seen as a demonic imitation. The sacraments represent the saving acts of Christ in a hidden form, and many mystery terms come to be used when the equation is fully made in the fourth century. Both the saving acts and the cultic representation are called mystḗrion, and by the latter believers are taken up into the former, since it contains the reality of these saving acts.

5. mystḗrion and sacramentum. In the Latin Bible sacramentum is at first the rendering of mystḗrion. As the soldier's oath, the sacramentum is an initiation (the mysteries, too, impose an oath). Tertallian preserves the military use by seeing a commitment to the rule of faith (cf. also Cyprian), but in later usage sacramentum becomes a full-scale equivalent of mystḗrion, may be used for it (along with mysterium) in the Vulgate, and becomes the preferred term for baptism and the Lord's Supper.

myéō. This word, meaning "to initiate into the mysteries," occurs in the NT only in Phil. 4:12. The use here is possibly general, but more likely there is an ironical echo of the mysteries. Paul learns the secrets of faith, i.e., he experiences the power of Christ, in the everyday gifts and stresses of daily life. [G. BORNKAMM, IV, 802-28]

mṓlōps, which is commonly used for "weal" or "welt," or "swelling" from a sting, is found in the NT only in 1 Pet. 2:24 (quoting Is. 53:5). When Christian slaves are unjustly beaten, they should remember that paradoxically it was by the blows he received that the doúlos Christ effected their salvation. [C. SCHNEIDER, IV, 829]

mṓmos [blame, blemish], ámōmos [without blemish, blameless], amṓmētos [blameless]

mṓmos. This word has such senses as "censure," "reproach," "insult," and "ignominy." It still has these senses in the LXX (Sir. 11:33) but also takes on here the meaning "physical blemish" or "moral blemish." The only NT instance is in 2 Pet. 2:13, where heretics, because of their moral libertinism, are said to be "blemishes" (and spíloi) in the sacred table fellowship of believers.

ámōmos. This means "irreproachable," "blameless," "without blemish." It is a cultic term in the LXX, denoting the physical perfection of the priest or offering. But it may also be used for the absolute blamelessness of God (2 Sam. 22:31). The NT adopts the term for the perfect piety to which believers are obligated by membership in the eschatological community (cf. Eph. 1:4; 5:27; Phil. 2:15; Col. 1:22). They are to manifest this at the judgment (cf. Jude 24). 1 Pet. 1:19 and Heb. 9:14 build on the cultic use but give it a moral thrust; the OT requirement that there be no blemish finds its fulfilment in the moral blamelessness of the Redeemer who offers himself (Heb. 4:15;7:26).

amṓmētos. This word which means "blameless," "without reproach," is used in 2 Pet. 3:14 (with áspiloi) to denote the blamelessness of believers at the judgment. [F. HAUCK, IV, 829-31]

mōrós [foolish], mōraínō [to make foolish], mōría [foolishness], mōrología [foolish talk]

A. The Group in Classical Greek. mōrós and cognates denote deficiency, e.g., physical sloth, but more especially mental dullness. We find such varied uses as for insipid foods, animals that are sluggish in winter, or people suffering from fatigue. With a human reference the main use is psychological. What is meant is a weakness of understanding or judgment, sometimes through stupidity, sometimes through confusion, but always demanding censure. Along with a more rationalistic view, the Greeks suggest at times that folly of this nature is a fate.

B. The Group is the Greek OT. The group is not common in the LXX (áphrōn is the usual term for the fool). Where it occurs, more is meant than lack of understanding. What is missing is true knowledge of God (cf. Dt. 32:6; Jer. 5:21). The people is hardened and its folly is apostasy. A more intellectualistic view occurs in Sir. 4:27 (cf. Is. 32:5), and in Sir. 21:22 mōrós simply refers to those who disregard good manners. In Ps. 94:8 the folly consists of practical atheism, i.e., not thinking that God really sees and controls events. That we are to honor the truth against foolish people of this kind (especially rulers) is taught in Sir. 4:27. In Is. 19:11 the fact that the rulers of Egypt have become fools is a sign of divine judgment. In some versions we also have the group when David confesses his foolishness in 2 Sam. 24:10. In general, although there is a certain secularization at times in Sirach, the group has a strong religious orientation in its biblical use. Folly may be in some ways a general social and moral affair, but at root it implies a practical denial of God as the Judge of good and evil. (For a full discussion of the Hebrew originals and the various references see TDNT, IV, 833-36.)

C. The Group in Philo. Philo retains the religious emphasis of the OT. His use of the group implies criticism of worldly wisdom. Humanity is ensnared in a folly that is linked with arrogance. In God's eyes we are childish in relation to truth (cf. Dt. 32:6). Even the people of the OT falls victim to ungodly folly. True wisdom comes only to the Jewish philosopher who has a deeper understanding of the world and life.

D. The Concept of Folly in the NT.

1. The Salt of Mt. 5:13; Lk. 14:34. In the NT, unlike the LXX, the main weight of the concept of folly rests on mōrós. A first use of the group is in the saying about salt losing its taste in Mt. 5:13 and Lk. 14:34 (cf. also Mk. 9:50). How this might happen has been much debated (an impure salt has been suggested, or salt used by Arab bakers to help burning). The main point, however, is surely that salt does not lose its taste, and neither does the gospel. We thus have here a kind of parable of the kingdom which denotes the indestructibility of God's gift in Christ. In the exhortations that accompany the saying, the corresponding responsibilities of the disciples are stressed. But whereas they themselves might fail—and exegesis that finds the main point in their response can easily make the word of grace a word of judgment—the word of God can never lose its efficacy.

2. "Fool" as an Insult. Mt. 5:22 raises the question what is meant by mōrós in this context and why its use as an insult merits such severe condemnation. Exegesis has suggested that what the term implies is either recalcitrance, ungodliness, the insulting of the righteous as fools, or simple stupidity. In context, anger relates to the disposition, the charge of empty-headedness is a charge of frivolity, and the charge of folly implies a lack of capacity for right thought or action. But since Jesus is hardly making casuistical distinctions, the two latter terms are to be seen as explanatory additions to the saying about anger. Anger and terms of abuse are closely related (cf. Jms. 1:19) and equally reprehensible. Since there is no real crescendo in the passage, since the two terms of abuse are virtually synonymous, and since the first court (krísis) comprises the supreme human and ultimate divine judgment, what we have is a threefold statement which achieves its effect by repetition. In the world of Jesus injury by words is of the utmost seriousness. Where there is anger and vilification, Jesus sees that the true problem is that there is no fellowship (cf. his own condemnation of the scribes and Pharisees as fools and blind in Mt. 23:17). Hence he is not just issuing a moral warning against anger and abuse but establishing by commitment to himself the true fellowship which excludes anger and the insults that express it.

3. The "Fool" in Parables. In the parables of Mt. 7:24ff. and 25:1ff. the contrasting of the "wise" and the "foolish" rests on the use in everyday life, but with an orientation to the last judgment (cf. also the rich fool in Lk. 12:13ff., the clever steward in Lk. 16:1ff., and the foolish guests in Lk. 14:15ff.). The point in the parable of the virgins is readiness. The fault of the foolish virgins is a lukewarmness that takes participation for granted and thus brings down judgment on itself. To make light of salvation is to exclude oneself from it.

4. Foolish Words and Thoughts (Eph. 5:4; 2 Tim. 2:23; Tit. 3:9). Eph. 5 warns against various sins of the tongue. These include mōrología, i.e., offensive and foolish speech, and in view of v. 6 heresy may also be meant. This is the point in 2 Tim. 2:23 and Tit. 3:9, where the teaching of Jesus contrasts sharply with stupid controversies, i.e., speculations and subtle questions that do not relate to the truths of salvation. Occupation with such matters is not just foolish but culpable. False teaching is in view, but with its nature rather than its content as the main point of contention.

5. "Folly" in Paul (Rom. 1:22; 1 Cor. 1:18ff.; 2:14; 3:18-19; 4:10). Paul's use is determined by the gospel's transvaluation of all values. The group expresses the world's judgment on believers; the word of the cross is foolishness to those who are lost (1 Cor. 1:18, 23; 2:14). The philosophers at Athens mock Paul (Acts 17:32), Gallio regards the disputes at Corinth as mōrología (18:15), and Festus thinks Paul is out of his mind (26:24). Even to speak about a crucified man is a breach of etiquette in Hellenistic eyes. But in his saving work God has reversed the situation. Ignoring the world's assessment, he has made its wisdom the real folly (1 Cor. 3:19). Paul accepts the fact that from the human standpoint his message and preaching are foolishness. God does not need human wisdom, for his foolishness is wiser than the world's wisdom (1:25). In their presentation of the gospel, then, Christians must be ready to be fools for Christ's sake (4:10). On the basis of the divine work of salvation, a radical break with human culture is thus made. The world has no true understanding of either wisdom or folly, just as it has no true understanding of either strength or weakness. Like strength, wisdom is a gift of God that is manifested precisely in what seems to be foolishness to human eyes. [G. BERTRAM, IV, 832-47]

Mōysḗs [Moses]

A. Moses in Later Judaism.

1. The View of Moses in Later Judaism.

a. Hellenistic Judaism. Moses is seen as the most important figure in the people's history, his person is magnified, and his life and work are surrounded by legends. Thus in Hellenistic Judaism we find various legendary elements, e.g., the prediction of his birth, his trampling on the crown of Egypt, his victories as an Egyptian general, and his leading role in Egyptian culture. Much of this glorification is a defense against the antisemitic presentation which depicts Moses as a leprous priest who became the leader of expelled lepers. For Philo Moses is the ideal sage who lives in harmony with nature and the prophetic ecstatic who mounts up to God. All in one, he is mediator, reconciler, legislator, prophet, high priest, king, and personification of the law.

b. Palestinian Judaism. The Book of Jubilees is often called the Apocalypse of Moses and supposedly rests on a revelation given to him at Sinai. The Assumption of Moses contains a disclosure of Moses to Joshua on Mt. Nebo. Other works relating to Moses are The Life of Adam and Eve, The Greatness of Moses, The Midrash of the Decease of Moses, and The Chronicle of Moses. The main point in these works is that Moses is the mediator of revelation. He is the faithful servant of God who sees God's glory and mediates the law. He is also a prophet for the whole world, a deliverer, and a man of prayer who vicariously accepts Israel's sin.

c. The Death and Ascension of Moses. In legends based on Dt. 34:5ff. Moses resists death. He dies through the kiss of God, Michael contends for his body, he is buried by God and the angels, corruption has no power over him, and atoning power is ascribed to his death. A few references, in spite of Dt. 34:5, suggest a rapture. Hellenistic Judaism is the probable home of this notion.

d. The Distinction between the Hellenistic and the Palestinian Views. The Hellenistic view reflects the concept of the divine man, i.e., the superhuman genius or the ideal of human righteousness. The Palestinian view embodies redeemer expectation. It accepts Moses' fallibility but extols him as the mediator of the law.

2. Moses in the Eschatological Expectation of Later Judaism: The Return of Moses. There are few references to Moses' return in the end-time. Mk. 9:4-5 suggests that there was a tradition that Elijah and Moses (rather than Enoch) would be the precursors of the Messiah. Elsewhere Moses is said to die so that he may come at the head of the wilderness generation (Dt. 33:21), which on this view is given a share in the resurrection. Moses is never presented as the Messiah.

3. Moses as a Type of the Messiah.

a. The Coming Prophet like Moses. As Moses is seen to be the ideal man, so he comes to be viewed as a prototype of the Messiah. A starting point for this view is Dt. 18:15, 18. This is referred at times to a historical prophet. It is also seen as the prophecy of a special prophetic forerunner of the Messiah. Only a few passages (e.g., Jn. 6:14-15 and references in Josephus, the Damascus Document, and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs) suggest that this prophet is himself the Messiah. This might well have been a more popular view that finds little documentation.

b. The Messiah as the Second Moses. Quite apart from Dt. 18:15, 18 there is evidence that the Messiah is expected to bring a second redemption and is thus seen as a second Moses. A rabbinic principle is that the final redeemer will be like the first, and there is expectation that he will give miraculous water and manna, that he will be brought up at Rome, that his age will last forty years, and that he will be accompanied by Elijah as Moses was by Aaron. The Damascus Document rests on the view that the wilderness period is a prototype of the age of salvation, that the Damascus sect is the new covenant people, and that its leader is a teacher and lawgiver who has called them to a new exodus. The false messiahs depicted by Josephus all follow Moses' example by leading their followers into the desert and promising signs and wonders. The witness of the NT is to the same effect, whether in relation to the Egyptian of Acts 21:38, the false messiahs against whom Jesus warns in Mt. 24:26, the hope that the Baptist might be the Messiah in Lk. 3:15, or the expectation of the people regarding Jesus in Jn. 6:14-15. The Samaritans, too, look for a Messiah who will be like Moses.

c. The Second Moses as a Figure of Suffering. Since Moses is described as a model of patient endurance, it is no surprise that elements of suffering are linked with the second Moses. Thus he will stay for a time at Rome, will come in lowliness on an ass (cf. Ex. 4:20), will be hidden as Moses was, and will endure hardships in the wilderness. In Rev. 11:3ff. the second Moses, with Elijah, will suffer martyrdom, and one theory is that, since Elijah is sometimes viewed as the Aaron of the Messiah, the second witness here (the second Moses) is the Messiah himself (cf. Mk. 9:12-13).

B. Moses in the NT.

1. The Historical Moses.

a. As Mediator of the Law. For the NT Moses is supremely the messenger and servant (Acts 7:35; Rev. 15:3) whom God validated by miracles (Jn. 6:32) and through whom he gave the law (cf. Acts 7:33-34). So strongly is Moses linked to the law that the law can simply be called Moses (2 Cor. 3:15; Acts 15:21). As teachers of the law, the scribes sit on Moses' seat (cf. Mt. 23:3; Jn. 9:28). Their fault in the eyes of Jesus is that they do not practice what they preach.

b. As Prophet. Moses is also a prophet, and especially a prophet of Christ (Lk. 24:27), of his suffering (Acts 26:22-23) and resurrection (Lk. 20:37), of the Gentile mission (Rom. 10:19), and of the election of grace (9:15). Belief in Moses, then, involves belief in Christ (Jn. 5:46-47).

c. As the Suffering Messenger of God and Model of Faith. Acts depicts Moses as God's suffering messenger (7:17ff.), and Hebrews presents him as a model of faith (11:23ff.) in his renunciation of worldly dignity (vv. 24ff.), his defiance of Pharaoh (v. 27), his keeping of the Passover (v. 28), and his crossing of the Red Sea (v. 29).

d. The Moses Legend. At a few points the NT goes beyond the OT account; cf. Moses' learning in Egyptian wisdom (Acts 7:22), his age when going to Midian (Acts 7:23), the opposition of Jannes and Jambres (2 Tim. 3:8), the role of angels in the giving of the law (Gal. 3:19), and the dispute about his body (Jude 9). In general, however, the NT presentation stays close to the OT, and the additional features are of Palestinian, not Hellenistic, origin.

2. Moses as a Figure of the Last Time. Moses has only a peripheral eschatological function in the NT. He appears at the transfiguration (Mk. 9:4-5) and he will testify against unbelieving Jews in the judgment (Jn. 5:45).

3. The Moses/Christ Typology. Like Adam, Abel, and others, Moses is a type of Christ in the NT. This typology is plain only in Acts, Hebrews, and John, is briefly hinted at in Paul and Revelation, and is presupposed in Mark and Matthew.

a. The Baptist. The appearing of John in the desert raises the hope that the Messiah is coming as the second Moses. The people think that John himself might be the Messiah (Lk. 3:15), but John apparently expects another to manifest himself as such.

b. Jesus. Jesus compares himself to Moses as the bearer of God's message (Mk. 10:1ff.; Mt. 5:21ff.) and as the mediator of the new covenant (Mk. 14:24), but his refusal to make bread in the desert (Mt. 4:3-4) or to repeat the miracle of the manna (Jn. 6:30ff.) shows that there might be a false identification.

c. The Primitive Community. The first community refers Dt. 18:15, 18 to Christ (Acts 3:22-23). Stephen, with Christ in view, depicts Moses as the misunderstood deliverer (Acts 7: 14ff.). The suffering Moses is a type of the suffering Messiah. 1 Cor. 10:1ff., Mk. 9:2ff., and Mk. 6:32, 35 (cf. Jn. 6) show that this is an authentic understanding and not a mere thesis developed by the author of Acts.

d. Paul. Paul develops the typology in the form of a contrast in 2 Cor. 3. Moses as the officebearer of the old covenant exercises a ministry of death with a veil on his face, whereas the officebearers of the new covenant have a ministry of the Spirit and may speak openly and in such a way that the community sees the imperishable glory of the Lord. In 2 Tim. 3:8 Moses is again a type of the community rather than Christ, this time in the sense that heretics oppose the community as Jannes and Jambres opposed Moses. In 2 Cor. 10 Paul compares Christian baptism to the baptism of the wilderness generation in the Red Sea. Judaism finds in the Red Sea crossing a type of proselyte baptism, but the idea of baptism "into Moses" is unique (and finds a parallel in the formula "into Christ"). The subordination of Moses to Christ is evident in Rom. 10:4-5, Gal. 3:19ff., and Eph. 4:8.

e. Matthew. In Mt. 2 the infancy story shows similarities to legends that develop around the birth of Moses. The fast for 40 days and 40 nights (Mt. 4:2) corresponds to the fast of Moses in Ex. 34:28. The Sermon on the Mount offers a counterpart to the giving of the law at Sinai (cf. "the" mountain in 5:1 and the references in 5:17 and 5:21ff.).

f. Hebrews. Moses is a type of faithfulness in Heb. 3:1ff., but as a servant, not a son. He is also a type as the mediator of the old covenant (cf. 9:15ff.; 12:24), but again the fulfilment is incomparably higher than the type (7:22; 13:20, etc.). As Moses renounces his glory in Egypt to suffer affliction with God's people

(11:24-25), so Christ leaves his heavenly glory and accepts vicarious abasement and suffering (2:7, 9, 14; cf. 12:2) in infinitely greater self-sacrifice.

g. The Johannine Writings. The seer in Rev. 15:3 compares the triumph by the crystal sea to the triumph on the far side of the Red Sea; Moses as the divinely sent liberator is a type of Christ. In Jn. 3:14 the lifting up of the serpent by Moses is a figure of the lifting up of Christ, and in Jn. 6:32ff. the manna is a type of the heavenly bread, although here in sharp contrast (cf. Jn. 10:11, 14 if this saying has in view the description of Moses as the faithful shepherd). In Jn. 1:17 the parallelism is probably synthetic. Moses mediates divine revelation in the preliminary form of the law and is thus a type of him who mediates it fully in the form of grace. The emphasis in John tends to fall on the antithesis.

h. The Suffering Moses as a Type of Christ. In the NT there is a heavy stress on the suffering Moses (cf. Acts 7: 17ff.; Heb. 11:24ff.; Mt. 2; Lk. 9:31). Orientation to the cross means that the prototype is set in the light of the fulfilment, although later Judaism itself opens the door to this understanding. The Moses/Christ typology is not a controlling influence on NT Christology but as a common motif it helps to shape it. Moses and Christ are both divine messengers, they are both misunderstood and rejected, and together they stand for the combination and contrast of the law and the gospel.

C. The Post-Apostolic Age. The story of Moses is used in exhortation in 1 Clem. 4.10.12; 17.5, etc. Barn. 4.6ff.; 6.8ff.; 10.1ff. offers allegorical interpretations of the story of Moses. Thus his arms outstretched in prayer signify Christ’s arms outstretched on the cross. [J. JEREMIAS, IV, 848-73]

Nazarēnós [of Nazareth], Nazōraíos [Nazarene]

Jesus is called Nazarēnós in Mk. 1:24; 10:47; Lk. 4:34, and Nazōraíos in Mt. 2:23; 26:69; Lk. 18:37. Paul is linked to the sect tṓn Nazōraíōn in Acts 24:5. A connection with Nazareth is presupposed in Mark, Luke, and John (also Nazarét and Nazará; cf. Mt. 4:13; Lk. 4:16). Comparison of Mt. 26:69 and 26:71 shows that Nazōraíos and Galilaíos mean much the same thing (cf. Acts 1:11). The terms seem to derive from the outside world and have a derogatory nuance as applied to Jesus and the disciples. Paul does not use them, and Christianoí becomes the common designation in the Gentile world (Acts 11:26). Whether or not the use of Nazarēnós or Nazōraíos for Jesus and the first Palestinian Christians underlies the term adopted by Christians in Syria, Persia, Armenia, etc. is much debated, and attempts have been made to trace an earlier sect of Nasaraíoi. As regards the prophecy of Mt. 2:23 we have the content rather than the exact wording, and the explanation probably lies in the similarity of Nazōraíos to Naziraíos (Nazirite; cf. Judg. 13:5, 7). The pre-Christian Jewish sect of Nasarenes is known only from Epiphanius (Against 80 Heresies 18; 29.6), who carefully distinguishes them from the Jewish Christian Nazōraíoi. It is possible, however, that there never was any sect of this kind at all, but that Epiphanius is confused by a Jewish list that really has Christians in view. According to his depiction, they have little in common with John the Baptist, Jesus, or later Jewish Christianity. One may conclude that the term Nazōraíos derives from the city of Nazareth as the hometown of Jesus. Neither linguistic nor material objections to this view are convincing. [H. H. SCHAEDER, IV, 874-79]

l. Nonbiblical Usage. naós, from naíō, “to dwell,” means “abode of the gods,” “temple.” Unlike the verb, it has a cultic nuance. House, altar, and statue are the essential features. The “house” may be a small one that can be transported, but is more generally a building. The naós is strictly the sanctuary as compared to broader terms for the precincts as a whole. It can be used even more narrowly for the innermost shrine that houses the god.

2. Biblical Usage. naós is relatively common in the LXX. It usually refers to the temple at Jerusalem (cf. Ps. 45:15). Ezekiel uses tá hierá for pagan sanctuaries, but this distinction is not maintained in Maccabees. Josephus has naós for both the temple itself and the precincts. The NT uses naós, hierón, and hágion with no sharp distinction. naós refers in particular to the Jerusalem temple but has a more general reference in Acts 17:24 and is used for silver shrines of Artemis in Acts 19:24. A special development that gives naós precedence in the NT is its use for the spiritual temple. The reasons for this development are the LXX interest in the term, the fact that it goes well with the idea of upbuilding, and the rich potential of the word. In the Gospels Mt. 23:16ff. mentions the custom of swearing by the temple or by its gold adornment. The casuistic distinction rests on the fact that the gold is consecrated and is thus supposedly more fully God's, but Jesus cuts through the casuistry by showing that God is invoked with whatever belongs to him, so that there can be no nonbinding oath. In Mt. 23:35 the slaying between the temple and the altar is particularly heinous, since this is a place of refuge (Ex. 21:14). The Zechariah intended is probably the son of Jehoiada (2 Chr. 24). At the trial Jesus is accused of saying that he would destroy the temple (cf. Mk. 14:58; Mt. 26:61; Acts 6:14; also Jn. 2:19, 21). Mark states that the witness is false. He also contrasts the temple made with hands and the wonderful new temple of the eschatological community, whereas Matthew and John stress the person and power of Jesus. An enigmatic saying underlies the accusation. Its context is the cleansing of the temple, it links the coming of the Son of Man and the temple, and it makes the point that Jesus is the builder of the messianic temple (which the church relates to itself as the messianic community of which Jesus is the head of the corner). In Mt. 27:5 Judas brings the thirty pieces of silver into the temple before hanging himself; naós here presumably means the precincts. In Mk. 15:38 one of the signs at the death of Jesus is the ripping of the temple curtain. We are not told whether this is the inner or outer curtain or what is the precise meaning of the sign. In Luke and Acts hierón tends to be more common than naós, which in Luke occurs only in the infancy stories (1:9, 21, 22). Notable points in Acts are the distinction between the earthly and heavenly temple in 7:48 (cf. Is. 66:1) and the use of naós for the miniature representations of the pagan shrine made by Demetrius in 19:24. In the epistles Paul impresses on the Corinthians that they are temples of God in which the Spirit dwells (1 Cor. 3:16; 6:19; 2 Cor. 6:16-17). This seems to rest on a saying of Jesus in a form related to Mk. 14:58. There are parallels in Philo and Stoicism but not for the description of the body as God's temple. The presence of an idol in God's temple is an abomination according to 2 Kgs. 21:7 etc.; Paul gives this cultic principle a moral application. In 2 Th. 2:3-4 the lawless one will try to usurp God's temple, possibly the historical temple at Jerusalem but more likely the Christian community. The community, with the apostles and prophets as a foundation and Christ as the head of the corner, is being built up into a holy temple (Eph. 2:20), or, as 1 Peter puts it, a spiritual house in which the members are living stones, and Christ, the stone that the builders rejected, is the cornerstone (2:5; 4:19). The idea of "pillars" in Gal. 2:9 (cf. Rev. 3:12) may be part of the same comparison. In Revelation naós is sometimes the historical temple (cf. 11:1). In 7:15 those who are cleansed serve as priests in God's temple. In 11:19 the heavenly temple is opened, in 14:15, 17 angels come out of it, in 15:8 it is filled with the smoke of God's glory, and in 16:1 the word of fulfilment is spoken from it. This temple is the abode of God's majesty and the source of his commands. The temple may also be the community, as in 3:12. In the new Jerusalem there is no temple, for God himself is the temple (21:22). The point is that God is now present in person.

3. Postapostolic Usage. The term naós is an important one in the postapostolic period. Barn. 4. 11 demands that believers become a perfect temple for God. The heart is a holy temple in 6.15. This is the true temple, not the historical temple (16.1ff.). Yet we are also being led to God's heavenly dwelling as a temple. Ignatius has an elaborate depiction of the building of the temple with the cross as the pulley and the Spirit as the rope (Ephesians 9.1). He also calls believers temple bearers, perhaps on the basis of pagan processions with their representations of shrines (9.2). We are to act with a sense of God's indwelling (15.3). We are especially to keep the flesh as God's sanctuary (Philadelphians 7.2; cf. 2 Clem. 9.3). This admonition has an anti-Gnostic thrust. The whole community is a temple in Magnesians 7.2, which exhorts believers to come together as one temple of God.

nauagéō [to suffer shipwreck]

nauagéō means "to suffer shipwreck," and figuratively "to fail," "to be put to shame." It occurs literally in 2 Cor. 11:25, where Paul says that he has been shipwrecked three times. A figurative use occurs in 1 Tim. 1:19. Timothy must fight a good fight; those who do not do this fall into error and bad conduct, i.e., they suffer shipwreck in the faith, or make shipwreck of it. [H. PREISKER, IV, 891]

nekrós [dead], nekróō [to put to death], nékrōsis [death, deadness]

nekrós. In Greek nekrós is a common noun for "dead person or body" and a common adjective for "dead." Inanimate things may be called nekrá; also the things of the sensory world (e.g., the body), or the false philosopher and his teaching. The main LXX use is for a deceased person or a corpse. As an adjective nekrós occurs in the NT for dead persons (Acts 5:10; Rev. 1:18) and for inanimate objects (Jms. 2:26). As a noun it is the opposite of the living. Christ will judge both the living and the dead (Rom. 14:9). Christ has power to raise the dead (cf. Mt. 10:8). The nekroí are often the dead in Hades. As Christ is raised from the dead, so the dead will finally be raised (1 Cor. 15:35) or will arise (Mk. 12:25). The sea, death, and Hades will give up their dead (Rev. 20:13). Figuratively the prodigal is dead and then comes to life again (Lk. 15:24, 32). The church at Sardis is dead (Rev. 3:1). Dead works mark the pre-Christian period (Heb. 6:1), and faith without works is dead (Jms. 2:17, 26). The whole pre-Christian life is dead (Col. 2:13; cf. Eph. 2:1-2). In Mt. 8:22 those who resist the call of Jesus are treated as the dead. Jesus' call comes to the dead in Jn. 5:25; Eph. 5:14. A sacramental use of the adjective may be seen in Rom. 6:11. By identification with Christ believers are dead to sin in baptism and they are to live as those who are already raised from the dead (v. 13). For a variation on the same thought see also Rom. 8:10.

nekróō. This means "to put to death" and is used medically for atrophy. Rom. 4:19 says that Abraham is as good as dead (cf. Heb. 11:12) in a literal sense. Col. 3:5 has the command that we should figuratively put earthly things to death (cf. the sacramental use of nekrós).

nékrōsis. This Hellenistic term is used medically for the mortification of a member or the body. Rom. 4:19 uses it for the deadness of Sarah's womb, Mk. 3:5 has it figuratively for the deadness of the heart, and in 2 Cor. 4:10 Paul uses it sacramentally for the death of Jesus in himself as a process of dying in the form of his afflictions. [R. BULTMANN, IV, 892-95]

néos [new, fresh], ananeóō [to renew]

1. Linguistic and Historical Data. Meaning “belonging to the present,” néos has the nuances of “fresh” and “young.” As what is fresh or new, it may denote the odd or unexpected but also a new state or position, e.g., new converts or converts as new people. In the sense of young we find it for children and young people, and it can denote younger men as a group. In the LXX Proverbs has país néos for a youth in 1:4. In the NT néos is less common than kainós. It is used for fresh dough in 1 Cor. 5:7 and new wine in Mk. 2:22. The néos is contrasted with the palaiós in Col. 3:9-10, and Heb. 12:24 differentiates the new covenant from the old. The reference is to a new age, whereas kainós would suggest a new nature. The only instance of “young” is in Tit. 2:4 (“young women”), but we find the comparative in Tit. 2:6; 1 Pet. 5:5; 1 Tim. 5:1-2 (also Lk. 15:12-13), i.e., younger people (or the younger son).

2. Theological Implications. Unlike kainós, néos does not have an eschatological content in the NT. It refers to the new reality of present salvation. The new wine of Mk. 2:22 represents the unheard of element in the person and message of Jesus (cf. Mt. 12:6, 41-42; Lk. 4:21; Mk. 10:6ff.). The old age and the new are opposites. The community, as the new leaven, must keep itself pure from earlier sins (1 Cor. 5:6ff.) so as to be in its conduct what it really is. As Christ, the new man, is present, so is the new person of the Christian, and this must express itself in daily renewal (Col. 3:9-10).

ananeóō (→ anakainízō and anakainóō under kainós). This word means “to renew” and in the passive “to be renewed.” In Eph. 4:23, which is asserting obligations, the infinitive has an imperative sense. But the renewal is not a self-renewal. It is accomplished on rather than by believers. They are set in a field of renewal in which they are to let themselves be renewed by Christ (v. 20). The anakainoústhai of Col. 3:10 is to the same effect, and ananeoústhai in Eph. 4:23 gives a nuance that connects the verse with vv. 22 and 24, namely, that through inner renewal by Christ Christians are freed from their old being and free for their new. [J. BEHM, IV, 896-901]

nephélē [cloud], néphos [cloud]

A. The Terms in General Religious and Moral Imagery.

l. In an Emphatically Low Sense. These words, meaning “mist,” “haze,” or “cloud,” occur in the name of Aristophanes’ city of the birds, Cloud-Cuckoo-Land, i.e., the sophistry that introduces new gods. In the OT the cloud signifies what is transitory. Salvation slips from us like a cloud (Job 30:15). Israel’s love of God is like a cloud (Hos. 6:4). Boasters are like clouds and wind with no rain (Prov. 25:14). God blots out sins like a cloud (Is. 44:22). Gnostic heretics are like waterless clouds (Jude 12). To take note of clouds but not of God’s time is hypocrisy (Lk. 12:54).

2. In an Emphatically Lofty Sense. The chariots of the destroyer are like clouds (Jer. 4:13), and so are those that bring tribute (Is. 60:8). The king’s benevolence is like a spring cloud (Prov. 16:15), as is God’s mercy (Sir. 35:24). In the age of salvation the clouds will pour down righteousness (Is. 45:8). God is as incomprehensible as a high cloud (Job 35:5). Arrogance reaches to the clouds (Is. 14:14), but so does God’s faithfulness (Ps. 36:5).

B. The Cloud as an Embodiment and Attribute of Deity.

1. The Greek and Hellenistic World. Clouds have a religious significance because of human dependence on them and the fear of sinister thunderclouds. The Harpies personify storm clouds, and there is a goddess Nephele. The cult of the clouds does not occur in Greece, but Orphism includes invocation of the clouds at the offering of incense. Aristophanes parodies Orphic worship in his Clouds; the clouds represent the new gods of sophistry. The cloud is an attribute of deity; Orphism itself often places the clouds in the service of the supreme god. Gods watching battles hide in clouds. They hide their assistants or favorites in clouds. The cloud is also the chariot of the gods that leads the hero to them. In later Hellenism the cloud has a stylized part in divine appearances or journeys.

2. The OT.

a. The Cloud in Theophany. The OT takes a similar course to that of the Greek world but with a distinctive concept of God. God appears in the storm in Judg. 5:4-5 (cf. Ps. 18). Dark clouds are his tent (Ps. 18:11). He comes from the clouds (Ezek. 1:4). The cloud fills the temple (1 Kgs. 8:10-11), and is his chariot (Is. 19:1) or the dust of his feet (Nah. 1:3). In all this, however, God is the one God and it is only in subordination that heavenly beings share his glory in the clouds. The one like the son of man who comes with the clouds of heaven in Dan. 7:13 receives his power from the Ancient of Days.

b. The Cloud in Rapture. The stories of rapture in the OT (Enoch in Gen. 5:24 and Elijah in 2 Kgs. 2:1ff.) do not mention clouds, although the storm cloud probably stands behind the heavenly chariot of the second story.

c. The Cloud in the Story of the Covenant. It is the covenant God who conceals and manifests himself in the cloud. The pillar of cloud plays an important part in the exodus and the desert journey (Ex. 13:21-22; 14:19ff.; 33:9-10; 40:36-37). At Sinai the dark cloud on the mountain conceals and manifests God's presence (Ex. 19:16 etc., and cf. Pss. 77:18; 78:14; 99:7; 105:39). A parallel cloud is promised for the age of salvation (Is. 4:5).

d. The Cloud in Belief in the Creator. Dependence on the cloud gives it acute religious significance (1 Kgs. 18:44-45). There thus develops a view of nature that sees in it the power and glory of the covenant God. God gathers the clouds (Jer. 10:13) and controls them (Job 36:27ff.; 37:11, 16, etc.). Mythology is ruled out, not by rationalism, but by the personality of the historical God of the covenant.

3. Judaism (and the Mandaeans). In Judaism interest focuses on the cloud of the wilderness and the last days. Philo links the plagues to the clouds. By the pillar of cloud God separates the good from the bad. The cloud at Sinai, reaching from earth to heaven, shows that all things serve God. Josephus tries to play down the miracle of the divine cloud but in so doing achieves the absurdity of a special and highly unusual cloud over the tent. The rabbis ascribe additional properties to the pillar of cloud, e.g., smoothing the ground and smiting scorpions. The Messiah will come on clouds if the people has merits; if not, he will come on an ass. Israel will mount up on a cloud to the throne of glory. It will also be brought back on the clouds to its own land for worship in the age of salvation. For the Mandaeans the great cloud of light is the place of original life. The clouds serve as seats for exalted beings, and the redeemed are wrapped in clouds of glory. Dark clouds conceal the guardhouses of evil. This differs sharply from the OT presentation, in which dark clouds are a sign of the inaccessible God who graciously discloses himself.

4. The NT.

a. The Cloud in Nature Theology. This aspect hardly figures in the NT, but God in his all-embracing love sends rain on both the just and the unjust (Mt. 5:45). By this self-attestation he issues a summons to conversion (Acts 14:17).

b. The Cloud in the Wilderness. The only mention of this cloud is in 1 Cor. 10:1ff., which views it as a type of baptism into Christ. The stress is on personal encounter with God. Sacramental grace is not a talisman but sets us before decision. Even those who are baptized in the cloud perish if they are disobedient.

c. The Cloud in Theophany. The garment of the angel of revelation is a cloud in Rev. 10:1 (cf. Ex. 13:21). At the transfiguration of Jesus a cloud overshadows "them," probably Jesus, Elijah, and Moses, since the voice comes to the disciples out of the cloud (Mk. 9:7). This bright cloud (Mt. 17:5) is God's answer to the saying of Peter in Mk. 9:5 and manifests the divine presence that is promised for the last time. The taking up of Jesus into it means that he will bring final salvation.

d. The Cloud in Apotheosis. The cloud at the ascension gives plasticity to the event but its role is that of a veil rather than a means of ascent. The cloud covers only the external form, so that a personal relation to Jesus persists.

e. The Cloud in Eschatology. The old motifs are now linked to the person of Jesus. He himself is the Son of Man who will come with the clouds of heaven (Mk. 14:62). The linking of the Daniel theme with Zech. 12:10ff. (a threat) is traditional. In Rev. 14: 14ff. Christ already sits on the cloud and its white color denotes heavenly triumph. Believers will come on clouds at the parousia (1 Th. 4:17). The application to Christ gives a new thrust to ancient motifs in the NT. The cloud is a sign of the Father of Jesus Christ who in concealment offers himself for fellowship and victoriously establishes it. But this new meaning exhausts the symbolical value of the term. The known reality so far transcends the figure that it plays little further role in the church.

nephrós [kidney]

The word nephrós, for "kidney," is common in the OT laws of sacrifice and is also used figuratively for the "inner parts" where grief is bitter (Job 16:13), the conscience sits (Ps 16:7), and there is a deep distress (Ps. 73:21). Only God sees these inner parts (cf. Ps. 7:9 etc.). He is far from the inner parts of the wicked (Jer. 12:2). Philo thinks the kidneys are appropriate for offering to God because they sift out waste material. The only instance of nephrós in the NT is in Rev. 2:23 (quoting Jer. 11:20). By the afflictions that fall on false prophets and their followers the church may see that God demands ultimate truth and purity. The OT saying that God "searches mind and heart" expresses the total claim that he makes on the community. [H. Preisker, IV, 911]

nḗpios [child, childish], nēpiázō [to be as a child]

A. nḗpios in General Greek Usage. This word means "immature," "foolish." It is used in medicine for small children in various stages. We also find it on burial inscriptions for small children aged 1 to 10. It may also be used for orphans (denoting their helplessness), and then comes into use for legal minors. It often occurs for children as members of the family along with the wife or mother. (It can also be used for the young of animals or plants.) But the main sense in Greek is "foolish," "inexperienced," or "childish" with no necessary reference to children. A person is nḗpios who is immature in conduct, who shows a foolish confidence in fortune, who does not take account of reality, or who does not heed the advice of philosophers.

B. nḗpios in the OT. In the LXX nḗpios is used in Prov. 23:13 for the young man who is undergoing education. It is a simple term for youth in Hos. 11:1. When Israel was a youth, God loved her. The term expresses the childlike innocence of the wilderness age prior to the apostasy of later times. In Hos. 2:17 neótēs expresses the same thought. The LXX prefers áphrōn when the reference is to folly, although other versions sometimes have nḗpios in the censorious sense. nḗpios has a good reference when it denotes the simple person in the Psalms. The simple are the righteous to whom God gives wisdom (Ps. 19:7) and whom he protects (116:6) and enlightens (119:130). In other words, the LXX does with nḗpias what Paul does with mōrós, accepting and transmuting the word with the derogatory nuance that it has in the pagan world.

C. nḗpios in the NT.

1. Paul and Hebrews. The use in Paul and Hebrews is primarily ethical and pedagogic. Paul links the term with children but in specific connections. The Corinthians are childish to stress outwardly impressive gifts (1 Cor. 14:20). They are to be children in malice. Maturity, however, is the chief goal for Paul (Eph. 4:13-14), since children are easily led astray. From one standpoint childhood is a state that is already left behind (Gal. 4:1ff.). The reference here is to the heir who is still a minor and for whom the law is a pedagogue. Now that Christ has come, the full rights of sonship are bestowed. Paul also compares the child and the adult in 1 Cor. 13:11. Our present knowledge is the imperfect knowledge of childhood, which will yield to full understanding when the age of maturity comes. If nḗpioi is the reading in 1 Th. 2:7 ("we were infants among you"), this is a straightforward and nondialectical self-designation, but ḗpioi ("gentle") is to be preferred. In the churches Paul accepts his role as a teacher of children (cf. Rom. 2:20). The Corinthians, being still sárkinoi, are nḗpioi, i.e., they are children who are not yet ready for deeper instruction and therefore must be fed with milk (cf. 1 Cor. 3:1-2). The situation dealt with in Heb. 5-6 is similar. The readers ought to be teachers but they have remained nḗpioi who know only the basic doctrines (cf. 6:1-2) and have not yet learned to put what they have been taught into action (6:11). For Paul, of course, knowledge alone carries the danger of evaporating into speculation. In the long run the cross is the one theme of Christian preaching, and the decisive thing is that God's power, which is folly in human eyes, is granted to mōroí or nḗpioi (1 Cor. 1: 18ff.).

2. Little Children in the Message of Jesus. In this regard Paul is at one with Jesus, who in different ways insists that the gospel is for children or little ones. The term nḗpioi occurs only in Mt. 11:25 (par. Lk. 10:21) and Mt. 21:16 (quoting Ps. 8:2). In the latter passage small children would be at the feast with their parents, but with the literal sense there is probably an extended reference to the lowly, the disciples, and the masses (just as rabbinic exegesis finds in Ps. 8:2 a reference to Israel as a weak and helpless people). Those whom the world does not notice acknowledge Jesus. God has disclosed to them who he is (Mt. 16:17). To them it is given to know the mysteries (13:11). The story of OT revelation continues as a story of revelation to the simple (cf. Ps. 25:14). This is the special point in Mt. 11:25. The cry of jubilation is not just the result of experience but expresses a basic insight into the nature of revelation as God himself wills it. Jesus, who is lowly, has come to nḗpioi. This manifests the greatness of divine grace. Being gentle and lowly, Jesus invites the nḗpioi to himself (v. 29). "These things" in v. 25 is to be taken christologically. The reference is to Jesus himself as the revelation of God. Recognition of Jesus, the presupposition of the acceptance of revelation, is fulfilled in the nḗpioi. The church, attracted to pedagogic models, has always found it hard to stand by this truth. The fact that it includes concealment from the wise enhances the difficulty. This is why Paul's understanding in 1 Cor. 1:19-20 is so important. It is also why the idea of Jesus himself as a child has been significant even though it has produced apocryphal traditions that reflect the childhood stories of the age. In spite of their stress on learning, then, even theologians like Clement and Origen of Alexandria find it impossible to abandon the principle that revelation is to the simple. Origen defends the self-description of believers as nḗpioi against the scorn of Celsus, and Clement not only allows that the gospel is for nḗpioi but sees that through Christ, childhood's revealer, all Christians are nḗpioi notwithstanding the educational distinctions between them. [G. BERTRAM, IV, 912-23]

nḗstis [hungry, fasting], nēsteúō [to hunger, fast], nēsteía [suffering hunger, fasting]

1. The Meaning of the Word. nḗstis means "one who has not eaten," "who is empty," then "who fasts." nēsteúō means "to be without food or hungry," but mostly "to fast." The noun nēsteía means "suffering hunger," usually "fasting."

2. Fasting in Antiquity. Fasting is found in all religions. It is the temporary abstention from nourishment on religious grounds. At first it is more common among the Greeks than the Romans, but it spreads over the whole of the ancient world. Fear of demons plays a role in it; it is also seen as a means of preparing for dealings with deity. The mourning fast is due to fear of demonic infection. Egyptian priests fast before entering the sanctuary. Fasting also prepares the way for ecstatic revelations. There is little relation between fasting and ethics in antiquity.

3. Fasting in the OT and Judaism. The OT uses various terms for fasting. Many aspects of OT fasting are the same as elsewhere. There is a mourning fast for the dead that expresses sorrow (1 Sam. 31:13). Moses fasts before receiving the commandments (Ex. 34:28), as does Daniel before receiving his visions (Dan. 9:3). Fasting also expresses submission to God, whether in the case of individuals (2 Sam. 12:16ff.) or the people (Judg. 20:26 etc.). Prayer accompanies fasting (Jer. 14:12), especially penitential prayer (1 Sam. 7:6). The one who fasts often takes the posture of a mourner (cf. 1 Kgs. 21:27). Fasts last one day (Judg. 20:26); three days in Esth. 4:16. In the seven-day fast of 1 Sam. 31:13 the actual fasting is only during the day. The only cultic fast is on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:29ff.). Special fasts are set up to remember the fall of Jerusalem (Zech. 7:3, 5; 8:19). The prophets protest against the view that purely external fasting gains a hearing with God (cf. Jer. 14:12; Is. 58:1ff.). For them true fasting is a bowing down of the soul that leads to moral action. Judaism finds an important place for fasting. Apocalyptists prepare for revelation by it. Fasting confirms vows and prayer. It has efficacy with God for forgiveness, healing, and exorcism, although true fasting necessarily involves repentance. The devout make the second and fifth days of the week into additional fasts, but there is never fasting on special feast days, days of preparation, or the sabbath. Longer fasts of up to 40 days occur, and much stress is laid on gestures of mourning in fasting. The Pharisees, the disciples of the Baptist, and the Therapeutae all observe fasts. Philo extols nēsteía as ascetic restraint. Rules are set up for the public fasts, and individual fasting tends to replace sacrifice after the destruction of the temple, since it grants expiation, guarantees a divine hearing, and produces sanctity. Yet there are warnings that penitence is also required, and students are advised against excessive fasting.

4. Fasting in the NT. Jesus opens his ministry with a 40-day fast corresponding to that of Moses. But Jesus as the Mediator of the new covenant has already received God's revelation, and he fasts in order to be equipped to confirm his messianic dignity and power. He seems not to engage in special fasting during his ministry, but he would naturally observe the public fasts, and he does not forbid his hearers to fast. For Jesus, however, fasting is service of God and a sign of true conversion. It must be done in secret and not accompanied by open signs of mourning. His disciples do not fast like those of the Baptist (Mk. 2:18ff.), for the presence of the Messiah means rejoicing as at the presence of a bridegroom. The new age is an age of joy. Only the age of waiting (which will begin again after his death) is a time of fasting (cf. Jn. 16:20). The eschatological message of Jesus transcends fasting, but since there is a gap between the dawn of salvation and its consummation there is room for fasting, not as a pious work, but as the sign of an inner attitude. The sayings about the patch and the wineskins are linked to the question of fasting in Mk. 2:18ff. This link preserves the insight that the new age has come as an age of joy. Yet fasting goes hand in hand with prayer in Acts 13:2-3 and 14:23, when missionaries are sent out and elders are appointed. The epistles do not mention fasting; it is not listed even in Heb. 13:16.

5. Fasting in the Early Church. Voluntary fasting on specific days returns in the early church (Wednesday and Friday in Did. 8.1). The Easter fast is laid on all Christians in the second century (Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 5.24. 12ff.). Fasting before baptism also comes into vogue (Did. 7.4), as does fasting before communion. Reasons given for fasting are to strengthen prayer, to prepare for revelation, to express sorrow, to help the poor with the food saved, and to reconcile penitents with God. Criticisms of fasting are based on the OT prophets (Barn. 3. 1ff.), and there is a tendency to subordinate the rite to inwardness and to the ethical (Hermas Similitudes 5.3.5ff.). But the early church shows little awareness of Jesus' distinctive approach to fasting. [J. BEHM, IV, 924-35] nḗphō [to be sober], nēphálios [sober, self-controlled], eknḗphō [to become sober] nḗphō.

1. Sobriety in a Literal Sense. The thought behind nḗphō is a negative one, i.e., the opposite of intoxication. This is first meant literally either in the strict sense of complete abstemiousness or the relative sense of temperance.

2. Sobriety in the Figurative Semse.

a. When the word is used figuratively the subject is a person or the human logismós and what is meant is the opposite of every kind of fuzziness. Sober judgment is highly valued in both individual and public life.

b. In the OT world the readiness to bear the burdens of obedient service to God is denoted by the group. For Philo the sober regulation of given powers is a self-evident requirement in dealings with God. paideía is a guide in this regard. Every form of fuzziness (including intoxication) usurps the place of God, and awakening from it is a conversion.

c. Psychologically Philo sees that intoxication and sobriety overlap. In the literal sense this involves a concession, but figuratively, while a softening takes place, Philo endorses the synthesis.

The NT uses nḗphō only in the figurative sense. It does not equate the endowment of the Spirit with Dionysiac-type intoxication (as onlookers might do, Acts 2: 12ff.; cf. Eph. 5:18), but in the five instances (1 Th. 5:6, 8; 2 Tim. 4:5; 1 Pet. 1:13; 4:7; 5:8) nḗphō means acknowledgment of the reality of revelation and discharge of the resultant ministry in worship, hope, love, and conflict.

1.a. This word means "holding no wine"; the reference is to (cultic) materials or offerings. b. It then describes cultic objects (e.g., fuel) that are not to be made of the wood of the vine, and, by extension, things that remind us of cultic actions without wine.

2.a. The neuter singular denotes "what is sober," "soberness." b. In relation to ecstasy, Philo takes a positive view, using the phrase nēphálios méthē. But Philo also applies nēphálios to men when he regards abstemiousness as a priestly obligation, not just in a literal sense, but in the sense of sobriety of judgment. The word still belongs at this point to the sacral sphere. In the NT the term occurs in the listed requirements for bishops (1 Tim. 3:2), women (3:11), and elders (Tit. 2:2). If 1 Tim. 3:2 and 1 Tim. 3:8 are parallel, the meaning might be "temperate in the use of wine." But the term is probably a cultic one and refers to the self-control and clarity of mind that are needed in the service of God (though with a hint of the literal sense too).

eknḗphō. This word, meaning "to become sober," occurs in 1 Cor. 15:34. Paul has just mentioned the confused thinking about life and death that leads to loose conduct. Appropriately, then, he summons the Corinthians to come to their senses in a true sobriety of thought centered on God's message in the raising again of Christ. [O. BAUERNFEIND, IV, 936-41]

nikáō [to conquer, overcome], níkē [victory], níkos [victory], hypernikáō [to be more than conquerors]

A. Usage outside the NT.

1. This group denotes "victory," "supremacy," or "success." It is assumed that the success is palpable and achieved by an action, but two questions remain, a. whether the human eye can distinguish true victory from false, and b. whether mortals can ever really achieve true victory. In answer to the first question, it is argued that true victory may be hidden, while in answer to the second the mystery religions hold out the promise of ultimate victory.

2. The Greek renderings of the OT yield no striking data regarding the use of the group. The LXX employs it variously for standing in the judgment and for military success. Israel's victory (2 Macc. 10:38), or that of the prophet (Ezek. 3:8), is viewed as God's victory. 4 Maccabees speaks about victory over inner passions and external assaults. Yet the martyr's victory is a divine gift no less than a moral achievement.

B. NT Usage. In the Lucan version of the parable of the strong man, the stronger "overcomes" him (Lk. 11:22; "binds" in Mt. 12:29). This is an obvious victory, but the victory of Jesus which it illustrates is not obvious to his opponents, who advance a theory that would mean discord in the kingdom of evil. The same decisive victory of Jesus is in view in Jn. 16:33. Revelation talks about provisional victories of evil, e.g., in 6:2; 11:7; 13:7. But these victories are "allowed" and therefore restricted. Terrible though they are, the Lion has won the final victory (5:5; cf. 17:14). The beast may thus seem to be victorious, but by the crystal sea are those who have overcome him (15:2). Promises may thus be given in all the churches to those who overcome (2:7, 11, 17, 26; 3:5, 12, 21). This victory will be achieved in the new heaven and earth (21:7). The victory is eschatological, but Christ has won it already with his blood (3:21; 12:11), and it is already present (1 Jn. 5:4-5). The young men have overcome the evil one (1 Jn. 2:13-14), and evil is overcome by good (Rom. 12:21). The use of níkē is similar to that of nikáō. On the basis of Is. 42:1ff., Mt. 12:20 speaks of the victory of God's servant Christ, while on the basis of Is. 25:8 Paul in 1 Cor. 15:54ff. refers to the victory over death. Faith itself is níkē in 1 Jn. 5:4. So great is the victory that is secured by the loving work of Christ that Paul in Rom. 8:37 finds nikáō too weak a term. He thus adopts the rare hypernikáō. In every test we win the supreme victory; we are "more than conquerors."

níptō [to wash], áníptos [unwashed]

(baptízō, loúō, katharós) → níptō. This word means "to wash" both generally and cultically. Running water, especially from springs, is preferred for washing. Partial washing of people is at issue. Ritual purity in the approach to deity imposes the need for cultic washing. This is important in the OT (cf. Ex. 30:18-19; Dt. 21:6). Judaism extends the OT rules, e.g., by requiring washing of the hands before meals. In the NT níptō means partial washing but is of no great significance. It denotes ordinary washing in Jn. 9:7, 11, 15 and Jewish ritual washing in Mt. 15:2. Jesus defends the disciples when they are attacked for not washing before eating, and he exposes the hypocrisy of those who deliberately refrain from washing when fasting (Mt. 6:17). In the foot-washing níptō is partial washing (the feet) as distinct from loúō (Jn. 13:5-6, 8 etc.). By his action here Jesus sets an example of menial service. But the action also has symbolical significance. Christ's death gives full cleansing (cf. baptism), so that there is no need of partial washing (if we omit "except for his feet"), or need only of cleansing from daily sin (if we include it).

ániptos. This word means (cultically) "unwashed." It does not occur in the LXX, but the OT stresses the need for clean hands in ministry and prayer (Lev. 15:11; Ex. 30:19ff.). Judaism brings in the custom of washing the hands before meals, but when the disciples are attacked for eating with unwashed hands (Mk. 7:2; Mt. 15:20) Jesus exposes the formalism of the requirement. [F. HAUCK, IV, 946-48]

1. Linguistic Data. The verb noéō means "to direct one's mind to." At first it is used in the broad sense "to perceive," but later it means only "to perceive mentally" and then "to think," "to understand," "to intend," and "to know" as a function of the mind (noús). In the LXX the organ of noeín is often the heart (kardía), but the sphere of noeín is always mental. In the NT the verb has such senses as "to note," "to grasp," "to recognize," "to understand," and "to imagine."

2. Biblical Theology. Jn. 12:40 takes the biblical view that the heart is the center of noeín. Knowledge has religious and moral significance. Rom. 1:20 states that God's power and majesty may be apprehended in his works. From visible things we can and should work back (in an intellectual process) to the invisible reality of the Creator. We are thus responsible when we fail to do so. Heb. 11:3 argues that by faith we do in fact perceive that the universe is ordered by God's word. To acknowledge that God's creative will is the basis of all reality is to think in terms of faith. Faith sees that the invisible is the true reality, but this reality is the reality of salvation. Hence knowledge of God as Creator is rooted in the knowledge of God as Savior.

A. The Meaning of the Term.

1. The original meaning of noús is "(inner) sense directed on an object," and from this come such meanings as "sensation," "power of perception," and "mode of thought." The main nuances are "mind," "insight," "understanding," "judgment," and "meaning."

2. The word is rare in the LXX, since kardía is there the main organ of understanding. The usual meaning in the Apocrypha is "mind" or "disposition."

3. The term is imprecise in postbiblical Jewish works, having such senses as "moral nature," "mode of thought," and "power of spiritual perception."

B. The Term noús in Greek Philosophy and Religion. The transition to philosophy gives the term noús more pregnancy but in so doing restricts it. The noús is now the "reason" or "spirit" with a more theoretical orientation. In Anaxagoras noús is the cosmic reason that orders the universe and links perception and creativity. Plato thinks the noús is the most excellent part of us. As it rules the world, so it controls moral action. With truth, it is the product of the marriage of humanity with pure being. Aristotle sees in the noús our characteristic enérgeia. Theoretical noús is the power of logical thought and practical noús sets goals for the will. The noús is immortal and comes into the body from outside. Yet this applies only to the active, not the passive or potential noús. In Zeno God is cosmic reason, in Epictetus God's being is moús, and in Marcus Aurelius the noús is our daímōn. Philo uses noús for reason (as distinct from pneúma as spirit), but while noús is the best in us, it is earthly and can attain to truth only as divinely instructed. The noús of the first man far surpasses ours. When the noús serves God purely, it is divine and rises up to heaven in an initiation into the divine mysteries. In ecstasy, it is replaced by the pneúma. God himself is noús in the deepest sense. In contrast, the human noús is limited, but because cosmic noús has created the universe, it has the promise that it will finally come to know God and itself. In Plotinus the noús is the thinking substance and the supreme hypostasis in the intelligible realm. It works in the lesser suprasensual and sensual spheres and is in us the chief force alien to the world of sense. In the Hermetic writings God is noús in the supreme sense and then there is a second noús. The divine noús is a unique human property that brings knowledge and insight, although in some texts it seems to belong only to the righteous. In Gnosticism and magic noús is hypostatized as the god Noús or as an emanation among the aeons. The aeon Noús still plays a part in Manicheanism.

C. noús in the NT.

a. Used only by Paul (apart from Lk. 24:45; Rev. 13:18; 17:9), noús is imprecise in the NT, though never equated with pneúma or psychḗ. It first means "mind" or "disposition" in the sense of inner orientation or moral attitude (cf. Rom. 1:28; Eph. 4:17; Col. 2:18; 1 Tim. 6:5; Tit. 1:15). In the disposition of the believer there should be constant renewal (Rom. 12:2). Unity is achieved when members of the community are of the same noús (1 Cor. 1:10).

b. A second sense is "practical reason," i.e., the moral consciousness that determines will and action. Thus in Rom. 7:23 the noús affirms the law to be God's, and in 7:25 Paul serves this law with his noús.

c. The word then means "understanding"; in this sense it is the faculty of knowledge whether as state or act. Thus the noús understands the OT in Lk. 24:45 and penetrates secrets in Rev. 13:18; 17:9. God's peace grants a liberation far beyond our care-ridden understanding (Phil. 4:7). The noús produces intelligible words and clear thoughts in 1 Cor. 14:14-15, 19. It commands a sure power of judgment when faced with extravagant ideas (2 Th. 2:2).

d. A final sense is "thought," "judgment," or "resolve." We are to be established in our own judgment (Rom. 14:5). God's saving resolve answers the question put in Rom. 9- 11 (11:34). This is also the meaning in the first occurrence in 1 Cor. 2:16 ("the mind of the Lord"); in the second occurrence ("the mind of Christ") the sense is more that of disposition (a.).

D. noús in the Oldest Christian Literature after the NT. The word is rare and imprecise in the apostolic fathers, but Gnostics find in Christ the first-begotten Noús, the Apologists think God and Christ are by nature noús and may be known only by noús, and Clement of Alexandria suggests that God is noús, that Christ is the Son of noús, that the word illumines the soul as it pierces to the depths of the noús, and that the human noús, when purified, can in some sense receive God's power. Thus philosophical ideas give to the use of noús a thrust that it does not have in the NT itself.

nóēma. This word denotes the result of the activity of noús, i.e., "what is thought," "thought," "concept," "point," "resolve," or "plan." Only Paul uses it in the NT, and always in a bad sense (except in Phil. 4:7). Thus, in the plural, it means corrupt thoughts in 2 Cor. 3:14; 4:4; 11:3, the devices of Satan in 2 Cor. 2:11, and opposing thoughts that are captured and brought into Christ's service in 2 Cor. 10:5. In Phil. 4:7 (also plural) the reference is to thoughts that proceed from the hearts of believers.

anóētos. In the rare passive this word means "unthought of," "unsuspected," "unintelligible," or "inconceivable," and in the more common active it means "unwise," "irrational," or "foolish," with a moral as well as an intellectual nuance. In Rom. 1:14 the plural is used for those whose power of thought is undeveloped. Elsewhere in the NT the word involves an adverse moral or religious judgment (Gal. 3:1; Tit. 2:3). In 1 Tim. 6:9 the many desires that assail the rich are anóētoi because they are morally suspect as well as making no sense or having no substance.

ánoia. This word means "unreason" or "folly," and has a moral slant. In Lk. 6:11 a mad fury is denoted. 2 Tim. 3:9 refers to the dreadful folly of new and old errors.

dysnóētos. This word means "something that is hard to understand." 2 Pet. 3:16 refers to such things in Paul's epistles; the ignorant and unstable twist them. Possibly in view are what Paul says about freedom, about flesh and spirit, or about eschatology.

1. Use outside the NT. This common word for "thought" has such varied senses as (1) thought as a function, (2) the power of thought, the thinking consciousness, (3) the way of thought, (4) the result of thought, e.g., thought, idea, opinion, or judgment, (5) resolve or intention, and (6) the meaning of words or statements. The LXX uses it as an equivalent of kardía, and the usage is much the same in other Jewish works.

2. NT Usage. Though not common, diánoia occurs in most NT books in the popular sense, with some LXX influence. In the Synoptics and Hebrews the main sense is "mind" or "understanding" (cf. Mk. 12:30; Heb. 8:10; 10:16; an arrogant disposition in Lk. 1:51). In Eph. 4:18 the defect of noús is traced back to a defect of diánoia (moral and spiritual understanding). In Col. 1:21 the pre-Christian mode of thinking is in view, and the impulses of the will are meant in the plural in Eph. 2:3, i.e., evil thoughts or inclinations. The metaphor of 1 Pet. 1:13 is a summons to readiness of mind and soul, while in 2 Pet. 3:1 a pure disposition is meant. The only instance in the Johannine writings is in 1 Jn. 5:20, where the reference is not to specific knowledge, nor to a natural disposition, but to thinking (given by the Son of God) that is oriented to God. In the apostolic fathers we find a use similar to that of the NT, e.g., for faculty of thought or for mind (evil thoughts in 1 Clem. 39.1). The word is less common than noús and kardía in the Apologists, but Clement of Alexandria uses it in all the current Greek senses.

dianóēma. This word denotes the result of dianoeísthai, namely, “thought,” “opinion,” “resolve,” “judgment.” The only NT instance is in Lk. 11:17 where, in a bad sense, it is used for the hostile reservations regarding Jesus and his power.

l. Use outside the NT. This word means “what takes place in the noús,” i.e., “deliberation.” It can then mean “what arises in the noús,” and it is used in philosophy for “idea” or “concept.” Thus in Stoicism all thought rests on empirical énnoiai (concepts). Such concepts come by experience or observation. They are common to all people, but not innate. They include notions of God, immortality, providence, and good and evil. In the LXX énnoia occurs often in Proverbs for “insight,” “perception,” “consideration,” etc. (cf. 1:4; 3:21; 4:1; 16:22; 18:15; 23:4). In the plural it denotes ethical thoughts in 23:19. Elsewhere in Jewish works the term is rare. Philo can use it in the everyday sense, but usually for him it denotes the thoughts with which reason fructifies the noús. In Gnosticism it is hypostatized as the aeon Énnoia.

2. NT Use. The term is rare in the NT and the use is popular. In Heb. 4:12 the énnoiai that God’s word discerns are morally questionable thoughts. In 1 Pet. 4:1 the truth expressed in Christ’s passion is a “thought” with which believers are to arm themselves so as to have no more dealings with sin (cf. Rom. 6:2ff.).

eunoéō, eúnoia. eunoéō means “to be well-disposed to,” “to meet halfway,” and eúnoia means “goodwill.” In Mt. 5:25-26 the advice to the debtor is to meet his adversary halfway, i.e., to come to an arrangement with him. In the light of the last judgment, disciples should be conciliatory with a view to settling wrongs. In Eph. 6:7 the admonition that slaves should serve with eúnoia (goodwill) corresponds to a general view of antiquity but is given a new basis, namely, that the service is now rendered to the Lord. Mart. Pol. 17.3 transfers the loyalty or self-sacrifice of subjects directly to the relation between Christians and Christ.

katanoéō. This compound intensifies the simple noéō; it means “to immerse oneself in.” This may be in the field of sensory perception, but critical examination is also denoted, and in literary Greek the idea is that of apprehension by pondering or studying. In the NT visual perception is usually the point, e.g., scrutiny of an object (Jms. 1:23-24), or the observation of facts or processes (Lk. 12:24, 27; Rom. 4:19; Acts 7:31-32). Sensory contemplation may lead to intellectual apprehension, and this is indicated in Lk. 20:23, where Jesus takes note of the craftiness of his questioners. In Hebrews Christians are to focus on the moral example of Christ (3:1-2) or to consider how they can stir up one another to loving actions that will demonstrate their faith (10:24).

A. Greek Usage.

1. metanoéō. (1) This word, which is fairly rare, has first the sense “to note after or late” (often with the sense “too late”). (2) It then means “to change one’s noús,” i.e., opinion, feelings, or purpose. (3) If it is perceived that the former noús was wrong, it then takes on the sense “to regret,” “to rue,” in various constructions, and often with an ethical nuance.

*2. metánoia. (1) The noun, too, can mean “later knowledge” or “subsequent emendation.” (2) More commonly it denotes “change of noús,” whether in feelings, will, or thought. (3) It then means “remorse” or “regret” if there is dissatisfaction with the previous noús and the pain etc. it might have caused.

3. Historical Significance of the Date. At first the two words bear a purely intellectual sense. When the idea of change of noús establishes itself, emotional and volitional elements come in, but the change is not necessarily ethical; it may be from good to bad. Only when the idea of regret is present is a moral component plainly included, and even now there is no total change in life’s direction, for the regret is only for a specific act or attitude, not for a whole way of life. Philosophers use the terms mainly in the intellectual sense, though not without a moral nuance. Fools become wise when they reconsider, but the wise are above metánoia, since it would pillory them as the victims of error and show them to be lacking in inner harmony. The Greek world offers no true linguistic or material basis for the NT understanding of metanoéō and metánoia as conversion. [J. BEHM, IV, 948-80]

B. Repentance and Conversion in the OT.

1. Cultic and Ritual Forms of Penitence.

(1) The Occasion and Development of Penitential Observances. Although the OT has no special terms for repentance, the concept is present in cultic and prophetic forms. The cultic forms develop out of national emergencies, which are traced to the wrath of God even when no specific offenses are perceived. The fast that is used as an occasion for accusing and robbing Naboth is an example, although often common afflictions will not be attributed to the sins of individuals but to public guilt. As Joel portrays it, the priests summon to the fast, the people assembles on the blast of the ram’s horn, and there is common lamentation (Joel 2: 15ff.).

(2) External Forms. Along with fasting, sackcloth and ashes are penitential forms. We also read of scratching (Hos. 7:14) and pouring out water (1 Sam. 7:6). Cattle may also fast and be garbed in sackcloth (Jon. 3:7-8; cf. Esth. 4:16).

(3) Liturgies. Calling on God with the confession of sin is also a feature in the fast. Fixed liturgies develop to this end (Hos. 6:1ff.; Jer. 3:21ff.; Neh. 9; Dt. 9:4ff.). Neh. 1:5ff. contains a strong sense of sin, but later we also find protestations of innocence (cf. Ps. 44). No reference is made to offerings in this connection, but one may perhaps infer from Mic. 6:6-7 that they would be made. Indeed, it has been suggested that the human sacrifices which the prophets condemned might be made on such occasions.

(4) Days of Penitence. General days of penitence seem to have been common in preexilic times (1 Kgs. 8:33ff.). During the exile fasts are established for the fall of Jerusalem. Defeats, droughts, famines, fires, etc. are the reasons for these special days.

(5) Prophetic Criticism of Cultic and Ritual Penitence. Since cultic forms might become purely external, they are subject to prophetic criticism. Thus Amos complains that the people does not truly repent (Am. 4:6ff.) even though it most likely engages in cultic practices. Hos. 6:1ff. depicts the people doing outward service, but in 6:4ff. God sees no serious penitence in it, for it has no moral force. Zechariah raises again the ancient prophetic cry for an inner fasting that will issue in righteousness (7:5ff.). Joel adds to the summons to weeping a call for the rending of the heart and not the garment (2:12-13). The prophets are not rejecting external forms but are insisting that serious penitence carries with it a turning from sin to righteousness. Without this the external forms might easily come to be viewed as magical ways of dealing with national disasters rather than as ways to establish a new and true relationship with God. This is why they protest against them.

2. The Prophetic Concept of Conversion. The prophets do not invent a special word for true repentance but make do with the common word for return (šûḇ). This carries with it a sense of turning back, i.e., after relapse, but not exclusively so, for sometimes the idea is that of turning from. In general, what is meant is an about-face. The turning is mostly to God (once in Neh. 9:29 to the law), and what is turned from is evil conduct, previous conduct, violence, idols, or sin. The concept of conversion stresses positively the fact that real penitence involves a new relation to God that embraces all spheres of life and claims the will in a way that no external rites can replace. The question of standing before God is the question that really matters. All other things, relations with others, the cultus, and the state, depend on it. Implied here is a strongly personal view of sin whereby individual faults are seen to result from a wrong attitude to God, e.g., infidelity in Hosea, rebellion in Isaiah, forsaking God in Jeremiah. This wrong attitude is the more serious because of Israel's special relationship to God as the covenant people. In line with the personal view of sin is a personal view of repentance as turning to God with all one's being. This turning, or returning as the prophets often call it, has three facets. (1) It means obedience to the will of God, i.e, unconditional recognition of God in conduct corresponding to his will (Hos. 6:1ff.; Jer. 34:15). (2) It means trust in God in rejection of all human help and all false gods (Hos. 14:4; Jer. 3:22-23). (3) It means turning aside from everything that is ungodly. This third aspect seems to be taken for granted in the older prophets but comes to expression in Jeremiah and especially in Ezekiel (Jer. 26:3; Ezek. 18:26, etc.). The call to conversion presupposes its possibility. This aspect is less prominent in Amos, whose message is predominantly one of ineluctable judgment (7:8; 8:2). Hosea, too, appreciates the seriousness of the situation, but he believes that judgment itself will open the door to conversion, not because the latter is a human possibility, but because it is the goal of God's direction of history (2:8-9; 3:5). Isaiah accepts the fact that conversion is a consequence of God's own saving action, but only for a remnant, not for the whole people. Jeremiah in his many appeals seems to assume that by repentance the people may avert judgment, but he expects a comprehensive renewal only as God writes his law in the hearts of the people (31:33). In general, the prophets do not state that the people has a possibility of its own whereby it may repent and avert judgment. On the other hand, judgment is not for it a blind fate. It preserves the living quality of the relation to God and the validity of the moral order.

3. The Exilic and Postexilic Period. The later chapters of Isaiah and Ps. 51 maintain the prophetic witness with their orientation of both sin and conversion to God Is. 44:2) and their insistence on inner renewal (Ps. 51:10). Ezekiel stresses the individual aspect, accords more prominence to the forsaking of sin, gives conversion enhanced significance as a means to salvation, and counts far more on its possibility, although in the last resort he, too, sees the need for a new heart that only God can give (cf. 18:21ff.; 33:12ff.; 36:26). A stronger orientation to the law may be seen in the sins from which Malachi demands conversion (3:7-8), or in the call of Neh. 9:29 for conversion to the law (cf. the role of the Passover in 2 Chr. 30:6ff.). Yet inner repentance is still seen to be the central point (cf. Joel 2:12ff.; Jon. 3:8ff.) even if the thought is not expressed with its original grandeur and profundity. [E. WÜRTHWEIN, IV, 980-89]

C. metanoéō and metánoia in Hellenistic Jewish Literature.

1. The LXX.

(1) metanoéō. This word is rare in the LXX. It is used for "to regret" and "to change one's mind"—with both God and man as subject. The LXX prefers epistréphō or apostréphō for religious and moral conversion, but metanoéō can have much the same sense (Jer. 8:6) when used for Heb. šûḇ. metanoéō, then, can acquire the sense of a lasting change that it does not have in the secular sphere.

Heb. Hebrew

(2) metánoia. The LXX does not use this word in translating the OT.

2. Other Literature.

(1) Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha. These works have metanoéō and metánoia for conversion in the full sense (Sir. 48:15 etc.). The usage echoes the prophetic call for conversion as a gift and task from God. God himself grants it as a means whereby sinners may come to eternal life. But while a total change is the goal, there is a tendency to stress individual sins that are left and individual laws that are kept. Thus a petty legalistic zeal tends to crowd out the true concept. On the other hand, when conversion is related eschatologically to the final goal of faith and hope, it is seen in the prophetic sense as God's gift and work for Israel.

(2) Philo. In Philo one sees the synthesis of Greek culture and Jewish religion. Philo uses the terms for "change of mind," but he also gives them the religious nuance of religious and moral conversion, i.e., the total change of turning to God and turning from sin that affects all life and conduct. Without such conversion there is no salvation. In his depiction Philo does, of course, adopt philosophical and mystical elements, e.g., when he says that conversion fulfils the Stoic ideal, or when he shows that it brings harmony in thought and word. Yet he does not agree with the Stoics that the sage needs no metánoia, and in his total view the OT concept retains its distinctive flavor.

(3) Josephus. Like Philo, Joshus uses the terms both in the common sense and in the religious and moral sense. His statements, however, are echoes with little profundity. He attaches significance to external forms, focuses on individual vices and virtues, and relates conversion to the averting of punishment. Yet the goal of a new life stands behind the individual manifestations.

D. Conversion in Rabbinic Literature. The rabbis give linguistic expression to the OT view of conversion with their frequent use of terms for "to convert" or "conversion." While they do not work out the theology of conversion systematically, they have an inner religious concern for the matter. They extol conversion as great, and accord it saving significance. Its gates are always open. It is a break with wicked acts and where necessary entails restitution. It comes to expression in penitential prayer. Its positive side is obedience to the law. Although God must give it, humans achieve it, partly in the form of cultic exercises. It is often repeated since there are new violations of the law. By obstinate sinning, one may forfeit it and incur final punishment. Some rabbis think that Israel's conversion is a condition of the coming of the Messiah but others think that the time is set by God. Another hope is that the Messiah will lead all people to God by conversion. The core of the rabbinic view is much the same as that of Hellenistic Jewish teaching.

E. metanoéō and metánoia in the NT.

1. The Linguistic Understanding. The two words are most common in the Synoptics and Acts (the verb 21 times, the noun 14). Paul has the verb only once, and the noun four times. The verb occurs 12 times in Revelation, the noun three times in Hebrews and once in 2 Peter. The popular sense occurs in Lk. 17:3-4 and 2 Cor. 7:9-10 ("regret" or "remorse"). The usual meaning is "change of mind" or "conversion" with the full OT nuance. This nuance is important, for it makes a big difference whether the call of Jesus to repent is a call to total conversion or simply a call to sorrow for sin, a change of mind, or acts of restitution.

2. The Concept of Conversion.

(1) John the Baptist. Conversion is the core of the message of John, who proclaims the imminence of judgment and demands a turning to God as God is turning to us. The summons acquires new urgency inasmuch as it stands in the light of eschatological revelation. This is a once-for-all conversion, an inner change, that is required even of the righteous and must find expression in acts of love. A baptism of conversion signifies that God is at work to change our nature for the new aeon. God himself grants conversion as both gift and task; it is for us to let it be given and to authenticate it as the divine basis of a new being.

(2) Jesus. In the teaching of Jesus metanoeíte is the imperative that is implied in the indicative of the message of the kingdom. Conversion is a basic requirement that follows from the reality of the eschatological kingdom as it is present in Jesus‘ person. The preaching and miracles are a call to conversion in a final and unconditional decision, in a once-for-all turning to God in total obedience (cf. Mk. 1:15; Mt. 12:39ff.; 11:20ff.; Mt. 4:17). This is the point of Jesus’ teaching even when the terms are not used. Not merely evil, but anything that might be put before God must be renounced (Mt. 5:29-30; 10:32ff., etc.). Conversion applies to all people, demanding a complete commitment that seeks forgiveness in full trust and surrender. Faith is its positive aspect (cf. Mk. 1:15). It is not a human achievement, for it involves becoming small and receptive like a child (Mt. 18:3). It is God’s gift, but as such a binding requirement. By the baptism of the Spirit Jesus imparts the divine power that creates those who are subject to the divine rule, i.e., converted people. In all its severity, then, the message is one of joy. metánoia is not law, but gospel.

(3) Primitive Christianity.

a. General. In the apostolic kerygma conversion is a total requirement. The disciples preach it in Mk. 6:12 and are directed to summon people to it in Lk. 24:47. metánoia is at the heart of their message in Acts (5:31; 8:22; 11:18, etc.). It is a basic article in Heb. 6:1. Peter’s sermon connects it with baptism (Acts 2:38). It is a turning from evil to God (8:22; 20:21). It is both a divine gift and a human task (5:31; 2:38). It embraces all life (cf. Acts 3:19 etc.). Its basis is Christ’s saving work (5:31). The Spirit effects it (11:18). Faith goes with it (26:18). The imminent end gives urgency to its proclamation (Rev. 2:5, 16; 3:3). The goal is remission of sins (Acts 3:19) and final salvation (11:18).

b. Paul. In Rom. 2:4 metánoia in view of the judgment is what God in his goodness seeks for us. It is God’s gift (2 Tim. 2:25). It means a radical break with the past (2 Cor. 12:21). Psychologically it involves remorse (2 Cor. 7:9-10), but more deeply it is God’s saving work. For Paul, the concept of faith embraces conversion with its implication of death and renewal. This explains his sparing use of the terms.

c. John. In John, too, faith includes conversion. So does the new birth from God. The sharp line drawn between light and darkness etc. means that believing in God necessarily carries with it a turning from evil.

d. The Impossibility of a Second metanoía in Hebrews. Hebrews stresses the total seriousness of conversion. We cannot command it at will (12:7). There is no renewal of it for apostates. What is at issue is not daily repentance but the decisive change that is a new creation. Those who are set in the circle of eschatological salvation, if they consciously arrest the movement and turn back from God, are exposed to eschatological judgment. Conversion is a totality, and hence its surrender is a total surrender.

F. metanoéō and metánoia in the Ecclesiastical Writings of the Postapostolic and Early Catholic Period. The apostolic fathers make frequent use of the terms in the full sense (1 Clem. 8.3; Justin Dialogue 109. 1; Hermas Mandates 4.3.2). Greek ideas are interfused (Hermas Visions 3.7.3; Justin Apology 61. 10; Mart. Pol. 9.2), but Christian influence is apparent (Did. 10.6; 1 Clem. 7.4; Hermas Similitudes 9.22.3; Justin Apology 15.7-8), and there is a strong orientation to the OT (1 Clem. 8; Justin Dialogue 25.4; 30. 1; 107.2). Jewish ideas make some impact. Thus keeping the commandments is part of conversion (Hermas Visions 5.6-7), and penitence with weeping and wailing is required (Justin Dialogue 141.3). This leads to the development of a penitential discipline and the equation of metánoia and penance. The teaching of Hermas opens the door for this with its message of a second repentance. The first conversion is unique (Mamdates 4.3.1-2), but a second repentance is possible which consists of moral achievement in accordance with the mandates (Mandates 1-12). Asceticism and penal suffering are the school of this conversion (Similitudes 7.4-5; Mandates 4.2.2).

ametanóētos (→ ametamélētos under metamélomai). This word means “exposed to no change of mind,” “beyond repentance or recall,” “unshakable.” The Stoics use it to express their ideal of never repenting. Paul, however, poses the Christian antithesis to this ideal by using the word in Rom. 2:5 for the hardened mind and heart of the self-righteous who resist conversion.

A. The Usage.

1. pronoéō. This word means “to perceive in advance,” “to note beforehand,” “to foresee”; also “to know in advance,” then “to care for,” “to make provision for,” “to take thought for.” “To care for” is the meaning in 1 Tim. 5:8, while “to have regard for” is the sense in 2 Cor. 8:1 and Rom. 12:17 (cf. Prov. 3:4 LXX).

2. prónoia. This word means “prior vision or knowledge” but usually has the sense of “forethought” or “provision.” When the term is applied to the gods the meanings converge in foreknowledge, foresight, and foreordination. The stress is on the temporal and rational elements. In philosophy prónoia is used for divine providence and itself becomes a term for deity (especially in Stoicism). The NT never alludes to divine prónoia. prónoia is rhetorically ascribed to Felix in Acts 24:2, and in Rom. 13:14 Paul warns believers not to care for the body in such a way as to give entry to sinful lusts.

B. The Concept of Divine Providence.

1. Greek and Roman Antiquity. Beginning with the idea of the rule of cosmic reason, Greek thought develops the concept of a divine prónoia that works in nature for human good. The wise and just care of the gods binds us to obedient trust. Providence is at the heart of Stoic belief. Nothing is contingent; immanent divine power harmonizes all things and works them for good. Destiny may be ineluctable, but it expresses a benevolent concern. Moral as well as physical events are under divine control, and a rational humanity is the goal. Since the gods cannot fail, a joyous confidence results.

2. The OT. The only direct expression of providence in the OT is in Job 10:12, but the belief that the God of creation upholds and directs the world is everywhere present (cf. Pss. 65:6ff.; 104; Hos. 2:10; Job 9:5ff.). God sees to it that his purposes are achieved (Ps. 19:6; Job 38:33; Prov. 8:29; Jer. 5:22). We have here no neutral or abstract idea but the personal God who overrules the history of his people (Dt. 32:39; 2 Kgs. 19:25ff.) and shapes the destiny of all peoples (Am. 2:1ff.; 9:7; Gen. 11:1ff.; Is. 41:2ff.). Displaying his presence by miracles (1 Sam. 12: 16ff.), God foresees history (Is. 22:11) and chooses instruments to effect his purposes in it (Is. 49:1 ff.). Believers are caught up in the events that God directs and hence they experience his guidance and see that their lives are in his hands (Prov. 20:24; Job 5: 18ff.; Ps. 16:5ff.). Even evil is a means in God’s hands (Am. 3:5-6; Is. 45:7). Incomprehensibly it serves his plan of salvation (cf. Gen. 50:20). The OT view of providence is strongly theocentric and volitional.

3. Judaism. Through all the pressures of history Judaism maintains the OT belief in God’s providence. This is apparent in the great apocalypses in which persons and events serve foreknown ends and history follows a predetermined course with the rule of God as the final goal. The law is a providential guarantee of God’s dynamic presence and its commandments are tools of providence. God controls all situations, so that one may commit oneself always to him in prayer, although providence in this sense does not negate human freedom. To express the idea of providence Hellenistic Judaism takes over the term prónoia. It is natural that God as Father should be concerned for his children. He thus works to avert what is harmful and to achieve what is beneficial (cf. Philo and Josephus). The habit even develops of calling God prónoia (4 Macc. 9:24), and Philo can describe providence in Stoic terms (cf. On the Special Laws 3.189).

4. The NT. That the NT does not express the concept of providence illustrates its distinction from philosophy. The belief is implicitly present but along OT lines. God as Creator is Lord of heaven and earth (Mt. 11:25). He directs history's course to his own goal (Rom. 11:36). Predominant is the love of God enacted in Christ. This is what is reflected in God's sending sunshine and rain on all people (Mt. 5:45) and in his care for all creatures (6:26ff.). God works all things for good for those who love him (Rom. 8:28), and nothing can separate them from his love (8:35ff.; cf. Phil. 2:13). This faith gives individuals their place in God's teleological control of history (Rom. 9-11) with the establishment of his kingdom as the goal. The foreseen plan of salvation, manifested in history in Christ, reaches its consummation beyond history.

5. The Early Church. The apostolic fathers inherit the concept of providence. The sprouting of seeds attests to the resurrection (1 Clem. 24.5) and the church is the work of divine providence (Hermas Visions 1.3.4). Philosophical ideas intermingle with the primary soteriological concern (Athenagoras Supplication 1.1). If Irenaeus ascribes providence plainly to the God of salvation (Against Heresies 4.36.6), Clement of Alexandria views it as a rational truth, to doubt which is unchristian (Stromateis 1.52.1ff.). Philosophy itself is for him a work of providence preparing the way for the gospel (1.18.4; 6.128.3). The tendency, then, is to split providence and salvation into distinct branches of the divine operation that are related, but not organically so.

hyponoéō, hypónoia. The verb means "to think in secret," "to suspect," or, more generally, "to conjecture." In the NT only Acts uses it, and with no theological significance. It means "to suppose" in 13:25, "to suspect" in 27:18, and "to conjecture" in 27:27. The noun has such senses as "secret opinion," "conjecture," "illusion," and "hidden meaning" (e.g., of metaphors or allegories). In 1 Tim. 6:4, which depicts the liking of false teachers for wars of words, the reference is to the wicked suspicions or insinuations with which they try to discredit those who oppose them.

nouthetéō, nouthesía. The verb means "to impart understanding," "to set right," "to lay on the heart." The stress is on influencing not merely the intellect but the will and disposition. The word thus acquires such senses as "to admonish," "to warn," "to remind," and "to correct." It describes a basic means of education. Philo and Clement of Alexandria speak about God or Christ warning, censuring, and encouraging us in this way. The idea is not that of punishment but of a moral appeal that leads to amendment. In this sense it takes on the meaning "to discipline." Philosophy, however, does not use it technically for its own work. The LXX makes little use of it; it means "to reprimand" in 1 Sam. 3:13, "to admonish" in Job 4:3, and "to correct" in Job 30:1; 36:12. The noun, which means "admonition" or "correction," is common in Philo, for whom it represents divine warnings as distinct from divine punishments. The only LXX use is in Wis. 16:6 (the desert plagues as a warning), but Job 5:17 has the synonymous nouthétēma. The group occurs in the NT only in Paul. In Eph. 6:4 the noun represents a means of Christian upbringing, i.e., the admonition or instruction which will correct but not provoke. In 1 Cor. 10:11 God's OT judgments have pedagogic significance; they are written for our instruction. The verb denotes a pastoral function. Paul warns and teaches (Col. 1:18) with a view to bringing believers to maturity in Christ. Admonition is a central part of the cure of souls (Acts 20:31). Criticisms are fatherly words of correction (1 Cor. 4:14-15). The churches are to correct one another through their pastors (1 Th. 5:12) or their reciprocal ministries (1 Th. 5:14). This may be a correcting of the refractory (2 Th. 3:15), but it may also be a last attempt to reclaim heretics (Tit. 3:10). The pastoral use remains a common one in the apostolic fathers (1 Clem. 7.1; Ignatius Ephesians 3.1; Hermas Visions 2.4.3), and the reference may also be to admonitory sermons (2 Clem. 17.3; Justin Apology 67.4). nómos [law], anomía [lawlessness], ánomos [lawless], énnomos [lawful], nomikós [lawyer], nómimos [lawful], nomothétēs [lawgiver], nomothesía [the law], nomothetéō [to give laws], paranomía [lawlessness], paranoméō [to transgress the law]

A. The Greek and Hellenistic World.

J. The Meaning of nómos.

a. From némō, “to allot,” nómos first means “what is proper.” It thus comes to apply very broadly to any norm, rule, custom, usage, or tradition. The concept is religious but embraces all aspects of life (e.g., marriage, family, schools, and meals, not just the cultus). Even the gods have nómoi.

b. Politically a specialized use develops in the sphere of law, although nómos may still denote more generally the absolute as well as the political law, e.g., cosmic law, natural law, or moral law.

c. By the fifth century B.C. the term comes to be used for written laws in a legal sense.

d. It then denotes “contracts” or “conventions.”

e. It has a musical application as “mode of singing” or “melody.” Nómos is personified as a divine figure in poetry and later in theology.

2. The Nature and Development of the Concept in the Greek World. Rooted in religion, nómos always retains its relation to the cultus in the Greek world. Even written law expresses the will of deity. nómos always has an author, either deity or an inspired legislator. It is thus a work of supreme skill. Only when laws come to be made by consent does the concept lose its strength.

a. In the earliest period nómos is a creation and revelation of Zeus. It is thus firmly anchored in the divine sphere and expresses what is right or just. The city-states give constitutional form to established usage. The state represents nómos; hence the people must fight for its nómos as for the state itself. It is the ruling power (the basileús or despótēs) in the city.

b. By the sixth century B.C. Zeus comes to be viewed as a divine principle. The cosmos is ruled by nómos, and human nómos reflects this. It is a specific instance of divine law. One can no more live without it than without the nómos that rules the cosmos. Some authors (e.g., Heraclitus) understand cosmic law in terms of national law, but others (e.g., the Stoics) lay more stress on cosmic law, a basis for their cosmopolitanism.

c. Greek tragedy tackles the question of conflicting laws. Sophocles in Antigone depicts the confrontation between the law of the state and ancient unwritten law. The inability to keep the law arises, therefore, from an irreconcilability that may be traced right back to God, and a tragic outcome is thus unavoidable. Violation of the law is not due to human sinfulness in this instance. Out of the dilemma more stress comes to be put on unwritten law, either as the original usage of a state, or more commonly as universally valid natural or divine law (cf. the natural law of the Sophists and the cosmic law of the Stoics). This unwritten law embraces ethical and social as well as ritual commands.

d. In the fifth century B.C. the authority of law is shaken by the discovery of other laws and the conclusion that humans are the authors of specific laws. Conflict results not only between laws but between what is right by law and what is right by nature. An attack on religion is also the consequence. From one standpoint, law alone forms a basis for belief in deity. From another (that of the Sophists), the divine origin of law is a clever invention of lawgivers to add sanctions to their laws. Laws, then, can be overthrown only by an attack on religion. On the other hand, they can be protected only by showing that they are truly divine. This is what Plato attempts, first by proving the existence of the gods and second by affirming that nómos, as a child of noús, is related to the soul.

e. The thinking of Socrates begins with the positive content of the state. The law of the state is for him the law of life. It may be unjustly manipulated, but he dies rather than resist it. Laws are parents that sustain and instruct us, and they are still valid in the face of death and beyond.

f. Socrates does not oppose his individual conscience to nómos, for what is important for the Greeks is not the subjective moral sense but objective knowledge of right and wrong. This knowledge is law, and obedience to law is righteousness, which includes all virtues. The goal of education (Aristotle) is instruction in the spirit and ethos of laws, with law itself as a teacher, and obedience as a valid form of servitude that distinguishes free citizens from real slaves. (The only other valid form of douleía is respect for the gods.) The rule of law guarantees the preservation of the state and the possibility of human life.

g. Plato regards the death of Socrates in obedience to the law as the transition of norm and law from the institution to the soul. He finds a cosmos and order in the soul itself. This is nómos. The inner nómos is the order that is controlled by the norm of the soul, i.e., righteousness and self-control. The spirit gives law a new validity and force (Aristotle finds this in the noús). In this way a fresh link is formed with the divine world. Yet the ideal for Plato is no longer the dominion of law but the rule of a righteous and kingly figure who has true knowledge. In Aristotle, too, the person of outstanding virtue is above law and is indeed law itself for the self and others.

3. nómos in Hellenism.

a. This theory becomes a reality in Hellenism. The king himself is now nómos. As divine, he is the source of law. He is the visible manifestation of eternal law in the cosmos.

b. Stoicism replaces political law with cosmic law. It does not use the term for the laws of state. True divine law is to be sought only in the cosmos, where one law rules that is the basis of society and the union of divine and human beings. As reason, this law pervades nature and determines moral conduct. Zeus is identified as this cosmic law in a concession to popular religion. To decide for this nómos is to come to one’s true self. It is thus a reasonable possibility, and it leads to a happy life. Law is written on the soul. c. In Neo-Platonism law is less significant but the law of providence upholds humanity by relating morality and happiness.

d. Later antiquity adopts for the most part Orphic Platonic views seen in the light of cosmic theology.

4. The Greek Concept of nómos and the NT. For the Greeks nómos comes from the spirit rather than by revelation. Hence it is no mere imperative. It has power over those who try to evade it and brings salvation to those who obey it. It produces, however, no awareness of the inability to keep it, and in the long run fails to carry conviction because of a lack of historical objectivity. All this is in marked contrast to the NT understanding of nómos. [H. KLEINKNECHT, IV, 1022-35]

B. The Law in the OT.

1. The Law in Ancient Israel. In ancient Israel the first laws are rooted in the doctrine of the covenant. The basic principle is that the whole life of the people belongs to God. Laws are not an adjustment of human interests that receives divine sanction nor are they conditions of the divine relationship. They are the requirements of the God to whom Israel belongs in virtue of the exodus and they come directly from God at Sinai. Thus a. their demand is unconditional, as their form shows; b. they take a negative turn, forbidding that which destroys the covenant relationship; c. they make a persuasive appeal to the will; d. they are brief but comprehensive; and e. they are addressed to all Israel, their aim being to fashion the whole people as the people of God.

2. The Understanding of the Law in the Older Historical Books. The true climax of the older histories is the giving of the law. Israel is a graciously elected people. Hence the law is itself a gift of grace that shows the people what is in accord with its status. As faith in God impregnates the law, there is no distinction between law and morality. Ritaul legislation fits into the same pattern, for God's requirement is the principle, and the priests are the guardians of the law. All law is the will of God and rests on God's active choice of the people and his desire to see it live accordingly.

3. The Attitude of the Prophets toward the Law. Prophecy rests on a new encounter with God. The prophetic preaching of repentance presupposes a knowledge of the law (cf. Mic. 6:8). The prophets may put God's demand in a new way, but they do not pose a new demand. For them Israel is still God's people, and violation of the law is apostasy (cf. Am. 2:9; Is. 1:27-28). The prophets see, however, that appeal to the law may go hand in hand with a refusal of true obedience (Am. 2:6). They radicalize and interiorize the law, and in so doing bring out its real thrust. In view of the people's disobedience, they do not expect salvation from a legal order; for this reason they proclaim a new act of God which will establish righteousness and bring the law to the Gentiles (Is. 1:26; 2:3). They attack the cultus when it is used to gloss over disobedience (Jer. 7:11; Hos. 4:6), but while they may regard the contemporary cultus as beyond remedy (Am. 5:25), they clearly do not advocate noncultic worship.

4. The Deuteronomic Understanding of the Law. A distinctive feature of Deuteronomy is the urgency with which the requirement of the law is grounded in God's liberating act. The law must be safeguarded as the link between Israel and God. A further point in Deuteronomy is the concern to impart the blessing of the relation with God to all members of the people. We thus find that in Deuteronomy a. proclamation of the law is preaching; b. the law encompasses all areas of life; c. the neighbor is of central concern; d. distance from God is maintained by upholding the divine supremacy and contesting all submoral worship. Blessing is promised for observance of the law in the form of full enjoyment of the divine purpose and gift. The problem, of course, is the disruptive fact of sin, which only a new covenant, not the law itself, can remedy (Jer. 31:31 ff.).

5. The Understanding of the Law in the Priestly Writing and Related Works. The priestly legislation presents the law with great austerity. Stress falls here on the divine transcendence and the role of Israel in establishing divine order. Yet the basis is still in history, for the holy God is personal will, not impersonal power. It is by God's calling that Israel is God's people and by his creative action that she knows how to live. Moral and cultic norms find a higher unity in the divine will, so that the cultus stands within the total revelation of the law to Moses. The austerity of this presentation does not rule out elements of joy, reverence, and self-sacrifice (cf. Pss. 19; 119). Legalism is thus avoided. In Lev. 17-26 supreme dignity lies in subjection to God's will with a stress on obligation to one's neighbor and less emphasis on the historical validation of the law.

6. The Law in the Postexilic Period. Prophetic judgment falls at the exile, and after it the people knows that it must obey God's will if it is to live. Election is still the basis. Keeping the law does not establish the relation to God but upholds it. Yet the latter aspect comes to the fore and gives the law a certain independence as the means whereby the people may keep itself in grace. Important points (e.g., in Chronicles) are a. that a legal norm governs Israel's history, even the prophets being commandeered by the law; b. Israel becomes a religious community centered on the law (Ezra); c. worship acquires importance primarily as a fulfilment of the law; and d. a new class (the scribes) takes over the religious leadership of the people (Ezr. 7:10). Genuine piety remains (cf. Pss. 19; 37; 40; 119), but by a certain inner logic there is now pressure toward casuistry, the loss of the neighbor as a person, and the exploiting of attachment to the law as an evasion of authentic obedience and as a false means of security.

7. The Meaning of Torah. In the OT Torah is the most comprehensive term for law. It occurs some 220 times in various senses. Its administration is at first a task for the priests, but the prophets use the term both for written commandments and for God's word to them (Is. 8:16). The essential point, then, is always divine authority even though the term may often be used for specific cultic or ritual directions. Later it may denote moral instruction as well (Prov. 28:4; 29:18). In Deuteronomy the whole corpus is the Torah, and this embraces the curses as well as the legal provisions. The law may also be equivalent to divine revelation or to general instruction (Ps. 1:2; 2 Chr. 17:9), but always with a strong sense of authoritativeness. In later works a specific reference to the Pentateuch may be discerned.

8. nómos in the LXX. The LXX mostly has nómos for Torah (some 200 times), and in all it uses nómos some 240 times. In general it gives nómos the fuller sense of later usage. Where other terms are adopted, the reference is usually to plural laws, to human directions, or to individual statutes. In virtue of its equation with Torah, nómos expands its meaning beyond the boundaries of normal Greek usage.

C. The Law in Judaism.

1. The Law in the Pseudepigrapha and Apocrypha. In these varied works, law is always the basis, and some of them specifically apply, defend, or commend the law.

a. Linguistically we find ho nómos (or nómos) in the absolute. Also used are ho nómos kyríou, toú theoú, or Mōyséōs, and such less typically OT expressions as hoi nómoi, ho patrṓos nómos, and ho theíos nómos.

b. Interesting features are (a) the unconditional divine validity and supremacy of the law, as illustrated by the Maccabean revolt, the rise of the Pharisees, the stress on the sabbath and circumcision, and the relating of reward to observance; and (b) the equating of the law and wisdom, with the Torah as a universal law that timelessly expresses the divine will, is itself preexistent, and occupies a mediatorial position (although inability to keep it may give rise to despair in spite of the recognition of its eternal divine validity).

a. Josephus usually has nómos for the religious law of Israel (although he often has hoi nómoi). He may also use ho nómos for the Pentateuch or the OT. Sometimes he employs nómos for the laws of other nations or for the natural order. Another use is for the norm of something, but this is rare.

b. For Josephus the law is dominant. He accepts its divine origin even while making accommodations to his Gentile readers by pointing to the wisdom of Moses, the antiquity of the law, and the rationality of its provisions. The law makes a happy life possible but it also prevents the excusing of sin. For Josephus rewards and punishments play a great part as motives for keeping the law, but Josephus also stresses early instruction in the law and the constraint of conscience. The essential material basis of his view is Jewish, but with an apologetic orientation to the rationalistic and moralistic world of Hellenistic culture.

3. Philo of Alexandria.

a. In usage Philo resembles Josephus, but Philo employs nómos more broadly for the order or law of nature and for norm.

b. Materially, the law is not central in Philo. He seeks to show the agreement between OT law and cosmic law in nature and reason. The unity of God means the unity of creation and revelation. Hence the patriarchs can keep the law by nature. The law itself is of supernatural origin, but, while it must be kept literally, it has allegorical significance. Philo is also concerned to show the rational point of its various provisions, e.g., circumcision. He also stresses the voluntary nature of the law, which encourages rather than commands. We are to meditate on the law, but in the long run the perfect do it by nature, so that for them the law is external and alien. Philo presses for observance, but the thrust of his presentation is to dissolve the law in favor of Hellenistic speculation and moralism.

4. The Law in Rabbinic Judaism.

a. The Torah in rabbinic writings is primarily the Mosaic law. Specifically, but by no means exclusively, it may be the Decalogue. It may also be the Pentateuch. The OT as a whole may also be called the Torah in virtue of its agreement with the Pentateuch. Valid teaching is Torah in a more general sense, as is revelation. Finally, Torah may denote study of the law.

b. Materially, the rabbinic understanding rests on the principles that God has revealed himself once and for all in the Torah and that we are related to God only by relation to the Torah. Special features are (a) that all other authoritative writings depend on the law as contained in the Pentateuch, of which they are the explanation and application; (b) that the law is authoritative because of its divine origin, implications being that the Torah is preexistent, that Moses is passive in its mediation, that it must be copied with great care, and that its sanctity is so great that one must wash the hands before turning from it to secular activities; (c) that reasons are not to be sought for the provisions of the Torah; (d) that the authority of the Torah is so high that God himself is bound by it and that the Messiah will study and keep it; (e) that all relationships are subject to the Torah; (f) that the Torah has differentiating force in human relationships, distinguishing between Israel and the Gentiles and between individuals within Israel; (g) that the Torah shows us what to do or not do with a view to God's approval and eternal life, great danger being incurred by disobedience to it; and (h) that casuistical development almost necessarily follows, although not without a stress on inward piety as a prerequisite of true study.

D. The Law in the NT.

I. Jesus and the Law in the Synoptic Gospels.

l. The Word nómos. nómos occurs only eight times in Matthew, nine in Luke, and not at all in Mark. It normally denotes the Pentateuch, though it may comprise the OT as a whole. The law is primarily that which governs conduct, but promise is also denoted (cf. Lk. 24:44). It is never used for the oral Torah or the teaching tradition (cf. Mk. 7:5, 8).

2. Jesus' Negation of the Law. Jesus affirms the law but also negates it by replacing its mediatorial office. The answer to breaking the law is conversion and forgiveness, not obedience to the law (cf. Lk. 15). Keeping the law does not insure a right relation to God (Lk. 15:25ff.). The attitude to Jesus determines the relation to God (cf. Mt. 10: 13ff.). Rest is achieved by coming to Jesus (Mt. 11:28ff.) and justification by repentance (Lk. 18:14). The law is still valid but a new aeon has come (Lk. 16:16-17) which is bound up with the word and person of Jesus (Mk. 2:21), who himself is free relative to the law.

3. Jesus' Affirmation of the Law. (a) While Jesus negates the mediatorship of the law, he affirms the law in the judgment on sin that his forgiveness implies. Breaking the law brings death, and it is this situation that the act of eschatological pardon remedies. (b) Conversion restores sinners to obedience to the law and is in this sense its affirmation (cf. Mt. 5:20; 7:16ff.; 11:29). (c) Jesus affirms the law by himself observing it (cf. Mt. 9:20; Lk. 2:22ff.). His whole coming is indeed a fulfilment of the law (Mt. 5:18). (d) Jesus states specifically that doing God's good will and keeping the commandments are the same thing (Mk. 10:18ff.). A right disposition demands obedient action expressive of self-sacrificial love of God and neighbor. Those who see this are not far from the kingdom (Mk. 12:34). (e) Detailed criticisms, e.g., of sheltering from disobedience behind the law, or of appealing to the law to evade discipleship, or of putting legal observance above loving service, are in fact a radical affirmation based on the focusing of the law on love of God and neighbor. This concentration restores the law to its original OT sense of a claiming by God in orientation to the neighbor. The difference is that Jesus brings in person the divine act that creates true obedience. When Jesus attacks casuistry, the primary point is that the divine demand on the whole person is taken seriously. Thus the law is open to criticism when it does not expose sin at the root by condemning the attitude and not the act alone. It also fails inasmuch as it can restrain sin (cf. Mt. 5:21ff.) but cannot set it aside as Jesus himself does by establishing the obedience of love. Nevertheless, by bringing the divine forgiveness and sonship, Jesus makes possible a genuine fulfilment of the law, not as a means of self-justification, but as an expression of the new relationship.

4. The Interrelation of Negation and Affirmation of the Law. Jesus' acknowledgment of the law calls for full repentance, which acquires depth and concreteness from the law's demands. It also exhibits true obedience, which rests on the restoration of fellowship by God's new creative act. Confrontation with God's unconditional demand and liberation from the mediation of the law mutually promote and control one another. God's new act establishes the demand, and those who receive forgiveness thereby offer the true obedience of love.

II. The Conflict Concerning the Law.

1. The Primitive Community.

a. At first the primitive community keeps the law without greatly reflecting on it. The extension of the gospel to the Gentiles raises the question, and a first position is reached at the apostolic council (Gal. 2; Acts 15). This council accepts the agreement between Paul's message and that of the Jerusalem church by stating that observance of the law is not necessary to salvation. At the same time, it agrees that Jewish Christians should keep the law, and this leaves unclarified the question of table fellowship with Gentiles that becomes an issue at Antioch (Gal. 2).

b. Implicit in the resultant debate is the question why even Jews have to keep the law if salvation is by faith in Jesus. The main reason given is concern for the Jewish mission (cf. 1 Cor. 9:20-21). To solve the issue of fellowship the apostolic decree adopts measures that can be defended before the Jewish world, which itself permits fellowship with the uncircumcised in synagogue worship.

c. The primitive community obviously regards faith in Christ as its main distinctive, viewing observance of the law as obedience for love's sake in the service of the gospel. It derives this position from Jesus himself, since historically it can hardly have read back its own attitude into the acts and teaching of Jesus: messianic Judaism offers no basis for this by any inner logic of development, and Hellenistic Judaism provides no true parallels (cf. the story of Stephen in Acts 6:9ff.).

d. Further developments arise out of the apostolic council. The radical Judaizers zealously resist the council's decision and claim that circumcision is necessary to salvation and to membership in the community. In some cases this is perhaps due to fear of trouble in the Jewish world (cf. Gal. 6:12-13), but in others it may well be through devotion to the law. Arguments in support are the command of the law, the example of Jesus, the dubious apostolic authority of Paul (cf. Gal. 3; 2 Cor. 11), and the possibility of antinomianism.

e. The main Jewish body represented by James and Peter keeps to the lines laid down by the council. The law is not necessary to salvation, but should be observed by Jewish Christians in the service of the Jewish mission. Fellowship with Gentile Christians is accepted so long as these Christians observe such points as make the fellowship defensible in the Jewish world.

2. The Usage of Paul. Paul starts with the traditional sense whereby the law is the OT law, though his usage is not uniform. The Decalogue is the gist of the law (Rom. 13:8ff.), but nómos comprises other laws and it may be used for a single law (Rom. 7:2). The law demands action; one does it (Rom. 2:25). It represents God's living will. Even those who do not know the law, but do it, are "the" law to themselves (not a law of their own choosing) (Rom. 2:12ff.). The law is the one revealed will of the one God. It can thus be personified (Rom. 3:19; 7:1). On occasion the nómos may be the Pentateuch (cf. Rom. 3:21; Gal. 4:21). A figurative use may also be seen, as when Paul refers to the law of faith (Rom. 3:27). The law of Rom. 7:21 is perhaps to be taken in this way, i.e., the rule that when we want to do right, evil is close at hand. Other instances are the law of sin (Rom. 7:25), the law of the spirit of life (8:2), and the law of Christ (Gal. 6:2).

3. The Material Understanding of the Law in Paul.

a. The cross dominates Paul's material understanding. This explains his otherwise inexplicable negation and affirmation of the law.

b. The law is the good will of God, so that to oppose it is to oppose God (Rom. 8:7). It is oriented to human acts, not just knowledge (cf. Rom. 2:17ff.). To do it is to have a life based on achievement, but this gives rise to boasting, and in fact the law cannot give life (Gal. 3:21), for no one truly keeps it. The law must be affirmed because it is identical with the good. If a distinction is made between Jews who have it and Gentiles who do not, the Gentiles assent to its verdict and all fall under its judgment (Rom. 1-2). Hence all are referred to faith in Christ for salvation (Gal. 3:28).

c. In relation to human sin, the law first forbids it (Rom. 7:7 etc.), then unmasks it as revolt against God (Rom. 7:9), then condemns it (5:13), so that there can be no further appeal to the law, then nails us to it with divine authority (Gal. 3:22ff.), ruling out all attempts at self-righteousness, and finally brings us to death (Rom. 7:9- 10). This is the weakness of the law, which causes Paul to reckon it among the elements, the constitutive features, of the present order (Gal. 4:3), not in spite of, but precisely because of its holiness as a revelation of the divine will.

d. This negation rests on the affirmation of God's pardoning act in Christ (Rom. 3:21ff.; 8:1; Phil. 3:9). Outside faith in Christ, people are still under law (Col. 2:20), but by Christ's death and participation in it there is translation from the sphere of law (cf. Rom. 10:4) into the relation of sonship. Christ, then, replaces the law as the way of salvation; for those who still seek righteousness by law, Christ has died in vain (Gal. 2:21).

e. Yet the cross accepts the verdict of the law (Gal. 2:19; 3:13). It fulfils the condemnation (cf. 2 Cor. 5:21; Rom. 5:6ff.). It is a fulfilment of the law in perfect obedience (Phil. 2:5ff.) and love (Rom. 8:34ff.). Faith recognizes the condemnation implicit in the law, and with it comes the new obedience whereby the law comes to fulfilment in the fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22-23). This is the law of Christ (Gal. 6:2) in which the true intention of the law is realized, so that Paul can say that the gospel establishes rather than abolishes the law (Rom. 3:31). On this ground Paul himself can freely keep concrete provisions of the Mosaic law in ministering to Jews (1 Cor. 9:20ff.), and he can advise Jews not to renounce their circumcision (1 Cor. 7:18ff.). Indeed, the law is the place where Paul seek guidance in community life, not as the decisive argument, but in confirmation of what is known in the obedience of faith.

f. Paul's view seems to derive not so much from personal experience of the law as from a consistent application to the law of faith in the crucified and risen Lord, although it may be debated whether he works out his view independently or in debate with the answers proposed by others around him. Certainly he sees from the outset the antithesis between the way of law and the way of faith.

III. The Period after the Conflict.

1. Hebrews.

a. In Hebrews nómos is usually the OT law. In content it mostly has to do with the priestly law as that which gives the OT priesthood its dignity and force. The main focus, of course, is on the relation between the OT priesthood and that of Christ (cf. 7:16).

b. Although validated by law, the OT priesthood cannot make perfect, nor can its law (7:11, 19). This is because of human weakness (7: 18ff., 24ff.) and the externality of this ministry (9:9-10). The law is weak here, not because humans do not do it, but because humans do it. Only the priesthood of Jesus can bring true sanctification, for here we have a sacrifice of pure obedience.

c. Along these lines Hebrews teaches that the law is not meant to bring us to the goal on its own but rather to point us to Christ and his authentic high-priestly ministry (cf. 10:1 ff.).

d. We thus find a striking similarity to the negation and affirmation of the law in Paul.

2. James. This epistle raises the question of faith and works rather than faith and law. When it uses the term nómos, it often adds a qualification (1:25; 2:8, 12) as though to warn against legalism while guarding against misinterpretations of Paul's teaching. In 1:25 the perfect law of liberty is much the same as the implanted word of v. 21. It is the gospel in its application to life, a law, but in contrast to legalistic law a law of liberty. In 2:8ff. nómos is commandment but hardly in the sense of the whole OT law (notwithstanding v. 10), for the royal law is the law of love, which the rich, too, must take with full seriousness and not expect any partiality. In v. 11 an example is given to back up v. 10, but this does not alter the general equation of nómos with the law of love, which is, as in 1:25, the word of the gospel oriented to specific action. In 4:11-12 the point seems to be that the nómos is God's will for the individual—the law of liberty—which we judge if we judge those who act according to it. The freedom, of course, is the freedom of obedience to the commandment of love.

3. John's Gospel. nómos is more common in John (14 times) than Matthew (eight), but less significant. What is meant is the law, especially in the Pentateuch (1:45), but also in the OT as a whole (10:34). But nómos may also be a single commandment (7:19) or ordinance (7:51). John shows interest in the law, not as a norm of conduct, but as revelation. Thus a. Jesus is compared and contrasted with the law as the perfect revelation of God (cf. 1:17; 8:12, etc.). Yet b. there is an inner connection between Jesus and the law (1:45), for the law witnesses to Jesus (5:39-40), and he fulfils it (8:17), so that one cannot quote the law against him (7:19ff.). Thus c. Jesus and the disciples are not bound by the law as such (5:19; 13:34-35), and yet Christ is imparted to those who do it (1:47ff.). True hearing of the law leads to faith, for Christ both replaces and fulfils the law. In John the law is never a rule for conduct, and nómos does not occur in the epistles or Revelation.

anomía. The prefix gives to anomía the sense of either absence of law or nonobservance of it, i.e., lawlessness. The word is common in the LXX, sometimes in the plural for lawless acts (Gen. 19:15). In the NT it denotes sinful acts in Rom. 4:7 and Heb. 10:17, not necessarily with the law in view. In Rom. 6:19 the condition is also meant, i.e., alienation from the law. In 2 Cor. 6:14, where righteousness and anomía are mutually exclusive, the sense is the general one of iniquity (cf. 2 Th. 2:3). There is perhaps a stronger relation to the law in Mt. 23:28, although less so in Mt. 7:23; 13:41; 24:12. In 1 Jn. 3:4 sin is shown to be serious because it is anomia, i.e., revolt against God, or transgression of the commandment of love as the true law.

ánomos. This word has the objective sense of "having no law" and the subjective sense of "paying no heed to law." The Jews often use the term for the Gentiles with some vacillation of sense. In the NT the reference is to the absence of law in Rom. 2:12 and 1 Cor. 9:21 (cf. also Lk. 22:37; Acts 2:23: the Gentiles). Yet there is an element of judgment in 1 Cor. 9:21, for Paul adds that he is not ánomos theoú. With no specific reference to the OT law, ánomos implies judgment in 1 Tim. 1:9 (lawless); 2 Pet. 2:8 (lawless deeds); 2 Th. 2:8 (the lawless one).

énnomos. The opposite of ánomos, this word implies adherence to the law. When used of persons, it thus means "upright." In Acts 19:39 the reference is to a properly constituted assembly. In 1 Cor. 9:21 Paul says that he is not ánomos theoú but énnomos Christoú, i.e., under Christ's law.

nomikós. This word, meaning "according to law," comes to be used for "lawyer." In Tit. 3:9, as an adjective, it denotes wranglings about the law, either as a norm of life, or, more likely, as a general source of teaching. In Matthew and Luke the word occurs as a noun for Jewish leaders concerned about the administration and understanding of the law (cf. Mt. 22:35; Lk. 7:30; 14:3). The general sense of "lawyer" fits best in Tit. 3:13.

nómimos. This word means “according to rule or order”; tó nómimon is “what is right or fair” The NT has nómimos only as an adverb in 1 Tim. 1:8 and 2 Tim. 2:5. In the latter the meaning is “according to the rules,” or, perhaps, “well.” In the former the meaning is “appropriately”: the law is good if properly used.

nomothétēs. This word, meaning “lawgiver,” occurs in the NT only in Jms. 4:12 with reference to God. The preceding verse controls the sense.

nomothesía. This word denotes the result rather than the act of legislation, i.e., the law, constitution, etc. The one NT instance is in Rom. 9:4, where one of Israel’s privileges is the possession (not the giving) of the law.

nomothetéō. This word means either a. “to give laws” or b. “to settle matters legally.” In the passive in Heb.7:11 the point is receiving the law—the whole law and not just cultic legislation. In Heb. 8:6 the reference is to the general enactment of either the ministry (leitourgía) or the covenant (diathēkē)—most likely the former, although nothing essential is at stake.

paranomía. This word may denote either a condition or an act conflicting with a (legal) norm. The only use in the NT is in 2 Pet. 2:16, where the reference is to Balaam’s wrong act with no specific connection with the OT law. A question arises whether the rebuke here refers to punishment or warning.

paranoméō. This word, meaning “to transgress a law,” occurs in the NT only in Acts 23:3; the antithesis katá tón nómon shows that breaking the OT law is at issue.

nósos [sickness], noséō [to be sick], nósēma [sickness], (malakía [weakness, sickness], mástix [suffering], kakṓs échō [to do badly]) nósos, of uncertain etymology, means “sickness,” “plague,” “epidemic”; also “calamity,” “licentiousness.” noséō means “to be sick” and figuratively “to be full of (unhealthy) ambition” etc.

A. Sickness and Sin.

I. Primitive Near Eastern and Greek Thinking. Primitive thinking connects sickness and impurity under the concept of míasma, which is a kind of substance that one should avoid. Later, demons are thought to convey it or to be stirred up by it, or gods are thought to avenge offenses (mostly cultic) by means of it. Many Babylonian words for sin also denote sickness, and Babylonian penitential psalms often complain about disease and destruction. Expiations are designed to restore the body. In Greece Apollo avenges wrongs by inflicting pestilence, and Egypt offers examples of sickness as a punishment for offenses.

2. The Equation of Defect and Sickness in Greek Philosophy. Greek philosophy hints at the derivation of immoral acts from physical degeneration but also relates defect and sickness more strictly by calling for both physical and mental training to overcome evil.

3. Sickness and Sin in the OT. The OT never describes sin as a spiritual sickness. If the penitential psalms bear resemblances to those of Babylon, the difference is that guilt before God is moral. The sickness of Ps. 103 is a real one, and if it is hopeless like sin, the OT starting point is the connection between guilt and judgment. A sense of innocence (Job) protests against a rigid causality of sin and sickness, and Is. 53 solves the resultant problem by the concept of vicarious suffering.

4. Sickness and Sin in Judaism. Judaism works out the doctrine of retribution but avoids a direct equation of sin and sickness except for some Greek influence in Hellenistic Judaism. If the sick are to make special confession, it is more because of the imminence of death than some special sinfulness. Illnesses may be chastisements of love, and God is especially near the sick, so that they are to be visited and helped, not shunned. The role of medicine is honored as early as Sir. 38:12

5. Sickness and Sin in the NT. The NT views sickness as contrary to God's creative will, sees demonic power at work in it, and traces a general connection between sin and sickness (Mt. 12:22ff. etc.). But Jesus, transcending the dogma of retribution, grants both healing and forgiveness (Mk. 2:5ff.), so that Christians may now see sickness as a divine correction (1 Cor. 11:32) and at the same time take steps to deal with it by prayer, healing, etc. (2 Cor. 12:8; Jms. 5:13ff., etc.). In Mk. 2:17 Jesus accepts sickness as a figure of speech for sin, but he does so only to proclaim that he has come to save sinners. The figurative use in 1 Tim. 6:4 is more Hellenistic with its suggestion that ignorance is the source of aberration (cf. the description of error as a cancerous growth in 2 Tim. 2:17). Being sick denotes here an abnormal inward state.

B. Sickness as Vicarious Suffering.

l. The Suffering Hero in the Greek World. The sick hero or heroine (Orestes, Ajax, Antiope, especially Hercules) is a common figure in Greek mythology. The sicknesses are finally due to a demonism of destiny, which alone can bring human life to full richness. The tragedy, then, has saving significance, but the vicariousness is not that of historical expiation.

2. The Suffering Servant of God in the OT and Judaism. The Bible reflects a tension that only the eschaton can solve, yet in prophetic figures one finds an understanding of sickness in terms of vocational burden. Thus Ezekiel with his cataleptic type of sickness bears the burden of Israel's iniquity (3:22ff.; 4:4ff.), and above all the Servant of Is. 53 bears the sin of the people in vicarious expiation. Only later and in part does Judaism relate this passage to the Messiah, but out of it arises the idea of the Messiah as a leper.

3. The Suffering Man of God in the NT. The NT refers Is. 53 to Jesus, although more in terms of violent death than sickness. Mt. 8:17 specifically quotes Is. 53:4 in relation to the fact that in bearing away illnesses Jesus also bears them, i.e., takes the needs of the sick to himself (cf. 15:30ff.). Sickness is a vocational burden for Paul (cf. 2 Cor. 12:7ff.), though he does not call it vicarious. His sufferings mostly take the form of persecution but do not exclude ill health. In Col. 1:24 the thought is not that Paul's sufferings supplement or complete the vicarious work of Christ but that Christ, present with his "body" in this aeon, still undergoes a measure of suffering which hastens the final redemption. Himself present as Head in the heavenly aeon, Christ has died vicariously once and for all at the cross.

C. The Church and Sickness.

1. Visiting and Caring for the Sick. Visiting and caring for the sick is an important ministry in the early church (1 Clem. 59.4; Pol. 1.3). The bishops and deacons pray over the sick, and in times of plague believers devote themselves sacrificially to the sick and dying.

2. The Influence of Is. 53 on the Concept of Christ. The early church does not depict a sick Christ. It refers Is. 53:4 to the crucifixion and sees in the healing and teaching Christ the mighty Helper. A sign of increasing Hellenization is the growing tendency to take the infirmities and diseases of Mt. 8:17 figuratively.

nýmphē [bride, daughter-in-law], nymphíos [bridegroom, son-in-law]

The meaning of nýmphē is "bride," "marriageable young woman," or "young wife," while nymphíos means "bridegroom" or "young husband." Jewish Greek also uses the terms for "daughter-in-law" and "son-in-law." The NT always uses the words for bride or bridegroom except in Mt. 10:35, where the strife is between daughter-in-law and mother-in-law living in the same house.

A. Background Material

1. The Bride as gynḗ. In the NT the bride is often called gynḗ (Mt. 1:20; Rev. 19:7). This accords with Palestinian usage whereby betrothal constitutes a valid marriage and the bride can become a widow, be divorced, or be punished for adultery.

2. The Escort for the Bridegroom. Since marriages are held in the bridegroom's house, the bridegroom comes for the bride and takes her there. The point in Mt. 25:1 is perhaps that the virgins are friends of the bride who meet the bridegroom when he comes for the bride, although on the longer reading ("and the bride" in v. 1) they more likely form an escort on the way to the bridegroom's house.

3. lampádes in the Bridal Procession. Mt. 25:1 presupposes an evening wedding, and the lampádes are either torches or lamps, probably lamps on poles or lanterns.

4. The Best Man. Jn. 3:29 refers to the friend of the bridegroom. At weddings there are two best men who take the bridegroom to the bride and superintend the sexual union. Rejoicing at the success of the bridegroom is taken as a figure for the unselfish delight of the Baptist at the success of Jesus.

B. Christ as Bridegroom in the Parables of Jesus.

t. The Allegory Bridegroom/Messiah Unknown to the OT and Later Judaism. In the parables of Mk. 2:19-20 and Mt. 25:1ff. the bridegroom seems obviously to stand for the Messiah. There is no OT basis for this equation, although Hosea and Jeremiah depict God as the bridegroom or husband of Israel (cf. also Is. 62:5), and later Judaism often uses this image, as in the interpretation of the Song of Songs.

2. The Two nymphíos Parables of Jesus.

a. "Can wedding guests mourn?" (Mt. 9:15 and par.). This is a genuine metaphor, perhaps even a secular proverb, which shows that fasting is out of place now that the age of salvation is present. The secondary clause carries the implication that, since this age is present with Jesus, he is the bridegroom. The addition, predicting the passion, limits the time of nonfasting to Jesus' earthly life.

b. "The bridegroom comes" (Mt. 25:1ff.). This statement comes in a parable of judgment warning of the unexpected end of the age. It refers directly to the suddenness of this end. Implied is the point that the Messiah is the bridegroom and that his coming is delayed. It may be noted that in his own preaching Jesus compares the disciples to the guests rather than to the bride (Mt. 9:15; 22:1ff.).

C. The Development of the Bridegroom/Bride Imagery. This occurs first in 2 Cor. 11:2, where Christ is the bridegroom, the community the bride, and the apostle the best man. Further development comes in Eph. 5:22ff., which on the basis of Gen. 2:24 stresses the loving union between Christ and the church, with self-sacrifice on the one side and obedient dedication on the other. In the Synoptists, of course, the wedding days are at first the days of Jesus' earthly life, but in Revelation the consummation is the wedding (19:7ff.; 21:2, 9; 22:17) and the bride is the heavenly Jerusalem (cf. 21:2 and Is. 61:10). Final fulfilment is depicted here in what is said about the Lamb and his bride. [J. JEREMIAS, IV, 1099-1105]

A. The Presuppositions of the NT Concept of nýn. I. The Forms of the Word (nýn, nyní árti). In the Koine nyní is as common as nýn, but less so in the biblical Koine. In the LXX nyní is more common in literary books like Job, while in the NT it occurs mostly in Paul and Hebrews. nýn occurs mostly in Paul,

par. paragraph

Luke, and John. árti is less common in the NT and is not found at all in Mark, Luke, Acts, the Pastorals, or Hebrews.

II. The Forms of Use.

1. A transitional form to use as a noun occurs when nýn or árti is dependent on prepositions, e.g., “from now on” (Mt. 23:39), “now” (Jn. 13:19), “until now” (1 Jn. 2:9).

2. More commonly in such cases nýn is a noun.

3. As an accusative of time, the noun nýn is more common in the plural either in a temporal sense or with a very weak meaning (Acts 17:30; 4:29).

4. The words may also serve as attributive adjectives between articles and nouns (cf. 1 Tim. 6:17; Rom. 3:26; 2 Pet. 3:7; Acts 22:1; 1 Cor. 4:11).

III. The Nontemporal nýn.

1. As a Connecting Particle. While nýn mostly has temporal significance, it is sometimes used very weakly as a connecting particle.

2. As a Particle of Logical Antithesis. nýn has greater force as a particle when the NT opposes something factual to a hypothetical but erroneous supposition, e.g., human ungodliness in Jn. 8:40 etc., or divine reality in Jn. 18:36 etc. The sense of nyn(í) dé in such cases is “in fact.”

3. A similar expression is kaí nýn, which has the force of “nevertheless” (Jn. 11:22).

IV. The Temporal nýn.

1. As a Limit.

a. At the End. nýn is a limiting concept expressing boundaries. At the end the boundary may be that of a provisional end (Mt. 24:21), that of human life (Gen. 46:34), that of the age of grace (Num. 14:19), or that of hardening (cf. 2 Cor. 3:14). árti has this sense in the NT only in Jn. 16:24. b. At the Beginning. Since the nýn pushes it back, the ending boundary is fluid. In contrast, the beginning boundary is more sharply fixed. What begins is usually a divinely appointed period, e.g., the new aeon, the time of salvation, or the time of personal blessing (Lk. 1:48; 5:10). The end of Jesus inaugurates the time between the comings, a time of distress but also of Christ’s lordship (Lk. 22:18, 69).

2. As a Period of Time. The point may become a line, e.g., the period between the comings, or the now that extends to eternity (2 Pet. 3:18).

3. With Reference to Past and Future.

a. With the preterite, nýn and árti may refer to what has just happened (Mt. 9:18; 26:65, etc.), but also to a state or process initiated by it (Jn. 8:52; Acts 7:52).

b. But nýn may also refer to the near future (Jn. 12:31; Rom. 11:31) in expression of the certainty of faith.

B. The NT Now.

I. Now as the Divine Hour nýn denotes only a moment, but such a moment may become a kairós as God chooses it (cf. Lk. 5:10; Acts 18:36; 20:32). This is especially true of the nýn of the departure of Jesus (Jn. 12:27; 13:31; Lk. 12:52; 22:18). In this now Jesus anticipates his glorifying, which begins even with his humiliation.

II. Now as the Divinely Delineated Period.

1. The History of Christ as Present. The NT claims that God once gave a new turn to human history, but this new turn has present power. It has full weight for Christians as a nýn (Rom. 5:9; Col. 1:22, etc.). They experience history as present, and, since this present has eternal significance, in it they also experience the future as present.

2. The NT nýn between the Comings.

a. Intimations. The prophets give intimations of a future already present by declaring the judgments or blessings that they prophesy. In their case, however, each Now becomes a Then and looks ahead to a new Now. The use of the concept of the two aeons gives further intimation of the specific NT nýn (cf. 2 Tim. 4:10; 1 Tim. 6:17; Gal. 4:25).

b. The Uniqueness of the NT nýn. This concept of the two aeons gives to nýn the value of an interim period from which one may survey the two comings and in which believers belong to both, being still in the old aeon but already in the new. Paul has for this the expression ho nýn kairós, i.e., the time of the remnant of grace for Israel (Rom. 11:5), of suffering between the presence and the return of the Bridegroom for Christians (8:18), but also of the unique revelation of God's righteousness prior to final judgment (3:26). ho kairós hoútos is the term for this interim period in Lk. 12:56 and Mk. 10:30. The present of Heb. 9:9 is also the time of Christ, with a stress on the contrast between the time of fulfilment and that of prefiguration.

3. The NT Still.

a. The unique NT present is part of the old aeon as God's creation (Jn. 5:17), which is now fallen creation (Rom. 8:21-22; cf. 1 Jn. 2:9).

b. The darkness of this aeon is part of the structure of Christ's time between the comings (Lk. 6:21, 25; Jn. 16:20, 22). The nýn begins with Christ and brings division (Lk. 12:52) and suffering (22:36); it also ends with Christ (Rom. 8:18). In this time the world is sti11 the world, and Christians share in this still (Gal. 2:20). Yet the world presses on to Christ's victory (2 Th. 2:6ff.). In it there is thus the possibility of conversion (Acts 17:30). The nýn carries with it an urgent "now at last."

4. The NT Already.

a. nýn in Parallelism with the Past. If the NT nýn also stands in sharp tension with this aeon, there is, of course, an element of correspondence, as in a typological reading of the OT (Gal. 4:29; Heb. 12:26; 1 Pet. 3:21). Yet even here we find a measure of antithesis.

b. nýn in Antithesis to the Past. The antithesis comes out in Paul's tóte/nýn, which stresses the newness and splendor of the present as (a) the now of a new relation to God (Rom. 5:10-11; Col. 1:21-22; Eph. 2:12; 1 Pet. 2:10), (b) the now of the new life in righteousness, freedom, and the power of the Spirit (Rom. 3:21; 6:22; 7:6; cf. Eph. 2:1ff.), and (c) the now of new knowledge in which God has fully revealed himself (Col. 1:26; Eph. 3:5, 10; Rom. 16:26) and believers enjoy the radically transforming knowledge of love (Gal. 4:8-9; 2 Cor. 5:16).

c. nýn as an Anticipation of the Last Things. The day of the Lord has come in this nýn (Lk. 4:19, 21; 2 Cor. 6:2). It expresses the certainty of eschatology already realized: judgment (Jn. 12:31), salvation (2 Tim. 1:10), and even the vision of God (Jn. 14:7). Especially in John (cf. also Revelation) the nýn of the life of Jesus, and more narrowly of his final crisis, anticipates the last things, for in it one is aware of being in transition, of the presence already of the end (cf. the singular nýn of Lk. 16:25 and the ap' árti of Rev. 14:13).

d. nýn as a Proleptic First Stage of the Last Things. If the last things are anticipated in the nýn, the NT still looks ahead to a consummation, so that the now means hope as well as possession (Rom. 5:8-9; 1 Jn. 3:2; 1 Tim. 4:8). While there is present participation, there will also be future fulfilment (cf. Eph. 1:13- 14).

5. Stages of the NT nýn. Within the one nýn of the day of salvation there is a progression of moments. Jesus is aware of the nýn of work in, e.g., Jn. 13:19; 16:1, 4; cf. Lk. 22:36. Within the nýn the disciples are incomplete, and they may thus make progress (cf. the íde nýn of Jn. 16:29). Paul senses the movement of the eschatological clock from nýn to nýn in Rom. 13:11-12; 2 Th. 2:5ff.; cf. the nýn of 1 Cor. 3:2.

6. Once and Now in the Lives of Individual Christians. As Paul shows in Gal. 1:23, the once and now of salvation history apply also to believers (cf. Rom. 5:9; 7:6, etc.). This is a matter of objective fact and not merely of personal experience (Rom. 6:21-22; 11:30-31). The pun of Phlm. 11 brings out its basic significance (cf. also Lk. 2:29; Acts 13:31; Lk. 1:48).

III. nýn with the Imperative.

1. In NT Exhortation. The already of the NT includes renewal, but since the principle of NT ethics is "Be what you are," a nýn with the imperative corresponds to the indicative. There are classical and Hellenistic models for this. In the NT we find it (a) in missionary proclamation (although here the emphasis is more indicative; cf. Acts 17:30-31), and (b) in edificatory exhortation, which stresses that the time of liberation and tension is the time for righteousness and abiding in Christ (Rom. 7:6; Col. 3:8; 1 Jn. 2:28).

2. In NT Prayer In many urgent crises there rings out the nýn of prayer to God (cf. in the LXX Jon. 4:3; Is. 64:8). Acts 4:29 is an example. The supreme instance, however, is in Jn. 17:5, in which Jesus accepts his most difficult hour as that of divine glorifying.

IV. The Significance of the NT View of the Now. The ancient world suffers under the ineluctable transitoriness of time. The OT proclaims teleological movement but only in a preparatory way. In the NT, however, the Christ event, the historical past of Christ's life, death, and resurrection, is also present as God's breaking into time. History is thus made contemporaneous in a unique way. As grasped by faith, the past is also the present and it carries the hope of the future. For individuals, this involves decision. The NT evokes the nýn as a fact but also teaches us to live in terms of it as the divinely given kairós. What has been done once and for all is still at work in the nýn of the time of Christ. Moreover, as the tóte of the past stands behind it, the tóte of the future is ahead of it. Believers live in hope because the present of Christ gives them ground for hope. When the reality of faith comes to the consummation of sight, the tóte of 1 Cor. 13:12 will be the new and eternal nýn.

→ aiṓn, hēméra, kaīrós, sḗmeron hṓra [G. STÄHLIN, IV, 1106-23]

nýx means "night," "darkness," "the dark," and figuratively "blindness," "harm," or "death." In mythology deified Nýx is a dreadful figure. Night is a time for demons and hence for magic. But it is also a time for revelations, especially by dreams as the consciousness is released from the empirical world.

1. In the NT nýx has first the literal sense of "night" (divided into three or four watches or 12 hours). Nicodemus comes to Jesus by night (Jn. 3:2). The reference to 40 days and nights (Mt. 4:2 etc.) stresses the length of time (unless it is OT pleonasm). Jesus does not fear the night, but spends nights in converse with God (Lk. 6:12). The NT introduces dreams only where they mediate divine commands (Mt. 1) or instruct or exhort (Acts 16:9; 18:9; 23:11; 27:23). It may be the Lord or a messenger who issues the directions, and the revelation is at night because there is greater openness to it during the night. Since darkness is sinister, Revelation associates the darkening of the stars with judgment (8:12), and declares that there will be no darkness in the end-time (21:25).

2. Figuratively, night is a time when there can be no work (Jn. 9:4) and also a time of defective spiritual understanding (11:10). In Paul it is the time before the consummation of God's rule (Rom. 13:12). Believers already stand in the light (1 Th. 5:5ff.) in contrast to those who are spiritually asleep or are drunk. As children of light, they are to walk in the light (cf. Rom. 13:11ff.). [G. DELLING, IV, 1123-26]

The word nōthrós, meaning "sluggish," "obtuse," occurs in the NT only in Hebrews. In 5:11 the author cannot deal with profounder themes because his readers are slow to hear and receive. This is because they lack the vitality of assured and persevering faith (6:12). Those who are exhausted in both breathing in (hearing) and breathing out (confident believing) are nōthroí. [H. PREISKER, IV, 1126]

xénos [foreigner, stranger, guest], xenía [hospitality, guestroom], xenízō [to surprise, entertain], xenodochéō [to show hospitality], philoxenía [hospitality], philóxenos [host, hospitable]

A. The Tension in the xénos Concept.

1. Words of the xen- stem can mean "foreign" or "strange" but also "guest." The former is the main sense in the NT, though the less common "host" is the meaning in Rom. 16:23. The verb xenízō in the NT means "to surprise," "to be strange" (Acts 17:20; 1 Pet. 4:4), but also "to entertain" (Acts 10:23; Heb. 13:2).

2. Strangeness produces mutual tension between natives and foreigners, but hospitality overcomes the tension and makes of the alien a friend. Historically foreigners are primarily enemies or outlaws who should be killed. It is then found, however, that hospitality is a better way to deal with strangers, and they thus become the wards of law and religion.

B. The Judgment of Antiquity.

a. The Treatment of Foreigners. Homer divides the nations into the savage and the hospitable. Greece prides itself on hospitality to strangers, although at first it treats them with reserve and grants them no rights. Religion puts strangers under the protection of Zeus and gradually their rights are defined. In ethics mistreating aliens is a serious offense, but aliens themselves incur specific obligations, e.g., military service. Rome at first grants no rights to aliens unless they have patrons, but the situation changes by the imperial period. In the cosmopolitan cities of Hellenism natives and aliens live side by side with no palpable distinctions.

b. Religious Evaluation. While the Bible opposes and condemns alien cults, Hellenism may deride them but is also interested in them. This is reflected in Acts 17: 18ff., where some mock Paul's message but others are curious about it.

2. Israelites and Jews.

a. Foreign Peoples, Resident Aliens, and Aliens Temporarily Present.

(a) Terms. Hebrew has different words for foreigners denoting (1) the alien, (2) the resident alien, (3) the resident without rights, and (4) the alien temporarily present. For these the LXX usually has the terms allótrios or allógenēs, pároikos, and prosēlytos. xenós is not as such the direct equivalent of any of the Hebrew words.

(b) Basic Judgment. (1) Foreigners are primarily enemies both politically and religiously. (2) Yet if it is a wretched thing to be an alien (Gen. 19:4ff.), kindness is shown to foreign visitors. (3) Resident aliens come under protection (Ex. 22:20). They might at first be treated with contempt or even violence (cf. Gen. 12:12), but religious law takes them under its wing (cf. Dt. 10:18-19) and gradually integrates them into the people.

b. Historical Survey.

(a) The OT Period. The monarchy is a period of openness to foreigners (1 Kgs. 8:41ff.; 11:7-8), but the prophets head a reaction against foreign influences and especially foreign religions. Aliens are representatives of their religions, i.e., Gentiles. Their foreignness may be overcome either by exclusion or by full inclusion. Exilic prophecy calls for universal mission (Is. 42:6ff.; 66:19), but ungodly Gentiles are to be destroyed (Jer. 46ff.). After the exile the attitude hardens with the campaign against mixed marriages (Ezr. 9-10) and the opposition to the Samaritans. But resident aliens may still be full members of the community, since this is religiously rather than racially defined. The attitude to foreigners has a theological basis. It is for God's sake that mercy is to be shown to aliens and that efforts are to be made to win them, but it is also for God's sake that Gentiles are to be bitterly opposed.

(b) Later Judaism. Later Judaism practices strict separation from everything foreign. Yet there is a broader party (cf. Philo and Josephus) that is more open to foreigners and foreign influences. Missionary zeal appears on both sides. Yet semiproselytes enjoy only limited civil and religious rights, and after A.D. 70 a stricter approach to Gentiles tends to prevail, the missionary impulse weakens, and even full proselytes, who are sharply distinguished from others, meet with some reserve. Since neighborly love need be shown only to members of the people, hostility to others increases except for the sake of peace. It may be noted that the rejection of aliens is thought to have eternal as well as temporal significance.

c. Graves of Foreigners. A question arises as to Mt. 27:7: Who are the strangers that are to be buried in this field? Of the various suggestions—Israelites temporarily in Jerusalem, proselytes temporarily resident there, or Gentiles—the most likely one is that the field was meant for unclean Gentiles, who are thus set apart from members of the people even in death.

3. The Attitude of Christians to Foreigners. Christians share the dislike of the OT and Judaism for what is foreign in religion, but love of the xenós is a special form of love of neighbor, as Jesus shows (1) in the parable of the Good Samaritan and (2) in the parable of judgment in Mt. 25. That kindness to strangers has a bearing on eternal destiny is a theme in Parsee and Greek religion, and the thought occurs in Judaism too, but the new thing in Mt. 25 is that Jesus himself is the xenós, so that the deciding factor is one's relation to Jesus. The stranger representing Jesus might, of course, be anyone, and not just some other Christian. Thus all the ethical concepts of humanity regarding kindness to strangers come to fulfilment here; in the most alien of aliens Jesus himself is loved. The point is 3 Jn. 5, of course, is the different one that hospitality is to be shown to brethren from abroad.

C. The Custom of Hospitality.

1. Greeks and Romams. While aliens may have no rights, hospitality provides some compensation. Based on a sense of mutual obligation, this has divine sanction. Aliens are guests of deity, and sanctuaries are the primary places of hospitality. (a) There is, of course, private hospitality among the Greeks and Romans. Motives for this are the divine requirement, sympathy, and hope of return. (b) Hospitality may also take a more public or official form. (c) With increasing commerce, the need arises for inns or hospices, some of which are associated with temples, synagogues, or places of pilgrimage.

2. Israelites and Jews. The biblical stories extol hospitality (cf. Job 31:32). This is a duty as a work of mercy. In later Judaism the tradition continues, but with some emphasis on the meritoriousness of the work and some restriction to members of the people.

3. Christians. a. The NT.

(a) Terms. philoxenía is the term for hospitality, the philóxenos is the host, and the guestroom is the xenía (Phlm. 22).

(b) The Story and Message of Jesus. Hospitality is important in the Gospels. Jesus depends on it (Mk. 1:29ff.; 2:15ff., etc.). He regards it as important in the parables (Lk. 10:34-35; 11:5ff., etc.). God's hospitality is an essential part of his message (cf. the divine generosity in Lk. 14:16ff.; 12:37; 13:29, etc.).

(c) Exhortation. agápē implies philoxenía. The latter expresses agápē in Rom. 12:9ff. It is linked to philadelphía in Heb. 13:1-2. It is to be shown by all (Mt. 25:35ff.), but especially bishops etc. (1 Tim. 3:2). It is also to be shown to all (Rom. 12:13-14), although in fact it will be shown most to fellow believers (Gal. 6:10; 1 Pet. 4:9).

(d) Motives. While agápē is the ultimate motive, there is also a charismatic motive—hospitality is a charism; an eschatological motive—Christians are strangers and pilgrims going through affliction; a metaphysical motive—the hope of entertaining angels unawares (Heb. 13:2); and above all a missionary motive—aiding itinerant evangelists (cf. Mt. 10:11ff.; Acts 10:6, 18, 32; Phlm. 22; 3 Jn. 8), which in the case of genuine messengers plays a big part in the spread of the gospel and may lead to the baptism of whole families (cf. Acts 16:15, 33; Rom. 16:4-5).

b. The Early Church. Hospitality becomes a prominent feature in the early church (cf. 1 Clem. 1.2), although Origen complains of the gap between preaching and practice (Homily 5.1 on Genesis). Hermas Mandates 8.10 includes hospitality in the list of Christian virtues. With missionary increase, organization is needed, and in the fourth century Antioch cares daily for 3,000 widows, sick, and strangers. Bishops and widows are especially expected to be hospitable both privately and officially. Bigger churches and sanctuaries later set up hospices, and where care focuses on the sick these develop into hospitals.

4. Christ the Host. While Christ comes to earth as a guest, he is also depicted as the heavenly Host. In the OT God is often presented as the Host (cf. Pss. 15:1; 23:5), and as in the judgement, so in the related eschatological banquet, Jesus is the Host alongside God or in his place (cf. Mt. 22:2ff.). At this feast, which is for sinners, Christ offers lavish entertainment (Mt. 6:41ff.), he himself serves his guests (Lk. 12:37), washes their feet (Jn. 13:1ff.), and crowns his service by offering himself as their eternal nourishment (Mk. 14:22ff.).

D. Foreign as a Religious Concept.

1. The Greek and Biblical Views.

a. The Greek View. Foreignness has a religious aspect in Greek thought. But the approach is primarily anthropological. The soul belongs to the noetic world and by divine appointment is temporarily lodged as a stranger in the body. It is anxious in this alien world and longs for its heavenly home.

b. The Biblical View. The biblical approach is theological. The world belongs to God but has been estranged from him by an alien power, so that the antithesis of humanity is not with the world but with God. God's action, whether in grace or judgement, is alien to us. Israel, however, has been put in God's land as a resident alien under his protection, and as such, keeping God's law, she becomes a foreign body in the world of humanity.

2. Hellenistic Judaism. As represented by Philo, Hellenistic Judaism brings Greek ideas into the biblical world. The souls of the wise are of heavenly origin and hence are strangers on earth. The wise prefer heavenly citizenship even if this means that they are strangers here. Hillel calls his soul a guest in the body.

3. The NT.

a. God and Christ. The NT follows the OT pattern. God and the world are alien to one another because of human estrangement from God (cf. Acts 17:23; Eph. 4:18). This estrangement means hostility. On account of it Christ comes to the world as a stranger (Mk. 12:1ff.; Jn. 8:14, 25ff.). He comes from the unknown God (Jn. 7:27ff.). He lives as in a tent (Jn. 1:14). He is subject to misunderstanding (3:4). Even his disciples must ask who he is (21:12). His dominion is not of this world (18:36). He must go back to heaven to take his kingdom (Mt. 25:15; Lk. 19:12).

b. Christians.

(a) Legal Terminology. Christians, too, are strangers in the world, for God has given them a new home in heaven (Heb. 11:15-16; Eph. 2:6; Phil. 3:20). In legal terms, they belong to the city of God (Heb. 11:10, 16; 12:22-23). Formerly outlaws, they now have civil rights there (Eph. 2:19). They are thus aliens in the world (Jn. 15:19; 17:14, 16). They live as sheep among wolves (Mt. 10:16). The world is offended by them (1 Pet. 4:4). They can only reside as aliens in it (2:11). In the apostolic fathers Diog. 5.5 makes this point with impressive force, and cf. Hermas Similitudes 1.1; 2 Clem. 5.1.

(b) OT Prototypes. For this position of Christians in the world, models are found in (1) the patriarchs (Heb. 11:8ff.), (2) Israel in Egypt (Acts 7:6), and (3) the Jewish dispersion (Jms. 1:1; 1 Pet. 1:1).

c. Foreignness and Foreigners. Christians have to be on guard against making this world their homeland. They must therefore avoid all strange ways and doctrines. Yet they must offer the gospel freely to foreigners (in contrast to Greek, Roman, and Jewish exclusiveness).

d. The Devil as Foreigner. Behind the world stands the devil, who in relation to God and believers is the supreme alien and enemy (Mt. 13:39; Lk. 10:19). In the early church ho xenós is thus one of the names for the devil.

4. Fusions of Biblical and Greek Views.

a. Gnosticism. Hellenization effects a fusion of the very different biblical and Greek views of foreignness. Thus Gnosticism makes a big point of the foreignness of the soul, its longing for another world (the strange world of God), and its redemption by the stranger from heaven. A complication is that the soul, astray in a strange world, becomes alien from its true home. The redeemer-stranger, however, does not let himself be alienated, rekindles in the soul homesickness for heaven, and by attaching it to himself makes it foreign again in the world. In some versions the redeemer, by clothing himself in earthly garments, runs the risk of alienation and has thus to be redeemed by a letter from home and a heavenly voice. In distinction from the NT this complex does not see that it is sin that brings estrangement or that Christians become strangers in the world only when Christ brings redemption. Gnosticism thinks anthropocentrically. It starts with the experience of foreignness, whereas the Bible starts with the holy and gracious God.

b. Marcion. For Marcion humans, as creatures of the just God, are alien to the good God. This alien God brings them into the new Father’s house. Marcion, then, thinks theocentrically, but in contrast to the NT his stranger God comes in merciful love to redeem those who are not his concern, since he has not created them. In other words, God is essentially a stranger. In the Bible, however, estrangement is due to the fall. God’s world has become an alien world, and by God’s saving action believers become alien in and to it. [G. STÄHLIN, V, 1-36]

xýlon [wood, cross, tree]

xýlon means living or dead "wood," anything made of wood, e.g., a "stick," "cudgel," or "club," also a "bench" or "table." As an instrument of punishment or restraint it is a kind of wooden collar. It is also used for the "stake" or "tree" to which malefactors are fastened. Figuratively xýlon is an "unfeeling" person. The LXX often uses xýla for trees, but also has xýlon for wood, used for cultic or secular purposes.

l. Wood. The NT offers instances of the use for both living and dead wood. Thus in Lk. 23:31 we have the contrast between green wood and dry. If God has not spared the green wood (Jesus), how will it be with the dry (the impenitent)? In 1 Cor. 3:12 Paul lists wood among the materials which might be used in the building that God will examine on the judgment day. Scented wood has a place in the cargo that merchants can no longer sell after the fall of Babylon (Rev. 18:12); this is wood from North Africa used to make costly vessels and inlaid work.

2. Cudgel. Those sent to arrest Jesus carry cudgels (xýla) according to Mt. 26:47, 55.

3. Stocks. Paul and Silas are put in stocks when arrested at Philippi (Acts 16:24).

4. The Cross. A distinctive use of xýlon in the NT is for the cross. The basis is Dt. 21:22, which stresses the shame of being exposed on a tree. Acts 5:30; 10:39, etc. make the point that crucifixion is the greatest possible insult to Jesus, but that God has displayed his majesty by raising him from the dead. Paul in Gal. 3:13 shows that Christ has redeemed us from the curse by being made a curse for us according to Dt. 21:22. A curse lies on those who break the law, but Christ, who has not broken the law, voluntarily and vicariously becomes accursed, as his death on the accursed wood makes plain. He thus releases us from the curse and from the death that it entails. 1 Pet. 2:24 is to the same effect when it says that Christ bore our sins in his own body on the "tree" (with a plain reference to Is. 53:4, 12). The vicarious element is prominent here. Human sins are laid on Christ, crucified in him, and thus set aside. Christ does not lay sins on a scapegoat, but takes them to himself and cancels them on the cross, so that sinners, dead to sin, may live to righteousness.

5. Tree (of Life). Revelation speaks of the tree or trees of life in paradise or the heavenly Jerusalem (2:7; 22:2, 14, 19). A share in their fruit is granted to those who are cleansed by Christ and who conquer, but it is withheld from those who reject the prophetic word. In this regard Revelation takes up the apocalyptic notion of salvation as restoration. Yet perhaps there is also some association between the tree of life and the cross, as in early Christian art. [J. SCHNEIDER, V, 37-41]

ónkos [weight, burden]

ónkos means "mass," "weight," "compass," and figuratively "burden." In Heb. 12:1 it obviously means the "weight" that contestants must put off if they are to finish the race. The use of "every" shows that the author has no specific hindrance in mind. Believers must not let anything hamper them. [H. SEESEMANN, V, 41]

A. hodós for the Greeks.

1. General. This word means "way," "path," "road," "route," also "course," "journey," "march," and figuratively "means," "procedure," "manner." Life is often compared to a way, as in phrases that speak about the path of life or the manner of life. A technical philosophical use is for a "way of inquiry" or "method."

2. The Prodicus Fable. In view of the importance of the two ways in Jewish and Christian writings, note should be taken of the fable of Hercules at the crossroads. Earlier Hesiod speaks about two ways, a short and easy one to evil and a long and steep one to virtue. In the case of Hercules there is no contrasting of the ways, and the main point is the vision of the two women who seek to win him for good or evil. Only in later versions do the two ways take on the greater significance that justifies the idea of a crossroads.

3. hodós in Religiously Significant Statements. A common idea is that there are two ways after death, but it should be noted that these are ways of destiny, not decision, and that sometimes we find three ways. hodós also occurs in connection with the ascent of the soul. The way to truth (right thinking) is a way to heavenly light. In Hermetic writings gnṓsis is a way. In Gnosticism the soul takes the way from heaven to earth and then at death from earth back home to heaven. But the idea of the way is not an essential one in Gnosticism.

B. hodós in the LXX and Judaism.

1. The LXX. hodós occurs some 880 times in the LXX (mostly for drk). Often what is denoted is literally a path, road, or street, whether well constructed or not. It is a bad sign when streets are deserted (Lev. 16:22) or when one must resort to byways (Judg. 5:6). Verbs are used in phrases that do not refer to a specific road, e.g., "to go one's way" (Gen. 32:1). One may pass people on the way (Job 21:29) and should not deviate from it (Num. 22:23). Animals also have their ways (Prov. 30:19; figuratively 6:6). Thunders take a divinely ordained course (Job 28:26). God takes his way in judgment (Nah. 1:3) but also in saving grace (the Red Sea, Ps. 77:19). Figurative use is common (cf. Dt. 8:2; Prov. 1:31). Life itself is viewed as a way (cf. passages like Prov. 4:10; Is. 40:27; Job 3:23), and dying is a way that all must go (1 Kgs. 2:2) and from which none can return (Job 16:22). Another common use is for "manner of life" or "conduct" (cf. Ex. 18:20; 1 Sam. 18:14; 8:3, 5 etc.; 2 Kgs. 22:2 etc.). More frequently we read of the way or ways of God. These may be God's own dealings, but they may also be the ways that he commands for us (Jer. 7:23). The ways are thus equivalent to the commands (Ps. 119:15 etc.). Yet these ways do not have to relate to specific commandments of the law (cf. 1 Kgs. 11:33 with Dt. 5:33). Various descriptions are offered: they are good ways (1 Sam. 12:23), right ways (1 Sam. 12:23), the way of truth (Ps. 119:30), the everlasting way (Ps. 139:24), etc. Some passages assume that people can follow these ways (Job 23:11; Ps. 17:4, etc.), but others state that people neither observe (Mal. 2:9) nor know them (Jer. 5:4-5). Mostly they leave the right way (Prov. 2:13) and follow their own ways (Is. 56:11), which may seem right to them (Prov. 12:15). The self-chosen way is a wicked one (Is. 65:2); cf. such expressions as the way of the wicked (Ps. 1:6) or of sinners (1:1), or the ways of darkness (Prov. 2:13). The cry of the prophets is that we should return from our evil ways (Zech. 1:4 etc.). God sees all our ways (Prov. 5:21) and punishes wicked ways (Hos. 4:9). Yet we cannot turn from such ways unless God helps us. He has promised this help, teaching us his ways, and leading us in the way we should go (Is. 48:17). Yet if the thought of divine assistance is always present, the many imperatives show that we are responsible for our ways and for taking God's way. Knowing the ways of the Lord, we should also proclaim them (Ps. 51:13; 1 Sam. 12:23). What is said about human ways presupposes an antithesis between God's ways and self-chosen ways, but only rarely do we find the metaphor of the two ways. The most important instance is in Ps. 1:6, and cf. also Prov. 4:18-19; 15:19; Pss. 119:29-30; 139:24; Prov. 11:20. Included in the contrast are the thoughts of light and life on the one side and darkness and death on the other. The range is narrow, however, and we find neither any reference to the two ways as such nor any attempt to integrate all the horatory material into this schema. As regards the ways that God himself takes, the combination with érga shows that hodoí may mean "dealings" and that with boulaí (Is. 55:8-9) the reference may be to "purposes", or "plans." God's ways are mercy and truth (Ps. 25:10). They are also right (Hos. 14:10) and perfect (Ps. 18:30). God is righteous in all his ways (Ps. 145:17). His ways are beyond human criticism, for we can know only the outskirts of them (Job 26:14). Is. 55:8-9 gives classical expression to this thought when it states categorically that God's ways are not ours, but are higher than ours. Distinctive concepts in the LXX usage are that there is no human way to virtue, that an attainable human goal does not control the metaphor, and that the divine commandment stands at the beginning of the true way.

2. The Influence of OT Usage on the Pseudepigrapha and Rabbinic Writings. When the pseudepigrapha speak about two ways, OT influence is plain. The literal use of "way" is rare. References occur to the "course" of years or the stars, and to the "way" of angels. The sense of "walk" is common, and we also read of God's "ways," either his dealings or his commands. A contrast is drawn between the ways of this world and those of the next. The image of the two ways occurs in Eth. En. 91:18-19, which enjoins the way of righteousness and warns against that of violence, but the image is not as yet a fixed part of catechetical instruction. It is found at times in the rabbis on the basis of Dt. 11:26; 30:19; God has set before his people the ways of life and death. Here it might refer either to the destiny that God has appointed or to the decision that we must make. Again, however, there is no generally accepted schema.

3. Philo and Josephus. Philo makes great use of hodós in many senses, e.g., for the Red Sea "passage," for the "ways" of the sea or stars, for "procedure," for "human life," for the "paths" that we should take, for the "way" to virtue or to God, for the "two ways" (of vice and virtue) between which choice must be made (although with little schematic content), for the "royal way" that is identical with God's word or with wisdom (cf. Num. 20:17; 21:22; Dt. 28:14), or for the "right way," which is in general the broad or smooth one as distinct from the slippery way of wrong. Philo stresses that we need a guide on the right way, i.e., Moses, the lógos, or God himself, who as a merciful Savior leads the noús to virtue. In Josephus the word mostly has the literal sense of road, street, corridor, passage, journey, march, etc., although at times we find the sense "manner of life" and less commonly "means," "purpose," or "possibility."

C. hodós in the NT.

l. The Literal Sense. Most instances of the literal use are in the Synoptics. We are not told what roads Jesus used. Only two roads are mentioned, from Jerusalem to Jericho in Lk. 10:31 and from Jerusalem to Gaza in Acts 8:26. Some incidents take place "on the road" (cf. Mk. 8:27; 10:32; Mt. 20:17). The reference in Mk. 9:33 is a general one, but Lk. 9:57 is more narrowly topographical. Mk. 10:52 adds an "on the way" to indicate that the man who has received his sight follows Jesus on the path to Jerusalem. hodós occurs in certain parables but with no special emphasis. Thus seed falls along the path (Mk. 4:4, 15), which runs either through or alongside the field. In Lk. 14:21ff. the servant who has gone first to the lanes is then to go to the highways. In Lk. 11:6 the friend who comes is on a journey. Other uses are for the way leading to the Gentiles in Mt. 10:5, the way of the sea (toward the sea?) in Mt. 4:15, a way that is taken in Mk. 2:23, and a day's journey in Lk. 2:44.

2. The Metaphorical Use. This important use of hodós is found throughout the NT. How far the idea of a road is present is not always clear; cf. Mk. 1:3, where the meaning might be "plan" or "work" as well as "way" (cf. Mt. 11:10).

a. The Two Ways in Mt. 7:13-14. Jesus uses the image of the two ways in Mt. 7:13-14 (cf. Lk. 13:24). The first thought is that of entering by the narrow gate, but this seems to be a parallel metaphor—the gate does not lead on to the way. Thus the way is narrow (or broad) as well as the gate, in contrast to other descriptions of the right way. There are no exact parallels to Jesus' presentation, although gate and way are sometimes brought together, e.g., the little gate that leads on to a difficult way, or the narrow path or entrance. It is unlikely that Mt. 7:13 is directly related to 7:12 (the golden rule), nor is the door to be seen as entry into God's kingdom (as in Lk. 13:24). Again, the narrow way is not just that of piety in contrast to the broad way of vice and frivolity, although such an understanding might fit in with the call of Jesus for conversion. Furthermore, the saying is not primarily polemical, i.e., directed against the Pharisaical view of the law. What we have is a summons to discipleship. Jesus' demands are severe. Hence the gate is narrow and the way is hard. But there is no other way to life. If there are few on this way, it is not because it is too small, but because people like an easier path. The few of v. 14 are disciples; the many of v. 13 are those who refuse discipleship. "Way" does not denote the way of life of disciples but what Jesus expects of them. Like "gate," "way" has the connotation of entry. The destination, then, is mentioned, either life or destruction. "Finding" in v. 14 does not imply choice among many ways, or trying to find a path in difficult terrain, or coming across a narrow entry after a lengthy search. It involves the mystery of the divine action whereby those who seek will find. Although Mt. 7:13-14 does not explicitly say so, the way is found in Christ himself; it is he who makes possible our entry on it.

b. The Way into the Sanctuary (Heb. 9:8; 10:20). The uses of hodós in Heb. 9:8 and 10:20 are related. In 9:8 hodós clearly has a topographical connection with the temple, yet in the light of 10:19 the thought is more that of access than of way (eísodos), although still not without a certain spatial reference. Even if it is not stated, the way is obviously a way to (fellowship with) God. Jesus is not said to be the way, but the term "living" shows that the way is closely connected with his person. That Jesus is the way is thus a fairly clear implication.

c. Jesus as the Way (Jn. 14:4ff.). The statement in Jn. 14:4 grows out of the context. Jesus is talking about the situation of the disciples. The dwellings of 14:2 represent the goal of salvation. Jesus is going and will prepare a place for them. The disciples are not said to be going with him (e.g., to martyrdom); he will finally take them to be with himself (v. 3). The way of 14:4 is thus the way of Jesus, which the disciples ought to know because he has told them. But this way includes the promise for the disciples that Jesus has given in v. 3. Thus the question of Thomas refers to the significance of the way of Jesus for his followers, and the same is true of the answer of Jesus in v. 6. The secondary clause ("no one comes...") makes the sense plain. It stresses the importance of the "I am," and if it rules out other attempts to get at the Father

(especially by the disciples), its thrust is positive. Thomas is asking about the one way, and Jesus replies that he himself is that way. One should note that, while v. 7 might imply a general attaining to fellowship with God, v. 3 links the way more closely to the coming again of Jesus. A question thus arises whether 14:6 is exclusively eschatological or whether 14:4 prepares the way for a general reference as well. The terms "truth" and "life" in v. 6 have a bearing on this. These might represent the goal of the hodós, but in view of vv. 2ff. hodós itself refers to both way and goal. Hence the function of "truth" and "life" is more likely one of elucidation: Jesus is the way as he is the truth and the life. While "life" has an eschatological flavor in John (11:25), these terms serve to effect the redirection to the present that one finds in v. 7, although they do not involve any conflict with what precedes. No direct models have been found for linking the three terms. At most, we read of the way(s) of truth or life in the OT, and the law is separately called way, truth, and life in rabbinic works, though this does not warrant any antithesis of Jesus and the law in this or other passages. The Gnostic idea of the heavenly journey of the soul can hardly have had much influence, for elsewhere in John hodós occurs only in 1:23, there is no reference to the heavenly origin of souls or to their return, the orientation is to the coming again of Jesus rather than the death and subsequent journey of the disciples, and John lays little stress on the function of the Redeemer as guide. The passage might be directed against rival contemporary claims, but since hodós is adequately explained by the context, it undoubtedly has its own unique and positive significance.

3. The Figurative Use. In the figurative use the spatial idea is often strong. Thus in Lk. 1:79 "way" rather than "means" is the obvious point (cf. the verb "guide"). In contrast to Is. 59:8 (cf. Rom. 3:17) the reference of peace here is to messianic salvation rather than a life at peace with others. In Acts 2:28 (cf. Ps. 16:10-11) hodós might refer to the "means" or "possibility" of the resurrection, and "means" seems to be the point in Acts 16:17. In 1 Cor. 12:31 the context does not support "means" as the means of seeking the best gifts. On the other hand, one does not have to think in terms of "manner of life" or "attitude." The "way" is probably the means of reaching the goal that is elsewhere sought by the earnest desiring. The idea of "walk" or "conduct" is often plain enough, e.g., in Jms. 1:8; Acts 14:16; Rom. 3:6; Jms. 5:20; 2 Pet. 2:2 (though this might denote true teaching); probably Mt. 21:32. Another sense is the "divinely commanded walk" (cf. 2 Pet. 2:21; Heb. 3:10). This is the obvious sense in Mk. 12:14. It might also be the meaning in Acts 13:10, although in the light of OT parallels (Dan. 3:27; Hos. 14:10) the reference here is perhaps to God's dealings. In 1 Cor. 4:17 Paul is thinking of the ways that he teaches, not his own manner of life. In the light of Rom. 2:16, these ways correspond to the walk that God requires. Hence the reference could well be to the "principles" or "commands" that Paul imparts. On the other hand, in Acts 9:2; 19:9, 23; 22:4, 14, 22 what is meant is the mode of life expressed in Christian fellowship. In the absolute, the singular hodós is here the Christian equivalent of what others would call haíresis (cf. Acts 24:14). Implied is the teaching or view that others might disparage but Christians believe to be the right one. "This way" in 22:4 does not imply that there might be other ways but is simply giving precision to what is in view. How this special use of hodós develops is hard to explain. Acts 18:25-26 is of little help, for here the "way of the Lord" is the divine plan or work of salvation. Nor are we aided by 2 Pet. 2:2, 21, for these verses do not permit us to give to hodós a single absolute sense. The OT and later Jewish use offer no parallels for the specific usage in Acts, and it is unlikely that Luke develops it out of the use of hodós for philosophical "method" (and hence "system"). Furthermore, there is only a tenuous link with the Damascus description of apostates as "those who deviate from the way." In Acts 18:25-26 and 13:10 the divine plan of salvation and its fulfilment in the Christian mission are at issue. Rom. 11:33 and Rev. 15:3 also refer to the divine plans, which are inscrutable, but just and true.

D. Early Christian Usage. In the apostolic fathers hodós is fairly rare in the literal sense. It occurs in the confusing allegory in Hermas Visions 4.1.2, where leaving the way proves no way at all, although the stones that fall from the tower are said to fall on the way. In Ignatius Romans 9.3 the way is obviously the way that Ignatius takes; the katá sárka indicates that he is not a free agent on it. The idea of a journey also occurs in 1 Clem. 12.4 (the story of Rahab). Figurative use is more common. agápē is a way in Ignatius Ephesians 9.1, while the ways of 1 Clem. 31.1 seem to be ways of achieving blessing, and in 36.1 hodós has the sense of conduct (cf. Hermas Visions 2.2.6). Along similar lines we read of the way of truth or righteousness (cf. Barn. 1.4; 2 Clem. 5.7). hodós has the sense of command in Apoc. Pet. 1. This Apocalypse (2.2) also employs hodós tḗs dikaiosýnēs for what is virtually the gospel or the Christian faith. The metaphor of the two ways is important in the apostolic fathers. In addition to brief references, e.g., in Barn. 10.10, the two main passages are Barn. 18-20 and Did. 1-6. Of these, Didache integrates the hortatory material more consistently with its antithesis of the ways of life and death (as compared to light and darkness in Barnabas). It may be noted that in Didache the ways lead to life or death, whereas in Barnabas they are controlled by light or darkness. Didache is closer to Mt. 7:13-14, but neither refers to a gate nor uses the descriptions "broad" and "narrow." Barnabas possibly rests on Prov. 4:18-19, and Didache may also reflect Jewish influence. The angels of Barn. 18.1 hardly form a parallel to the women of the Prodicus fable. The two ways are also described in Hermas Mandates 6.1.2ff., where the sense of walk is prominent. Here there are no paths on the crooked way, but the straight way is level and smooth. hodós is of no significance in the Apologists. Justin has it mostly in biblical quotations. He also refers to the way of the stars and to the way of the Baptist (Dialogue 85.5; 88.2). The letter of the churches of Vienne and Lyons (Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 5.1.48) uses "way" for Christian teaching, but this is not common.

hodēgós, hodēgéō. hodēgós has the sense of "leader" or "guide," while hodēgéō means "to lead," "to show the way," "to instruct." The noun is rare in the LXX. It occurs for guides in 1 Macc. 4:2 and for the pillar of fire in Wis. 18:3. The verb is more common; mostly it is God who leads or guides or instructs (cf. Ex. 13:17; Josh. 24:3; Pss. 25:9; 78:72, etc.). The spatial sense comes out when hodēgéō is used with hodós or tríbos, but when it is parallel to didáskō the meaning "to teach" is strong. Wisdom is the subject in Wis. 9:11 etc., but OT parallels make it clear that God is in view. Philo has hodēgós only once and hodēgéō not at all (though we do find podēgetéō in On the Unchangeableness of God 182 etc.). The idea of guiding angels is common among the rabbis; they fetch the souls of the righteous after death. In the NT hodēgós has a literal sense in Acts 1:16 (Judas is the guide who leads the police to Jesus). The sense is also literal in the figure of speech in Mt. 23:16, 24 (the Pharisees are leaders of others but are themselves blind). Paul's use is similar in Rom. 2:19. hodēgéō has a literal sense in Mt. 15:14 and Rev. 7:17, and a figurative sense ("to instruct") in Acts 8:31. In Jn. 16:31 the idea might be that of "leading" to the goal of full truth, but one might ask whether the thought is not that of the Spirit's instruction complementing and completing that of Jesus, i.e., in the whole sphere of truth (cf. 14:26). If the thought is that of "leading," then the suggestion is that the Spirit (and Jesus before him) is a hodēgós, for which there would be nonbiblical parallels. If, however, the sense is “to teach,” alien influence is less likely. hodēgós does not occur in the apostolic fathers but we find hodēgéō in Did. 3.2ff., where the point is that sinful impulses may seem trivial but they lead to great offenses. hodēgós does not occur in the Apologists, and hodēgéō is rare (cf. Justin Dialogue 38.3).

methodeía. This word is not attested prior to the NT. We find méthodos for “treatment,” “procedure,” or, in a bad sense, “deception,” and methodeúō for “to treat methodically,” “to handle according to plan,” also “to handle craftily,” “to deceive.” In the NT methodeía occurs only in Ephesians. In 4:11 we have a warning against those who act craftily, while the word again has a bad sense in 6:11, where believers are to put on the whole armor of God against the machinations of the devil. In the apostolic fathers only methodeúō occurs, the sense being “to distort.”

eísodos, éxodos, diéxodos. eísodos and éxodos often occur together. Literally they mean “entrance” and “exit.” Figuratively we find them for “access” and “exodus” (in such varied senses as going away, banishment, dissolution, or conclusion). Commercially they denote “income” and “expenditure.” eísodos occurs some 50 times in the LXX for “entrance,” “gate,” “door,” “entry.” éxodos occurs in over 70 verses, sometimes for a way out, then for leaving, departing, exporting, and often for the exodus from Egypt. “Going out and coming in” is a common phrase to denote fellowship (1 Sam. 29:6) or total activity (2 Sam. 3:25). In Wis. 7:6 the two words denote birth and death. The terms are rare in Philo in a spatial sense, but we often find them for coming and going, and Philo also uses éxodos for “death” in the sense of departure on a journey. Josephus makes common use of the two words both spatially, e.g., for “entrance,” and verbally, e.g., for “marching in,” or “visiting prisoners,” or for “riding out,” “setting off,” and even “escaping.” The terms are rare in the NT, never occur together, and do not have the spatial sense. eísodos in Heb. 10:19 means “entry” or “access” rather than “entrance” (even though it is not used with eis). This is also the point in 2 Pet. 1:11 (with eis). In 1 Thessalonians (with prós) the idea is that of a welcome in 1:9 and a first appearance or visit in 2:1. In Acts 13:24 the Baptist is said to have preached before the public appearance of Jesus, i.e., not his coming into the world, but the beginning of his ministry. éxodos occurs only three times. It refers to the exodus from Egypt in Heb. 11:22. In Lk. 9:31 and 2 Pet. 1:15 it means the end of life in the sense of “conclusion” rather than “departure.” Thus Lk. 9:31 is not speaking of Jesus’ going out of the world but of the conclusion of his life and work. There is certainly no reference to his coming out of the grave (though the resurrection may well be in view in the light of 9:22). In the apostolic fathers eísodos occurs only once in Hermas Similitudes 9.12.6 (for “entrance”) and éxodos only once in Hermas Visions 3.4.3 for “end.” Of the Apologists Justin uses both terms frequently both independently and in quotations. diéxodos occurs in the parable in Mt. 22:9, most likely in the sense of “end”; the diéxodoi tō̂n hodō̂n are the points where the town streets give way to country roads. Mt. 22:9 thus seems to combine Lk. 14:21, 23 and supports the view that Jesus means the gospel for the Gentiles too. Outside the NT diéxodos means “gate,” “passage,” “exit.” The LXX has it for the endpoints of boundaries (Num. 34; Josh. 15- 19). It can also denote a “spring,” and figuratively it has such varied meanings as “escape,” “result,” and “exposition” or “elucidation.”

euodóō. This rare term means “to lead on a good path,” “to guide well,” “to bring on to the right path.” Its attestation prior to the LXX is dubious, but it is common in the LXX, where it takes on the sense “to bring to a good conclusion," "to succeed." In some 40 instances God is the one to whom success is ascribed either directly or indirectly, and this finds a counterpart in the use of the stronger compound kateuodóō , mostly in the passive. (For details of LXX usage see TDNT, V, 110-12.) The only NT instances are in Rom. 1:10, 1 Cor. 16:2, and 3 Jn. 2 (twice). All these are in the passive and LXX influence is plain. The fairly obvious meaning in Rom. 1:10 is "I will succeed," although with a hint perhaps that God will make a way, or provide the opportunity. In 1 Cor. 16:2 it might seem at first as though we have in hóti an accusative of object, but it is more probably the material subject, so that the sense is "as much as possible." It is unlikely that there is reference to "profit"; the idea of success is linked to saving, which each is to accomplish with genuine weekly sacrifice. In 3 Jn. 2 we have a customary wish for health, but the stress is on euodoústhai rather than hygiaínein, probably because this is a less secular term and carries the thought that all health and success, both material and spiritual, depend on God, and that we may have confidence in him. In Hermas Similitudes 6.3.5 the point seems to be success in business ventures, while Justin in Dialogue 14.6 quotes Is. 55:11 and in Epitome 7.8 uses euodoún in the sense "to be well advised."   [W. MICHAELIS, V, 42-114]

odýnē [pain, distress], odynáomai [to suffer pain]

odýnē means a. "physical pain" and b. "mental distress." odynáō is "to cause pain or sorrow," passive "to feel pain," "to suffer." The main LXX use is for deep grief of soul, as in Zech. 12:10; Is. 38:15; Am. 8:10; Prov. 17:25; Ezek. 21:11. In the NT Paul uses odýnē in Rom. 9:2 for his distress that his compatriots are shut off from salvation. In 1 Tim. 6:10 the reference is to pangs of conscience that afflict those who defect through love of money. odynáomai occurs four times in Luke and Acts. In Lk. 4:28 it is anxiety for a beloved child, in Lk. 16:24 torment at eternal loss, in 16:25 the anguish of remorse, and in Acts 20:38 the sorrow of final parting from the apostle.

odýromai [bewail, lament]), odyrmós [lamentation]

odýromai means transitively "to bewail" and intransitively "to wail," "lament," "grieve." It occurs in the LXX only in Jer. 31:18. odyrmós means "lamentation" or "weeping." It occurs in the LXX in Jer. 31:15 (cf. also 2 Macc. 11:6). Only the noun occurs in the NT, first in Mt. 2:18 quoting Jer. 31:15, then in 2 Cor. 7:7. In the former it expresses Rachel's grief; in the latter the Corinthians' remorse.

oída [to know, understand]

1. oída, which means "to know" and is more or less synonymous with ginṓskō, is often used in the NT in a general way, e.g., to know a person in Mk. 14:71, to be able to understand in Mt. 7:11, to apprehend in Eph. 1:18, and to recognize in 1 Th. 5:12.

2. Theologically significant is the phrase "to know (or not to know) God or Christ." Not knowing God is culpable, as in the OT (cf. Gal. 4:8; Tit. 1:16; 1 Th. 4:5). Demons know Jesus (Mk. 1:24), but try to defend themselves by declaring his true name. Over against the Gnostics in Corinth Paul is determined to know only the crucified Christ (1 Cor. 2:2). Over against Judaizers he insists on more than the knowledge of Jesus on earth (2 Cor. 5:16).

3. In John Jesus is said to know God (7:28-29). This is not abstract knowledge but a knowledge of mission that produces obedience (8:55). Jesus knows that this mission will issue in his death (13:1ff.). The Jews, however, do not know Jesus (8:23). The Baptist is aware of this (1:26). Even the disciples do not know him (4:32; 14:7). Yet they are not of the world, and hence knowledge is promised to them when Jesus departs and the Paraclete comes (14:15ff.; 16:7ff.). [H. SEESEMANN, V, 116-19]

oíkos [house, family, household, race], oikía [house, family], oikeíos [member], oikéō [to live, inhabit], oikodómos [builder], oikodoméō [to build, edify], oikodomḗ [building, edifying], epoikodoméō [to build on], synoikodoméō [to build together], oikonómos [steward, manager], oikonomía [management, administration], katoikéō [to dwell], oikētḗrion [dwelling place], katoikētḗrion [dwelling place], katoikízō [to make to dwell], oikouménē [the inhabited world]

1. General Greek and Hellenistic Usage. oíkos means "house" or "dwelling." The dwelling may be a cave, a temple, a palace, or even a grave. In the papyri oíkos can also mean "domestic affairs," "wealth," or "property." In astrology it is used for the "station" of the planets.

2. "House" and "House of God" in the OT. oíkos, mostly for Heb. bayiṯ, is a common word in the LXX. It may mean "family," but with theoú is often used for "sanctuary." Like oikía, it also means "house"; cf. the house that wisdom builds in Prov. 9:1 (and rabbinic references to the house of the law).

3. "House of God" in Jesus and the Gospels. The NT uses both oíkos and oikía, but usually links toú theoú to oíkos, reserving the phrase for the temple (or the Christian community, Heb. 3:6; 1 Pet. 4:17). Jesus speaks about the house of God in Mk. 2:26 and in Mk. 11:17 (based on Is. 56:7), where the temple is holy because it is a house of prayer for the nations (cf. Jn. 2:16, which recalls Zech. 14:21). While Jesus uses "my Father's house" for the temple, as in Lk. 2:49, his phrase may also denote the heavenly home (Jn. 14:2). The house also suggests the kingdom, as in Jn. 8:35.

4. The Heavenly "Father's House" in Gnosticism and Philo. Gnosticism favors the picture of the "house." The world is a lower dwelling in Mandaean writings. The elect are promised a place in the Father's house, for which they long. Philo, too, speaks of the return of the soul to the Father's house (On Dreams 1.256). He spiritualizes and individualizes the concept of the house of God (1.149). The divine house is not spatial but represents God's care. When the cosmos is viewed as a house, God is obviously its builder or Creator. For Philo, the body may also stand as the house of the soul, and the soul itself is a house which lodges holy and pious thoughts (On the Confusion of Tongues 27) or receives the lógos (On the Unchangeableness of God 135).

5. Primitive Christian Sayings about the Earthly Temple and Contacts with Near Eastern Symbolical Use. In Lk. 11:51 Zacharias is struck down between the altar and the oíkos. In Acts 7:2ff. Stephen distinguishes between the tent and the oíkos, perhaps viewing the tent more favorably, unless v. 47 applies to the tent as well. In Mt. 23:38 Jesus may be alluding to the temple, but it is also possible that he has the whole city or people in view. Relative to Mt. 12:44; Lk. 11:24, Babylonian and later Jewish texts speak about demons pursuing their unnatural activities in shrines and houses.

6. "House of God" as a primitive Christian Image for the Community. Heb. 3:1ff. calls Moses a faithful servant in all God's house, while Christ in contrast is faithful over God's house as a son. In the OT

Heb. Hebrew

"my house" refers to Israel, so that the NT passage recalls the equation of house and community. The glory of Moses relates to that of Christ as building does to builder. Christ as the son builds the OT community and is thus set over it. Believers are this house if they hold fast their confidence. Earlier Paul refers to the church as God's temple (1 Cor. 3:16). Primarily the whole church rather than the individual is God's house. This line of thought is fully developed in Eph. 2:19ff. and 1 Pet. 2:3ff. It leads on naturally to the usage in 1 Pet. 4:17 and 1 Tim. 3:15. The meaning of oíkos in this connection is not "family" but "dwelling" (cf. the comparison of Christ and Christians to stones in 1 Pet. 2:4ff., and the introduction of the thought of priesthood and sacrifice in 1 Pet. 2:5, 9). 1 Pet. 4:17 takes up the prophetic concept that purifying judgment will first smite the sanctuary and people (cf. Ezek. 9:6), while 1 Tim. 3:15 expresses the fact that the church as God's house is the bastion of truth inasmuch as the Spirit dwells in it.

7. The Related Symbolism of Later Jewish Apocalyptic and the Rabbinate. "House" is a common metaphor in the historical allegories in En. 83ff. It may stand for the sanctuary, for Jerusalem, or for the new and heavenly Jerusalem. In the rabbis the highest of the seven heavens is the dwelling of God. This is hidden by a curtain, but the righteous dead and ministering angels may approach, although they do not see God face to face.

8. "House" as Family and Race. On an OT basis the NT uses the phrase "house of Israel" (Mt. 10:6; 15:24; Acts 2:36, etc.). "House of David" also occurs (Lk. 1:27, 69; 2:4—the royal race of David). Two OT quotations refer to the "house of Jacob" (Lk. 1:33; Acts 7:46). Another quotation speaks of the "house of Judah" (Heb. 8:8ff.). Cf. also Acts 7:10.

9. The "House" as a Group in the Structure of the Christian Community. The NT church structured its congregations in families and houses. The house is both a fellowship and a place of meeting (cf. 1 Cor. 1:16; Phlm. 2; Acts 11:14; 16:15, 31, 34; probably Acts 18:8; 2 Tim. 1:16). In Acts 2:46 the first believers break bread in their houses (cf. 5:42). The conversion of the head of a house brings the whole family to the faith (16:15). The bishop must rule his house well (1 Tim. 3:4), and so, too, the deacons (3:12), while false teachers lead whole houses astray (Tit. 1:11). Paul addresses house meetings according to Acts 20:20. For similar references in the apostolic fathers, cf. Ignatius Smyrneans 13.1; Polycarp 8.2.

1. In Greek a distinction is first made between the broader oíkos and the narrower oikía, whereby the latter denotes only the "house." The NT, however, uses oikía not only for "house" (Mt. 5:15; 7:24ff.) but also for "family" (Mt. 10:12; 12:25) and even for "possessions" (Mk. 12:40). Mk. 3:24-25 associates oikía with the kingdom, and cf. Mt. 12:25, which brings together kingdom, city, and family to show that Jesus does not invade the domain of Satan with Satanic power (cf. also Jn. 8:35). Mk. 6:4 links three circles that deny recognition to the prophet: his city, kin, and family (oíkia).

2. A distinctive saying is that of Jesus in Jn. 14:2-3. There are rabbinic parallels for the phrase "my Father's house." The point is that God's house has places of rest for the afflicted disciples; Jesus will take them there at his coming.

3. In 2 Cor. 5:1ff. Paul contrasts the earthly body with the future heavenly body. The use of "house" for body is common, and denotes perishability (cf. Job 4:19). "Tent" stresses the transitory nature of our stay in the body (cf. 2 Pet. 1:13; Is. 38:12). In Gnosticism the body is a house, but it is the abode of evils.

4. Phil. 4:22 refers to members of Caesar's house, most likely the imperial staff, both slave and free. The phrase suggests that Paul wrote from Rome.

5. Hermas Similitudes 1.1-2.8-9 objects to Christian possessions in this world; we should win fields and houses of another kind.

oikeíos. This adjective means “belonging or related to the household,” then “intimate,” and finally “fitting” or “suitable.” In the NT it is partly used as a noun and is controlled by the understanding of the church as a house (Heb. 3:1ff.). Thus Gal. 6:10 requires that good be done especially to members of the household of faith. Eph. 2:19 tells the readers that they belong to the household of God (note the combination of oíkos and pólis in this verse). A more general sense applies in 1 Tim. 5:8, which gives divine sanction to the common moral norm that we should provide for relatives, and especially for our own families.

oikéō. This word means “to live,” “to dwell,” and transitively “to inhabit.” In the LXX it can mean “to live with a woman.” Important in the NT is the use for spiritual indwelling. Thus Paul says in Rom. 7:18 that nothing good dwells in him, and in 7:20 that sin dwells in him. Yet the Spirit of God dwells in the new man (1 Cor. 3:16; Rom. 8:9, 11). As sin previously enjoyed lordship, so the Spirit impresses the human spirit into service, not effacing it in ecstatic rapture. The common formula in 1 Cor. 3:16 and Rom. 8:9, 11 suggests that this is a stock theme in Paul’s teaching. God is said to dwell in inaccessible light in 1 Tim. 3:16 (cf. the apocalyptic depictions of God’s heavenly throne in En. 14:10ff., although here the stress is on glory and fire rather than light). In Diog. 6.3 Christians live in the world as the soul does in the body.

oikodómos. This word means “builder of the house,” “architect.” The only NT instance is in Acts 4:11 quoting Ps. 118:22.

A. oikodoméō outside the NT. This word means literally “to build” houses, temples, etc., but it soon acquires a figurative sense, as in Ps. 28:5. To plant and to build are related concepts in the LXX. The image of building is also common among the rabbis. God builds the world, the righteous build by doing good works and learning the law, and students build up the world by studying the law. In Mandaean works believers are chosen, planted, and built up (integrated into the fellowship of life). Philo says that the body is built on the heart, that fools build untenable doctrine like a tower, and that good thoughts and teaching are the foundation stones of a solid house. Josephus has oikodoméō only in a literal sense.

B. oikodoméō in the NT.

1. The NT uses oikodoméō literally with various objects, e.g., house in Lk. 6:48, tower in Mk. 12:1, sepulchres in Lk. 11:47. This word is common in the similitude of the tower in Hermas Similitudes 9.3.1; 9.12.6; cf. Visions 3.2.4ff. Building is an apocalyptic and messianic concept. By the resurrection or the return Christ will build the heavenly temple. In Mt. 16:18 (cf. Mk. 14:58) the reference might be either to the resurrection or to the return, but Acts 2:1 ff. seems to suggest the former. The future tense points to an act of eschatological power, but with a spiritual element. For the temple not made with hands of Mk. 14:58 cf. Acts 7:47, 49. Although messianic, oikodomeín is also an ecclesiastical term, as in Acts 9:31; 20:32; 15:16 (which borrows from Am. 9:11 and Jer. 12:15ff.). In such verses God is the subject and the community the object; the building itself is spiritual and eschatological.

2. The Pauline Concept.

a. An Apostolic Task. In Paul’s letters oikodomeín is important. It denotes first an apostolic activity (2 Cor. 10:18; 12:19; 13:10). Paul may destroy when necessary, but his true work is to build up. In 1 Cor. 3:10ff. one apostle lays the foundation and another builds on it. The community is the object, although not without a hint of the spiritual temple (3:16). Planting is also mentioned in this connection (3:6ff.). It is Paul’s special pride that he himself does not build on the foundation of others (Rom. 15:20), although this is not an absolute rule (1:11, 14-15).

b. A Community Task. Important also for Paul is the fact that the Spirit builds up the community. Edification for him has a charismatic and spiritual bearing. In 1 Th. 5:11 we note a relation of individuals to the whole, a mutual interrelationship of individuals, and the charismatic nature of the process. Edification goes hand in hand with exhortation (or encouragement), and also with consolation (1 Cor. 14:3). Unbelievers may be won by the prophetic word (14:24). The edification is at the same time that of the community and that of individuals. Knowledge alone does not edify, as some seem to have thought at Corinth (cf. 1 Cor. 8:1, 10; 10:23). Eating idol meat might be lawful, but it could destroy rather than build up. Love, however, always serves to edify. Self-edification by tongue-speaking is not enough (1 Cor. 14:4). It is not directed to the community as prophecy is. Prophecy builds up both by strengthening believers and winning unbelievers, although this, too, must be understood in terms of Christ, the Spirit, and faith.

c. oikodomeín and katalúein. Paul contrasts building up and tearing down in Gal. 2:18. The partition between Jews and Gentiles has been torn down, but Peter is building it up again by his vacillation. The same contrast occurs in rabbinic writings, but the usage in Gal. 2:18 is unique.

d. 1 Pet. 2:5. This passage takes up the thought of building on a foundation. Using Is. 28:16; Ps. 118:22; Is. 8:14; Ex. 19:6, it combines Pauline and Synoptic motifs. On the cornerstone that is also a stone of stumbling, a house is built that is also a household as individuals are integrated into the church. The eschatological temple is the new community.

C. oikodoméō in Postapostolic Writings. The word is common in these works. It occurs especially in the allegory of the tower in Hermas, where angels do the building, the church is the tower, and the time of building is the time of conversion (cf. Similitudes 9.3.1ff.; Visions 3.2.4, etc.). Barnabas also uses the term. In 11.1 it is said that Israel rejects baptism and builds for itself, while 16.1ff., dealing with the temple, says that the true temple is gloriously built in the name of the Lord (i.e., by spiritual conversion). In Polycarp 3.2 we find the common use of the term for building up in the faith. Ignatius has the word mostly with a purely individual reference.

D. Summary. oikodomeín is a community concept that is understood teleologically, spiritually, cultically, and ethically. Paul plays a key role in its development. Various influences are discerned by various scholars e.g., architecture, apocalyptic, the OT, Gnosticism, and even Stoicism.

1. This word first denotes the act of building (Hermas Similitudes 9.5.1). In Paul spiritual furtherance is primarily in view (1 Cor. 14:12). Everything, including apostolic authority, should serve this (2 Cor. 10:8). Individuals give and receive it. Whether they edify is the chief criterion in assessing charismata (1 Cor. 14:5).

2. oikodomḗ can then mean the finished building. The temple is in view in Mk. 13:1-2; Mt. 24:1. In 1 Cor. 3:9 the reference is to the church, but a special turn is given to the thought in 3:10ff. In Eph. 2:21 the church is God’s temple, with the apostles and prophets as the foundation and Christ as the cornerstone. Related thoughts include that of the heavenly temple and the church as Christ’s body. Hermas Visions 3.2.6 combines mythological motifs and the Christian concept. In the tower passages oikodomē may sometimes denote the act of building, but its predominant use is for the building itself. (For details cf. TDNT, V, 146).

3. Paul uses oikodomḗ as a figure of speech for human corporeality. When the present tent dissolves, we have a house from God not made with hands, eternal in heaven (2 Cor. 5:1). “We know” shows that this apocalyptic belief is part of the tradition (cf. Mk. 14:58). There are Hellenistic parallels for the image of the tent, though cf. also Is. 38:12. Judaism does not use the thought of a building anthropologically. Mandaean writings make a similar switch from the metaphor of a building to that of clothing (v. 4).

epoikodoméō. This word means “to build on something,” “to build further.” It occurs in the NT in 1 Cor. 3:10 for building on a foundation that is already laid, with all the responsibility that this entails. Another use is in Eph. 2:20: believers are built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets (cf. some versions of 1 Pet. 2:5). The epí has very little force in Col. 2:7, which again combines the thoughts of building and planting. Jude 20 emphasizes that the holy content of faith should be the foundation of individual Christian lives.

synoikodoméō. This word means “to build together,” passive “to be built together.” In Eph. 2:22 we do not have an imperative, nor is mutual fellowship the point. The reference is to the unity and totality of the structure in which Christ and the apostles are united with believers. The same image occurs in Hermas Similitudes 9.16.7.

oikonómos. In Greek this word means “steward.” It may then denote the head of a particular branch of a great house, e.g., the chief cook. As a loanword it can denote a city official (cf. Rom. 16:23). It may also be used for an estate manager or accountant as well as a housekeeper. In the rabbis Moses is God’s steward. In parables the loanword usually has the sense of treasurer. In the NT oikonómos first occurs in the parables of Jesus. In Lk. 12:42 and Mt. 24:45ff. the oikonómos is a steward from among the slaves who is set over the house and property of the owner. In Lk. 16:1, 8 the oikonómos seems to be a free treasurer. Paul in Gal. 4:2 links the oikonómos with the guardian as the one who has charge while the heir is a minor. oikonómos here is perhaps meant to amplify and elucidate epítropos (the guardian). The apostle himself is an oikonómos in 1 Cor. 4:1: as a minister of Christ he is entrusted with the treasures of the gospel, and the first requirement is trustworthiness. Tit. 1:7 describes the bishop as God’s steward, and 1 Pet. 4:10 calls on every Christian, as a recipient of a gift, to be a good steward of God’s varied grace. Ignatius Polycarp 6. 1 takes up the same theme.

oikonomía. In Greek, applying to household administration, this word has the sense of “direction,” “provision,” “administration.” In the NT it means 1. the office of household administration, and discharge of this office (Lk. 16:2ff.). Paul applies the thought to the apostolic office (1 Cor. 9:17; Col. 1:25; Eph. 3:2), which he holds by divine commission and in service to the churches. A second NT use is for the “divine plan” of salvation, its order and administration. This is the point in Eph. 1:10 and 3:9, and there is a hint of it in 3:2 and Col. 1:25. Ignatius follows this usage in Ephesians 18.2; 20.1. A final NT use occurs in 1 Tim. 1:4, where false teachers are said to promote speculations rather than godly “instruction” (or training) in faith (oikonomían theoú en pístei). We find this sense in the fathers, e.g., Clement of Alexandria Paedagogus 1.8.64.3.

katoikéō. This common Greek word means “to dwell.” It often has a figurative sense, as in Philo, who speaks of man dwelling in God, or of the sage dwelling like an alien in the body but like a native in virtues. The NT uses the word transitively for “to inhabit” in Lk. 13:4 and intransitively for “to dwell (in)” in Acts 1:20. The stock phrases “dwell upon earth” and “inhabit the earth” occur in Rev. 3:10; 6:10; 8:13; 17:2, etc. Figuratively demons dwell in humans (Mt. 12:45). God dwells in the heart (cf. 1 Cor. 3:16), God dwells in the temple (Mt. 23:21, though cf. Acts 7:48), Satan dwells where Antipas was killed (Rev. 2:13), Christ dwells in his people by faith (Eph. 3:17), the fullness of God dwells in Christ (Col. 1:19), the fullness of deity dwells in him bodily (2:9), and righteousness dwells in the new heaven and earth (2 Pet. 3:13). In Hermas God dwells in patience (Mandates 5.1.3), the Holy Spirit dwells in believers (5.2.5), and God causes the Spirit to dwell in a selected fleshly nature (Similitudes 5.6.5).

oikētḗrion. This word means “abode,” “dwelling place.” Paul uses it in 2 Cor. 5:2 in relation to the building we have from God. We long to put on our heavenly “dwelling.”

katoikētḗrion. This term is common in the LXX and seems to have come from there into the NT. In Rev. 18:2 fallen Babylon has become an “abode” of demons (cf. Is. 13:21-22). In Eph. 2:22 believers are built into the temple as a “dwelling place” for God. As in 2 Cor. 5:1-2, the concept takes up here the figure of the building and temple with reference to the edification of the whole community. Barnabas individualizes the concept in 6.15; 16.7-8.

katoikízō. This verb means “to make to dwell,” “to assign a dwelling.” It is almost a formula in Jms. 4:5: “the Spirit whom God has made to dwell in us” (cf. Hermas Mandates 3. 1: Similitudes 5.6.5). On the basis of creation and/or conversion the Holy Spirit is regarded as sent into us by God.

hē oikouménē. This word, having the sense of a noun, denotes the “inhabited world” and then comes into use for the Roman empire. In Philo it has primarily a general rather than a political sense. It is fairly common in the NT. In Mt. 24:14 the use is general; the gospel is for all nations. In Lk. 2:1, however, the reference is more political. The inhabited world is the point in Lk. 4:5 (Mt. 4:8 has kósmos) and Lk. 21:26 (cf. Acts 11:28; Rev. 3:10). Acts 17:6 and 19:27 are in accord with current Greek usage. Paul uses the term only in quoting Ps. 19:4 (Rom. 10:18). Heb. 1:6 and 2:5, however, reflect Hellenistic usage. The NT never contests the Roman claim that equates the oikouménē with the empire. 1 Clem. 60.1 perhaps includes the spiritual and angelic world in the concept. [O. MICHEL, V, 119-59]

oiktírō [to be sympathetic], oiktirmós [sympathy], oiktírmōn [sympathetic]

A. Greek Usage. oíktos is first “lamentation,” then “sympathetic lamentation,” “sympathy.” Hence oiktírō means “to be sympathetic.” Sympathy in grief may be regarded as a sign of weakness, but compassion as such is not reprehensible and may be sought from deity.

B. The LXX and Judaism. oiktírō is mostly used in the LXX for ḥnn and rḥm, although sometimes it has no original. oiktirmós and oiktírmōn are common, and we also find oiktírēma and oiktrós. The meaning is always sympathy or pity, mostly with reference to God, whose compassion is invoked in prayer. The group is most common in the Psalms.

C. Primitive Christian Writings. The verb oiktírein occurs in the NT only in Rom. 9:15 (quoting Ex. 33:19), where it is parallel to eleeín. The noun oiktirmós is always in the plural and denotes God’s compassion in Rom. 12:1 and 2 Cor. 1:3. In the latter verse God is the Father from whom all compassion comes and is then imparted to all. Human sympathy is at issue in Phil. 2:1 and Col. 3:12, specifically the mercy of the judge or the law in Heb. 10:28. The only adjective used in the NT is oiktírmōn. This refers to God in Jms. 5:11 (cf. Pss. 103:8; 111:4; also 1 Clem. 60.1). It also denotes the divine mercy in Lk. 6:36, where it serves as the basis of an admonition (cf. Justin Apology 15.13; Dialogue 96.3). [R. BULTMANN, V, 159-61]

The vine was cultivated from prehistoric times, and wine comes into early use both socially and cultically. The god Dionysus is equated with wine, and it has a special place in his cult. Noah cultivates the vine in Gen. 9:20. Many OT texts praise wine (Judg. 9:13; Ps. 104:15). Fullness of wine is a divine blessing (Gen. 27:28). The Rechabites abstain from wine (Jer. 35), and Hos. 2:10ff. links it to Baal worship. There are also warnings against overindulgence (Is. 5:11-12; Prov. 20:1). Wine has cultic significance in the OT (Ex. 29:38ff.). The vine also serves frequently as a metaphor. In the NT oínos has a literal sense and never occurs in a cultic connection. The Baptist abstains from it (Lk. 1:15); his mission demands that he be controlled solely by the Spirit. Jesus partakes of wine (Mt. 11:19), for the time of the bridegroom's presence is a time of festivity (Mk. 2:18ff.). The new wine of the new age demands new skins. At Cana (Jn. 2:1ff.) Jesus turns a great amount of water into wine. If the nature of Johannine miracles as signs is considered, a deeper meaning must be sought. Thus law and gospel may be contrasted as water and wine, or wine may be equated with Logos (Philo). While oínos is not used in the accounts of the Last Supper, it is obvious that the cup contains wine, and with the cup (Mk. 14:25 and par.) Jesus is triumphantly looking ahead to the consummation (cf. Mt. 8:11). On the cross Jesus is handed a mixture of wine and myrrh (Mk. 15:23) to dull his senses (cf. Mt. 27:34). Paul recommends abstinence should weaker believers be upset about eating and drinking (Rom. 14:21). In Eph. 5:18 he warns against excess (cf. Prov. 23:31), and calls instead for infilling with the Spirit. A moderate use of wine may be beneficial to health (1 Tim. 5:23), but overindulgence is to be avoided (3:3, 8). In Revelation oínos is one of the commodities that the fleet can no longer sell when Babylon falls (18:13). The term denotes the crop in 6:6; this is to be spared when the yield of wheat and barley falls short. In 14:10; 16:19; 19:15 oínos denotes the wrath of God in a figure that is taken from the OT (cf. Jer. 25:15-16; 49:12, etc.). In 14:10 "poured unmixed" indicates the great and terrible nature of the divine wrath. The metaphor is rather different in 14:8 (cf. 17:2; 18:3), where the wine is that of impure passion. But the figures merge into one another inasmuch as those who drink this wine fall victim to God's wrath.

oknērós [slothful]

oknērós describes a. those who are slow to act through hesitation, anxiety, negligence, or sloth, and b. things that awaken suspicion, dislike, or fear. In the OT it is used for the slothful (Prov. 6:6, 9) who let inconveniences stop them (20:4) or never move on from the will to the deed (21:25). In the NT sense a. occurs in an eschatological context in Mt. 25:26. Slothful servants represent disciples who hesitate to put their gifts to work in the testing period of earthly life, and who thus fail to live up to their eternal responsibilities. Another instance is in Rom. 12:11, where yielding to indolence is contrasted with being inspired and directed by the Spirit. Sense b. occurs in Phil. 3:1, where Paul says that under the impulsion of the Spirit he overcomes his dislike of repeating the same admonitions. [F. HAUCK, V, 166-67]

olethreúō. This term means "to corrupt," "to destroy." Philo uses it for the corruption of the soul. It occurs 18 times in the LXX in its usual sense. The only NT instance is in Heb. 11:28, where by faith Moses sprinkles the blood so that the destroyer (olethreúōn) might not touch his people.

ólethros. This word means a. "corruption," especially "death," and b. "that which brings corruption." It is common in the LXX; the prophets use it often for eschatological "destruction" (Jer. 48:3). The sense is eschatological in two NT instances. In 2 Th. 1:9 eternal destruction will come on those who reject the gospel when Christ is revealed from heaven. In 1 Tim. 6:9 the conscience of those who seek wealth is seared, and they are thus in danger of falling into temptations that will plunge them into complete ruin. The point is rather different in 1 Cor. 5:5, where Paul seems to be saying that physical destruction (i.e., death) will follow when the congregation, with whom Paul will be present in spirit and with the power of the Lord, delivers the incestuous person to Satan (cf. Acts 5:5, 10; also Ignatius Ephesians 13.1 for the divine power at work when the church gathers).

olothreutḗs. This word occurs in the NT only in 1 Cor. 10:10, where the reference is to the OT angel of destruction. This may be a specific avenging angel (cf. the definite article), or it may be more generally an angel of Satan (cf. 2 Cor. 12:7).

exolothreúō. This word means "to destroy completely." It is very rare except in the LXX, in which it refers to God's extirpation of sinners or of the disobedient. The only NT instance is in Acts 3:23, where Peter, after healing the lame man, quoting Lev. 23:29 and Dt. 18:19, tells the people that those who will not listen to the predicted prophet (i.e., the Messiah) will be rooted out from among the people. The apostolic fathers often use the term in OT quotations (cf. 1 Clem. 14.4; 15.5; 53.3).

olígos means a. "small" or "few," i.e., in number, and infrequently b. "little" (in quantity). The idea of "little" is important in the LXX. God can work with few means (1 Sam. 14:6), and so can the righteous with God's help (cf. Job 8:7). A poor man who is wise can do much with little (Eccl. 9:14-15), and a little wisdom means much (10:1). Such sayings may express practical experience, but they also denote the eschatological transvaluation of all values. Rather different is the thought that we are limited by a short span of life (Job 10:20). This is a punishment for sinners (Ps. 37:10). It is also a punishment that only a few remain in times of distress (Dt. 4:27), or that little is left of the harvest (28:38). The suffering of the righteous, however, is of little account (Zech. 1:15). The NT gives the term something of the same theological stress as the LXX. In Lk. 7:47 Jesus answers the critical Pharisee by telling him that those who are forgiven little, love little. The saying seems to be aimed at the self-righteous who hold aloof from sinners and whose love, in transgression of the chief commandment, is consequently small. In Mt. 25:21, 23 the point is that those who are faithful in small things will have greater things entrusted to them. Lk. 12:48 makes a distinction between greater and smaller punishments. Those who know the master's will but do not do it will be more severely beaten than those who do not know or do it. Whether Jesus has the common people in mind here, or possibly the Gentiles, one cannot say. [H. SEESEMANN, V, 171-73]

ololýzō means "to make a loud, inarticulate cry" in expression of great stress of soul. It is common in sacral contexts, e.g., at sacrifices or divine epiphanies, usually denoting jubilation (along with dancing etc.). In the LXX it denotes the effect of judgment on those smitten by it (Ezek. 21:17; Zech. 11:2). In crying of this type there comes to expression both horror at oneself (Am. 8:3) and dread at the destruction of worldly power. Hos. 7:14 demands the prayer of the heart in place of such cries. Jms. 5:1 is in line with the prophetic use except that now the fulfilment has come with Christ, and the last and total possibility of repentance will have gone.

→ alalázō, threnéō, kóptō [H. W. HEIDLAND, V, 173-74]

hólos [whole, complete], holotelḗs [through and through] hólos. This word means “whole,” “complete,” “intact,” “undivided.” In the NT it is used with nouns to denote their totality (cf. Acts 21:30; Mt. 5:29-30; Lk. 11:36). It has theological significance in Jn. 7:23, where the reference is not just to the contrast between healing the whole man and one member (by circumcision) but more broadly to the healing of the whole being (cf. 13:10). The point is similar in Mk. 12:30 and parallels: the chief commandment demands that we dedicate ourselves wholly and utterly to God, with all our being. In keeping, too, is the negative admonition to stake everything on not being cast totally into Gehenna (Mt. 5:29-30), and also the positive admonition to see to the integrity of the whole person (Mt. 6:22-23), since only those who serve God in this totality can render true service (6:24).

holotelḗs. This is a stronger form of hólos meaning “through and through.” The only NT example is in 1 Th. 5:23, where Paul’s use of this rare term gives emphasis to his prayer that God may grant total sanctification. In the apostolic fathers Hermas has the word four times for “unbroken” (Mandates 9.6) or “complete” (Visions 3.6.4).

homeíromai [to have a kindly feeling for]

The meaning of this rare word is not wholly clear, but it obviously expresses intensity of feeling. Paul uses it in 1 Th. 2:8 to show that he does not serve the church merely in obedience to his commission but out of heartfelt love for it.

omnýō means “to swear,” “to affirm by oath.” It is mostly used with the accusative of the person or object by which the oath is taken. Those to whom one swears are in the dative, and the matter sworn is in the accusative or infinitive. In the LXX a common oath is by the life. When God swears by himself the first person is used. In the ancient world swearing is usually by the gods, who are invoked as witnesses. Later, with the concept of divine monarchy, swearing may be by kings. Oaths are common in public life, but the stronger forms show that their force was declining.

1. In the NT the most important passage theologically is Mt. 5:33ff. In the law the oath is an essential element in spite of the tendency to abuse it in daily life. The law prohibits false oaths and insists that oaths and vows be kept. Jesus, however, sets up a new order of life in the kingdom which leaves no place for oaths since there is no reason here to suspect human veracity. Those who belong to the kingdom must always be truthful, and hence do not need to swear. Jesus does not limit this prohibition to promises or to common swearing. The Sophists, Pythagoreans, Stoics, and Essenes all agree that consistent truthfulness should obviate the need for oaths, and some of them forbid their followers to use them. Judaism forbids frivolous swearing, and Philo demands that we either avoid oaths or use them only with great circumspection. We should never swear by God. Jesus himself follows up his prohibition by exposing the insincerity of substituting equivalents for the name of God (5:34-36). He then issues the positive command that his disciples should use a simple “yes” or “no” (5:37); the double form here does not indicate a simplified form of oath, as in some rabbinic statements, but is obviously by way of confirmation. Anything more than this either proceeds from the evil one (if toú ponēroú comes from ho ponērós) or is a consequence of the evil that is present in the world (if it comes from tó ponērón, as is more likely).

2. Jms. 5:12 offers another and perhaps more original form of the saying. The second half brings out its absoluteness. Truthfulness is the norm in the Christian community; hence taking oaths is totally unnecessary.

3. The sayings in Mt. 23: 16ff. are aimed at the casuistical treatment of oaths and vows. There is no rabbinic instance of the distinction between the gold and the temple or altar, but parallels exist, and we find examples of oaths by the covenant, the law, the temple, and its ministry. An oath by the temple, Jesus says, is also an oath by everything in it, and by the God who dwells in it.

4. Heb. 6:13, 16 and 7:20ff., following the OT, regard it as natural that God should take an oath. The oath confirms the promise. God, unlike us, swears by himself, since there is none higher to whom he can appeal. His oath is thus a guarantee that removes all doubt. It gives his word unconditional validity. The oath that confirms Christ's priesthood shows its superiority to the priesthood that it replaces.

5. Peter at his denial ignores the prohibition of Jesus and swears with an oath that he does not know Jesus (Mk. 14:71). Jesus confirms his own sayings by a solemn but simple amḗn. When adjured (Mt. 26:64), he answers with a plain declaration. Paul avoids direct oaths, but comes near when he invokes God (Rom. 1:9) or his conscience (9:1) as witness. The saying in 1 Cor. 15:31 is also close to an oath ("by my pride in you").

6. Herod swears in the manner of a great Near Eastern ruler at his birthday feast, and his frivolous oath seals the fate of John the Baptist. [J. SCHNEIDER, V, 176-85]

homothymadón denotes the unity of a group and may be translated "with one mind." It often occurs with words denoting number (e.g., "all" in Acts 1:14) and place (Acts 2:1). The thymós may be anger, fear, or gratitude, but the most common use later is political (cf. Acts 15:25), or, in Judaism, religious. The term denotes common interest rather than personal feeling and expresses reaction to some outside event. In the NT it stresses inner unanimity in response to teaching (Acts 8:6) or in prayer (1:14). Tensions exist, but unanimity is achieved in the magnifying of the one Lord (Rom. 15:16). It is a response to God's action for the community and the world (cf. Acts 1:4; 4:24). It is thus a gift of God to the praise of God. [H. W. HEIDLAND, V, 185-86]

hómoios [of the same nature, similar], homoiótēs [similarity], homoióō [to be like], homoíōsis [likeness], homoíōma [likeness, copy], aphomoióō [to be like, copy], parómoios [similar], paromoiázō [to be like] hómoios. This word means a. "of the same kind," b. "of like disposition," c. "belonging equally," and d., in geometry, "similar" (of figures). In the LXX it is common in the question "Who is like?", presupposing a negative answer. In the papyri it mostly means "similar." It is common in the NT, e.g., in images and parables. In Jn. 8:55 Jesus alone has true knowledge of God; if he were to deny this he would be "like" the Jews, who do not know God. In Acts 17:29 Paul says that as God's offspring we should not think the deity is "like" gold etc. In 1 Jn. 3:2 believers will reach fulfilment when they are "like" Christ; this will come about at the parousia. In Rev. 1:13 the figure is "like" the Son of Man—a messianic designation (cf. Dan. 7:13). In Mt. 22:39 the command to love one's neighbor is of the same importance and validity as the command to love God. In Gal. 5:21 Paul ends his list with the phrase "and the like," which enables his readers to continue the list in thought.

homoióō. This word means a. "to make like or equal," b. "to liken," and c. (passive) "to be like." In Matthew it usually serves to introduce parables. The introduction may be in the form of a stereotyped question (cf. 11:16; Mk. 4:30; Lk. 13:18, 20). In Mt. 6:8 Jesus tells his disciples not to "be like" the Gentiles when they pray. Heb. 2:17 tells us that in his humiliation Jesus is "made like" his brethren so as to be able to do his high-priestly work. But this is not mere equality (cf. 9:14).

homoiótēs. This word means "likeness" or "similarity." The only NT instances are in Hebrews. In 4:15 the temptation of Jesus bears a "similarity" to ours; the difference is that he does not sin. In 7:15 Christ is a priest in the "likeness" of Melchizedek, not on the basis of law and descent, but by the power of an indestructible life.

homoíōsis. This uncommon word means a. "making like or similar," b. "being like," and c. (in grammar) "comparison." In the LXX it mostly means "similarity." The only NT example is in Jms. 3:9 (cf. Gen. 1:26), where cursing those who are made in God's "likeness" is in sharp contradiction to blessing God himself. In this sense the term is an important one in the fathers. The Alexandrians distinguish between eikṓn as something in which we are created (and which thus remains after the fall), and homoíōsis as something for which we are created (and which we are thus to strive after).

homoíōma. This rare word means "what is similar," "copy," with a stress on the aspect of "similarity." In the LXX it also takes on the sense of "form" (Dt. 4:12). This is the meaning in Rev. 9:7.

1. In Rom. 1:23 cultic "images" are contrasted with the glory of God; they are made in the form of human or animal bodies.

2. In Rom. 6:5 the baptized are in the "likeness" of Christ's death and resurrection. Much debated is whether Paul's point is that baptism is just a representation of Christ's death or whether it is a likeness that contains the original. A first view is that it is a similitude or reproduction of Christ's death and resurrection. A second view relates the "likeness" to our own death in baptism; we have grown together with a baptismal death that is like Christ's death, which is the type that is reflected in the death experienced at baptism. A third view is that the word homoíōma denotes the mystical and sacramental death of the baptized with Christ; in Roman Catholic thinking Christ's death is directly present in the sacrament. A fourth view is that we are sacramentally but not mystically integrated into Christ's death as it is present in baptism. As concerns the likeness of the resurrection, there is debate as to whether this refers to mystical resurrection with Christ at baptism or to the future resurrection of the baptized. The two main lines of exegesis are a. that the baptized experience a mystical resurrection corresponding to that of Christ, and b. that they share sacramentally in Christ's own resurrection. It may be noted (1) that since Paul speaks of the likeness rather than the event of Christ's death and resurrection, he can hardly be referring to a mystical relation to the historical acts, (2) that since he has in view an organic link, he can hardly be saying that our experiences are copies of Christ's, and (3) that we are thus led to the conclusion that the likeness in question is that of the death and resurrection of Christ, as they are now sacramentally present, to the historical acts, and that by means of this likeness we ourselves are thus closely linked with these saving realities.

3. In Rom. 5:14 Paul says that death holds sway even over those who did not sin like Adam, i.e., who did not copy Adam's sin.

4. In Rom. 8:3 and Phil. 2:7 Paul uses the word with reference to Christ's earthly life. In Rom. 8:3 he stresses the reality of Christ's humanity by saying that he came in the "likeness" of sinful flesh; he entered the nexus of human sin but without becoming subject to the power of sin, as would be implied if Paul had simply said "in sinful flesh." The homoíōma denotes likeness in appearance but distinction in essence. With the body the intrinsically sinless Christ becomes the representative of sinful humanity in order that by destroying this body God might cancel human sin. The term homoíōma is clearly an attempt to overcome the difficulty of having to say that the Christ in whom human sin is condemned is not himself a sinner. The word may well be an inadequate one, face to face with the mystery of Christ's person and work, but it is not docetic as some suppose. Christ is not just a heavenly being with an external human form; he is fully and truly human, but not a sinner. The point is similar in Phil. 2:7, where Christ, taking servant form, is born in human "likeness." The sense here is closer to that of form, but in the background are the two thoughts that he who is the full image of God becomes the image of man, and that the image means likeness rather than full identity, since Christ differs from all others by his consistent obedience (v. 8). Behind the statement lies the message of Jn. 1:14, namely, that God has entered human history. It is not implied that he has ceased to be God; even in his humanity Christ is at the same time a being of another kind. In the fathers Ignatius refers to the resurrection of believers corresponding to Christ's "likeness" (Trallians 9.2), and an early sacramentary calls the bread the "likeness" of Christ's body.

aphomoióō. This verb means "to copy," rarely "to compare," and in the passive "to be or become like" or "make oneself out to be like." The only NT instance is in Heb. 7:3, which says that Melchizedek "is like" the Son of God. The point may be that the Son of God is the prototype, or that the OT text is taken to be a messianic prophecy, i.e., a sign that points forward to Christ.

parómoios. This word means "similar," or "mostly alike." In Mk. 7:13 Jesus has shown how the Pharisees invalidate God's word by their tradition in the matter of corban, and he adds that they do many similar things.

paromoiázō. This verb means "to be like"; it occurs in Mt. 23:27 when Jesus tells the scribes and Pharisees that they are like whitewashed tombs.

homologéō [to confess, promise, praise], exomologéō [to confess, promise, praise], anthomologéomai [to praise, thank], homología [confession], homologouménōs [confessedly]

A. The Group in Secular Greek Usage. This group is common in law and religion. The literal meaning of homologeín is "to say the same thing." We thus get the senses a. "to agree to something" (an affirmation, a charge, etc.), b. "to confirm receipt," c. "to agree or submit to a proposal," and d. "to agree,to a wish," "to promise." In a transferred sense it may denote the agreement of words and deeds, or of customs. The noun homología is important in Socratic dialogue as indicating consent to what is found to be valid followed by the appropriate resolve and action; theoretical assent is not enough. In the Stoics there is a shift from the thought of actual conduct to the idea of an integrated state of life. In the papyri the word takes on the sense of a "compact" or "agreement" of a legal character. In religion we find varied use, e.g., for commitment to vows and especially for the confessing of sins.

B. The OT-Near Eastern and Hellenistic-Gnostic Liturgy of Thanksgiving.

a. Biblical homology develops out of the cultus and takes the form of confession of sins and praise of God. Many psalms (e.g., 22; 30; 116) and many other passages (e.g., 1 Sam. 2:1ff.; Is. 38:9ff.) are thanksgivings after deliverance. Job 33:26ff. describes how God has brought restoration, and a response is made in confession and acknowledgment. There are parallels of confession in psalms of complaint outside Israel. The persons afflicted confess their faults, invoke divine mercy, promise a song and offering, and then fulfil the vow. The song of thanksgiving (cf. Ps. 116) describes the distress, utters a prayer, and depicts the saving action. It often associates true sacrifice with thanksgiving and calls for praise from those present (cf. Jer. 33:11). Sacred words are used, but there may be a call for a new song (Pss. 33:2; 40:3).

2. Liturgies of thanksgiving also occur in the Hellenistic religions of redemption. These focus on the redeemer myth and the theme of union with the redeemer. The cultus enacts the soteriological drama. In the Hermetic corpus the idea of logikḗ thysía is an important one. It comprises the whole life of thanksgiving, but especially the hymn of thanks.

C. The Group in the LXX and Postbiblical Judaism.

1. The LXX prefers the compounds exomologeísthai and exomolǵēsis, which in secular Greek denote public admission or acknowledgment. On the basis of Heb. yāḏâ, however, the idea of praising God is added to that of confessing sin (cf. 1 Kgs. 8:33, 35; Neh. 9:3 for the linking of the two). homología may still denote the confession of sin; public confession is presupposed. In the sense of extolling or praising, the group takes its place with other terms, e.g., invoking and reciting. It carries the thought of magnifying God by confessing or rehearsing his mighty acts.

2. In later Judaism the group carries the thought of the confession of sin with penitential prayer. The great men of the past publicly acknowledged their guilt (Dan. 9:1ff.; Jdt. 9:1ff., etc.). Even the ungodly Manasseh humbled himself (2 Chr. 33:12- 13). Prominent in this type of confession is the concept of divine judgment, which both inspires it and is averted by it. Josephus refers to acknowledgment of the emperor in Jewish War 7.418; its opposite is confession of the one God (2 Macc. 7:37).

3. Philo gives evidence of philosophical influence, e.g., of Stoicism in his demand for integrity and harmony of soul. Confession of God is for him a transcendent virtue. True confession is the work of God and belongs to the immaterial sphere. homologeín can also denote both God’s declarations in Scripture and human promises to God. Other meanings are confession of sin and agreement or affirmation, as well as engagement or contract in the secular sense.

4. The praise of God plays a role in apocalyptic. In En. 61:9ff. it will accompany God’s righteous judgment. Such praise may be a sign of human transformation (71:11-12).

D. The Group in the NT.

I. homologeín.

1. A first use of this verb is for “to assure,” “to promise,” “to admit,” or “to concede.” In Mt. 14:7 (cf. Acts 7:17; Heb. 6:13) it binds the speaker to his word. The use is Hellenistic, but in Jn. 1:20 there is a distinctive Christian note. In John solemn declarations belong to the circle of witness to Christ (1:7, 15, 19). Similarly in Heb. 11:13 the idea of a solemn declaration of faith is added to that of admission or confirmation. Similarly, admission of sin in 1 Jn. 1:9 (cf. the opposite in 1:8) carries with it the idea of confession.

2. A second use is for “to make a statement” or “bear witness” in a legal sense. Shaped by the gospel tradition, this is perhaps the most important NT use. It occurs in Lk. 12:8; Mt. 10:32. Jesus demands confession of himself, and he will confirm it to the Father as the eschatological witness. Important here is the correspondence between earthly conduct and the eschatological word. Rev. 3:5 takes up the theme, and cf. Mt. 7:23 for rejection by the eschatological witness or judge. In Jn. 9:22 the Jews expel those who publicly confess Jesus as Messiah. To confess Jesus means honor with God; refusal to confess him is based on the desire for human honor (5:44; 12:43). Judicial confession is also the point in Acts 24:14, where Paul acknowledges that as a Christian he serves the God of the fathers.

3. A third use is for “to make solemn statements of faith,” “to confess something in faith.” Rom. 10:9-10 (cf. Dt. 30:14) links faith and confession (cf. 2 Cor. 4:13). Confession and proclamation grow out of faith. Confession stands under eschatological responsibility (2 Cor. 4:14) and has the promise of eschatological salvation (Rom. 10:9-10). The eschatological aspect is evident in Acts 23:8. We are perhaps to take Heb. 13:15 in the same way, and also Tit. 1:16, where the words of the false teachers confess God but their works deny him. 1 John, too, contrasts denying and confessing. Those who deny Christ are liars and antichrists (2:22). Confessing, then, implies acceptance of a specific christological understanding. Only the spirits that affirm this understanding are from God (4:2-3). That more than intellectual understanding is at issue may be seen from 4:15. This type of homología causes division (cf. 2 Jn. 7). The aim of John is to bring about decision by a firm formulation of the gospel that expresses its saving significance. 1 Tim. 6:13 views the witness of Jesus at his trial as confession. This good confession, ordained and confirmed by God, stands in sharp contrast to the false witness of his opponents (Mk. 14:56). It consists of his admission that he is the Son of God (cf. Mt. 16:16; Mk. 15:39). It is a model for disciples (Mt. 10:32). Such confession should be public (1 Tim. 6:12), binding (6:12-13), and definitive (Mt. 10:32). It may come as the answer to a question (Mt. 16: 13ff.; Jn. 1: 19ff.; Acts 8:37: at baptism). The authentic confession rules out other possibilities, and even though the question is put personally the answer is given representatively (cf. the link between Peter's confession and the church in Mt. 16: 13ff.). Knowledge does not necessarily include confession (Mt. 10:19; Jn. 12:42), and present confession does not rule out future denial (Peter). But confession means taking sides, and confession of Christ means confession of the risen and exalted Lord (set side by side with the one God in 1 Cor. 8:6). Proclamation and teaching are forms of confessing and witnessing. They start from an event in history, which they proclaim and interpret, they carry with them a commitment and a claim, and they integrate those who accept them into eschatological fellowship with God.

II. homologouménōs. This adverb means "by common consent." It occurs in the NT only in 1 Tim. 3:16, which says that the mystery of the faith is "confessedly great." Christ is vindicated in the Spirit, seen by angels, preached among the nations, and believed on in the world.

III. anthomologeísthai and exomologeísthai tṓ theṓ.

1. anthomologeísthai has many meanings in secular Greek, e.g., "to agree," "to admit," "to express thanks." In Lk. 2:38 (on an OT model) Anna's thanksgiving combines acknowledgment, obedience, and proclamation.

2. exomologeísthai also has such senses as "to admit," "to confess," and "to promise." The NT adopts especially the cultic sense "to confess," "to extol." Paul's use in Rom. 15:7ff. recalls the Psalms, and cf. Rom. 14:11 and Phil. 2:11 (Is. 45:23), where the Christian confession, which is to God's glory, broadens out into that of the last time (cf. the songs of Rev. 4:8, 11; 5:9ff.; REV 12:10ff., which pledge final victory and are a summons to rejoicing; also the angels' song in Lk. 2:14 and the blessing of Simeon in Lk. 2:29ff.). As many OT Psalms begin with praise (111:1; 138:1), so Jesus' cry of jubilation refers to a rejoicing in the Spirit (Mt. 11:25). The threefold division here combines praise of God, disclosure of the authority of the Son, and a summons to accept eschatological wisdom (or, in Lk. 10:23-24, a blessing of eyewitnesses). This wisdom is not that of the law or tradition, but of the gospel; this is why the scribes reject it (1 Cor. 1:19-20).

IV. exomologeísthai tás hamartías. While Phil. 2:11 construes the confession of Is. 45:23 as praise of God, Rom. 14:11 relates it to the eschatological confession of sins before God's judgment throne. The two go closely together. From the time of the Baptist public confession of sin is integral to conversion (cf. Mk. 1:5; Mt. 3:6; Acts 19:18). According to Jms. 5:16 it is also a custom in times of sickness.

V. homología. This word denotes a free act of confession of the gospel or a liturgical form of confession in the community. As a response in 2 Cor. 9:13 it implies acceptance, commitment, and obedience. It is thus an occasion for thanksgiving and for praise of God (9:12-13). At issue here is an act of sharing, so that the use is very broad. In Heb. 3:1; 4:14; 10:23, however, the reference is to the ecclesiastical or baptismal confession of faith to which the hearers are committed, or to a liturgy of praise connected with the various predicates of Christ. In Hebrews, too, the word expresses commitment, but with a fixed homología in view. In 1 Tim. 6:12- 13 the reference seems to be to a gathering for ordination, and it may be that the verse which follows gives the content of Timothy's confession, echoing both its legal and its cultic form. The hymn in 2 Tim. 2:11ff. recalls Mt. 10:32-33: the Christ who summons us to confession himself makes confession and is faithful. The concept of witnesses is important in 1 Tim. 6:12; Heb. 12:1; Rev. 1:5, for, like Christ, they hear the commitment and will speak for or against those who make the confession at the last judgment. In 2 Tim. 2:11ff. it is Christ himself who is the witness. The first two members are oriented to the eschatological promise and the last two to the attitude of Christ. The third member adopts the concept of correspondence as a warning, but the last breaks it in view of God's greater faithfulness (cf. Rom. 3:3), unless the point is that Christ will be faithful to his word. The point of Jms. 2:14ff. is that confession does not release from obedience but demands it.

E. The Group in the Postapostolic Writings.

*1. homologeín. This word occurs in the senses a. "to promise," "to admit," "to concede" (cf. Diog. 2.1), b. "to make legal statements," "to bear witness" (Ignatius Smyrneans 5. 1; Hermas Similitudes 9.28.1ff., which presents confession as a duty of servant to master; 2 Clem. 3. 1ff.; Mart. Pol. 6. 1), c. "to make solemn statements of faith" (Ignatius Smyrneans 5.2; 7.1, where contradiction of the confession of the Lord's Supper as Christ's flesh means exclusion and death; Polycarp 7.1; 2 Clem. 3.2ff., which demands honoring with the whole heart and mind).

*2. exomologeísthai tṓ theṓ or tás hamartías. exomologeísthai tṓ theṓ finds a place in the liturgy (1 Clem. 52:1ff., which extols the resurrection; 61.3, where it takes a christological form; Hermas Mandates 10, which argues that the sorrowful cannot give God thanks). exomologeísthai tás hamartías is recommended (cf. 1 Clem. 50- 51, where it is closely related to praise; 2 Clem. 8.1ff., which says it will come too late after death; Did. 4.14, where it should precede intercession; Hermas Similitudes 9.23.4, which may hint at formulas of remission).

*3. homológēsis, exomológēsis. These words, denoting confession and praise of God, do not occur in the NT but are found in Hermas Similitudes 9.28.7 and 2.5.

*4. homolóouménōs. Diog. 5.4 uses this term in the sense "admittedly."

5. Clement of Alexandria. Clement uses homologeín in the various senses "to agree," "to concede," "to promise," "to confess," and homología in the senses "agreement," "assent," "acceptance." He offers an exposition of the Lord's sayings about confession in Stromateis 4.9.70ff. [O. MICHEL, V, 199-220]

ónar [dream]

Used only in the nominative and accusative, and of uncertain etymology, ónar means "dream." It does not occur in the LXX, which mostly uses enýpnion. In the NT only Matthew and Luke mention dreams, and Luke (in Acts) has hórama (16:9-10; 18:9), and hórasis and enýpnion (2:17).

A. The Dream in Antiquity.

I. Dreams and Their Interpretation.

1. The Problem. Belief in the significance of dreams is common in antiquity (as it still is today), but not without criticism. Distinction is made between significant dreams and others. A problem is whether some dreams might be caused by deceiving powers or by purely physical causes (wine etc.). Dietary rules are established. Aristotle and Cicero are mostly critical. Cicero argues that it is unworthy of deity to use dreams for revelation, that interpretation is uncertain, and that there are too many dreams to prove by observation that they come true.

2. The Most Important Books of Dreams. In spite of recent findings, knowledge of the field is far from complete. In Babylonian texts it is hard to differentiate dreams and omens. From Egypt we have a hieratic book and various demotic texts. Greek books date from the time of Socrates but the first to come down in full is that of Artemidorus. The later book of Synesius takes a platonic turn. The Byzantine book of Achmet derives from Arabian sources. Other books are apocryphal.

3. The Importance of Dreams in Antiquity.

a. The Cultic Dream. Cults and sanctuaries are set up through dreams, e.g., a temple in Hierapolis, and the cult of Sarapis in Alexandria. Directions are also given by dreams, and the gods threaten punishment for neglect or encouragement for devotion. The sick are healed as they dream of the gods. Domitian dreams of the disarming of his protective goddess Minerva before his death. Votive offerings are made on the basis of dreams.

b. The Political Dream. Dreams supposedly intimate the birth of great leaders, e.g., Pericles and Augustus. Generals are promised victories in dreams, e.g., Xerxes and Caesar. But dreams may be equivocal, coming to fulfilment in reverses rather than successes. Critical events are intimated by dreams, e.g., the end of Nero, or the accessions of Hadrian and Marcus Aurelius.

c. The Personal Dream. Ordinary people as well as leaders have dreams that relate to events in their lives. Such dreams are usually symbolical or allegorical. They often have to do with death or with the consequences of evil acts.

4. The Metaphysics of Dreams. Primitive people feel that in dreams they are caught up into the suprasensory world. Thus in Egypt dreamers supposedly enter the world that the sun god traverses by night, and what they experience there is unquestionably true. In Greece, too, there is a connection between dreams and the world of the dead. The dead often appear in dreams, and dreams are seen as messages from the hereafter in the form of rapture. They are common on the approach of death.

5. The Interpretation of Dreams as a Science. When directions are given in dreams, interpretation is not needed. But other dreams are more obscure and various efforts are made to interpret them. These might be intuitive, but as regular patterns are sought, supported by examples, interpretation is put on a more scientific basis, and a class of scholars develops that collects and studies dreams and undertakes their interpretation, e.g., in Babylon and Greece. Since the same dream may have different interpretations according to age, sex, health, and situation, one needs ability, wit, and experience to fit it to a given case. Pleasant dreams usually indicate pleasant things and vice versa, but the reverse may be true. Animals denote characters, e.g., the crocodile a rapacious official, pirate, or murderer. Puns help in view of the divine nature of language. Keywords come under scrutiny, and Artemidorus has a well-arranged system relating to such things as birth, the arts, contests, washing, food, sleep, the chase, fishing, voyages, and heavenly phenomena. The harvest usually refers to progeny (wheat to sons and barley to daughters), and fruits in husks are miscarriages. This is a bizarre world, although modern study of dreams shows that there may be elements of truth in the belief that dreams are significant.

6. The Dream as a Literary Form. The dream also becomes a form of literary composition. Cicero makes effective use of this, as does Lucian when he describes his life in the form of a vision, or when he invents the witty dialogue between the cobbler Micyllos and his cock.

7. Dream Life as a Mirror. The people of antiquity are seen unadorned in their dreams. Books of dreams enable us to construct a mosaic of their culture. We find harmless dreams presenting life as work or depicting good fortune. But in the main the picture is one of riotous and perverted fantasy in which the dominant concern is not for higher things but for the trivialities of daily life, e.g., money, health, safety, and sexual fulfilment. If unfavorable interpretations show a sober realism, they also manifest a pitiless lack of concern. The total picture is one of fatalism, superstition, and corruption; nowhere is antiquity so unmasked as in its dreams.

II. Dreams and the Interpretation of Dreams in the OT.

1. The Dream and History. In the OT we again find cultic, political, and personal dreams. Thus Jacob's dream is cultic (Gen. 28:11ff.), those of Joseph and Solomon are political (Gen. 37:5ff.. 1 Kgs. 3:5ff.), and those of the butler and baker are personal (Gen. 40:8ff.). Dreams are mostly allegorical, so that interpretation is important, and it follows traditional lines. Joseph and Daniel replace the Egyptian and Babylonian soothsayers, even using some of their equations. Yet OT dreams have certain distinctive features. They move on a more sober, indeed a higher level. Stress is laid on the evanescent character of dreams (cf. Ps. 73:20). They do not come from the realm of the dead, which is in no sense an abode of God, but from God himself (Gen. 20:6; 28:10ff.; Judg. 7:13ff.; Dan. 2:1ff.). They are not needed for revelation, but God can use them if he so chooses, and he alone can give the true interpretation to selected people (Gen. 40:8; Dan. 2:17ff.). On these conditions dreams are integrated into the history of God with his people (cf. Gen. 41:1ff.; Judg. 7: 13ff.). Even personal dreams are told because the persons concerned have a part in salvation history. The God who gives dreams is the God of history from whom sanctifying power goes forth. Dreams, then, are given a distinctive stamp.

2. The Dream as a Regular Means of Revelation. Job and his friends all regard dreams as messages from God (cf. 4: 13ff.; 7:14). Dreams are associated with shrines (Gen. 28: 10ff.), and revelations are sought there (1 Sam. 3:1ff.). Prophecy is linked with dreams (Num. 12:6-7). Dreams will be a feature of the age of salvation when God pours out his Spirit (Joel 2:28).

3. The Prophetic Criticism of Dreams. Yet there is also criticism of dreams. God speaks to Moses directly (Num. 12:6ff.). Revelations by dreams may be untrustworthy even when accompanied by signs and wonders (Dt. 13:2ff.). Jeremiah struggles with prophets who appeal to dreams (23:25ff.). It is on the basis of the true word of God, not of rationalism, that dreams are suspect. Eccl. 5:3, 7 comes to a similar conclusion. Words and dreams are cheap; it is better to fear God.

III. Dreams and Their Interpretation in Judaism.

1. Philo. The prophetic criticism is lost to view in Hellenistic Judaism. Philo knows the emptiness of dreams, but he still thinks that God gives knowledge of heavenly things through them, e.g., the beauties of virtues. In some dreams God speaks directly, in others through immortal souls, in yet others through the souls of the dreamers. Dreams of the last group are obscure and need authentic interpreters, although Philo himself allegorizes biblical interpretations.

2. Hagiography and Apocalyptic. Popular religious literature evinces a strong belief in dreams. In Esther the LXX adds a dream by Mordecai, and in 2 Macc. 15:1lff. Judas Maccabeus tells a dream to encourage his troops. In apocalyptic there is a fluid border between dream and vision. Many visions are literary constructs.

3. Josephus. Josephus shows considerable credulity. He adds new dreams to the OT and adorns postcanonical history with dreams, e.g., those of Jaddus, Hyrcanus, Archelaus, and Josephus himself, who has dreams disclosing the future destiny of the emperors before going over to the Romans.

4. Rabbinic Judaism. The rabbis show some skepticism, e.g., in the saying that dreams neither exalt nor abase. They sometimes interpret dreams psychologically, but also distinguish between valid and invalid visions, i.e., those that come from angels and those that come from demons. There is an angel of dreams, and dreams constitute a tiny fraction of prophecy. In practical life the concerns in dreams are the common ones of money, health, marriage, etc. Those who have corrupt dreams should seek reason and wisdom. There are both expert and popular interpreters, and fixed interpretations develop; thus wheat denotes peace, barley forgiveness, a white horse good, an ass messianic salvation. Puns are common in exposition. Peculiar to Judaism is the belief that a dream has force only by interpretation. Interpretation is thus a valuable art, and dreams may be evaded by seeking a favorable interpretation (as also by reciting Scripture, prayer, almsgiving, and penitence). Attempts are made to apply dreams morally. Thus God is said to give the wicked bad dreams to lead them to repentance.

B. The Dream in the NT.

1. The Tradition. Paul’s dreams in Acts 16:9- 10 and 27:23-24 bear the stamp of authenticity, and we may thus accept 18:9 and 23:11 as well. Elsewhere the only dreams are in Matthew (1:20-21; 2:12; 2:13ff.;

27:19). The formula kat' ónar shows that these are from the same hand, although some scholars think they are legendary and apologetic.

2. The Uniqueness of the NT Understanding.

a. Paucity. If the NT seldom mentions dreams, this is because it regards fewer dreams as significant. It does not rule them out, for it quotes Joel 2:28 with approval. But it resists the Hellenistic interest. Thus Paul never mentions the dreams of Acts in the epistles, and he refers only hesitantly to his visions and revelations (2 Cor. 12:1). Jude, indeed, condemns the carnal dreamings of heretics (v. 8).

b. Absence of Allegorical Dreams and Interpretations. There are no allegorical dreams in the NT. God appears, or an angel, or a messenger, or a man, and gives plain directions about what is to happen or what is to be done (cf. Acts 27:23; Mt. 1:20, etc.). There is thus no interpretation of dreams in the NT. When God speaks through dreams, he does so unambiguously.

c. Lofty Nature of NT Dream Life. On the basis of the OT, the dreams of the NT compare most favorably with those of secular antiquity. There is nothing vulgar, disgusting, sexually unnatural, or egocentric about them. They are not concerned with personal fate but with Christ and the Christian mission. They do not terrify, but by means of them God directs his people. The tension between superstition and enlightenment is resolved.

C. Dreams and Their Interpretation in the Postapostolic Period. The terms do not occur in the apostolic fathers and are rare in the Apologists. The Gnostic Acts abound in dreams and visions. Martyrs like Polycarp have dreams (Mart. Pol. 5. 1-2; cf. Perpetua, Satarus, and Cyprian). Synesius works out a system of interpretation on an eclectic philosophical basis. He advocates keeping a book of dreams and daydreams, and follows the principle that like follows like. Achmet makes use of the dreams of the OT, and traces interpretation to God, but he also draws on various sources, and his detailed suggestions are often trivial, e.g., that cutting side hairs denotes poor management of income. Thus the muddy waters of antiquity bring in a new flood of superstition. [A. OEPKE, V, 220-38]

óneidos. This word seems to come from a root meaning "to revile," and it means "disgrace," "abuse," or "object of disgrace or shame." In the LXX the fact of sin means that earthly life is marked by shame, so that all of us despise and are ourselves despised. Release from shame is part of divine deliverance (Is. 25:8; Joel 2:19). The wicked despise God, but he in turn heaps shame on them. Sin is a reproach to a people (Prov. 14:34), yet God may also bring reproach on the righteous as a test, and when accepted in God's name (Ps. 69:7-8) this brings joy and courage (cf. 73:23ff.). In the NT the only instance is in Lk. 1:25, in which Elizabeth rejoices that God has taken from her the "reproach" of childlessness.

oneidízō. This word means "to upbraid," "to revile," "to bring reproaches or complaints." In the Psalms enemies revile God, Israel, the righteous, etc. Jesus has authority to reproach in Mt. 11:20 (cf. Mk. 16:14). In his passion, however, he himself is reviled (Mk. 15:32). The disciples will be reviled too (Mt. 5:11). Yet blessing comes upon them when they are reviled in Christ's name, i.e., as Christians (1 Pet. 4:14). God's generosity is such that he gives without reproaching (Jms. 1:5). Paul in Rom. 15:3 quotes Ps. 69:9 in holding up Christ as a model of unselfishness. The word is also a variant in Mk. 15:34, where it softens the "forsaken," and in 1 Tim. 4:10, where it hardly seems to fit the context.

oneidismós. This word means "insult," "abuse," "reproach." It is fairly common in the LXX. In the NT the bishop must be well thought of lest he fall into "reproach" (1 Tim. 3:7). In Heb. 10:33 the readers were formerly exposed to "abuse," in 11:26 Moses prefers "abuse" for Christ's sake to the treasures of Egypt, salvation history providing the link between Moses and Christ, and in 13:13 the readers are to go outside the camp with Christ, bearing “reproach” for him as messianic bearers of the cross who have a share in their Lord’s sufferings. [J. SCHNEIDER, V, 238-42]

ónoma [name, person], onomázō [to name], eponomázō [to nickname], pseudṓnymos [bearing a false name]

A. Historical Background. It is a common belief of antiquity that the name is not just a label but part of the personality of the one who bears it. Various rites are used to find names for children. New names are often given in puberty. The name carries will and power. One must know the names of gods to have dealings with them or power over them. The name conjures up the person; there is thus a desire to know it and a reluctance to give it. Possession of secret names is a safeguard of freedom.

B. The Greek World and Hellenism.

1. Usage. ónoma means a. “name” of a person or thing. Names are given by parents, and strangers must give their names when seeking hospitality. Common expressions are “to call by name,” “to give a name,” “in the name,” “under the name,” and “with mention of the name.” ónoma also means b. “repute.” It may be used c. as the opposite of a thing, but also d., with the genitive, for the person or thing. In grammar e. it is used for a “noun” or “word.” In the papyri f., on the basis of names in books or on lists, it may denote such things as “legal title,” “item in an account,” or, in banking, the actual “account,” e.g., when money is paid to the name (credit or account) of someone.

2. The Significance of ónoma in Greek Thought. Epic poetry shares the belief in the significance of names, although it also shares the philosophical doubt whether human names truly reflect reality. Many things have both divine and human names. Skeptical philosophy suggests that human names express false notions and concepts, since they are conventional and relate only to experience. Thus the Sophists contrast the name with the work, reality, or nature. The nature is what counts; names cannot change it. Plato accepts the view that, while names are not capricious, and are undoubtedly necessary, they do not convey true knowledge and simply act as signs. Aristotle attaches importance to the thought behind the mere sound. The name is a verbal sign, but a limited one since words have to indicate more than one thing, some ideas can hardly be put into words, and words change their meanings. Linguistic research is needed, then, to serve logic. For the Stoics, language arises from the human soul, and hence words represent things according to their nature in a fusion of thing, concept, and word. Etymology has the task of showing the truth of words (etymótēs) in their agreement with the objects they denote. By this art the Stoics take over popular religion, for they find truth and wisdom in it by etymologizing the names of the gods.

3. The Name of God. Originally the Pelasgians are thought not to have named their gods. The divine names come from Egypt; Homer and Hesiod play a big part in naming the gods of Greece. Strabo also mentions a tribe that sacrificed to an unnamed god. Later Greek religion, however, attaches great importance to the divine names and tries to learn about their being and nature from their names by way of etymology. Philosophy has doubts about the correspondence of name and nature. Etymology can yield only human thoughts about the gods. Yet the names are still commonly regarded as significant. Indeed, names are heaped on the gods to pay them greater honor and to be sure of gaining control over them. Stoicism thinks Zeus should be known by many names in view of his many functions and characteristics. In the Hermetic writings God is too lofty to have a name; no name fits him and all names fit him. The anonymity of deity is related to its incorporeality, for language is corporeal. Again, names differentiate distinct things, but the deity is the one and all. Celsus thinks along these lines, as do the Gnostics, and even some Christian authors.

4. The Magic Papyri. The magic papyri believe in the power and efficacy of names. Knowledge and utterance of them give power over their bearers by invocation and even mystical identification. Magicians know the right acts and times to gain this power. They use names from all possible languages; barbarian names have great force if pronounced correctly. In Egypt even the name of Yahweh is used. The name has to be the one that the deity itself has given. In invocation it is honored by many predicates. The name works by its own power, for the deity is itself the name. Christian magic papyri mention the names of Mary, the Baptist, and the Trinity as efficacious along with Yao, Sabaoth, etc. Antiquity has, of course, its skeptics like Lucian.

C. The OT.

1. Lexical and Statistical Data. The common Heb. shēm (some 770 times in the singular and 84 in the plural) is used for the names of gods, humans, and animals, also of such geographical features as rivers, mountains, and towns, then of things or times. With reference to acts it may also be used for a good or bad "reputation," and then for "memory" or "fame" after death, although there is debate as to whether it is used metonymically for the person or in the sense of "memorial" or "sign." A common expression is "for the name" (usually God), and familiar verbs used with the name (of God) are "to invoke," "to speak," "to bless," and "to prophesy."

2. The Significance of the Name. Israel believes in the significance of names. Thus Adam exercises dominion by naming the animals (Gen. 2:19-20). To name a city is to establish control over it (2 Sam. 12:28). Women seek the name of a man in times of distress (Is. 4:1), i.e., to put themselves under his protection. God names the stars (Ps. 147:4) and Israel (Is. 43:1). His name is named over Israel (Is. 63:19), and also over the temple, the ark, and Jerusalem. He knows Moses by name (Ex. 33:12, 17). Names live on in children (Gen. 21:12). The names of those without children are blotted out. The names of the righteous are written in the book of life (Ex. 32:32-33; Ps. 69:28).

3. Proper Names and Meaningful Names. Proper names establish identities. Thus it may be said of Nabal (1 Sam. 25:25) that as a man is named, so he is. Etymologies are given for such names as Eve (3:20), Cain (4:1), Noah (5:29), and cf. Babel (11:9). The name may express the whole person or a single feature. Many names are theophorous, expressing either a relation to God or a Godward wish. The names of the 12 patriarchs bear witness to God's help (Gen. 29:31ff.). Second names are sometimes given (cf. Gen. 41:45; 2 Kgs. 23:34; Dan. 1:7). These express new status. God himself may give new names (Gen. 32:29). As in Abraham's case, the name may have meaning for more than its bearer (Gen. 12:2-3). This applies to the symbolical names in Hos. 1 and Is. 7:3; 8:3.

4. The Name Yahweh. Knowing the name of God is important in the OT (Gen. 32:30). God reveals his name to Abraham (Gen. 17:1) and Moses (Ex. 6:2). Invocation of his name is common, but incantation is forbidden (Ex. 20:7). God promises to hear when properly called upon, but his name is a gift of revelation, not an instrument of magic. Yet invocation of his name implies faith in his power, as in swearing (1 Sam. 20:42), cursing (2 Kgs. 2:24), or blessing in his name (2 Sam. 6:18). The name may indeed stand for the person (Lev. 18:21; Am. 2:7). If the name is in the angel of Ex. 23:21, this means that God himself is present in revelatory action. While he himself is in heaven, he chooses a place for his name to dwell (Dt. 12:11; 2 Sam. 7:13; 1 Kgs. 3:2). This is the pledge of his saving presence. It assures a high estimation for the temple and yet also a low estimation, for God is not tied to the temple by causing his name to dwell there. After the exile, the name often denotes the glory of God. A common idea is that God will be gracious to Israel so that his name may not be dishonored among the nations. Much more frequently, however, the name now stands for the person, and this leads to the hypostatizing of the name whereby it stands alongside God as an acting subject or an instrument in his hand (cf. Ps. 20:1; Prov. 18:10; Mal. 1:11). If there is often parallelism here, there is also a more conscious use of the term.

5. In the Name. A formula that is often used is that of "in the name." Sometimes this is much the same as "by name" (Judg. 18:29). Elsewhere it means "under the name" (cf. 1 Kgs. 21:8). More strongly it means "on the commission" (cf. Esth. 2:22; 1 Sam. 25:9). Most commonly we find the phrase with reference to God. Cultically it has the significance of calling "on the name" (Gen. 4:26; 12:8), or swearing or blessing "by" or "in the name" of God (Dt. 6:13; 10:8). David meets Goliath "in the name" of God (1 Sam. 17:45), Elijah builds an altar "in his name" (1 Kgs. 18:32), and one may be strong or set up a banner "in his name" (Ps. 20:5, 7). In Dt. 18:18-19 the sense is probably "on the commission of God," but in 18:20; Jer. 14:14 false prophets either name the name of God, speak only ostensibly on his commission, or make an appeal to his name.

D. Hellenistic Judaism.

1. The LXX. ónoma occurs over 1,000 times in the LXX, mostly for shēm. (For details of the Hebrew and Greek words see TDNT, V, 261-62.) The concept "in the name" causes problems. The LXX uses ek (Esth. 8:8), día without ónoma (3:12), epí (1 Sam. 25:5), and en (25:9; en tṓ onómati is literal, but unusual in classical Greek). (For details cf. TDNT V, 262-63.) The verb onomázein is rare in the LXX; kaleín usually replaces it, perhaps because shēm has no related verb. eponomázein occurs some 36 times.

2. Philo. Philo calls the name a kind of shadow accompanying the reality (On the Decalogue 82). Clear thoughts find suitable terms, as in the case of Moses, but there are no fitting expressions for obscure concepts. The LXX is praised because its renderings harmonize so well with the original that they correspond to the things denoted. Giving names is a task for the first man rather than many people, and this means that confusion is avoided. Philo allegorizes many OT names, building partly on OT expositions and partly on Stoic etymologizing. Words are important for Philo, but we must not spend our whole lives on them and ignore the realities. Idolatry gives false names to things, and in so doing obscures the true God (On the Decalogue 53). As regards God's name, Philo borrows from Ex. 3:14 LXX. But as "he who is" (i.e., being itself), God cannot be named (On the Life of Moses 1.75). He is the Lord God, or the God of Abraham etc., but he has no proper name. The powers of God have many names (cf. Stoicism), as does the lógos, and these names are to be held holy. Philo warns against false swearing and also against the blasphemous heaping up of many names instead of simply praising God (On the Special Laws 2.8).

3. Josephus. The use in Josephus is more Greek than Semitic. For "in the name" he mostly has ex or ep. He is reserved about God's name; he avoids mention of "name" in his version of the third commandment, and says that God showed Moses his prosēgoría (not ónoma), about which it is not permissible to say anything. God's name is dreadful. It may be invoked in crises, and coins are marked by his name (as alien temples are named for their gods). One must honor fathers because they bear the same name as God. On the other hand, part of God's Spirit rather than his name dwells in the temple. Writing for Greeks, Josephus perhaps thought they would regard it as odd to speak about God's name dwelling in the temple.

E. Later Judaism.

I. Pseudepigrapha. These works are not rich in statements about the name. Slavonic Enoch expounds the meanings of human names, e.g., Adam. In Ethiopian Enoch the wicked are under threat that their names will be blotted out of the book of life (108:3). The names of saints and believers are related to stars and lightnings (43). An interest is shown in the names of fallen angels (6:7 etc.). As regards God's name, seven divine names are known. God will protect Israel for his name's sake. To know God's name is to praise him, but sinners deny his name. The Son of Man is named before the Lord of spirits prior to the creation of the stars. In affliction, believers will overcome in God's name. Often the name seems to be the same as God himself, but in other passages it seems to be a mysterious force that is revealed by angels.

II. Rabbinic Sources.

1. Usage. The rabbis take over the meanings of the Hebrew term from the OT. They speak of three names: the family name, the given name, and the acquired name. When Scripture doubles a name, it points to a share in both this world and the next. "In the name" means "in virtue of," "on the basis of," or "with appeal to the name." "In the name of a teacher" is a phrase used when citing an authority. Circumcision is given “in the name of the covenant,” denoting both entry into the covenant and commitment to it. Doing things “in God’s name” may sometimes have the force of doing them “for his sake.”

2. The Name of God. In the synagogue reading of the OT the divine name Yahweh is read as Adonai. Yahweh is the special name of God, his secret proper name that is mostly not to be uttered. To curse parents with this name is a capital offense. Originally used in temple worship, it is gradually replaced and becomes an ineffable name that lays itself open to magical use. Lev. 24:11, 16 is adduced in support. A technical term for it is “the name of four letters.”

3. Belief and Magic. We find many accounts of the wonder-working power of the divine name, e.g., the deliverance of Isaiah, or the binding of Asmodai the demon-prince. Knowledge of the future may be gained with its help. In syncretistic magic God’s name is used along with others. By linking the name “el” with angels and Israel, God has made over power to them. If official Judaism struggles against magic, the Talmud ascribes force even to the individual letters of the divine name, and Hebrew Enoch (42:2ff.) believes that divine names hold together the polar forces in the cosmos, thus insuring its harmony.

F. The NT.

1. Usage.

a. Name of a Person. In the NT proper names are usually integrated into sentences (Mk. 3:16; Acts 27:1, though cf. Rev. 9:11). Hebrew influence may be seen in Lk. 1:5; Mt. 1:21,23; Lk. 1:59, etc.

b. Name as “Reputation.” This occurs in Mk. 6:14 and Rev. 3:1.

c. Name for Person. Three examples of this are Acts 1:15; Rev. 3:4; 11:13. Perhaps one might also add Acts 18:15.

d. Name with Prepositions. This usage shows strong Semitic influence. Along with epí, diá, perí, kat’, and prós, en is very common. It is used with various verbs and in such senses as “with invocation of,” “with proclamation of,” “on the commission” “in fulfilment of the will,” “in obedience to,” “in the power of,” or “in the presence of.” (For details cf. TDNT, V, 271.)

2. ónoma as the Name of God or Jesus Christ. In the NT the name, person, and work of God are inseparably linked to those of Christ. This applies even to OT quotations or allusions, e.g., Mk. 11:9-10; Mt. 23:39; Acts 15:17.

a. The name of God relates to revelation, and in this sense it is linked to “glory,” thus expressing a specific approach and relationship. In Jn. 12:28 God glorifies his name in the life and work and then again in the death and resurrection of Jesus (cf. Jn. 17:6). Jesus discloses the obscure name of God to his disciples, giving it the specific content of “Father.” To be received in the name is to stand in the sphere of the love of Father and Son (17:11, 12, 21). When the name is declared it awakens new life in believers (1 Jn. 4:7) as the Son is present in them in the Father’s love. Glorifying God’s name is supremely Christ’s work as a work of revelation and reconciliation. Grounded on Christ’s work, the church has the promise that this work will continue in it (Jn. 17:26).

b. The fullness of Christ’s being and work may be seen in his name. The divinely given name “Jesus” expresses his humanity and his mission (Mt. 1:21). It implies “God with us” (1:23). The exalted name he receives is that of Son (Heb. 1:4). He is also called Lord (Phil. 2:9-10), which denotes divine equality and is the name above all others. Hence Jesus is Lord of lords. Revealing the divine dominion, he is also King of kings (Rev. 19:16). The unity of nature and name may be seen in Rev. 19:13 and Jn. 1:1. He alone knows his name in the sense that he alone knows the fullness of his relationship with God (Rev. 19:12). Jesus acts in God’s name as the Christ (Jn. 10:24-25). His coming again completes his work (Mt. 23:39). His name, then, embraces the whole content of God’s saving acts (1 Cor. 6:11). Justification and sanctification in his name relate not to the mere pronouncing of the name but to baptism in the sense of Rom. 6:1ff. Forgiveness is in his name (Acts 10:43; cf. 1 Jn. 1:7; 2:12). Life is given in his name, i.e., by entry into his sphere of action or the sphere of his person (Jn. 20:31). As Peter says, salvation is only in his name (Acts 4:12). Those who enter into it are to do all things and to give thanks for all things in this name (2 Th. 1:12; Col. 3:17; Eph. 5:20). His name is the hope of all peoples, although it may mean judgment as well as salvation (Jn. 3:18). The Father sends the Spirit in the name of Jesus (Jn. 14:16).

c. In Mt. 28:19 Father, Son, and Spirit come together and thus give fullness to the Father's name. Baptism in this name means entering into fellowship with the Father through the Son and coming under the operation of the Spirit. The phrase eis (tó) ónoma is difficult. It sometimes has the force of "with regard to" or "because" (cf. Mt. 10:41-42; Mk. 9:41). Gathering in Christ's name means meeting "on the basis of" Christ (Mt. 18:10; cf. Heb. 6:10). Yet this does not seem to be the sense in Mt. 28:19 (cf. Acts 8:16; 1 Cor. 1:13, 15). After the rabbinic model, the force is final rather than causal, expressing a specific end or intention, and with forensic rather than mystical implications. Without the use of ónoma, Paul has similar phrases in 1 Cor. 1:13, 15; Rom. 6:3; Gal. 3:27, and cf. 1 Cor. 10:2. It is Semitic in origin rather than Hellenistic (e.g., charging to the account). In Acts 2:38 the epí with dative may denote the basis, and the en of Acts 10:48 is perhaps to be taken in the same way.

d. The first petition of the Lord's Prayer (Mt. 6:9) relates to the dawn of the kingdom and is thus a prayer, primarily that God will sanctify his own name in spite of all sin and opposition. The disciples of Jesus are to pray in the name of Jesus (Jn. 14:13-14), i.e., according to his will, on his commission, and with invocation of his name. Presupposed here is faith that he has come from his Father and that the Father will hear the prayer for his sake. The unity of Father and Son is shown in the fact that the Son will himself do what is asked (14:13).

e. Believing in His Name. In Jn. 2:23 believing in the name of Jesus is believing in him as the Christ, the Son of God (3:18). Belief arises through his acts of power (10:25). It confers a right relation to the Father (1:12). God commands it (1 Jn. 3:23).

f. Believers in this name can act on its commission and in its power (Lk. 10:17). Even nondisciples find power in it (9:49). Works of mercy, too, are done in it (Mt. 18:5). It is the force in the healing of the lame man (Acts 3:6, 16). Paul drives out the spirit of soothsaying in the name (16:18). It is no magic formula but stands for Christ's presence (9:34). Adjurations are used only by demons (Mk. 5:7) and the Jewish exorcists (Acts 19:13ff.). The name has power only where there is faith and obedience (cf. Mk. 9:38-39). This power is in answer to prayer (Acts 4:30; Jms. 5:14-15).

g. The name of Jesus is the basis and theme of proclamation (Acts 8:12). Repentance is preached to the Gentiles in it (Lk. 24:47). Missionaries go out for it (3 Jn. 7). Saul persecutes it (Acts 26:9), but when converted, he proclaims it (9:27-28). He speaks on its commission (Rom. 1:5 etc.). He beseeches in it (1 Cor. 1:10).

h. Belief in the name leads to confession of it (Heb. 13:15), which is linked to suffering for it (Mk. 10:29; Jn. 15:21). The disciples are put to shame for it (Acts 5:41), and Paul and Barnabas risk their lives for it (15:26). The church at Pergamum holds fast to it (Rev. 2:13) and that at Philadelphia does not deny it (3:8). Reproach for the name means blessing (1 Pet. 4:14). Fulfilment for the church comes with reverence for the name (Rev. 11:18) and praise of it (15:4). Calling on it is salvation (Acts 2:17ff.), and it is named over believers, so that they are called Christians (11:26; Jms. 2:7). In the new creation the victors will bear the name of the Lamb with that of God and the new Jerusalem (Rev. 3:12). Investing with the new name marks entry into the new world order (cf. Is. 56:5). Unbelief is blaspheming the name (Rom. 2:24; 1 Tim. 6:1).

3. Other References.

a. In the case of the beast, the name expresses ungodliness, for the beast usurps the names and titles of God (Rev. 13:1). What the number signifies is hard to determine. The name or number is a mark denoting the beast's sphere of power. In the case of the harlot, too, the name expresses ungodliness (17:1). Babylon violates the divine purity and majesty. The names Death, Hades, Abaddon, and Apollyon (6:8; 9:11) denote forces that are opposed to life as God's true nature. Spirits have names. The name Legion suggests not only the nature and greatness of the spirit but also the fullness of the power of Jesus.

b. Jesus gives three disciples new names. These do not denote natural qualities but future promises. Thus Simon is called Peter, and James and John are Sons of Thunder. Jesus will build his church on Simon, and he gives James and John a mighty power of witness. The names of the apostles are the foundation stones of the new Jerusalem (Rev. 21:14). Note here the link with the OT community (21:12). Jesus knows his own people by name (Jn. 10:3). These names are written in heaven (Lk. 10:20; cf. Rev. 3:5; Phil. 4:3). Christ promises those who overcome that he will not blot out their names (Rev. 3:5). The names stand because Jesus confesses them. With the white stones, the victors receive a new and secret name (2:17), which expresses a new nature and inexchangeable fellowship with Christ.

onomázō. This word, meaning "to name," "to call by name," "to number," "to denote," and "to promise," occurs nine times in the NT. Jesus calls the 12 apostles; their name and ministry come from him (Lk. 6:13). He calls Simon "Peter" (6:14). Those who bear the name but act unworthily are to be denied table fellowship (1 Cor. 5:11). Sins are not even to be named, i.e., mentioned, by the saints (Eph. 5:3). Every family in heaven and earth is named by God (Eph. 3:14-15), for he is the common Father.

eponomázō. This word means "to give a second name" or "nickname." The only NT instance is in Rom. 2:17, where Paul overturns any pride associated with the mere name of Jew, since Jews and Gentiles are both under judgment and are both referred to grace.

pseudṓnymos. This word means "bearing a false or incorrect name." The one NT instance is in 1 Tim. 6:20, where the apostle warns Timothy against a movement that gives the lie to its name, since it leads to error, not knowledge.

ónos [ass, donkey], onárion [little donkey]

A. The Ass in Palestine and Judaism.

1. There are early references to the ónos (diminutive onárion), or "ass," in Egypt and Palestine (cf Gen 12:16 and figuratively 29:14). The ass is used for riding, carrying, plowing, etc (Num. 22:22ff. 1 Sam 25:18. Is. 30:24). Only in dire need is it eaten (2 Kgs. 6:25). The wild ass loves its freedom (Job 6:5). The burial of an ass is a shameful burial (Jer 22:19). A calumny against Jews and Christians is that they worship the head of an ass.

2. In Gen. 49:11 and Zech. 9:9 the eschatological ruler who will establish peace rides on an ass, or, as the parallelism shows, a young male animal. The verse in Genesis stresses the fruitfulness of the reign, that in Zechariah its righteousness. Rabbinic exegesis relates the second redeemer to the first, i.e., Moses (cf. Ex. 4:20). Some scholars argue that he will come on an ass only if Israel has no merits, while others think that riding on an ass is for the sake of the wicked, and recalls the merit of the fathers, e.g., Abraham in Gen. 22:3.

B. The Ass in Antiquity, Hellenism, and Gnosticism. In Egypt the ass is dedicated to the god Typhon. It seems to come to Greece from Asia Minor. Ajax is compared by Homer to an ass. Dionysus and his followers ride on asses. There are accounts of sexual intercourse with asses. Epiphanius calls the Gnostics worshippers of Typhon, and the Mandaeans refer to the mystery and sacrament of the she-ass with four bones, in an attack on Christianity.

C. The Ass in the NT.

1. While Mk. 11:1ff. does not quote Zech. 9:9, as Mt. 21:2ff. and Jn. 12:15 do, it is full of allusions. Mark and Luke stress the fact that no one has yet sat on the foal that Jesus uses (cf. Num. 19:2; Dt. 21:3). Matthew mentions both ass and colt. This seems to create difficulties (even of a practical kind), and it is hard to see why both should be mentioned. Jn. 12:14ff. uses onárion for the colt, and expressly says that the disciples do not at first understand the incident. Surprisingly, perhaps, he relates the prophecy to the messianic event rather than the messianic character (v. 16).

2. The OT often mentions the ox and the ass together, and Jesus does the same in the saying in Lk. 13:15. In Lk. 14:5 the true reading might be "a son or an ox," but "an ass or an ox" is also attested. Some Jewish rulings allow pulling a man out of a well on the sabbath, but not an animal. [O. MICHEL, V, 283-87]

óxos [sharp, sour]

"Sour wine" is a popular drink, and "very sour wine" (vinegar) a popular seasoning. Doctors recommend sour wine for fevers, as well as for refreshment and for digestion. In Ps. 69:21 (cf. Jn. 19:29) the complaint seems to be that only a sour drink is given instead of wine. The passion story (Mk. 15:36 and par.) says that the wine of the people was offered to Jesus on the cross. Some commentators suggest that a sharp drink would produce nervous stimulation and prolong the agony, but no such effect is known, and Mk. 15:36 implies that it is given for refreshment after the cry of v. 34. Mt. 27:48-49 supports this view, although Lk. 23:36-37 finds an element of mockery when the soldiers hand Jesus sour wine. Jn. 19:28ff. attributes the initiative to the saying of Jesus: "I thirst," and traces in the incident a fulfilment of the saying in Ps. 69:21 that the innocent sufferer is given vinegar to drink. The stupefying drink in Mk. 15:22-23 and Mt. 27:34 is quite a different one. [H. W. HEIDLAND, V, 288-89]

opísō [behind, later], ōpisthen [behind, from behind]

1. opísō has such meanings as "behind," "after," "later," and "again." As a noun in Phi1. 3:13 it denotes "what lies behind." The reference in Jn. 6:66 is to "withdrawal" and in Lk. 9:62 to "looking back." Like the LXX, the NT uses opísō as a preposition with the genitive, mostly of person.

2. ópisthen as an adverb and preposition means "behind." The NT has it seven times. As an adverb it means "from behind" in Mk. 5:27 (Mt. 9:20; Lk. 8:44) and "behind" in Rev. 4:6; 5:1. As a preposition it means "behind" in Mt. 25:23; Lk. 23:26.

3. opísō is theologically significant when it is combined with a genitive of person and verb of motion (though there are exceptions, e.g., Lk. 9:14; Rev. 12:15). Thus in Mk. 1:17 it binds the disciples to Jesus. In the OT "going after" God (or other gods) means obedience (or apostasy). Hence Jesus does not just ask his disciples to follow him. He demands total commitment with a view to entry into the kingdom. This means self-denial (Mk. 8:34; cf. Mt. 26:24; Lk. 9:23) in cross-bearing and self-surrender. When the call to "go after" is heard (Mk. 1:17), there can be no going back (Lk. 9:62; cf. Mk. 13:16). Discipleship means belonging exclusively to Christ. A warning is issued to avoid going after false Christs (Lk. 21:8). On the other hand, the Pharisees complain that the world has gone after Christ (Jn. 12:19). In other verses Gamaliel refers to Judas drawing people after him (Acts 5:37), Paul warns against false teachers who draw disciples after them (20:30), 1 Tim. 5:15 says that some believers go astray after Satan, Rev. 13 refers to following the beast, Jud hóplon. Originally meaning “implement,” this word comes to be used for 1. “ship’s tackling,” “cable,” “rope,” 2. “tool,” 3. “weapon,” and 4. “troops,” or “camp.” It is used figuratively for weapons of both offense and defense. In the LXX the general term often replaces more specific Hebrew words, e.g., for “spear” in Ps. 46:9. It is rare in the LXX in a figurative sense (cf. Ps. 57:4). God may use human weapons, but when he wishes he destroys these (Ps. 46:9), and lends his people his own weapons (Ps. 35:2). In Philo the figurative use predominates. The NT always has the word in the plural for “weapons.” Paul, describing his work as warfare, stresses the efficacy of his weapons (siege-engines) in 2 Cor. 10:4. Moral qualities seem to be the weapons of 2 Cor. 6:7, and in Rom. 6:13 the members of believers are to be weapons of righteousness. In Rom. 13:12 (cf. 1 Th. 5:8) the nearness of the parousia does not mean inertia but arming for the conflict, not merely with what is unnatural or immoral (cf. 1 Cor. 11:13ff.), but with satanic forces.

The early fathers follow the NT closely (cf. Ignatius To Polycarp 6.2; Clement of Alexandria Protrepticus 11. 116.3-4), but with a moralizing rather than an eschatological thrust.

hoplízō. This word means “to prepare,” e.g., provisions, meals, sacrifices, ships, lamps, or, in the case of soldiers, weapons. It then means “to prepare oneself,” “to train,” “to arm,” and figuratively, “to arm oneself with courage.” The only NT use (1 Pet. 4:1) is figurative; here the idea is that of arming oneself with a mind or thought in preparation for suffering.

1. Linguistic Data. This word is used variously for the soldier’s full equipment, for war material, for booty, and for the prize in contests. The only figurative use is in the biblical field.

2. Archaeological Data. The soldier’s equipment remains much the same for centuries but with minor variations, e.g., in the size of shields or the weight of armor. The Roman legionary carries a lance or spear, a shield, javelins, helmet, and breastplate or coat of mail. In the OT we read of shields, helmets, armor, shoes, spears, bows and arrows, and slings.

3. Religious Data.

a. Deity. Gods are often depicted as armed, e.g., with bows and arrows, clubs, nets, helmets, mail shirts, and chariots. The reference is often to such phenomena as storms and lightning. In Greece clouds are the shield and helmet of Zeus and lightning his sword. Apollo has a bow and arrows. In the OT God’s breastplate is righteousness and his helmet salvation (Is. 59:17). In Ps. 35:1ff. and Is. 34:6 etc. we read of the spear, javelin, bow, and shield of God in poetic references.

b. Human Share in the Divine Equipment. The idea of invincibility because of divinely given weapons is an ancient one (cf. Odin’s helmet as a cap of invisibility, or Achilles‘ armor, or Siegfried’s sword). In the OT God protects his people with his own weapons (cf. Pss. 7:1lff.; 35:1ff.). His faithfulness is a shield and buckler (Ps. 91:4). He gives power to the javelin of Joshua (Josh. 8:18, 26). The concept is moralized in the Iranian sphere. Philo believes that God has given rational speech to humans as a protection.

c. The Community panoplía. The Qumran Community sees itself in a situation of conflict in which the sons of light war with the sons of darkness. The community is God’s covenant people engaged in a military action in which it uses lances, spears, darts, and slings. The depiction gives new vividness to the parallel passages in Rom. 13:12 and Eph. 6:16.

4. panoplía in the NT. The word is used only figuratively in the NT. Luke has it in the parable of the overcoming of the strong man in 11:22. It occurs twice in the allegory of the Christian’s spiritual armor in Eph. 6:10ff. Here Paul takes his verbs from military speech, and he lists six items of equipment, i.e., girdle, breastplate, shoes, shield, helmet, and sword. He has in view the actual equipment of the Roman soldier along with OT models. Since the enemy is spiritual, the whole panoplía of God is needed. The background is the mythological one of God giving his own equipment, but the concept is spiritualized. In an ethical context, the apostle is describing a religious and moral battle. The weapons, however, are not moral qualities but divine realities. One’s whole existence depends on the outcome of this battle with the forces of evil, and one can triumph in it only in the Lord and the power of his might (v. 10).

5. The Early Church. Ignatius Polycarp 6.2 uses panoplía in a passage that contains several military terms, but here the word seems to mean “armor,” and the passage is less vivid and more moralistic than Eph. 6. Clement of Alexandria has the term in Stromateis 2.20.109.2 in a Stoic context.

I. Girdle and Girding in Graeco-Roman Antiquity.

1. The girdle is used in antiquity to fasten articles of clothing. In the passive the verb means "to be fastened"; the middle, "to gird oneself," "to tie on something," is common.

2. Richly decorated girdles are worn for adornment, especially by women.

3. The girdle serves as a pocket, e.g., for money, valuables, daggers.

4. The girdle is an item of military equipment, e.g., as a broad leather band for protection, as an apron under the armor, as a belt studded with metal, or as a sign of rank.

5. In a transferred sense the girdle is a sign of virginity among women. Loosing it can denote intercourse, and hence we have a use for marriage. The word also denotes the ocean as the girdle of the earth, and it carries a reference to the zones of the earth, the planetary spheres, and the angels of the zones. zōnnýnai may be used for an embrace in wrestling or of the ocean.

II. Girdle and Girding in the OT and Judaism.

1. The girdle is an article of clothing made of linen or leather. To gird up one's loins is to be ready for hasty departure (cf. Ex. 12:11) or for work (Prov. 31:17) or prophetic ministry (Jer. 1:17). Elijah wears a distinctive leather girdle (2 Kgs. 1:8; cf. 1 Kgs. 18:46).

2. Girdles are used for adornment (cf. the royal marshal in Is. 22:21, the high priest in Ex. 39:29, and the angel in Dan. 10:5). But they may also signify sorrow or disgrace, e.g., when made of sackcloth (Is. 3:24; 2 Sam. 3:31).

3. Girdles also serve as pockets (cf. Ezek. 9:2ff.).

4. Girdles serve as items of military equipment, e.g., to fasten underclothes, to distinguish officers, to protect the lower body (1 Kgs. 22:34), and to carry swords (1 Sam. 17:39).

5. Figuratively God binds Israel to himself as with a girdle. But he delivers it up to judgment in the form of Jeremiah's girdle (Jer. 13:11). The wicked are girdled by a curse (Ps. 109:19). God himself is girded with might (Ps. 65:6), and he girds the righteous with strength (Ps. 18:32) and joy (30:11). He also girds the hills with rejoicing (65:12). The messianic king will be girdled with righteousness and faithfulness (Is. 11:5). People gird themselves for battle or for work. Judaism refers to God's girding himself with mercy, love, and grace, and to Moses' girding himself with prayer.

III. Girdle and Girding in the NT.

1. In the NT the girdle is an article of clothing in Mt. 3:4, which tells us that the Baptist wears a leather girdle. Girding one's undergarment for work occurs in several parables (cf. Lk. 17:8; 12:37). In Lk. 12:35 disciples are to be ready for their master's unexpected return (cf. Ex. 12:11). In Jn. 13:4-5 Jesus girds himself to wash his disciples' feet. Peter fastens on his clothes in Jn. 21:7. The idea of preparing to set out is present in Acts 12:8. The contrast in Jn. 21:18 is between acting on one's own initiative and being bound and carried off by others (cf. Acts 21:11).

2. The angels wear girdles for adornment in Rev. 15:6, and Christ similarly wears a high girdle like that of the high priest in 1:13.

3. In Mk. 6:8 the disciples are to carry no money in their girdles.

4. The only use for armor is the figurative one in Eph. 6:14. The reference is probably to the breechlike apron of the Roman soldier. The truth here is neither reliability, nor subjective truthfulness, nor real fighting, nor even the gospel, but the divine reality that has come in the gospel and is put on by believers.

IV. Girdle and Girding in the Early Church. The words are uncommon in the early church. The aged Polycarp looses his girdle before execution (Mart. Pol. 13.2). Hermas refers to the girding of abstinence (Visions 3.8.4), virgins (Similitudes 9.2), and vices (Similitudes 9:9.5). Clement of Alexandria cites the girdles of Jeremiah, the Baptist, and Jesus as models of humility and contentment (Paedagogus 2.3.38.1,; 10.112.3-4; Stromateis 3.6.53.5). The liturgical girding of the tunic is an admonition to sexual abstinence.

1. Armor. In Greece we find various forms of armor from leather doublets (with metal studs) to bronze armor conforming to the body. The Romans also use coats of mail combining lightness and strength. Armor comes into Egypt from abroad. Goliath the Philistine wears a heavy coat of mail. In Israel armor is at first a privilege of the nobility but comes into general use under Uzziah (2 Chr. 26:14).

2. Chest, Trunk, Thorax. In a transferred sense thṓrox is used for the part of the body covered by armor.

3. The Metaphorical Use in the Bible.

a. The OT. The biblical metaphor originates in Is. 59:17 with its statement that God has put on righteousness like a breastplate, i.e., that he will deploy his full moral integrity to destroy evil and bring salvation in the sense both of justice (Am. 5:7) and of help (Ps. 5:8 etc.). Why the image of armor is chosen is not clear. Possibly putting it on denotes military initiative, and if so we are to think more of offensive than defensive action.

b. The NT. Paul alludes to Is. 59:17 in 1 Th. 5:8 and Eph. 6:14. In the former the breastplate is that of faith and love (and the helmet that of hope). The emphasis here, too, is on preparing for battle rather than on defense. In Ephesians the situation is different, for offensive weapons are also named. The breastplate is now that of righteousness, and what is in view is most likely the righteousness that we have before God by faith in Christ (Rom. 3:22). Enclosed in this, we are secure against all evil assaults (8:38-39). It issues, of course, in righteousness of life, and for this reason protects against temptation.

hypodéō (hypódēma, sandálion). The verb hypodéō means “to furnish with footgear,” middle “to put on sandals.” In the Near East and Greece people usually go barefoot or wear sandals. Sandals are put off for worship, mourning, and fasting. Slaves tie and untie them, and carry them when not needed. Assyrian soldiers wear laced boots, the Roman legionaries wear half-boots with strong soles, and in Rome shoes of leather, often expensive, are worn. John the Baptist is not even worthy to carry or untie the sandals of the mightier one who is to come (Mt. 3:11 and par.). The disciples are not to use hypodḗmata according to Mt. 10:10; Lk. 10:4, though Mk. 6:9 seems to permit sandália, which longer journeys make necessary. If it is hard to reconcile the two accounts, the point is that full commitment demands renunciation of all nonessentials. In Eph. 6:15 shoes are a necessary part of the believer’s armor. They represent a readiness to take the gospel of peace to the nations. The paradox that this message is the best way of fighting evil powers is in full keeping with the general outlook of Ephesians. Later Hermas sees the bride of Christ arrayed in white robes and sandals (Visions 4.2.1). Clement of Alexandria demands that women should avoid richly embroidered shoes, and that men should go barefoot; he also compares talkative Sophists to old shoes that are weak except for the tongue (Paedagogus 2.7.59.3; Stromateis 1.2.22.5).

thyreós. The thyreós is the ancient four-cornered long shield. The long shield comes in various shapes, but the reference is to the rectangular Greek shield which is almost a portable wall, which covers the whole person, and which poses the hard problem of reconciling strength and lightness. The Romans take over a later form of the long shield around 340 B.C. and retain it until the days of Constantine, who reverts to the round or oval form. The only NT use is the figurative one in Eph. 6:16. Describing faith as a shield, this verse has in view the divinely given reality (1 Cor. 13:13; 1 Th. 5:8) rather than a subjective attitude. Believers have a fellowship with God that hurls back all the attacks of the enemy (cf. 1 Jn. 5:4; 1 Pet. 5:9).

perikephalaía. This word, meaning “head covering,” is used in a military sense for the “helmet,” which in gladiatorial conflict is medically suspect because of its pressure, and which is a prize in some contests. Earlier times know only a leather cover with metal plates (cf. 1 Sam. 17:5). Metal helmets come into Israel later (2 Chr. 26:14). Greek soldiers wear bronze helmets, as do the Romans. The helmet is slung on a strap during marches and put on for battle. The only NT use (in 1 Th. 5:8 and Eph. 6:17) is figurative. Both are based on Is. 59:17, where God, or the Messiah, is the subject. In these verses believers are the subjects, the OT indicative becomes an imperative, and salvation has a more passive sense. The eschatological thrust is strong in 1 Th. 5:8, and in Eph. 6:17, too, the final deliverance that is assured to believers encompasses their heads like a helmet, so that they may confidently commit themselves to the battle against the sinister powers that would harass them. Ignatius Polycarp 6.2 also compares faith to a helmet, but with reference to the human attitude rather than the divine gift. [A. OEPKE, V, 292-315] horáō, eídon, blépō, optánomai, theáomai, theōréō.

A. Usage among the Greeks.

1. The Words.

a. horáō. While akoúō is virtually the only Greek word for hearing, there are various words for seeing. The first of these is horáō, which means "to look," "to see," "to experience," "to perceive," "to take note," "to see to," "to take care." The range of ideín is much the same, although, since it suggests presence, with tina it can also mean "to visit or meet someone."

b. blépō also means "to see" with a stronger emphasis on the function of the eye, so that it serves as the opposite of "to be blind." It can also be used for intellectual or spiritual perception, and in the absolute for insight.

c. optánomai is rare and late and has the sense "to be visible," "to appear."

d. theáomai suggests spectators and denotes attentive seeing, i.e., "to behold." Having a certain solemnity, it is used for visionary seeing and the apprehension of higher realities.

e. theōréō has primary reference to spectators at a religious festival, and thus means "to look at," "to view," with such additional senses as "to review (troops)," "to discover," "to recognize," and figuratively "to consider," "to contemplate," "to investigate."

2. Seeing in the Greek World and Hellenism. The Greeks are a people of the eye, and seeing is important to them. It has strong significance in their religion, which is a religion of vision. (If theōréō is derived from theós, and first means "watching over" the god, this is even more true, but that derivation is unlikely.) Quite early there is a transition from sensory to intellectual and spiritual perception. The two are seen to be linked, but there is also a sense of the limits of sensory seeing. Mythology allows that the gods can be seen, but only in a visionary manner to a few, and then in a frightening way. Philosophy stresses the invisibility of the gods, and Plato with his world of ideas finds an antithesis between horán and noeín. True reality is accessible only to the noús; this alone can comprehend God. Yet this comprehension is still viewed as a kind of seeing, especially in the form of theōreín. For Aristotle seeing is the most spiritual sense, since it gives access to light. As Plato thinks that we contemplate God with the eye of the soul, so for Aristotle the true goal of life is contemplative self-giving to God, for God's own mode of being and working consists of pure theōría. The divine is something to be contemplated, not heard and believed. Thus philosophy transposes into an intellectual key something that is a historical reality in Greek religion. The visual is important in the mysteries as well. True bliss is to see the rites and enjoy visionary experiences. Gnosticism accepts the invisibility of God but believes that deification by gnṓsis brings the vision of God. In the Hermetic writings this comes only with death, although it may be possible in this life for a few Gnostics. Hearing the teacher is merely a preparation for ecstatic vision. In magical papyri formulas and actions are offered for forcing gods and demons to manifest themselves and thus come under control.

B. Usage and Concept in the LXX and Judaism.

I. LXX.

1. Meaning of the Terms.

a. horáō. With eídon (930 times), horáō (520 times) covers most of the references to seeing. The future ópsomai is common (178 times), while the present (110) and perfect (97) are balanced. The main Hebrew original for both verbs is rā'āh (over 400 times for horáō, and 670 times for eídon). Figuratively water, the sea, and the earth may be said to see (Pss. 77:16; 114:3; 97:4). The dead will never again see the light (Ps. 49:19). When seeing and hearing occur together, the reference is usually to recognition or understanding (Job 13:1). Either may come first, for God has created both (Prov. 20:12). Yet seeing may be contrasted with mere hearsay (Ps. 48:8; Job 42:5). In the intransitive passive sense ("to show oneself," "to appear"), the meaning is usually "to be present" (cf. the fixed expression "to appear before God"). The thought of seeing God's face is rare (cf. Ex. 33:20), and the LXX normally has in view a spiritual encounter, though cf. Ps. 17:15. In ordinary use "seeing the face" usually means "to visit," "to meet," or, at court, "to be granted an audience." horáō and eídon often denote spiritual perception in such senses as "to observe" (Gen. 16:4-5), "to perceive" (26:28), "to experience" (Jer. 5:12), and "to encounter" (God's works in history, Ex. 34:10). Thus "seeing God's glory" means receiving the revelation of God in his glory (Ps. 97:6; Is. 26:10). The more concrete ophthḗnai is used in Ex. 16:10 because the glory appears in a cloud, but the cloud is only a veil, so that the verb denotes the presence itself, not the manner of the presence. The parallelism of Ex. 16:6 and 16:7 ("to know" and "to see the glory") shows that sensory perception of the glory is not the issue (cf. Is. 40:5).

b. blépō occurs over 130 times, 38 in Ezekiel (35 of these for geographical or architectural directions; cf. Num. 21:20; Josh. 18:14). In the main the Hebrew original is the same as for horáō. Ability to see is mostly in view, including ability to perceive. God is the subject in Ps. 10:11. Prophetic vision is at issue in Am. 8:2; Zech. 4:2; 5:2.

c. optánomai is rare. It occurs in 1 Kgs. 8:8 (the poles could not be "seen from outside"). We also find the intransitive passive in Num. 14:14 (God "is seen").

d. theáomai occurs eight times (with a Hebrew original only in 2 Chr. 22:6: "to visit"). The sense is that of seeing with astonishment, of contemplating God's acts, and of seeing Jerusalem's future glory.

e. theōréō occurs some 56 times, often with other verbs of seeing as alternative readings. In Daniel (13 times) the reference is usually to visionary seeing, but sense perception is the point in Josh. 8:20; Judg. 13:9-10, and "to live" is what is meant in Eccl. 7:11. Watching as a spectator is the meaning in Judg. 16:27 and Ps. 68:24. Actual seeing is less prominent in Ps. 73:3, but only in Wis. 6:12; 13:5 does the term mean "to perceive."

2. The Significance of Seeing in OT Proclamation. As regards the distinction between sensory and spiritual seeing, the compass of verbs of seeing is much the same in Greek and Hebrew. When God is said to see, sensory perception is not in view; there are few anthropomorphisms in the narrower sense (cf. Gen. 6:12; Ex. 12:13), for it is only poetically that the Psalms and prophets refer to God's seeing. The verbs of seeing, like those of hearing, embrace many meanings that have little to do with actual seeing, although in the main it seems that in the relationship with God and his revelation hearing is regarded as more important than seeing. The main uses are as follows.

a. Visionary Prophetic Seeing. horáō and eídon are the words for prophetic visions. Prophets are called seers, and for this term ho horōn is used in 2 Sam. 24:11; 2 Kgs. 17:3, etc. The OT, however, does not record visions in the case of the seers; their revelations are by word (2 Sam. 24:11). The dreams in Gen. 37:9 etc. are purely visual and need interpretation. If they are accepted as impartations of the divine will, they are not manifestations of God. The visions of Zechariah are inner perceptions. The mark of authentic visions is that in them the prophets are recipients, not authors; they cannot induce them by prayer, sacrifice, etc. There is no specific term for auditions, and hórasis may apply to more than visual elements, possibly because seeing is more important at first, then yields to hearing as the great prophets hear God's own word but never see God himself in their visions, only creatures or creaturely processes. Ezekiel sees the glory of God but does not describe it. Dan. 7:8 mentions the Ancient of Days but again without description, for the fate of the empires is the real point of the vision. Am. 9:1 is purely introductory. If Is. 6:1 is unique, here again there is no description, and in 1 Kgs. 22:19 the real reference is to the true word of God that Micaiah is to deliver to Ahab.

b. Theophanies. Num. 12:6, 8 makes it plain that there is a difference between prophetic vision and the more direct theophany in Moses' case. Yet even Moses does not see God directly (Ex. 33:11). In Ex. 3:2 the angel (or God himself) appears to Moses in the bush, but Moses veils his face, and if 3:16 says that God has appeared to him, this simply means that he has manifested himself as present, as also to Abraham etc. In Ex. 24:10 a select group ascends the mountain and sees God, but the LXX softens the realism. In Ex. 33:18ff. the basic principle is that to see God directly is to die because of the divine holiness; hence Moses is permitted only an indirect vision. The same principle appears in Ex. 19:21, and cf. Gen. 32:30; Judg. 6:22ff., where it is only by God's special grace that the rule does not apply. In instances like Gen. 12:7; 17:1, etc. God is simply heard, and the introductory ṓphthē indicates the presence of the God who reveals himself in his word. These are not, then, attenuated theophanies.

c. Seeing God in a Transferred Sense. Often seeing God is in a transferred sense. Thus Ps. 17:15 refers to the certainty of God's proximity, while in Sir. 15:7 the meaning is perception. In Job 23:9 Job sees no sign that God is taking note of him, in 34:29 seeing God means certainty of his grace, and in 42:5 the reference is to spiritual understanding. Job 19:26-27 raises the question of seeing God after death. 23:9 and 35:14 suggest that the point might be seeing God's grace again in this life, but even if the reference is to the future the idea is probably that God's grace still sustains Job after death. In Is. 60:2 there will be a future vision of the divine glory, but again with reference more to God's revealing presence than to eschatological vision.

a. Words. horáō (with eídon) is for Philo the most important verb of seeing. The future and the passive are rare, and there is ophthḗnai of God only in OT quotations. horáō may denote sensory seeing (except in the case of God), but its main use is for spiritual perception. The words and voice of God are visible in this sense, and horáō (with theōréō) may thus be used for "seeing" God. blépō has primary reference to sense perception and is seldom used of God. In a transferred sense it may be applied to the noús, and Philo can use ho blépōn for Israel and hoi blépontes for the prophets. theáomai is used for intensive looking and occurs in relation to visions and seeing God. theōréō mostly means "to consider," "to perceive," and passive "to show." theōría is common for "perception" and also as the opposite of praxís, while theṓrēma (almost always plural) has the meaning "view" or "doctrine."

b. The Significance of Seeing. Adopting Plato's dualism, Philo has a poor view of the senses. The chief of these are seeing and hearing. Seeing as perception of the noetic world is superior to hearing, but as an agent in human development, not as a response to revelation. Does this mean that Philo has in view a vision of God? His exposition of the OT passages is inconclusive, and his references to deification and vision are counterbalanced by references to the divine invisibility and unknowability. Since the latter references are more common, and Philo says that we see only the fact and not the nature of God's existence, he seems to speak of the vision of God only with qualifications.

2. Josephus. In Josephus the primary emphasis is on sensory seeing and the related mental perception. blépō and theōréō are less common; the former is often used figuratively for "to note," "to observe," while the latter signifies "to view" (as a witness), "to be present" (as a spectator). When directions are received in dreams, this is not a seeing of God, for God is intrinsically invisible for Josephus.

III. The Pseudepigrapha and Rabbinism.

1. The Pseudepigrapha. In apocalyptic seeing is important, but angels explain the visions, so that hearing is the climax. Even when God is seen, as in Eth. En. 14:15ff., this leads up to God's word. The vision of God is not an end in itself. God's glory is seen in heavenly wonders. The eschatological vision hinted at in places is vision of God's glory, or face, or salvation. In Jub. 1:28 God will appear to all eyes in the last time.

2. Rabbinism. The rabbis lay the stress on hearing, as the OT does. They are thus opposed to the idea of ecstatic vision. At most they speak of seeing the face of the Shekinah. This is eschatological vision, but it may come in the days of the Messiah. God himself is invisible, so that even angels cannot see him. Greeting the face of the Shekinah may take place in this life through attending the temple or synagogue, studying the law, or giving alms.

C. Usage and Concept in the NT.

1. Review of the Words.

a. horáō and eídon. In the NT horáō and eídon are the most common verbs of seeing. The former occurs some 113 times, the latter some 350 times in the Gospels, Acts, and Revelation. eídon is less common in John, mainly because the perfect heṓraka is preferred. John uses theōréō instead of the present horáō, which is generally uncommon, being replaced elsewhere by blépō. The two verbs horáō and eídon have a broad range of meaning. God is said to "see" in Acts 7:34. horáō is used for "seeing" Christ in Jn. 3:11; 6:46; 8:38. To see means to "speak to" in Jn. 12:21. The distinction in Phil. 1:27, 30 does not imply any antithesis between seeing and hearing, and if seeing is more highly estimated in Jn. 8:38, seeing and hearing constitute the totality of perception in Mk. 4:12; Mt. 13:14-15; Acts 28:26-27; Rom. 11:8. For the most part seeing comes first in such cases, but hearing is first in Lk. 2:20; Jn. 5:37. For brevity seeing alone is mentioned in, e.g., Jn. 12:40; Rom. 11:10. Seeing signs is equivalent to hearing the message in Acts 8:6 (and cf. Jn. 11:45), but the desire to see signs may also denote resistance to the message (Mt. 12:38; Lk. 23:8). Often the verbs mean “to perceive” in such senses as “to experience,” “to note,” “to establish,” “to realize,” “to know,” “to judge,” “to mark,” “to heed.”

b. blépō. This word occurs some 137 times, mostly in the present. It first denotes ability to see as distinct from blindness (Mt. 12:22; 15:31; Mk. 8:23-24; Lk. 7:21; Jn. 9). Seeing the book in Rev. 5:3-4 includes reading. Scrutiny is implied in Mt. 22:16. God’s seeing in Mt. 6:4 is a secret one. Jesus sees the Father’s works in Jn. 5:19 (cf. 8:38). Angels see the face of God in Mt. 18:10. Empirical seeing is the point in Rom. 8:24-25; 2 Cor. 4:18; Heb. 11:1ff. Figuratively blépō can mean “to note,” “to perceive” (Rom. 7:23; Col. 2:5). It is rare for visionary seeing (Acts 12:9; Rev. 1:11-12). It is not used for appearances of the risen Lord or for eschatological vision; in Acts 1:9, 11 it denotes full participation rather than mere sensory perception, and in 1 Cor. 13:12 the image of the mirror shows that the use is metaphorical even in the second half of the statement, which also does not mention God as the object. Only in Mt. 18:10 and Jn. 5:19 is blépein used for seeing God.

c. optánomai. This word occurs only in Acts 1:3 with reference to the resurrection appearances. It is used because an appearing comprising many proofs demands a present participle.

d. theáomai. This word occurs 22 times. It suggests a more intimate visit in Rom. 15:24 (compared to ideín in 1:11). It means “to look over” in Mt. 22:11, is more graphic than ideín in 11:7-8, stresses the element of loving regard in 28:1, and brings out the importance of the meeting in Lk. 5:27. Attentive regard is implied in Acts 21:27. The use in John has a certain solemnity in 6:5, and the same applies in 1:14, where it denotes not just the seeing of witness but the seeing of faith. theáomai is never used in the NT for seeing God.

e. theōréō. This verb occurs 58 times (24 in John and 14 in Acts). In John the present theōréō seems to be used instead of horáō. It has the original sense “to watch” in Mt. 27:55. The chief sense in Acts is “to perceive” (4:13; 17:16, etc.). In Jn. 6:19; 20:6, 12, 14 sense perception is at issue, but “to perceive or recognize” is the point in 4:19; 12:9, and “to know or experience” in 8:51, and possibly in 17:24 in an eschatological sense.

2. The Significance of Seeing in NT Proclamation.

a. General. As in the LXX, there are in the NT more instances of verbs of seeing (680) than of hearing (425), yet hearing is more important. The NT has little interest in the physiology or psychology of seeing, and since it makes no distinction between the sensory and the spiritual, it readily accepts seeing as a function in revelation. If more blind people than deaf people are healed in the Gospels (Mt. 9:27ff.; Mk. 8:22-23, etc.), this is most likely because eye afflictions are more common, not because sight is more important or Jesus wants eyewitnesses.

b. Eyewitness: Faith and Sight. Mt. 13:16 seems to commend eyewitness, but the reference to eyes and ears (cf. Lk. 11:27) does not necessarily stress sense perception. The point is rather that those who have the privilege of seeing and hearing should not fail to attain to true seeing and hearing (cf. Mt. 13:14-15). Underlying the saying is the conviction that the age of salvation has come with Jesus, and that a right decision must be made in the light of it. Lk. 1:2 bases the truth of the gospel on a tradition that goes back to eyewitnesses. Eyewitness here includes ministry of the word and thus comprises both seeing what took place and understanding its significance as revelation (cf. Jn. 20:31). It is authentic, then, only when the imperative of faith is present as well as the privilege of sight. The stress on eyewitness in 2 Pet. 1:18 is unusual, and the statements in Jn. 1:14 and 1 Jn. 1:1 include more than eyewitness, for what follows is no mere report but proclamation. The Gospels omit many details (the appearance of Jesus, scenery, etc.), for their focus is on the words (hearing) and acts (seeing) of Jesus. Word and work (hearing and seeing) constitute the full historicity and totality of the event of revelation. Hearing is primary, but seeing is a kind of hearing, for if dependence on a certain kind of seeing is unbelief (Mk. 15:32), seeing, too, can and should lead to faith (Jn. 11:40). In Jn. 20:24ff., while the reference is to seeing the risen Lord, the statement in v. 29 has more general validity (cf. 1 Pet. 1:8). As the first eyewitness is oriented to proclamation, so proclamation rests on the first eyewitness as a safeguard of historicity. Thus the seeing of the disciples becomes the hearing of later believers (1 Cor. 15:3; Rom. 10:16ff.). It is no longer essential that those who preach the gospel should be themselves witnesses. A contrast arises between what is seen and what is not seen (2 Cor. 4:18). What is seen is perishing, but what is not seen—and this includes not merely what is yet to come but inner renewal by the operation of the Spirit and the powers of the coming age—is eternal. Similarly the object of faith and hope in Rom. 8:24-25 is not yet seen, for otherwise faith and hope would be unnecessary. Believers have a present sonship in faith, but they are still hoping for eschatological sonship as a visible entity. In Heb. 11:1 the things not seen, qualifying the things hoped for, are future things. In incidental contrast is the visible world of v. 3, which is created, as faith perceives, by the nonvisible word of God.

c. Visionary Prophetic Seeing. Dream-revelations are rare in the NT. In Mt. 1:20 etc. Joseph is given verbal directions by the angel, so that these are not true visions. The same applies in Lk. 1:11; Acts 7:2-3; 9:10; 18:9; 23:11. God does not speak directly here, as in OT parallels, but either an angel or the Lord (Acts 9:10 etc.). There is no ecstatic element, nor are there any theophanies except in the quotation in Acts 7:2. A voice speaks in Mt. 3:17 and parallels, but only in Acts 7:31 do we have direct mention of the voice of God. Angels appear in the infancy stories (Lk. 1:11-12), but only as heralds of the divine action. In Lk. 22:43-44 the appearing of the angel simply implies that an angel comes to help Jesus, not that he has a vision of an angel. In the resurrection stories angels are seen again, this time as agents of proclamation. Jn. 20:12 is the only angelophany in John (unless we include the thunder of 12:29). Acts 1:10 belongs to the resurrection group. The angel that comes to Cornelius in 10:3 bears a message (cf. 8:26). In 5:19-20; 12:7ff. angels bring release from prison and explanatory messages. 12:9 shows that what takes place is real even though it belongs to the suprasensory realm. In Acts 10:10ff. we are specifically told that Peter is in a trance, so that we have a parallel to the prophetic visions of the OT. Visions of future events occur in Revelation, but we learn from 1:3; 22:7, etc. that what is intended is prophecy rather than apocalyptic, and in the last analysis the word predominates (22:6, 8). Paul has ecstatic experiences, but to clear up eschatological questions he appeals to words (1 Th. 4:15) or disclosed mysteries (1 Cor. 15:51). In 2 Cor. 12:1ff. "revelations" seem to be the key term (v. 7), and the stress is again on things that Paul heard (v. 4). What the revelations are, Paul does not say, but he does not include the Damascus experience. If Paul does not mention the Spirit in this connection (cf. Rev. 1:10; 4:2), this aspect is plain in Acts 7:55 when Stephen sees heaven opened and the Son of Man standing at God's right hand. In the life of Jesus the only visionary element is in the baptism story, in which he sees the Spirit descending (Mt. 3:16) and hears the voice from heaven (3:17). We have here two sides of a common event. On the one side is the assurance that Jesus is the divine Son and Messiah; on the other the perceived imparting of the Spirit at the beginning of his ministry as such. Materially the revelation by word is primary. The transfiguration is not to be regarded as an ecstatic experience of Jesus himself. The terms used leave open what form of seeing is intended. Lk. 9:32 shows that the disciples are awake during the experience. Neither the transfiguration nor the voice is for the sake of Jesus himself, so that we might have here a shared visionary process, although a real transfiguration is not to be ruled out. The eschatological form and orientation make it unlikely that the transfiguration is an emergence of preexistent glory; the primary reference is more probably to the form that Jesus will have as Messiah-Son of Man at the parousia.

d. The Resurrection Appearances. We have accounts of resurrection appearances in Mt. 28:9-10, 16ff.; Lk. 24:13ff., 36ff., 50ff.; Jn. 20:14ff., 19ff., 24ff.; 21:1ff.; Acts 1:4ff., and cf. Paul's conversion. The appearances are all isolated, and in Acts 9:3; 22:6 Jesus seems to come from heaven. No appearance is said to have occurred during sleep, so the appearances are not dream-visions. Indeed, they do not take place by night. Again, they are always linked with revelations by word. At times the Lord's corporeality is viewed more literally (Lk. 24:39-40), at times more spiritually (Lk. 24:36). In 2 Cor. 12:1 Paul does not include the Damascus experience among his visions (in spite of the optasía of Acts 26:19; cf. 22:17-18). If he sees the Lord according to 1 Cor. 9:1, it is because God reveals his Son to him (Gal. 1:16). In 1 Cor. 15:3ff. Paul says that Jesus "appeared" (cf. Lk. 24:34; Acts 9:17). The stress is on revelation rather than on actual seeing; Jesus shows himself, and those to whom he does so experience his presence. The Damascus experience is for Paul similar to the prior experiences during the 40 days. The object of the appearances is the risen and exalted Lord, who is thus the basis of faith and the community. The disciples do not mistake the appearances for the parousia. Hence one should not stress the analogy of the visual element in the two cases. In the case of the parousia, the important thing is the coming rather than the seeing; the visual element in the appearances, which is stronger, is neither proleptic of eschatological events nor influenced by them.

e. Johannine Seeing. Jn. 6:62 does not refer to the ascension as such, but to the exaltation of Jesus by way of the cross. It thus has in view the spiritual perception that demands decision. When this seeing achieves its goal, it means faith and eternal life (6:40). In 16:10, 16-17, 19, however, the reference is to seeing the earthly life and then the resurrection (or parousia). Yet in view of the mention of the Spirit this seeing, too, denotes encounter through the Spirit's ministry. The world does not see Jesus because it resists the Spirit's work (14:19). When Jesus and his disciples are said to see the Father, this seeing cannot be integrated into the usual parallelism of seeing and hearing in John. There is, of course, a distinction between Jesus' seeing of the Father and the disciples‘ seeing of the Father, for it is Jesus himself who reveals the Father to the disciples (12:45; 14:9). Jesus reveals the Father in a unique way (12:45); hence seeing the Father involves submission to his revelation in Jesus (14:9). Both the historicity of the event and the pre- and postexistence of Jesus are involved. For John seeing is the seeing of faith; indeed, it is faith, although this does not have to mean that it is an anticipation of eschatological seeing. Its more probable significance is that for John verbs of seeing bring out the personal element in the encounter with Jesus.

f. The Vision of God. Since God is seen in the Son, Jn. 1:18 is not contesting previous theophanies but simply saying that God reveals himself exclusively through the Son. The Son has immediate access to the Father (6:46); others know God, whether through hearing or seeing, by means of the Son. The point is not that the invisible God becomes visible, but that God reveals himself. 1 Jn. 4:12 (cf. v. 20; 1 Tim. 6:16) maintains the intrinsic invisibility of God. God makes himself known through his works (Rom. 1:19-20), but supremely through the Son who is his image (Col. 1:15). At the end there will still not be direct vision but complete revelation. Future vision will differ from present possibilities (cf. the seeing of 1 Cor. 13:12 which goes hand in hand with faith), but God is not named in 1 Cor. 13:12 as the direct object of sight. Vision and sonship are related in Mt. 5:18 and (eschatologically) in 1 Jn. 3:2. Vision and sanctification also go hand in hand in these verses, so that the presupposition is full divine likeness (not deification by vision) at the consummation. In a book that is oriented to the visual Rev. 22:4 also refers to a final seeing of the face of God (and cf. the exhortation in Heb. 12:14). The NT speaks of the vision of God only with great restraint and in the light of the saving revelation of God in Christ. This promise is so unsurpassably great that it is not lightly repeated and thus rings out the more joyfully, as in 1 Jn. 3:2.

D. Usage and Concept in the Apostolic Fathers. The apostolic fathers use verbs of seeing (some 265 instances compared to 170 of hearing) in much the same way as the NT. God sees (1 Clem. 28:1), but we humans cannot see God except figuratively (Diog. 8.5-6). We may know God from his visible works (1 Clem. 60. 1), and God reveals himself by way of the incarnation because we could not have stood direct vision (Barn. 5.10). Jesus will be seen at the parousia, and eschatological fellowship with him is a form of seeing (Barn. 7.9.11).

1. These words, meaning “visible” and “invisible,” are important words in Greek philosophy as they become slogans for the sensory world and the world of ideas.

2. Both terms are very rare in the LXX. horatós means “handsome” in 2 Sam. 23:21 (and cf. Job 37:21; 34:26). aóratos is used in Gen. 1:2, and we find aorátous in Is. 45:3, but God is not called aóratos.

3. Philo has horatós over 70 times (often with a negative), and aóratos over 100 times. He adopts and extends the view of Plato. Invisible powers are at work in the cosmos. The noús is invisible. But so especially are God and the divine nature and spirit. Josephus uses aóratos for places that are not, or ought not to be, seen. The soul cannot be seen, but it moves the body. There are no direct rabbinic equivalents for the terms.

4. The NT uses horatós only in Col. 1:16 (with aóratos). tá horatá here seems to denote the whole earthly sphere, including the stars, and other heavenly phenomena, while tá aórata are the heavenly powers which, while created, share God’s invisibility and seek dominion in the human sphere (cf. Eph. 6:12). Elsewhere aóratos relates only to God. Invisibility is a divine predicate in the doxology in 1 Tim. 1:17. It is the invisible God who is seen in Heb. 11:27; faith enables Moses to accept him as the supreme reality in his demands and promises. Paul in Rom. 1:20 refers to the invisible nature of God which is manifested in his works. Creation does not make God visible, but reveals him. This is also the purpose of Christ as the image of God in 2 Cor. 4:4.

5. In the apostolic fathers God is invisible in 2 Clem. 20.5; Diog. 7.2; Ignatius Magnesians 3.2. The earthly life of Jesus makes visible the preexistent Christ (Ignatius Polycarp 3.2). In Diog. 6.4 the invisible soul is guarded by the visible body. Ignatius Polycarp 2.2 makes a distinction between things phenomenal and things invisible, and Ignatius Smyrneans 6.1 refers to visible and invisible angelic powers.

hórasis. This word means “seeing,” “sight” (plural “eyes”), later “appearance,” and in the biblical sphere “vision.” It is common in the LXX (some 110 times, 38 in Ezekiel and 18 in Daniel) in such senses as “sight,” “appearance,” “vision.” Philo has it over 70 times for the sense or process of “sight.” He often prefers ópsis, as does Josephus. The NT uses it twice for “appearance” in Rev. 4:3, and also for “vision” (Rev. 9:17; Acts 2:17; cf. Joel 2:28). In the apostolic fathers it means “eyesight” (2 Clem. 1.6), “spectacle” (7.6), and “vision” (Hermas Visions 2-4).

hórama. This word means “what is to be seen,” “spectacle,” “appearance,” “vision.” The LXX uses it 43 times, often for “vision” (cf. Daniel). In the NT it occurs in Mt. 17:9 for what the disciples have seen at the transfiguration. In ten instances in Acts (9:10, 12; 10:3, 17, 19; 11:5; 12:9; 16:9-10; 18:9) it means “vision,” but often with only a formal emphasis on the visionary aspect (9:10, 12, etc.). In the apostolic fathers the phrase in Hermas Visions 4.1.3 is reminiscent of 2 Cor. 12:1. The only other examples are in Hermas Visions 3.4 (twice plural; at night in 3.10.6).

optasía. This noun is an uncommon one. It occurs only four times in the LXX in the sense “appearing” (cf. Esth. 4:17; Mal. 3:2). In Lk. 1:22; 24:23 it refers to angelophanies, and the Damascus appearance is called a heavenly optasía in Acts 26:19. There is little emphasis on the visionary aspect in either Luke or Acts; the stress lies on the revelation by word and the demand for obedience. Paul himself does not use the autóptēs. This term has the sense of "eyewitness" ("seeing for oneself"). It does not occur in the LXX but Josephus uses it. The only NT instance is in Lk. 1:2. Stylistically there are parallels for this, but materially the statement shows that for the tradition it is an inner necessity that eyewitnesses should be mentioned as normative carriers.

epóptēs, epopteúō. The noun has such meanings as "spectator," "observer," then "overseer." In the mysteries it denotes "one who comes to have a share in vision." The verb means "to view," "to inspect," "to consider," and in the mysteries "to have the rank of an epóptēs." The noun occurs in the LXX to indicate that God takes note of things (cf. Esth. 5:1; 2 Macc. 3:39), but the verb is not used. Philo uses neither noun nor verb, and Josephus has only compounds. The NT uses the verb in 1 Pet. 2:12; 3:2. Gentiles take note of the conduct of Christians, and when they see their good deeds they will glorify God or be won over. There is no relation here to the use in the mysteries, nor is epóptēs in 2 Pet. 1:16 dependent on this use, for the sense of "spectator" or "observer" is adequate enough in context; the specific element of "eyewitness" is not too strongly emphasized by the word in isolation. God is epóptēs in 1 Clem. 59.3 and pantepóptēs in 55.6; he sees and knows all human deeds.

1. This word means "apple of the eye," "eye" (mostly plural), and figuratively "what is most dear." Many phrases bring out the importance of the eye, and we also find references to seeing with the eyes of the noús or kardía (mind or heart).

2. The LXX uses the word some 700 times, often for human perception or judgment, or for divine perception (cf. Dt. 11:12). The eyes can be the seat of evil impulses (cf. Prov. 6:17; 10:10; 30:13; Job 31:1, 7).

3. Philo uses the word some 130 times, over 100 literally for "seeing" or "sight." He seldom speaks about the eyes of God and mostly uses ómma figuratively for the mental eyes. The pseudepigrapha refer to the eyes of God, but also say that human eyes may reveal an adulterous or covetous nature. The rabbis, too, speak about evil or good eyes and refer to seeing the seducer in the eye.

4. The NT employs the word some 100 times. As the organ of sight it occurs in relation to the blind and their healing (cf. also the blinding in Acts 9:8). The eyes are heavy in Mt. 26:43, and tears are wiped off them in Rev. 7:17. The parable of the mote and the beam (or the speck and the log, Mt. 7:3ff.) is a warning against judging others. The OT rule of an eye for an eye is quoted in Mt. 5:38, but with an admonition to replace strict justice with love. The function of the eye is the basis of the image in Mt. 6:22-23, which considers the possibility that the eye might be sound or unsound, with a moral reference (cf. Test. Iss. 4:6). That the eyes may entice to sin is stated in 1 Jn. 2:16, and cf. 2 Pet. 2:14. The eye may also be a cause of offense according to Mt. 5:29. Under OT influence the eye is associated with eyewitness in Mt. 13:16; Lk. 2:30; 1 Jn. 1:1; Rev. 1:7. In connection with the resurrection appearances there is no special singling out of sight (cf. Lk. 24:16, 31; Acts 1:9); the crucial point is spiritual rather than sensory perception. God grants enlightenment to the eyes of the heart (cf. Acts 26:18; 1 Jn. 2:11; Eph. 1:18). Only rarely does the NT refer to the eyes of God (cf. 1 Pet. 3:12; Heb. 4:13).

5. In the apostolic fathers ophthalmós is rare except for ten references in 1 Clement. The Martyrdom of Polycarp applies "eyes of the heart" to martyrs. 1 Cor. 2:9 is quoted in 1 Clem. 34:8; 2 Clem. 11:7; Mart. Pol. 2:3. ómmata occurs only in 1 Clem. 19.3.

1. This word means “to look down,” then more generally “to view,” and figuratively “to perceive,” “to note,” “to look over,” “to give attention to.”

2. The LXX uses kathoráō four times and kateídon four times, usually for sense perception or anthropomorphically for God’s looking down from heaven (Job 10:4).

3. Philo uses kathoráō 34 times with a greater emphasis on intellectual perception, as is shown by the objects, by the fact that God may be the subject, and by the link with diánoia (although not with noús). In Josephus, on the other hand, sense perception is mostly at issue, although we also find the transferred meaning “to perceive,” “to inspect.”

4. The only NT use of kathoráō is in Rom. 1:20. Since the construction here rules out sense perception prior to intellectual apprehension, what seems to be meant is sense perception that is at the same time apprehension (nooúmena kathorátai). Hence the poiḗmata are not just empirical phenomena but phenomena or processes that must be considered in a way that combines sensory and intellectual perception, e.g., God’s works in history. The context seems to make it plain that true perception of these is not a possibility that is naturally available to sinners (cf. v. 19); it depends on the divine action in self-revelation. This is no less necessary at the level of general revelation than special revelation.

prooráō, proeídon. This word means “to see before, ahead, earlier, in advance,” and hence “to provide for.” The middle means “to have before one’s eyes,” “to have seen in advance” (cf. God’s advance knowledge of human ways and deeds). Philo uses the term for foreseeing the future. This is possible for God but not for us. Josephus agrees (except in the case of the prophets), but he also uses the term for foreseeing and taking precautions against dangers. In the NT Acts 2:31 says that David as a prophet has advance knowledge of the resurrection of Jesus. Acts 2:25 quotes Ps. 16:8 to the same effect. The meaning in Acts 21:29 is “to have seen earlier.” Gal. 3:8 refers to the foreseeing of Scripture. problépomai has the same sense of “foreseeing” in Heb. 11:40 (with God as subject). In the apostolic fathers the sense in Ignatius Trallians 8.1 is that of foreseeing dangers and taking precautions against them. [W. MICHAELIS, V, 315-82]

orgḗ [anger, wrath], orgízomai [to be angry], orgílos [angry, quick-tempered], parorgízō [to make angry], parorgismós [anger, wrath]

A. Wrath in Classical Antiquity.

1. The Meaning of orgḗ.

a. orgḗ, which denotes “upsurging” (of sap or vigor), comes to be used for “impulsive nature.” This is a tragic element in drama, since it inclines people to decisive acts. A demonic excess of will combines with fate to bring disaster.

b. A second and resultant meaning is “anger” as the most striking manifestation of impulsive passion. Unlike thymós, a complementary term, orgḗ is especially oriented to revenge or punishment. Thus it is applied to rulers who must avenge injustice.

c. There then develops the sense of “punishment.” Apart from this legitimate form, however, orgḗ is recognized to be an evil, or the source of other evils. Some philosophers regard it as natural and necessary, although only in moderation, but Stoicism lists it as a primary passion that should be completely eradicated.

II. The Wrath of the Gods in the Greek World. Wrathful and avenging deities have a firm place in Greek religion. The Furies call for retribution when the ties of nature (e.g., blood and family) are broken. Anger may be between the gods when there are conflicting claims, but it is also directed against humans when they are arrogant, or when they neglect such duties as sacrifice, hospitality, and honoring the dead. This anger, to which one had best submit, is not just blind rage but rests on a claim. In an odd sense it confers a negative dignity on its victims by marking them out or setting them within specified limits. At first words like chólos, kótos, and mḗnis are used for this divine anger, but tragedy begins to use orgḗ, making a distinction between divine and human wrath. Philosophy has some difficulty with the concept of divine wrath in view of its teaching that there must be no passion in deity. Yet Plato refers to the sufferings that fall on various races because of divine anger, and later philosophers, while critical of mythological conceptions, accept the idea of divine punishments. In popular belief the divine anger has a cultic connection as attempts are made to placate it, and phenomena such as storm and pestilence, as well as deformity and sickness, are accepted as plain evidences of the wrath of the gods or of demons.

III. The Wrath of the Gods in the Roman World. The Romans hold much the same views about the wrath of the gods as the Greeks, and their philosophers express the same reservations. Prodigies in particular manifest the divine wrath, and it results in famine, sickness, and plague. Cultic neglect is the common cause of the anger, and expiatory rites are devised to avert disaster. Prayers may be made for the direction of divine wrath against enemies, and those who take oaths call down divine wrath on themselves in case of perjury. Wrath falls especially on the impious, and this is one reason why, superstitiously, the Romans are ready to recognize the most varied cults. Political evils such as civil war and mutiny are also regarded as manifestations of divine wrath, and conquered cities or defeated enemies are seen as its victims. Should sacrifices and other rites be ineffectual in averting divine wrath, a voluntary sacrifice of the self is the supreme mode of expiation. Divine wrath plays a very significant role in Roman history and literature. For Tacitus the fortunes of Rome are bound up with it, and in the Iliad divine wrath is a controlling force that leads Aeneas to Rome. Wrath and fate are two sides of the same coin. The wrath of the gods, and its appeasing, give expression to the opposition and reverses, and their overcoming, which mark the fulfilment of historical destiny. This historical reference is the distinctive factor in the Roman view. [H. KLEINKNECHT, V, 382-92]

B. Human and Divine Wrath in the OT.

I. The Hebrew Terms. Hebrew is rich in terms for anger. a. The most common is ʼap̱, which has the basic sense of snorting; it is mostly used for divine anger (170 times), but also for human (40 times). b. Another word is ḥēmâ, which carries the sense of "heat" or "passion," and is often used for divine (90 times) or human (25) rage. c. Used only for God's wrath is ḥārâ in the phrase ḥ□rôn ʼap̱. d. Another word is ʻeḇrâ, and other terms include kāʻas, zāʻam, and zāʻap̱, all these express facets of wrath such as rage, indignation, chiding, etc. (For full details cf. TDNT, V, 392ff.) [O. GRETHER and J. FICHTNER, V, 392-94]

II. Human Wrath.

1. Against Others. While the same terms may denote divine and human wrath, there are important material differences in the two cases. The objects of human wrath are usually individuals, groups, nations, or their rulers. The wrath of other nations is a threat to Israel (Am. 1:11), but puny in face of God's protection (Is. 7:4). Human wrath is directed mostly against other people, and it is justified when not concerned only with self-interest (cf. 2 Sam. 12:5; Neh. 5:6). This is especially true when the cause of God is championed (cf. Moses in Ex. 16:20; Lev. 10:16, Elijah in 2 Kgs. 13:19, Elihu in Job 32:2, and Jeremiah in Jer. 6:11). Yet human anger may also be self-interested (e.g., Cain in Gen. 4:5, Esau in 27:44-45, Balak in Num. 24:10, Saul in 1 Sam. 20:30, Potiphar in Gen. 39:19).

2. Against God. Human anger may be directed against God when his dealings seem to be enigmatic or unjust (cf. Samuel in 1 Sam. 15:11, David in 2 Sam. 6:8, Job in 11:2-3 etc., and Jonah in Jon. 4:1ff.). The anger of the righteous at the prosperity of the wicked is finally directed against God (Ps. 37:1, 7-8; Prov. 3:31-32).

3. Evaluation. Proverbs measures human anger in terms of practical wisdom. It is dangerous in the light of its results (6:34; 15:1, etc.). We should wait for God to judge the wicked (24:19-20; cf. Ps. 37:7ff.). Patience is the true wisdom (Prov. 14:29), and anger is folly (14:17, 29). The wise see that human anger leads to injustice (14:17; cf. Jms. 1:20). Job's friends condemn his anger because it damages him (Job 18:4), undermines fear of God (15:4), and attacks God's justice (8:2-3). God endorses the verdict, although at much greater depth (38ff.), and Job himself repents (42:6).

III. Divine Wrath.

1. Linguistic Data. In the OT terms for wrath more commonly denote divine than human anger, especially in combinations which distinguish the wrath of God by its power. Wrath is consistently linked with Yahweh, the covenant God. Later there is a tendency to loosen the tight link with God. The absolute use of "wrath" in Chronicles calls for notice. Is. 63:5 distinguishes Yahweh and the wrath of Yahweh, but the next verse shows that this is poetic personification.

2. Objects. Israel knows only one God, with whom she stands in a special covenant relationship. The concept of divine wrath is thus controlled by the knowledge of faith with its historical perspective of past, present, and future. Israel does not deal with an irrational, impersonal force but with the personal divine will. This gives shape and vitality to what is said about wrath. A strong sense of the distance of God keeps the involved anthropopathism within proper limits. Wrath is not the same thing as judgment, for it has to do with a process or emotion within God. Yet this emotion affects, not his intrinsic being, but only his being in relation to the world and its entities.

The divine wrath is directed a. against Israel. It is a recurrent factor in the wilderness wanderings, the conquest, and the subsequent history. Where it falls on individuals such as Moses, Aaron, Miriam, kings or prophets (Ex. 4:14; Dt. 9:20; Num. 12:9; 1 Sam. 15; Jer. 21:1ff.), their representative function is usually at issue. But it may also fall on the people as a whole because of individual sins (cf. Achan in Josh. 7 or David in 2 Sam. 24). For some prophets, divine wrath is a primary theme, though they do not all use the word (cf. Amos). The aim of these prophets is to shatter a false sense of security (cf. Am. 3:2; Hos. 13:9ff.; Mic. 3:11; Zeph. 2:2). In particular Jeremiah and Ezekiel are prophets of the wrath of God. Wrath is less prominent after the exile, but cf. Hag. 1:5ff.; Zech. 1:3, 12.

b. Other nations and their rulers are also subject to divine wrath. Most of the prophets proclaim this (cf. Is. 13:3ff.; Jer. 50:13, 15; Ezek. 25:14). Psalms also sing of it (cf. 2:5, 11; 110:5). When it breaks forth, it affects the whole earth (Dt. 32:22).

3. Exercise. Various means are used to depict God's wrath, but it always threatens the existence of those concerned. The figures used express its destructive and irresistible force. Fire is a common metaphor (cf. Jer. 15:14). The storm is another symbol (cf. Jer. 30:23). Commonly it is said to be poured out like a fluid (Hos. 5:10). At times it is poured out like fire or burning pitch (Is. 30:33); at other times it is to be drunk (Jer. 25:15). God may vent his wrath through the nations (Is. 10:5; 13:5), but his own arm is also said to be the agent of his anger (Is. 30:30). His wrath is variously said to be kindled and stilled (Ezek. 5:13), brought or sent (2 Chr. 36:16; Job 20:23), and executed (1 Sam. 28:18). When it ends, God ceases from it (Ex. 32:12), or it is turned aside (Jer. 4:8), though the latter expression might denote only suspension. The final aim of divine wrath is total destruction in the form of historical defeat and banishment from the land. More detailed manifestations are temporary oppression, famine, plague, and drought. In its eschatological dimension it stands for the complete triumph of God. The day of God will be a day of wrath even for Israel (Am. 5:18ff.). Only by divine grace and forgiveness will some escape the judgment that will inevitably fall on the nations and on the wicked in the land (Pss. 9:16-17; 7:6, etc.). In the lives of the righteous divine wrath takes the form of various problems such as sickness, persecution, the threat of early death, and a sense of remoteness from God (Pss. 88:16; 90:7ff.; 102:8, 10-11, 23). Job is an example of the righteous undergoing an apparently inexplicable manifestation of divine wrath.

4. Motives. In some instances there seem to be no reasons for God's wrath. It simply comes with primal force (cf. Gen. 32:23ff.; Ex. 4:24-25). It is a death-dealing intervention when God's holiness is violated (Ex. 19:9ff.). No real explanation can be given for God's opposition to David's census (1 Sam. 24) or for the sufferings inflicted on Job or the righteous of the Psalms. It seems as though we have here an incalculable factor that borders on the arbitrary. Yet at other times the reasons for wrath are plain. The covenant God smites his people, or groups within it, when they resist his saving will and fail to make the response of trust and obedience (cf. Num. 11:1; 17:6ff.; Josh. 7:1; 1 Sam. 15, etc.). Apostasy is an obvious reason for divine wrath (Ex. 32; Num. 25, etc.). In the prophets the context of wrath is the gracious and faithful love that God displays to Israel. All her offenses are a despising of this love. Hence wrath, as wounded love, is correlative to grace. It is a jealous zeal that will not tolerate the disloyalty of the chosen people. The same zeal, however, will protect Israel when as a faithful husband God destroys the nations that oppress his people and brings his people deliverance (Zech. 1:14-15; Neh. 1:2). An attack on Israel is an attack on God himself, on the honor of God (Is. 48:9ff.). Yet God's wrath against the nations has a broader dimension. It is directed against human arrogance and wickedness in assertion of the claim of God to lordship over the cosmos. God may use Assyria as the rod of his anger against Israel, but he also turns his wrath against Assyria when she exceeds her commission (Is. 10:5ff.; Ezek. 25:15ff.; Zech. 1:15). The aim of divine wrath is the establishment of the divine rule of holiness. In this connection the whole burden of human life after the fall is in itself an expression of divine wrath (cf. Gen. 3; 4; 6-8; 11). As Job 14:1ff. vividly puts it (cf. Ps. 90:7), all human life stands under the constant operation of the wrath of God.

5. Outbreak, Duration, and Turning Aside. Historically, as distinct from eschatologically, God's wrath falls on individuals or peoples in the form of afflictions. Often it will flash down like lightning (Ex. 19:12; Num. 11:33; 1 Sam. 6:7). Yet God does not give free rein to wrath but is long-suffering (Ex. 34:6-7; Num. 14:18, etc.). He warns the people to repent, as the prophets bear witness. He is quick to show clemency. He can even exercise restraint in the case of Nineveh, to the disgust of Jonah (Jon. 4:2). This restraint may sometimes be for the sake of testing his people or bringing out the fullness of guilt. The question of the duration of wrath is a constant one in the exilic period and the Psalms. There is hope that it will be short (cf. Is. 54:8ff.). The conviction arises that the day of wrath must run its course and then the time of grace will come. Yet the divine wrath against the nations will be final (Nah. 1:2). This is the reverse side of God's love for Israel. The aim of the law and the prophets is to bring the people to the conversion and obedience that will avert wrath (cf. Dt. 6:15). No rites can placate God's wrath when it falls. God himself decides its duration, and the only course is to seek the divine mercy in prayer or intercession (cf. Moses in Ex. 32:11-12; Num. 12:13; Amos in 7:2, 5; Jeremiah in 14:7ff.; and Job in 42:7-8). God hears such petitions (Num. 11; 14), but the time may come when he will not do so or may even forbid them (Jer. 7:16). The grounds of intercession are God's own faithfulness and the weakness of his creatares (Num. 14:18; Am. 7:2, 5). Job especially stresses his weakness and asks God to leave him alone (7:1ff.; 9:18ff.; 13:13ff.), not realizing that there is a special reason for the severity of his lot. Since the wrath of God manifests the divine holiness, it can cease when punishment is executed on transgressors (cf. Num. 25:1ff.; Josh. 7:1, 25-26). Expiatory offerings sometimes play a role (Num. 16:46; 2 Sam. 24:17ff.), but in the prophets the only hope for an aversion of wrath is total repentance (Jer. 4:4, 8). The exiled people will see the end of wrath when it has emptied the cup of wrath and received double for its sins (Is. 51:17, 22; 40:2).

6. God's Wrath and His Holiness, Righteousness, and Pity. While wrath is only once called an essential trait in God (Nah. 1:2), it is an integral part of the OT message. The wrath of God is God's onslaught in assertion of his claim to dominion. Materially, if not linguistically, it is closely linked to his holiness. It is presented as the work, not of objective fate, but of a personal will. It is God's attack on all forces that resist his holy will. It is not the same as God's justice even though it is aimed against transgressions of the divine demands. To Job it may even seem to be unjust, for there is an inscrutable element in it. Thus Job can even appeal from the God of wrath to the God of justice (16:20-21), and Jeremiah can ask for correction in just measure rather than in anger (10:24). Nevertheless, in relation to Israel wrath is no mere caprice but is the reverse side of God's faithful and zealous love. The sins of Israel bring tensions, as it were, to God as his pity restrains his wrath (Is. 54:8ff.). Confession of the divine mercy provides no reason for thinking that judgment will not fall, especially on the nations and the wicked. Yet it nourishes the belief that for God's righteous people God's anger is but for a moment and his favor for a lifetime (Ps. 30:5). [J. FICHTNER, V, 394-409]

C. The Wrath of God in the LXX.

I. Usage.

1. orgḗ and thymós. In rendering the various Hebrew terms the LXX uses orgḗ and thymós. Etymologically thymós denotes the emotion and orgḗ the expression, but this distinction is lost in the LXX. a. The two are often used together (cf. Dt. 9:19). b. They are used interchangeably in parallelism (cf. Hos. 13:11; Is. 34:2). c. Also interchangeable are the genitive constructions thymós tḗs orgḗs and orgḗ toú thymoú (Ex. 32:12; Num. 32:14, etc.). d. We also find thymoústhai orgḗ (Gen. 39:19), and more rarely orgḗ thymoútai (1 Sam. 11:6). e. There are many expressions with either orgḗ or thymós but far fewer with just one of the terms (for details cf. TDNT, V, 409-10).

2. orgízō, (thymóō), parorgízō, parorgismós. Active forms of orgízō and thymóō occur only once each ("to make angry"), but passive forms are common ("to become or be angry"). The nouns parorgismós and parórgisma ("provocation to anger") are rare.

3. orgílos and thymṓdēs. These words, meaning "angry," "wrathful," occur mostly in the Wisdom literature, and in every case but one refer only to the human attribute.

4. (kótos), chólos, and mḗnis. These words, common in secular Greek for "anger," are not used for God's wrath in the LXX. kótos does not occur at all, chólos only five times (cholán once) with reference to human anger, and mḗnis only four times (mḗniama or mēnima once and the verb mēníein five times), again with reference to human anger except for the verb in Jer. 3:12; Ps. 103:8. The translators perhaps avoid using for God's wrath terms that are associated with the anger of the Greek gods.

II. Interpretations and Paraphrases. In general the LXX correctly renders the Hebrew, although it is mechanical at times, e.g., in using thymós when the Hebrew reference is to "poison" or orgḗ when the Hebrew means "vexation." When the Hebrew refers anthropomorphically to the nose of God, the LXX prefers the anthropopathic orgḗ. It sometimes replaces the wrath of God with the sin that provokes it, and it chooses to paraphrase (and alters the sense) in Mal. 1:4, Is. 66:14, and Zech. 1:12. In a verse like Dt. 32:22 it offers the rendering that a fire is kindled as a result of (not in) God's anger. A direct treatment of the revelation of God's anger occurs in Sir. 48:1. (For full details cf. TDNT, V, 411-12.) [O. GRETHER and J. FICHTNER, V, 409- 12]

D. The Wrath of God in Later Judaism.

I. Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha.

a. Later Jewish writings continue along the same lines as the OT, using some of the same Hebrew terms, and in the Gk. orgḗ and thymós (and derivatives).

b. Human anger is judged in different ways. There may be righteous anger, e.g., at transgressions of the law. The anger of pagan rulers against offenders is also justifiable, and may even serve as an illustration of the wrath of God. Mostly, however, anger is regarded as a passion that leads to sin and ruin. The fierce anger of pagan rulers (e.g., against Israel) is condemned. Strictly, anger is proper to God alone; human anger particularly arouses God's anger. Even by secular criteria anger is contrary to wisdom, although reason can also control it.

c. Since the judgment on anger is predominantly negative, it is perhaps surprising that almost all these works speak uninhibitedly about God's anger. Even the Hellenistically tinged 4 Maccabees reckons with God's righteous wrath. orgḗ denotes the passion itself as an expression of God's nature and of his righteous opposition to evil. It may also denote its effects as wrathful judgment. This is especially true of eschatological wrath. Personification of anger serves to preserve the personal aspect while detaching it to some degree from God himself. Apocalyptic tends to stress the divine mercy and gives as reasons why wrath is held in check the small number of the righteous, the ignorance of the masses, the universality of sin, and the subjection of evil itself to the divine will. Where wrath breaks out, it has first a historical phase in which it is directed against individuals and nations, including Israel (with limitations). Historical wrath, however, is a type of eschatological wrath. This is directed against the nations and against all impenitent sinners. The objects of wrath, e.g., rulers, may also be its instruments, as are angels. Ways to avert wrath are worship, righteous conduct, intercession, vicarious suffering, and God's own saving advocacy. [E. SJÖBERG and G. STÄHLIN, V, 412-16]

II. Rabbinism. The rabbis have no problem with the idea of divine wrath. They can even depict it in human terms, although they condemn human anger apart from righteous indignation. Sometimes they hypostatize anger in angelic forms. Divine anger is never divorced from God's essential righteousness. Even in anger God continues his merciful care for the world. Punishing the wicked, he is kind to the righteous and merciful to the penitent. Indeed, he still gives good gifts to sinners. This does not weaken, however, the terror of his wrath. The day of judgment is a day of wrath, although with a greater emphasis on justice. [E. SJÖBERG, V, 416-17]

III. Philo. Philo recognizes a righteous anger at sin and sinners, but under Stoic influence he views anger as a passion that should be suppressed. He speaks about God's anger as chiding, and finds its outworking in earthly events, but he suggests that anger is ascribed to God rather than being a divine reality, and he explains biblical references as a divine accommodation to the capacities of the hearers. [E. SJÖBERG and G. STÄHLIN, V, 417-18]

IV. Josephus. Josephus uses orgḗ for divine and human anger, and he also uses chólos, mḗnima and mḗnis, but not thymós. He relates divine wrath to violations of the law. The criterion of orgḗ is díkē, so that he sometimes uses díkē instead. In his own time he regards the Romans as the instrument of divine díkē. [O. PROCKSCH, V, 418]

E. Human and Divine Wrath in the NT.

I. Human Wrath.

1. Relative Justification. Apart from orgḗ itself, words of the stem org- are used in the NT only for human anger, although thymós is preferred for sudden rage (Lk. 4:28; Acts 19:28). Since the NT takes divine wrath seriously, it cannot be wholly negative toward human anger. It accepts a holy anger that hates what God hates and that is seen in Jesus himself (Mk. 3:5) or in Paul (Acts 17:16). Nevertheless, it does not think love and wrath are intrinsically compatible in us as they are in God (cf. 1 Cor. 13:5). The divinely provoked anger of Israel is good in Rom. 10:19, and so is the indignation that is the fruit of the true repentance in 2 Cor. 7:11.

2. Negative Appraisal. Elsewhere in the NT human anger is a fault. The anger of the elder brother is wrong in Lk. 15:28. So is the anger of Jesus' hearers in Lk. 4:28. So, too, is the anger of the Gentiles in Rev. 11:18. Such anger is finally directed against God, and it comes to full focus in the anger of the devil in Rev. 12:17. Herod is a human prototype in Mt. 2:16. It is anger of this sort that James describes in 1:20, and that Jesus perhaps has in mind in Mt. 5:22, where it is a first step to murder. Paul takes a similar view. Anger is one of the sins of Col. 3:8 and Eph. 4:31. To refrain from it is to give place to God (Rom. 12:19); to yield to it is to give place to the devil (Eph. 4:26-27). If it leads to revenge, it is an infringement of the divine prerogative of judgment (Rom. 12:19). God's wrath is the response to it (Col. 3:6, 8). We are neither to be angry nor to provoke to anger (Col. 3:8; Eph. 6:4). Anger is out of place in divine service (1 Tim. 2:8; Tit. 1:7). Eph. 4:26 allows that even believers might be angry at times, but if they are, they must be careful not to sin. Jms. 1:19 teaches a forbearance that, like God's, is more ready to forgive than to yield to anger, for anger does not advance true righteousness.

II. Divine Wrath.

1. Differentiation from the World Around.

a. Linguistic. The NT never uses mḗnis and chólos for God's wrath but only orgḗ and thymós, and the latter only in Rom. 2:8 and Revelation. The linking of orgḗ with ekdíkēsis (Lk. 21:22) and dikaiokrisía (Rom. 2:5) rules out the idea of unbridled explosions of anger, and the use of words like stenochōría as parallels shows that the stress is more on the effects than on the emotion.

b. Material. The message of the Baptist, Jesus, Paul, and Revelation includes wrath as well as mercy. Hence the NT does not stand opposed to the OT in an antithesis of love and wrath. Love and wrath are present in both. If, however, human arrogance is the occasion of divine wrath (cf. Rom. 2:4ff.), it does not cause eternal hostility between God and humanity, for God's love stands alongside and above his wrath. Hence God's wrath is never depicted in the NT as an emotional or irrational outburst. A theological concept outweighs the psychological concept.

2. Wrath in the NT View of God.

a. Wrath is an inalienable element in the NT view of God. It is a fearful thing to fall into his hands (Heb. 10:31). He can destroy both body and soul in hell (Lk. 12:5; cf. Jms. 4:12).

b. orgḗ might sometimes seem to be present almost as an independently operating force (cf. Paul's use of orgḗ without a qualifying toú theoú). Yet the NT finds no place for transcendent embodiments (as distinct from instruments), refers to the coming of wrath only as to the coming of the last things, and rejects the fatalism that would be implied if orgḗ were an automatic principle. Paul's use of orgḗ corresponds to his use of cháris; he takes it for granted that God's orgḗ is in view.

c. Is orgḗ an emotion, however, or is it a punishment? In most instances it undoubtedly denotes the divine work of judgment, yet God's serious displeasure at evil is also implied (cf. Rom. 1:18; Rev. 6:16; Heb. 3:11).

d. In the NT, as in the OT, love and wrath are not mutually exclusive in God. It is by wrath that the greatness of mercy is measured, and by mercy the greatness of wrath. Where love is confronted by ungodly resistance, it has the form of wrath (cf. Mk. 3:5; Mt. 18:34). Those who accept mercy are freed from wrath, those who despise mercy remain under it (Lk. 2:34; Mt. 3:12; Mk. 4:12). The two malefactors who are crucified with Jesus vividly illustrate this truth (Lk. 23:39ff.).

e. What is the relation of God's orgḗ to his makrothymía (patience)? On the one side makrothymía is an instrument of mercy that gives sinners space for repentance (cf. Rom. 2:4; Rev. 2:21; 2 Pet. 3:9); it thus serves the manifestation of the riches of glory in the vessels of mercy. On the other hand, when it is despised, it is an instrument of wrath that confirms the power of God in the destruction of the vessels of wrath. The revelation of wrath is the indispensable foil of that of mercy, as in Rom. 1:17-18;3:23.

f. The NT sees that God's wrath is directed against human adikía, yet its message is that of the triumph of divine dikaiosýnē over human adikía. If, then, human wickedness serves God's righteousness, is God unjust to inflict wrath (Rom. 3:5)? Indeed, can there be any justice at all in God's wrath when God himself abandons humanity to the chaos of wickedness (Rom. 1:18ff.)? Paul's first answer is that those who realize that they are sinners deserving nothing at God's hands are fully aware that God's wrath is his just judgment of the world. Only impious thinking can reason otherwise (3:7-8). His second answer is that God's wrath and righteousness are united in a humanly inconceivable way. It is precisely because God has to be wrathful against all of us that he grants righteousness from faith to faith and in this very way vindicates his righteous judgment (3:26). The vicarious work of Christ is God's solution to the apparent tension or dilemma.

3. The Revelation of Divine Wrath.

a. In Jesus and His Message. Although direct references are infrequent (Mk. 1:43; 3:5; Mt. 9:30; Jn. 11:33, 38), wrath is an integral characteristic of Jesus himself. His anger displays his humanity and yet its objects point to his deity. He is angry at forces that oppose God, e.g., Satan (Mt. 4:10), demons (Mk. 1:25), leprosy (Mk. 1:41), the wicked and hypocritical (Jn. 8:44; Mt. 12:34), the disobedient (Mk. 1:43), and the unbelieving (Jn. 11:33). His angry sorrow at the Pharisees is that of the merciful Lord whose love encounters only a legalistic hate that wants law, not love, and thus reacts with merciless hostility (Mk. 3:5-6). Especially severe is the wrath shown in the parable against the wicked servant who is so freely forgiven but then refuses to forgive (Mt. 18:34). Terrible, too, is Jesus' anger at the cities which reject the call to conversion (Mt. 11:20ff.) and at the merchants who desecrate the temple (Mt. 21:12ff.). In a strange parabolic action he also displays his wrath against those who withhold the fruits of repentance (Mk. 11:14; cf. Lk. 13:7). This is the wrath of the eschatological Judge who can cut off from fellowship (Mt. 21:12) and cast into Hades (11:23). By word and act Jesus manifests God's eschatological wrath. He is the Lord of the last judgment (Ps. 2:12) who denies evildoers (Mt. 7:23), destroys enemies (Lk. 19:27), and casts into the furnace of fire (Mt. 13:42). Rev. 19:15 offers a similar picture. So does Rev. 6:16 when it refers to the wrath of the Lamb. The same Lamb that comes under human judgment will finally exercise divine judgment on those who despise his vicarious self-offering.

b. Historical and Eschatological Outworking. Like such concepts as kingdom and salvation, orgḗ can have both an eschatological and a historical reference.

(a) Accompanying words and images (e.g., such words as coming and day, and such images as fire and cup) give orgḗ an eschatological thrust. The NT opens with the Baptist's message of coming wrath and liberation from it (Mt. 3:7ff.). Jesus seldom uses the terms orgḗ and orgízomai but he finds a place for eschatological orgḗ in the last tribulation (cf. Lk. 21:23) and in the last judgment. In Rom. 2:5 the last day is the day of wrath, and this is the setting of the drama of wrath at the end of the NT in Revelation (cf. the great day of wrath in 6:17).

(b) Yet there is also a historical wrath that is already present. Jesus himself is present as the holy Judge. He portrays the historical outworking of wrath in Lk. 13:2ff. Paul discerns an operation of wrath in Rom. 1:18ff. Related to the operation of righteousness, this is bound up with Christ, whose coming means both grace and judgment. In the light of the gospel the wrath of God may be seen in the world's sinfulness. This temporal manifestation points ahead to the full and final manifestation, so that one must preach both present and future wrath (2:8) as well as present and future justification. The two aspects go together in

Rom. 2:5ff.; 3:5; 4:15; 13:4-5; 1 Th. 2:16. In Rom. 3:7 present wrath is in view but the term krínomai confers an eschatological quality.

(c) Wrath is delayed in the NT; God is slow to wrath. There are parallels for this thought in the Greek world, the OT, and the rabbis. As noted already, the delay has a double function (Rom. 9:22; cf. 2:4). We should not anticipate God's delayed wrath by exercising retribution ourselves (12:19).

(d) Faith sees a period of wrath and a period of grace, but these overlap in Christ, so that in the present time both righteousness and wrath are manifested (Rom. 1:17-18). The law, when violated, brings wrath, but this is the reaction of spurned love, for the law, like the gospel, is a gift of love.

(e) The anticipation of eschatological wrath means that there is a present state of wrath (Jn. 3:36). This does not eliminate the eschatological element, but it raises the question whether wrath will finally be eternal. Greek thinking accepts this, the OT seems to question it in Jer. 3:12, and Judaism is uncertain. In the NT many passages support an eternal duration (Mt. 3:12; 18:34; Rev. 14:10), although the reference is to the punishment rather than the wrath. God's wrath is undoubtedly lasting as his holy resistance to everything unholy (Rev. 20:10, 14; 21:8). Eternity of wrath, however, is definitely not meant in 1 Th. 2:16 (cf. Rom. 9-11), where the eis télos might mean "forever" in the sense of "eternally" but has here a weaker rhetorical sense, and may even mean up to the dawn of the last time.

4. Divine Wrath in NT Imagery.

a. In the parables of Jesus we find the human images of the wrathful king (Mt. 18:34) and judge (Mt. 25; Lk. 13:6ff.).

b. For those smitten by divine wrath we find the image of vessels into whom it is poured (Rom. 9:22). A family image is also used in Eph. 2:3 with its reference to children of wrath. In both cases there are opposites, i.e., vessels of mercy and children of God by adoption.

c. For wrath itself we find the image of (a) fire, which unites judgment, torment, and the fires of hell; 6) flood, which as in the OT carries the thought of the water that both saves and destroys (cf. the baptism of John); (c) the cup or vial, which carries the double thought of punishment and stupefaction (Rev. 14:8ff.), and which is accompanied by the image of the winepress (14:19-20); and (d) the capital (Rom. 2:5) that is stored up in heaven and will be paid back at the last judgment (cf. the opposite treasure in Mt. 19:21).

5. The Objects and Instruments of Wrath.

a. Objects. In the NT wrath is not of the essence of God but always has objects. God is wrathful with Israel (Mt. 3:7; Lk. 21:23; 1 Th. 2:16). He is wrathful with all sinful humanity (Eph. 2:3) and all nations (Rev. 11:18; 14:8; 18:3). He is wrathful with the mighty and the rich (Rev. 6:15ff.). He is wrathful with the whole earth (especially Babylon) because of its worship of antichrist (Rev. 14:8ff.; 16:1, 19). He is wrathful with the demonic world which opposes its own wrath to God's (cf. Rev. 12:17).

b. Instruments. God uses demonic forces as instruments of his wrath (Rev. 11-12). These forces bring disasters, but dualism is avoided by their subordination to God. Even in opposition to God, the devil unwittingly and unwillingly serves him (1 Cor. 2:8). Like the great powers of the OT, even as an instrument he is also an object (i.e., a vessel in the twofold sense). Political power also serves as a tool of divine wrath (Rom. 13:4). Like the devil, it can do so even when it is itself ungodly and thus becomes subject to the very wrath which it executes (cf. Rev. 13).

c. The Christian. All are under the wrath of God (Rom. 3:23). Christians, however, are liberated from it (1 Th. 1:10). In retrospect they thus see that they were not destined for wrath but prepared as vessels of mercy (Rom. 9:23).

6. The Causes and Effects of Wrath.

a. Causes. The root cause of wrath is despising God. The world stands under wrath because it disregards his revelation in creation and transgresses his will in ungodliness and wickedness (Rom. 1:18ff.). orgḗ is God's displeasure at false worship (cf. Paul in Acts 17:16 and Jesus in Jn. 2:15ff.) and evil

(Rom. 12:19). Sin, apostasy, and hatred of God are the reasons for wrath (Rom. 5:8, 10). Apostasy stirs up God's wrath especially in its form as worship of the beast (Rev. 14). But alongside despising of the law, despising of God's holy love and forbearance is a decisive cause of orgḗ (Lk. 14: 16ff.; Rom. 2:4). A rejection of Jesus is answered by rejection in divine wrath (1 Th. 2:14ff.). Despising of God may also take the form of a lack of love or compassion (Mk. 3:5; Mt. 18:23ff.) which easily takes the form of judging others (Rom. 2:5). Despising of God's love and lack of love for others, at root the same, are both reasons for wrath. Behind all other causes lies the will of God as the truly normative basis. Thus Rom. 9:22 and 1 Th. 5:9 hint at an ordination to wrath. The law is given in order to set sinners unequivocally under wrath (Rom. 3:19). The divine will does not mean human exculpation. Divine ordination and human guilt are no less inextricably interwoven than devilish temptation and human transgression (Eph. 2:2-3).

b. Causes and Effects. The most serious causes of divine wrath are also its effects, so that the great acts of wrath are occasions of new wrath. If sin and unbelief are causes of wrath, they are also its effects (Rom. 1; 9:22). Sin and punishment converge, for God repays like with like. The acts of sinners fall on their own heads.

c. Effects. Like the OT, the NT sees the working of divine wrath in death (Rom. 1:18ff.). Eschatological wrath brings destruction (Rom. 9:22), as is typified in the overthrow of Jerusalem (Lk. 21:23). Destruction is not annihilation but eternal torment (Rev. 14:10-11; 20:10). The most proper outworking of wrath, however, is further sin (Rom. 1-2). The moral chaos of the race is an effect of divine wrath, not in a causal nexus, but by God's answering of the threefold human "exchange" by a threefold "handing over" (1:23ff.).

7. Liberation from Wrath.

a. General. Antiquity at large seeks escape or deliverance from divine wrath.

b. Conversion and Baptism. The Baptist offers repentance and baptism as a means of deliverance by a figurative anticipation of judgment. This is no automatic process but depends on an authentic conversion that finds demonstration in fruits (Mt. 3:8ff.). It is thus a valid way of escape from judgment.

c. Jesus the Deliverer. The apostolic message finds in Jesus the one who delivers his followers from coming wrath (1 Th. 1:10; Rom. 5:9), since in him they have already a present and future salvation that grants assurance that they are not destined for wrath (1 Th. 5:9-10). Jesus delivers from wrath because, justified and reconciled in him, they are no longer enemies or under condemnation (Rom. 5:9-10; 8:1). He brings this about by tasting the cup of wrath for them (cf. Mk. 14:36; Lk. 22:43-44). His acceptance of baptism, the sign of judgment, points in this direction. He takes away God's wrath from others by bearing it himself, for even as he voluntarily comes under wrath the good pleasure of the Father rests upon him in view of his righteousness and self-sacrificial obedience. His vicarious work solves the tension between divine wrath and divine love. If, however, deliverance from eternal wrath is in Christ, then everything depends on one's response to him. To reject him is to abide under wrath; to receive him is to be free. We must either "fear future wrath or love present grace" (Ignatius Ephesians 11.1). In faith in Christ the eschatological gift of freedom from wrath is a present reality. Water baptism is an anticipatory judgment. As a type of outpoured wrath, it saves from wrath as in it we receive a portion in Christ who bore and cancelled wrath (cf. Rom. 6:2ff.). Deliverance from wrath by grace is not, of course, a possession on which we can count irrespective of our own conduct (cf. Mt. 18:23ff.). Yet the final testimony of the NT is not to the fiery lake of wrath but to the wellspring of mercy in Christ. [G. STÄHLIN, V, 419-47]

orégomai [to reach out, strive], órexis [desire, longing]

orégō means “to reach out,” “to reach for.” It is used figuratively for 1. intellectual or spiritual striving, either generally, e.g., for fellowship, or philosophically, e.g., rational or irrational aspiration, or, in Philo, homesickness for the world of ideas; and 2. physical craving, e.g., for nourishment.

The group occurs only four times in the NT and only twice in formal analogy to the philosophical use. Thus in Heb. 11:16 faith desires a better country; it is oriented, not to nature or the lógos as in philosophy, but to the promise (11:8, 17). A total attitude is at issue, for those who turn aside from the promise crave after money instead (1 Tim. 6:10). The difference from philosophy lies in the eschatological focus of the seeking. In Rom. 1:27 Paul uses órexis for the sexual impulse. This is not to be dualistically disparaged as such. It becomes corrupt only because the truth of God is perverted (vv. 24-25). In the justified, it integrates itself into the service of God to which the body is dedicated. Faith, then, has a decisive bearing on physical needs too. [H. W. HEIDLAND, V, 447-48]

a. This word first means “upright,” “standing.” b. It then means “moving in a straight line.” c. A next sense is “right,” “correct,” “true.” d. We then find the meaning “stretched,” “taut.” The LXX offers examples of a. in Mic. 2:3 (figurative), b. in Jer. 38:9, and c. in Prov. 8:6 etc. In the NT Paul in Acts 14:10 tells the cripple to stand up “straight” on his feet. Heb. 12:13 quotes Prov. 4:26 but changes the idea from that of right conduct to that of moving “straight” toward the goal in an eschatological rather than a more purely ethical sense. With their eyes fixed on Jesus, believers pursue paths that lead straight to the goal.

diórthōsis. This word, which originally means “straightening,” is variously used for “correction,” “arrangement,” “setting up” states, and “settlement” (debts or taxes). Heb. 9:10 argues that the OT cultus, which can have only temporary and external effects, is set up only until the time of the true order (diorthṓseōs). When this comes, the cultus finds its own fulfilment in the dawning age of consummation.

epanórthōsis. This word means “restoration,” “reestablishment,” “correction,” “reformation.” It occurs in the NT in the sequence in 2 Tim. 3:16. Scripture is given for teaching and reproof, then for epanórthōsis, and finally for instruction. Placed as it is, the word seems to mean “amendment,” i.e., the restoration that means salvation (v. 15) and that only God can give.

orthopodéō. This word means “to stand erect,” “not to waver or tumble.” First found in the NT, it is used negatively in Gal. 2:14 to describe the conduct of Peter and the followers of James at Antioch. Denying freedom from the law, they do not walk firmly according to the truth of the gospel, i.e., in obedience to the reality of the salvation accomplished in Christ. Like the rest of the group, the word deals with the new relationship to God and the implied conduct. It has in view the eschatological determination of the human situation. [H. PREISKER, V, 449-51]

horízō [to limit, appoint], aphorízō [to separate], apodiorízō [to divide], proorízō [to foreordain]

horízō. This word (from hóros, "boundary") means "to limit" and then figuratively "to fix," "to appoint." Time as well as space can be limited. A literal use occurs in the LXX (cf. Num. 34:6; Josh. 13:27). We find limitation of time in Heb. 4:7 and of time and space in Acts 17:26-27. Elsewhere the sense is "to appoint" or "determine" (cf. Lk. 22:22; Acts 2:23; 10:42; 11:29; 17:31). In Rom. 1:4 Jesus is instituted the Son of God in power. Whether the reference here is to a declaration or an appointment is not a matter of great urgency, since a divine declaration is also a divine appointment. In the light of Acts 10:42 and 17:31 what Christ is now declared or appointed to be is to be equated with what he already is from all eternity by divine ordination (hence the addition of a pro- in some readings of Rom. 1:4). Apart from Acts 11:29, the horízō passages in the NT are all emphatically christological; they relate to the person and work of Jesus Christ.

aphorízō. This compound means "to separate," "to sever." It is used in the NT for the divine separation for service (Rom. 1:1; Gal. 1:15) which goes hand in hand with divine calling. By divine commission the Son of Man will separate the good and the bad (Mt. 25:32; cf. the angels in 13:49). Believers, then, must already separate themselves as a people of salvation (2 Cor. 6:17; cf. Is. 52:11). The Holy Spirit demands separation for special tasks (Acts 13:2). In Acts 19:9 Paul and his followers separate themselves from the synagogue, but Peter wrongly reverses the process by separating himself from Gentile believers (Gal. 2:12). The world for its part retaliates by excluding and reviling the followers of Christ (Lk. 6:22). In the OT separation for God and the separation of the unclean (e.g., lepers) are important models for NT separation for service or separation from the world.

apodiorízō. This rare double compound means "to define more exactly" in Aristotle. It might bear this sense in Jude 18-19 if the sense is that false teachers engage in endless definition. But the more likely meaning is that they cause divisions in antithesis to the true task of edification (v. 20). Thus in 2 Pet. 2:1 the heretics introduce destructive teachings, and often the NT castigates the spirit of contention or division (Gal. 5:20; 1 Tim. 4:1ff.).

proorízō. This rare and late word has in the NT the sense "to foreordain." It is parallel to "to foreknow" in Rom. 8:29. God has ordained everything in salvation history with Christ as the goal. Hence Herod, Pilate, and the Gentiles can only do what God has predetermined (Acts 4:28). Herein lies the hidden wisdom of God (1 Cor. 2:7). Divine sonship in Christ is the goal of God's ordaining (Eph. 1:5). Our assurance of inheritance rests on it (1:11). [K. L. SCHMIDT, V, 452-56] hórkos [oath], horkízō [to adjure], horkōmosía [confirmation by oath], enorkízō [to adjure, invoke], exorkízō [to charge under oath], (exorkistḗs [exorcist]), epíorkos [perjured], epiorkéō [to commit perjury] hórkos. This word means a. "oath" (usually taken by the gods, who are invoked as witnesses) and b. the god that punishes false swearing and perjury. In the papyri we find oaths by rulers, and later by relics and the Trinity. Oaths steadily increase in intensity and compass.

A. The Oath in the Greek World and Judaism.

1. The Greek World. Oaths are primarily self-cursing should one not be speaking the truth. Higher beings, usually deities, are invoked as witnesses and guarantors. Oaths may be simple or highly complex. In public life the formulas and deities are fixed by law. When Greece comes under the Roman empire, oaths are also sworn by the genius of the emperor. Judges give force to their sentences by oaths. Penalties for perjury are often included in oaths. The weakening of oaths leads to their multiplication but also to attempts at reform; the movement to abolish oaths, however, does not prevail.

2. Judaism. The OT has two words for the oath, the one having the basic sense of "seven" (perhaps because seven animals are offered when oaths are taken; cf. Gen. 21:31 with 15:10 and Jer. 34:18), the other literally meaning "cursing." The two may be used together (cf. Num. 5:21). The law lays down that the oath must be taken by God (Dt. 6:13). It is thus a solemn confession of God. False swearing and swearing by other gods are forbidden (Ex. 20:7; Jer. 5:7). Self-cursing adds force to oaths, and penalties may be mentioned (Is. 65:15; Jer. 29:22). God himself may swear by himself (Num. 14:21 ff.). He backs his will and word with his oath. Divine cursings and blessings are highly significant (Num. 14:21 ff.). God's relation to his people is a solemn marriage by oath (Hos. l:ff.). which he upholds in spite of Israel's apostasy. Oaths of witness do not occur in the OT but there is an oath of purification which the accused take when there are no witnesses to their innocence (Ex. 22:8ff.). Trespass offerings are demanded when ill-considered oaths are sworn (Lev. 5:4ff.). Perjurers are left to divine retribution, though Talmudic law prescribes penalties. The prophets complain about a growing laxity in relation to oaths (Jer. 5:2; Zech. 5:3-4; Mal. 3:5). In the Damascus Document only judges may demand the oath of cursing to unmask a thief. The Mishnah mentions various kinds of oaths, e.g., the oaths of witness and deposition, and the judicial oath. It imposes the penalty of scourging for intentional perjury.

B. The Oath in the NT.

1. In Jms. 5:12 hórkos is the object of omnýō. The final member of the statement shows that James has in view an absolute prohibition of oaths.

2. Twice hórkos appears in OT quotations. In Lk. 1:73 God has given Abraham a sworn promise which is now being fulfilled in Christ. In Acts 2:30 Peter sees in Christ's resurrection a fulfilment of the sworn promise to David (Ps. 132:11). Mt. 5:33 refers to the demand of the law that oaths should be taken only by God.

3. In Heb. 6:16-17 the definitive nature of an oath is invoked in order to show that the purpose of God will not change.

4. Mt. 14:7 and 26:72 link statement and oath by the expressions "promise" and "deny" "with an oath." Mk. 6:26 brings out the serious consequences of oaths lightly taken.

horkízō. This word means "to cause someone to swear" and "to adjure someone by something." In Mk. 5:7 the demoniac adjures Jesus by God in an effort to rob him of his power, but to no avail, since Jesus is the Son of God. In Acts 19:13 the exorcists try to cast out demons by adjuring them in the name of Jesus. Using the name as a magical formula, however, has the opposite effect to what they desire, for the name of Jesus has force only when spoken in faith and on his commission.

horkōmosía. This rare word means "confirmation by oath." It occurs in the NT only in Heb. 7:20-21, 28. Contrasting the imperfect priesthood of the OT with the perfect priesthood of Christ, these verses make the point that the former is instituted by the law but the latter by the divine oath of Ps. 110:4, which makes Jesus the surety of a better covenant.

enorkízō. This word means "to adjure someone by something" and "to invoke in petition." In the NT it occurs only in 1 Th. 5:27, where Paul adjures his readers by the Lord to read the letter to all the brethren.

exorkízō (exorkistḗs). This word has such senses as "to put on oath," "to invoke," and "to deny upon oath." The exorkistḗs is one who expels demons by magical formulas; it is used in the NT only in Acts 19:13. In Mt. 26:63 the high priest adjures Jesus by the living God to tell the truth about his messianic claim, and Jesus answers with a simple affirmation. Some exegetes take his reply to amount to a declaration on oath, others construe it as no more than a declaration, others see in it an evasion, and a few even find in it a rejection of the oath. The most likely interpretation is that Jesus makes a simple declaration which at the most involves tension, but not contradiction, with Mt. 5:33ff. In the post-NT period baptism is regarded as a kind of exorcism (cf. Justin Dialogue 30; 85).

epíorkos. This word means "perjured." The one NT instance is in 1 Tim. 1:8ff., which states that the law is good but is not given for the justified but for sinners, among whom are perjurers.

epiorkéō. This word means "to be a perjurer," i.e., "to commit perjury," "to break a vow." It occurs in the NT in Mt. 5:33. Formerly false swearing was forbidden, but now there is to be no swearing at all. The Didache seems to reverse this by simply forbidding perjury (2.3). [J. SCHNEIDER, V, 457-67]

hormḗ [impulse], hórmēma [violent rush], hormáō [to set out, rush headlong], aphormḗ [impulse, occasion] hormḗ, hórmēma, hormáō.

A. Extrabiblical Usage.

1. From a root meaning "flowing," hormḗ has various senses denoting the start of a rapid movement. The verb hormáō means "to set in rapid motion," "to impel," and intransitively "to go out," "to storm out," "to originate." Psychologically the words find common use for impulses, strivings, inclinations, longings, or even demonic impulsions. The strivings may be good, but in Stoicism they may also be contrary to reason or nature.

2. Philo is fond of the concept. hormḗ distinguishes beings with souls, and is good so long as it is under the control of the lógos, e.g., as a striving for piety, virtue, or immortality.

B. The Word Group in the OT. There is little psychological use of the group in the LXX. Its original sense comes out best when it is used for flowing water (Prov. 21:1) or other forms of movement (often violent). (For details cf. TDNT, V, 469-70.) Even where the LXX uses the group for emotion, it denotes a power of violent effort which goes beyond the conscious will. It is thus used sometimes to describe divine intervention in a way which accords well with the OT concept of God.

C. The Word Group in the NT. Like the LXX, the NT does not put the group to psychological use. In Mk. 5:13 and parallels it describes the senseless flight of the swine into the water under the grip of demonic impulsion. In Acts 7:57; 19:29 it is aptly used in relation to mob action. In Acts 14:5 a stroke is planned but no subject is given. In its one NT occurrence in Rev. 18:21 hórmēma obviously bears a connection to the wrath of God but its immediate reference is to the storm against Babylon or to the city's violent fall. Behind Jms. 3:4 stands neither the pressure on the rudder nor the purpose of the helmsman but an element of caprice. The images of the bit and the rudder are common ones in antiquity (cf. Philo) and often bear an optimistic sense. In James the point seems to be the more realistic one that as the horse cannot resist the bit or the ship the rudder, so we humans are helpless against the hormḗ or caprice of that little but powerful member, the tongue.

D. The Postapostolic Period. hormḗ and hormán are rare in the first Christian writings outside the NT. We find the sense of caprice in Diog. 4.5 and that of striving in Justin Apology 58.3; Dialogue 8.3. The verb occurs for "to derive from" in Athenagoras Supplication 2.2.

aphormḗ. This word has such various senses as "start," "origin," "cause," "stimulus," "impulse," "undertaking," "pretext," "possibility," "inclination," "opportunity," and even "aversion." Its use in the LXX in Ezek. 5:7 alters the sense by establishing a connection of the people with the Gentiles. It is added in elucidation in Prov. 9:9. In the NT it occurs only in Paul except for an alternative reading in Lk. 11:54, where it has a derogatory sense. In 2 Cor. 5:12 the term has the neutral sense of “cause” or “occasion,” but in 11:12 it has more of the sense of “pretext”: Paul hopes by his conduct to counter the deceptive pretexts that his opponents seek against him. What he probably has in view is that he is blamed for not claiming support, but would be no less blamed, i.e., accused of avarice, were he to claim it. In Gal. 5:13 the flesh (sárx) seeks a pretext, or starting point, or opportunity, in Christian freedom, as does the enemy in widowhood in 1 Tim. 5:14, and sin in the law in Rom. 7:8, 11. It may be noted that the things that offer occasion are themselves good but they may be turned to evil. In 1 Tim. 5:14 remarriage is recommended because it offers some safeguard, but in Rom. 7:8ff. the law is used by God to unmask the true nature of sin inasmuch as sin is incited by it to open resistance against God. This does not mean that the law instigates sin any more than that God’s prohibition in Eden instigates the disobedience of Adam and Eve, or Christ’s coming instigates the sin of his rejection. It simply means that the flesh, or sin, or the devil uses the good gifts of God as deceitful occasions for leading people astray. Yet God is in no sense defeated thereby, for in his inscrutable counsel his good gifts serve in this way to unmask sin by offering it a fresh impetus. Thus the rather formal concept of aphormḗ takes on a more material character in the NT, finding a place alongside such terms as “offense” and “temptation,” and such figures of speech as “nets” and “snares.” [G. BERTRAM, V, 467-74]

tó óros means “mountain” or “mountain range,” plural “mountains” or “mountain range.”

A. The Mountain in Antiquity.

1. As striking natural phenomena, mountains have always been honored as gods or as abodes of the gods. Gods of light and life are connected with their peaks, those of darkness and death with the inner parts of mountains or with mountain woods or deserts. A common mythological concept is that of the primal mountain.

2. In the Near East mountains are often figures for power. To the Babylonians mountains are remote and inaccessible, and there are eastern and western mountains on which the arch of heaven rests (cf. the two pure and two dark mountains of the Mandaeans). Various references are made to the mountains where gods were born, to the mountain of assembly where they meet, to the mountain of winds whose top reaches the heavens and whose base is in the sea, etc.

3. The Greeks praise their wooded mountains as an adornment of their land. They derive from them a sense of power and associate them (especially Olympus) with the gods. Soaring up to heaven, Olympus symbolizes natural and ethical perfection.

4. In Asia Minor worship of the great mother is linked to a mountain. The mother of nature is sensed in the storm and experienced in ecstatic dancing in the woods by night. The mountain belongs here to the darker side of life (cf. Cybele’s link with mountain caves).

5. In Syria and Palestine divine honors are paid to mountains as such, and cultic worship takes place on them. Mountains are also abodes and places of assembly for the gods. Here, too, they are used as symbols of power.

B. The Mountain in the OT and Judaism.

1. The LXX almost always uses óros for Heb. har, which also means either a single mountain or a range. In 2 Sam. 1:6, 21 the MT and LXX vacillate between the singular and the plural for Mt. Gilboa.

Heb. Hebrew

MT Masoretic Text

2. There are many references to hills in the OT. Later the hills are denuded of trees (earlier cf. Josh. 17:18). We thus read mainly of pastures (Ps. 147:8). The hills are suitable for beacons (Is. 13:2). Messengers can be seen on them from afar (Is. 52:7). They offer extensive views (Dt. 34:1ff.). Voices carry across them (2 Sam. 2:25-26). But they hamper travel (2 Kgs. 19:23). Lonely (1 Sam. 23:14), they are a shameful place to die (Ps. Sol. 2:26) but also a refuge (Judg. 6:2).

3. In prophecy and poetry mountains display God's power. God establishes them (Ps. 65:6), weighs them (Is. 40:12), crushes them (41:15), turns them (Job 9:5), and levels them (Is. 40:4). They tremble before him (Judg. 5:5), are consumed by him (Dt. 32:22), and melt before him (Mic. 1:4). The mountain may also symbolize political power (Jer. 51:25; Dan. 2:44). In Eth. En. 18:13 etc. the fallen angels are burning mountains, and in 52:2, 6-7 iron and gold mountains represent the power of iron and gold. In rabbinic writings the evil impulse is presented as a great mountain that the righteous must overcome, and mountain is used as a title of honor for eminent people. Authoritative sayings are also compared to mountains.

4. Topographical changes are expected in visions of the last time. The mountains will drip with wine (Am. 9:12). They will be levelled for the returning exiles (Is. 40:4). At the end the Mount of Olives will disappear (Zech. 14:4) and Mt. Zion will be higher than all other hills (Mic. 4:1).

5. The OT associates mountains with God's proximity. Isaac is to be offered on a mountain (Gen. 22:2). Moses prays on a hill (Ex. 17:9-10). Blessings and curses are issued from the two mountains (Dt. 11:29). Elijah prays on Carmel (1 Kgs. 18:42). Circumcision takes place on a hill (Josh. 5:3), the ark is set on a hill (1 Sam. 7:1), and Samuel sacrifices on a high place (9:12ff.). David captures Jerusalem, and Solomon builds a temple on a projecting height. Zion then becomes the sign of God's presence and the only legitimate place of sacrifice. Yet God is not specifically a mountain God (1 Kgs. 10:23, 28-29), and Sinai and Zion are not holy places as such. Zion is the hill that God has chosen. Prophecies are uttered from mountains (Balaam in Num. 23:7, and cf. 1 Sam. 10:5), but the great writing prophets have no particular mountain connections.

6. There is little mountain mythology in the OT. Poetic allusions or echoes may perhaps be found in Gen. 49:26; Pss. 68:15; 48:2; Zech. 6:1. Is. 14:12ff. and Ezek. 28:11ff. make ironical use of the myth of a mount of the gods in songs that mock the downfall of pagan rulers. The pseudepigrapha take up mythical themes more strongly, e.g., in equating paradise and the mount of God (Eth. En. 24-25). The reason why mythological imagery is less important in the OT is not that it opposes a spiritual to a sensory depiction but that its concern is with the God who acts in history.

C. The Mountain in the NT.

1. In the NT, too, the óros is either the single mountain (Jn. 4:20-21) or the range (Mk. 5:11). The plural denotes a range in Mt. 18:12; Mk. 13:14, etc.

2. Many sayings reflect Palestinian geography, e.g., the city on a hill (Mt. 5:14), the sheep left on the hills (18:12), the faith that moves mountains (Mk. 11:23), the cry to the mountains to give cover (Lk. 23:30), and the warning to flee to the mountains (Mk. 13:14). Mountains named are Gerizim (Jn. 4:20-21) and Olives (Lk. 19:37), and cf. the hill on which Nazareth lay (Lk. 4:29).

3. Jesus often goes up into mountains (Mt. 5:1; Mk. 3:13; Mt. 15:29, etc.). He prays in the mountains, perhaps for solitude (Mk. 6:46; 1:35). He teaches on a mountain in Mt. 5:1ff., possibly because the voice carries well there, possibly to make the crowds decide whether to follow him, possibly to gain the effect of withdrawal from everyday surroundings, possibly to offer a parallel to the giving of the law on Sinai.

4. Traditionally the transfiguration takes place on Mt. Tabor. The name is not important for the NT authors, and it is not so likely that Jesus would go to Tabor from Caesarea Philippi. The mention of a high mountain perhaps suggests that Jesus uses the evocative significance of the mountain to attune the disciples to the world of God. The mount of temptation (Mt. 4:8) cannot be pinpointed with accuracy. Surveying all the kingdoms of the world is represented as looking out from a high mountain; Luke simply says that "the devil took him up." There is a parallel in Rev. 21:10 (cf. Ezek. 40:2), where looking out from a high mountain symbolizes the surveying of eschatological events in the Spirit.

5. The NT contains some important eschatological sayings about mountains. Lk. 3:4-5 gives wider range to Is. 40:3ff. The image in Rev. 8:8 is that of destructive power. The shaking of the mountains in Rev. 6:14 announces the shaking of heaven and earth. The mountains and islands disappear in 16:20, and then heaven and earth perish at the climax in 20:11. The islands are places of security for the Gentiles and the mountains are symbols of power. The point, then, is the shaking and then the destruction of pagan power and security. No new mountain replaces the old ones in Revelation, just as there is no new temple or altar in the new world where God dwells among us (Rev. 21:3). Revelation also uses óros for the seven hills on which the woman is seated. These are probably not the seven hills of Rome in any specific sense, since Babylon represents secular power and culture in a more general way, and the number seven denotes this totality. The world (cf. 1 Jn. 2:16) is enthroned on all the world powers, the hills, and antichrist, the beast, has the nature of these powers (17:11).

1. This word means "bereaved," "without parents or children," "orphaned," "orphan." In the LXX it is usually associated with "widow" (Is. 1:17). Occasionally it has the figurative sense of "abandoned," "deprived."

2. The word occurs twice in the NT. Jms. 1:27, echoing the OT, calls for the protection of widows and orphans (cf. Ex. 22:21). This is in accord with the teaching and legal practice of Judaism, and similar exhortations occur in Barn. 20.2; Hermas Mandates 8.10, etc. The second NT instance is in Jn. 14:18, where the use is figurative. Jesus will not leave his disciples "orphaned," i.e., "abandoned" or "unprotected." [H. SEESEMANN, V, 487-88]

hósios [holy, devout], hosíōs [devoutly], anósios [impious], hosiótēs [holiness] hósios, hosíōs.

1. Greek Usage.

a. A first reference of these terms is to actions that are regarded as "sacred," "lawful," or "dutiful," i.e., good from the standpoint of morality and religion, no matter whether they are based on divine precept, natural law, ancient custom, or inner disposition. When combined with díkaios, what is indicated is that which corresponds to both divine and human law.

b. A second reference is to persons who feel awe before the gods and eternal laws, i.e., "pious" or "devout." A narrower use is for initiates. Only rarely is the term applied to God himself.

c. A third reference is to "pure" or "sanctified" things.

2. LXX. In the LXX hósios is plainly distinct from words like "righteous," "pure," or "devout." In its primary human reference it denotes those who are pledged to obedience to God. Originally this covers the whole people, but since the people includes some who are ungodly, it comes to characterize those who are ready to fulfill covenant obligations. What counts here is dutiful acceptance of the relations to God and others. Toward the end of the OT, the term is thus used for the quiet in the land who are faithful to the law, who oppose Hellenization, and who will finally take up the struggle for freedom in the Maccabean revolt, but then withdraw when this struggle loses its religious emphasis.

3. The NT. hósios occurs only eight times in the NT (five in quotations), and once as an adverb in 1 Th. 2:10. It is common (with anósios) in the Pastorals. It is obviously not a leading concept in the church's vocabulary, nor do believers use it for themselves.

a. In quotations (Dt. 32:4; Ps. 145:17), Rev. 15:4 and 16:5 use it of God. God is righteous and holy in vindicating persecuted believers and judging malefactors.

b. hósios occurs three times in quotations in Acts. In 2:27 and 13:35 (quoting Ps. 16 and Is. 55:3) it refers to Christ; he is "the holy one of God" and the "holy" blessings of David are promised to him. Jesus is also called hósios in Heb. 7:26. In mind and conduct he perfectly fulfils the divine requirements, and therefore he does not need to make an offering for himself, as the OT priests do.

c. The group mostly has a human reference in the NT, four times with díkaios. Paul in 1 Th. 2:10 has satisfied divine and human law by his "holy" and righteous conduct in his apostolic work. Bishops must be upright and "holy" if they are to do their work properly (Tit. 1:8). Hands that are lifted up to God in prayer should be "holy," thus symbolizing freedom from ungodly thought or action.

4. hósios and anósios occur in the apostolic fathers only in 1 and 2 Clement.

anósios. This word refers 1. to "impious" acts that transgress ancient laws and 2. to "impious" persons. It occurs twice in the NT for impious persons who impiously reject sacred obligations. "Ungodly" might fit the context of 1 Tim. 1:9, but "devoid of piety" is obviously meant in 2 Tim. 3:2 (cf. the sequence).

hosiótēs. This word denotes personal "piety," whether toward God or parents, as a disposition that has regard for eternal ordinances. In the NT it occurs twice in the phrase "in holiness and righteousness." In Lk. 1:75 it refers to the life of believers in the age of salvation, and in Eph. 4:24 to the new nature that results from regeneration. [F. HAUCK, V, 489-93][13]

osmḗ [smell, fragrance]

A. The Meaning outside the NT.

1. The meaning of this word is "smell," either good, bad, or neutral. In antiquity it is thought that the scent of water can give new growth to a withered tree (cf. Job 14:9). Odors are regarded as exhalations of mist and air that have the power to give either life or death.

2. Along these lines divine savors play an important role in theophanies. An inscription speaks about a deified boy giving off sweet scents that give life to flowers growing out of his grave. A tree with a sweet smell will give life to the righteous (Gk. En. 25:4, 6).

3. The OT refers to the sweet savor of sacrifice that causes God to be favorably disposed to worshippers (Gen. 8:21). Lack of savor is a sign of rejection (Lev. 26:31). In offerings to idols (cf. Ezek.

6:13) there is perhaps some thought that the scent gives power to the gods. Tob. 8:2-3 reflects the notion that scents can serve as a safeguard against hostile forces. Wisdom gives off a scent, i.e., vitality for righteous living (Sir. 24:15), and the righteous are summoned to give out a sweet savor in praise of God (39:14).

B. The NT.

1. The literal sense occurs in Jn. 12:3.

2. A figurative use of the idea that the scent of sacrifice is pleasing to God occurs in Eph. 5:2. The combination with love suggests that God's pleasure is in the loving and vicarious self-offering of Jesus. Paul also calls the gift of the Philippians a fragrant offering in Phil. 4:18. As a demonstration of love, it is a pleasing sacrifice to God.

3. The idea of scents dispensing life and death occurs in 2 Cor. 2:14ff. The knowledge of God in Christ gives life to the apostle. Carrying the savor of Christ, he brings life (in the power of God) to those who believe, but judgment to those who do not. On the one hand, then, we have life from life, but on the other, for those who do not find freedom from the power of death at work in them, death from death. [G. DELLING, V, 493-95]

osphýs, meaning "hip," is common in the LXX, e.g., in the phrase "to gird up one's loins," for travel, work, battle, etc. (used of the Messiah in Is. 11:5). Under OT or LXX influence it occurs eight times in the NT. In relation to the Baptist in Mk. 1:6 and Mt. 3:4, a comparison with Elijah is suggested. In Lk. 12:35ff. the thought is that of vigilant readiness. Eph. 6:14 applies Is. 11:5 to the warring believer in a figurative sense. Also figurative is 1 Pet. 1:13 with its admonition to be ready and watchful. Another OT usage stands behind Heb. 7:5, 10; Acts 2:30 (cf. Gen. 35:11;, 2 Chr. 6:9; Ps. 132:11), namely, that for descent. "Prior to his birth" is thus the point in Heb. 7:10. [H. SEESEMANN, V, 496-97] ouranós [heaven], ouránios [heavenly], epouránios [heavenly], ouranóthen [from heaven]

A. Greek Usage.

1. The Basic Idea. ouranós in the singular means "heaven" either as the overarching firmament or as that which embraces all things. This duality is already present in the notion of the cosmic egg, in Homer's view of a solid heaven on pillars which can yet be called the abode of the gods, or in Plato's use of heaven for both the cosmos and the perfect or the absolute (cf. also Aristotle, the Stoics, and the Gnostics). There is one heaven, but it is given both a natural and a divine reference, with a realistic, symbolical, or figurative link. Up to a later period we find representations of the god Uranos.

2. The Cosmological Sense. In Homer heaven is a solid vault or half-globe (of iron or brass). An effort is made later to understand heaven in terms of thought and experience. The phrase "heaven and earth" is common, and "under heaven" also comes into use. Heaven is the cause and prototype of all being and may be equated with the universe or cosmos. For Plato it is the starting point for the contemplation of being and for absolute knowledge.

3. The Mythological Sense.

a. The God Uranos. Uranos is a god of pre-Homeric religion. He is emasculated and overthrown by his son Cronos, who is then replaced by Zeus, but depictions of Uranos continue into the period of the empire.

b. The Abode of the Gods. Heaven in this sense is Olympus; the Olympians are dwellers in heaven. "The lord of heaven is the lord of the universe (Zeus). Prayer is made to heaven, oaths are taken by heaven, and crimes can reach to heaven.

c. Orphic Writings. These integrate heaven and earth (cf. the cosmic egg, of which heaven is the upper shell). Initiates recapture this unity by becoming divine. Heaven is also presented as the mantle of the world.

d. The Magic Papyri. Heaven is important in these papyri, e.g., in invocations.

4. Gnosticism. In the Hermetic writings heaven is divided into seven "cycles." It is created by the demiurge and serves as his dwelling. It lies above ether, air, and earth. The heavenly god is a bad god; mysteries are shut up in heaven, necessity rules there, and its inhabitants have demonic souls. Light brings liberation from it. The upward journey leads through the heavenly spheres. In general, heaven is a sign of dualism; the view of it is profoundly pessimistic.

5. Philo. Philo combines Plato, Stoicism, and the OT. Heaven and earth for him are God's votive offering. Heaven, which is noncorporeal, represents the cosmos, although it has a material counterpart. The heavenly man is the prototype of the earthly, but man himself is a heaven with starlike natures. Heaven for Philo is a sign of cosmic unity and helps to effect it. [H. TRAUB, V, 497-502]

B. The OT.

1. Heaven in Ancient Israel. The Hebrew term for heaven is šāmayim (a plural word of obscure etymology). It is first depicted as something fixed, with windows, pillars, and foundations. It is largely equivalent to "firmament." Above it is the heavenly ocean which can bless with rain or destroy with flood. Heaven can also denote the atmosphere, but is not limited to this sense. Heavenly spheres are sometimes suggested (cf. the "ends" of heaven), but the phrase "heaven of heaven" is largely hyperbolical. "Days of heaven" is a phrase that denotes lasting duration (Dt. 11:21). The cosmos consists of heaven, earth, and the lower waters (Ex. 20:4), but often only heaven and earth are mentioned. Only fragments of mythical ideas occur. In poetic imagery heaven is a tent (Is. 40:22), or a stretched out scroll (34:4). It has chambers for snow, hail, wind, and water (Job 37:9; 38:22, 37). It is also a place of signs and calendar references. In general it is presented on the basis of simple observation.

2. God and Heaven. God created heaven (Gen. 1:1). He dwells in it, although he also dwells in the sanctuary, the ark, etc. Possibly the twofold dwelling reflects Near Eastern ideas of temples of dwelling and temples of manifestation. While the ark, e.g., is a place of temporary presence, heaven is the real abode of God. Yet the OT presentation is complex. The belief that God is the God of heaven is undoubtedly ancient, as is the concept of the heavenly court and the heavenly host (1 Kgs. 22:19ff.; Job 1:6ff.). There may be some influence here of the Canaanite pantheon, but the depiction is fluid, for the heavenly host may consist of spirits (1 Kgs. 22:19), but it may also be the heavenly army (Josh. 5:14), or simply the stars (Gen. 2:1). The cult of the host of heaven is sternly resisted (2 Kgs. 17:6; cf. Jer. 7:18). Because God dwells in heaven, hands are lifted up to heaven in oaths (Dt. 32:4) or prayer (Ex. 9:29), and God is asked to look down from heaven (Dt. 26:15). Deuteronomy explains that in the Sinai revelation God really speaks from heaven, not from the mountain (4:36), and if God dwells in the sanctuary, it is as he sets his name and causes it to dwell there, the name representing God's turning to Israel in self-revelation (cf. Dt. 12:5, 11; 14:23-24; 26:2). In cultic practice, of course, the main concern is with the manifestation. Ezekiel depicts the throne-carriage coming forth from heavenly transcendence, but his message has to do with the revealed God. Earth is God's sphere of dominion (Dt. 4:39), but heaven itself cannot contain him (1 Kgs. 8:27). Enthroned on high, he rules on earth (Ps. 113:5-6). In times of affliction he seems to be wrapped in clouds (Lam. 3:44), and prayer is made that he will rend the heavens and come down (Is. 63:19). Eliphaz accuses

Job of thinking that thick clouds cover him so that he cannot see (Job 22:13). Ecclesiastes warns against foolish talk in view of the divine transcendence (5:2). In the main, however, the OT links God's dwelling in heaven with his mighty works on earth. The "God of heaven" of the later period is the God who in historical omnipotence controls the destinies of empires and works out his plan for the world.

3. Heaven as the Place of Salvation. As the dwelling of God, heaven is the source of blessing, the setting of life, and the place where God's planned salvation is already present. The isolated idea of rapture (2 Kgs. 2:11) relates to this concept. The thought of God's word being fixed in heaven (Ps. 119:89) has a more general application (cf. 89:2). There is a model of the earthly tabernacle in heaven (Ex. 25:9, 40), and Ezekiel (2:1ff.) refers to a roll that is preexistent in heaven. In the visions of Zechariah the kingdom of God is already prepared in heaven. In Dan. 7:13ff. the kingdom of the Son of Man is one that comes down from heaven in contrast to the earthly empires that come up from below (v. 17). Since heaven is also created, it, too, may be shaken (cf. Am. 8:9; Jer. 4:23ff.). A cosmic collapse is foreseen in Is. 51:6, and a new heaven and earth will be created according to 65:17. Thus heaven itself is drawn into the circle of soteriology. But heaven is never of primary interest in the OT; even when salvation comes from heaven, the central point is that it comes to earth. Only once (Dan. 4:23) is heaven substituted for the name of God, though cf. Ps. 73:9; Job 20:27. [G. VON RAD, V, 502-09]

C. The LXX and Judaism.

I. The LXX.

1. Additions.

a. ouranós is used 667 times in the LXX, sometimes in additions. These may be designed to give greater vividness (cf. Josh. 8:21; Ex. 9:29; Dt. 9:15; Job 7:9, etc.).

b. Another reason for adding ouranós may be to give greater concreteness (cf. Is. 8:21;24:18,21;38:14).

c. At times the belief that God the Creator is linked with heaven is the reason for adding ouranós (cf. Ps. 91:1; Is. 14:13; Job 22:26). There may be anticipations here of the substitution of heaven for the name of God, or the point may be to protect the divine transcendence.

*2. The Plural ouranoí. The LXX has the plural 51 times. It is alien to secular Greek and follows Hebrew usage. It occurs mostly in the Psalms or similar pieces (cf. 1 Sam. 2:10; Dt. 32:43). The only prose use is in 2 Chr. 28:9, but it becomes more common in 2 and 3 Maccabees, Wisdom, etc. The phrase "heaven of heavens" (Dt. 10:14; 1 Kgs. 8:27) reflects the idea of a plurality of heavens but it is used to suggest the comprehensiveness of the universe and of God's dominion over it.

II. Judaism.

a. Judaism engages in speculation about heaven which leads to the idea of various heavens. These are usually seven in number, each with its own name and all loved by God. Other texts, however, speak of two, three, five, or ten heavens. En. 71:5ff. offers a vivid description of the heaven of heavens with the Ancient of Days, the seraphim, angels, etc. in a house of crystal stones with living fire running between them.

b. Another development in Judaism is the widespread use of heaven instead of God.

c. Judaism expects a new creation in the last time in the form either of a transfiguration or of a complete destruction and replacement of the old creation.

D. The NT. ouranós occurs 284 times (94 in the plural) in the NT. It is most common in Matthew (84 times) and Revelation (54). It is chiefly used in Matthew in the formulas "Father in heaven" and "kingdom of heaven" (plural in both instances). The plural usage of the NT derives mainly from Jewish sources, although Hellenistic Gnosticism might have had some influence on Eph. 1:10; 4:10; 6:9; Col. 1:16, 20, and just possibly Heb. 4:14; 7:26; 9:23. NT usage in general reflects on the one side the ancient view of heaven as a vault and on the other side the belief that heaven is the divine sphere from which God comes down. These ideas go together, for the relation to God involves the cosmological sense, and the cosmological sense the relation to God. The cosmos is "heaven and earth," with heaven as the controlling part. The integration of the two is God's work. Their relationship symbolizes that of Creator and creation (cf. Is. 55:9).

1. Heaven and Earth.

a. With earth, heaven was created by God (Acts 4:24; Rev. 10:6; cf. Acts 17:24). The creation of a new heaven and earth is promised (Rev. 21:1). Sin has disrupted the old creation, but the new creation is already prepared in God's saving purpose (2 Pet. 3:13; cf. Rom. 8:21 ff.).

b. Heaven will pass away as well as earth (Mk. 13:31; Rev. 21:1; Heb. 12:26). Both are kept for destruction (2 Pet. 3:7), and they flee before God in terror (Rev. 20:11). The law is valid so long as the first heaven and earth remain (Mt. 5:18), but the word of Jesus will remain even when these perish (Mk. 13:31). The judgment of God on heaven and earth is the background to the true message of the NT, i.e., the intimation of what is enduring and unshakable (Heb. 12:27).

c. With earth, heaven stands under God's lordship. God is Lord of heaven and earth (Mt. 11:25; cf. Gen. 24:3). He is so not merely as Creator (cf. Rev. 17:24) but as Father, i.e., as God of the covenant. With Is. 66:1, Mt. 5:34 and Acts 7:49 describe heaven and earth as the absolute sphere of God's dominion. When the Son of Man comes, he will gather his elect from the ends of earth to the ends of heaven-an intentional paradox designed to indicate universal gathering.

d. Heaven and earth are given a new relation by Christ's saving work. This is expressed by the "in heaven and on earth" of Eph. 1:10 and Col. 1:16, 20. With "all things," this phrase denotes absolute comprehensiveness and yet also makes "all things" more concrete. Heavenly things are probably to be equated with the "invisible" things of Col. 1:16. The universe in this total sense is strictly related to Christ. Its very being is grounded in him through whom the work of reconciliation and peace is done. The formula serves as a basis for the idea of the body in Col. 1:18. Everything in heaven and on earth is integrated as a body whose head is Christ (Eph. 1:10, 21-22). In 1 Cor. 8:5-6 the many gods in heaven and on earth may be called lords but they have no reality. What is real is defined only by the one God and the one Lord. In Eph. 3:15 all families in heaven and on earth derive not merely from God the Creator but from the God who is the Father of Jesus Christ. In Rev. 5:3 Christ is the only one in heaven and on earth who can open the book, and in 5:13 all creation, in heaven, on earth, and under the sea, praises the Lamb. In Acts 2:17-18 the outpouring of the Spirit means signs and wonders in heaven above and on earth beneath. In Mt. 28:18 the risen Christ has all exousía in heaven and on earth; in virtue of his saving work, no entity exercises autonomy. The unity of heaven and earth that Christ's work effects finds expression in the petition of Mt. 6:10 that God's will be done on earth as it is (already) in heaven. Earth is taken up to heaven, or heaven descends to earth, yet heaven is superior because God's will is done there and his throne is set there (cf. Heb. 8:1, 4). To be sure, what is decided on earth is ratified in heaven (Mt. 16:19), yet only in the eschatological community in which God's will is already done and there is thus a unity of earth and heaven. In Lk. 15:18, 21 "heaven and you" represent heaven and earth, although here heaven probably stands for God. The eis means "against," not "up to heaven."

2. God in Heaven.

a. God is called the "God of heaven" only in Rev. 11:13; 16:11. This denotes an affinity of God to heaven but not vice versa, for heaven is God's work. What is implied is not just divine transcendence but divine dominion. God rules from heaven and initiates his saving work in heaven. "Father in heaven" in Matthew (5:16, 45; 6:1, 9, etc.) and Mark (11:25) has the same thrust but with more stress on the approach to humanity. Father is not just a substitute for God. Where "in heaven" is not added we mostly have statements of Jesus about his Father. Parallel sayings show that “in heaven” denotes God’s freedom from restriction; he knows, sees, and can do all things. The “from” of Lk. 11:13 shows that God acts from heaven.

b. “Heaven” is sometimes thought to be used as a substitute for God, e.g., in the phrase “kingdom of heaven.” Yet the NT shows no fear of using the name of God, and while heaven obviously relates to God, it may also help to define God’s lordship as that which comes down from heaven. Heaven, then, carries a reference to God’s saving work. God’s kingdom sets heaven in motion (Mt. 3:2) and breaks in from it.

c. God’s throne is in heaven, or is heaven itself (Heb. 8:1; Mt. 5:34). “Throne” here denotes government. The point is not that heaven is God’s location but that it expresses his absolute and inviolable lordship.

3. Heaven and Jesus Christ.

a. Jesus Christ is awaited from heaven (1 Th. 1:10). He will come with the clouds of heaven (Mk. 14:62; 24:30); the expression implies apotheosis. His sign will be visible in heaven. Session at God’s right hand is linked with coming from heaven (Mk. 14:62). In 1 Th. 1:10 Christ’s raising from the dead is related to his coming from heaven (cf. 1 Cor. 15:23, 47). His resurrection is the basis of the parousia. When the Lord descends from heaven, the dead in Christ will rise (1 Th. 4:16). There will be a manifestation of what is concealed in heaven (2 Th. 1:7). In this concealment lies the políteuma of believers as they await their Savior from heaven (Phil. 3:20). Christ’s coming means eschatological manifestation.

b. Since Jesus comes from heaven, it is natural to refer to Christ as the lord or master in heaven (Col. 4:1). This is not so much a reference to location as to rule. Christ is lord over believers and the ruler who sees and knows all things.

c. In Acts 2:32ff. raising up and exalting at God’s right hand imply ascension (v. 34). One reading of Lk. 24:51 intimates ascent. In Acts 1:10-11 the disciples see Jesus go up as far as the sky, which is here the margin of the heaven that receives and conceals him. Heaven also stands for God’s sovereignty that has still to be consummated on earth (2:35; 3:21). The determinative factor is that heaven is seen from the standpoint of the right hand of God (1 Pet. 3:22; Mk. 16:19). In Acts 3:21 heaven receives Christ in virtue of its concealing function. In Eph. 4:9-10, however, the picture differs. Christ ascends above the heavens, shattering the isolation imposed by evil forces. The ascent is Christ’s triumphal procession through the subjugated zones of heaven. A similar thought is present in Rom. 10:6-7. In Jn. 3:13 only he who comes from heaven can mount up to it. God’s saving will characterizes the heaven from which Jesus comes and to which he returns. The divine will and plan are “heavenly things” (3:12). The incarnation does not interrupt fellowship with the Father, for heaven is open to the Son (1:51), and he has his true existence there (15:16, 19; 1 Jn. 4:6). Coming from heaven, he is the true bread from heaven (6:41, 50-51). Only God can give this bread; it is uniquely the bread of God that gives life to the world (v. 33). Hebrews refers to Christ’s session at God’s right hand in heaven (8:1) and also to his passing through the heavens (4:14), or into heaven as the innermost sanctuary (9:24). Where heaven is the innermost sanctuary, it is thought of eschatologically as the perfect tent not made with hands. It is here in the presence of God that he has offered his once-for-all sacrifice of himself. Before God’s face there are no more types or shadows but fulfilment. God is both high above heaven and yet also in heaven. In Col. 3:1 heaven is where Christ is, but only in the sense that this defines the purpose rather than the nature of heaven, i.e., to denote the right hand of God. In 1 Cor. 15:47 Christ is the second man from heaven in contrast to Adam as the first man from earth. Behind the phrase lies the idea of the primal man that is also found in Philo (with Platonic links). But Paul’s use is different, for he stresses sṓma, and his man from heaven belongs to the eschatological present understood as the last time. He thus selects the phrase more from the standpoint of exaltation, i.e.., the victory over death, than from that of eternity. The Christ who rose in the sóma, and is awaited from heaven, is the Christ who has come already in the incarnation. He is the initiator of the aeon of resurrection.

4. Heaven Opened. At the baptism of Jesus opened heaven corresponds to eschatological expectation. God is at hand in him (cf. Mt. 3:16). In Jn. 1:51 heaven is always open to Jesus. He is Bethel, the gate of heaven on earth. Opened heaven enables faith to see his glory (cf. Acts 7:56). Christ's messianic work is the basis of the opening of heaven. Hence the vision of open heaven in Rev. 19:11 is the revelation of Jesus Christ (1:1). Heaven is here a temple into which a door is opened (4:1). Peter receives his vision, too, from this opened heaven (Acts 10:11, 16; 11:5).

5. Heaven as the Starting Point of the Event of Revelation. God's revelations come from heaven. The voice at the baptism (Mk. 1:11) is God's authoritative voice initiating the eschatological aeon. The same applies to Jn. 12:28 and cf. Mk. 9:7; Rev. 10:4, 8; 11:12, etc., although in Revelation the voices are probably those of angels speaking with divine authority. Heb. 12:25 is perhaps referring to God's speaking from heaven. Like the voice, the Spirit also comes from heaven (Mk. 1:10; cf. Jn. 1:32). He is sent from heaven in 1 Pet. 1:12 (cf. Acts 2:2). Heaven denotes origin and authority. John's baptism is from heaven; hence its validity (Mk. 11:30). Not to acknowledge this baptism is to render futile the seeking of a sign from heaven (Mk. 8:11). The light from heaven in Acts 9:3 is a light from the Lord that leads to faith and knowledge. Jn. 3:27 says that we can receive only what is given from heaven; the reference is to the exclusiveness of God's saving lordship (cf. 6:65; 19:11). All giving is from the dominion of the Father of Jesus and beyond human control or influence. In Rom. 1:18 God's wrath is also revealed from heaven in and with the revelation of righteousness. OT figures are used to depict wrath concretely, e.g., fire from heaven (Lk. 9:54), or hail stones from heaven (Rev. 16:21). Closed heaven may also be a form of wrath, i.e., the withholding of rain and fruitfulness (Lk. 4:25; Jms. 5:18; Rev. 11:6).

6. Heaven and the Blessings of Salvation. As God's throne and the place from which Christ comes and to which he returns, heaven is a focus for present and future blessings in the new aeon, e.g., citizenship (Phil. 3:20), dwelling (2 Cor. 5:1), inheritance (1 Pet. 1:4), reward (Mt. 5:12), and treasure (6:20). Being in heaven, these blessings are with God or Christ, with whom believers already are, although incomprehensibly. The new Jerusalem is also present in heaven in the same reality and concealment (Rev. 3:12; 21:2, 10; cf. Heb. 12:22, 25).

7. Heaven and the Angels. Heaven is the sphere of angels and is served by them (Mt. 18:10). They come from it and return to it (Mt. 28:2; Lk. 2:15). The divine in Rev. 10:1 etc. sees them there. Their heavenly origin denotes their divine authority. If evil powers also seem to live in heaven (1 Cor. 8:5; Acts 7:42), the reference here seems to be to the firmament (though cf. Lk. 10:18; Rev. 12:7ff.). Satan's fall from heaven means that he can no longer stand in God's presence (Rev. 12:10). Since God's will is done in heaven, it is summoned to rejoice with those who overcome (12:12). Heaven is defined here in terms of the perfect service of God.

8. Heaven as the Firmament. This is the meaning when Jesus and others lift up their eyes to heaven (Mk. 6:41; Jn. 17:1; Acts 1:11). The sky hides God's throne but also signifies his ruling presence. Oaths and prayers are directed to it, i.e., to God. It also denotes the height of human arrogance (Mt. 11:23). Hypocrites interpret the signs in it but not the signs of the times (Lk. 12:56). Birds fly in it (Mt. 6:26). Stars falling from it are apocalyptic signs (Mk. 13:25). The final catastrophe is a collapse of the vault of heaven that shakes its powers (Mt. 24:29; Mk. 13:25).

9. Heaven in the Plural. Paul speaks of a rapture to the third heaven in 2 Cor. 12:2 (cf. v. 3) but says nothing specific about the three heavens. The things he hears are árrēta: they may not and cannot be uttered. The heavens of Hebrews are filled with ministering angels.

E. The Apostolic Fathers. The use in the apostolic fathers is much the same as that of the NT (and the LXX in 1 Clement). 1 Clement usually quotes in the singular but itself has the plural. There are OT and even Stoic echoes in what it says about God's creating and sustaining the heavens. Barnabas has OT quotations and touches on the ascension. In Hermas Visions 1.1.4 heaven opens and closes for the vision. Its unattainable height plays a role in Mandates 11.18. Did. 8.2 has the singular in the Lord's Prayer, and in 16.6 the opening of heaven is an apocalyptic sign. In Mart. Pol. 9. 1 Polycarp hears a voice from heaven, and in 14.1 he prays toward heaven. Gnostic influences may be seen in 2 Clem. 1. 16.3. Diog. 5.9 says that while Christians live on earth they are citizens of heaven. God sends down his truth and Logos, the Creator of the heavens, from heaven (7.2). In Ignatius Smyrneans 11.2 the work of believers is to be perfect on earth and in heaven, and in Ephesians 19.2 a star in heaven marks the incarnation.

ouránios. This word means "heavenly" with reference either to the sky or to the abode of the gods or to the gods themselves. With the latter reference, it has the sense of "divine." The immortal gods (especially Zeus) are heavenly beings. With the former reference, the word is used for the sun, the stars, the course of the stars, the pole, etc. Plato also connects the term with his ideas. In Gnosticism heavenly beings are intermediaries furnished with bodies. Philo speaks of the heavenly man by participation in whom we all dwell in heaven. "Heavenly" for him denotes divine origin; he can thus speak of heavenly virtue, insight, word, message, etc. For Josephus the word is imprecise. Pagan gods are heavenly, but so is the theme of philosophy. The LXX hardly uses the term, though there are a few instances in the pseudepigrapha. God opens the heavenly gates in 3 Macc. 6:18, and his host is heavenly in 4 Macc. 4:11. God is the heavenly Lord in 1 Esdr. 6:14. His children are heavenly in 2 Macc. 7:34, but in the sense that they have entered the heavenly sphere. The main NT use is in the phrase "your or my heavenly Father" (Mt. 5:48; 6:14; 15:13; 18:35). What is stressed here is the Father's openness and power as he effects the saving transition of the aeons. In Lk. 2:13 the host is heavenly; it consists of servants of God proclaiming from heaven God's saving work in the Savior's birth. Paul's vision in Acts 26:19 is heavenly; the vision is from the Lord and displays his resurrection power. In the apostolic fathers the only instance is in Mart. Pol. 22.3, which calls Christ's kingdom heavenly (cf. Diog. 10.2).

epouránios. ep- in this word means "at" or "in" rather than "upon." The term is used for the gods who dwell in heaven and come from it. It also has the sense of belonging to heaven. The divine word is said to be epouránios, and so is God, according to the Hermetic writings. epouránia are heavenly things. The term is rare in the LXX, but Philo uses it. In the NT it occurs both as an adjective and as a noun. Ephesians has the phrase "in the heavenlies" in 1:3, 20; 2:6; 3:10; 6:12. In some instances the meaning is much the same as "in the heavens." God's throne, government, and right hand belong here; this is the world of God and Christ. Yet in 4:10 Christ is exalted above the heavenly world and reigns over it. This world is filled with spiritual forces that constitute and dominate it. Christians share in Christ's rule over it (2:6), and in Christ they have blessings in it (1:3). They can with stand its forces as they follow Christ in his march through it (4:9-10). Through them God's mystery is disclosed to it (3:10). The phrase "in the heavenlies" brings out the cosmic significance of the event of revelation. In Hebrews the word is given its stamp by the idea of the heavenly sanctuary which the heavenly high priest enters to do his work (8:5; 9:23). The heavenly things are the truly real and eschatologically future things (8:2; 10:1). They stand for the consummation, and are not set in antithesis but simply in comparison (8:5; 9:23). Their essence lies in God's presence, from and to which alone there is reality (9:24). The inheritance is heavenly in virtue of its origin and goal (3:1). The heavenly gift (6:4) is eschatological salvation. The country (11:16) and Jerusalem (12:22) are heavenly because they are the final aim. The broad canvas of 12:22ff. also includes innumerable angels, the festal gathering, the firstborn enrolled in heaven, God the Judge, and Jesus the Mediator. In 2 Tim. 4:18 the kingdom of Christ is called heavenly with an emphasis on its consummation. In Phil. 2:6ff. "every knee" of Is. 45:23 is said to apply to heaven, earth, and under the earth. Heavenly powers, too, will recognize Christ's lordship, whether angels or hostile forces. In 1 Cor. 15:40 heavenly bodies exceed earthly bodies in glory. In vv. 48-49 the meaning is that as we have borne the image of the earthly one, so we shall bear the image of the heavenly one, i.e., we shall have membership in the risen Christ. In Jn. 3:12 the heavenly things embrace the descent and return of the Son of Man (vv. 13ff.) as these are grounded in the love of God and effected by the obedience of Jesus. They express the divine secret of revelation in the Son. In the apostolic fathers the plural noun occurs only in Ignatius for "heavenly spirits" (Smyrneans 6. 1). The term is used for God in 1 Clem. 61.2 and for Jesus in Mart. Pol. 14.3, both times with "eternal."

ouranóthen. This word means "from heaven" in the various senses of heaven. The LXX has it only in 4 Macc. 4:10. Philo uses it once in allegorical exposition of Ex. 22:25. The two NT instances are both in Acts. In 14:17 rain comes down from heaven both as falling from the sky and as sent from God. In 26:13 the light shines from the sky but it also shines forth from the Revealer. Pouring forth from him, it pierces the firmament. [H. TRAUB, V, 509-43]

oús [ear], ōtíon [outer ear], ōtárion [outer ear], enōtízomai [to hear] oús.

A. Outside the NT.

1. Greek Usage. In Homer this word means the "ear" and also the "handle" of vessels. It is common later for the human or animal "ear." It occurs in various phrases, e.g., to bring to the ear, to strike the ear, to lend one's ears, to stop one's ears. The movement of air is thought to have a role in the hearing process, but the will can open or close the ears. The ear has a place in revelation as the organ for divine communications. Depictions of the ears of the gods may imply a request for hearing. Other votive ears may be ears cured of deafness or they may denote the hearing of requests. The Greeks, however, lay less stress on the ears of deity than Near Eastern lands. The use for "handle" as well as "ear" may be found in the papyri.

2. The OT.

a. The "ear" (Heb.'āḇîḇ) is first the natural "ear" both human and animal (Gen. 35:4). Ears are adorned with pendants and rings. The ears of perpetual slaves are bored (Ex. 21:6).

b. The ear also denotes the function of hearing. By it statements and orders are noted. "Before the ears" for "in the presence" is a phrase that shows its importance (Gen. 23:10). Being heard, the spoken word is not just the expression of a thought but a concrete process (Gen. 20:8). The written word is meant to be heard (cf. Ex. 17:14; Dt. 31:11). When something important is revealed, the ear is uncovered (1 Sam. 20:2). The righteous stop their ears from hearing bloodshed (Is. 33:15). The ear is itself a subject in its critical activity (Job 12:11).

c. God has created the ear (Ps. 94:9), and we are thus responsible for its proper use. The greatest thing we can hear is God's word as it comes to and through the prophet (Is. 22:14). Yet more than natural hearing is needed for this; the ear may hear and yet be deaf (Is. 6:9-10). God himself decides whether to open the ear for understanding and faith (Is. 48:6ff.). Deaf ears will be opened in the messianic age (35:5). In priestly consecration the ears are important organs of priestly action and receive a sacred character by smearing with the sacrificial blood (Ex. 29:20).

d. The OT often refers to God's ears (e.g., Num. 14:28; 1 Sam. 8:21). Since the futile ears of idols are ridiculed (Ps. 135:17), the emphasis is on God's hearing and answering of prayer. That the thought is seen to be anthropomorphic emerges plainly in Ps. 94:9. The NT avoids such expressions except when quoting the OT.

3. Philo and Josephus.

a. Philo follows the OT pattern as regards the creation and use of the ear, but also attempts a natural explanation of hearing and a teleology of the ear along the lines of Greek philosophy. Greek influence may also be seen in his concern lest things heard by the ear should have a disruptive effect, in his giving precedence to the eye over the ear, and in his theory that the soul really hears rather than the physical organ.

b. Josephus, too, adopts the Greek differentiation of the soul from the body, and he thus offers a different presentation of the scene in Ex. 17:14 (Antiquities 3.59-60); cf. also Dt. 21:11 (Antiquities 4.210). The prophetic word comes through the souls of the prophets rather than their eyes or ears.

4. The Rabbis. The ear is of basic significance for the rabbis. God speaks into the ears of the prophets as we shout into the ears of neighbors. He has to incline to our weak ears. Human ears should be attuned to the law. Those who expound the law must bend their ears to it so that their hearers will hear aright. When God's voice sounds forth, it is not mystical but is heard with the actual ear; however, this rarely occurs. God judges the ear; hence one should not listen to unprofitable talk.

B. The NT.

1. The Synoptic Gospels and Acts.

a. Like the OT, the NT thinks of hearing in terms of the physical ear. Jesus heals real ears in Mk. 7:33; Lk. 22:50-51.

b. It is to the ear that Jesus speaks his message. He seeks to strike the real ears of hearers in their specific time and situation. His message is "today" an eschatological event (Lk. 4:21). The warning is given to hearers that they should have ears to hear (Mt. 11:15; 13:43; Mk. 4:9). The point is not just good hearing but right hearing.

c. In Mk. 7:31ff. a messianic sign is given (Is. 35:5-6) with the opening of the ears of the deaf man. In this instance Jesus does not shun using popular medicine to show on what members the miracle may be expected.

d. The ears of the disciples are blessed because they hear the proclamation of the age of salvation (Mt. 13:16). Jesus himself is the mystery of this age, and what they hear from him they are to tell on the housetops (Mt. 10:27). They must first be hearers before they can be preachers. The warning in Lk. 9:44 points to the mystery of the messianic way of suffering which only believing ears will later understand. In Lk. 1:44 the Holy Spirit has to open Elizabeth's ears to the true meaning of Mary's greeting; both women are in the sphere of the messianic event and the operation of the Spirit.

e. The true mystery of the divine rule of Jesus lies hidden in parables that some people hear only with the natural ear (Mk. 4:1ff. Faith and understanding are connected with true hearing (cf. Mk. 4:20; Mt. 13:23; Lk. 8:15). In Lk. 4:21 the point is that the fulfilment is in the person of the one who puts it in their ears, so that it ought to penetrate their hearts as a living word. But hearing may bring hardening instead of faith (cf. the free rendering of Is. 6:9-10 in Mt. 13:1lff.; Lk. 8:10). While John (12:40) refers this prophecy to all the teaching of Jesus, the Synoptists refer it specifically to the parables. What distinguishes those who hear with faith and understanding from those who hear only with the natural ears is an awareness of the dawn of the divine lordship as it is visibly and audibly set before them in the person of him who proclaims it. The hína has the force of a very serious "in order that," but the mḗpote ("unless perhaps") leaves open a possibility of grace and conversion. Only God can open the ears, but the challenge to hear retains its full seriousness if the ear is to grasp this most astonishing of all messages. The disciples who do hear are like the remnant of Isaiah, and their ears are therefore blessed (Mt. 13:16). Yet even their ears have no certainty of true hearing (Mk. 8:18). They cannot take their understanding for granted but must strive to hear responsibly.

f. In Acts uncircumcision of the ears is connected with resistance to the work of the Holy Spirit (7:51). The stopping of the ears so as not to hear blasphemy is really a closing of the ears to the Spirit (v. 57). In Acts 28:25ff. Paul applies the saying in Is. 6:9-10 not merely to Jesus' own ministry but to the apostolic ministry. In contrast to unbelieving Jews, the Gentiles to whom he has been sent will listen.

2. Paul's Epistles. In Rom. 11:8, which quotes Dt. 29:3 supported by Is. 29:10, Paul echoes Is. 6:9-10. Trying to understand why Israel does not believe, he finds a divine stupefying that results in unseeing eyes and unhearing ears. In 1 Cor. 2:9 (which echoes Is. 64:3; 65:17; Jer. 3:16) eye, ear, and heart must first be freed by the Spirit if they are to see the good things that God has prepared for those who love him (cf. v.10). The ear is one of the parts of the body listed in 1 Cor. 12:16.

3. The Catholic Epistles. In these epistles we have references to God's ears in OT quotations (Jms. 5:4 quoting Is. 5:9 and 1 Pet. 3:12 quoting Ps. 34:15). 1 Pet. 3:12 links the assurance of being heard with calling (v. 9) and obedience (v. 8).

4. Revelation. In each of the seven letters Revelation issues the challenge of Jesus to hear what the Spirit is saying (2:7, 11, 17, 29; 3:6, 13, 22). By the Spirit the risen Lord has a message for the readers and hearers of the prophecy (1:3). In 13:9 the shortened form of the common warning gives urgency to the threat and to the call for vigilance.

ōtíon. This diminutive means the "lobe" or "little ear." In the NT it occurs only in Mt. 26:51 (the cutting off of the ear at the arrest of Jesus). Lk. 22:50 uses oús and adds that it is the right ear. The healing love of Jesus stands in contrast here to the violence of a disciple who has not grasped the hour (Lk. 22:51).

ōtárion. This is another diminutive. It occurs in the NT in Mk. 14:47 and Jn. 18:10 in the story of the cutting off of the (right) ear at the arrest.

enōtízomai. This word, which means "to hear," "to listen," occurs in the NT only in Acts 2:14, where Peter asks his hearers seriously to listen to what he has to say. [F. HAUCK, V, 543-59]

opheílō [to owe, be under obligation], opheilḗ [debt, obligation], opheílēma [debt, obligation], opheilétēs [debtor, someone under obligation] opheílō.

A. Outside the NT.

1. Etymologically obscure, this word means "to owe someone something," e.g. loans, debts, sums, or rents. The things owed may be spiritual, and the word is also used with the infinitive for "to be under obligation to," "to have to." The word is common in respect of revenge or law. Transgressors are in debt to injured parties. Secular and sacral penalties are owed. God's goodness also makes people debtors. This gives rise to the idea of moral obligation.

2. Rare in the LXX, opheílein is used for owing money (Dt. 15:2), for owing offerings (Prov. 14:9), and for owing penalties (Job 6:20). The sense "I ought to" occurs in Wis. 12:15; 4 Macc. 11:15. Only in the basic sense of owing money is there a Hebrew original. The OT thinks more in terms of obedience to the divine law than of inner obligation, but the idea develops that sin is indebtedness to God.

3. Philo follows Greek usage in speaking about inner moral obligation. This derives from the relation to God, from creation, and from law and sacred custom. Thus priests are under obligation to set aside secular things, the Gentiles owe worship to God, parents and children are under mutual obligations, physical cleanness is demanded as a sign of moral purity, and judges must be just to dispense justice.

4. Later Judaism often applies the idea of indebtedness to God, e.g., through falling into arrears in good works. Debt, then, becomes a common term for sin, and one's record with God is presented in financial terms. God will remit part of the debt in consideration of fasting, and payments can be made to offset arrears in the hope of a final balance.

B. The NT.

1. The opheil- group is common in the NT, and the use in Matthew is close to that of Judaism. Jesus often speaks about people being debtors to God (Mt. 6:12; 18:23ff.; Lk. 7:41; 17:10), but only in Mt. 6:12 is sin specifically equated with debt. Jesus uses the illustration of debt to explain the human situation vis-à-vis God. The debt is so great that no good deeds can offset it. We are totally dependent on the divine mercy. Remission is a matter of grace, but it imposes a corresponding obligation to forgive others. Refusal to do this brings with it the severe judgment of God. In Mt. 6:12 the readiness to remit the debts of others does not constitute a claim for divine remission but simply shows that no implacability on our part stands in the way of remission. In Mt. 23:16, 18 the oath imposes an obligation to God. Jesus uses opheílein with the infinitive only in Lk. 17:10 and Jn. 13:14. In general he does not refer to human obligations but speaks in direct imperatives, thus giving his demands an unconditional character.

2. In Phlm. 18 the word bears the literal sense. In Jn. 19:7 the point is that he "ought" to die (cf. Mt. 26:66). In Heb. 5:3 the reference is to the priest's legal duty. In 1 Cor. 11:7, 10 Paul finds in the Jewish custom something that is grounded in creation. In Rom. 13:8 he puns on the word; we are to owe nothing but love, which places us under an infinite obligation. In Rom. 15:1 we should support the weak, and in 15:27 we should repay spiritual goods with material goods. In 2 Th. 1:3; 2:13 thanksgiving is an obligation, and various other obligations are parental duty (2 Cor. 12:14), marital love (Eph. 5:28), sanctification (1 Jn. 2:6), self-sacrifice (3:16), love (4:11), and hospitality (3 Jn. 8). In the main these obligations toward others develop out of the preceding act of God or Christ, as the sentence construction shows (Rom. 15:3; Eph. 5:28, etc.).

3. A weaker sense of obligation may be found in Acts 17:20; 1 Cor. 5:10; Heb. 5:12.

opheilḗ. This word is common in the papyri for financial debts. In the NT it is used for debts in Mt. 18:32, for taxes and obligations (e.g., honor) in Rom. 13:7, and for the mutual obligations of spouses in 1 Cor. 7:3.

1. This word means "debt" and in a broader sense "obligation." It occurs in the LXX for "debt" in Dt. 24:10. In later Judaism it is a common term for "sin." In the NT it occurs in Mt. 6:12 for "debt" in the sense of "sin" (cf. hamartía in Lk. 11:4). Paul uses it in Rom. 4:4: The reward for works is "something that is due."

opheilétēs.

1. This word first means "debtor." It has this sense in the NT in Mt. 18:24. In Jewish usage it also denotes one who is guilty of a fault (cf. Mt. 6:12; Lk. 13:4).

2. The word then means "someone who is under an obligation." Paul owes the gospel to Greeks and barbarians (Rom. 1:14), Gentile Christians owe the mother community material support (Rom. 15:27), those who accept circumcision are debtors to the whole law (Gal. 5:3), and those who trust in Christ are no longer debtors to the flesh. [F. HAUCK, V, 559-66]

óphis [snake, serpent]

A. The Serpent in Antiquity.

1. As an Animal. As an alien animal the snake kindles similar reactions of aversion in various peoples. Its form of movement, its gliding, its stare, its sudden appearances, and its association with poison give rise to the idea that it is cunning, malicious, and hostile, although house snakes are often almost domestic pets.

2. As a Hostile Animal in Religious History. The snake as a hostile animal is often depicted in attempts to create fear, e.g., in descriptions of the underworld, or on the headband of the Egyptian king. From this it is only a step to the use of the dragon for chaos. The primal sea encompasses the earth like a serpent. In dualistic religions the serpent is a demonic animal in a narrower sense.

3. The Earthly Nature of the Serpent in Religious History. Creeping on the ground, the snake is a chthonic animal. It is dedicated to the gods of inner earth or connected with the god of ocean depths. In Greece it is associated with earth deities (Hecate, Demeter, and Kore) and with the realm of the dead. It is thus also a mantic animal which appears in dreams and gives oracles.

4. As an Animal of Life. By association with the resources of the earth the serpent can also become a symbol of fertility or a phallic symbol, thus appearing in birth stories. The sloughing off of its skin denotes rejuvenation. In places it is worshipped as divine. Egyptians keep snakes in their temples and domestic snakes are venerated. From ancient times serpents have connections with the worship of Zeus, and the serpent has an important role in Orphic cosmogony.

5. Summary. By a circular route the serpent of chaos becomes the primal serpent. This duality corresponds to that of nature, which gives life and also destroys life. Its alien character gives the serpent its preeminent role in religion. In the light of Scripture, however, the elevation of this cunning and harmful creature into a symbol of deity is a sinister indication of the intermingling of God and the devil. [W. FOERSTER, V, 566-71]

B. The Serpent in the OT.

1. Linguistic Data. Snakes are common in Palestine, and the OT uses various terms for them, not all of which can be translated with zoological precision. In addition to ordinary snakes we find supernatural references or allusions in Is. 14:29; Ex. 7:9-10; Job 7:12; Is. 51:9; Ps. 104:26, etc. The snake is unclean in Israel because of its veneration by other peoples; it is not, then, to be used in sacrifice. (For details cf. TDNT V, 571-72.)

2. The Nature of the Serpent. The OT observes the serpent with some precision, noting its strange progression, its hissing, its sudden attacks, its dangerous bite and poison (Gen. 3:14; Jer. 46:22; Gen. 49:17; Num. 21:6). protection against it is a vivid metaphor for the divine protection (Ps. 91:13). It is a cunning animal that stands under God's curse (Gen. 3:1, 14-15). It thus symbolizes malignity (Dt. 32:33). It serves God when he punishes his people (Num. 21:6). In the last days peace with the snake is one of the marks of the messianic kingdom (Is. 11:8). [O. GRETHER and W. FOERSTER, V, 571-73]

3. Gen. 3. The serpent has an important role in Gen. 3. The story is not a snake myth, for the serpent's role is secondary and is only that of a creature. Yet supernatural elements are used in depicting the serpent, e.g., its cunning, its knowledge of hidden things, and its hostile intentions. There are parallels elsewhere for the serpent's hostility to God and its purpose to destroy life. There is no actual parallel, however, to the biblical story of the fall, which engages in a measure of demythologizing by making the serpent so plainly a creature and asserting the sole deity of God as Creator and Lord. The tension in the story arises out of the tension in the human situation as the original harmony with God has been lost through apostasy. This apostasy is the result of a human decision, yet the impulse toward it comes from outside, and the serpent serves very well to suggest that behind the insoluble mystery of the entrance of evil into the good world of God lies the presence or activity of a force that is inimical to God. According to the sentence of Gen. 3:15 the cooperation between the serpent and humanity is turned into hostile confrontation. The reference is not simply to the natural threat of snakes but to the profounder threat presented by the power which is hostile to God and which continually presses humanity toward sin and death. Gen. 3:15 does not clearly predict an end to this conflict, but in the light of the new creation Christ may be validly seen as the serpent's conqueror.

4. Num. 21. The story of the brazen serpent (Num. 21:4ff.; Dt. 8:15) is theologically important. In contrast to other stories of murmuring, this story does not depict God as helping the whole people but only those who look at the symbol. The meaning is not, of course, that the looking has a quasi-magical effect, but that God has set up a sign of salvation that all can see and that can thus bring help to all who will turn to him. [J. FICHTNER, V, 573-76]

C. The Serpent in Later Judaism.

1. The LXX.

a. Linguistic Data. The LXX uses various words for the many Hebrew terms, e.g., óphis, drákōn, aspís, ékgona, aspídōn, basilískos, kerástēs. Oddly, the rams of Jer. 50:8 become serpents (drákontes) in the LXX version. (For details cf. TDNT, V, 576.)

b. Material Data. In dealing with mythological allusions the LXX sometimes takes the way of excision (Is. 51:9), sometimes leaves names like Rahab as they stand (Ps. 87:4), and sometimes makes an ethical and religious application (Job 26:13; Ps. 89:10).

2. The Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, and Rabbis.

a. Metaphors. In these works serpents are often used for metaphorical purposes. The rabbis allude to the cunning of serpents. Their crooked ways are compared to those of government. The serpent illustrates cunning temptation in 4 Macc. 18:8, and Gentile kings display the poison of dragons and venom of asps in Damascus Document 8:9ff.

b. Mythological Echoes. Bel and the Dragon alludes to the temple snakes of Babylon. Slavonic Enoch depicts the gates of Hades as great serpents. Hades itself is a serpent in Apoc. Abr. 31:7. In the pseudepigrapha and rabbinic works Leviathan and Behemoth will be food for the righteous in the messianic age.

c. The Serpent of Paradise. At first no clear relation is seen between Satan and the serpent, but later the serpent is called an instrument of the devil, and then the two are equated. Attempts are made to supply motives for the serpent's actions, e.g., jealousy of Adam, refusal to bow to his rule, the desire for world dominion, and sexual desire.

d. Num. 21. One interesting comment on this story associates the healing, not with the brazen serpent as such, but with sincere subjection to the heavenly Father.

e. The Serpent and the Demonic. In the rabbis the serpent is close to the demonic world, as in occasional statements to the effect that demons and dragons howl in the desert, or that a dragon is the form in which an evil spirit is manifested. In view of the prodigal use of serpents in pagan religion the rabbinic aversion to snakes is understandable.

D. The Serpent in the NT.

l. In Similitudes. In Mt. 22:33 the serpent represents what is dangerous and malevolent. In Mk. 16:17-18 taking up serpents is a sign of the new aeon (cf. Lk. 10:19, where that which is menacing in natural as well as human life belongs to the kingdom of Satan). In Mt. 7:9-10 (cf. Lk. 11:11) the second member is sharper than the first, for a stone is useless but a serpent harmful. The point of the saying is that what is given in answer to prayer will be good. As regards Mt. 10:16 there are rabbinic parallels and the saying may well be proverbial. A direct reference to the fall is unlikely. The memorable feature in the exhortation is the unexpected combining of a serpent's cunning and a dove's innocence. Rev. 9:19 describes horses with tails like serpents. Their power to poison is thus worse than the power of the locusts (8:7ff.) to sting.

2. The Serpent of Paradise. Rev. 12:9 and 20:2 use the rabbinic expression "the ancient serpent," equating the óphis (or drákōn) with Satan. 2 Cor. 11:3 alludes to the deceiving of Eve by the serpent. It is unlikely that he has sexual temptation in view. In 1 Tim. 2:14-15 the point is the woman's receptivity to cunning arguments, and it is probably against this that Paul is warning the community in 2 Corinthians. The promise of Rom. 16:20 obviously rests on Gen. 3:15.

Apoc. Apocrypha

3. The Brazen Serpent. Paul refers to the brazen serpent in 1 Cor. 10:9 (perhaps with Ps. 78:18 in mind). Jesus uses the story in Jn. 3:14-15 to bring out the significance of his lifting up. The christological reference is distinctive.

E. Gnosticism. In Gnosticism the serpent plays a varied role, mostly as a symbol of evil. The drákōn is Satan, the tempter. Óphis is one of the devil's names. The drákōn is also equated with matter, which drags humanity down. Yet some sects call wisdom a serpent and oppose it to the demiurge. [W. FOERSTER, V, 576-82]

óchlos [crowd, throng, common people]

A. Nonbiblical Usage.

1. óchlos first means "crowd," a. as a "throng," b. as "the public" as distinct from private persons or small groups, and c. as "the mass" or "mob."

2. A second meaning is "host," "troop," "army," used especially for a. "lightly armed troops," b. the "baggage train," c. "common soldiers," d. "mercenaries," and e. "an irregular armed mass."

3. The word also has the sense of "people" or "population."

4. As a measure óchlos is a "great number."

5. A final sense is "unsettlement" or "harassment." [R. MEYER, V, 582-84]

B. OT Usage.

1. Canonical Books. Almost completely absent from the older books, óchlos occurs later in such senses as a. "crowd," "assembly," b. "camp followers," "troops," "levy," or "armed mob," and c. "great number."

2. Apocrypha. The word has here such customary senses as a. "crowd," b. "army" or "camp followers," and c. "population."

C. óchlos as a Rabbinic Loanword. The rabbis use óchlos as a loanword (both Hebrew and Aramaic) for a "crowd," an "army," a "train" (of stars), and a "great number." [P. KATZ, V, 584-85]

D. NT Usage.

I. The Meaning.

1. Crowd of People.

a. Except for Rev. 7:9; 19:1, 6, óchlos occurs only in the Gospels and Acts. In the former it usually denotes the crowd that runs to Jesus (Mt. 13:2), seeks him or goes to him (Lk. 8:40; Jn. 12:9), and accompanies him (Mk. 5:27; Lk. 7:9). Jesus calls it to him (Mk. 7:14) and pities it (Mk. 6:34). It wants to see his miracles (Lk. 6:19). Sometimes it throngs him (Mk. 3:9). It is closer to him than his family (Mk. 3:31ff.). It expresses joy, admiration, astonishment, and fear (Mt. 7:28; 9:8).

b. After Jesus finishes his acts or addresses, he leaves the people (Mt. 13:36). He then deals more specifically with the disciples (cf. Mk. 6:45). He heals the deaf mute away from the crowd in Mk. 7:33. The crowd argues about him (cf. Lk. 9:18). It welcomes him in Mt. 21:1ff.; the reference here is to Galilean pilgrims as distinct from the population of Jerusalem (v. 10). He is the subject of debate in Jn. 12:43 and prays for the people in Jn. 11:42.

c. The masses are at times distinguished from the rulers (cf. Mt. 14:5; Mk. 15:15), although the latter have to take them into account (cf. Mk. 11:18; Mt. 21:26). Jesus is accused of inciting the masses (Jn. 7:12; cf. Acts 24:12, 18). The rulers' scorn of the crowd comes out in Jn. 7:49. Fickle and easily swayed by propaganda, the crowd is induced to condemn Jesus (Mk. 15:11; cf. Lk. 23:48). The relation of the crowd to the apostles is similar (cf. Acts 8:6; 13:45; 14:11, 19; 17:8, 13, etc.).

2. "Host," "troop." This is the meaning in Mk. 14:43.

3. “People.” The plural means “hosts of peoples” in Rev. 17:15.
4. Only Luke uses the term as a measure (Lk. 5:29; 6:17; Acts 1:15; 6:7; 11:24, 26).

II. óchlos and ʿam hāʾāreṣ.

1. The Johannine óchlos. The word has a special sense in John. It may have different references, e.g., to a Galilean crowd in 6:2 etc., or to the Jewish public in 7:11-12, or to the masses as distinct from the rulers (7:49), or to pilgrims at the feast (12:12), or to the many who believe because of Lazarus (12:9; cf. v. 11). In general, however, John has in view the common people, many of whom believe, many are opposed, and many also believe at first but then fall away.

2. The ʿam hāʾāreṣ. The judgment of the Pharisees in 7:49 stamps this crowd as a rabble that does not really know or keep the law. It is the ʿam hāʾāreṣ. This term goes back to the OT and is at first a sociological one for the nobility or land-owning class. Later, however, it becomes a religious term for ordinary people who irrespective of social position do not live strictly according to the demands of the law. After A.D. 70 the Pharisees, by their ideological and organizational superiority, take advantage of political events to subjugate the ʿam hāʾāreṣ to the rabbinate. Jn. 7:49 still contains a measure of social as well as religious contempt. This is probably because the common people, and especially Galileans, are more attracted to the message of Jesus in view of their eschatological hopes and their dislike of legalism. When Jesus disappoints these hopes his influence on the people wanes, and after the failure of major and minor revolts, and the destruction of the temple hierarchy, they fall under rabbinic control. [R. MEYER, V, 585-90]

This is a military term for a “fortified place.” It is used only in the literal sense in secular Greek, but the LXX introduces a figurative usage (2 Sam. 22:2; Prov. 10:29). Here God is the stronghold. Philo then employs the term for the bastion of vaunting human reason (On the Confusion of Tongues 129-30). This is close to Paul’s use of the term in 2 Cor. 10:4. Like Philo, he may have the tower of Babel in view, but he certainly wishes to stress both the strength of philosophical structures and even more so the power of spiritual weapons (under God) to lay them low. [H. W. HEIDLAND, V, 590-91]

opsṓnion [wages]

This word means literally “what is appointed for buying food,” then “money,” then “military pay,” then more generally official “salaries or wages.”

1. In Lk. 3:14 the Baptist tells the soldiers to be content with their pay, putting God’s command above claims that they can make good only by force.

2. In 2 Cor. 11:8 Paul uses the word for the support that is given him by the churches, thus suggesting that his work is a form of warfare, that he has a valid claim to support (even though in a venture of faith he does not assert it), and possibly that any support given can never be adequate recompense but only an “allowance.”

3. In Rom. 6:23 the use of the word brings out three important points: a. that sin is a deceiver, promising subsistence but delivering death; b. that as wages are not a single payment, so death already casts its active shadow on life in an ongoing process; and c. that in contrast to the gift of life we have here a right, but a right that carries only judgment with it. [H. W. HEIDLAND, V, 591-92]

pagís. This word means "what fastens" or "holds fast." It is often used for a "net" or "snare" as well as for a "mousetrap." A vivid expression is "snatching at bread." Figuratively the word is often used in connection with seductive women. The Trojan horse is also called "wooden págis." A religious phrase is "to be caught in the net of Ate" (delusion or perdition or guilt). The LXX uses the term for snares, often figuratively (Ps. 69:22). The transferred sense stresses the crafty or destructive element (cf. Ps. 35:7). Often the suddenness of the destruction is to the fore. Later the usage is more stereotyped, e.g., for idolatry and for the "snares of the ungodly" (Jeremiah, Psalms, Proverbs). In Prov. 13:14 the reference seems to be to the divine punishment itself. The term is rare in the NT. In Lk. 21:34-35 Jesus warns his disciples to be on guard lest the last day come on them like a snare. 1 Tim. 3:7 warns bishops that bad conduct will bring them into disrepute and make them easy victims of the devil's wiles, so that they will be unfit for further service. 2 Tim. 2:25-26 shows that those who resist the Christian message are still in the snare of the devil; deluded by him, they are trapped into doing his will. The idea of gods and demons being equipped with traps and nets is ancient and widespread. The devil is not just an accuser but an active opponent who is at work to capture and destroy people. 1 Tim. 6:9 deals with the danger of the craving for wealth. This leads people into a snare. In the context of desires and destruction, this is clearly again the snare of the devil. In Rom. 11:9 (quoting Ps. 69:22), Paul uses pagís in connection with divine judgment. All that the people lives by and does is a snare, offense, and recompense. In the apostolic fathers Did. 2.4 uses the LXX phrase "snare of death" for a double-dealing tongue, and Barn. 19.8 uses it for the mouth in general.

pagideúō. This word occurs only in the biblical sphere and is perhaps coined by the LXX for "to lay a snare," "set a trap," "entice into a trap." The LXX uses it only in 1 Sam. 28:9 and Eccl. 9:12. Other versions of the OT have it in Ezek. 13:20-21; Is. 8:15; Prov. 6:2; 11:15. The only NT instance is in Mt. 22:15 where the Pharisees try to trap Jesus by asking him about paying taxes to Rome. [J. SCHNEIDER, V, 593-95]

paideúō [to train, instruct], paideía [education, instruction], paideutḗs [teacher], apaídeutos [untrained, uninstructed], paidagōgós [attendant,guide]

The words paideía and paideúō relate to the upbringing of children, who need direction, teaching, instruction, and discipline. Both the way of education and the goal are indicated by paideía. Other words in the group are paídeuma, paídeusis, and various compounds.

A. The Orientation of the Concept in the Greek World. The group characterizes Greek culture and has remained a basic one in the development of all Western civilization.

1. Home Education among the Greeks.

a. Up to the Sophists. paideía is not known in Homeric Greece, where nobility rules, aretḗ is a divine gift, upbringing is physical, and education is simply the handing down of uses and customs according to rank. The Sophists challenge the aristocratic principle and advance the idea that culture can be acquired by teaching, thus giving the paideía concept its orientation.

b. The Classical and Later Periods. Plato distinguishes vocational training from paideía but includes music and gymnastics. Parents are primarily responsible, but they need direction. Aristotle distinguishes age groups and regards reading and writing as essential. The goal of personal education is virtue, and happiness is brought by culture. In Stoicism the aim, by way of self-scrutiny, is Hellenistic cosmopolitanism. The Roman ideal of firmness of character as the goal of education has an impact here (cf.

also the Spartan system). A heroic attitude to fate offers freedom in relation to worldly values and makes even the renunciation of life easy. Plutarch argues that education is only for free males. The child is like the earth, the teacher like a farmer, the teaching like the seed. Boys are in the hands of carefully screened pedagogues, who, though slaves, are private tutors giving instruction in fear of God, uprightness, self-discipline, and courage. Parents must supervise, for culture is all-important, being divine and permanent. Above all, parents must teach by example. Fate itself plays a role in paideía by its chastisements, but the word is not used in nonbiblical Greek for corporal punishment.

*2. The Legislator and paideía. Education in Greece is a public affair, for the relation to the state is at issue. Hence even ideas about family education are presented as legal demands. Man is by nature ordained for paideía, and paideía serves the security of the state and individual integration into society. Laws, then, order education. paideía is what distinguishes humans from animals or Greeks from barbarians. Lying myths, Plato thinks, must be set aside, and virtue is of the essence of culture, which requires personal commitment. Aristotle argues that the state must impose education on all free men, although rulers will be marked by superior culture as well as riches. Law is for Aristotle the true pedagogue. Education serves a social end, i.e., integration into the political relations set up by law.

3. Religious Education. Greek paideía is fundamentally anthropocentric, each person being the measure of all things (Protagoras). Plato, however, introduces a transcendent absolute, thus giving paideía a theological aspect. Education presupposes knowledge of the good, which is theology. Reason may control education, but the cultivation and even the salvation of the soul is finally at issue. Aristotle, too, finds a place for theology, and his successors think paideía sets us on an equality with the gods. The anthropocentric element remains, but paideía rounds out human nature and fulfils its destiny by directing its strivings to the good.

B. Education in the OT.

1. God's Discipline by Law, and Wisdom. Originally the biblical tradition has no pedagogic vocabulary. God is holy, and he demands holiness from his chosen people. Breaches of holiness are either punished or expiated. Since holiness has a moral dimension, moral commandments are an obligation. God helps the covenant people to keep them by way of instruction, punishment, and reward. The record of God's acts, along with law and prophecy, stamps and fashions the people. The law especially is an educative force (Ps. 119). The father is its guardian, charged to teach the younger generation (Gen. 18:19). Its purpose is to serve as a standard for growth in faith and order. Of the many words for instruction, ysr (with musr) is the one that comes closest to the idea of education. It combines the ideas of moral "rearing," correction, and culture. It carries the thought of interpersonal relations and may refer to the training of the people as well as personal upbringing. It also carries the thought of censure, admonition, and disciplinary measures. Even corporal chastisement is included (Prov. 13:24), for it keeps from worse things (23:13) and gives hope of amendment (19:18). Yet it must be in love and not in anger. Fathers and mothers have a primary responsibility (1:8). Cultivation of the character of adults as well as the education of children is also at issue in Proverbs. The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom (1:7). The goal of instruction is wisdom, understanding, discipline, and integrity (1:2ff.). The law is a lamp and wisdom a light (6:23). What is sought is moral education. Poverty and shame pursue those who neglect it (13:18; 24:32). God is the ultimate source of all training. Trust in him is the content of instruction (3:11). God himself disciplines and corrects (Ps. 16:7). His absolute correction would destroy; hence the request for moderation (6:1; 38:1). This moderate chastisement is a blessing (94:12). It is that of a loving Father. It extends even to the Gentile world (94:10).

2. God’s Discipline in the Prophetic Revelation. The prophets relate God’s discipline to his historical acts rather than to teaching. As the point of the law, this discipline serves the whole people (cf. Hos. 10:12). The prophet has insight into the divine direction of events (cf. Is. 8:11), which may take very different turns (28:26). God teaches Israel by destroying Jerusalem (Zeph. 3:2, 7). Instruction is futile, however, in face of obduracy (Jer. 2:30; 5:3, etc.). Even so, God preserves his people and there is hope of renewal (Jer. 30:11; 31:18). Along similar lines, the sense of warning is present in Ezekiel (5:15; 23:48). The desert experiences are an example of divine instruction (Dt. 11:2). Since Israel is depicted as an individual, the intrinsically individual concept of education applies to it quite easily, though there is an application to righteous individuals as members of the covenant community.

3. The Reconstruction of the Concept in the Greek Translation of the OT. The depiction of God as Educator gives an anthropocentric turn to the theocentric character of the OT revelation. Problems of theodicy strengthen this trend, although the idea of testing preserves a more theocentric view. The notions of education and development remain on the margin in Scripture, and while the term paideía enables the translators of the OT to give a pedagogic interpretation of OT history, it acquires the new sense of chastisement in the process.

a. The Wisdom Literature. Here parental discipline is the setting for pedagogic thinking. The Greek term adapts itself to the original and often means “chastisement” (Prov. 29:19). Education by suffering is presupposed in Prov. 3:11-12. Yet the group also brings in cultural notions that are more characteristic of Hellenistic Judaism, e.g., that of intellectual instruction (Prov. 1:8; 4:1, 13, etc.). Wisdom is the ultimate teacher, working both through the law and through life, and comprising more than human reason. Later the thought of educative punishment is present (cf. Wisdom and Psalms of Solomon), though it is not easy to differentiate the disciplinary sufferings of the righteous from the penal sufferings of the wicked. The solution to the problem of theodicy is that a merciful God is in various ways, not always evident, the Educator of his people.

b. The Psalms. The references here are to correction by God or instruction in his will. The noun tends to have more of the Greek sense of culture, the verb more of the biblical sense of discipline. In the main the relevant verses belong to the Wisdom tradition.

c. The Prophets. More plainly than the original, the LXX here presents God’s dealings as correction. The LXX assumes that the prophet’s true task is to instruct the people by means of the divine wisdom he is given (cf. Ezek. 13:9; Am. 3:7). Education by God is a gracious gift to the covenant people, not a privilege of the human race as such. The Gk. paideúein may mean “warn,” “correct,” “chastise,” or “educate,” but the upbringing of children is always in the background, and the concept comes to embrace both the law and all Israel’s experiences after the exodus (cf. Hos. 5:2).

d. The Presentation of History. Here all God’s dealings, including the giving of the law and wisdom, are seen as the work of God the Teacher. If God teaches through suffering, he also teaches through the law and its statutes. The law becomes the basis of the culture of Judaism and is viewed as the book of education for Israel and the race. With it Judaism confronts the world with a supreme claim to culture. In its discipline, it finds life and bliss (Sir. 24:27).

C. The paideía Concept in Hellenistic and Rabbinic Judaism.

1. paideía and nómos in Philo. Philo finds in paideía a bridge between the OT revelation and Greek culture. In it he sums up the intellectual content of the OT tradition for educated people. He also uses the group to prove the superiority of the OT revelation. It denotes the education and culture of the individual and people. It has character formation and self-fulfilment as the goal. A clear worldview and practical wisdom are included. paideía, as a gift of God, develops the human spirit. OT content pours into this Greek form. paideía is the agent of OT revelation in the Greek world. Parents are the primary educators. They give an education that ends at maturity, although paideía also embraces the self-education of adult life. If education is primarily for boys, Philo thinks a suitable education should be provided for girls as well. The synagogue gives training in piety. It teaches educated people to choose the right from the triple standpoint of love of God, of virtue, and of others. paideía is a divine jewel of the divine soul. The Greek "know thyself" is seen in terms of the biblical "take heed to thyself" (Ex. 34:12). Self-education is thus referred back to the divine commandment. Concern for the one God and Creator gives Jewish culture its superiority. The staff of Ex. 12:11 signifies paideía. As a sceptre, it symbolizes the rule of God, the one king who stands behind all paideía. paideía brings salvation. The soul attains to good gifts only by exercise in virtue. paideía is a well or source with saving significance, although only with the goodness of God as the ultimate basis. Most people can attain only to the ordinary paideía (represented by Hagar) that brings them under the positive laws of nations. Yet this bears healthy fruit, for the good is imperishable, and paideía marches on, constantly rejuvenated, blooming with eternal blossoms. In the last resort, paideía means for Philo a life that is led under the direction of the lógos from which all potentialities of wisdom and culture proceed.

2. Jewish-Hellenistic Education in Josephus. Josephus, too, raises a claim to culture and knows educational theory. Education for him embraces both teaching and practice, and religion is its goal. The law offers the best combination of teaching and practice. Obedience to the law, as even outsiders see, is the basis of Jewish education. This gives it a volitional as well as an intellectual slant. Yet fundamentally Josephus accepts the Greek norm of culture. He does not try to give the group its OT sense of discipline or correction. At the most parents discipline by admonition.

3. Discipline through Suffering in Later Jewish Theology. The rabbis develop a view that sees God's education as essentially correction. The Maccabean period exerts an influence here. Correction is a filial privilege; ungodly nations are left in temporal prosperity which will lead to final ruin. Correction may take the form of direction as well as chastisement. In rabbinic statements chastisement presupposes guilt. Those on whom it falls should scrutinize their actions or ascribe it to neglect of the law. In some instances it may be simply the chastisement of love. Even this concept, however, does not wholly solve the problem of theodicy. The pedagogic solution is an anthropocentric one that does not fit in too well with the theocentric claim of the OT that God's revelation is unconditional.

D. The paideía Concept in the NT.

1. Greek and Jewish Culture in the NT. Two verses in Acts, which have no theological significance, give evidence of Hellenistic usage. Acts 7:22 says that Moses was nurtured in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. This accords with similar biographical notices about great figures. Acts 22:3 has Paul say of himself that he was brought up in Jerusalem and educated in the law. He can thus understand the importance of this education, but as a Christian and an apostle he must dispute the claim of the Jews to be directors of the foolish and teachers of children. At issue in Romans is not just an intellectual understanding but the shaping of life according to a consistent study and application of the law. The word paideutḗs suggests practical guidance, and áphronōn denotes those who need direction.

2. The Law as Taskmaster. Jesus rejects the claim of the scribes and Pharisees to be educators for the world (Mt. 23:15), and Paul takes the same position, quoting Is. 52:5 and Ezek. 36:20 (Rom. 2:24). For Paul the law has only limited validity (Gal. 3:24). Its time ends with Christ. It is a paedagōgós while we are minors. During our minority we are under it and virtually in the position of slaves. With faith, however, we achieve adult sonship and a new immediacy to the Father which is far better than dependence on even the best “pedagogue.” Although Paul here associates the law with the “elemental spirits,” he is not against the law. It is a taskmaster with an educational role. He thus continues to appeal to it when decisions must be made in congregational life, interpreting the OT in the light of Christ.

3. Education by God. In Lk. 23:16, 20 paideúein is twice used for “to chastise” in the passion story. This usage is not attested in the nonbiblical world, but whipping forms part of the Greek upbringing of children, and the word has this sense in popular, if not in literary, usage. Heb. 12 deals with the discipline of suffering. Suffering is disciplining by the Father in responsible love. In the light of Christ’s passion, it is the guarantee of sonship and hence of divine grace and forgiveness. It is not just athletic training but association with Christ. “For paideía” in 12:7 hardly means that Christian “culture” is the goal. paideía is not the goal but the way; believers are to endure for the purpose of education. As earthly parents exercise discipline for the good of their children, so the heavenly Father disciplines believers with a view to holiness (v. 10). If paideía is painful at first, it brings the peaceful fruit of righteousness (v. 12). An eschatological understanding lifts this view above that of practical wisdom, for the end is participation in the eternal worship of God in heaven. The letters of Revelation teach the same message. Those whom God loves he rebukes and chastens (3:19). The two verbs here express friendly testing, censuring, chastising, and educating, not in a moralizing sense, but in terms of the divine dealings. In Tit. 2:12, too, God’s loving will as Father stands behind the training. The goal is salvation (v. 11), and the word of God educates for this by summoning to renunciation of ungodliness and nourishing the hope of Christ’s appearing. In 1 Cor. 11:32 Paul takes up the thought that God’s chastisement of his people is not one of condemnation, since it is for the world. This chastisement is an outflowing of fatherly love. 2 Cor. 6:9 is to the same effect. The blows Paul experiences as an apostle are the paideía kyríou (cf. 11:23). They have a negative appearance but the reality is life, victory over death, and rejoicing.

4. Christian Discipline in the NT. The basic rule of Christian upbringing is stated in Eph. 6:4. The Lord himself does the educating through the parent. He uses the ordinary means of discipline and instruction to this end. In 2 Tim. 3:16 Scripture plays a key role; it is profitable for teaching, correction, and instruction in righteousness. This does not contradict Gal. 3:24. Taught by Christian leaders, members of the churches are to actualize righteousness under the guidance of Scripture. Timothy in 2 Tim. 2:25 is to correct those who are in error with meekness, not entering into stupid controversies that do not promote spiritual development, but exerting an educative influence that under God can bring repentance and enlightenment. In 1 Tim. 1:20, where there is no human subject, chastisement rather than destruction is the point. If the stress is more on punishment than education, the aim is amendment, and in this sense we have Christian paideía (cf. the edificatory discipline in Acts 5:1ff.; 13:6ff.). [G. BERTRAM, V, 596-625]

paízō [to play, dance, mock], empaízō [to mock, deceive], empaigmonḗ [mocking], empaigmós [mocking, scorn], empaíktēs [mocker] paízō. Deriving from país, this word means “to act as a child,” e.g., “to play,” “to dance,” “to jest,” “to mock.”

1. Greek Usage. Homer uses the group for games and dancing. Lack of seriousness is sometimes meant, e.g., when it is asked whether Socrates is speaking in jest. Ships are seen to be playthings of the winds, and humans of fate or the gods. Mockery may be suggested, or the thought of what is frivolous or futile. Aristotle finds a valid place for play as a means of relaxation, but it is not the best use of leisure. Play has a universal role in the education of children.

2. The OT and LXX. Like the world around, the OT attests to religious dancing (Ex. 15:20; Ps. 26:6, etc.), though this may at times tend to be orgiastic (2 Sam. 6:16ff.) and can also have pagan associations (1 Kgs. 18:26). Eschatologically Jer. 31:4 promises joyful dances and Zech. 8:5 looks forward to the streets being filled with children at play. In Judg. 16:25 playing a musical instrument is perhaps meant, while children's play is the point in Gen. 21:9 (Ishmael and Isaac). Dancing is the sense in Is. 3:16, with possibly a hint of frivolity.

3. The Sense of Play, Scorn, Bravado. In Wis. 15:12 the Gentiles treat life as a game. In Jer. 15:17 the Hebrew refers to merrymakers, but the LXX brings in the thought of an arrogance that scorns revelation. Prov. 8:30-31 and Ps. 104:26 give play a theological reference, but the group is more ironical when it denotes God's mocking of human pretension (cf. Wis. 12:26). As God himself scorns human bravado, his people may mock enemies, dangers, and temptations (2 Kgs. 19:21).

4. paízō in the NT. The only NT instance is in 1 Cor. 10:7 (quoting Ex. 32:6). The reference is to idolatry in the form of cultic dancing and the associated licentiousness. For Corinthian believers pagan feasts offer temptations to similar idolatry.

1. Mockery in the Greek OT. empaízō means "to make sport with," "to dance around," "to mock," "to deceive," "to defraud." It is one of many words denoting disparagement, scorn, ridicule, etc. The scorn may be justifiable and constructive, or it may be a negative expression of arrogance, aversion, or hostility. In the OT the Greek term does not always correspond exactly to the various Hebrew originals, for which various other Greek words are also used. Common ideas in the OT are Jacob's mocking of his father, the scorning of idols, the contempt God brings on Jerusalem, mocking punishment, despising and derision, outwitting and overreaching, etc. (cf. for details TDNT, V, 630-33).

2. Mockery in the Martyr Piety of Judaism. In the Apocrypha a distinct vocabulary of mocking develops in connection with Jewish passion piety. The reference may be to human arrogance or to God's derisive punishments. The mockery of the wicked is a test for the righteous. It takes the form of abominations committed against the city, the temple, and the people. Actions and not just words are in view.

3. empaízō in the NT. The verb empaízō occurs in the NT only in the Synoptics. In Mt. 2:16 Herod is outwitted by the Wise Men. In Lk. 14:29 the imprudent builder exposes himself to ridicule because he cannot finish what he begins, whether through weakness, rashness, arrogance, or sheer incompetence. In predictions of the passion Jesus himself is to be mocked (Mt. 20:19; Mk. 10:34; Lk. 18:32). Spitting and scourging go along with the mocking, all at the hands of the Gentiles. The passion story itself gives accounts of the mocking (cf. Mk. 15:16ff.; Mt. 27:27ff.). The various actions, which include the scourging in Jn. 19:1ff., show plainly that the messianic claims of Jesus are being held up to derision. Something similar occurs in Mt. 26:67-68; Mk. 14:65; Lk. 22:63ff., though only Luke uses empaízein as a comprehensive term for this incident. In Matthew and Mark the judges themselves treat Jesus with scorn and derision, although this time as a prophet rather than a king. Luke also uses the term empaízein in relation to the mocking before Herod (23:11). Finally, Matthew and Mark use the verb for what takes place during the crucifixion itself (Mk. 15:31; Mt. 27:41; cf. Lk. 23:35). The chief priests, scribes, and elders mock Jesus as the pretended king who saved others and trusted in God, but who is now helpless on the cross between two malefactors. Here, as in the passion piety of Judaism, violence against the righteous is mockery. It expresses sinful arrogance against the instrument of revelation in the form of cruel contempt.

empaigmonḗ, empaigmós, empaíktēs. While empaízein is in the main restricted to the passion narrative, Hebrew gives empaigmós a wider reference to the righteous of the OT who suffered mocking and scourging like Christ (11:36). empaigmonḗ and empaíktēs occur in the NT only in Jude 18 and 2 Pet. 3:3. Here the scoffers, who may be Gnostic libertines, are people who are hostile to revelation and to godliness, although their scoffing may take specific forms, e.g., scoffing at delay in the parousia. Such mockers are enemies of the cross of Christ (Phil. 3:18; cf. Gal. 5:11; 6:12; 1 Cor. 1:23). This is the general reference in Jude, and the scoffers of 2 Peter fit into the same basic understanding, since the concept of mockery receives its basic NT imprint from the passion narratives. [G. BERTRAM, V, 625-36]

país [child], paidíon [small child], paidárion [small child], téknon [child], teknníon [small child], bréphos [embryo, infant]

A. Lexical Data.

1. bréphos. This word has such senses as "embryo," "young," "infant,","small child."

*2. país. This word means "child" (usually "boy" but also "girl"), and with reference to descent "son," or to social position "servant." Another use is for a class, e.g., orators or doctors (paídes rhētórōn, paídes Asklēpioú). Figurative1y an author's works are his "children."

*3. paidíon. This word means "small child" with reference to age or descent, and it may also denote "servant" (social position). Figuratively it carries the sense of undeveloped understanding but is also used in affectionate address (cf. Jn. 21:5; 1 Jn. 2:18).

*4. paidárion. This is another diminutive denoting "little boy" or "young slave."

*5. téknon. This word means "child" (or "son") in the sense of progeny (also spiritual progeny in Mt. 3:9; Gal. 3:7; 1 Pet. 3:6; cf. Gal. 4:21ff.; 2 Jn. 1; Lk. 7:35). The inhabitants of Jerusalem are its "children" in Joel 2:23; Mt. 23:37; Lk. 13:34. We also read of "children of light" (Eph. 5:8), "wrath" (2:3), "obedience" (1 Pet. 1:14), and the false prophetess (Rev. 2:13).

*6. teknníon. This is a nursery term for a "small child." In the NT it occurs only in affectionate address (Jn. 13:33; 1 Jn. 2:12, 28; 3:7, 18; 4:4; 5:21).

B. The Child from the Natural and Ethico-Religious Standpoint.

I. Antiquity.

l. Original Positive Estimation. Children, especially sons, are valued highly in early antiquity because they enhance the strength of a family and the state. Their birth is greeted with feasting. Rome takes a similar view, but with little personal feeling.

2. Decline and Countermeasures from the Classical Period. Cultic and genetic factors lie behind the exposure of children, but economic considerations are also important. Depopulation comes with abortions and the prevention of pregnancies. Children are regarded as unimportant. Laws are passed favoring larger families but with no great success. Philosophers tend to shun marriage, poetry magnifies free love, and the novel depicts adultery, jealousy, procuring, and pederasty. Another trend is toward continence even in marriage.

3. The Rediscovery of the Child in Hellenism. Parental love continues, provision and prayer are made for children, and their loss is bewailed. Poetry revives ancient motifs, e.g., the divine child of the golden age (Vergil). Drama makes some use of children (in boyish pranks), and art gives better depictions of children. But taste is sentimental and perverse; the rich often amuse themselves with slave children. On the other hand, there is no bar to children becoming emperors.

4. Ethico-Religious Evaluation. Antiquity rarely speaks of the innocence of children. The child has no sexual complications, has little comprehension of joy or suffering, and cannot deceive (though mainly because of intellectual immaturity). The idea of the wonder child is strong in Egypt. Ideas of universal imperfection and guilt also occur. Thus Orphism detects a nexus of evil that initiatory rites must overcome. The concept of the body as a prison moves in the same direction. But these thoughts are marginal. The main feature of the child is immaturity or childishness. The child lives for the moment and simply plays at things. Education has the task of making something out of this raw material, and with normal gifts and the right techniques can succeed at the task, but with little love for the child or regard for its developing personality.

5. The Child in the Cultus.

a. Children have a part in the cultus from birth. They are placed under divine protection, are present at cultic rites, and may be lifted up to kiss the household gods.

b. The children of priests and other privileged groups serve the sacrifices. Temple schools exist. Conscious or unconscious manticism is ascribed to children. Children engage in intercessory processions. They also perform certain cultic actions. Thus a boy at the games cuts the victors' leaves from the sacred olive. Boys and girls assist the vestal virgins. The vestal virgins themselves are appointed as small girls. To guarantee chastity, many Greek cults entrust priestly functions solely to children.

c. Children have a place in the mysteries too. They join in the processions of Eleusis. Their initiation is customary. They officiate in the mystery ritual.

II. The OT and Judaism.

1. The Religious Evaluation of Progeny. In the OT increase is an order of creation (Gen. 1:28). To be childless is a source of sorrow and vexation (Gen. 15:2). Children are a gift from God (Ps. 127:3ff.). The family lives on in them. Judaism stresses this aspect with reference to the people. Levirate marriage provides for those who die childless. Contraception is infamous. Intercourse is for the sake of children. Pure marriages are pleasing to God. Abortion and exposure of children are pagan abominations. Ascetic inclinations are rare (cf. the Essenes) except in warnings against immoderation.

2. The Estimation of the Child.

a. The OT stresses parental love (Gen. 22:2; 1 Kgs. 3:26) but demands obedience from children (Ex. 20:12). The babbling of children glorifies God (Ps. 8:2). A few children have prophetic gifts (1 Sam. 3:1ff.). Children may be ignorant and self-willed (Is. 3:4; Eccl. 10:16; cf. Gen. 8:21), and they need discipline (cf. 2 Kgs. 2:23ff.), but the messianic child is highly estimated (Is. 7:14ff.).

b. The OT does not see children as innocent. Though individual responsibility may be stressed (Jer. 31:29-30; Ezek. 18:2ff.), there is a nexus of sin, guilt, and punishment (cf. Ps. 51:5; Gen. 3) that only God can break. Judaism develops a full doctrine of original sin, although each person affirms Adam's deed afresh. Rabbis argue that children are not personally responsible in the first years, but the evil impulse is present, and children soon yield to it. Where dualism has an influence, the soul is pure, but unwillingly or by its own fault it is chained to matter. Children in any case are open to sensual desire.

3. The Participation of the Child in Religious Exercises. Circumcision initiates into the cultic fellowship. Firstborn males belong to God and must be redeemed by offerings. Children attend family offerings and planned instruction is given (cf. 1 Sam. 1:4; Dt. 4:9; 11:19; Prov. 4:1ff.). Early dedication to the sanctuary is possible but rare (1 Sam. 1:28). There are no child priests. Judaism lays the main stress on instruction in the law. Boys, who alone must keep the law in its entirety, are taught from an early age and must attend the great feasts as soon as possible. Circumcision is seen as a duty owed to the child, and the children of proselytes are baptized with their parents (although attestation of this is late).

III. The NT.

1. Affirmation of the Child as a Creature of God.

a. Jesus. Inheriting the OT belief in the Creator and the implied affirmation of human life, Jesus finds some place for ascetic concerns (Mt. 19:11-12) but he also endorses and sanctifies parental love (Mt. 5:36; 9:19; 7:9ff.).

The community obviously agrees with the teaching of Jesus in the sayings that it transmits. It supports missionaries and their dependents (1 Cor. 9:5). Paul accepts marriage as an order of creation in spite of an ascetic inclination (1 Cor. 7). The family teaching in Eph. 6:1ff. displays a positive attitude to children and their upbringing. 1 Tim. 2:15, which does not mean that childbearing is a basis of salvation or a means of doing penance, calls the bearing (and nurture?) of children a work that promotes salvation.

2. Affirmation of the Individuality of Children?

a. Jesus evaluates children highly (Mt. 18:2ff.; 19:13ff.). This is not because of a Hellenistic sense of their relative innocence, but because their littleness, immaturity, and need of help keep the way open for God's fatherly love.

b. Paul alludes to childlike innocence in 1 Cor. 14:20, but mostly his comparisons stress the immaturity and inferiority of children (3:1; 13:11; Gal. 4:1). Heb. 5:13 is to the same effect. In regard to regeneration, however, the relative innocence of children is an important motif in exhortation (1 Pet. 2:1).

3. The Child in God's Saving Counsel. Jesus' teaching is explicable only on the assumption that children have a place in God's saving counsel. Paul's objective view of God's saving work has a similar implication (Rom. 5:18-19; 11:25). The need for faith raises a question, but faith does not effect salvation; it receives it. The transmission of the infancy stories and of the account of the blessing of children is hardly conceivable if children are excluded from God's plan (cf. also Acts 2:39).

b. Children are numbered with the community, take part in crucial events (Acts 21:5), are present at services (20:9, 12), and are under instruction (Eph. 6:1ff.).

c. Whether children are baptized is debated. The household baptisms and contemporary custom (cf. Jewish proselyte baptism) favor infant baptism. So do the relationship to circumcision (Col. 2:11), the concept of eschatological sealing (Ezek. 9:4, 6), the common participation of the whole people (1 Cor. 10:1-2), and patristic testimony. The story of the blessing of the children (Mk. 10:13ff.) might well have been seen as an answer to objections.

IV. The Later Church.

1. The Child as a Creature of God. Eschatological hopes and ascetic inclinations militate against the high view of children, but the church maintains the biblical doctrine of creation. It thus protects marriage and fights licentiousness, contraception, abortion, and the exposure of children. Clement of Alexandria offers a fine presentation which combines the best of antiquity with the Christian legacy. He sees the lack or loss of children as a heavy burden and commends marriage for the sake of the nation, the children, and the good of the world so far as it rests in our hands (cf. Stromateis 3.3.22ff.; 9.67.1, etc.).

2. The Relation to the Child. The church depicts childish innocence but does not forget the nexus of evil. Children are immature and even foolish but also fresh and friendly, so they must not be scorned. Christ is lauded as the divine child. Augustine tends to stress infant sin but is led to conversion by the prophetic voice of a child.

3. The Child in the Cultus.

a. Clerical Functions. The prayers of children are thought to be efficacious and we read of choirs of boys and choir schools, as well as of boy lectors.

b. Infant Baptism and Communion. Infant baptism is said to be an apostolic tradition, and the delay in baptism dates only from the fourth century. For infant communion there is witness from the time of Cyprian (On the Lapsed 9).

C. Divine Sonship.

I. Religious History. The motif of divine sonship arises mainly in connection with the word téknon, which suggests a closer personal relationship. Greek religion thinks of divine sonship in natural terms. In the mysteries it comes by initiation, with deification as the goal. The OT applies the thought nonmythologically to the people (Hos. 11:1). Salvation history controls the relation, and God is more often depicted as King than Father. Individualism comes to the fore later, but divine sonship is not at the heart of Jewish piety.

II. The NT.

1. Jesus puts divine sonship in the center. It rests on grace, and since the original relation has been broken, there has to be reacceptance into it. Jesus bears God's definitive offer, not simply because he enjoys a unique divine sonship, but because he is sent for this purpose. His own sonship differs from ours, and he is never called the téknon theoú. téknon either denotes descent from Abraham as a precondition of divine sonship (Mk. 3:9), or it denotes divine sonship in parables (Mk. 7:27; Mt. 21:28).

2. For Paul believers have divine sonship through Christ's work. It does not come by creation or physical descent but involves true descent from Abraham (Gal. 3:6ff.; Rom. 4). It has a universal sweep and carries with it freedom and adulthood (Gal. 3:25ff.; 4:1ff.; Rom. 8:31ff.). tékna theoú is used as well as huioí, but Christ is never téknon. Full sonship is still hoped for (Rom. 8:23).

3. In John only Christ is huiós; believers are tékna (1:12; 11:52; 1 Jn. 3:1). Sonship means being born of God but with a reference to fellowship rather than individual deification. The thought of the people and eschatological hopes are still present (Jn. 11:51-52; 1 Jn. 3:2), but there is a victorious possession that drives out fear. A break with sin and love of others are demanded (1 Jn. 3:9ff.).

4. Other NT writings do not use téknon for believers, but James and 1 Peter relate sonship very clearly to regeneration (Jms. 1:18; 1 Pet. 1:23).

III. The Church. While the church never forgets the truth of divine sonship, it tends to be overgrown by alien naturalistic and moralistic concepts. [A. OEPKE, V, 636-54]

país theoú [servant of God, child of God]

A. The OT.

I. The Secular Use of ʿeḇeḏ.

1. The Hebrew original of país in the phrase país theoú, i.e., ʿeḇeḏ, carries a stress on personal relationship and has first the sense of "slave." OT law offers some protection to slaves, for Israel itself is redeemed from bondage, slaves are part of the cultic fellowship, and they can act representatively for their masters.

2. The word then comes to be used for the "paid soldier" and even more broadly the "court official"; these are the king's servants.

3. A third use is to denote general political subjection.

4. On the basis of court usage the term is then used in polite phrases like "your humble servant."

5. A special use is for servants of the sanctuary (Josh. 9:23).

II. The Religious Use of ʿeḇeḏ.

1. The term serves as an expression of humility used by the righteous before God. Different emphases in this regard are self-abasement, the implied claim on God for help, and grateful self-commitment when help is received. These elements are present in other nations too, but distinctive in the OT are the exclusiveness and totality involved in being God's servant, the gracious decision of God which makes it possible, and the historical character of the relationship. These factors give the status of the ʿeḇeḏ a unique security. God himself calls Moses his servant (Num. 12:7-8; cf. Ps. 119:76). The divine call is the basis of confidence even though enemies arise against God's servant (Ps. 109:28).

2. In the plural the term becomes a designation for the righteous, those who seek refuge in God (Ps. 34:22), those who love his name (Ps. 69:36), his saints (Ps. 79:2), his people (Ps. 105:25). The two poles of the concept are election and obedience.

3. In the singular "servant of God" is a term for Israel. Is. 41:8ff. seems to initiate this usage. Abased by the exile, Israel is elected, created, and gathered by God (41:8-9; 44:2, 21). The role of the people as God's servant here is the passive of reception. It is summoned only to "convert" (44:22).

4. "Servant of God" may also be a term for distinguished figures. Among these are the patriarchs, who stand in a gracious relationship to God and are pledges of his will to save. Then comes Moses (Ex. 14:31; Num. 12:7-8), who specifically embodies God's words and works as an active servant who enjoins the law, orders the conquest, regulates the cultus, and promises rest; to obey Moses is to obey God, for God has chosen him as his minister. Later the kings are servants of God with the special role of securing the people against its enemies. David, chosen by God, is a special instance who is also a sign of promise in darker days (cf. 1 Kgs. 11:34; Ps. 89:3; Jer. 33:21-22). In certain circumstances even a pagan ruler may act as God's servant, e.g., Nebuchadnezzar in Jer. 27ff. Alongside the king is the prophet, the servant of God who has a unique office as God's messenger (1 Kgs. 18:36). God himself is present in such messengers, so that the phrase "my servants the prophets" becomes almost a fixed one. The prophets warn the people and show it the true meaning of its history. The older writing prophets for the most part avoid the term "servant," probably because of its associations with the cultic and courtly piety which they castigate. Nevertheless, it aptly denotes their function. In the prose sections of Job, God calls Job his servant even though he does not belong to Israel. Job belongs to God as his creature and in virtue of his uprightness and his refusal to renounce God with cursing when subjected to testing.

5. A special question arises with the references to the suffering servant of the Lord in Is. 42:1ff.; 49:1ff.; 50:4-9; 52:13-53:12. There is no reason to isolate these passages from their general context, but the problem arises how the figure of the ʿeḇeḏ is to be understood in them, whether collectively or individually. 49:3ff. seems to support an individual reference. The individual may be either a royal or a prophetic figure, and of these the latter is the more likely, for ear and tongue (50:4-5) are the organs of this servant's work, and prophets may judge and liberate as well as kings (42:1ff.). In the immediate context the author himself may well be intended; anonymity is preserved because the important point is that the servant belongs to God, being fashioned, elected, grasped, called, and equipped by God (cf. 42:1ff.). The task of the servant is to publish justice, not perhaps in the general sense of a proclamation to the nations, but in the special sense of the restoration of Israel, which itself will put idols to shame, glorify God's name, and thus bring light and salvation to the whole world (42:1;, 49:5-6). Yet this task cannot be accomplished without suffering (cf. Jeremiah), though whether this is persecution by his own people, oppression by Babylon, or a mortal (?) sickness is not clear from the text, and the depiction in 52:13-53:12 transcends biographical features and may not unjustly be seen as pointing to the true Servant of the Lord who is yet to come. Meaning is found in the suffering, for it has a vicarious character and is thus obediently accepted by the servant as divinely ordained (53:6, 10). This is not just blind obedience, nor does it relate only to the vicarious ministry effected by the suffering, for the servant of Is. 53 triumphantly believes that God will confess him even beyond the tomb (50:7ff.), that he will receive from God his right (49:4) and his reward (53:12). This is not just a private transaction, for it will be seen by the rulers of the nations, and will thus serve to promote God's honor and to proclaim his faithfulness in the world at large.

B. The LXX Translations.

1. Translations of ʿeḇeḏ. ʿeḇeḏ occurs 807 times in the Hebrew and is translated by the país group 340 times, the doúlos group 327 times, the oikétēs group 36 times, the therápōn group 46 times, and huiós and hypērétēs once each; there are no equivalents or very free renderings in 56 instances. país predominates in Genesis, but therápōn in Exodus. In Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy various terms are used, but país is to the fore again in Joshua. doúlos, however, hardly appears at all in the Hexateuch. From Judges to 2 Kings, however, doúlos alternates with país, doúlos being "slave" in the stricter sense and país the "free servant" of the king, i.e., the soldier or official. The service of God is expressed by doúlos even in the case of Moses or Joshua, since this is not a service into which one may freely enter. The differences between the renderings in the first group and this later group are probably due to the fact that the first group is an older translation which reflects more of the Greek sense of the nearness of God and man, while the later group uses the harsher doúlos for the relationship with God in order the better to emphasize the divine sovereignty. After Judges to 2 Kings, the groups begin to interfuse except that therápōn fades from the picture. Psalms prefers the sterner doúlos, as do the Minor Prophets, but Isaiah and Daniel opt for país. Alternation occurs in Jeremiah, and the omission of any rendering at all in many cases shows that the translator (s) find it hard to decide on the proper equivalent. The same alternation occurs in Ezra and Nehemiah.

2. The Servant of the Lord Passages in Isaiah. The LXX of Is. 42:1 inserts Jacob and Israel into the text, showing that a collective interpretation is held. On the other hand, the LXX of 52:13-53:12 might well have an individual reference. paidíon is used in 53:2, and in view of 9:5 this might suggest a messianic understanding (cf. the future in 52:14-15 and the recurrent use of the term dóxa with no real original). As distinct from the Hebrew, the LXX states that divine retribution is exerted on the wicked for putting the servant to death. This is regarded as part of the servant's exaltation. [W. ZIMMERLI, V, 654-77]

C. país theoú in Later Judaism.

I. The Twofold Meaning of país theoú .

1. Child of God. país theoú is rare in Judaism after 100 B.C. It may mean either "child" or "servant" of God; the context usually shows which. The plural paídes theoú occurs for Israel or the righteous in Wisdom. Since Wisdom also depicts the righteous in terms of suffering, the servant of God of Is. 52:13ff. has here become the child of God.

2. Servant of God. After 100 B.C. país theoú more often means "servant of God," e.g., when applied to Moses, the prophets, or the three children (Bar. 1:20; 2:20; Dan. 3:33 Θ).

II. Persistence of the Religious Use of ‘eḇeḏ

1. Self-Designation in Prayer. In addition to país, other words such as doúlos and diákonos are used for ‘eḇeḏ and these alone occur when what is expressed is abasement before God in prayer.

2. Servants of God. This phrase is often used for Israel, the prophets, the righteous, priests, and even proselytes, parents, and angels.

3. Collective Use. The collective use of the singular for Israel lives on after 100 B.C. but is not common.

4. As a Title of Honor A few instances may be found of país as a title of honor for such figures as Moses, David, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Aaron, Elijah, etc. The title is solidly established only for Moses, next for David.

5. The Messiah. The Messiah is "my servant" in the OT in Ezek. 34:23-24; 37:24-25; Zech. 3:8. This usage continues only in 4 Esdr. 7:28 etc.; Syr. Bar. 70:9, and the Targums on Is. 42:1; 43:10; 52:13; Zech.

3:8; Ezek. 34:23-24; 37:24. The rabbis use the term only in OT quotations. The form is always “my servant”; God is the speaker.

III. Interpretations of the Servant of the Lord Passages in Isaiah. Apart from the references to Isaiah, Eliakim, and David in Is. 20:3; 22:20; 37:35, the singular “servant of God” occurs 19 times in 41-53. The rabbis do not isolate these chapters from the rest of the book, nor the Servant Songs from these chapters. Nor do they think that there has to be a uniform interpretation. One must also distinguish between mere allusions and solid exposition, and between the Palestinian tradition and that of the diaspora, which develops independently, partly as a result of divergent LXX readings.

1. Hellenistic Judaism. At first país is the usual word for ‘eḇeḏ, and it carries the sense of “child” as well as “servant.” In the second century A.D. the picture changes and doúlos is preferred as closer to the original. On the basis of the LXX the collective interpretation becomes more general. Thus Hellenistic Judaism (unlike Palestinian) refers 42:1ff. to Israel. It also takes Is. 53 collectively; the servant here is a type of the righteous (as Origen testifies in Against Celsus 1.55). This is an interpretation that does not occur in Palestinian Judaism until the eleventh century A.D.

2. Palestinian Judaism. Palestinian Judaism advances three different interpretations in the different passages. The first is a collective one on the basis of the Hebrew (e.g., Is. 41:8-9; 44:1ff.; 45:4; 38:20; 49:3ff.). In the collective sense, the servant is mostly Israel. In allusions the righteous or the prophets may be perceived, and in exegesis there are occasional references to penitent sinners or sufferers, to the prophets, or to upright teachers. Qumran does not clearly apply the “servant” to the community. The second interpretation refers the sayings to Isaiah himself (49:5), although not in the case of 53:7-8. Individual verses are sometimes referred to other figures, e.g., Jacob (41:8), David (43:10), Noah (49:8-9), and Moses (53:12). The third interpretation, which applies to 42:1; 43:10; 49:6; 52:13; 53:11, is messianic. Sir. 48:10 applies a phrase from 49:6 to the work of the returning Elijah. Ethiopian Enoch describes the Messiah in language based on Is. 42:1 (the elect), 53:11 (the righteous one), 42:6 (light of the nations), etc. It fuses the Son of Man and the Servant, although only in respect of the Servant’s exaltation. The Peshitta refers Is. 53 to the future Messiah. In the NT the rulers in Lk. 23:35 mockingly call Jesus the Chosen One (Is. 42:1). The translation of Is. 53:8-9 in Aquila has the servant exercise judgment, and the idea of a leprous Messiah, also inferred by some rabbis, is read into 53:4. Theodotion’s translation also takes Is. 53 messianically, especially in the understanding of 53:9ff. as referring to final judgment. The Targum, which rests on older material, interprets the whole of 52:13-53:12 messianically. In it only weak traces of the sufferings remain, and the passage is taken to describe the establishment of messianic rule over Israel. The rabbis apply 42:1ff. and 52:13ff. to the Messiah, including the passion sayings in ch. 53. As regards the suffering Messiah, the first witness is textually uncertain, Justin’s testimony in Dialogue 36.1 etc. is secondary, and incontestable examples date only from around A.D. 200. After this period opposition to Christianity leads to the avoidance of such terms as Servant of the Lord or the Elect for the Messiah, and textual alterations and tendentious reinterpretations occur in renderings of Is. 53, e.g., referring Is. 53:12 to Moses. Nevertheless, a distinctly nonmessianic interpretation of Is. 53 does not occur even though it might seem to have been natural for the rabbis to link the chapter more generally with current ideas of the atoning power of death, e.g., in the case of criminals, or the righteous, or martyrs, or children. In sum, Is. 42:1ff.; 43:10; 49:1ff.; 52:13ff. are taken messianically, the messianic understanding is constant in the case of 42:1ff. and 52:13ff. (with reference especially to judgment), and a messianic interpretation of the passion sayings of 53:1ff. fairly certainly goes back to the pre-Christian period.

D. país theoú in the NT. Of eight instances of this phrase, one refers to Israel (Lk. 1:54), two refer to David (Lk. 1:69; Acts 4:25), and the other five to Jesus (Mt. 12:18; Acts 3:13, 26; 4:27, 30). Lk. 1:54 has righteous Israel in view. The references to David are liturgical and are taken over from later Judaism.

1. The Provenance. In the few instances in which Jesus is called país theoú we obviously have early tradition. Indeed, país theoú may also underlie other passages, e.g., Mk. 1:11; 9:7, where the basic quotation may well be Is. 42:1 (cf. the imparting of the Spirit, the textual vacillation between agapētós and eklelegménos, and the version in Jn. 1:34). In Jn. 1:29, 36, too, the unusual amnós may go back to an original Aramaic that might mean "boy" or "servant" as well as "lamb," and if so the use of país theoú in the church could well originate in Aramaic-speaking circles. After the NT there are only eleven instances in three works, but these instances are all in liturgical contexts (Did. 9.2-3; 10.2-3; 1 Clem. 59.2ff.; Mart. Pol. 14. 1ff.; 20.2), and in all but two cases the same liturgical formula is used. In the light of the usage in Acts 4:27, 30, this suggests that we have here an ancient title that never becomes as common as kýrios, Christós, or huiós theoú, but lives on in the eucharistic prayer, in doxology, and in confession. The provenance of the title is to be sought in the Palestinian community; the Gentile churches do not favor it (preferring huiós) because it seems not to do full justice to the majesty of the risen and glorified Lord.

2. The Meaning. The reserve of the Gentile churches suggests that "servant" rather than "child" is the original meaning (cf. the juxtaposition with David in Acts 4:25, 27, 30 and Did. 9.2-3, and the references to Is. 52:13ff. in Mt. 12:18; Acts 3:13ff.).

3. The Change in Meaning. In Gentile churches país theoú signifies "child of God" from at least Mart. Pol. 14.1 and possibly from 1 Clem. 59.4. It is unlikely, however, that "son" is the meaning in Acts, and "servant" persists as the sense in Didache. If país can have at times a distinguished, archaic ring, it has a lowly ring as well, and for this reason it does not commend itself to Gentile Christians.

II. Christological Interpretation of the Isaianic Servant in the NT.

1. The References. Only in Mt. 8:17; 12:18ff.; Lk. 22:37; Jn. 12:38; Acts 8:32-33; Rom. 15:21 are verses from Isaiah referred directly to Jesus, but many direct and indirect allusions fill out the picture. Thus we find obviously pre-Pauline tradition and formulas, e.g., in 1 Cor. 15:3ff.; 11:23ff.; Phil. 2:6ff.; 1 Tim. 2:6; Gal. 1:4, etc. (the hypér formula); Rom. 5:16, 19; 10:16; perhaps 8:32. Pre-Synoptic formulas may also be cited, e.g., Mk. 14:24; 10:45; 1:11; Lk. 2:32; Mt. 12:18ff.; Mk. 9:12. Acts also contains obvious tradition and formulas, e.g., 8:32-33; the title ho díkaios in 3:14; 7:52; 22:14. Primitive formulas may also be traced in 1 Pet. 2:21ff.; 3:18; 1:11; Heb. 9:27-28; 7:25. The same applies to the Johannine works, e.g., Jn. 1:29, 34, 36; 1 Jn. 2:1, 29; 3:7; Jn. 10:11, 15, 17-18; 16:32. Paul himself quotes Is. 52:15 in Rom. 15:21, but with a missionary rather than a christological slant. Matthew contributes an obvious allusion to Is. 53 in 26:54. The lack of references in James, 2 and 3 John, Jude, 2 Peter, and Revelation and the paucity of references in Paul, Hebrews, and John support the conclusion that like país theoú the christological interpretation of Isaiah belongs to the oldest stratum of tradition and quickly takes on fixity of form. Of the Isaiah passages only 42:1ff.; 49:6; 52:13ff. are expounded messianically, as in the case of Palestinian Judaism.

2. The Setting in the Primitive Church.

a. Scripture Proof. In the primitive church the setting of the christological interpretation of the servant passages is in the proof from Scripture. The situation after the death of Jesus necessitates a proof that the crucifixion is divinely planned. Usually Is. 53 is taken to be so well known that a general reference to Scripture is enough, but the passage is quoted in Acts 8:32-33, and details of Jesus' life are found in Is. 42:1ff.; 53, along with a prophecy of the unbelief of Israel in Is. 53:7, and of the apostolic mission in Rom. 15:21.

b. Primitive Christology. Many christological predicates are based on Isaiah, e.g., país itself, huiós, amnós, arníon, eklektós, agapētós, and díkaios, and perhaps the description of Jesus as hilasmós (1 Jn. 2:2) and paráklētos (2:1). Various formulas also derive from Isaiah, e.g., the hypér formula, (para)didónai, and the phrase aírein tḗn hamartían (or anaphérein hamartías).

c. Liturgy. The "many" (pollṓn) of the eucharistic sayings points to the servant passages (Mk. 14:24), and the liturgical formula diá Iēsoú toú paidós soú lives on with great tenacity in the eucharistic prayer and doxology. The hymn of Phil. 2:6ff. extols Jesus as the servant and draws on the Hebrew text in vv. 6-9 (cf. especially the harsh phrase heautón ekénōsen [v. 7] as an exact rendering of Is. 53:12). The contrast between humiliation and exaltation, too, plainly reflects Is. 53. The song of Simeon in Lk. 2:29ff. takes up Is. 49:6 and applies it to Jesus.

d. Exhortation. Is. 53 plays an important role in exhortation. Jesus as the servant is a model of ministry (Mk. 10:45), unselfishness (Phil. 2:5ff.), innocent and voluntary suffering (1 Pet. 2:21ff.), and humility (1 Clem. 16.1ff.). In particular, he is an example for the martyr to follow (Ignatius Ephesians 10.3). No phase of early Christian life does not bear the stamp of Servant Christology.

III. Does Jesus See Himself as the Servant of Isaiah? The Gospels say so (cf. Mk. 9:12; 9:31; 10:33; 14:8, 24, 61; 15:5; Mt. 26:2; Lk. 24:7, etc.). If there are indications that the present form of some of these statements comes in part from the community, there are points in the texts that forbid their dismissal as inauthentic. Jesus is forced by the situation to expect a violent death (cf. the charges of blasphemy and sabbath-breaking, the need to seek safety in flight, and the examples of the fate of the prophets and of the Baptist). If Jesus expected a violent death, he must have reflected on its purpose, and it is natural that he should have found it in the contemporary concept of the atoning power of death. Since Is. 40ff. obviously affects his sense of mission, the references to Is. 53 fit into the framework of his ministry. Five considerations support the antiquity of the relevant sayings. First, they do not show any plain influence of the LXX. Second, the intimations of the passion and glorification are general and not colored by the actual events of the crucifixion and resurrection. Third, the sayings are firmly anchored in the context (cf. especially Mk. 8:31; 14:8; Lk. 22:37; Mk. 9:12). Fourth, the use of the passive for God's action, which is a later Jewish mode of speech, is a token of the personal style of Jesus, and it occurs in Mk. 9:31 in a saying that has an archaic ring because of its conciseness, its enigmatic character, and its wordplay. Fifth, Is. 53 plays a role in the eucharistic sayings (Mk. 14:24), which in their form in the Gospels (as distinct from Paul in 1 Cor. 11:23ff.) are shown by many Semitic features to belong to the bedrock of the tradition. If Jesus rarely refers Is. 53 to himself, and never in the material peculiar to Matthew and Luke, this is probably because it is only in his teaching of the disciples that he declares himself to be the Servant who has the divinely ordained task of dying vicariously for the many who have come under divine judgment. It is as he goes to death willingly, innocently, and patiently in accordance with the will of God that his death has unlimited atoning power. The life that he pours out is life from God and with God. [J. JEREMIAS, V, 677-717][14]

pálai. This word has such senses as “earlier,” “before,” “once upon a time,” “long since,” and “for a long time.” It occurs seven times in the NT, for “just before” in Mk. 15:44; 2 Cor. 12:19, much “earlier” in 2 Pet. 1:9, “long ago” in Mt. 11:21; Lk. 10:13; Heb. 1:1; Jude 4.

1. This word means “old” with such nuances as “past,” “ancient,” “antiquated,” and “venerable” (usually archaíos in secular Greek); kainós and néos are antonyms. In Paul palaiós has greater theological force than archaiós.

2. The LXX uses palaiós for various Hebrew terms, but unlike the verb palaióō, which denotes the uselessness of worn-out things, and figuratively the transitoriness of creaturely life (cf. Ps. 32:3; Gen. 8:12; Job 21:13; Is. 65:22), it has no theological significance.

3. In the Synoptic tradition palaiós occurs in Mk. 2:21-22 and parallels; Lk. 5:36ff.; 5:39; Mt. 13:52 in the sharp antithesis of old and new. In Mk. 2:21-22 Jesus points out the incompatibility of old and new in proverbial sayings. The meaning depends on whether the sayings refer more strictly to the question at issue or more generally to the total mission of Jesus. The latter is more likely; his message is something completely new, although the new is also a fulfilment of the old (Mt. 5:17). Lk. 5:39 seems to contradict what precedes, but in context it is a warning against overvaluing the old. Mt. 13:52 is probably to be interpreted along the lines of 5:17, since the parables in Mt. 13 all deal with the new thing that Jesus presents.

4. Paul, too, sets the old over against the new. Indeed, in 1 Cor. 5:6ff. the old leaven is evil, the reference being to the old life of sin. The antithesis of the old and the new man in Rom. 6:6; Col. 3:9; Eph. 4:22 is along similar lines. The old, crucified with Christ (Rom. 6), is incompatible with the new, and is thus to be put off and to give place to the new (Col. 3:9; Eph. 4:22). Vices mark the old man, but the new is renewed in God’s image (Col. 3:5ff.). One may see here an allusion to baptism (cf. Gal. 3:27-28). The law brings no renewal, and its covenant is thus the old one (2 Cor. 3:14) which is the letter that kills. Christ has brought the new covenant of righteousness which replaces it. The old covenant, however, is still a covenant of God.

5. 1 John mentions the old commandment and the new but in a different way, for the old commandment here is that which Christians have already heard (cf. Jn. 13:34-35), and there is thus no antithesis between the two (1 Jn. 2:7).

palaiótēs. This rare word means “aged” or “what is dated.” It occurs in the NT only in Rom. 7:6, where the service which consists only in observance of the written code is outmoded and must give way to service in the power of the Spirit.

palaióō. This word means “to make old,” “to declare to be obsolete.” Important in the LXX, it occurs in the NT in Heb. 1:11 (quoting Ps. 102:25) and Lk. 12:33, but is theologically significant only in Heb. 8:13, which argues that God, by setting up the new covenant, has declared the old to be outdated, so that it is ready to disappear. We thus have here an antithesis similar to that of Jesus and Paul. [H. SEESEMANN, V, 717-20]

pálē means "wrestling," but Greek tragedy prepares for it the broader sense of "conflict," and Philo uses it figuratively for the wrestling of the ascetic. It occurs in the NT only in Eph. 6:12, which gives Christian warfare an eschatological dimension as part of the great final battle that has begun and is intensifying. Christian wrestling is with demonic forces, and the reward is deliverance in the judgment (cf. also 1 Th. 5:8; Rom. 6:13; 13:12). [H. GREEVEN, V, 721]

→ panoplía

panḗgyris [festal gathering]

panḗgyris means "gathering of the people," especially cultic (cf. in the LXX Hos. 2:13; 9:5). The only NT instance is in Heb. 12:22, where it is probably in apposition to "myriads of angels" and means "festal assembly." For such an assembly in the NT, cf. Rev. 4. [H. SEESEMANN, V, 722]

panoplía → hóplon

panourgía [cunning, craftiness], panoúrgos [cunning, crafty]

A. Nonbiblical Usage.

1. The group denotes "ability," but when it expresses all-around human ability there is the suggestion of a false and presumptuous self-evaluation.

2. The limited positive use is secondary and comes only after centuries of negative use in which the sense is "capable of anything." A piece of wood befitting the panoúrgos is not magical wood but the gallows. The group is used for wily animals. The reason why the positive aspect is poorly developed is that the sense of human limitation stands in the way. The negative use rests on the assumption that those who have the secret of success will use it unscrupulously.

B. The LXX and Philo.

1. The Hebrew original means "cunning" but in Proverbs it may also mean "prudent." Since the LXX uses the group mostly in Proverbs, it tends to take on a more positive sense. Fear of God confers practical wisdom and this implies the ability to do things successfully. The huiós panoúrgos is a model of obedience in Prov. 13:1. Sirach follows the same pattern. panourgía is good if based on wisdom, otherwise not.

2. Philo once uses panourgía for what might be "skill," but even here the sense is bad, as the context shows (Allegorical Interpretation of Laws 2.106-07). Humans may have panourgía, but their use of it has evil results. One may see from Gen. 3 that it has a satanic background, and it comes at the head of Philo's list of vices (On the Sacrfices of Abel and Cain 32).

C. The NT and Early Church.

1. The NT uses the group negatively. "Cunning" is the meaning in Lk. 20:23, 2 Cor. 12:16, and probably 2 Cor. 4:2. In the quotation in 1 Cor. 3:19 Paul differs from the LXX, perhaps on the basis of the Hebrew, or by recollection of Job 5:12. The NT thus follows the usual sense, but with a suggestion of satanic panourgía and with a feeling that the group has a self-righteous ring.

2. In Hermas Visions 3.3.1 Hermas is called panoúrgos in a warning against ulterior motives. [O. BAUERNFEIND, V, 722-27]

pará [from, beside, before, etc.]

A. With the Genitive (Ablative).

1. Spatially the sense in such cases is “out of,” “from beside,” “from.”

2. The word then denotes authorship: “from.” In this sense it comes a. after verbs of asking, demanding, etc. (cf. Mt. 20:20), or verbs of taking, receiving, or buying (cf. Mt. 18:19; Mk. 12:2; Eph. 6:8). Another use b. is with verbs in the passive to denote the doer or logical subject (cf. Lk. 1:45; Jn. 1:6). We also find it c. in movements that stress the starting point or actions that stress the doer (cf. Mt. 14:43; Lk. 2:1; 8:49). Important here are the coming of the Son from the Father (Jn. 6:46) and the procession of the Spirit (15:26). We then find it d. in various prepositional expressions, e.g., Rom. 11:27, where the covenant is willed by God, Mk. 5:26, where the reference is to what the woman has, and Mk. 3:21, where the relatives of Jesus (or perhaps even the disciples) are indicated.

B. With the Dative (Locative).

1. Spatially, pará in such constructions is used a. with things for “beside,” or “by” (cf. Jn. 19:25), and b. with persons to denote proximity, as in Lk. 9:47, being at home or in a household (1 Cor. 16:2; Lk. 19:7), and presence, fellowship, or sphere of influence (Jn. 14:17, 23; 1 Cor. 7:24).

2. Forensically pará is used for appearance “before” a judge (2 Pet. 2:11).

3. Figuratively the term indicates presence with someone who makes an evaluation (Rom. 2:13), or favor with someone (God in Lk. 1:30, men in 2:52), or a quality (cf. God’s omnipotence in Mt. 19:26, his impartiality in Rom. 2:11, human faith in Mt. 8:10), or inner relationship (Mt. 21:25).

C. With the Accusative.

1. Spatially pará in such constructions means a. “toward” (Mt. 15:10) and b. “beside,” “by” (Lk. 7:38; Mt. 13:1) or “along,” “by” (Mt. 4:18).

2. Comparatively, pará expresses a. preference (“before”; cf. Lk. 13:2), comparison (“more than” “than”. cf. Lk. 3:13. 1 Cor. 3:11 [with “other”]), and exclusion (“except,” “in place of”. cf. Rom. 1:25, where idolatry does not lie alongside true worship but takes its place).

3. Denoting difference, pará means a. “by so much” (cf. Lk. 5:7) and “less” (2 Cor. 11:24).

4. Adversatively the sense is “without regard for,” “in spite of,” “against”; cf. Heb. 11:11; Rom. 1:26 (contrary to nature); 11:24 (by divine intervention); 4:18 (against hope); Acts 18:13 (contrary to the law).

5. Causally, the meaning is “because of,” “on account of,” as in 1 Cor. 12:15-16, where one member cannot say it is not of the body because it is not another member. [E. H. RIESENFELD, V, 727-36]

parabaínō [to transgress], parábasis [transgression], parabátēs [transgressor], aparábatos [unchangeable], hyperbaínō [to transgress] parabaínō.

1. This verb means a. “to go beside” (intransitive), b. “to overstep,” “transgress” (transitive), and c. “to pass over,” “let pass,” “let slip” (transitive). In the papyri the original spatial sense is rare and the most common use is for disregarding statutes, contracts, wills, etc., or breaking one’s word. A religious use parallels the legal use.

2. The LXX applies the term to the violation of God's commandments and ordinances, e.g., Ex. 32:8: "turning aside from the right way" (cf. also Dt. 9:12). In Is. 66:24 God calls backsliders hoi parabebēkótes en emoí. Other expressions are transgressing God's word (Num. 14:41) or covenant (Josh. 7:11) and turning aside from his commandments (Dt. 17:20). There is no fixed original for the LXX rendering. Various Hebrew words are used which denote aberration, rebellion, apostasy, etc.

3. Josephus follows the usage of the LXX either with reference to breaking the divine law and commandments or harming the state (the political order).

4. Philo stresses the penalty for transgressing laws. In two instances he refers to violation of the laws of marriage, i.e., by remarriage after divorce and by adultery (On the Special Laws 3.30.61).

5. The word is rare in the NT, where sin is a demonic force and not just transgression of the law. In Acts 1:25 the use suggests that Judas by withdrawing from his apostolic office has incurred guilt. In Mt. 15:2-3 the double use brings into sharp relief the battle of Jesus against Pharisaic piety. Transgression is sin where it is against God's commandment. Even observance of human tradition may be transgression if the tradition obscures the pure and original will of God and turns it into its opposite. In 2 Jn. 9 the reading parabaínō is explanatory. Those who do not abide but go ahead (or beyond) are guilty of transgression.

parábasis. This word means "striding to and fro," "stepping over," "transgressing," "violating" (cf. in the LXX Ps. 101:3). In the NT it denotes sin in relation to the law. In Rom. 2:23 the Jew dishonors God by transgressing the law, and in 4:15 the law brings wrath because there is transgression only where there is law. Between Adam and Moses there is sin but no parábasis because the law is not yet given. In Gal. 3:19 the law is given to show that evil deeds are transgressions of God's will. In 1 Tim. 2:14 Eve is deceived first and becomes a transgressor by violating God's prohibition. In Heb. 2:2 every transgression of the law carries a due penalty, and in 9:15 Christ's death serves to remit the transgressions committed under the old covenant, i.e., the acts of disobedience against God's law that have brought Israel into guilt against God.

parabátēs. In secular Greek this word usually means a "companion" or "helper" and only rarely a "transgressor." In military usage it denotes the warrior who stands in a chariot beside the charioteer or the foot soldier set among the cavalry to seize and mount horses whose riders have fallen. The papyri, Josephus, and Philo do not use the term. In the NT Paul uses it for a transgressor of God's commands. Thus in Rom. 2:25, 27 Gentiles may rightly accuse Jews of being themselves transgressors, and in Gal. 2:18, refuting the suggestion that Christ is made an agent of sin, Paul argues that by setting up the law again he would make himself a transgressor, for transgression arises only under the dominion of law. Jms. 2:9 shows that respecting persons is transgression of the law, and 2:11 makes the point that even by breaking a single commandment one becomes a transgressor of the law.

1. This rare word usually means "unchangeable," "immutable" (cf. the stars).

2. In law it thus comes to mean "valid," "unalterable," "inviolable."

3. In the NT Heb. 7:24 says that Christ has an eternal and imperishable priesthood, not just in the sense that it cannot be transferred to anyone else, but in the sense of "unchangeable."

1. This word means "to step over," "to exceed a limit," "to transgress," and "to overlook." In the papyri we find it for a share that "falls" to someone. Another expression is "to pass over in speech," i.e., to be silent.

2. The LXX uses the word for crossing a threshold (1 Sam. 5:5), climbing over palisades (4 Macc. 3:12), leaping over a wall (2 Sam. 22:30), stepping over a boundary (Job 24:2), passing in a race (2 Sam. 18:23). It also means “to surpass” (3 Macc. 6:24). A theological sense is “to overlook” (Job 9:11), and even “to forgive” (Mic. 7:18).

3. Philo uses the word frequently for “to disregard” and “to cross the limits” (e.g., of selfishness, of truth, or of nature).

4. The only NT instance is in 1 Th. 4:6. If the word has no object here, the sense is “to sin,” but if it goes with “his brother” like “wrong,” then it means “to overreach,” “to defraud.” The latter is more likely in the general context. [J. SCHNEIDER, V, 736-44]

parabolḗ [comparison, parable]

A. Secular Greek.

1. This word has the following senses: “setting beside,” “standing beside,” “aberration,” and “division.” In rhetoric it means “similitude,” “parable.”

2. Rhetoric distinguishes between the comparison, the metaphor, the metaphor which has passed into common use, the simile, the allegory, and the parable. The latter compares two things from different fields in order to elucidate the unfamiliar by means of the familiar.

3. Epic poetry makes great use of similitudes because of their illustrative power and evocative content. Gnomic poetry likes them, and so does Plato, who draws on human life or myth for illustrations. The Stoic-Cynic diatribe also uses illustrations, often in answer to objections. Aristotle thinks examples from history are more valuable than parables, but points out that the latter, as distinct from fables, take their material from real life. The effectiveness of comparisons, he says, rests on the ability to see analogy, and it is better that discerning minds should grasp the point of comparison independently. Parable and allegory often merge into one another.

B. The OT, LXX, and Later Judaism.

1. In the LXX parabolḗ is mostly a rendering of māshāl, which indicates likeness. At first the māshāl is a proverb (1 Sam. 10:12); we find it in the phrase “to become a proverb or byword” (Is. 14:4). In Wisdom writings it is the wise saying and comprises examples from life, rules of prudence and courtesy, vocational advice, moral admonitions, and religious directions. Many proverbs use the comparative “as” (Prov. 25:11ff.; 26:18-19). Comparison is also made by juxtaposition (15:16; 16:8). But parallelism is predominant. Since sages love veiled expressions, parabolḗ and aínigma (“riddle”) are often synonymous. In Ps. 78:2 the māshāl is a didactic poem that seeks to solve the riddle of the people’s history. Another form of māshāl is the developed comparison or similitude (cf. 2 Sam. 12:1ff.; Judg. 9:8ff.). The prophets find parables helpful, either constructing them (Is. 28:23ff.) or receiving them in visions (Am. 7:8). The best known is the parable of the vineyard in Is. 5. The OT parable in this sense is a complete story whose meaning is hidden and may be either discerned independently or disclosed by the prophet. In Ezekiel the māshāl is a word of divine revelation (Ezek. 17:2; 24:3); another word is needed to interpret it (17:11ff.; 24:6ff.). In Ps. 49:4 the psalmist speaks as a prophet who has received from God a word that explains the strange prosperity of the wicked. Parabolic actions are also performed by the prophets. As a rendering of māshāl, parabolḗ takes on a richer content that carries over into the NT.

OT Old Testament

2. In apocalyptic, similitudes are means of giving eschatological instruction. Earthly events clarify heavenly events. Visions of heavenly and future mysteries (judgment, resurrection, abodes of the blessed, etc.) are also parables.

3. The Palestinian rabbis use parables that are close to those of the Gospels. They may have the form of short sayings or they may be longer fables, allegories, or stories. The rabbis use the term māshāl impartially for pure or mixed similitudes and allegories. The aim is usually to establish or explain a statement, often polemically. Eschatological parables are rare. A short introductory formula marks off the parable from the general context, as in the NT. The point of comparison may be stated in the final sentence. Some parables have two climaxes, which causes complications. The parables are meant to elucidate, but they have also an oracular quality.

C. The NT.

1. Usage. In the NT parabolḗ occurs 45 times in the Gospels and twice in Hebrews, while paroimía occurs three times in John and once in 2 Peter. The use is the same as that of māshāl-parabolḗ in the OT and the rabbis. In the Gospels the parabolḗ is a short saying combined with a comparison, a proverbial saying, or, in most instances, a parable in the usual sense. In Hebrews it is a “type” or “counterpart.”

2. Defnition and Form of NT parables. More than a metaphor (Mt. 16:6) or simile (10:16), the parable is a similitude which uses evident truth from a known field (nature or human life) to convey new truth in an unknown (the kingdom, the nature and action of God). In the stricter sense parables are more developed similes or metaphors (Mt. 13:31-32; 18:12ff.). They derive their power from the obvious general truth that is used. But then many parables take the form of stories with secondary details in which a single experience constitutes the known truth (Mk. 4:3ff.). In other cases we have stories in which the truth is presented without figurative garb (Lk. 10:30ff.; 12:16ff.; 16:19ff.; 18:9ff.). Jesus takes his material from nature (Mk. 4:26ff.) or Palestinian life. He uses ordinary occurrences (the leaven), typical incidents (sowing seed), and exceptional circumstances (the workers in the vineyard). He uses stock metaphors but these do not become allegories, although some parables (Mk. 12:1ff.) are close to allegories. Current happenings might be used. While the tendency of expositors to allegorize parables was a mistake, some parables have more than one climax, and the stories are organisms, so that several points of comparison might arise (e.g., the sower and different soils). One must also avoid generalizing, for Jesus is not illustrating general truths but preaching the kingdom of God. The connecting statement, then, lies in a living context within the theme of Jesus’ preaching. In form the parables are like those of the rabbis. They begin with a brief introductory formula. An (amḗn) légō hymín often gives emphasis to the point. The parables may or may not include an application and sometimes end with a question. The application may be antithetical (Lk. 12:40, 56). The final aim is to clarify but not without demanding response from the hearers.

3. The Question of Transmission. The fidelity of transmission seems to be very high. The parables bear the imprint of Jesus’ thought and style, and are true to the Palestinian setting. Comparison of the different versions shows that there may be secondary additions, and the community may have adapted for believers some parables that were originally addressed to opponents (cf. Mt. 18:12ff.; Lk. 12:58-59). Allegory tends to invade eschatological parables (cf. Lk. 14:16 and Mt. 22:2), although allegorical features may well have been original. The question of authenticity is particularly urgent when interpretations are given (Mk. 4: 13ff.; Mt. 13:36ff.). The disciples ask for these interpretations because of the oracular nature of the parables (cf. Mk. 4:34). Some exegetes believe that allegorical elements and stylistic peculiarities in the interpretations suggest a community setting.

4. The Meaning and Purpose of the Parables in Jesus’ Preaching. Mk. 4:33-34 says that Jesus makes much use of parables because the people is slow to understand. Jesus has come at a critical hour and seeks to evoke the right response (Lk. 12:54ff.). As a prophet, he has to be clear. The parables carry their own message, but they presuppose listeners who will accompany the speaker and grasp the point of comparison. Those who do not have the spiritual power to do this, or who reject the revelation of God, will be sifted out by parables. If Jesus uses parables as an aid to understanding, they also serve as veils where there is unbelief. This raises the question of Mk. 4:11, which with its hína suggests that parables deliberately conceal the truth with a view to hardening and judgment. On a critical understanding, this is a later construction which ascribes the unbelief of Israel to the prior counsel of God that Jesus fulfils by using parables. On a conservative view, the saying reflects the experience of Jesus as he proclaims the actualization in himself of the divine plan of salvation but meets with the two responses of faith and unbelief; his sayings are light and salvation to disciples but darkness and judgment to the unresponsive masses who hear the same words but do not perceive their truth, and thus come under the prophecy of Is. 6:9-10.

5. The Message of the Parables. The parables deal with the kingdom of God, God's nature and work, and human destiny. While rabbinic parables expound the law, the parables of Jesus are mostly eschatological (although not apocalyptic). Most of Jesus' parables are interwoven into a didactic context. Some, however, are not bound to a theme, but seek by veiled speech to stir the audience to find the statement behind the veil (Mk. 12:1ff.). As regards the kingdom, the parables stress its imminence and sudden coming (Mk. 13:28-29; Mt. 24:43-44). The old aeon has gone (Mk. 2:21-22), demons must yield (3:27), an invitation to enter the kingdom is issued (2:17). The kingdom will grow (4:31-32) and permeate the world (Mt. 13:33). Decision is demanded (Mt. 6:24), the end will entail separation (13:24ff.), those who seek earthly security are fools (Lk. 12:16ff.), and the unfruitful are under threat (13:6ff.). Watchfulness is required (Mt. 25:1ff.). Only doers will stand in the judgment (Mt. 7:24ff.), and the kingdom will reverse all earthly values (Lk. 16:19ff.). As regards God's nature and action, he is like a loving father (Mt. 7:9ff.; Lk. 15:11ff.), a kind and righteous judge (Lk. 18:1ff.), and a more than generous employer (Mt. 20:1ff.). As regards human destiny, self-examination (Lk. 14:28ff.) and prudent action (16:1ff.) are demanded. Disciples have no claims (Lk. 17:7ff.), share the fate of their master (Mt. 10:24-25), and must shine out like a city on a hill (Mt. 5:14). Integrity (Mt. 15:10ff.), humility (Lk. 18:9ff.), gratitude (Lk. 7:36ff.), and a readiness to forgive (Mt. 18:23ff.) are incumbent on them. The love that God requires recognizes no human limits (Lk. 10:30ff.).

6. Figurative Language in Paul, James, and Revelation. Paul does not use the word parabolḗ but draws comparisons from human life, e.g., armor, leaven, milk, the temple, the mirror. In more extended comparisons he refers to the legal status of the married woman, to believers as a crop, to the Christian life as a contest, to the community as a bodily organism, to resurrection bodies as seed and plant. James, too, is rich in figures but uses no true parables. Revelation, after the apocalyptic manner, makes copious use of visions, allegories, and symbols, but not parables.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. parabolḗ occurs twice in Barnabas in allegorical interpretation of the OT (cf. 6.10 and Ex. 33:1ff., and 17.2). The word here means a saying with an allegorical sense, a mysterious intimation of the divinely ordained future. Hermas uses parabolaí in the title of the third part. The first five parabolaí are extended comparisons that are built on current metaphors and accompanied by partly parabolic and partly allegorical interpretations with interwoven admonitions. In 6-10 the parabolaí are visions which impart divine revelations in figures of speech, and explanations are again given. [F. HAUCK, V, 744-61]

parangéllō [to give orders, command], parangelía [order, command]

A. General Greek Usage. This group has to do with “intimation” in various senses, the only one of which to occur in the NT, with much modification, is that of “order” or “direction.” While parangéllein denotes transmission of the command, keleúein has the actual command in view.

B. Hellenistic Jewish Usage.

1. The LXX does not use the noun but has the verb for military orders, summons to an assembly (1 Sam. 10:17), and official proclamations (2 Chr. 36:22).

2. Philo uses the verb for God’s commands, and also has the nouns parángelma and parangelia for precepts, legal statutes, and demands.

C. NT Usage.

1. The Synoptics use parangéllein for “to command,” but only with Jesus as subject. Thus he instructs the disciples (Mt. 10:5), commands the spirits to depart (Lk. 8:29), orders the cleansed leper (5:14), tells the crowd to be seated (Mk. 8:6). Luke shows a liking for the word.

2. The verb is fairly common in Acts. Jesus commands the disciples in 1:4, and has told them to preach in 10:42. In Christ’s name Paul commands the spirit to depart in 16:18. Various other commands are those of the authorities in 4:18, of the magistrates in 16:23, of Lysias in 23:22.

3. Paul alone uses the noun as well as the verb. Timothy is to charge false teachers in 1 Tim. 1:3; the aim of the charge (v. 5) is love. What the Lord commands is the supreme authority (1 Cor. 7:10), but this authority stands behind Paul’s own commands (1 Th. 4:2; 2 Th. 3:12). In 1 Timothy parangéllein is enjoined on Timothy; he is to charge false teachers, widows, and the rich (1:3-4; 5:7; 6:17). This charge is laid on him in Christ’s name. parangéllein is thus traced back to God’s saving work in Christ. [D. SCHMITZ, V, 761-65]

parádeisos [paradise]

A. History of the Word.

1. This is a loanword from a Persian term meaning “enclosure” or “park.” The Greeks first use it for the parks of Persian kings. In the LXX the garden of Gen. 2-3 is God’s “park” and parádeisos becomes a technical religious term.

2. Hebrew and Aramaic also adopt the word but use it only in the secular sense.

B. Paradise in Later Judaism.

1. The First Age. Statements about paradise begin with Gen. 2-3, which offers rich material for embroidery.

2. The Last Age. Hope develops for a final age of bliss, and this hope uses the paradise motif (Ezek. 36:35). There is indeed an expected return of the original paradise in apocalyptic, which by means of the belief in resurrection offers assurance that all the righteous will share its delights.

3. Present Hiddenness of Paradise. If the paradise of the first age is to return, it still exists in hidden form. It is the present home of the righteous; Sheol is the abode of the wicked. Suggested locations are on earth, on a high mountain reaching up to heaven, or in heaven. The delights of the intermediate and eschatological paradise merge into one another.

4. The Identity of Paradise. While there are references to the first paradise, the last paradise, and the intermediate paradise, these are not three entities but one and the same garden of God.

v. verse

C. The NT.

1. The First, Hidden, and Last Paradise. The term parádeisos occurs in the NT only in Lk. 23:43; 2 Cor. 12:4; Rev. 2:7. It is not used for the garden, but the paradisal state is implied in Rom. 3:23; 5:12; Mt. 19:8. The concealed paradise is the intermediate abode of the redeemed in Lk. 23:43. Other NT terms for the intermediate state are table fellowship with Abraham (Lk. 16:23), being with the Lord (2 Cor. 5:8) or Christ (Phil. 1:23), and the heavenly kingdom (2 Tim. 4:18). In Mk. 13:27 the dead will assemble in the heavenly world. The final paradise is mentioned in Rev. 2:7, for all the victor sayings have an eschatological thrust, and the fruit of the tree of life is a privilege of the last paradise (cf. Jerusalem in 22:1-2, Jerusalem being the center of the renewed earth).

2. Paul's Rapture. In 2 Cor. 12:4 Paul refers to his rapture to the abode of the righteous departed. He does so with great reserve, and it is not certain that paradise is the same as the third heaven of v. 3. The visions of the Lord are visions given by the Lord, not visions of Christ among the departed.

3. Fellowship with Christ. Jesus' answer to the prayer of the penitent thief is that he will be with him in paradise (Lk. 23:43). This is the hidden intermediate paradise, but the eschatological "today" points to the dawn of the day of salvation. Paradise is opened to the worst of penitent sinners by fellowship with the Messiah. Fellowship with Christ is the distinctive Christian characteristic of the intermediate state (cf. Acts 7:59; 2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:23; 2 Tim. 4:18; Jn. 12:26; Rev. 7:9ff.). This replaces speculation about paradisal delights.

4. Paradise and Hades. The NT says that Jesus enters paradise (Lk. 23:43) and offers his blood in the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. 7:26-27; cf. also Jn. 3:14; 8:28). Yet it also refers to his sojourn in hádēs and perhaps to redemptive work there (cf. Rom. 10:7; Acts 2:27; 1 Pet. 3:19-20). Both conceptions express the same assurance of faith in the unique atoning efficacy of Christ's work, but from different angles.

5. Jesus Restores Paradise. In Rev. 2:7 it is Jesus who gives the fruit of paradise to the victors. But the NT goes further, for Jesus has already restored paradise by his coming. Thus in Mt. 11:5 his word and work fulfil Is. 35:5-6, and in Mk. 10:2-3 he reimposes the divine will in paradise (cf. also Mk. 1:13; 7:37) and in John his offering of the symbols of paradise in the bread and water of life. The NT makes only sparing use of the term, probably because of the danger of the intrusion of fantastic ideas, as in the inauthentic saying reported by Papias. [J. JEREMIAS, V, 765-73]

parakaléō [to exhort, comfort], paráklēsis [exhortation, comfort]

A. Common Greek Usage.

1. These two words have a wide range of meaning, the first sense being that of "calling to" either literally or with such nuances as calling for aid, inviting, and summoning.

2. A second sense is that of "beseeching," e.g., calling on the gods in prayer, or, from a superior to an inferior, proposing.

3. A third sense is that of "exhorting" or "encouraging," and even on occasion of "winning over" for a plan.

4. The final sense is that of "comforting," mostly in the form of giving exhortation or encouragement in times of sorrow. This is not a common use.

B. Greek Judaism.

1. Hebrew, Equivalents and Their Influence. In the LXX the words are used for 15 Hebrew terms and also occur in free renderings. Mostly, however, they are used for nāḥam, and this makes "comfort" the main sense, especially in bereavement (Gen. 24:67). The verb in particular also refers to the comfort that God gives his people under judgment, or individuals in temptation.

2. The Group in the LXX with No Hebrew Original. Where there is no Hebrew original, the sense of comfort is almost completely absent, and instead we have such senses as exhortation, encouragement, strengthening, reassuring, proposing, and inviting.

3. The Extracanonical Writings. Outside the biblical sphere we seldom find the special LXX use, and such meanings as asking, admonishing, beseeching, etc. predominate. Thus we find "to invite" in Philo and "to invoke" God in prayer in Josephus. Only in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs and 4 Esdras is the idea of comfort more commonly present, whether with God's comfort in view or the comforting of Zion in her mourning. [O. SCHMITZ, V, 773-79]

C. Comfort and Comforters in Nonbiblical Antiquity.

I. Comfort and Admonition. The group contains an imperative element ("to admonish") that is accompanied by the indicative ("to console"). A theoretical distinction is made between them but they come together in practice. Exhortation is a form of comfort with a view to overcoming or setting aside grief.

II. Comforters. Antiquity works out different forms of comfort for the elderly, the dying, the bereaved, the separated, exiles, and the victims of injustice or handicaps. All have the duty of offering comfort. The dying give it in parting words, and the dead in writings in which they figure. Mourners try to console themselves in the same way as they console others. They may read works of consolation, and rational considerations have a consoling effect, as does the recounting of one's troubles.

III. Ways and Means of Comfort. The ways of giving comfort are personal presence, visits, letters, and consolatory writings. Professional comforters are also available. Means of comfort are philosophical teachings, religious teachings and practices, e.g., prayer and the mysteries, and such things as music, diversions, sleep, and even wine.

IV. Reasons for Comfort.

1. Epicurus. Among reasons for comfort the Epicureans suggest that death is the absolute end, so that there is no reason to grieve for the dead. The true comfort is life itself, i.e., the remembrance that each day might be the last, and therefore the receiving and using of each hour as a gift.

2. Common Reasons. Among reasons for comfort commonly adduced are the recollection of past happiness, the consideration of good things still remaining, the thought of the duration of the universe but also of its corruptibility, compared to which individual suffering is petty, and the thought of the universality of death, which overtakes great as well as small.

3. The Thought of Immortality. The main basis of comfort in antiquity is the idea of the immortality of the soul. The good are not dead; death is the birth of neverending life, a returning home. On this view life itself is an exile, with the body as a prison or burden, and death a joyous liberation. One should thus dwell on the better hereafter to which the dead have gone and in which they enjoy a heavenly reward and the fellowship of the blessed gods. The mysteries especially nurture this view. In general, the gods themselves are not comforters. They fix the time of death and will not abandon those who are under their protection, but their function in antiquity is not to console, and the ancients have more fear of their envy than trust in their friendship. For all the appeals to the thought of a better hereafter, many of the statements to this effect have a note of uncertainty and unreality. A profound lack of hope characterizes the world of antiquity. The dead are called blessed whether they live on or cease to be. Transitoriness as a source of consolation is cold comfort. The pessimistic principle that life is evil and death a release testifies to a hopeless sense of meaninglessness. Early death in particular suggests the futility of birth. Cynical notes are heard when the dead are summoned up to give the information that all that is said about the world to come is false. Various symbols, e.g., the broken column, the extinguished torch, and the flawed rose express the hopelessness of antiquity. Even the noblest consolation ends in capitulation to the majesty of death. Pagan antiquity shows

"classically" how little our own insights and resources can help us when we encounter the forces that make life a realm of suffering [G. STÄHLIN, V, 779-88]

D. Comfort and Comfortlessness in the OT.

I. Human Comfort.

1. Bearers. Relatives and friends are called upon to give comfort in the OT (Job 2:11), but also those more distant (cf. 2 Sam. 10:2). It is an honor to be asked to console the mourning (Job 29:25). Some may do it badly (16:2), but a true comforter is like a king among his troops (29:25).

2. Means. Visits are customary, and bread and wine are brought (Jer. 16:5, 7). Wine is a particular solace in trouble (Gen. 5:29; cf. Prov. 31:6-7).

3. Self-comforting. Often comforters counsel self-consolation. Sirach advises that mourning be brief, for nothing can be altered and lamentation is harmful.

II. Divine Comfort.

1. Comfortlessness. There is no true comfort apart from God. The Psalms express human comfortlessness (69:20; 77:2). Lamentations (1:2, 9, 16) and Ecclesiastes (4:1) mention it too. Such desolation is finally a divine judgment (Is. 51:19).

2. Comfort. God's proper work is to comfort. He turns desolation into consolation for individuals (Ps. 23:4) and the people (Is. 54:11ff.). The great promise to Israel is that of Is. 40:1ff. The time of salvation is the time of God's comfort when he will make of ruins a parádeisos (51:3).

3. Metaphors. The metaphors of the shepherd (Is. 40:11) and mother (66:13) describe God's comfort. His people find consolation at his breast (66:11) and on his knees (66:12).

4. Mediators. God channels his comfort through mediators, e.g., his word (Ps. 119), Scripture (2 Macc. 5:19), wisdom (Wis. 8:9), and among humans the prophets, who both judge and comfort (cf. Ezek. 4ff. and 33ff.; Jer. 31:18ff.), and especially the servant (Is. 61:2).

E. Human and Divine Comfort in Judaism.

I. Human Comfort.

1. Occasions. Comfort is given to bereaved relatives, to the teachers of those who die young, and to those who are conscience-stricken.

2. Duty. The duty of comforting falls on close relatives, teachers, colleagues, pupils, neighbors, etc. To give comfort is a good work and a following of God, who himself comforts mourners.

3. Forms. The main forms are visits and letters. Books close with words of consolation and blessing.

4. Reasons. The reasons are partly the same as in the pagan world and partly biblical and Jewish.

5. Presuppositions. Knowledge of Scripture and experience of comfort confer the ability to comfort.

6. Self-comforting. Judaism cultivates the ideal of self-comforting.

II. Divine Comfort. With the OT Judaism extols God as the only true comforter. Hellenistic Judaism thinks God has planted a native hope in humanity, but Palestinian Judaism refers to such mediators of comfort as the word of promise, the prophets, the angels, and the Messiah. "Comfort" becomes a comprehensive term for the messianic salvation (Is. 40:1ff.). The consolation of Israel is the messianic hope, and Menachem (Comforter) becomes a name for the Messiah. [O. SCHMITZ—G.STÄHLIN, V, 788-93]

F. The Words in the NT. In the NT parakaléō and paráklēsis, which do not occur in the Johannine works or James, receive their main content from the NT event of salvation. Sometimes, of course, we also find the ordinary use (cf. especially Acts, e.g., 8:31; 9:38; 16:39; 28:14, 20, etc.). In other cases there is movement toward a specific use, e.g., when people ask Jesus for help. A general use for comfort occurs in Acts 20:12; 1 Th. 3:7; 2 Cor. 2:7, but this is on the basis of the gospel, and in the main the NT uses the words specifically for address with the three nuances of asking for help, exhorting, and comforting.

1. Asking for Help. This is a common use in the Synoptics when people turn to Jesus for help, e.g., in Mt. 8:5; Lk. 7:4; Mk. 5:18; 6:56; 1:40; 8:22. This asking is urgent beseeching. A similar use in Mt. 26:53 is for calling on God for help; Jesus does not avail himself of this open possibility.

2. Exhorting. This is a common use in Acts and Paul. It implies speaking in God's name and with the Spirit's power. Evangelistic entreaty is the point in 2 Cor. 5:20, but with a note of authority. Proclamation is also paráklēsis in 1 Th. 2:3 (cf. Acts 9:31;, 2:40; Lk. 3:18). What is meant is the proclaiming of salvation as also a claim on the will and action of the hearers. Often admonition to those already won is at issue (cf.Heb. 13:22; 1 Pet. 5:12; Jude 3; Phil. 2:1; Rom. 12:1, etc.). This admonition is "in Christ," or "by his name," or "by his meekness and gentleness," or "by the mercy of God" (cf. Phil. 2:1; 1 Cor. 1:10; 2 Cor. 10:1; Rom. 12:1). It rests on the saving work of God in Christ and is an inherent part of the apostolic ministry (1 Tim. 5:1; Tit. 2:6). The Holy Spirit is at work in it, and it is almost a function of prophecy (cf. 1 Cor. 14:3, 31; Acts 15:28, 31). Barnabas can give pastoral help as one who is filled with the Spirit (Acts 11:24). Accompanying words show that the admonition is not sharp, polemical, or critical, even though it is urgent and serious. The fact that comfort can be another meaning points in the same direction.

3. Comforting. It is in Paul and Hebrews that parakaleín denotes the comfort that God brings through his present and future salvation. Heb. 6:18 and 12:5 relate this comfort to exhortation and encouragement. Rom. 15:4 shows that it comes through Scripture and bases it on the divine constancy. This constancy is that of the divine love displayed in Christ (2 Th. 2:16-17). Paul is time and again concerned to comfort the churches in their afflictions (cf. Col. 2:2; 4:8). He himself is comforted by the kindness of Philemon (Phlm. 7). The good news about the Thessalonian church also comforts him (1 Th. 3:7). The same applies to the good news from Corinth (2 Cor. 7:6).

4. Human and Divine Comfort. Comfort is given by human agents but is real comfort only as it comes from God. God is the God of all comfort (2 Cor. 1:3-4) who makes the fellowship of suffering a fellowship of comfort (1:5ff.). While comfort derives from present salvation, it stands in the light of future deliverance, and is thus linked to both sōtēría and elpís (cf. 2 Th. 2:16; Rom. 15:4). Enjoying the divine comfort, the Corinthians are to forgive and console the one who wronged Pau1 (2 Cor. 2:7). Events as well as words bring comfort (2 Cor. 7:6). But the final comfort (Mt. 5:4) is the eschatological act of God which reaches into the present so that those who mourn are already blessed. Those who look for the consolation of Israel (Lk. 2:25) are awaiting messianic salvation (Is. 40:1ff.). The comfort of present salvation is set in the light of the coming consummation when God will remove all suffering by his glorious presence (Rev. 21:3ff.). For this reason it is eternal comfort and good hope (2 Th. 2:16).

5. Conclusion. The NT makes good use of the wealth of meaning in the terms parakaleín and paráklēsis. The sense "to call in" fades into the background. "To ask" occurs mainly for requests addressed to Jesus during his earthly ministry. The meaning "exhortation" comes into use both for missionary proclamation and pastoral admonition. The sense of "comfort" occurs in connection with salvation history (on an OT basis). In this sense the terms express God's aid to the churches in present affliction on the basis of the saving work of Christ and with a view to final deliverance. Asking thus presupposes that God's salvation is manifested in Jesus, exhorting that it is effected by the Spirit, and comfort that it will finally be consummated by the Father. The words relate, then, to the saving work of the triune God which leads the needy as suppliants to the Son, which is preached as exhortation in the power of the Spirit, and which carries with it already the eternal comfort of the Father. paráklētos [advocate, helper]

A. The Linguistic Problem.

1. Use Outside the NT.

a. In Greek the verbal adjective paráklētos has first a passive sense, i.e., "called in to help." From this develops the sense of a "helper in court" (though not an advocate or professional adviser).

b. The LXX does not use paráklētos, though two other OT versions (Α and Θ) have it for Job's "comforters." Josephus uses aparáklētos and dysparáklētos in a passive sense.

c. The rabbis have paráklētos as a loanword and use it for an advocate before God. Conversion and good works are great advocates in the judgment.

d. Philo also employs paráklētos for an advocate. Those who speak on behalf of accused persons are paráklētoi, and God's love, intercessions, and good works are paráklētoi before God. The symbolic adornment of the high priest's garment is his advocate in his atoning ministry in the temple.

e. In the early church, apart from NT influence, Did. 5.2 refers to advocates who help only the rich. Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 5.1.10 mentions an Epagathos who is the paráklētos of the persecuted brethren before the governor. In general, then, paráklētos means a helper in court who might speak on behalf of those who are accused. Only in one instance do we find the sense of "comforter."

2. The Meaning in the NT. The limited NT use does not make any consistent impression In 1 Jn. 2:1 Christ as paráklētos is plainly the "advocate" who represents the sinning believer in the Father's court. In Jn. 16:7ff. the idea of a trial is again present, but here the Spirit is the disciple's counsellor in relation to the world, and the context (16:7, 13ff.; 15:26; 14:16-17, 26) might suggest the broader sense of "helper." The meaning "comforter," although adopted in some renderings, does not fit any of the passages. In the early church the Greek fathers take Jesus to be a paráklētos in the sense of "advocate," Origen bringing in the idea of Christ's intercessory work. As regards the Spirit, the earliest sense is again "advocate," but some fathers then come to think of the Spirit as the "comforter," the Johannine discourses being designed, they think, to comfort the disciples on Jesus' departure. The Latin fathers use both advocatus and consolator, and so do Latin translations when they do not keep the Greek paracletus or paraclitus).

B. The Religious Background.

1. The Helper.

a. Mandaean Writings. Some trace the origin of the use of paráklētos in the Johannine works back to the concept of heavenly helpers. We find many such helpers in the Mandaean literature. The term is an elastic one, but it is linked especially to the revealer.

b. The Odes of Solomon. These also speak of a heavenly helper but with reference to God himself. Parallels to the concept in John may be seen, especially in such Mandaean ideas as sending from above, imparting instruction, leading to salvation, and confirming in moral conduct, but the thought of the legal advocate does not occur, and the plurality of helpers contrasts with the two of John, Jesus and the Spirit. Again, neither in the Mandaean writings nor in the Odes is paráklētos a title.

2. The Advocate.

a. The OT. The origin of the Johannine use has also been sought in the concept of the advocate. This is important in the OT. The patriarchs (Gen. 18:23ff.) and prophets (Jer. 14:7ff.) intercede with God for others who are guilty or afflicted. The function of such people is also to declare God's will. A somewhat higher advocate is that of Job in Job 33:23 (cf. 5:1; 16:19ff.; 19:25ff.). This is the friend in heaven who not only serves as an advocate in the divine court but also gives correction and summons to repentance. For a similar use cf. Zech. 1:12; 3:1ff.

b. The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha. In these writings we again find the idea of advocacy, e.g., that of the prophets, the righteous, those who fear God, and the interceding angels, who can both prosecute and defend, and who also teach and advise those who are committed to their care.

c. The Rabbis. Here again the idea of the heavenly advocate is common. The law, sacrifices, and good works have this function along with the righteous, interceding angels, and the Spirit, who both pleads with God for grace for Israel and reminds Israel of its duty toward God.

d. The NT. The concept of the advocate familiar in the OT and Judaism is obviously present in 1 Jn. 2:1. The OT and Judaism also offer many parallels for the view of the Spirit in Jn. 14ff., e.g., as authoritative teacher (14:26), witness to revelation (15:26), and speaker at the trial of the world by God (16:8ff.). The idea that the advocacy takes place both in heaven and on earth is also common to the OT and Judaism. On balance it seems that the NT usage is more closely linked to the "advocate" concept of the OT than to the "helper" concept of the Mandaean world.

C. The NT Concept.

1. The first clear idea linked with paráklētos in the NT is that of the advocate at God's bar in heaven. In place of the many advocates Christians now recognize only the one, Jesus Christ. He is our intercessor at God's right hand (Rom. 8:34). He places his incorruptible life in the service of his people (Heb. 7:25). He not only claims the office of judge but also promises to be the defender of those who confess him (Mt. 10:32-33). The Christian idea of an eschatological paraclete goes back to Jesus himself.

2. More richly developed, and difficult to define, is the idea in John of a Paraclete working in and for the disciples. First Jesus is such (14:16), then the Spirit, who, completing the work of Jesus, leads the disciples into all truth (14:26), witnesses to Jesus (15:26), and convicts the world (16:8ff.). This work is similar to that of the OT advocate and links up with descriptions of the Spirit's ministry elsewhere in the NT (Rom. 8:26-27; Mk. 13:11; Lk. 13:6ff.). The Greek term may well go back to the term used by Jesus himself in his mother tongue. In translation the many secondary senses rule out any single equivalent. If we are to avoid "Paraclete," the basic thought is that of "Advocate" but the more general "Supporter" or "Helper" is perhaps the best rendering. [J. BEHM, V, 800-814] parakýptō [to stoop to see, look into]

1. This word means "I stoop to see." It applies to a quick, stolen glance. A verb of seeing may be added, but this is unusual.

2. The word occurs eight times in the LXX. The passive is used for the difficult Hebrew of 1 Kgs. 6:4. Elsewhere the idea is that of looking out of a window (Gen. 26:8) or into a window (Sir. 14:23).

3. In Jn. 20:5 the beloved disciple looks into the tomb through the low entrance. The glance is not necessarily a fleeting one (cf. 20:11). A figurative use occurs in Jms. 1:25, where again more than a fleeting glance is at issue. In 1 Pet. 1:12 inquisitive peeping might be the point unless there is a desire for genuine perception. [W. MICHAELIS, V, 814-16]

paralambánō → lambánō; paraménō → ménō

paramythéomai [to admonish, console], paramythía [comfort], paramýthion [comfort]

A. Meaning.

1. Structure and Basic Meaning. Made up from pará ("toward") and mythéomai ("to speak"), paramythéomai has the basic sense "to speak to someone in a friendly way." With reference to what ought to be done, it develops the sense "to admonish," with reference to what has been done, the sense "to console."

2. "To Admonish." Nuances of this sense are "to urge," "to win over," "to spur on," "to encourage," "to persuade," and "to convince."

3. "To Console." Nuances of this sense are "to cheer," "to refresh" or "tend" (plants), "to mitigate" or "soothe," "to lessen" (shocks), "to resolve" or "explain" (a contradiction), "to excuse," "to appease," "to pacify," and "to satisfy" or "atone."

4. Special Meanings of the Nouns. The main sense of the nouns is "comfort," but they may also denote "means of comfort," "sign of comfort,'" and in the financial world "compensation," "interest," "pension," or "tip."

B. The Group in the OT. The group does not occur in translation of the Hebrew but only in books in which the LXX is the original. The idea is usually that of encouraging, soothing, comforting, or refreshing.

C. The Group in the NT.

1. Usage. There are only six instances in the NT, two in John and four in Paul. Since the reference in Jn. 11:19, 31 is to Jewish practice, and John does not use parakaléō, there is no word in John for Christian paramythía. In Paul paramythéomai is subsidiary to the more important parakaléō (cf. 1 Th. 2:12; 5:14; 1 Cor. 14:3; Phil. 2:1). Since both terms combine admonition and comfort, it is hard to draw any clear distinction between them. In both the unity of admonition and comfort is rooted in the gospel with its dialectical relationship of imperative and indicative. The only possible difference is that paramythéomai is not used directly for God's comfort or for eschatological comfort, but always for comfort in the earthly sphere.

2. Comfort and Comforters.

a. Traditional Rites and the Comfort of Jesus. In John the reference is to the typical Jewish visit of condolence (11:19, 31). Comforters stay as close as possible to the bereaved and speak words or perform acts of sorrow and consolation. Jesus as the true comforter uses traditional forms of speech in Mk. 5:36; Lk. 7:13; Jn. 11:23, but he also gives the true comfort of action by breaking the power of sickness and death. Two other Jewish customs, i.e., the letter of condolence and ending a book with a word of consolation, find expression in the NT in 2 Cor. 1ff. and Mt. 28.

b. Recipients. The recipients of comfort in the NT are all who sorrow, the sick and prisoners (Mt. 25:36, 43), and orphans and widows (Jms. 1:27). Usually paramythéomai has the church or its members in view (1 Cor. 14:3; Phil. 2:1; 1 Th. 2:12; 5:14).

c. Bearers. First the prophets bring comfort (1 Cor. 14:3). Giving comfort is part of their office. Paul also sees it as part of his apostolic ministry (1 Th. 2:11-12). It has a strongly personal character (cf. also Col. 1:28). Mutual consolation seems to be the point in 1 Th. 5:14. The same applies to Phil. 2:1, where the love might be that of God or Christ, but is probably the mutual love of the brethren. The fellowship of suffering is a fellowship of consolation. Above all earthly comforters, of course, stands the heavenly comforter who is the source of all earthly comfort (2 Cor. 1:3).

d. The Chief NT Motif. In the NT the name of Christ is the main reason for comfort. All thoughts of comfort are oriented to Christ. The OT offers comfort as it is read in the light of Christ. The comfort of the Father and the Spirit relates to the divine work in Christ. Comfort for death lies in the promise of resurrection that is grounded in Christ. Comfort in persecution lies in the fact that it is for Christ's sake and means fellowship in the suffering of Christ (2 Cor. 1:5; 1 Pet. 4:13). The content of NT prophecy is the revelation of the mystery of Christ, the power of Christian comfort lies in the love of Christ (Phil. 2:1), and apostolic comfort rests on God's calling believers into the kingdom and glory of Christ (1 Th. 2:12). pareiságō [to bring in secretly], pareísaktos [brought in secretly] pareiságō has the neutral sense "to bring forward," "to present," but often with the suggestion of something unlawful or furtive, e.g., "to introduce strange gods." The term does not occur in the LXX, Philo, or Josephus. In the one NT instance in 2 Pet. 2:1 the false teachers are unlawfully and secretly bringing in their destructive heresies (cf. Jude 4, where they insinuate themselves). The verbal adjective pareísaktos in Gal. 2:4 has the same emphasis. The term is a rare one and denotes someone who has wormed his way in and is at work where he does not belong. In Gal. 2:4 it is a disparaging term for opponents of the Gentile mission. [W. MICHAELIS, V, 824-26]

A. Nonbiblical and Non-Jewish Use.

1. Usage. Of uncertain origin, parthénos means a "mature young woman." According to context the stress may be on sex, age, or status. By a process of narrowing down the more general sense yields to the more specific one of "virgin," with a stress on freshness, or on physical or spiritual purity.

2. The Virgin in Religion.

a. Cultic Honoring of the Divine Virgin. In relation to female deities there is a multiple use. Artemis is strictly parthénos but has varied functions as, e.g., the giver of fertility, the mistress of law, and the guardian of oaths. Virgin sacrifices are especially powerful because of the combination of freshness and innocence. The same combination lies behind the worship of virgin deities. Athene is an example, for although she has some maternal characteristics, she epitomizes the chaste and unapproachable maiden of nonsexual origin. Thus the term parthénos suggests the immutable, the self-sufficient, and the self-contained in a kind of mythicizing of autarchy.

b. The Virgin as the Mother of the Divine Child. In religion we find many references to the virgin mother of the divine child, but it is not always clear whether the idea is that of a virgin in the strict physical sense, of a woman still in the bloom of youth, or of a virgin in the sense of unapproachable character. Again, what is meant by conception is open to debate, since deities come in many forms, although usually by natural processes, and there seems to be no thought of parthenogenesis in the strict sense.

3. Virginity in Cultic Practice and Magic. Various motifs are at work in the imposing of celibacy on priests, priestesses, and magicians, whether permanently or temporarily. Virginity is thought to convey special power, priestesses are viewed as married to the gods, and ritual purity is a consideration (or freedom from demotic infection). In the use of virgin girls or boys in magic, the special power of virginity is the point.

B. The OT and Judaism.

1. The Mother of Immanuel. The word 'almâ occurs nine times in the OT. Three times it means an unmarried woman (Gen. 24:43; Ex. 2:8; probably Ps. 68:25). This also seems to be the sense in Ps. 46:1; 1 Chr. 15:20; Cant. 1:3. The meaning is uncertain in Prov. 30:19, but the reference is probably to a girl who has just reached maturity. The same applies to Is. 7:14. Questions regarding Is. 7:14 are whether the woman is an individual or represents all the women pregnant at the time in Israel, whether Immanuel is an individual or a representative name, and whether honey and milk are the food of deliverance or of judgment. In context the name Immanuel obviously signifies salvation beyond the immediate judgment, and Immanuel seems to be the child, not of the prophet's wife, but of an unknown woman. The father is not named because the child stands under God's protection and is under God's commission to bring salvation. In its immediate reference the verse carries no thought of a divine child, of divine conception, or of parthenogenesis.

2. The Meaning of parthénos in the LXX. As the usual rendering of Heb. bəṯûlâ, parthénos means "girl" in many instances, with chastity implied. A stress on virginity occurs in Lev. 21:13-14; Dt. 22:23, 28; 2 Sam. 13:2. When used with place names, the thought is that of not being forced, or, in the case of Israel, of nonpollution with idolatry. Only twice is parthénos used for 'almâ. Although the LXX gives to parthénos a stronger emphasis on virginity, it may be used for the young woman who is raped in Gen. 34:3, and on purely lexical grounds one cannot say for certain that it means "virgin" in Is. 7:14, where it might simply denote a woman who is inviolate up to the moment of conception. On the other hand, the use of neánis in other renderings may well be polemical, and on the basis of LXX usage the translator of Is. 7:14 could well have had a nonsexual origin in view for Immanuel.

3. The Allegorical Use in Philo. Philo allegorizes the supernataral conceptions of the OT. For him Sarah etc. represent virtues. The soul has been corrupted by sensual things, but God makes it parthénos again by freeing it from desire, thus befitting it for converse with himself.

C. parthénos in the NT.

1. General Use. This use may be seen in Mt. 25:1ff. The daughters of Philip in Acts 21:9 are probably called parthénoi (adjective) in the sense of "unmarried."

2. The Virginity of Mary. Mary's virginity prior to Jesus' birth is not for ascetic reasons (cf. Mt. 1:23; Lk. 1:27). The virgin birth does not disparage marriage, and the idea of Mary's perpetual virginity is a later one. The virgin birth is by a natural process and is not meant to explain either the deity, the sinlessness, or the power of Jesus. In Luke the birth of Jesus plainly differs from that of the Baptist. Mary conceives a son by the creative act of God (1:27, 34). Mt. 1:18, 20 says that the generation is by the Holy Spirit, but in the sense of a new work of creation (cf. Gen. 1:2) rather than a divine begetting. The idea of a sacred marriage is wholly absent. The lack of other NT references to the virgin birth (e.g., in Paul or John) may be explained in different ways, e.g., its acceptance as self-evident, concentration on other matters, or in some cases ignorance on the question. Allusions, as in Jn. 1:13-14; Rom. 1:3; Heb. 7:3, are only indirect.

3. The Ascetic Sense. The word parthénos seems to have an ascetic sense in 1 Cor. 7:25, 28, 34, 36ff. Some see here a reference to women who have set up house with men so as to be economically independent. The literal sense is also possible in Rev. 14:4.

4. The Figurative Use. This is the more likely use in Rev. 14:4 (cf. the use of pórnē for the world). The redeemed have remained pure when tempted to fall into idolatry or licentiousness. The community is parthénos in 2 Cor. 11:2 as the bride of Christ. The word here signifies exclusive commitment. Paul has affianced the church to Christ and watches over it so that he may present it for marriage at the parousia. [G. DELLING, V, 826-37]

parístēmi* [to place, approach], paristánō [to place, approach]

A. Nonbiblical Greek. From the NT standpoint the following are the most important secular senses of these words: "to present," "to place," "to bring," "to offer," "to demonstrate," "to set up," "to make ready," "to make," "to approach," "to assist," "to wait on," "to help," "to stand by," "to be on hand" (cf. also "to happen").

B. The LXX. In the LXX the words have many nuances within the basic meaning. The usual thoughts are those of being present and helping. The religious sense rests on the practice at royal courts, where service implies dignity but also dependence. We thus read of angels and natural forces (Job 1:6; Zech. 6:5), but also of priests and Levites (Dt. 10:8), of prophets (1 Kgs. 17:1), and of the whole people standing in the presence or service of God. God himself stands with Moses in Ex. 34:5, and he is at the right hand of the needy in Ps. 109:31. [G. BERTRAM, V, 837-39]

C. The NT.

1. The ordinary senses "to place at the disposal" (Acts 23:24), "to furnish" (Mt. 26:53), "to show" (Acts 1:3), and "to prove" (Acts 24:13) occur in the NT.

2. Intransitively one also finds "to approach" (Acts 9:39), "to stand by" (Jn. 18:22), "to assist" (2 Tim. 4:17), "to be present" (Mk. 15:39).

3. The senses "to place or stand at the disposal" and "to serve" have some theological significance. The angel in Lk. 1:19 waits on God. Christians must set their members in the service of God and not of sin (Rom. 6:12-13). Food will not bring us before God (1 Cor. 8:8). God will present believers before his throne (2 Cor. 4:14). Paul will present the church as a bride (2 Cor. 11:2). Christ himself will present the church to himself (Eph. 5:27). We are all to stand before God's judgment seat (Rom. 14:10). Paul is presented before the governor and must appear before Caesar (Acts 23:33; 27:24). In all these instances we have analogies to court ceremonial or legal procedure. A cultic setting is presupposed when Jesus is presented in the temple in Lk. 2:22 (cf. Ex. 13:2, 12ff.). In Lk. 17:14 the cleansed lepers are to show themselves to the priests, and this thought may underlie Col. 1:22, 28 and 2 Tim. 2:15. Bringing offerings lies behind the exhortation to believers to present their bodies as living sacrifices in Rom. 12:1.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. Interesting phrases in the apostolic fathers may be found in 1 Clem. 35.10, Hermas Similitudes 8.4.1, and 1 Clem. 23.4. [B. REICKE, V, 839-41]

pároikos* [resident alien], paroikía [resident alien], paroikéō [to live as a resident alien]

A. Secular Greek. pároikos means a. "neighboring," "neighbor," and b. "noncitizen," "resident alien." paroikeín means a. "to dwell beside" and b. "to be a resident alien."

B. The OT.

1. paroikía and paroikéō.

a. The OT uses the noun to denote the state, position, or fate of a resident alien (Ps. 119:54). The reference is usually to Israel or its members. "Exile" is the sense in Ezr. 2:1.

b. The verb means "to live as a resident alien." It may refer to non-Israelites (cf. 2 Sam. 4:3; Is. 16:4), but usually refers to the patriarchs (Gen. 12:10; 17:8; 26:3; 35:27; 47:4) and Israelites (Judg. 17:7ff.; Ruth 1:1; 2 Kgs. 8:1-2). Residence in the promised land is an alien residence relative to God but also brings alien residence to an end (Ps. 78:55). A nontechnical use occurs in Ps. 61:4 (dwelling with God), though the idea of life on earth as a sojourning lies in the background.

2. Israel and the pároikos. The pároikos is the resident alien who is accepted by Israel (which was itself a pároikos in Egypt) but is excluded from certain cultic rights and duties (cf. Ex. 12:45; Lev. 22:10, though cf. also Dt. 14:21). Resident aliens do have rights (e.g., asylum in Num. 35:15) and must be helped if poor (Lev. 25:35; cf. 25:6). If aliens become proselytes, their cultic rights and obligations are extended (cf. Ex. 12:49). A full equation of citizens and resident aliens is promised in Ezek. 47:22-23. In general, resident aliens are sacrosanct as guests, and in view of their weak position enjoy divine protection. They are not totally outside the covenant community but ought to seek fuller entry by circumcision.

3. The People of Israel as pároikos. Israelites, too, may be resident aliens; cf. Moses in Midian (Ex. 2:22) and Israel in Egypt. Israel views its alien residence in Egypt not just as a historical fact but also as an occasion for theological reflection. In God's sight all peoples are resident aliens (cf. Is. 19). This does not cancel out possession of the land but it is a reminder that there must be humility before God. The prophets, proclaiming the impending destruction of the nation, point out that there can be no appeal to land or temple. God will not be tied to the land (Ezek. 8; Jer. 14:8-9). The people have received it and live in it only as pároikoi (1 Chr. 29:15; Ps. 119:19). The land truly belongs to God, and the people are his servants in it with the status of resident aliens. Yet God is also the owner of the whole world and creates and posits all human relations. Before his claim to total ownership the distinctions of human law between residents, proselytes, resident aliens, and full aliens lose their final force (cf. linguistically the overlapping of stranger and sojourner in Gen. 23:4; Lev. 25:23; Num. 35:15, and the use of prosḗlytos and pároikos for the same Hebrew term).

C. Hellenistic and Rabbinic Judaism.

1. Philo and Josephus.

a. Philo. As more and more Jews came to live in the diaspora, this had a twofold impact on Israel's sense of alien status. In Hellenistic Judaism the historical reference is weakened. Philo uses the pároikos group to express the fact that the righteous are strangers on earth. The world is an enemy and the body a tomb, as in contemporary philosophical thinking. The lógos, like the soul, is a stranger, as in Gnostic mythology, where the redeemer accepts alien status.

b. Josephus refers to the resident aliens whom Solomon employed for his works of construction (Antiquities 8.59). [K. L. and M. A. SCHMIDT, V, 841-50]

2. Rabbinic Judaism.

a. Proselyte, God-Fearer, Resident Alien. The rabbis, who develop a stronger historical sense of alien status, distinguish between full proselytes, God-fearers who belong to the wider missionary community in the diaspora, and true resident aliens who live and work in Israel.

b. Duties of Resident Aliens. To make life within the cultic community easier, resident aliens are required to keep the Noachic commands, and especially to avoid idolatry. Amorean scholars demand a renunciation of paganism.

c. The Historical Orientation. Aliens residing in Israel obviously have to respect the religious customs of the people, but an alien colony in the true sense is possible only after the break-up in A.D. 70. Thus the rabbinic regulations apply properly only to the preexilic situation and have more the force of theory in their own time. [R. MEYER, V, 850-51]

a. In the NT pároikos occurs four times, paroikía twice, and paroikéō twice, almost always in quotations from the OT or allusions to it (cf. Acts 7; 13:16ff.; Heb. 11:9, 13).

b. Like ancient Israel, the saints were strangers and sojourners but are now fellow citizens (Eph. 2:19). Again like ancient Israel, they are still resident aliens in another form, i.e., relative to the earth and the sárx (1 Pet. 2:11). The church as ekklēsia is paroikía. It is ekklēsia relative to God, pároikia relative to the world (cf. Heb. 13:14). Like Israel, it is diaspora in the world (1 Pet. 1:1; Jms. 1:1). As such it has a specific task and burden but also a specific promise and destiny. Its resident status is provisional. Proleptically Christians are already fellow citizens even while they are still resident aliens, but only because one day they will be citizens in the full sense. A term of honor, paroikía lays on them the responsibility of befitting conduct (1 Pet. 2:5ff.).

c. A single nontechnical use is perhaps to be found in Lk. 24:18, where the disciples ask the risen Lord if he is the only stranger in Jerusalem (paroikeís) not conversant with events. They assume that he must be either a visitor up for the feast or a Jew from abroad living in Jerusalem.

E. The Early Church. The early church still regards itself as an alien colony (Diog. 5.5). 2 Clem. 5.1 uses paroikía in the same way as 1 Peter. Irenaeus calls the churches paroikíai (Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 5.24.14). This plural becomes a term for the individual congregations (cf. the NT ekklesíai), and then ekklesía (singular) comes to be used for the whole church, and paroikíai for the constituent churches (Lat. parochiae; Eng. parishes). Strictly, then, the parishes are societies of resident aliens on earth whose true citizenship is in heaven (cf. the verb in Mart. Pol., Introd.; Diog. 6.8). [K. L. and M. A. SCHMIDT, V, 851-53]

A. Outside the NT.

1. Literally "byword," the paroimía is a sentence or proverb summing up what is said. The proverb is a popular, ancient, and familiar saying, expressing common wisdom in pointed form. When based on a typical example, it may be enigmatic to those not conversant with the example. It is less artistic than the maxim or aphorism and less specific than the apophthegm. It is common in speeches and letters, and may also be given poetic form. Drawing often on nature, it has some relation to the fable.

2. The Hebrew term, māshāl, is a common one. Only twice in Proverbs and five times in Sirach is paroimía used for it. In Prov. 1:1 the term applies to all the sayings that follow. The meaning, then, is wisdom saying (so also Sirach).

3. Philo uses paroimía for "proverb." The rabbis make much use of proverbs in elucidation and proof, usually with an introductory formula.

B. The NT.

1. The only NT instance of paroimía for "proverb" is in 2 Pet. 2:22, which uses two common sayings in disparagement of the conduct of the heretics. Jn. 4:37 also adduces a popular saying but does not use paroimía. The same is true in 1 Cor. 15:33, Gal. 6:7, Acts 26:14, and Tit. 1:12, and many sayings of Jesus reflect current proverbs (cf. Mt. 5:14; 6:21; 7:5, 7, 12; 20:16; Mk. 4:24-25, etc.).

2. John uses paroimía three times (10:6; 16:25, 29) but more in the sense of "obscure speech" that needs interpretation. Later, clearer speech about heavenly things will replace this more difficult form of statement, i.e., when Jesus reaches the end of his life's task and tells the disciples that he is going back to the Father (16:29). [F. HAUCK, V, 854-56]

paroxýnō [to spur, to stir to anger], paroxysmós [irritation, stimulation]

The verb means "to spur," "to stir to anger," passive "to be provoked, incensed." The noun is rare and means "provocation" or "irritation." In the NT the verb occurs in Acts 17:16, where the meaning is not that Paul is stimulated to preach but that he is honestly angered by the idolatry. Similarly in 1 Cor. 13:5 love does not let itself be provoked-there were many provoking things at Corinth. The noun has the sense of "irritation" in Acts 15:39 when Paul and Barnabas disagree about taking Mark with them. In Heb. 10:24, however, the neutral sense of "stimulating" is the obvious one. [H. SEESEMANN, V, 857]

parousía [presence, coming], páreimi [to be present, come]

A. General Meaning.

1. Presence. páreimi means "to be present" (persons or things). parousía denotes "active presence" (e.g., of representatives or troops, in person; cf. 2 Cor. 10:10).

2. Appearing. páreimi also means "to have come," "to come," and parousía "arrival."

B. Technical Use.

I. Hellenism.

1. Visit of a Ruler. While the group may be used for the presence of deities, it finds technical use for the visits of rulers or high officials. At first genitives, pronouns, or verbal phrases accompany it in this sense. On the occasion of such visits there are flattering speeches, delicacies to eat, asses for the baggage, street improvements, and wreaths or gifts of money. These are paid for by voluntary contributions or, if necessary, unpopular levies. Under the empire the ceremonies become even more magnificent and visits are marked by new buildings, the institution of holy days, etc. Complaints and requests are customarily addressed to rulers on such visits.

2. parousía of the Gods. In relation to gods the word denotes a helpful appearance.

3. Sacral Meaning in Philosophy. In Plato the word is still a secular one, and it is not prominent in Stoicism, but it acquires a cultic sense in Hermes mysticism and Neo-Platonism. Typical uses are for the invisible presence of the gods at sacrifices and for the appearance of divine fire.

II. OT presuppositions for the Technical Use in the NT.

1. The Coming of God in Direct Self-Attestation and the Cultus. Since Hebrew is more concrete, it has words for "to be present" and "to come," but not for "presence" or "coming." Theologically we find references to the near coming of the time or end (Lam. 4:18), of evil (Prov. 1:27), or of the day of redemption (Is. 63:4) or recompense (Dt. 32:35). Above all, God comes in self-attestation and at cultic places, there being a close link between these (Gen. 16:13-14; 28:18; 2 Sam. 24:25). The entry of the ark is God's coming (1 Sam. 4:6-7). But God is not tied to places; he may come in dreams (Gen. 20:3), theophanies (18:1ff.), clouds and storms, visions, the quiet breath (1 Kgs. 19:12-13), his word or Spirit (Num. 22:9; 24:2), and with his hand (1 Kgs. 18:46).

2. God's Coming in History. The victory over Sisera is a coming of God (Judg. 5:4-5; cf. Is. 19:1; 30:27). For apostates his coming is terrible (Am. 5:18ff.). He also comes to liberate (Ex. 3:8; Is. 35:2, 4) and to conclude the covenant (Ex. 19:18). The coming of salvation leads to the eschaton.

3. God's Coming as World King. God is lauded as an unparalleled king in Dt. 32:2ff. He is king forever and ever in Ex. 15:18. He will finally assume full kingship (Is. 2:2). His coming as world king will mean the creating of a new heaven and earth (Is. 66:15) and universal peace and joy (Is. 2:2ff.; 65:21ff.; 66:10ff.).

4. The Coming of the Messiah. God's anointed may take his place. As both hero and prince of peace, his main task is to establish peace (Zech. 9:9-10). This coming has a universal sweep and is historical, but with eschatological aspects (Dan. 7:13). In the Psalms the stress is on God's coming, not that of the Messiah.

III. Judaism.

1. Palestinian Judaism.

a. Expectation of God's Coming. Apocalyptic is full of expectation of the imminent end when God will come in full array to rule and judge. The rabbis lay more stress on the coming of the righteous to God but refer at times to God's manifestation as advocate and world ruler in the messianic age.

b. Expectation of the Messiah. Up to A.D. 70 the idea of a coming Messiah or Son of Man is a lively one, but the hope is complex. Other comings are also expected, e.g., Enoch, Elijah, and the priest king. The rabbis expect the Son of David at a time of great affliction and await him with some fear. The cleansing of the people is a precondition of his coming.

2. Hellenistic Judaism.

a. Greek Translations. In the LXX etc. páreimi is fairly common for "to come," but is never technical. parousía occurs only in works written in Greek. The technical sense is not at first normative but has some impact.

b. Philo. Philo does not use parousía, and Hellenistic influences more or less eliminate the idea of a coming of God or the Messiah.

c. Josephus. Josephus uses the verb for God's presence to help and the noun for the Shekinah. He rejects apocalyptic and refers the Son of Man of Daniel to Vespasian, though only in a penultimate sense, for an ultimate ruler will finally establish dominion in Jerusalem.

IV. The Technical Use of the Group in the NT

1. The Historical Place of the parousía Concept in the NT In the NT Jesus has come already, but so strong is the hope of his coming in glory that the group is not used for his first coming. There is not a twofold parousía. The verb is not a technical term (though it has overtones in Jn. 11:28; 1 Cor. 5:3; 2 Cor. 13:10; cf. also Jn. 7:6; Col. 1:6, Heb. 12:11; 2 Pet. 1:12). For the coming in glory the Synoptists and John use "day of the Lord," the Pastorals use epipháneia (cf. also Mt. 24:3; 1 Jn. 2:28; 2 Pet. 1:16. 3:4, 12), and Paul favors parousía. The term parousía is Hellenistic but its content derives from the OT.

2. Development of the Concept.

a. The Synoptic Jesus. Jesus' thinking is permeated with the thought of the parousía (Mk. 8:38; 14:63; Mt. 25:1ff.; Lk. 12:35ff.). The concept is present in fully developed form in Mk. 13, which distinguishes between the judgment on Jerusalem and the parousía, a space being left for the conversion of the Gentiles. Jesus depicts the parousía as imminent (Mk. 9:1; 13:24ff.) but also enjoins perseverance (Mt. 24:13). He attempts no date-setting and divests the parousía of its political element, stressing the ethical aspect (Mt. 25:14ff.).

b. The Primitive Community. The word does not occur in Acts but the first community clearly expects the parousía (Acts 1:11; 3:20-21; 10:42; 13:33).

c. Paul. Paul's Christology includes preexistence but is still oriented to the future. The word parousía is always used with the genitive and refers to men in 1 Cor. 16:17; 2 Cor. 7:6-7, etc., to antichrist in 2 Th. 2:9, and to Christ elsewhere (1 Cor. 15:23; 1 Th. 2:19; 3:13; 4:15; 5:23; 2 Th. 2:1, 8). The expectation in 1 and 2 Thessalonians is both immediate and extended, and the bearing is pastoral. Colorful details are given (1 Th. 4:13ff.; 1 Cor. 15:22ff.). Even in 2 Cor. 5:1 ff. there is no interest in the interim period (cf. also Rom. 8:19, 23). Paul realizes he may go to be "with Christ" (Phil. 1:23) but still expects the parousía (3:20-21; 4:5).

d. The Pastorals. In 2 Tim. 1:10 epipháneia is used for Christ's manifestation in the flesh but the expectation of a coming survives if with a little less emphasis (cf. 1 Tim. 4:1; 2 Tim. 3:1). In Hebrews the main interest is in the past coming and in the believers' entry into rest, but the hope of a future coming persists (9:28; 10:37; 12:26). This will be a second coming in 9:28.

e. James, Peter, and Jude. Jms. 5:7-8 refers to Christ's parousía. 1 Peter has a more dynamic view; the decisive manifestation is at hand (1:5, 7, 13). 2 Peter meets the objections of mockers (3:3-4) by adducing God's patience (3:8-9). Believers should wait for and hasten toward the parousía of the day of God (or the Lord) (3:12).

f. Revelation. Though it does not use the term, Revelation is full of ardent hope of the parousía (cf. 1:1, 3; 22:20). Lofty portrayals are given in 14:14ff. and 19:11ff. The time sequence suggests a double parousía.

g. John and 1-3 John. The idea of the parousía is present in Jn. 21:22-23 and 1 Jn. 2:28; 3:2. There is a stress on present victory, judgment, and life, but true eschatological expressions are also present (Jn. 6:39, 40, 44; 12:48; 1 Jn. 2:18). We find both realized and unrealized eschatology. The realization is as yet provisional and demands a definitive consummation. If there is more stress on possession, the tension between possession and hope remains.

3. Theological Summary. The concept of the parousía in the NT defies systematization. Jewish particularism is rejected and the sensual element is minimal, since fellowship with God is the chief concern. Divine transcendence overcomes the antithesis of the present and the future aspects of God's rule. The turning point has already come, and the parousía will be a definitive manifestation when God's eternal rule supersedes history. Christ is the resolution of the tension between this world and the next, hope and possession, concealment and manifestation, and faith and sight.

V. Early Christian Writings. The verb plays no important part in earlier writings, though Justin Dialogue 54.1 says that Christ will be present at the second parousía. The noun often has the secular sense. It has a technical eschatological sense in Diog. 7.6 and Hermas Similitudes 5.5.3. Ignatius Philadelphians 9.2 uses it for the earthly coming. Justin Dialogue 14.8 etc. (and Apology 52.3) refer to two parousíai, and cf. Irenaeus and Hippolytus. Clement of Alexandria speaks mostly of the earthly parousía, but this deeschatologizing is exceptional. [A. OEPKE, V, 858-71]

parrhēsía [openness, candor], parrhēsiázomai [to speak openly]

A. The Greek World and Hellenism.

1. The Political Sphere. The term parrhēsía is an important one in the political sphere as a presupposition of democracy. It signifies a. the right to say anything, b. an openness to truth, and c. candor.

2. The Private Sphere. Here the main sense is that of frankness or candor. But the bad sense of "impudence" or "insolence" or "shamelessness" also occurs, and when not linked with lógos it also means "liberality."

3. The Moral Sphere. Philosophers connect parrhēsía with moral rather than political freedom (although the word may also denote shamelessness in the case of those dominated by the passions). Those who have parrhēsía (in the good sense) are public figures with cosmopolitan responsibilities.

B. The LXX and Hellenistic Jewish Literature.

1. The word parrhēsía is rare in the LXX. It marks free people in Lev. 26:13 and is ascribed to wisdom in Prov. 1:12. parrhēsía before God is important in Job 27:9-10 and 22:23ff. (cf. Wis. 5:1-2). It is a virtue of the díkaios (see Prov. 13:5) or the sophós, and comes to expression in joyful prayer. Another distinctive use in the LXX is for God's own parrhēsía (cf. Ps. 94:1, where the meaning is clear, and Ps. 12:5, where the original is uncertain).

2. In Hellenistic Jewish writings, especially Philo and Josephus, parrhēsía has the primary sense of "candor," but with a connection to the law and a good conscience in a fusion of Jewish and Hellenistic elements. An important aspect is parrhēsía toward God, and God himself is the source of parrhēsía.

3. In Ethiopian Enoch parrhēsía occurs in an eschatological context when the reference is to the reward of an open standing before God. In antithesis to the shame and anxiety of the wicked, this parrhēsía is the confident and joyful freedom of hastening toward God and standing openly in his presence.

C. The NT.

1. The Johannine Writings. In John parrhēsía is associated with the work of Jesus. He works publicly, i.e, in the synagogues and temple, not in secret (Jn. 18:20-21; cf. 7:25-26). Yet this openness does not mean open manifestation (cf. 7:10), which begins only with the eschatological event initiated by the ascension (cf. 7:6ff.). Hence the Jews do not understand the public ministry as parrhēsía and ask for direct self-attestation (10:24-25). The works give this, but it is grasped only in faith. We see this in 11:11ff., where Jesus has to tell the disciples "plainly" that Lazarus has died. For the moment he speaks in figures, but with his resurrection and the coming of the Spirit he will speak "plainly" (16:25ff.), and in love and faith the disciples will have direct perception. In Mk. 8:32 parrhēsía again suggests the open speech that is granted to the disciples, but this openness can still conceal (except for faith), as is apparent in Mk. 8:32-33; cf. 9:32; 10:32. In 1 John parrhēsía has the sense of openness toward God (3:21; 5:14), which presupposes a good conscience, faith, and love (3:22-23), and also the gift of the Spirit (v. 24). This parrhēsía comes to expression in prayer (5:14-15) that is heard because it is according to God's will. In addition to this present parrhēsía there is a future parrhēsía, i.e., that of confident standing before the Judge on the ground of the divine love (2:28; 4:17).

2. Acts. In Acts we find only a human relation. In 9:27-28; 14:3, etc. the verb has almost the sense "to proclaim," i.e., to speak publicly, whether to Jews, Jews and Gentiles, or Gentiles, whether to the people or their rulers. At issue here is bold and open speaking. But it is also effective speaking (4:13) even though there has been no formal training. The Lord grants the apostles this parrhēsía, and he confirms their speech by signs and wonders (4:29-30; 14:3). As may be seen from the example of Apollos, parrhēsía as open and eloquent speaking to a hostile world is a charism (18:25-26).

3. The Pauline Corpus. Paul, too, stresses apostolic parrhēsía in both life (Phil. 1:20) and preaching (Eph. 6:19-20). Openness toward God and men, and in the gospel, is meant (Eph. 3:12; 2 Cor. 3:12; Eph. 6:19-20). The face that is open toward God is also open toward others (2 Cor. 3:7ff.). This open face reflects the Lord's glory in increasing transformation by the Spirit. Openness implies a confident freedom of approach to God (Eph. 3:12). In its human dimension it has the nuance of affection in 2 Cor. 7:4 and authority in Phlm. 8. The ground of parrhēsía is faith (1 Tim. 3:13), and it is effected by the Spirit and related to union with Christ (Phil. 1:19-20). Christ himself triumphs "openly" over the powers in Col. 2:15.

4. Hebrews. In Hebrews parrhēsía has an objective character. It is something one has and must keep as a believer (3:6). It is related to the object of hope. In content it is the freedom of access to God that is given in Christ's blood and grounded in his high-priestly ministry (4:14-15; 10:19). It is preserved by endurance in affliction (10:34ff.) and means confidence before the Judge (4:16).

D. The Early Church. The group is an important one in early writings. Diog. 11.2 speaks of the parrhēsía of the lógos and opposes it to mystḗrion. In 1 Clem. 34.1ff. the believer's parrhēsia stands in the Lord, is the Lord's gift, demands obedience, and grants participation in the promise by prayer. Of particular significance are the connections with the apostle in apocryphal writings, where the stress is on authority, with the martyr in martyr literature, where the martyr shows it toward persecutors and also has it toward God, and with prayer, e.g., in Origen's On Prayer, which points out that calling God Father in the Lord's Prayer expresses a special parrhēsía. [H. SCHLIER, V, 871-86]

pás [each, all], hápas [all, everybody]

A. Linguistic Data in the NT.

1. pás as Adjective.

a. With Article. pás can have different meanings according to its different uses. With the article it may have a predicative position with implicative ("all," "whole"), distributive ("whoever," "all possible"), or elative significance ("all," e.g., knowledge in 1 Cor 13:2) or it may have an attributive position ("whole" "generally"; cf. Acts 20:18).

b. Without Article. Without the article pás may have elative ("full" "total") or distributive significance ("each," "whoever" "whatever," or, in privative phrases, "any" ["without any"] or "none," "nothing" ["not any"]).

2. pás as Noun.

a. With Article. With the article pás as a noun may have implicative ("all," mostly plural) or summative ("in all," "all together") significance.

b. Without Article. Without the article pás may have distributive significance ("each," "all"), or it may be used in adverbial phrases (e.g., "first or last of all," "in every respect," "above all," "in all circumstances," hence "certainly").

3. hápas. In Luke hápas is sometimes preferred when something impressive is to be said, especially with an implicative meaning and after a consonant, but in the main it is used in exactly the same way as pás.

B. Material Aspects.

1. God as Creator and Ruler of All Things in the OT. That God is the Creator and Ruler of all things is a basic OT conviction. Totality is expressed by phrases like "heaven and earth" (Gen. 1:1; cf. Ps. 24:1), but the word "all" may also be used (cf. Dt. 10:14; Job 41:3). Depictions of God's omnipotent sway occur in

Job 38ff. and Ps. 104, and cf. Jer. 27:5; Dan. 4:32. The human race is a unity prior to Babel (Gen. 9:19; 11:1ff.). The original fellowship with God is broken by the fall and is to be restored by God's saving dealings with Israel (Gen. 12:3; Is. 60). Thus the God of the universe is also the God of Israel but with expectation of a full implementation of his universal sovereignty. [B. REICKE, V, 886-90]

2.pás in the LXX. After kýrios, pás is the most common theologically significant term in the LXX (6-7,000 instances). In many passages, of course, the use is rhetorical, but in the general context even these instances imply the total claim of God and his word. In the first place the universal God has chosen Israel. Israel must keep all the law, the cultic legislation applies to all the people, and the expiatory rites take away all guilt. All who disobey, and all Israel's foes, fall under God's wrath. Yet Israel's history is a revelation to all peoples. God is the one God over all kingdoms, and his judgments extend to the whole world. God is the Savior in all troubles, all his ways are mercy and truth, his wrath smites all the wicked, but his salvation is for all believers. He knows and sees all things, tries all hearts, and can do all things. Even when a particularism of salvation is present, the belief in God's omnipotence, and in the universal validity of his word and claim, is never lost. A sense of the universal reach of his loving purpose comes out even in passages relating primarily to Israel (cf. 1 Kgs. 8:37ff.). [G. BERTRAM, V, 890-92]

3. The World of Greek and Hellenistic Thought. The Greeks have a developed concept of the universe from early times and seek a basis of unity in, e.g., water, fire, or numbers. This philosophical cosmogony leaves no real place for a personal Creator in the OT sense; even the demiurge is more of a philosophical idea. Pantheistic trends may be seen in the mysteries and Gnosticism. Doxologies similar to those of the OT and NT occur, but these do not presuppose biblical monotheism.

4. The NT

a. In the NT, as in the LXX, pás is very common (1,228 times, hápas 32). This reflects a liking for the concept of totality resting on the concept of God and joy in salvation. Totality in the NT relates to a specific history of creation and redemption. NT soteriology is richer than that of the OT. The focus of the NT is on the personal God and personal salvation.

b. For the NT there is only one God and one Lord (1 Cor. 8:6). All creation is God's work. This means that all creatures depend on God (Rom. 9:5; Acts 17:25ff.). They are also ordered to him, not in the sense of a flowing from and to him, but in the sense that restoration of fellowship with him is the goal.

c. That Christ is also Creator rests on OT statements (cf. Ps. 8:6; Prov. 8:22ff.; Gen. 1:1ff.: creation by the Word). All things are both made and made anew by Christ (1 Cor. 8:6). The first creation in the Son points ahead to the new creation in the Son. The firstborn of all creation is the firstborn from the dead. Before all things, and holding all things together, he is the first in all things, and all things are reconciled through him (Col. 1:15ff.). The world, of course, will not recognize its dependence on God. All are in sin (Gal. 3:22) and guilty before God (Rom. 3:19). The original unity of the race is destroyed, and idolatry and corruption result (Rom. 1:18ff.). Only Christ can bring reconciliation (Rom. 7:24-25). To the incarnate Christ God has given all power (Jn. 3:35; 17:2). "All things" in Mt. 11:27 probably includes power as well as knowledge. He has come in humility, but he seizes power with the cross and resurrection (Mt. 28:18) and is now exalted even above angels (Rom. 8:38; Eph. 1:21ff.; Col. 2:10).

d. Since people do not recognize the position of Jesus, mission is needed to actualize it. All flesh is to see God's salvation (Lk. 3:6)—first Israel (Acts 2:36), then the whole world (Mk. 16:15). Then Christ will be all in all (Eph. 1:22-23), all creatures will do him homage (Rev. 5:13), he will make all things new (Rev. 21:5), and he will present his all-embracing kingdom to the Father (1 Cor. 15:24). Until then, all things already belong to Christians (1 Cor. 3:21ff.), sanctified by the word and prayer (1 Tim. 4:4-5).

e. NT proclamation is full of abounding joy at Christ's universality, and this comes to expression in a common use of pás (Eph. 1:22-23) which also reflects personal commitment.

f. In many verses, of course, pás is used in the NT simply to denote a great number, e.g., "all Jerusalem" in Mt. 2:3, and "all the sick" in 4:24. [B. REICKE, V, 892-96]

páscha is a transcription of the Aramaic. In the NT it may denote a. the seven-day Passover feast, b. the Passover meal, c. the Passover lamb, or d. Easter or the Lord's Supper (cf. Lk. 22:15-16).

1. The Feast. The Passover dates from the exodus; details may be found in Ex. 12. At first a family feast, it is later celebrated at Jerusalem and involves a pilgrimage. The main features of the liturgy are becoming fixed in NT times. In later Judaism the Passover covers the days of unleavened bread as well as the Passover proper. This is the main NT use (Lk. 22:1; Mt. 26:2; Jn. 11:55, etc.; Acts 12:4). Heb. 11:28 refers to the first Passover as an expression of the faith of Moses. The Passover is the setting of many NT stories, e.g., the boy Jesus in the temple (Lk. 2:41ff.), the feeding of the 5,000 (Mk. 6:32ff.), probably the incident mentioned in Lk. 13:1ff., the passion, and the martyrdom of James (Acts 12:1ff.) (cf. also the slaying of James the Lord's brother).

2. The Meal. The meal, which begins after sunset, has to be eaten in Jerusalem and is enframed by a liturgy that includes prayers and psalms. Whether the Last Supper is the actual Passover meal has been debated (cf. Mk. 14:12ff. and Jn. 18:28). Dt. 17:13 shows that there is no objection to the trial being held on the feast day, and many features of the Supper display its paschal character.

3. The Lamb. The NT frequently equates Jesus with the Passover lamb (cf. 1 Cor. 5:7; 1 Pet. 1:19; Jn. 1:29). The sayings of Jesus at the Last Supper probably underlie the equation (Mk. 14:22ff.). In Lk. 22:16 the messianic banquet is a fulfilment of the Passover, in 1 Cor. 5:7-8 the community is the unleavened dough, and in 1 Pet. 1: 13ff. the people redeemed by the blood of the spotless lamb sets out on pilgrimage.

4. Easter and the Lord's Supper. The early church takes over the feasts of Passover and Pentecost from Judaism. At first Easter is probably kept on the date of the Jewish celebration, but the paschal vigil replaces the Passover meal and expectation of the parousia replaces expectation of the coming of the Messiah. Later, lights come into use, baptism precedes the eucharist, leavened bread replaces unleavened, and there is more stress on recollection of the passion. In many places, including Rome, the day replaces the date, and after a struggle around A.D. 190 (Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 5.23ff.) the Sunday Easter prevails. [J. JEREMIAS, V, 896-904] páschō [to experience, suffer], pathētós [subject to suffering], propáschō [to suffer before], sympáschō [to suffer with], páthos [suffering], páthēma [suffering], sympathḗs [sympathetic], sympathéō [to suffer with, sympathize], kakopathéō [to suffer misfortune], synkakopathéō [to suffer misfortune with], kakopátheia [misfortune], metriopathéō [to deal gently], homoiopathḗs [to have similar feelings], páschō.

A. The Greek and Hellenistic World.

1. The basic meaning of páschō is "to experience something that comes from outside." At first the "something" is usually bad, and while a neutral use develops, the idea of suffering evil remains so strong that an addition is needed to show that good is meant unless the context is very plain.

2. The forensic use "to suffer punishment" is fairly old, and occurs especially for corporal or capital punishment.

3. Evils suffered are misfortune and disfavor (human or divine). In the case of sickness the idea is that of suffering from it rather than under it. The stress is always on the experience of evil rather than painful feelings. When páschō denotes emotions, the reference is more to moods than to sufferings. The group raises the question of suffering, and to this many answers are attempted. Tragedy suggests learning through suffering, Stoicism aims at freedom in its negation (apátheia), the Hermetic writings promise redemption from it, at first by initiation and definitively, after death, by deification.

B. The LXX and Judaism.

1. The LXX. The word is rare in the LXX, since the Hebrew has no corresponding term. We find it in Esth. 9:26; Am. 6:6; Zech. 11:5; Ezek. 16:5. The OT, of course, has much to say about suffering in Job, the Psalms, and Is. 53. The term occurs more commonly in the apocryphal works, e.g., for the sufferings of both Israel's enemies and of Israel itself, the former as a punishment, the latter as discipline with a view to salvation. In 2 and 4 Maccabees páschō is not a technical term for suffering martyrdom, and does not even have to refer to death. Thus in 2 Macc. 7:18, 32 the reference is a general one to the sufferings of the people, and the sense in 4 Macc. 14:9 is "to undergo."

2. Philo and Josephus.

a. Philo uses páschō some 150 times, often for suffering evil, but mostly in the sense of passivity as distinct from free action. Sensory impressions are páschein, and finally only God is active and everything creaturely is passive, so that even noús confers only an illusory freedom.

b. Josephus, too, uses the word a good deal, especially in Antiquities. His usage is more general than that of Philo. The main senses are "to experience" and "to suffer punishment" (sometimes death, but this depends on the context).

3. Pseudepigrapha and Rabbis.

a. The term is rare in the pseudepigrapha. It may mean "to have an impression" but also denotes "to suffer punishment or afflictions." Present sufferings in Syr. Bar. 78:6 anticipate future punishment, and by the law of compensation are the best guarantee of future felicity.

b. This principle also occurs in the rabbis. The rabbis trace back sufferings to specific sins, and ascribe to them atoning force should they induce repentance. But some sufferings involve no guilt (the chastisements of love) and are tests. The possibility of purification and expiation by suffering is a sign of election. This important insight is often called "passion theology," but this is a dubious term in view of the absence of any word corresponding to páschō.

C. The NT.

1. General. The word páschō occurs 42 times in the NT, mostly with reference to Christ's sufferings and those of his people. It does not occur in OT quotations nor in John, 1-3 John, or Revelation, and Paul uses it only seven times. Some common uses are not found, e.g., as the opposite of verbs of action. In Gal. 3:4 the many things experienced are obviously bad, but the experience is beneficial. In Mt. 27:19 it is unlikely that Pilate's wife suffers punishment; anguish is probably meant. In Mk. 5:26 the sense is simply that the woman has been much doctored. In 1 Cor. 12:26 the idea seems to be that of suffering harm or injury.

2. The Suffering of Christ.

a. The Synoptic Gospels and Acts.

(a) In the absolute in Lk. 22:15; 24:26; Acts 1:3; 17:3 páschō means "to suffer death." In Lk. 24:26 and Acts 17:3 there is an active nuance. The usage seems to go back to Jesus himself in Lk. 22:15ff.

(b) In a second group (Mk. 8:3; Mt. 16:21; Lk. 9:22; Mk. 9:12; Mt. 17:12; Lk. 17:25) the stress is more passive (cf. Mt. 17:12). We do not have in pollá patheín (Mk. 8:31; Lk. 9:22) a master concept. The aim of the phrase is perhaps to show the divine meaning and purpose of what takes place. “Suffering many things” expresses the divine aspect, “being rejected” the human side. Although the Greek renderings do not use páschō in Is. 53:4, 11, these verses might well lie behind the NT phrase, with an emphasis on the idea of “bearing” or “enduring.” Is. 53 fairly clearly contributes the concept of vicarious and active dying, and if so Jesus may be seen as the active subject of pollá patheín as he suffers obediently in discharge of a divine commission. The uniqueness of the passion of Jesus comes out in his use of páthō only for his own sufferings, not for those of the prophets (Mt. 5:12), or the Baptist (Mk. 9:12), or his disciples (Mk. 8:34ff.).

b. Hebrews and 1 Peter.

(a) Hebrews uses patheín for the passion of Christ in the sense “to die.” This is obvious in 13:12, and in 2:18 it is strongly suggested by the statement in 2:9. 5:7, of course, refers to Gethsemane, but 5:8 goes beyond this to Golgotha (cf. Phil. 2:8; Rom. 5:19). In 9:26 the context supports a reference to Christ’s death (cf. the “once for all”). Hebrews never uses “for us,” but this is implied. The patheín of Hebrews is related to the death (2:9, 14, etc.), the blood (9:12, 14), and the cross (12:2).

(b) As in Hebrews, so in 1 Pet. 2:21, 23 the patheín of Jesus is his death. The crucifixion is also the point in 4:1. This suffering is “for sins” (3:18) or “for us” (2:21). Stress is laid on its once-for-all character (3:18), on its unity with the resurrection (3:21-22) and glory (1:11), and on its exemplary nature (2:21).

3. The Sufferings of Christians.

a. Acts 9:16. Unlike Jesus himself, the NT writers use páschein for the sufferings of believers too. In Acts 9:16 general sufferings are meant if the task in v. 15 is to bear Christ’s name “to” Gentiles etc., but specific sufferings if the task is to bear it “before” Gentiles etc. Only the sufferings make the “bearing” possible. This explains the “must” of v. 16. The patheín is not a necessary consequence but a validation of the apostle as a chosen vessel (cf. 2 Cor. 11:23ff.). The fact that the suffering is “for the sake of my name” gives it an active character.

b. Paul. Paul normally uses páschein with reference to his readers, not himself. In 2 Tim. 1:12 he suffers in the discharge of his high office, but this suffering promotes his work (1:8). Only in 1 Th. 2:14 is Paul’s use passive. Phil. 1:29 has an active ring in view of v. 30, where páschein is the privilege of the whole community when it is páschein “for his sake” (Christ’s). This rules out, of course, any soteriological significance, since Christ cannot be the subject of soteriological effort. The pathḗmata of Christians count as pathḗmata of Christ (2 Cor. 1:5ff.) and have an eschatological goal (cf. 2 Th. 1:5 and the link with glory in Rom. 8:17).

c. 1 Peter. 1 Peter underlines more the exemplary nature of Christ’s páschein, but in the case of Christians páschein does not mean “to die” but covers undeserved punishment by masters or the courts, and possibly abuse, threats, insults, discrimination, etc. (cf. 4:16). The point of the example lies in the unjust nature of the páschein. In 3:14 the injustice lies not merely in punishment in spite of the performance of duty but in punishment for doing right. In suffering, Christians are not necessarily participating in Christ’s passion but following in his steps (2:21), again with an eschatological orientation (1:6-7; 5:10). In 4:1 there is an allusion to baptismal dying (cf. Rom. 6:7). As Christ accepted God’s will in dying, so in baptism Christians cease from sin and will only to live to God (Rom. 6:11). This is the only instance of a transferred use for baptism, and it is made possible only by the use of patheín for "to die" and by the teaching of Rom. 6.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. The word páschō is a common one in the apostolic fathers. It often means "to die" (Christ or martyrs) (cf. 1 Clem. 6:1-2; Ignatius Smyrneans 7.1); Romans 4.3; Barn. 5.5, etc. [mostly Christ]; Hermas Visions 3.1.9 etc. [martyrs]; Mart. Pol. 17.2 [Christ]). Other senses are "to undergo" in Ignatius Smyrneans 2 and "to suffer punishment" in Hermas Similitudes 6.3.6.

1. This is a verbal adjective of páschō and means "open or subject to external impressions" or to páthē.

2. The word occurs in the NT only in Acts 26:23. The point of the saying is that Christ has to suffer, and in view of the use of páschō in Lk. 24:26; Acts 3:18; 17:3 the reference is clearly to his death, not in the passive sense of "subject to," but in the active one of "ordained for."

3. In the apostolic fathers the only instances are in Ignatius (Ephesians 7.2; To Polycarp 3.2) with reference to the post- and preexistent Christ, not as the one who entered the world of páthē, but as the one who could die.

propáschō. This word means "to be under previous influence" (usually bad), "to suffer before." The one use in the NT is in 1 Th. 2:2, which refers to Paul's prior sufferings in Philippi. As distinct from the parallel reference to shameful treatment, the word has perhaps a more active nuance here.

1. This word means "to suffer at the same time," "to suffer with," and only very rarely "to sympathize."

2. The only NT instances are in 1 Cor. 12:26; Rom. 8:17. The idea in 1 Cor. 12:26 is not that when one member suffers loss all the members share the loss emotionally but that they all suffer loss too. In Rom. 8:17 the context shows that more than sympathy is at issue. Nor is it the meaning that Christ and Christians share a common suffering. Instead, as Christ has made them heirs and given them a share in heavenly glory, so he has set them in this suffering, so that it is suffering for his sake (Phil. 1:29). As in Christ's case, the glory will come only with the resurrection (Rom. 8:18), i.e., when Christ himself comes in glory (Col. 3:4). Rom. 8:17 shows that sympáschein is a presupposition of true fellowship with Christ and hence a condition of future syndoxasthḗnai (cf. 2 Tim. 2:12).

3. In the apostolic fathers Ignatius Smyrneans uses sympáschein in the sense "to die with" (Christ). This also might well be the point in Ignatius Polycarp 6. 1, and it is unquestionably the sense in 9.2. In the only other instance (2 Clem. 4.3) the word means "to sympathize."

1. Sharing the history of páschō, this noun means "experience," then "misfortune" etc., then "mood," "emotion," "passion," "impulse," also "change," "process," "attribute," and, in rhetoric, "pathos."

2. The LXX uses páthos only in works with no Hebrew original.

3. Philo has páthos some 400 times, mostly for "emotion." For Philo hēdonḗ is páthos. Philo demands apátheia or the bridling of páthē. Josephus has páthos for "misfortune" or "illness." In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs the word means "vice" or "passion." The rabbis have no equivalent term in the sense of "emotion" or "passion."

4. Only Paul uses páthos in the NT, the singular in Col. 3:5; 1 Th. 4:5, the plural in Rom. 1:26. The páthē of Rom. 1:26 are the vices of homosexuality. The meaning in context in Col. 3:5 is "erotic passion." "Sexual passion" is also the point in 1 Th. 4:5.

5. The apostolic fathers use páthos for "adultery" or "bad temper" (Hermas Mandates 4.1.6; Similitudes 6.5.5). But it also means "suffering" and "death" (Barnabas and Ignatius), i.e., the passion of Jesus. The stress on the páthos of Jesus in Ignatius is part of the original Christian tradition and develops from the use of pathéō for "to die."

1. Less common than páthos, this means "misfortune," "state of suffering," "sorrow," and occasionally "emotion."

2. It does not occur in the LXX. Philo has it for "sickness," and so does Josephus. But Josephus also has it for cosmic "process" (Antiquities 1. 156).

3. Always plural in the NT except in Heb. 2:9, it means "passion" or "impulse" in Gal. 5:24; Rom. 7:5, but its main sense is "suffering," e.g., Rom. 8:18; 2 Cor. 1:5ff.; Phil. 3:10; Col. 1:24; 2 Tim. 3:11; Heb. 2:9-10; 1 Pet. 1:11; 4:13.

a. In Gal. 5:24 it embraces the things mentioned in vv. 19-21. The impulses, whose basis is the sárx, are crucified in Christians and are thus to be put to death. In Rom. 7:5 life in the flesh means that sinful passions are aroused by the law and work in the members. The phrase tṓn hamartiṓn describes the nature of these passions.

b. In 2 Cor. 1:5 Paul says that he shares in Christ's sufferings, and in v. 6 he says that the readers endure the same sufferings, for in their sufferings, too, they share in those of Christ. Since suffering is an essential part of the faith, it is a grace (Phil. 1:29) and brings blessing to all. In Phil. 3:10-11 the pathḗmata of Christ are Christ's own sufferings, but fellowship with these is not just by a passion mysticism but by the actual sufferings that Paul himself endures. The point is not that Christian suffering arises because there has to be analogy, imitation, or continuation of Christ's suffering, but because the way of Christ entails suffering (cf. Acts 9:16; 14:22). In Col. 1:24 a parallel is again seen between the apostle's sufferings and Christ's afflictions. Disciples have to suffer, and therefore the absence of suffering is a lack which has to be made good. The sufferings may be severe, but Rom. 8:18 declares that they are nothing compared to the future glory.

c. In Heb. 2:9 the reference is to the suffering which consists of death. The tautology gives emphasis to this first mention of the death of Jesus, and the singular is an assimilation to the singular thánatos. The plural that follows refers to the whole process of the crucifixion (v. 10). In 1 Peter pathḗmata (like patheín) refers to the death of Christ (1:11). When the author calls himself a mártys (witness) of Christ's sufferings in 5:1, the continuation ("partaker of the glory") shows that he has in view sharing in the sufferings and not just eyewitness of the passion.

4. In the early church Ignatius Smyrneams 5.1 uses pathḗmata for Christian sufferings, 1 Clem. 2. 1 uses it for the death of Christ, and Athenagoras Supplication 28.4 uses it for "destinies."

sympathḗs, sympathéō.

vv. verses

1. sympathḗs means “having the same páthos ” and hence “sharing the same experience, suffering,” etc., and then “having fellow feeling.” sympathéō means “to suffer with” and hence “to sympathize.”

2. sympathḗs occurs three times 4 Maccabees; sympathéō occurs only in 4 Macc. 5:25 in the sense “to have the best in view.”

3. Philo uses sympathéō with mercy in On the Special Laws 2.115 and has sympathḗs to suggest “fellow feeling,” “participation,” and “cosmic movement.” In Josephus the group means “fellow feeling,” “mutual participation,” or “sympathy.”

4. In the NT sympathḗs occurs only in the list in 1 Pet. 3:8, where it denotes understanding participation in the lives of others. In Heb. 4:15 sympathéō does not signify a sympathetic understanding that is ready to condone, but a fellow feeling that derives from full acquaintance with the seriousness of the situation as a result of successfully withstanding temptation. In Heb. 10:34 the compassion on prisoners embraces actual help that is given by both word and deed.

5. In the apostolic fathers Ignatius Romans 6.3 uses sympathéō in a request for understanding of the author’s motives and of his urge for martyrdom.

1. kakopathéō means “to suffer misfortune,” “to be in a sorry situation,” or, rarely, “to endure evil.” kakopátheia means “misfortune,” “trouble,” “suffering,” as well as “enduring suffering,” “toil,” “exertion.”

2. The LXX uses kakopathéō in Jon. 4:10 for “to go to pains,” and kakopátheia in Mal. 1:13 for “trouble.” The senses in Philo and Josephus are similar.

3. In the NT the noun occurs only in Jms. 5:10 in the obvious sense of “enduring affliction” rather than mere “affliction.” The verb in 5:13 belongs to a new section and refers to the spiritual burden inflicted by misfortune or trouble. In 2 Tim. 2:9 Christian suffering is the point, and in 4:5 the demand is that one should endure suffering. In 2:3 Timothy is not just to sympathize with the apostle in his suffering but to take his share of suffering (cf. 1:8, where suffering is not imposed by the gospel but is for the sake of it).

4. In the apostolic fathers the only use of kakopathéō is in 2 Clem. 19.3 for being beset by the afflictions of this world.

1. This word denotes moderation in passion.

2. It does not occur in the LXX but Philo has it for the moderate grief of Abraham on Sarah’s death, and Josephus extols it in Vespasian and Titus on the conclusion of peace.

3. The only NT instance is in Heb. 5:2, where the high priest’s sense of his own weakness and sin results in moderation in dealing with the people’s offenses.

4. There are no instances in the apostolic fathers or Apologists.

1. This word relates to one whose circumstances, feelings, etc. are the same or similar. Wis. 7:3 states that the earth is the same for all, 4 Macc. 12:13 points out that tyrants and their victims have the same feelings, and Philo finds the same feelings and modes of life among animals and humans.

2. There are two instances in the NT. In Acts 14:15 Barnabas and Paul protest that they are humans like those who want to honor them as gods, and in Jms. 5:17 the point is made that we may pray as Elijah did, since he has no superhuman powers but is of the same nature as we are.

3. The Apologists use the term with reference to the incarnate Christ (cf. Justin Dialogue 48.3; 57.3).

1. This late construct means "gentleness" (cf. Philo On Abraham 213).

2. The only NT instance is in the list in 1 Tim. 6:11, where the meaning is not so much "meekness" as "composure" in face of wrongs.

3. Ignatius Trallians 8. 1 calls it a virtue that believers should acquire. [W. MICHAELIS, V, 904-39]

patássō [to strike, smite]

The intransitive "to knock loudly" does not occur in the NT. The transitive "to strike" is more common and occurs over 400 times in the LXX, usually for God's "smiting" in judgment. In the NT it is found three times in OT quotations (Acts 7:24; Mk. 14:27; Mt. 26:31). At the arrest of Jesus a disciple "smites" the high priest's slave (Mt. 26:51; Lk. 22:49). The term denotes divine intervention in Acts 12:7 and 12:23. In Rev. 11:6 the two witnesses have power to "smite" the earth in judgment. In Rev. 19:15 (cf. Is. 11:4) the Logos as universal Judge will definitively extirpate all hostility to God on earth. [H. SEESEMANN, V, 939-40] patéō [to walk, tread on], katapatéō [to trample], peripatéō [to walk around], emperipatéō [to walk]

A. General Greek Usage.

1. patéō means intransitively "to go," "to walk," and transitively "to tread," then in a transferred sense "to tread underfoot," i.e., "to disparage," "maltreat."

2. katapatéō means "to trample," "to despise."

3. peripatéō means "to walk around," and in a transferred sense "to live."

4. emperipatéō is a later term meaning "to walk." [H. SEESEMANN, V, 940-41]

B. The LXX.

1. In the LXX the terms denote "treading," e.g., on the land to take possession (Dt. 11:24). peripateín often denotes a righteous walk or life.

2. Negatively the terms are used for God's judgments, as in the treading of the winepress (Joel 3:13), the trampling of armies (2 Kgs. 7:17), the potter's treading of the clay (Is. 41:25), the treading down of the temple (Is. 63:18), the crushing of lions, adders, etc. (Ps. 91:13). Trampling and deriding are combined in Zech. 12:3. When the wicked do the trampling, their arrogance is implied (Am. 2:7; Ezek. 34:18). The psalmist faces proud enemies who tread him down (Pss. 7:5; 56:1-2; 57:3).

3. peripatéō and emperipatéō are closely related in the LXX. They denote moving about, e.g., Satan's in Job 1:6-7, God's in Gen. 3:8. Movement expresses life (Ex. 21:19). Idols cannot walk (Ps. 115:7). The religious or ethical walk is sometimes denoted. Wisdom walks in righteousness (Prov. 8:20) and the king has walked in faithfulness (2 Kgs. 20:3). In contrast is walking in darkness in the ethical sense (Is. 59:9). One catches here a hint of the two ways, but more with an indication of the sphere in which life is lived than its goal. [G. BERTRAM, V, 941-43]

C. The NT.

1. The five NT instances of patéō all show LXX influence. In Lk. 10:19 Jesus gives the disciples authority to tread on serpents and scorpions. In Lk. 21:24 Jerusalem will be trodden down by the Gentiles, i.e., plundered, desecrated, and destroyed. The usage in Rev. 11:2 is the same. The figure of treading the winepress for divine judgment occurs in Rev. 14:20; 19:15.

2. katapatéō occurs four times for "to tread underfoot" (Mt. 5:13; 7:6; Lk. 8:5; 12:1) and once in a transferred sense for "to despise" (Heb. 10:29).

3. peripatéō means first "to walk around" as in Mk. 2:9; Jn. 5:8ff.; Acts 3:6ff. The devil "roams around" in 1 Pet. 5:8. Paul, however, uses the term for the walk of life on the basis of the LXX. Believers are to walk in the Spirit (Gal. 5:16), to walk worthy of God (1 Th. 2:12) or the Lord (Col. 1:10) or their calling (Eph. 4:1), to walk as children of light (Eph. 5:8). Teaching on the walk of life is given (1 Th. 4:1ff.; Col. 2:6). Those who do not walk as directed are to be avoided (2 Th. 3:6, 11). Faith does not mean social reshuffling but it does mean a changed life (1 Cor. 7:17; Eph. 4:17). Baptism ends the walk in sin (Col. 3:7). It sets in the past walking according to the flesh (Rom. 8:4). Believers still walk in the flesh (2 Cor. 10:3), but the flesh is no longer lord. They may now walk in newness of life (Rom. 6:4). This is a walk by faith (2 Cor. 5:7). John uses peripateín for ordinary "going" (11:9-10), but in 8:12 it refers to the stance of faith (cf. 12:35; 1 Jn. 1:6-7). Other examples of a figurative use are found in Mk. 7:5; Acts 15:1; 21:21; Heb. 13:9; Rev. 21:24.

4. emperipatéō occurs only in 2 Cor. 6:16 (cf. Lev. 26:12), where it refers to God's redeeming presence in the community. [H. SEESEMANN, V, 943-45] patḗr [father], patrṓos [belonging to the father], patriá [from the father, family], apátōr [fatherless], patrikós [paternal] patḗr.

A. The Indo-European World and Graeco-Roman Antiquity.

I. The Use of patḗr. Of Indo-European origin, and incorporating the childish "pa," patḗr means "father" or "forefather," then "initiator," "revered person," "old man," "teacher," etc. The plural means "ancestors," and very occasionally "parents."

II. The Ancient Concept and Its Influence. The term is first genealogical, then legal and sociological for the kindly but severe and authoritative head of the house in a patriarchal order.

III. The Greeks.

1. Head of the House and Teacher. Patriarchal control is found among the Greeks too, modeled on that of Zeus and similar to that of the king. The Stoics regard children as subject to their fathers as elders, benefactors, and superiors. But there is also an emphasis on fatherly love. Fathers are teachers by word and example. Thus Philo states that they should engender and uphold good resolves and brave actions (On the Special Laws 2.29).

2. Piety toward the Father. A duty uniformly recognized is that of honoring one's father. To command love of parents is, for the Stoics, superfluous. Parents rank only after the gods. This does not entail ancestor worship. The point is that divine reason comes to expression in human societies, e.g., the family and the state. If conflict arises, however, the good takes precedence over father and mother.

IV. The Roman patria potestas. Roman law vests authority and power in the head of the house. Civil law combines here with sacral law, for the father is also the priest. The father's power continues over all children until his death and embraces slaves as well. It includes disciplinary and penal power, the right to marry and divorce children, and the right to adopt and emancipate. The Roman view affects Greek law, and Jews who are Roman citizens adopt it (cf. Philo On the Special Laws 2.227, 233). Relaxation comes only with the Justinian Code.

V. Religious Use of the Father Image.

1. The Indo-Iranian Basis of the Idea of God as Father. Invocation of God as father, i.e., the author of being, is old. It rests on primitive ideas, e.g., the view in India that vegetation arises by conception from heaven and earth. The concept of the divine progenitor spreads in many forms (cf. the ruler as God's son in Egypt).

2. Zeus as Father and Ruler. In Homer Zeus is the universal god, the father of all divine and human beings. Patriarchalism, fatherhood, and monarchy meet in this view. If Zeus is not called king, he still rules over all things and is the apotheosis of the head of the house, protecting parental rights. The despotic aspects in Homer's depiction of Zeus perhaps express some revolt against unrestricted paternal authority. His being portrayed in human terms means, however, that he too is subject to fate.

3. The Father in the Mysteries. God is commonly called father in the mysteries (cf. Serapis, Mithras, and Helios). The term signifies relationship, and generation by the god attests to his friendship and power to bless. The father god makes initiates both sons and brothers in a spiritual family. The teacher or pastor is also a cultic father in this family, and the office is hereditary or involves a spiritual descent. The priestly father represents the divine father (cf. the priestly role of the earthly head of the house).

VI. Philosophical and Gnostic Forms of Belief in the Father.

1. Father in Plato's Cosmology. Plato sees in the idea the source of all things. He then gives the father concept cosmological form in the creation myth. God is author and father (poiētḗs kaí patḗr). The world is good because its architect is good. Philo makes use of Plato's terms. Neo-Platonism distinguishes between the supreme God and the demiurge. Gnostic systems take a similar view. A common term in cosmological speculation is "the father of all" (patḗr tṓn hólōn or pántōn).

2. The Father as Begetter and the Synthesis of King and Father in Stoicism. Stoicism uses the myth of the sacred marriage of Zeus and Hera and traces back the world to divine begetting (cf. the spermatic lógoi). This confers divine sonship on humanity and a share in the divine lógos. Only the wise see this, and therefore there is some sense in which God is the father only of the good. The gods want us to be virtuous; hence divine sonship leads to ethical teaching. Later Stoicism stresses God's authority as ruler. As a good king and true father, God grants the powers necessary to struggle against adversity. Zeus as the king of kings is the model for earthly rulers.

3. The Father Concept in Philo.

a. Greek Influence. Philo uses the absolute "the Father" for God. He shows the influence of Homer and Plato but also takes up the Stoic idea of generation. The soul is the child of God inasmuch as virtues are begotten in it. The wise are adopted by God as true children. As Father, God cares for his creation and in his fatherly pity grants good gifts to it.

b. Jewish Factors. To express God's authority, Philo prefers kýrios or despótēs to basileús. God has both creative power and royal power. In the lógos as the vehicle of his transcendent deity his authority and kindness merge. The lógos is the first-begotten of the Father who validates God's fatherly power and ruling authority.

4. The Father in Hermes Mysticism. In the confused world of Hermes mysticism the father of all is the one fixed pole. Transcendent, he is related to all things and mystically known. He is father as maker or begetter. Primal man receives light and life from the father and is allowed to create, but falls through mating with nature. As author and father, God is good and embraces all good. He exercises saving rule, fixes human destinies, and has mercy on initiates, who enter into fellowship with him by way of noús. Father is the final word of prayer for initiates, but the final goal is absorption into the all. [G. SCHRENK, V, 945-59]

B. The OT.

1. patḗr and Other Terms for ʾāḇ in the OT. In the OT patḗr is almost always used for ʾāḇ. Other renderings of ʾāḇ yield no significant results, since we either have adjectival phrases, attempts at greater precision, or softenings.

2. ʾāḇ as a Primary Word. ʾ āḇ is a primary word connected to no stems, having only one meaning, and with no real synonyms. Suggested relationships to other terms are all questionable (cf. the attempt to read "fear" in Gen. 31:42 as "kinsman" or "ancestor").

3. ʾāḇ as a Basic Element in the Family Concept. The socio-legal order of family life determines the Hebrew use of "father." The family is "the father's house." Since "house" here can be a structure, an urban culture is the setting. The father's legal supremacy is in view but the sons' marriages create a clan and dilute this authority as the house becomes a broader community. In this connection the father may be the "forefather," as in the phrase "God of the fathers" (Ex. 3:13). Love and pride and loyalty can prolong the sense of belonging to forefathers (cf. the role of Abraham and David, and the use of "fathers" in Lk. 1:73; Rom. 4:12).

4. Basic Features of Patriarchy. The family laws of Israel give primacy to the father, especially in matters of property and inheritance. At first matriarchal features may also be seen, but the cultus reinforces patriarchy by expecting certain sacral functions from the male head of the clan and limiting the sacral role of women; cf. Judg. 17:10, where the young man is called "father" because he acts as priest, and the later use of the term "father" for the prophet (2 Kgs. 2:12) or official. Dignity and authority are also accorded to the priest, prophet, and official with the use of the term. The father's primacy means that the children belong to his clan and that the sons are heirs unless their mother is a "strange woman" (Judg. 11:2). Fathers may sell daughters as bond servants (Ex. 21:7) and may accuse their children (Gen. 38:24; Dt. 21:18ff.) in their respect for higher law. Fathers play a big role in tribal courts, and are so respected that they must not be cursed or struck (Ex. 21:15, 17). Thus there are no instances of patricide in the OT. The commandment (Ex. 20:12) brings out the impulse behind the law, associating the mother with the father and inculcating a positive norm of conduct. Whether parents deserve this respect is not at issue. The term "father" may set up an ideal when applied to priests, prophets, and officials, but physical fathers are to be honored as such, since they are such by divine ordinance. There is something divine about the father, for there is something fatherly in God.

OT Old Testament

5. The Father of the Gods. The OT makes sparing use of "father" for God. The three main reasons for this are that the OT expresses trust in more intellectual terms, that the important covenant concept does not fit too well with that of father, and that the father motif is more closely related to myth. Israel does call God Father, as may be seen in theophorous names. But the larger notion of a Father of the gods does not appear in the OT. At most one might quote Dt. 32:8-9, although Dt. 4:19 makes it plain that all things are under the Lord's supreme control. Ps. 82:6-7 refers to "sons of the Most High," and Pss. 29:1 and 89:6 speak about "heavenly beings" without actually calling them God's sons. It is only poetically that the gods may be called "sons of God." Theologically the OT concept of God leaves no place for this mythical conception.

6. Father and Other Terms of Relationship in OT Religion. The idea of God as Father fits in more easily with family than tribal worship, but the community sense of the clan or tribe provides some basis for the wider use of the concept. It is an ancient religious concept that must have been present elsewhere before being adopted by Israel. Behind the idea lies the sense of generation from a single head and an ultimate beginning in God (although with no hint of ancestor worship). The relationship with God is thus construed along the lines of the relationship to the father, with some diminishing of the sense of distance between Creator and creature, yet not so much as when the deity is thought of as mother, brother, or uncle, since less authority attaches to these figures. It should be noted, too, that the blood relationship suggested by the term father is not thought of literally but metaphorically (for the sake of its emotional content), so that the tradition adopts the concept even if it is misconstrued in periods of apostasy (cf. Jer. 2:26-27). References to the divine begetting (Ezek. 23:4; Gen. 6:4) must be seen in the context of Ps. 90, which does not call God the father of nature but presents him plainly as its sovereign Lord (v. 2) and calls believers his servants rather than his children. Dt. 32 undoubtedly calls God the Father of his people (vv. 6, 18-19), but it does so in order to make the reality of fellowship with God as vivid as possible and to bring out its ethical implications.

7. Father as a Theophorous Element in the Proper Names of Israel. The vitality of motifs proper to tribal religions may be seen in a name like Joab ("Yahweh is Father") or Abijah ("Father is Yahweh"). With or without a "my," this is a personal confession, but it also carries a collective sense. God as Head of the blood fellowship is Father to each member. One cannot conclude, however, that kinship provides the basis for the development of the concept of God as Father.

8. Father as Metaphor. Israel's belief in God as Father is not to be seen as grounded in myth, for myth does not nurture piety, and Israel always contests an image of God that is simply a heightened human image. Applied to God, the term Father is finally metaphorical. The first point of comparison is the legal authority of the father. If the idea still meets with some resistance, so that the people are called the children of Israel rather than of Yahweh, the sociological position of the father as the one who is a trustworthy and yet a loving authority (cf. Ps. 103:13; Prov. 3:12) gives it enduring strength. Love is an increasingly important element in the use of the term, as may be seen from Hos. 11:1. It is an important element even in the ideology of kingship (cf. 2 Sam. 7:14- 15) and thus results in statements like those of Pss. 89:26 and 2:7. Intrinsic to the concept are the greatness and the loving concern of God.

9. Father as a Concept of Authority. The element of authority may be seen in the fact that the delight of the Father in the son is more commonly expressed than the joy of the son in the Father. Fatherhood implies a duty of obedience (cf. 2 Kgs. 16:7; Dt. 14:1; Jer. 18:6-7; cf. Is. 64:8). As Creator, God the Father rules and molds his people.

v. verse

vv. verses

1O. The Universalist Trend in the Designation of God as Father. Since God is Creator, an extension of the father concept beyond Israel is logical. The Father of Dt. 32:6 creates rather than begets the people and this carries with it the question whether he creates Israel alone (cf. Jer. 3:19; Mal. 2:10). What finally emerges is that paternal feeling is the true motif in the father concept as applied to God (cf. Ps. 73:15; Jer. 31:18ff.; Is. 63:15-16). This has a personal as well as a national reference (Pss. 27:10; 68:5), and at last all reserve is overcome and there can be a full declaration of trust in God as Father (Ps. 89:26; Sir. 51:10). [G. QUELL, V, 959-74]

C. The Father Concept in Later Judaism.

I. The Earthly Father.

1. Piety toward the Father. The rabbis discuss why the father is to be honored first in Ex. 20:12 but the mother in Lev. 19:3 (the LXX and Philo change the order in Leviticus). They think the mother is put first in Leviticus because she advises the child. On the other hand, the father should have more honor because he teaches the law. Rules of proper observance are laid down. Thus fathers should not be contradicted or criticized, and adult children must care for aged parents.

2. Parents as Instruments and Representatives of God. Honoring God comes before honoring parents, and this principle can also give precedence to teachers of the law. Yet parents are instruments of divine generation, and therefore honoring parents is honoring God.

3. The Duties of the Father. The father must teach his children the law by instruction and example. He may punish children, but the rabbis soften the penalties of Ex. 21:15; Lev. 20:9. Philo and Josephus, however, incline to the Roman view of paternal authority and hence to a severer attitude to punishment.

II. The Fathers in Judaism.

1. The Concept. The “fathers” are usually the patriarchs, but the term also embraces the exodus or wilderness generation and outstanding figures of the past. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are “fathers of the world,” and Abraham, the father of nations, is commonly called “our father Abraham.”

2. The Importance of the Fathers. The fathers are the rock whence Israel is hewn. They embody tradition and guarantee covenant grace. Their mediated merits blot out later sin and bring pardon in the judgment. They are effective intercessors. God is thus invoked as “our (my) God and the God of our (my) fathers.”

III. Father as a Title for Teacher. As a general title of honor, father is a common term for the rabbi. The OT use for the prophet (not the patriarch) is a model for this. The title is often linked with the name of the teacher.

IV. God as Father in Judaism. In Judaism God is often called Father both collectively and individually. Hellenism strengthens this use, but in Israel the accent is less cosmic and genealogical and more national and theocratic. The religious use increases toward the end of the first century A.D.

1. Distinctions from Greek Cosmology.

a. Not Cosmic Begetter but National Protector. The most important difference from Greek thinking is that in Judaism God is the Father of the covenant people in a personal relationship. The reference is not to begetting as a principle but to fatherhood as an attitude and as action. God is Lord of the world but as Father he cares for his people. The addition of “our,” “your,” “my,” etc. expresses the personal aspect. For the most part Father is used as a predicate and in address to God.

b. Father and Lord. These terms go together in later Judaism. The combination is prefigured in Mal. 1:6; Sirach, etc. Josephus has patḗr kaí despótēs, and “our Father, our King” is a liturgical formula in the synagogue. The conjunction, which Stoicism and Gnosticism also favor, preserves the sense of God’s holiness and thus protects the father concept against mawkish weakening.

2. The Father in the Heavens. From the end of the first century A.D. this is a common phrase in the Palestinian synagogue. Tradition dates back “Israel and her Father in heaven” to c. A.D.70. Heaven here is not meant to stress God’s remoteness but to distinguish his fatherhood from earthly fatherhood. After A.D.

70 consolation for the loss of political freedom is found by looking to the heavenly Father. The use is collective, but personal versions also occur ("my Father in heaven" etc.). This applies especially but not exclusively in the case of outstanding figures who enjoy an unusually close relationship to God. The phrase "before the Father in heaven" expresses Israel's attitude in prayer.

3. Invocation of the Father in Prayer. Jewish Hellenistic writings and synagogue liturgies show that God is invoked as Father (cf. Is. 63:16; 1 Chr. 29:10 LXX). The form "our Father" is common, but "our Father in heaven" is less so.

4. The Relation to Other Synagogue Names for God and the Limitation in the Understanding of God as Father. The rabbis prefer phrases that denote God's sovereignty, or such terms as the Holy or Merciful One, or substitute terms like the place, the dwelling, or the word. The emphasis is on God's holiness and power rather than his fatherliness. A living sense of fatherly care is uncommon, and the belief in merit tends to rob the term Father of depth and vitality, since legalism restricts fatherly freedom. The materials of true faith in the Father are all present, but the spirit is still to some extent missing.

D. The NT.

I. Father according to the Synoptic Jesus.

1. Honoring the Earthly Father and Its Limits. Jesus unconditionally affirms the fifth commandment (Mk. 10:19) and dismisses the evasions of casuistry (Mk. 7: 10ff.). He also shows a tender regard for the parent-child relation (Mk. 5:40; 9:14ff.; Lk. 9:37ff.). Tension arises with Jesus' call to discipleship, for, like marriage (Gen. 2:24), this sets up a new order (Mk. 10:29-30) and demands an eschatological outlook (Mt. 8:21-22), yet does not permit evasion of the commandment. At times the tension may be felt so severely that renunciation of all earthly relationships is entailed (Lk. 14:26), although not in the sense of a vow. The Son of Man tears generations apart (Mk. 13:12), as in Jewish eschatological expectation. On the positive side, however, the gospel does a reconciling work (Lk. 1:17) by healing family disruption and restoring the disobedient.

a. The Presupposition of Patriarchy. Patriarchy is the sociological background of the religious use of patḗr. It is unusual to leave father and trade to follow Jesus (Mt. 4:22). The father orders his sons to work in the vineyard (Mt. 21:28). The father holds and controls the family property (Lk. 15:11ff.). The younger son sins by seeking advance ownership and selfishly leaving his father's house; conversion is returning to the father's fellowship. Being in fellowship with the father is the gift on which all else depends. When Jesus calls God Father, God's lordship is implied in his fatherhood.

b. Invocation of God as "Abba." The NT has preserved the Aramaic term used by Jesus, namely, "Abba." This childish cry is a generalized vocative. An infant sound is confidently applied to God as the simplest term to express his loving attitude. Familiarity is avoided by the setting of the invocation within the kingdom with its demand for submission to God's holy rule.

c. The Father in the Heavens.

(a) Sources. It seems likely that Matthew preserves the original, longer form of this expression (cf. Mk. 11:25). In parallel passages Luke amends it to suit his purpose. Matthew shows that Jesus does not always add "in the heavens," but he presents a true Father theology in a form which stands close to the Palestinian tradition.

(b) Meaning. Distinguishing heaven from earth, the formula suggests sovereignty but also implies perfect fatherhood. The use of "your" or "our" denotes the status of sonship. In the Lord's Prayer the first three petitions express the control of earth by heaven under the divine fatherhood. In Mt. 6:1ff. piety is regulated by the Father. In Mt. 23:9 the heavenly Father normatively fixes the meaning of earthly fatherhood. What the formula always implies is the orientation of earth to heaven, or the control of earth by heaven, under the God who is exalted and yet near.

d. My Father and Your Father.
(a) Sources. The use of “my Father” is limited in Mark but more common in material peculiar to Luke and especially Matthew. In Mark “your Father” occurs only in 11:25. It is more common in Matthew.
(b) Distinction. In Mark and Luke, and material common to Matthew and Luke, “your Father” occurs only in directions to the disciples. Yet the phrase always stands in relation to Jesus. The directions receive their force from the presence of the kingdom in the person of Jesus. The truth of fatherhood is the revelation of the Son. Only through him is it a truth for the disciples.
(c) Christological Confession. Jesus teaches his disciples to pray “our Father,” but his own “my Father” expresses a unique relationship. This may be seen already in Lk. 2:49 (cf. 23:34, 46). The use has christological and confessional force in Mt. 16:17; 18:19. The content of this Christology is that the Father reveals himself in the Son, that decision is made relative to him, that the suffering Son is doing the Father’s will, that he grants salvation and assurance of acceptance to his followers, and that future consummation is promised.
e. The Absolute ho patḗr. The absolute use is uncommon but is found in all strata. On the lips of Jesus it usually occurs with “the Son” or “the Son of Man” in apocalyptic contexts. Dan 7, which expresses the sovereignty of the Father and the commission of the Son, may well be the basis.
f. God the Father of All. Jesus relates God’s fatherhood primarily to the privileged nation of Israel, although decision as to Israel’s relation to the Father rests on her encounter with the Son (cf. Mt. 21:28ff.; Lk. 15:1lff.). God is the Creator of all (Mt. 5:43ff.) but there is no reference to any general sonship by nature or estate. Disciples encounter the Father in Jesus. Fatherhood is linked to the kingdom and discipleship. It implies the divine lordship.
g. Fatherly Authority and Fatherly Care. The heavenly Father is a model of impartial generosity who expresses his perfection in forgiveness. He combines love with discipline and his greatest gift is his strongest claim (Mt. 6:14-15; Mk. 11:25). Disclosure of the Father replaces legalism and controls conduct with a view to his glory (Mt. 5:16). Solicitude accompanies authority. The Father provides for both earthly needs and final salvation. One may rely on his foresight (Mt. 6:8, 32) and fatherly goodness (Mt. 7:9ff.). He extends assistance in persecution (10:29-30) and does not will that any of his little ones should perish either in time or eternity (Mt. 18:14).
h. Significance for the Disciples.
(a) Christological Form of Belief in the Father. Jesus is totally committed to the Father and his saving purpose and claims no greater power or knowledge than the Father. This comes out in the passion prayer of Mk. 14:36 and the disclaimer of knowledge of the date of the parousia (13:32). The Son’s authority is the gift of the Father to be used in the Father’s service. The Father reveals the truth concerning the Son (Mt. 16:17). The fellowship of the kingdom is a household fellowship under the Father as Head.
(b) The Cry of Jubilation. The mystery of the Son is an integral part of this cry. The Son’s fellowship with the Father gives him his authority and knowledge. The truth about Jesus and the Father takes kerygmatic form here in a way which takes us to the root of the unique sense of Jesus’ “my Father.”
(c) The Christological Message in Lk. 15:11ff. The christological message in Lk. 15:11ff. is that of the fatherly love that shows mercy meeting true conversion and then seeking to win the elder brother into the circle of blessing. The father’s will involves acceptance of his mercy and the joyous feast represents household rejoicing at the restoration of fellowship. The work of Christ is the work whereby the Father unites the righteous and the unrighteous in a new family fellowship by overcoming the legalism of the former and graciously opening the doors to the latter. This work does not make the cross superfluous, for it comes to completion on the cross, where Jesus forgives the thief and prays for the self-righteous. It is on the cross that Jesus fulfils the truth of fatherhood that dominates his ministry.
i. The Unity of Father, King, and Judge.

(a) Father and Judge. In patriarchy fatherly provision and judicial power come together. The Father's will is the norm of judgment (Mt. 7:21ff.; 18:23ff.), and the Son judges in the Father's name (Mt. 25:31ff.).

(b) Father and Ruler. The term "father" includes lordship, but Jesus strengthens this aspect by associating fatherhood and the kingdom. God is seldom called basileús in the Gospels but there can be no questioning his lordship. The kingly rule of God is the fatherly rule of grace. Jesus puts an end to any legalistic restriction of such terms as Lord, King, and Judge. The one name Father absorbs and implies others in expression of a trusting simplicity that overcomes both fear of the divine names and their accumulation.

1. Usage. In John patḗr is used for God some 115 times. The absolute use predominates. We find "your father" only once (20:17), and "our father" and "father in the heavens" not at all.

2. Concept. John does not relate the idea of begetting to the term "father." The Father takes precedence (14:28) in authoritative giving (6:32). The Son knows, obeys, recognizes, and honors him in a harmony of love (10:30). The Son's relation to the Father implies patriarchy. He stays in the Father's house, owns what the Father owns, and can gain a hearing with the Father (8:35; 16:15). He prepares a place for his disciples as members of his Father's household (14:2).

3. Revelation. In John the message of the divine fatherhood relates to revelation. God is not primarily the Father of all but the Father of the Son who reveals him, and who is the Son in a unique sense. In Jn. 1:14, 18 the Father is the Giver of revelation and the Son is the Revealer (cf. 4:21, 24). The Son acts on the Father's commission (5:43). The Father bears witness to him in Scripture (5:37ff.) and gives him as the heavenly bread (6:32). Only as he has always been with the Father can the Son reveal him (1:1, 18). Sending is thus the key. The Father sends the Son to do his work, and it is as he is consecrated and sent that he is manifested as the Son (10:36). "Father" is itself a word of revelation (17:6, 11, 26, 28). It is about the Father that Jesus speaks (16:25). This is no mere verbal concept separate from the saving work of the Son. The work of the Son is the content of witness to the Father (6:41ff.). To know or see the Son is to know or see the Father (14:7ff.). To decide for or against the Son is to decide for or against the Father (8:42). If revelation is the declaration of the Father, the word and work of Jesus fill the term with new and specific content.

4. The Harmony of Father and Son. The union of Father and Son is the core of the message in John. What this means is that the Father loves the Son (3:35). This is no mystical love but is related to the Son's commissioned work. This love has a pretemporal basis and implies mutual knowing and seeing. It is a "being in" but involves action as the Son says and does what the Father wills (5:19; 7:17-18). The works of the Son are the Father's works (10:32, 37-38). The word is the Father's word (14:24). Both works and word attest to both Sender and Sent (10:25). A fellowship of giving produces the act of revelation and comes to fulfilment in the self-giving of the Son as he takes up the cup the Father gives him to drink (18:11) in a union of the Father's love (10:17) and the Son's obedience (10:18). Only when the saving work is done does Jesus make his Father in the true sense the Father of the disciples as well (20:17), for he is the only way to the Father (14:6). The Paraclete works out the new relationship as an abiding gift (14:18ff.), and the disciples are brought into a parallel knowing (10:14-15), loving (15:9-10), union (14:20), and sending (17:18).

5. The Conflict for the Truth of the Father. In Jn. 2:16 Jesus accuses the Jews of desecrating the Father's house, but the real issue is Jesus' own relation to the Father (5; 6; 8). Opponents treat Jesus as a mere man and thus demand special validation of his mission (6:42). They appeal to God as their Father (8:41) but fail to recognize the Father and the Son (8:45ff.). Their attitudes and actions show that spiritually their father is the devil (8:42). The battle for the truth of fatherhood is repeated in the "convincing" work of the Paraclete (16:8ff., especially v. 10).

6. The Father and Prayer. As suffering intensifies, Jesus increasingly engages in prayer to the Father (11:41-42; 12:27ff.). The unique missionary form of prayer in 11:41-42 states his life's goal. The prayer of 12:27ff. expresses conflict but seeks God's glorifying in a fulfilment of mission. Giving by the Father and the glorifying of the Father are the dominant themes in ch. 17. The disciples have direct access to the Father as they appeal to the Son and agree with him (14:13; 16:23). The absolute patḗr is the goal of prayer in worship in the Spirit (4:21ff.). The disciples' prayer is the fruit of the Son's completed work of salvation.

III. Father in the Other Apostolic Writings.

1. The Earthly Father. The instructions given to fathers in Col. 3:18ff.; Eph. 5:22ff. combine OT and Jewish-Hellenistic elements but give them added depth with the reference to the Lord. The new relationship of faith is the determinative point. Paternal power must not be abused, but obedience pleases the Lord, and education is to be given in the Lord. In Heb. 12:4ff. discipline is right, but only as it evinces loving concern. In a mixed marriage Paul gives the decisive vote to the believing partner inasmuch as the other partner and the children are consecrated by the superior fact of faith. 1 Tim. 5:1-2 enjoins respect for the elderly as though they were fathers.

2. Men as Fathers in Paul.

a. Abraham. In Rom. 4:1 Abraham is father as a believer, and this means that all believers are his children. What counts is not blood relationship but a genealogy of faith. He is Israel's father only if she believes as he did.

b. The Apostle. In his relations to the churches Paul thinks in fatherly terms. He refers to birth in 1 Cor. 4:15. Timothy and Titus are children or sons (1 Cor. 4:17; Tit. 1:4; cf. Mark in 1 Pet. 5:13). The father differs from other teachers (1 Cor. 4:15), although he is father only in Christ. A title is not at issue but a living relationship. Both father and child serve the one gospel (cf. Phil. 2:22). Fatherly actions are described in 1 Th. 2:11ff. If there is any model, it is the rabbinic one, not that of the teacher of wisdom or the mystagogue.

3. God as Father.

a. The Cry "Abba." Gal. 4:6; Rom. 8:15; 1 Pet. 1:17 and the use of the Lord's Prayer confirm the importance of invoking God as Father. The cry "Abba" is not just liturgical; it is a work of the Spirit of adoption. Paul's doxologies show that a permanent attitude is at stake. The invocation implies the assurance of sonship and inheritance. It marks the end of legalism and servanthood.

b. The Use of patḗr.

(a) theós patḗr. This phrase occurs in blessings, salutations, and final greetings, e.g., Gal. 1:3; Rom. 1:7; Phil. 1:2; Eph. 1:2; 6:23. But it never occurs in Paul without mention of the kýrios. Omission of the article enhances its effect, and reading the epistles promotes its liturgical use. It has the force of a dogmatic formulation in 2 Pet. 1:17 (cf. Ignatius Magnesians 3.1).

(b) theós ho patḗr. This lofty confessional phrase occurs only in 1 Cor. 8:6.

(c) ho theós kaí patḗr. This is a formula of doxology and thanksgiving in 1 Thessalonians and Galatians. It represents the attitude of prayer in 1 Th. 1:2-3 and is shaped by the implied petition in 3:11. The kaí is preferred when a genitive follows, i.e., "God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." Here patēr toú kyríou defines theós, although probably only "Father" relates to Christ. Statements along these lines contain praise in the style of prayer (2 Cor. 1:3; Eph. 1:3; 1 Pet. 1:3). Solemn force is added in 2 Cor. 11:31. ho theós kaí patḗr also occurs in confessional statements in 1 Cor. 15:24; Eph. 4:5-6, and in an admonition in Eph. 5:20. Distinctive phrases are “Father of mercies” in 2 Cor. 1:3 and “Father of glory” in Eph. 1:17. The latter phrase is in apposition to the unusual “God of our Lord Jesus Christ.”

(d) ho patḗr. In Paul the absolute occurs only in Colossians and Ephesians, which polemically adopt Gnostic terms. Col. 1:12-13 links it with ho huiós. Eph. 2:18 shows similarity to John, which also seems to be in conflict with Gnosticism.

(e) patḗr, theós, huiós, kýrios. Paul mostly uses theós but gives it distinctive content. He uses patḗr in prayer and links it to theós. theós denotes God’s power and glory as Creator, patḗr his grace and mercy as Redeemer. In 2 Cor. 1:3 “Father of mercy” interprets theós as the “God of comfort,” while in Eph. 1:17 patḗr is defined in terms of theós as the Father of glory. Paul reserves kýrios for Jesus and he relates huiós to theós rather than patḗr, linking patḗr with kýrios. God, as the Father of Jesus, is also the Father of believers. Statements about the kýrios are more common than those about the huiós because Paul proclaims what is given by the Father and the Lord.

c. Content of the Father Concept.

(a) Fatherhood as Lordship. What is said about the Father relates to doxology, prayer, and confession. Fatherhood means sovereignty. His will controls the work of salvation (Gal. 1:4). We owe all things to his power (Eph. 5:20). His gift is a call to sanctification (2 Cor. 6:14ff.). At the parousia we come before him as Judge (1 Th. 3:13). When redeemed, we are put in his kingdom (Col. 1:12-13). At the end the kingdom will be his (1 Cor. 15:24ff.). That the Father is also Ruler is revealed in the fact that he is Father of the kýrios, who is also Ruler and Judge. The use of Father for God is controlled by the revelation in Christ. Ditheism is not implied, but it is the Lord who makes possible true belief in the Father.

(b) The Gift of Grace through the Father. The Father dispenses cháris, agápē, éleos, paráklēsis, eirḗnē (2 Th. 2:16-17; 2 Cor. 1:3; 1 Pet. 1:3). This is an ongoing part of redemption. Blessing fulfils the counsel of salvation (Eph. 1:3). The cry “Abba” relates to the Father as the Giver of salvation. The Spirit makes us children (Rom. 8:14) and gives us access to the Father (Eph. 2:18). Beloved in God the Father (Jude 1), believers are “in” God the Father by faith.

d. Greek Influences.

(a) The Answer to Belief in the Father of All. In 1 Cor. 8:4ff. confession of the Father is opposed to polytheism. tá pánta here is set in the biblical context of creation. God is the author of creation, and through Christ creation and redemption are linked. Paul uses Greek expressions, but he gives them a new sense. In Eph. 2:18ff. the saints, through the Spirit, have rights in God’s household. The Father of us all is above, through, and in all. Here OT and Stoic phrases are mixed, but the Stoic phrases receive new content with the reference to the new unity of the redeemed people. A dynamic unity is brought into focus by belief in the Father.

(b) Exceptions. 1 Pet. 1:3 relates “begetting” to the Father. The point here is that he has effected regeneration. Jms. 1:18 also relates regeneration to the Father, but again with a soteriological reference. “Father of lights” in v. 17 may have the stars in view (cf. Philo), but the phrase is an incidental one. Hebrews uses patḗr sparingly, but calls God the “Father of spirits” in 12:9 in what seems to be a more general cosmological rather than a soteriological use.

1. This word means “what belongs to the father or is inherited from the father.”

2. In the LXX and Josephus it has the special sense of “what derives from the fathers.” It may thus be used with tradition or with God.

3. Josephus prefers pátrios in this sense, e.g., for customs, tradition, the land, the language, the constitution, and especially the law.

4. In the NT Paul in Acts 22:3 says that he was brought up in the law of the fathers, while in 24:14 he says that he worships the God of our fathers, and in 28:17 he tells the Jews in Rome that he has done nothing against the customs of the fathers.

patriá.

A. Outside the NT.

1. Meaning. This word, denoting derivation from the father, is used for the family house, tribe, race, nation, or more specifically the family tree.

2. The LXX. The LXX uses the term frequently for "the sept," "the clan," and, in the plural, "nations" (Psalms and Jeremiah). It occurs in the phrase "father's house" and "heads of fathers' houses" (used also for the Levitical divisions in 1 Chr. 24:4).

B. The NT.

1. For "father's house" patriá occurs in Lk. 2:4, where it is added to "house" to show that the reference is to descent. In Acts 3:25 "nations" is the sense. This verse displays the liturgical influence of the Psalms with their missionary use of the term (cf. Ps. 96:7).

2. In Eph. 3:14-15 every family is said to be named from the Father. The Father has no patriaí in the strict sense but the very term patriaí shows that they have their origin in God and are oriented to him. If the family group of the church is included, Israel and the nations are also in view. The heavenly patriá is probably that of the angels rather than the perfected community, for Ephesians everywhere relates heaven and earth (cf. 1:10; 3:10). The text does not say directly that God is the prototype reflected in the patriaí. The relationship of Creator and creature is in the background, although only in combination with redemption. The patriaí are created by him who is the Father of Jesus Christ. God is not the primal Father of all things in the Greek sense, but the revealed Father in Christ who is related to the patriaí as such.

A. Outside the NT.

1. Humans. When used of humans, apátōr can mean "orphan," "foundling," "bastard," "of unequal parentage," "disinherited," or "of nonnoble or unknown origin." In Judaism converted pagans are said to be "without father," and Judaism also applies the sense of "unnamed" to Esther, who is an orphan in Esth. 2:7.

2. Deities. Such deities as Athena, Hephaestus, and Aphrodite are said to be without father or mother. God has no father in Orphic, Gnostic, and mystic works. The point is that he has no origin, or is uncreated.

3. Philo's Allegorizing. Philo uses only amētōr. Thus Sarah is the motherless principle. This idea rests on allegorical punning and does not imply deification any more than when the high priest is said to be the divine lógos, with God as father and sophía as mother.

B. The NT. The one NT instance of the word is in Heb. 7:3. This says of Melchizedek that he has no father, mother, nor genealogy. The point is that he does not fall into the sequence of the Levitical priesthood. As the promise precedes the law in Paul, so this priesthood precedes the Levitical priesthood in Hebrews. Similarly, as the reference of the promise is to Christ, so the reference of Melchizedek's priesthood is to the high priesthood of Christ.

1. This word has the sense of "fatherly" or "paternal" with various references, e.g., to rule, command, affection, etc. It is used in the LXX with "house," and tó patrikón denotes "patrimony." Jewish Hellenism prefers patrṓos to patrikós when speaking of the laws or customs of the fathers.

2. There is an inclination to use the term for one's own father in particular. The Gnostics refer it to the regenerate, and Clement of Alexandria uses it for the relation of the Logos to the Father (Stromateis 7.2.5.6).

3. Occasionally the reference may be to the fathers, as perhaps in 1 Chr. 7:4 LXX and more clearly in Lev. 25:41 LXX.

4. In Gal. 1:14 patrikós denotes the religious inheritance of the father's house (cf. Acts 23:6; Phil. 3:5; 2 Tim. 1:3; Acts 22:3; 26:5). [G. SCHRENK, V, 974-1022]

pachýnō [to make fat, insensitive], pōróo [to harden], (pēróō [to disable]), pṓrōsis [insensibility], (pḗrōsis [hardness]), sklērós[hard], sklērótēs [hardness], sklērotráchēlos [stiff-necked], sklērýnō [to harden]

This group from different stems signifies the "hardening" of unbelievers, of Israel's enemies, of Israel, of Jews against Christians, and finally of Christians. The term "to harden" may have a literal sense but is most commonly used in Scripture in a transferred sense. Luther's practice of bringing the various terms under a common equivalent, which is not followed by other translations, is justified to the extent that the material reference is the same. The LXX tends at times to soften the Hebrew by throwing greater emphasis on human responsibility, but this sharpens the measure of human guilt and misery. Interconnected in the whole complex are the thoughts of hardening and judgment by God on the one side and self-hardening and self-judgment on the other. The hardening is always specific within the history of the elect people, which may also be a history of rejection but is always a history of the divine faithfulness. If the fear of saying either too much or too little produces a kaleidoscope of harsher and softer colors, the basic color is the beautiful one of the divine glory.

1. Deriving from pachýs ("thick"), this word means "to thicken" (medically "to swell").

2. Figuratively it means "to make impervious," "insensitive," as in Mt. 13:15 and Acts 28:27 (both quoting Is. 6:10).

3. In Is. 6:10 the prophet is told to make the people's heart "fat," but the LXX softens this by simply describing the "fattening" or "hardening" as a fact.

pōróō (pēróō), pṓrōsis (pḗrosis).

1. This word group is used medically for the "hardening" or "thickening" of the bone, e.g., in fractures. Hence it may also denote "healing." In a transferred sense it means "to make insensitive."

2. The LXX uses it only in Job 17:7 (for the dimming of the eyes) and Prov. 10:20

3. The verb occurs five times in the NT, usually with the heart in view. The hardening is that of the Jews in Jn. 12:40; Rom. 11:7; 2 Cor. 3:14, and the disciples in Mk. 6:52; 8:17. The verbal noun occurs three times with reference to Jews or Gentiles in Mk. 3:5; Eph. 4:18; Rom. 11:25. God is the author in Jn. 12:40, but God's hardening is also a self-hardening, so that personal responsibility remains and a call can go out for repentance (Ezek. 18:31). Sin and unbelief are the punishment of sin and unbelief, but renewal by God is still a possibility (Is. 6:11ff.). In Rom. 9-11 Paul perceives a partial hardening of Israel, but believing Gentiles may boast only of the divine grace that includes the hope of a conversion of hardened Israel (11:33ff.) both by human decision and sovereign divine act (11:23, 17ff.). Connected with divine hardening is the self-hardening of 2 Cor. 3:14, from which even disciples are not exempt (Mk. 6:52) in their misunderstanding of Jesus' sayings.

4. In most of the above references we find the variant pēróō, "to maim," "to wound," and hence "to blind." The verb is found in Mk. 6:17; Jn. 12:40; Rom. 11:7, and pḗrōsis in Mk. 3:5. Ancient translations assume pēróō or pḗrōsis in other verses too. But pōr- is better attested, and pēr-, being more common, is more likely to have been substituted for it.

1. This word means "dry," "arid," "hard," "rough" (cf. "skeleton").

2. It occurs in the NT for "hard" sayings in Jn. 6:60; Jude 15, "contrary" winds in Jms. 3:4, and an "austere" man in Mt. 25:24. The phrase "it is hard for you" occurs in Acts 26:14 (cf. 9:4).

3. Some of the NT passages reflect LXX usage (cf. Jms. 3:4 and Is. 27:8; Mt. 25:24 and Is. 19:4). There are similar parallels in the apostolic fathers.

1. This verbal noun, which is rare in classical Greek, occurs four times in the LXX (Dt. 9:27; 2 Sam. 22:6; Is. 4:6; 28:27), and is used physiologically and psychologically by Philo. The only NT instance is in Rom. 2:5, where the hardened and impenitent heart of self-righteous Jews is denoted. In Hermas Mandates 5.2.6 we read that the Spirit will not dwell with an evil spirit and with hardness.

sklērotráchēlos. This word, meaning "stiff-necked," is developed by the LXX. It occurs in the NT only in Stephen's address in Acts 7:51. 1 Clem. 53.3 uses it (quoting Dt. 9:13).

1. This word, meaning "to harden," is primarily a medical term.

2. The NT uses it figuratively in Acts 19:9; Rom. 9:18; Heb. 3:8, 13, 15; 4:7. It is linked with unbelief in Acts 19:9, God punishes by means of it in Rom. 9:18, but Christians are admonished against it in Heb. 3:8 etc.

3. Rom. 9:18; Heb. 3:8, etc. have in view incidents such as those of Ex. 4:21; 15:23. In the LXX Gentile rulers are hardened, but so are Israel and her kings. The LXX also uses the term with no stress on hardening (cf. the heavy hand of Israel in Judg. 4:24, the hard thing of 2 Kgs. 2:10, the heavy yoke of 2 Chr. 2:10, and the withered grass of Ps. 90:6).

4. The apostolic fathers follow the biblical use for hardening in 1 Clem. 51.3.5 (cf. Barn. 9.5). [K. L. and M. A. SCHMIDT, V, 1022-31]

péthō [to convince, persuade], pepoíthēsis [trust, confidence], peithós [persuasive], peithṓ [persuasiveness], peismonḗ [persuasion], peitharchéō [to obey], apeithḗs [disobedient], apeithéō [to disobey], apeítheia [disobedience] peíthō.

1. The Active (apart from the Perfect).

a. The usual Greek senses of peíthō are "to convince," "to persuade," "to seduce," "to corrupt." The present expresses intention, the aorist success.

b. In the LXX peíthō is rare and there is no true original. But pépoitha, which expresses confidence, is more common. The LXX uses peíthein in, e.g., 1 Sam. 24:7 and Jer. 29:8, and more frequently in Maccabees and Tobit.

c. In the NT "to convince" is the most natural sense in Acts 18:4; 28:23, and "to persuade" in Mt. 27:20; Acts 14:19 (with a hint of "seduce"). In Acts 12:20; Mt. 14 "to bribe" is probably meant, though "to pacify" is possible in Mt. 28:14. The meaning is uncertain in 2 Cor. 5:11, where "to win" is possible but "to persuade" is more likely in context. In Gal. 1:10 the sense depends on whether the two questions are parallel. If they are, God is the answer, for it is God's favor that Paul seeks. If they are not, he is asking whom he seeks to persuade with his preaching, and the answer is "men." In this case, the parallel is a material one; Paul pleases God by his efforts to persuade men. In 1 Jn. 3:19 the text is uncertain, and one must ask whether "by this" has a forward or backward reference. The thought is undoubtedly that of reassurance, and the reason is probably given in vv. 20-21, namely, that we have confidence in God whether our hearts condemn us or not.

a. This word has such senses as "to trust," "to be convinced," "to believe," "to follow," and even "to obey."

b. In the LXX it is rare in books with a Hebrew original. In Esth. 4:4 the LXX introduces it to suggest that Mordecai will not be persuaded to stop mourning, and in Prov. 26:25 it brings in the thought of deceit. The ideas of conviction and faith are present in 2 Macc. 9:27; 4 Macc. 5:16, and that of obedience in 3 Macc. 1:11.

c. "To be convinced" is the meaning in Heb. 13:18; Lk. 20:6; Rom. 8:38 (cf. Acts 5:40). "To be won over" makes good sense in Acts 21:14; 23:21, and "to obey" in Heb. 13:17; Jms. 3:3; Rom. 2:8; Gal. 5:7. Only in the last two verses does the term take on theological significance with their stress on "obeying the truth." In such connections "not believing" is the opposite (cf. Acts 28:24). When following false messiahs is the issue, the sense of "being seduced" is present.

a. This term carries the sense of "trust," "reliance," or "confidence."

b. A Hebrew equivalent is bṭḥ, which expresses confidence, hope, trust, security, and peace; pépoitha is used both for this and for associated terms (some 142 times in all). Trust in God is a basic feature of the OT; there are also warnings against trust in earthly powers.

c. In the NT the strong rely on their armor and the rich on their wealth (Lk. 11:22; Mk. 10:24), but Paul relies on the faithfulness of the church (2 Cor. 2:3; Gal. 5:10) and the obedience of Philemon (Phlm. 21), while the brethren draw confidence from Paul's imprisonment (Phil. 1:14). Christian confidence is that of faith. It is "in the Lord" (Gal. 5:10; Phil. 2:24). It is confidence in God (Phil. 1:6; cf. Heb. 2:13; Mt. 27:43). In the NT, however, confidence in God mostly takes the form of faith and relates to eschatological salvation rather than present situations (as in the Psalms). It is related to obedience and involves the rejection of false confidence (Phil. 3:3-4), which Paul often calls "boasting." Boasting in Christ is the opposite of confidence in the flesh. The apostolic fathers use the term mainly in OT quotations or allusions (1 Clem. 57.7; 58.1; Hermas Mandates 9.6; Similitudes 9.18.5).

pepoíthēsis. This word means "trust" or "confidence." In 2 Cor. 1:15 Paul is confident that the Corinthians now have some understanding. In 2 Cor. 8:22 his confidence is in the church's readiness regarding the collection. A radical self-confidence is at issue in Phil. 3:4; its opposite is confidence in God (2 Cor. 3:4; cf. 10:2). Eph. 3:12 singles out the element of confidence comprised in faith, parrhēsia ("boldness") being synonymous. The apostolic fathers use the term for the confidence of the OT saints (1

peithós, peithṓ. These words occur only in two different readings of 1 Cor. 2:4. The former (an adjective) yields "persuasive words of wisdom," the latter (a noun) "the persuasive art of wisdom." Either way, the sense is that Paul's preaching does not derive its power from rhetorical skill.

peismonḗ. This rare word, not found prior to the NT, occurs only in Gal. 5:8, where it may mean "persuasion" or it may catch up the peíthesthai of v. 7 and mean "obedience." Ignatius Romans 3.3 says that Christianity is not a matter of persuasion, and Justin Apology 53.1 says that the prophecies are adequate for convincing.

peitharchéō. This verb means "to obey." "To pay heed" (Acts 27:21) is the weaker sense, and we find "to obey" rulers in Tit. 3:1, and "to obey God (rather than men)" in Acts 5:29.

apeithḗs. This word means "unworthy of belief," then "disobedient." The Baptist's mission in Lk. 1:17 is to turn the hearts of "the disobedient," false teachers are "disobedient" in Tit. 1:16, believers were once "disobedient" in Tit. 3:3, and Paul was "not disobedient" to the vision in Acts 26:19 (cf. also Rom. 1:30; 2 Tim. 3:2).

apeithéō. This word means "to be disobedient" and is a significant term in the LXX for disobedience to God. In the NT it is used of the wilderness generation in Heb. 3:18, that of the flood in 1 Pet. 3:20, all sinners in Rom. 2:8, and Gentiles in Heb. 11:31. Rom. 11:30. "To believe" is the opposite in Acts 14:1-2, and unbelief is parallel. We find an absolute use in Acts 14:2. Rom. 15:31; 1 Pet. 2:7. Important phrases are disobeying the word (1 Pet. 2:8), the gospel (4:17), and the Son (Jn. 3:36).

apeítheia. This word means "disobedience." It is used for sin in Rom. 11:32. The disobedience is that of the wilderness generation in Heb. 4:6, 11, the Jews in Rom. 11:30, and all sinners in Rom. 11:32. Sinners are "sons of disobedience" in Eph. 2:2; 5:6. apeítheia is the third of the vices personified as virgins in black in Hermas Similitudes 9.15.3. [R. BULTMANN, VI, 1-11]

peináō [to hunger, desire avidly], (limós [hunger, famine])

A. The Greek-Hellenlstic World.

1. Usage.

a. peináō means "to be hungry," or "avidly to desire something."

b. As compared with the noun hē peína, ho and hē limós expresses a higher degree of want, and figuratively signifies deprivation rather than desire.

2. Attitude to Hunger. Fertility worship is designed to insure nourishment (cf. Israel and Baal). Bad harvests are seen as due to divine anger. Rulers, too, must provide food, and are paid divine honors for so doing. In a well-run state no honest people should go hungry. Philosophy demands that goods should be shared and argues for moderation in food and clothing. Stoicism tries to treat external want as an indifferent matter; if need be, one may escape it by suicide. The later ideal in Neo-Platonism is total abstinence with a view to union with the divine (cf. Christian Gnosticism). In the mysteries the old gods have the new function of serving the hunger for abiding life. Philo adopts the ideal of moderation and the priority of nourishing the soul, but he finds in hunger an unsupportable evil, and extols the fact that through the fall we must provide against it by work.

B. The OT and Judaism.

I. Use. The OT usually refers to hunger, not as the need for food, but as the lack or withdrawal of the fruits of labor. The LXX always has limós as the noun (mostly for rāʿāḇ), but regularly uses the verb peimán for rāʿāḇ. peinán is under the shadow of limós, but the two are not coextensive in meaning.

a. This means "acute lack of food," i.e., famine, due to crop failure, drought, war, etc. The OT views it as a divine visitation (Dt. 11:10ff.; 2 Sam. 21:1, etc.), and deliverance is sought from God (1 Kgs. 8:37).

b. limós also means "hunger." Here again it is a divine judgment (Dt. 32:23; Ezek. 5:16), both historical and eschatological. With the sword and pestilence, it is a sign of the end, either as imminent (Mt. 24:7) or present judgment (Rev. 6:5-6).

c. Only rarely does the OT use limós for extended undernourishment (Is. 5:13; Dt. 28:48). It prefers peinán for this.

*2. peinán. This term is used for the effects of famine (Gen. 41:55), exhaustion on a campaign or journey (Judg. 8:4-5; Dt. 25:18), or persistent hunger.

II. The OT Interpretation of Hunger. Hunger is proclaimed as a judgment in Is. 5:13; Dt. 28:47-48. Related is the famine of hearing God's word (Am. 8:11). Present hunger is a means of instruction (Dt. 29:5). It teaches the people to receive the necessities of life in the form of the divine promise of salvation (Is. 55:1-2). It is God who satisfies those who languish (Jer. 31:25). The oppressed are sometimes called the hungry (cf. 1 Sam. 2:5; Ps. 107:36ff.). God will meet their needs but also bring hunger on the high and mighty as a sign of rejection (Is. 65:13). Hunger thus becomes a sign of waiting on God, but also a figure of condemnation.

III. Judaism. The pseudepigrapha hold out a promise for poverty, whether as a test, a chastisement, or a criterion of standing before God. The rabbis, however, view it as misfortune. Poverty greatly increases under Herod the Great, and religious groups insure subsistence for their members by mutual aid. After A.D. 70 the strong growth of private and public benevolence sees to it that there is at least sufficient food for the people.

C. peinán in the NT.

1. The Synoptic Gospels.

a. The Calling of the Hungry Blessed. The hungry are called blessed in Mt. 5:6; Lk. 6:21. The primary reference is to those who sadly lack the necessities of life and turn to God in their extremity. They are not beggars but believers who seek help from Jesus. Matthew sees in the turning to God a hungering after righteousness, i.e., a readiness that God's will should be done. Luke contrasts the hunger that means salvation with the hunger of rejection. Dives and Lazarus are illustrations (Lk. 16:19ff.). Lazarus is not hungry for the rich man's possessions but seeks only a sufficiency and finally comes to salvation. The rich man's self-sufficient satiety, if it does not become a lack that seeks help in God alone, will finally be a hunger that carries no further promise. Only those who live by God's grace have what is essential to true life (Lk. 15:21ff.; cf. 1:53).

b. Jesus and Hunger. Jesus himself undergoes hunger for his work's sake. In Mt. 4:1-2 he upholds the faith that Israel learns through her desert experiences. Mt. 4:4 (Dt. 8:3) points us to that which comes from God. Jesus lets his disciples pluck ears of corn on the sabbath when they are hungry (Mt. 12:1ff.), not because the hungry have a right to help themselves, but because, having exposed themselves to hunger for his sake, they may receive what he has the right to grant them. Everything is at the disposal of those who are at God's disposal (cf. 1 Cor. 3:22-23). The hunger that stands behind serving God or waiting on God is appeased by Jesus. This is why he feeds the hungry multitudes. Bringing the kingdom, he gives everything necessary to life, and thus puts earthly bread in its true perspective (Mt. 6:33).

c. Teaching. When Jesus, who is hungry, fails to find fruit on the fig tree in Mt. 21:18-19, the point of the enacted parable is that he is hungry for the fruit of righteousness in Israel and proclaims judgment on those in whom he does not find it. In Mt. 25:34ff., however, he promises blessing to those who feed his hungry brethren, for the mercy shown to them is mercy to Jesus himself, who suffered hunger on our behalf. It is in virtue of their association with him that the hungry themselves may be called blessed as co-heirs of the kingdom (Mt. 5:6).

2. The Pauline Epistles. In 1 Cor. 4:6ff. Paul ironically contrasts the Corinthians' supposed fullness of sight with his own hardships as he awaits the consummation in faith. His hunger and thirst are a token of ministry (2 Cor. 11:27). They cannot separate him from Christ (Rom. 8:35). His wants express his dying with Christ and are thus a pledge of participation in the resurrection (2 Cor. 4:7ff.). He is not stoically indifferent to need or plenty, but can affirm both in the light of Christ's death and resurrection (Phil. 4:11 ff.).

3. The Johannine Writings. In Jn. 6:35 Jesus fulfils for believers the promise of the age of salvation (Is. 49:10). No earthly bread (Jn. 6:27ff.) can meet the recurrent need for food in the deeper sense. Only the Son who has life in himself can do so by directing the need to its true goal. The desire enclosed in the craving for food is removed and satisfied by faith in him. No dualism is involved, but the spiritual core of the promise is brought out and its comprehensive significance presented. Thus Rev. 7:16-17 promises a future end to hunger. The promise is experienced here only in the harsh dissonance of 1 Cor. 4:6ff. It will be known in physical totality only in the new world of Rev. 21:4ff. [L. GOPPELT, VI, 12-22]

peíra [test, attempt], peiráō [to try, test, tempt], peirázō [to try, test], peirasmós [testing, temptation], apeírastos [untried, without temptation], ekpeirázō [to try, put to the test]

A. The Terms in Secular Greek.

1. peiráō in the active means "to try or strive," "to test," or "to tempt." In the more common middle or passive it means "to put someone to the test," "to test something," or "to know by experience." A rare religious use is for tempting the deity by testing the truth of an oracle.

2. peirázō, an uncommon word, also means "to try" or "to test."

3. ekpeirázō does not occur in secular Greek, but we find the middle ekeiráō for "to try out" or "to sound someone out."

4. peíra means "test," "attempt," or "experience."

5. peirasmós is rare in secular Greek. We find it for medical experiments.

6. apeírastos does not occur in secular Greek, but apeíratos occurs for "what is untried, unknown."

B. The OT and Judaism. In the LXX we find the ordinary senses (cf. 1 Sam. 17:39), but on a Hebrew basis a religious use develops, partly in relation to divine testing, partly in relation to temptation to transgress God's commands, and partly in relation to the human tempting of God.

1. Human Temptation.

a. The best example of divine testing is in Gen. 22:1ff., where Abraham meets the test. In Ex. 20:20 the law is a test of the people, and Dt. 8:2 views the desert experience as a test. In Judg. 2:22 God tests the people's obedience by not driving out the heathen who are still in the land. Here God uses history to test the people's faith and obedience.

b. The story of the fall describes human temptation that comes, not from God, but from the adversary, who forces Adam and Eve to decide for or against God. Satan also appears in Job 1. The temptation is here allowed by God as a test. Job meets the test because, even in incomprehensible suffering, he is ready to count on God and commit himself to him.

c. There are many references to testing in the Wisdom writings (cf. Sir. 2:1; 33:1), but here the testing is largely educative. All the life of the righteous is a test, and to pass it one should model oneself on Abraham etc.

d. In Dan. 12:10 the last tribulation will be a final testing and sanctifying.

e. The rabbis hold up Abraham as an example. God tests all of us, and due to the evil impulse testing always means peril.

f. Philo so stresses the educative aspect that testing itself is of little account.

g. In the Essene and Qumran writings believers are in a situation of conflict in which there is a constant pressure of temptation to pass over from the side of light to that of darkness.

2. Tempting God.

a. The OT offers many instances of human tempting of God. In Ex. 17:2 Moses asks why the complaining people are putting God to the test. Num. 14:22 contains God's judgment on those who put him to the proof. To tempt God is to fail to accept his power or his will to save. It is to challenge him in doubt and unbelief. True love of God rules out the testing of God (Dt. 6:16-17). The strong tradition that one must not tempt God explains the reasoning of Ahaz in Is. 7:12, although in this case the prohibition does not apply, for God offers a sign.

b. Wis. 1:2 shows that faith does not tempt God. Putting God to the test is not belief in him but questioning his power and love.

C. The NT.

I. Secular Use of the Terms. The noun peíra means "attempt" in Heb. 11:29 and "experience" in 11:36. The verb peirázō means "to examine" in 2 Cor. 13:5; Rev. 2:2 and "to attempt" in Acts 9:26 etc. In Mk. 8:11 the Pharisees "test" Jesus, and in Jn. 6:6 Jesus himself "tests" Philip by asking him how they might feed the multitude.

II. Theological Use of the Terms.

1. Human Temptation.

a. In 1 Cor. 10:13 Paul warns the Corinthians that so far they have come under ordinary human temptations, but he adds the consolation that God will grant the strength to endure whatever may befall them. The warning is probably a general one against too great self-confidence in Corinth. In helping others who fall believers must be humble, lest they also fall (Gal. 6:1).

b. James in 1:13 forbids us to call God the author of temptation. As God cannot be tempted, so he will not tempt others to sin, and is not to be held responsible in any way for sin. It is one's own desire that tempts into sin. In Jms. 1:2-3, however, sufferings for the sake of the gospel are a testing of faith (cf. 1 Peter). James does not suggest that God himself sends sufferings to educate believers, but sufferings should be accepted because they prove faith and produce steadfastness. Jms. 1:12 takes up Mt. 5:4, 10ff. but goes further by promising the crown of life to those who endure trial and stand the test. 1 Pet. 4:12 refers more specifically to the test of persecution, but argues that this should be met with joy because it means participation in the suffering of Christ. In v. 17 suffering is associated with judgment, which begins in God's house.

c. Jesus in Mk. 13 points out that the last time will bring the test both of persecution and of false messianic claims. Rev. 3:10 promises deliverance in the final hour of trial. In 2:10 the church of Smyrna will undergo testing by the diábolos and it is thus exhorted to be faithful unto death. As 2 Pet. 2:9 asserts, the Lord can rescue the godly from trial.

d. In the Lord's Prayer (Mt. 6:13; Lk. 11:4) what is at issue is not a test (as in Ps. 139:23) but temptation by ungodly powers, both in the great eschatological tribulations and in all affliction (cf. Lk. 8:13, where those who have no root fall away in time of temptation). In Mk. 14:38 Jesus tells the disciples to watch lest they enter into temptation. He has in view here the weakness of the flesh (cf. 1 Pet. 5:8). Watching involves prayer in the light of our defenselessness against temptation.

e. The NT seldom has the personification ho peirázōn. Except in Mk. 4:1ff. we find it only in 1 Th. 3:5. Satan is meant, for peirázein is his work (1 Cor. 7:5). "Temptation" or "trial" is a more likely sense than "tempter" in Gal. 4:14. 1 Tim. 6:9 issues a warning to the rich against falling into peirasmós; Satan might be in view, but there is no express reference.

2. Tempting God. In 1 Cor. 10:9 Paul uses an OT illustration to back up his warning that believers must not "test" or "challenge" God. Heb. 3:8-9 quotes Ps. 95 to the same effect. In Acts 5:9 Peter accuses Ananias and Sapphira of challenging the Spirit by their deceit, for the Spirit sees all things. In 15:10 Peter warns the assembly not to test God by imposing the law on Gentile believers, for by means of the vision God has shown that their freedom from the law is in accordance with his will.

III. The Temptations of Jesus.

1. Hebrews emphasizes that the life of Jesus is one of temptation (2:18; 4:15). He differs from us only in not sinning. The temptation in Gethsemane (5:7ff.) is to disobedience. Opposition is a temptation to give up in 2:18. Perhaps the attacks and questions of, e.g., Mk. 8:11; 12:15, are in view. But the main temptation is to avoid suffering. Because Jesus has victoriously withstood temptation, he can help his people in their temptations.

2. Just after his baptism and before commencing his public ministry, Jesus has an encounter with the peirázōn, who tries to deflect him from his mission. Whether the temptations come at the beginning or end of the 40 days, or during their course, makes no difference (cf. Mt. 4:2-3; Mk. 1:13). Jesus is aware of his task and resists efforts to make him disobedient to it. The first temptation is to use his power for purposes out of keeping with his mission, and he resists it by referring to the God who has given him his power. The second temptation is to tempt God by seeking help for selfish reasons and with a false appeal to Scripture; he rejects it as tempting God. The third temptation is the open one to gain world dominion by following Satan instead of God. As in the first two instances, Jesus remains firm, quoting Scripture in confirmation of his exclusive allegiance to God, and refusing to abuse his divine sonship and messianic authority. The only other Synoptic temptation is in Gethsemane, although there is a hint of continued temptation in Lk. 4:13, and cf. 22:28 if "troubles" is not meant, as is more likely. The questions of opponents are testing rather than tempting questions (Mk. 12: 13ff. etc.). The words of Peter are perhaps a temptation in Mk. 8:33, since they involve deflection from obedience to Jesus' divine mission. Heb. 5:7 shows that the prayer in Gethsemane is regarded as a prayer in temptation (although peirasmós is not used in connection with it). This hour is also one of temptation for the disciples. Jesus himself ratifies the basic decision that he made in Mt. 4:1ff. John only hints at temptation in the life of Jesus (cf. 12:27; 14:30); but the cry of 19:30 suggests victory over opposition. [H. SEESEMANN, VI, 23-36]

pénēs.

A. Secular Greek. This word, related to pónos ("hard work"), denotes a person who must work for a living. Such persons might be relatively well-to-do, even owning slaves, and they are not oppressed or disadvantaged. The ancient Greek nobility finds happiness in wealth, but philosophy seeks value in virtue irrespective of economic conditions. Indeed, the Cynics disdain extreme wealth. For the Stoics penía and ploútos are matters of indifference. Plutarch sees in penía nothing to be ashamed of, and seeks only self-sufficiency with a knowledge of the true good.

B. The OT, LXX, and Philo. The LXX uses pénēs for Hebrew terms that denote the economically weak, e.g., day laborers with no patrimony of their own. Since the Hebrew terms merge into one another, and ptōchós as well as pénēs is used for them, the difference between pénēs and ptōchós tends to be blurred in the LXX. The law protects the socially weak, the prophets fight against their oppression (Ex. 23:6; Am. 2:6, etc.), and God is their protector (Jer. 20:13 etc.). Later "poor" and "lowly" are terms for the righteous (Pss. 40:17; 70:5, etc.). The Savior King will finally exalt the lowly (Ps. 72:4, 12-13). Proverbial wisdom regards poverty as an evil, but the wise do not seek wealth either (Prov. 10:15; 30:8). To wrong the poor is to despise the Creator (22:16). Riches alone are valueless (Eccl. 6:8). Wisdom and humility make the poor superior to those who are above them socially (4:13-14; 5:7). Philo uses pénēs even when the LXX has ptōchós. The Jews are pénētes after the persecution under Flaccus robs them of their trading capital.

C. The NT. In the NT pénēs occurs only in 2 Cor. 9:9 (quoting Ps. 112:9). Giving to the needy is one of the good works for which God makes provision in believers.

penichrós. This word means "very poor," "needy," "wretched." The only LXX instances are in Ex. 22:24 and Prov. 29:7. Lk. 22:2 uses the term for the poor widow (ptōchḗ in Mk. 12:42). [F. HAUCK, VI, 37-40]

pénthos [grief, sorrow], penthéō [to grieve, sorrow]

A. Greek Usage. penthéō means "to mourn," "to grieve," and pénthos means "grief" or "sorrow," as well as "painful event or fact"; it is commonly used for mourning for the dead. The Stoics regard pénthos as a páthē that is to be avoided. Its pointlessness is a common theme in popular philosophy.

B. The LXX and Judaism. The LXX commonly uses penthéō and pénthos for derivatives of the stem 'bl. What is denoted is sorrow or lamentation, and especially mourning for the dead, which includes individual sorrow but is also conventional. pénthos plays a special role a. in prophecies of disaster (Am. 5:16; Is. 3:26, etc.), b. in descriptions of judgment (Joel 1:9-10; Jer. 14:2; Lam. 2:8), and c. in prophecies of salvation when mourning will end (Is. 61:3; 66:10). Apocalyptic describes the lamentation of Zion and its transformation into joy (4 Esdr. 9:38-10:50).

C. Primitive Christianity. In the NT, too, the words signify sorrow expressed in lamentation, especially mourning for the dead (Mt. 9:15; Rev. 18:7-8). In 1 Cor. 5:2 pénthos is passionate grief that leads to action. Only two usages are theologically significant.

a. In Rev. 18 lamentation is part of the divine judgment on Babylon. In Jms. 4:9, too, pénthos is God's judgment. The author is weaving a traditional threat into the context of admonition. In 1 Cor. 5:2 pentheín expresses grief at the shame brought on the church by the case of incest. Grief at sins for which there has been no repentance is also the point in 2 Cor. 12:21 (cf. 1 Clem. 2.6).

b. The blessing of the penthoúntes in Mt. 5:4 is to be taken eschatologically. Those who suffer in the present aeon will find comfort in the next. The mourning here is not just sorrow at sin; it is the mourning of those who see this aeon as it is and are not seduced by its charms. Their pentheín marks them off from the aeon and can hardly fail to include an element of penitent sorrow for sin. [R. BULTMANN, VI, 40-43]

pentēkostḗ [Pentecost]

A. Secular Use. We find pentēkostós from the time of Plato, and the LXX uses it in Lev. 25:10-11 for the Year of Jubilee and in 2 Kgs. 15:23 chronologically. pentēkostḗ occurs from the fourth century B.C. as a technical term in taxation signifying a 2 percent duty on the value of goods, e.g., exports and imports.

B. The OT and Judaism.

I. The OT Feast of Weeks. According to Ex. 34:22 the Feast of Weeks is a harvest festival to mark the gathering of the firstfruits of the wheat harvest. Dt. 16:9 says that it is to begin seven weeks after putting the sickle to the grain. The gifts are to be joyfully offered to God in the designated place. Lev. 23:15 provides further details about the dating and the sacrifices. On the day of the feast all work stops and there is a glad celebration. The only reference elsewhere in the OT is in 2 Chr. 8:13, so this is obviously not a major feast.

II. The Jewish Pentecost.

1. The Date. Judaism fixes the date as the fiftieth day after the Passover, although there is still debate about when to begin the reckoning. Prior to A.D. 70 the Pharisaic view that it should be 50 days after the 16th of Nisan seems to have prevailed. It might thus fall on any day of the week. It is only a one-day feast, although in the dispersion a second day is added because of difficulties in getting the calendar right.

2. As a Harvest Festival. In Judaism Pentecost is still a harvest festival. The Book of Ruth is read and pilgrims take offerings to Jerusalem, where they are met by the priests, and go up to the temple with songs. Two loaves are offered as the firstfruits of the wheat harvest. The numbers attending, however, are far fewer than for the Passover, of which it tends to become an appendage.

3. As a Festival of the Giving of the Law at Sinai. After A.D. 70, when firstfruits can no longer be brought to the temple, Pentecost is linked more closely with the age of Moses and celebrated as a festival of the giving of the law. Jubilees anchors the feast in the story of the patriarchs and thus gives it enhanced significance. The association with the law rests on Ex. 19:1, which puts Israel at Sinai in the third month after the exodus. The account of the giving of the law becomes the reading on the Day of Pentecost, and by the third century A.D. Pentecost is plainly stated to be the day when the law was given. Since there is no evidence that this equation is made in NT days, the idea that the Christian Pentecost is a festival of the new revelation of God has no foundation.

C. The NT.

1. In 1 Cor. 16:8 Paul says that he will stay at Ephesus until Pentecost. He probably has the Jewish feast in mind, as in Acts 20:16, where he wants to be in Jerusalem by Pentecost, possibly to take part, with Jewish Christians, in the Jewish celebration.

2. Luke introduces the story of the Christian Pentecost by linking it to salvation history in the phrase in Acts 2:1: “When the [promised] day of Pentecost had come” (cf. Lk. 9:51). The promise of Jesus in Acts 1:8 is now fulfilled. The account that follows stresses a. the gift of the Spirit, whose outpouring brings with it the ability to praise (v. 11) and to proclaim (vv. 14ff.), and b. the public birth of the church as a vital community (cf. 2:42ff.). The speaking in tongues (vv. 1 ff., 13) offers plain evidence of the Spirit’s descent and also serves as a prototype of world mission. The occurrence on the Day of Pentecost means that the Jewish calendar can be worked into the nexus of promise and fulfilment in salvation history.

D. The Early Church. In the early church pentēkostḗ is used for the 50 days of rejoicing that begin with Easter. Since Easter is always kept on Sunday, the seven weeks end on a Sunday too. During this period there are no fasts, prayer is offered standing, catechumens are baptized, and thoughts are directed to the last things, so that pentēkostḗ can be regarded as a sign of the heavenly kingdom, to which Christ has already ascended as the firstfruits of the harvest. Later the last day of the period takes on independent significance and pentēkostē comes to be used for it as a day that commemorates the outpouring of the Spirit. [E. LOHSE, VI, 44-53]

perí [around, about, for, etc.]

A. With Genitive.

1. From the spatial sense of "around" there develops the sense of "about."

a. With verbs (a) of speaking, writing, etc., (b) of questioning, complaining, etc., (c) of emotion, and (d) of caring, perí means "about," "on account of," or "for."

b. In loose dependence on verbs or nouns, the meaning is "for" or "in respect of." c. At the beginning of a sentence, perí denotes the subject of discussion:"As concerns."

d. In the phrase tá perí tinos the reference is to "what concerns someone" (cf. Mk. 5:27; Acts 18:25). 2. As the distinction between perí and hypér tends to fade, perí with the genitive may also mean "on behalf of," "for." In the NT this is a common use in intercession. In Lk. 4:38 people beseech Jesus for Peter's mother-in-law, in Lk. 22:32 Jesus prays for his disciples, in Acts 12:5 the church prays for Peter, in Col. 1:3 Paul prays for the church, and in 4:3 he asks it to pray for him. We also read of striving for others in Col. 2:1, or of Christ's dying for us in 1 Th. 5:10. 3. The phrase perí hamartías is a significant one in the NT; it means "for [the remission of] sins." In the LXX this phrase corresponds to the thought of "sin offering." It occurs in relation to the vicarious ministry of the Servant of the Lord in Is. 53:10. A sacrificial sense is obviously present in the NT in Heb. 10:6 (quoting Ps. 40:6), and cf. 5:3; 10:18, 26; 13:11. There is also at least a suggestion of sin offering in Rom. 8:3 and 1 Pet. 3:18.

B. With Accusative.

1. Of place, we find a. the general sense of "round" (Lk. 13:8; Mt. 3:4; Mk. 9:42), and b. "around persons"; cf. the disciples in Mk. 4:10, and Paul's companions in Acts 13:13 (hoi perí with the accusative autón or Paúlon).

2. Of time, to give an approximate time, we find perí for "about" (Mt. 20:3).

3. The spatial sense yields the transferred senses a. to be occupied "with" (Lk. 10:40; Acts 19:25), and b. more generally "in respect of" (1 Tim. 6:21); cf. tá perí eme ("my situation") in Phil. 2:23. [E. H. RIESENFELD, VI, 53-56]

periérchomai → érchomai*; perizṓnnymi → hóplon; perikátharma → katharós; períkeimai → keímai; perikephalaía→ hóplon; perilámpō → lámpō; perílypos → lýpē; *periménō → ménō perioúsios [chosen, special]

1. This word means "more than enough." In the papyri we find ho perioúsios ("the chosen one") for the married man.

2. The LXX uses the word five times. In Ex. 19:5; Dt. 26:18 the laós perioúsios is God's "special possession"; as such it has a duty to avoid idolatry and keep the commandments (Dt. 14:2).

3. The only NT instance is in Tit. 2:4. Christ's work of redemption has created for God a people that is a costly possession or special treasure. The basis is Christ's eschatological work, the orientation is to the final appearing, and the implication is a life that already actualizes the divine promise and command. [H. PREISKER, VI, 57-58]

peripatéō* → patéō; peripíptō → píptō; peripoiéomai → poiéō; peripoíēsis → *poiéō perisseúō [to be superabundant], hyperperisseúō [to superabound], perissós [superabundant], hyperekperissoú [beyond all measure], hyperekperissṓs[beyond all measure], perisseía [surplus], perísseuma [excess] perisseúō, hyperperisseúō.

A. Outside the NT.

1. Intransitively this word means “to be present overabundantly or to excess,” censoriously “to be superfluous,” and of persons “to be superior or superabounding.” Transitively the sense is “to make overrich,” “to provide superabundantly.”

2. In the LXX the verb is used personally for “to have more than enough,” “to take precedence,” or “to increase” (family or progeny).

3. Without using perisseúō, the OT suggests that the age of salvation will be one of superabundance (Am. 9:13; Is. 65: 17ff.). The rabbis base this hope on Lev. 26:4-5. Later Jewish writings take up the thought with descriptions of great fruitfulness in family, goods, crops, etc., and of a great outpouring of spiritual gifts and blessings, e.g., joy, wisdom, and the Spirit. The loss suffered through the fall will be offset hereby.

B. The NT.

1. Synoptic Gospels and Acts. A secular sense occurs in Mk. 12:44. The plenty of the hired servants in Lk. 15:17 points to the generosity of divine grace. Mt. 13:12 is perhaps a proverb containing the same thought. The messianic feeding of the multitude fulfils and transcends the Mosaic feeding with manna (Mt. 14:20; Lk. 9:17; Jn. 6:12- 13). The righteousness required for the kingdom must surpass that of the present masters of piety (Mt. 5:20). The rapid growth of the community (Acts 2:41; 4:4; 6:7; 9:31) bears witness to the work of Christ and the Spirit.

2. Paul. Paul uses the verb and the intensive hyperperisseúō in eschatological contexts (Rom. 5:20; Eph. 3:20; 1 Th. 3:10). The new age of salvation is one of abundant blessing in grace and the Spirit. If sin increased through the law, grace is superabundantly greater (Rom. 5:20). The new glory is also superabounding (2 Cor. 3:9). God causes his grace to flow richly on the apostles (Eph. 1:8). Grace increases thanksgiving, which overflows to God’s glory (2 Cor. 4:15). Sufferings abound, but so does comfort (loc. cit.). God’s truth is increased by the disclosure of human unfaithfulness and thus abounds to God’s glory (Rom. 3:7). The strong at Corinth gain no advantage by eating meats sacrificed to idols (1 Cor. 8:8), for external things do not count in the kingdom (Rom. 14:17). Deep poverty superabounds in generosity (2 Cor. 8:2). God has richly poured out his grace on the churches, and these superabound for every good work (2 Cor. 9:8). The collection brings many thanksgivings to God (9:12). Material abundance matters no more to Paul than material lack (Phil. 4:12); the gift from Philippi is for him more than abundance (4:18). Spiritual abundance in the churches is Paul’s serious missionary concern (Rom. 15:13; 1 Cor. 14:12; 15:58; Phil. 1:9; 1 Th. 3:12;4:1).

1. perissós, used of things, means “extraordinary,” “unusual,” “strange,” “overflowing,” censoriously “superfluous,” “surplus,” and of persons “unusual,” “noteworthy.” The adverb perissṓs means “unusually.”

2. In the LXX perissós means “remaining” (Ex. 10:5), “useless” (1 Kgs. 14:19), “extraordinary,” “excellent” (Dan. 5:12 Θ). The adverb simply means “very” in, e.g., Dan. 8:9 Θ; Ps. 31:23).

3. The adjective is used only six times in the NT. In Jn. 10:10 it denotes the superabundance of the life that Christ brings. In Mt. 5:37, however, it refers to unnecessary additional assurances. Disciples must do more than others in Mt. 5:47. Paul asks what advantage the Jews have in Rom. 3:1. It is superfluous for Paul to write about the offering in 2 Cor. 9:1. In Mk. 6:51 ek perissoú expresses surprise at Christ’s works. The adverb is used similarly in 10:26, and the vehemence of enemies comes to expression by means of it in Mt. 27:23; Mk. 15:14; Acts 26:11. The comparative perissóteros, a popular substitute for pleíōn in the Greek OT, occurs 16 times in the NT. John excels the prophets in Mt. 11:9, love is more important than sacrifice in Mk. 12:23, sham righteousness brings down sharper judgment in Mk. 12:40, Paul wants to spare the sinner too great sorrow in 2 Cor. 2:7, God seeks to display the immutability of his counsel more fully in Heb. 6:17, Paul excels his contemporaries in Gal. 1:14, other apostles in 1 Cor. 15:1, and his opponents (in sufferings) in 2 Cor. 11:23, he behaves with special holiness and sincerity toward the Corinthians (2 Cor. 1:12), has a special love for them (2:4), and has a special desire to see the Thessalonians (1 Th. 2:17).

perisseía. This word, denoting “surplus,” is used for the superabundant fullness of the age of salvation in both grace (Rom. 5:17) and joy (2 Cor. 8:2). Paul hopes for unbounded missionary advance when the faith of the Corinthians increases (2 Cor. 10:15). In Jms. 1:21 “exceeding” wickedness rather than “remaining” wickedness is the point.

perísseuma. This word, meaning “excess,” occurs in the NT in Mt. 12:34; Lk. 6:45 for that which, abounding in the heart, comes to expression in words. In 2 Cor. 8:13-14 the surplus goods of the Corinthians will make up the lack of the Jerusalem church, and the latter’s spiritual surplus will reciprocate. The reference in Mk. 8:8 is to the surplus fragments, which testify to the superabundance of the provision. [F. HAUCK, VI, 58-63]

peristerá [dove], trygṓn [turtledove]

A. The Dove in the Ancient World. This word, of disputed etymology, mostly denotes the “house pigeon,” but it may also be a general term. Training house pigeons is common in antiquity, probably for religious reasons, for the dove is regarded as a bird of the gods (especially female), either as divine messenger, attribute, or incarnation (cf. the dove goddess). The dove is also a bird of the soul (cf. dove grottos and the use of dovecots as monuments). As a symbol of human conduct in poetry and proverbs, the dove usually stands for chastity, faithfulness, affection, gentleness, and guilelessness, but it may also be connected with garrulity and complaint. Sometimes the dove appears as the bird of misfortune and death.

B. The Dove in the OT and Judaism. The dove appears in the flood story in Gen. 8:8, 12. Later exposition relates the reference in Cant. 2:12 to the Holy Spirit. Philo sees in the dove a symbol of the lógos, the noús, or sophía. The OT finds no place for the idea that the dove is a divine bird but there is perhaps a hint of a connection with the soul in Ps. 84:2-3. Doves are the only birds offered in sacrifice (Lev. 1:14). The dove denotes helplessness in Jer. 48:28 and vacillation in Hos. 7:11. It knows its season in Jer. 8:7, and Israel will return like a flight of pigeons in Hos. 11:11. God will protect his dove in Ps. 74:19, and “my dove” is a term of endearment in Cant. 2:14; 5:2.

C. The Dove in the NT.

1. At the baptism of Jesus the Spirit manifests himself by alighting on Jesus as a dove. This confirms the descent in a powerful symbolic way (cf. the link with the heavenly voice, as in Judaism).

2. Mary offers doves as a sacrifice, thus showing that Jesus belongs to the poor and humble (Lk. 2:24). Sellers of doves are mentioned at the cleansing of the temple; they are either private vendors or official salesmen.

3. The dove symbolizes simplicity in Mt. 10:16. The disciples must meet opposition with the wisdom of serpents, but they still stand under the norm of singleness of eye and purity of heart.

D. The Dove in the Early Church.

1. A combination of biblical references and ancient notions gives the dove rich symbolical power in the early church. The dove is a sign both of the Spirit and of Christ himself (the Logos). The offering of pigeons symbolizes Christ's death. Some heretics take it that the descent of the dove at Christ's baptism shows that only then is there a union of Jesus and Christ.

2. Tertullian contrasts the dove and the serpent in order to show the difference between true Christians and heretics (Against the Valentinians 3). He draws a parallel between the nature and housing of doves and those of the church. The dove is also for him a sign of the Holy Spirit.

3. Clement of Alexandria and Origen call believers doves. In Mart. Pol. 16. 1 the dove that flies out of the martyr symbolizes the Spirit and is also the bird of the soul.

4. Early Christian literature and art depict the dove of peace, of which Noah's dove is a type, since it signals the end of divine wrath.

5. Among the Manichees the white dove symbolizes God's love, and believers are also white doves, but the Son of Man is no more a real man than the dove at the baptism is a real dove. [H. GREEVEN, VI, 63-72]

peritémnō [to circumcise], peritomḗ [circumcision], aperítmētos [uncircumcised]

A. Nonbiblical Use.

1. Attested from the days of Homer, peritémnō means "to cut around," "to make incisions," "to encircle with a view to robbing" (e.g., cattle or lands), and then, as a ritual technical term, "to circumcise."

2. The noun peritomḗ means "circumcision."

3. The adjective aperítmētos means "unmaimed" or "uncircumcised."

B. The OT.

1. Usage.

a. The OT uses the verb exclusively for "to circumcise" in a literal sense.

b. Similarly the noun peritomḗ means "circumcision."

c. The adjective aperítmētos means "uncircumcised," usually in a literal sense for Gentiles, but figuratively in Jer. 9:25.

d. The LXX refers more often to circumcision or uncircumcision than the Hebrew.

e. The usage in Philo and Josephus is the same as that of the LXX.

2. Origin, Meaning, and Distribution of the Rite.

a. Performed mostly on males, circumcision serves as a sacrifice of redemption and as a covenant sign. The former significance may be seen in the OT in Lev. 19:23-24, but the latter predominates. Circumcision at birth is the most common form, but circumcision may also be a puberty rite or a marriage rite.

b. The Arab tribes as well as Israel practice circumcision (Gen. 7:23ff.).

3. The OT Tradition.

a. There is a piece of ancient tradition in Ex. 4:24ff., where circumcision is a rite of redemption. Josh. 5:2, 8-9 also rests on ancient tradition. Here circumcision is associated with "rolling off" from Israel the shame of Egypt, i.e., Egypt's scorn for the uncircumcised.

b. In Gen. 17:1 ff. circumcision is a covenant sign. It applies to all Abraham's descendants but the covenant is especially with Israel.

c. Jeremiah introduces a figurative use when he talks about the circumcision of the heart (4:4) or ears (6:10). For the people circumcision is little more than sacramental magic. It can be justified only when it is referred to the inner person and the essential relationship with God.

C. Judaism.

1. The Hellenistic Roman Period.

a. Under Antiochus IV attempts are made to prohibit circumcision. It thus becomes a national symbol, either of resistance or of victory. John Hyrcanus I (c. 128 B.C.) imposes mass circumcision and Judaizing. Without circumcision, intimate dealings with Jews are impossible. Even the Herod family prefers to forgo a politically advantageous marriage rather than have an uncircumcised son-in-law.

b. The Hellenistic world finds the ceremony indecorous and perverse. Hadrian even compares it to castration. Philo defends it as hygienically necessary and suitable for a priestly people. It combats sensuality and resists the idea that the power of procreation confers divine likeness. Philo does not mention the covenant significance.

c. The Manual of Discipline 5.5 refers to the circumcising of desire and obduracy. The rite is presupposed, but it is less important as such than its figurative understanding.

2. After the Destruction of the Temple.

a. After A.D. 70 Pharisaic Rabbinism triumphs. It stresses the literal aspect and banishes the figurative interpretation from official theology.

b. Under Hadrian the equation of circumcision with castration makes it punishable as murder. This perhaps sparks the Bar-Cochba revolt; after a short period of enforcement it is relaxed by Antoninus in A.D. 138.

c. The Tannaites work out the detailed rules for the rite in the second century.

d. The theological significance of circumcision is that it is a precondition, sign, and seal of participation in the covenant with Abraham, and also a sign of confession. It carries with it the covenant blessings of divine protection in this age and divine joys in the messianic age.

D. Primitive Christianity.

1. Usage.

a. The verb is a cultic term in the NT, used literally in Lk. 1:59; Jn. 7:22; Acts 7:8, and figuratively in Col. 2:11 with reference to baptism.

b. The noun peritomḗ is used in various senses for "circumcision," e.g., the rite in Jn. 7:22-23, the circumcised in Rom. 3:30, circumcised Christians in Acts 11:2; Gal. 2:12, and Christians as the true Israel in Phil. 3:3.

c. The adjective aperítmētos is not used literally in the NT (but cf. Barn. 9.5); it bears a figurative sense in Acts 7:51.

2. The Problem in the Apostolic Period.

a. Circumcision is no problem in the Synoptic tradition. Jesus and his disciples are all circumcised, and while the Baptist implicitly challenges circumcision in Mt. 3:9, Jesus never makes an issue of it.

b. In Jn. 7:22-23 Jesus argues from the lesser (circumcision on the sabbath) to the greater (total healing on the sabbath). The passage shows good knowledge of rabbinic discussions, and in it Jesus accepts the tradition in order to turn it against his opponents.

c. Paul in Rom. 2:28-29 contests the view that physical circumcision alone can bring salvation in this world and the next. He thus follows the line of Jeremiah and the Essenes but without accepting literal circumcision as an essential precondition. For him the only true circumcision is that of the heart which is the Spirit's work and which is identical with redemption by Christ (hence Col. 2:11- 12). It follows, then, that the physical sign is unimportant; what counts is being in Christ. Believers are the real circumcision (Phil. 3:3), so that Gentile Christians need not receive circumcision nor Jewish Christians remove its marks (1 Cor. 7:18- 19). Jewish Christians from Jerusalem challenge this view in Antioch, but Paul stands firm (cf. Gal. 2:3). The council of Acts 15 declines to make circumcision a condition of fellowship, but does not forbid Jewish Christians to continue the ancient practice.

d. Different courses are taken in the early church. In Barn. 9.1ff. the only valid peritomḗ is that of the heart, but Jewish Christians, although excommunicated by the synagogue, remain loyal to their position on physical circumcision.

peiphronéō → kataphronéō

perípsēma [refuse, means of expiation]

A. Meaning outside the NT.

I. Derivation and Development. This word, deriving from peripsáō, "to wipe or rub (off)," means "what is wiped off," i.e., refuse or filth, "what wipes off," e.g., bath towel, and "what expiates or religiously cleanses," e.g., the scapegoat.

II. As an Expiatory Sacrifice among the Greeks. The sense "means of expiation" seems to come from the attributing of disasters to some religious impurity that must be laid on a representative of the people. Associated is the concept of the wrath of a deity that has to be placated by a human offering. Those put to death in order to bring cleansing or healing are pharmakoí. They are normally young and may be prominent persons but may also be paupers or criminals, i.e., the scum of society (cf. the connection with the meaning "refuse" or "offscouring"). The victims have to volunteer, and the mode of death, e.g., drowning, or stoning outside the city, is designed to guarantee the removal of the impurity. The perípsēsma personifies deliverance (cf. Acts 13:47; 1 Cor. 1:30), and as an expiation that saves from cultic impurity the term stands closely related to words signifying cleansing and redemption.

III. The Hellenistic and Hellenistic Jewish Use.

1. Used only twice in OT translation, perísēma is first a weaker term for expiation when money is substituted for a threatened life.

2. A second use is for an unworthy subject either in abuse or self-abasement.

B. The NT. In 1 Cor. 4:13 perípsēma is almost synonymous with perikathármata. It has the double sense of "filth," "offscouring," "rubbish," etc. (as a term of contempt or self-abasement), and of "scapegoat," "expiatory offering," with a strong undertone of scorn. Paul accepts the contempt that is heaped on the apostles by the world, but reinterprets it, for their apparently worthless lives are for the general good. The context shows that behind the term stands the idea of the dregs of society that vicariously suffer death on behalf of all others. Those who are reviled and slandered are a means of blessing and expiation. This thought brings Paul close to the cross (cf. Gal. 6:17; 2 Cor. 4:10-11; 1 Cor. 15:31; Phil. 2:17; Col. 1:24), for it is Christ who is really the (supposed) malefactor who suffers vicarious death, and the apostle, who is the messenger of this atoning act, bears the mark of his crucified Lord.

C. The Apostolic Fathers. The Pauline use influences that of Ignatius with respect to his approaching martyrdom (Ephesians 8.1; 18.1). He goes to death for others, not in replacement of Christ's vicarious work, but to spare them persecution in an offering for God (Romans 2.2). The sense is more diluted and has no theological implications in Barn. 4.9; 6.5, where it has little more than the force of "your humble servant." This use lives on into the Middle Ages. [G. STÄHLIN, VI, 84-93]

Of contested origin, perpereúomai relates to arrogance in speech, being associated with such concepts as loquacity, bluster, bragging, etc. It suggests a literary or rhetorical form of boasting. In 1 Cor. 13:4 it carries such varied nuances as arrogance, pretension, and impotent chatter. Antiquity in general opposes such boasting, but Paul bases its renunciation on the love that makes possible the eschatological life disclosed in faith and hope. Since God has opened up this possibility in Christ, the action of love is presented in personal terms. We do not set aside perpereúesthai by practice etc., as in Stoicism; love itself sets it aside in us when we take this more excellent way. [H. BRAUN, VI, 93-95]

pétra [rock]

A. Secular Greek and the OT.

1. In secular Greek pétra denotes a large “rock,” but also a “cliff” or “rocky mountain chain.” Figuratively it suggests firmness, immovability, and hardness. pétros is more often used for smaller rocks, stones, or pebbles.

2. In the LXX pétra means “rock,” “cliff,” and it occurs as a place name (Judg. 1:36), as a name for God (2 Sam. 22:2), and as a figure for an unbending character (Is. 50:7) or hardened mind (Jer. 5:3).

B. Symbolic Meaning. In the mythical imagery of the Near East the earth comes up out of the sea like a rock or temple. For Judaism the rock is the holy of holies, which is the center of the earth, the stone that stops up the primal flood, and the gate of paradise. Is. 28 makes use of this concept. The old temple can no longer arrest the Assyrian flood, but God will set up a new one. An echo of the same concept may be caught in Mt. 16:18.

C. The NT.

l. The Literal Sense. The sepulchre is hewn out of a rock in Mk. 15:46. People seek shelter in clefts of the rock in Rev. 6:15-16. The earthquake rends the rocks in Mt. 27:51. Some seed falls on a rocky substratum in Lk. 8:6. The house built on a rock, not on sand, will survive wind and flood in Mt. 7:24ff.

2. The Rock Which Followed. Underlying the statement in 1 Cor. 10:4 is the OT miracle of water gushing out of the rock (Ex. 17; Num. 20). This is given typical significance in rabbinic exposition. The legend arises of a fountain that is with the people in the desert. Paul gives this a messianic turn (cf. Jn. 7:37-38). Christ is a spiritual reality, not an actual rock, but the same Christ acts in history in both the old covenant and the new to sustain his people. The “following” denotes his faithfulness both past and present.

3. Rom. 9:33 and 1 Pet. 2:7-8.

a. Rom. 9:33. Because Israel has rejected salvation by faith, Christ has become for her a rock of offense. Paul here conflates Is. 28:16 and 8:14 in versions closer to the Hebrew than to the LXX. Paradoxically the rock of offense replaces the tested and basic cornerstone. The latter becomes a terrible and invincible thing in face of unbelief. Yet it still bears the gracious invitation and promise of Is. 28:16 with its hope for Israel.

b. 1 Pet. 2:7-8. The author of 1 Peter also uses Is. 8:14 but combines it with Ps. 118:22. The joyous word of Ps. 118:22 at the placing of the keystone over the gate takes on a terrible aspect under the influence of Is. 8:14, in contrast here to Is. 28:16, which is addressed specifically to believers (vv. 6-7).

4. Mt. 16:18. The pun in the Greek text assumes an identity of pétra and Pétros which is assured only by the Aramaic. Elsewhere in the NT the individual Christian is always líthos rather than pétra (cf. 1 Pet. 2:5). Strictly only Christ himself is pétra. Peter is pétra only as he is enclosed within the revelation in Christ. If he himself is pétra, it is as Christ has taken him in hand and given him a place in the unique apostolate which is the historical foundation of the church. As Abraham is for the rabbis the rock on which God builds the world, so Peter is the rock on which Christ builds the community of the new covenant.

D. Apostolic Fathers and Apologists. In Barn. 11.5 God is the rock, and in 11.3 God or Christ is the rock that gives water. In Hermas Similitudes 9.2ff. Christ is the rock on which the church is built from stones (believers). The rock on which Polyearp builds is Christ (Ignatius Polycarp 1.1). Justin makes the same equation (Dialogue 113.6; 114.4). The stone knives of Josh. 5:2-3 typify Christ's sayings (Dialogue 24.2). The myth of the rock-birth of Mithras is a pagan imitation of Dan. 2:34 (Dialogue 70.1). [O. CULLMANN, VI, 95-99]

Pétros [Peter], Kēphás [Cephas]

A. Philological Questions. Except in Jn. 1:42, where it is used to elucidate Aram. kēphás, Pétros is used in the NT only as a name for Simon Peter. The Cephas of Gal. 2:11 is obviously the disciple Simon Peter in spite of various attempts to put him among the 70. Symeon, found in the NT only in Acts 15:4, is a common name among the Jews, but the NT mostly adopts the familiar Greek name Simon, which he possibly also bears from the first in addition to Symeon. Kēphás, the Aramaic of which Pétros is the Greek rendering, is not attested as a proper name. It is mostly used in the NT by Paul (Gal. 1:18; 2:9, 11, 14, etc.), who gives the Aramaic a Greek ending in -s. Pétros as a masculine form is preferred when a Greek translation is used (Jn. 1:42). Pétros establishes itself in the NT, where we find either Simon, Peter, or Simon Peter. The translation supports the view that Kēphás is not a proper name, since one does not usually translate proper names.

B. The Person and Place of the Disciple.

1. Biographical Note. Simon, the son of Jona, probably comes from Bethsaida (Jn. 1:44). He is a fisherman who is uneducated by rabbinic and Greek standards (Acts 4:13). He works in partnership with the sons of Zebedee (Lk. 5:10). He later lives in Capernaum, where Jesus visits him. He is married (Mk. 1:29ff.; 1 Cor. 9:5), but accounts of the martyrdom of his wife and children are legendary. He seems to have belonged to the circle of the Baptist's followers (Jn. 1:35ff.).

2. Position. As a disciple, Peter belongs to the inner group around Jesus (Mk. 9:2). He also stands out as a leader (Lk. 5:1ff.). Distinguished by excess of zeal, he tries to come to Jesus on the lake (Mt. 14:28). He acts as spokesman on various occasions (Mt. 18:21; Mk. 8:29ff.). Outsiders come to him (Mt. 17:24), and he goes to prepare the Passover (Lk. 22:8) and is present in the garden (Mk. 14:37). His name stands first in the lists (Mk. 3:16 etc.), and he is sometimes singled out (Mk. 1:36; 16:7). The Synoptists all agree on this, and John recognizes Peter's special position, although displaying a special interest in the beloved disciple (cf. 13:24ff.; 18:16; 20:1ff.; 21).

3. Name-giving. Two problems arise regarding the name Peter, namely, why Jesus always uses Simon, and when the name Peter is given (cf. Mt. 16:18; Mk. 3:16; Jn. 1:42). The name is a nickname in rabbinic style, and is perhaps given earlier and then explained in Mt. 16:18. It cannot refer only to Peter's character but relates to his representative mission as disciple and apostle of Jesus.

C. Peter as the Rock on Which the Church Is Built.

l. The Apostolic Commission apart from Mt. 16:17ff. While Peter does not lead the disciples during the earthly ministry of Jesus, he takes the lead in Jerusalem according to the call of the incarnate Lord and the commission of the risen Lord (Jn. 21:15ff.; 1 Cor. 15:5; Lk. 24:34). Peter is the first eyewitness of the risen

Aram. Aramaic

Lord in 1 Cor. 15:5, and a specific commission is given in Jn. 21. His prior call is thus confirmed by a postresurrection commission whereby he assumes the first leadership in the church.

2. The Saying Mt. 16:17ff

a. The Setting. Although the saying occurs only in Matthew, the story occurs in Mark and Luke as well. Mark's is probably the original version. In a crisp and vivid presentation Mark shows how Jesus provokes the question, receives Peter's reply, enjoins silence, foretells his suffering, and rebukes Peter's protests. Matthew prepares the ground in 14:33, but some scholars think that the saying of 16:17ff. breaks the sequence and may be inserted from some other context (cf. Lk. 22:31-32 or Jn. 21:15ff.).

b. Authenticity. The authenticity has been hotly debated. The linguistic character is Semitic. The pun comes out better in Aramaic, which has kēphâ' both times. One should also note the phrases bar-Jona and "flesh and blood," the strophic rhythm, and the use of rock for foundation. The usual objection is that Jesus would not talk about establishing a church, but it should be recalled that ekklēsía occurs frequently in the LXX and that the messianic task is that of establishing God's people, which is often represented as a house. If it is argued that this building is eschatological, the message of Jesus does not contrast present and future, for the imminent kingdom is present in Jesus himself (Mt. 12:28), and around him he starts establishing God's people with the calling of the 12, whom he then sends out to the lost sheep of Israel. Shepherd, sheep, and flock are all terms associated with the community. The idea of building the temple (Mk. 14:57-58; Jn. 2:19) is also relevant here; the temple not made with hands is the community of faith. Jesus begins building his church in his own ministry, bursts the gates of hell with his death, and gives his people the task of following up the victorious work that he thus initiates. To Peter, the rock, he gives the keys of the kingdom as the mediator of the resurrection. Binding and loosing refer primarily to the remission of sins, although the laying down of precepts may also be included. Jesus himself discharges the primary function of forgiving sins, and he now transmits the same office to Peter, to be shared, of course, with the other disciples (Mt. 18:18).

c. Meaning. By the rock Jesus does not mean the faith of Peter; the parallelism rules this out. Clearly Peter and rock are associated here. Jesus will build his church on the one rock, Peter. Peter is to do a unique work, limited to his own lifetime, on which all future building will be possible. The high-priestly prayer offers a clue to the meaning when it states that future generations will believe through the word of the apostles (Jn. 17:20). The apostles are the foundation (Eph. 1:20; Rev. 21:14) because they bear witness to Christ's death and resurrection. Among the apostles Peter is the first and chief eyewitness.

D. Peter's Leadership and First Missionary Activity.

1. Leadership. Peter assumes leadership in the primitive community in the electing of a twelfth apostle (Acts 1:15), the sermon at Pentecost (2:14), the healing of the lame man (3:1), the defense of the gospel (4:8), the exercise of discipline (5:1ff.), the follow-up in Samaria (8: 14ff.), and missionary work in Lydda etc. (9-10). Paul refers to this role of leadership in Gal. 1:18, although James is by now associated with Peter in it.

2. Missionary Activity. After his imprisonment and liberation (Acts 12:17), Peter leaves Jerusalem, where James takes the lead (cf. Acts 15; Gal. 2:9), and apparently gives himself to missionary work. At the council in Acts 15 his work remains more closely tied to Jerusalem than that of Paul. Paul speaks highly of him even when he has to censure him (Gal. 2:11ff.). His link to Jerusalem probably puts him in a delicate situation which accounts for his vacillation at Antioch. 1 Clem. 5 perhaps alludes to this when it speaks of the burdens that he has to bear through envy.

3. Theology. Part of Peter's problem is that he is very close to Paul theologically. He has learned from Jesus that the gospel is for all peoples. By his death Christ has made atonement for all who believe. In his early preaching he identifies Jesus as the Servant of the Lord (Acts 3:13, 26; 4:27, 30) whose vicarious suffering is seen to be necessary in the light of his resurrection (cf. 1 Peter).

D. Later Missionary Activity and Death. Little is recorded about Peter's missionary work. He is linked to three main centers, Antioch, Corinth, and Rome. The claims that he founded the churches at Antioch and Corinth find no support, but he certainly works in Antioch and a stay at Corinth is possible in view of 1 Cor. 1:12. As regards Rome, a ministry there might be inferred from 1 Pet. 5:1; 2 Pet. 1:14, but it can hardly be prior to Paul's letter to the Romans, although Rom. 15:20-21 perhaps relates the founding of the church in Rome to Jewish Christians, and this would make it possible that Peter has at least visited the church there. The greeting in 1 Pet. 5:14, with its reference to Babylon, suggests a Roman origin for this epistle, and if the witnesses of Rev. 11:3ff. are Peter and Paul this passage supports a Roman martyrdom. 1 Clem. 5 certainly gives substance to a Roman martyrdom, for the circumstances apply only in Rome (cf. also Ignatius Romans 4.3). In the later second century writers like Irenaeus and Tertullian give more precise form to the tradition of a Roman stay and martyrdom, although it is only in the fourth century that we find reference to his discharging of an episcopal function in Rome. Recent excavations have not yet made possible an identification of his grave. [O. CULLMANN, VI, 100-112]

pēgḗ [fountain, spring]

A. Outside the NT.

1. This word means "source of water," i.e., a natural spring. Figuratively it then denotes "tears," and it also finds a more general use for "origin."

2. pēgḗ occurs some 100 times in the LXX for various Hebrew terms, some of which are also rendered by krḗnē, which means a "well" (cf. also phréar). The sources of water mentioned in the OT are usually artificial fountains or wells. The aridity of the country means that there is a need to bore for water and also to conserve it in cisterns. Many springs are mentioned either with or without names, and their importance may be seen from the judgments of Hos. 13ff., the promises of Is. 35:7; 41:18, etc., and the eschatological image of Joel 3:18 (cf. also the use of pēgḗ in Jer. 8:23; Cant. 4:12, 15; Prov. 5:16; 10:11). With God himself is the pēgḗ zōḗs ("the fountain of life") in Ps. 36:9, and God complains that his people have forsaken him, the fountain of living waters, in Jer. 2:13 (cf. 17:13).

3. Philo uses pēgḗ some 150 times, mostly in a transferred sense for "origin" or "cause." When he refers to actual springs, he allegorizes. The divine lógos comes forth from the spring of wisdom, and the grace of God flows from ever living springs, although only for those who thirst after wisdom.

4. Josephus in his use of OT sources mainly follows the original in regard to pēgḗ, sometimes using it synonymously with phréar, sometimes distinguishing the two (cf. Antiquities 1.246 and 8.154).

B. The NT.

1. The only mention of a specific well in the NT is in Jn. 4:6ff. (pēgḗ in v. 6 and phréar in v. 11). This is a true well, not a fountain. Jms. 3:11 has pēgḗ when trying to show how unnatural it is that the same mouth should both bless and curse. In Rev. 8:10 the great star falls on the fountains, rendering the rivers undrinkable even at their source. In Rev. 16:4 the fountains as well as the rivers become blood. In Rev. 14:7 God is the Creator of the fountains of water as well as the seas.

2. The use in Mk. 5:29 is figurative: the flow of blood dries up like a spring. A similar use occurs in 2 Pet. 2:17, which compares false teachers to dried-up springs (cf. Jude 12). In Jn. 4:14 Jesus compares the water that he gives to that which comes from Jacob's well. As well as quenching thirst eternally, this water will become a spring welling up to eternal life. The idea is not that the recipient controls the water, but is brought into eternal life by fellowship with the indwelling Christ. The expression "fountain of [water of] life” is not used here but it occurs in Rev. 21:6 (cf. 7:17; 22:1, 17), where it denotes the consummation that Christ will give at the last day. [W. MICHAELIS, VI, 112-17]

pēlós, denoting a mixture of moisture and dust, has such senses as “morass”, “muck,” “loam,” “clay.” The LXX uses it for “mire” in Ps. 69:14 and “clay” in Jer. 18:6. The use is the same in Philo and Josephus. In Rom. 9:21, adopting a common OT image, Paul stresses God’s sovereignty by comparing God to the potter and us to the clay. In Jn. 9:6, 11, 14-15 pēlós refers to the clay that Jesus makes with spittle and uses to heal the blind man. We do not have here a magical formula, nor, probably, a medical prescription, but there may be a desire to differentiate Jesus from Aesculapius, who advises the use of a similar remedy. The deeper significance of the incident remains.

1. pḗra is the open sack carried on the left hip by a strap over the right shoulder and used by peasants, shepherds, beggars, and wandering philosophers.

2. The word occurs in the LXX only in Judith. Judith has her slave carry a skin of wine, a jug of oil, and a pḗra with food on her way to the Assyrian camp.

3. Josephus introduces pḗra for the kádion of 1 Sam. 17:40, 49, and the rabbis have a similar term for the bag in which they take provisions for journeys.

4. In the NT Mt. 10:10 forbids the disciples to take a pḗra, Lk. 10:4 forbids both purse and pḗra, and Lk. 22:35-36 reverses the ruling. The pḗra here is not the beggar’s sack but a bag for provisions. Jesus is teaching the disciples to rely wholly on God’s provision. They are not disappointed in this regard (Lk. 22:35), but Lk. 22:36 reflects a changed situation.

5. In the apostolic fathers the only use is in Hermas (Visions 5.1; Similitudes 6.2.5) for the shepherd’s bag. Tatian among the apologists has pḗra for the sack carried by the wandering philosopher (Address to the Greeks 25. 1).

→ ballántion [W. MICHAELIS, VI, 119-21]

pikrós [bitter], pikría [bitterness], pikraínō [to embitter], parapikraínō [to embitter], parapikrasmós [rebellion]

pikrós, pikría, pikraínō.

1. pikrós originally means “pointed,” “sharp” (e.g., arrows), then “penetrating” (e.g., a smell), then “painful” (to the feelings), and “bitter” (to the taste). The sense of bitterness yields such transferred senses as “unpleasant,” “unexpected,” “painful,” “severe,” “cruel,” “stern,” “embittered.” pikría has the meaning “severity” or “bitterness,” pikraínō means “to provoke,” and the deponent pikraínomai means “to become angry, bitter.”

2. The LXX uses pikrós literally for “bitter” (Ex. 15:23) and figuratively for “soured” (Ruth 1:20) or “cruel” (Hab. 1:6). In Gen. 27:34 pikrós makes Esau’s voice “shrill” rather than “full of grief.” Death is bitter in 1 Sam. 15:32, and fate is grievous in 2 Macc. 6:7. The adverb pikrṓs is linked with crying in Is.

22:4 but suggests “unrestrained” rather than “bitter” tears. The verb pikraínō is used only figuratively (cf. Job 27:2). The noun occurs some 30 times. It is a place name in Num. 33:9-10, is combined with poison in Dt. 29:19; 32:32, and denotes grief in Sir. 7:11, bitterness in Ps. 10:7, and God’s passing wrath in Is. 28:21, 28.

3. Philo uses pikrós literally with reference to bitter water or springs, but is also familiar with the transferred use. Bondage is bitter in On the Life of Moses 1.247, and pikría heads a list of vices in On Drunkenness 223. Josephus calls the Dead Sea bitter in Jewish War 4.476, but such things as death and bondage are also bitter Antiquities 6. 155; 11.263), and he has pikrō̃s for strong agitation, sharp reproaches, strict inquiry, etc. (cf. Antiquities 3.13; Life of Moses 339; Jewish War 2.41).

4. The NT uses pikrós literally in Jms. 3:11 for spring water which is bitter or brackish to the taste. The great star in Rev. 8:11 makes the rivers and fountains bitter pikraínesthai). In Rev. 10:9-10 the divine finds the message of God bitter, i.e., painful to proclaim. pikrós is used for Peter’s weeping in Mt. 26:75; the adverb expresses his utter despair following the denial. In Jms. 3:14 jealousy is bitter. Heb. 12:15 quotes Dt. 29:17 to show what harm the sin of an individual can do in the community. The OT association of poison and bitterness stands behind Peter’s saying to Simon Magus in Acts 8:23. Rom. 3:14 quotes Ps. 10:7, and pikría heads a short list of vices in Eph. 4:31 (in the sense of resentment). In Col. 3:19 husbands are directed not to be harsh or angry with their wives.

5. In Did. 4.10 masters are not to speak to their slaves in an incensed mood. The word is more common in Hermas in such senses as “ill-humor,” “anger,” etc.

1. These words have not been found prior to the LXX, and are late and rare. The verb occurs some 40 times in the LXX, in part for “to provoke” but also, perhaps originally by an oversight, for “to be recalcitrant.” The noun occurs only once in Ps. 95:8 for the well which is rendered differently in Ex. 17:7; Num. 20:24; Dt. 32:51. Why this term is chosen is not wholly clear, but it is more likely meant in the sense of “rebellion” than of “bitterness.”

2. Heb. 3:8, 15 quotes Ps. 95:8, and then 3:16 uses the verb in a context which obviously shows that the meaning is “to be rebellious,” so that the noun, too, has the sense of “obduracy” or “rebellion.” Like the LXX, the author no doubt catches an echo of the place name in both parapikrasmós and peirasmós (3:8). [W. MICHAELIS, VI, 122-27] pímplēmi [to fill, satisfy], empímplēmi [to fill up, satisfy], plēsmonḗ [satiety, satisfaction] pímplēmi, empímplēmi.

A. Outside the NT.

1. These two terms both occur in Homer but are not common. The simple form means “to fill” or “to satisfy” and occurs in varied contexts (e.g., the eyes with tears or the soul with vices). The compound means “to fill up” (e.g., a vessel). Other uses are for the fulfilling of wishes or the fulfilling of destiny with death.

2. The LXX prefers the compound to the simple form. In over 100 instances the simple form means “to fill,” “to satisfy,” or, of time, “to run out,” “to end.” The compound stands for several Hebrew terms and has many nuances, e.g., “to be filled,” “to be satisfied.” The sense may be either literal or figurative, and there is some ambivalence when the reference is to God’s glory filling the house, for statements to this effect stress both God’s gracious coming and the holiness of God which no one can abide. Temporal fulfilment is denoted only in Is. 65:20. In Ps. 103:5 God brings material satisfaction, but the satisfaction has a spiritual aspect in Ps. 63:5. Sexual satisfaction is meant (figuratively) in Ezek. 16:28-29. God satisfies with his grace in Ps. 90:14. Death is insatiable in Hab. 2:5.

B. The NT.

1.a. The simple form is used spatially for “to fill” in Lk. 5:7; Mt. 22:10; 27:48.

b. It denotes reaction to the words and works of Jesus in Lk. 4:28; 6:11; 5:26.

Similar responses to the apostles’ preaching are denoted in Acts 3:10; 5:17; 13:45; 19:29. Filling by the Spirit occurs only in Luke: first in the infancy stories (Lk. 1:15, 41, 67), and then in Acts with reference to the filling of Christians by the Spirit (Acts 4:8, 31; 13:9). Filling by the Spirit brings the gift of tongues in Acts 2:4. In Acts 9:17 it denotes either becoming a believer, receiving prophetic power, or endowing with apostolic gifts. The usage in Acts combines general Christian endowment with special gifts of the Spirit for preaching etc.

c. In the infancy stories plēsthḗnai denotes the ending of periods, the priest’s course in Lk. 2:21, the period for circumcision in 2:21, pregnancy in 1:57; 2:6.

d. OT prophecies come to fulfilment in Lk. 21:22.

2. Whereas the simple form means always “to fill,” “to fulfill,” the compound in the NT means always “to satisfy,” mostly in the passive. Physical satisfaction is at issue in Jn. 6:12. God satisfies the heart in Acts 14:17. Lk. 1:53 (based on Ps. 107:9) relates to the messianic kingdom when want will be removed. Lk. 6:25 refers to those who are satisfied with material things and who are thus excluded from the kingdom. In Rom. 15:24 Paul wants “to be satisfied with,” i.e., “to enjoy,” the faith and fellowship of the Roman church.

A. Usage outside the Greek Bible.

1. General Use. plēsmonḗ first denotes “fullness” in the sense of physical or spiritual satisfaction, but also “over-fullness,” “satiety,” and “lack of moderation.” A second use is for “that which fills,” e.g., heavy food, and a derived sense is that of a “great number,” “profusion.”

2. Philosophical Use. In philosophy the term mostly denotes “satisfaction” with no necessary element of censure. In Philo it plays a role in the attack on an overestimation of physical needs. Hence it usually means “gluttony”; thus the Therapeutae shun it as the enemy of body and soul (On the Contemplative Life 37).

B. The Greek OT. Used 28 times in the LXX, plēsmonḗ normally has here the sense of “satisfaction” (e.g., by nourishment in Ex. 16:3, 8, with God’s gifts in Dt. 33:23). Yet it may also denote the “satiety” that leads to sin (Hos. 13:6; Is. 65:15). Another usage is for “that which satisfies” (Is. 30:23) and for “fullness” or “profusion” (Jer. 14:22).

C. The NT.

1. In Col. 2:23 the fathers normally equate sárx with sṓma and thus take plēsmonḗ to mean the satisfaction of natural (not sinful) desires. The false teachers do not respect the body and thus deprive it. A more ascetic view taken by some fathers is that to fill the body is to ravage it, or that sárx represents the carnal mind, so that that is said to suffice which fleshly care teaches.

2. Modern interpretations tend to take it that the prós denotes an effect, that sárx is meant in a bad sense, and that plēsmonḗ is also negative. Difficulty arises because of the loose syntactical structure; a possible solution is that ouk en timḗ tini is an independent statement, and that lógon . . . sṓmatos is a subsidiary clause.

3. The context of Col. 2:23 shows that the piety combatted parades an earthly-cosmic glory as distinct from the life that is hid with Christ in God. Precepts that forbid the use of earthly gifts give these undue significance and serve the satisfaction of a selfish desire clothed in the garb of religion. These precepts make a show of wisdom with their promotion of piety, humility, and restraint, but they lack true validity and serve pious self-seeking. [G. DELLING, VI, 128-34][16]

pínō [to drink], póma [drink], pósis [drinking], potón [drinkable], pótos [drinking (party)], potḗrion [drinking vessel], katapínō [to consume], potízō [to cause to drink] pínō.

A. The OT Setting.

1. The Secular Sphere. Drinks to quench thirst are more necessary than food, and as intoxicants they affect personal life more deeply. Water, milk, and wine are the main drinks in Palestine. God shows himself to be the Lord of life by giving or withholding food and drink (cf. the miracles in the wilderness).

2. The Cultus.

a. Abstinence. Fasting includes abstinence from drinking (Ex. 34:28). Abstinence from intoxicating drinks is a special form; cf. the Nazirite vow (Num. 6:2ff.; Judg. 13:13-14). Drinks are unclean only when polluted by contact (Lev. 11:34). The mysteries include abstention from drinks in fasting, e.g., when preparing for initiation. The Neo-Pythagoreans refuse wine for ascetic reasons.

b. A Means of Salvation. As part of the covenant meal drinking effects fellowship with God. In the pagan world cultic meals supposedly bring union with the gods. Drinks are also thought to confer potency, to mediate immortality, and to induce ecstasy. In the mysteries eating and drinking are associated with the rites of dedication and have sacramental power. In Gnosticism drinking is a dualistic counterpart of true drinking, i.e., the appropriation of the true life-giving gift by the soul. Philo gives this a moral turn. Earthly drink serves the corruptible body but the heavenly soul seeks the drink of immortality which is virtue (On the Special Laws 1.304).

II. The Transferred Sense.

l. General. In relation to the ground or to plants, pínō means “to suck in,” “to absorb.” “To drink blood” is a phrase for killing. “To appease desire” and “to accept” what is forced on one are other forms of usage.

2. The OT. Theologically important in the OT are the ideas of a. drinking God’s cup of judgment, in which drinking represents the fact that those smitten by the judgment bring it on themselves by their bemused acts, and b. taking the salvation that is freely offered by divine grace (Is. 55:1).

3. Judaism. In Judaism pínō represents taking that which promises life (cf. Prov. 9:5). The rabbis allegorize the drinking of water as receiving the Spirit or studying the law (cf. the phrase "drinking of the water of a scholar"). In the Odes of Solomon knowledge is an overflowing river that supplies the thirsty (11:6ff.).

B. The NT.

l. Eating and Drinking as Expressions of the Subjection of the World. In 40 of 70 instances in the NT pínein is associated with eating. Eating and drinking are vital functions but as such they may be occasions of sin. Thus those who are content to eat and drink miss the signs of the kingdom (Mt. 24:38; cf. Lk. 14:18ff.; 16:19ff.). Eating and drinking become goals of human striving (Mt. 6:32-33) and objects of anxiety (Mt. 6:31). Security and satisfaction are sought in them (Mt. 6:25). The approach of death simply confirms this attitude (1 Cor. 15:32). Dualism leads to it in another way (1 Cor. 6:13-14). It is a basic expression of paganism (1 Cor. 10:7) but is also a temptation for believers (Mt. 24:49). The frontier between quenching thirst and drunkenness is clearly demarcated only by the community meal (1 Cor. 11:21).

2. Eating and Drinking as Expressions of the Freedom of Jesus and His Disciples. By eating and drinking with grateful joy, Jesus and his disciples show their freedom from the world's subjection and also from false protests against it. The Baptist neither eats nor drinks (Mt. 11:18), and Paul refrains from eating and drinking for a period (Acts 9:9), but Jesus and his disciples both eat and drink (Mt. 11:19; Lk. 5:33), for fasting is not suitable for him who brings God's rule, and those who are God's are the free lords of all things (Mk. 2:28; 1 Cor. 3:21ff.; 1 Tim. 4:4; Tit. 1:15). If we seek God's kingdom, God adds what is needed (Mt. 6:31ff.). Eating and drinking are to God's glory (1 Cor. 10:31ff.). Yet the strong in faith should refrain if offense is caused to weaker brethren (Rom. 14:21), especially when pagan libations are at issue (1 Cor. 10:21-22).

3. Eating and Drinking and Salvation History. For Jesus and his disciples, eating and drinking are signs of the coming age of salvation. Table fellowship with Jesus means participation in the kingdom that is present in him, and it secures a place in the consummating banquet (cf. Mk. 2:18- 19; 14:22ff.). At the Last Supper Jesus hands the cup to his disciples; it represents his vicarious death on their behalf. By handing out bread and wine, Jesus promises that the table fellowship of his earthly ministry will continue, on the basis of his saving work, until it is consummated in the heavenly banquet. Only when the risen Lord eats and drinks with the disciples for a limited period is there renewal of the table fellowship of the days of the incarnation (Lk. 24:30-31; Jn. 21:13). The sacral meal of Acts 2:42 onward is intelligible only on the basis of Easter and Pentecost. It belongs to the age of the church when the Lord is present as he works in his people through the Spirit. As Paul explains it, the eating and drinking are comparable to the manna and water of the age of Moses (1 Cor. 10:3-4), or to the sacrificial flesh and libations of cultic meals (1 Cor. 10: 18ff.), although with no thought of automatic sacramental operation (1 Cor. 10:5ff.). What is involved is encounter with the Lord who offered himself for us. Only if there is partaking in faith, however, does the physical function have the significance of salvation and not of judgment (1 Cor. 11:27ff.). In Jn. 6:26ff. eating and drinking are a spiritual receiving of Christ in his self-offering. In 6:51ff. they are a receiving through partaking of the elements. The statements reflect the vocabulary of Gnosticism and the mysteries, but the reference is to the incarnate, crucified, and ascended Christ who has imparted the Spirit (6:33, 51, 60ff.). Eating and drinking, then, are an encounter with Christ and are to salvation if they express total openness in faith to Christ and his saving work.

4. Figurative Use.

a. Drinking the Cup of Wrath and Suffering. Those who undergo God's judgment drink the cup of wine or of wrath either in the sense of being bemused (Rev. 18:3) or in that of suffering eternal torment (14:10). Drinking the cup of suffering means accepting it (Mk. 10:38-39; Mt. 26:42; Jn. 18:11). This has become a stereotyped phrase in the NT.

b. Drinking the Water of Life. Parallel to eating the bread of life (Jn. 6:35), this phrase (Jn. 4:13-14; 7:37) means receiving Jesus in faith. A Gnostic turn is here given to an OT concept; drinking is to quench the thirst for life. In antithesis to natural drinking, this drinking expresses certain key aspects of faith. Faith receives that which gives life, i.e., Jesus himself, and it results in a corresponding giving forth (Jn. 7:38).

*1. Usage. póma means "drink," "beverage," pósis means the "act of drinking" or "what one drinks," potón means "what is drinkable," and pótos means "drinking bout."

2. Material Use in the NT

a. Legal-Ritual and Ascetic-Dualistic Question. In Heb. 9:10 the OT regulations count only as carnal ordinances for this life. Hence the new covenant sets aside the rules of food and drink. All means of nourishment are pure for the pure in heart (1 Tim. 4:4). No one is to judge regarding food and drink (Col. 2:16). The kingdom of God is not food and drink (Rom. 14:17), although for this very reason the strong in faith must respect the problems of the weak. God's rule unites the heart to God and effects a new creation. Expressing the bodily aspect, food and drink are not indifferent matters (1 Cor. 15:32) but being free from bondage to the form of this world, they are to be practiced in obedience (Rom. 14:21; 1 Cor. 10:31ff.).

b. The Lord's Supper. Israel received spiritual food in the wilderness (1 Cor. 10:2). This is a type of the last time (10:11). Like the water and manna, the eucharistic food and drink are the gift and vehicle of God's saving work in Christ and offer the possibility of life in faith and obedience. They do not magically confer immortality but demand faith and obedience. In Jn. 6 the true food and drink are set in antithesis to the food that can only maintain physical life (6:31-32). This is not Gnostic dualism but represents the biblical opposition to living materialistically. The food and drink here are not the eucharistic bread and wine but Christ himself in his saving action, i.e., his flesh and blood. Only after the NT period do we begin to find a movement in the direction of magic or the mysteries (Justin Apology 1.66).

1. Usage. This word, rare in nonbiblical Greek, means "drinking vessel." In a Palestinian home it is the pitcher (usually an earthen bowl) that stands filled on the table. Only once in Ps. 116:13 is the potḗrion a vessel used in the temple ministry, although the word occurs in lists of temple furnishings in nonbiblical Greek.

2. Literal Use. The NT refers to the everyday cup in Mk. 9:41; 7:4. In Lk. 11:39-40; Mt. 23:25-26 the Pharisees go beyond the law by trying to keep the outside of cups free from impurities, but this is hypocrisy, for the cup is clean only if its contents are not the proceeds of greed and avarice. The demand for purity of heart is graphically associated with the demand that the inside of the cup be clean (Lk. 11:39). Thus an everyday illustration pinpoints the need for inward conversion.

3. Figurative Use.

a. Cup of Wrath. This metaphor, found in Revelation, derives from the OT. God hands a cup to those who are under judgment (Ps. 75:8; Is. 51:17). This cup robs them of their senses so that they stagger and fall. It is a cup of stupefaction (Ezek. 23:33) or staggering (Is. 51:17). The cup in the hands of God signifies his control of destiny. As a cup of wrath it denotes his judicial sway (Ps. 75:7-8). Later Judaism adopts the same comparison. The Passover cups are cups of punishment for the nations but of consolation for Israel. Revelation makes its own use of the OT image. In 17:4 Babylon holds a golden cup full of her abominations (cf. Jer. 51:17). Its contents are the wine of the wrath of her fornication (14:8). Babylon, under God, has power to subdue the nations by force and propaganda (Rev. 13), but the eschatological power of God's wrath may be seen in this power. It gives up to antichrist those who are not in the book of life (13:8), and in due course they are the agents of God's wrath to trample down Babylon herself (17:15ff.). God thus gives Babylon the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath, and at the last judgment all who accepted her rule will also drink of the wine of the wrath of God, i.e., final condemnation (14:10). The wine depicts God's active wrath, and the cup depicts the power of his wrathful judgment, whether in its temporary exercise through historical powers or in its definitive manifestation.

b. Cup of Suffering. When the sons of Zebedee ask for a special place in Christ's kingly rule, the reply of Jesus that refers them to his own cup is an intimation of martyrdom, but the question that he puts to them concerns their readiness to accept it. In Gethsemane he himself prays that the cup may pass from him, but after wrestling in prayer he attains to the readiness that is expressed in Jn. 18:11. The cup is not just cruel fate but divine judgment, so that Jesus‘ shrinking from it is not fear of death but the horror of the Holy One at coming under God's judgment on human sin (Mk. 14:33ff.; Mt. 26:37ff.; Lk. 22:44ff.). On the basis of the cup-sayings of Jesus the cup is a symbol of martyrdom in Mart. Pol. 14.2. The cup of suffering is here decisively defined by Jesus' own drinking of it.

4. The Supper.

a. The Eschatological Saying in Lk. 22:17-18. In Lk. 22:17-18 the saying of Mk. 14:25 is linked to a cup. In Mark the phrase "fruit of the vine" shows that it is originally connected with the blessing of a cup, for this phrase occurs in Jewish thanksgivings when wine is drunk, e.g., at the Passover. In Luke the saying relates to the first Passover cup. It is a declaration that this is Jesus' last meal with his disciples prior to the meal of consummation. Jesus himself does not drink, but hands the cup to the disciples, who drink from it, or fill their own cups from it, in a unity of table fellowship that looks ahead to the meal of consummation.

b. The Interpretative Saying. Since the order and the ritual followed at the Last Supper correspond to Jewish practice, there can be no doubt that the cup and saying derive from Jesus himself and are handed down by the Palestinian church. The interpretative saying in Mk. 14:23; 1 Cor. 11:25; Lk. 22:20 refers to the contents, but cup rather than (red) wine is always the term used. The cup reminds those to whom it is given of the cup in God's hand. He who proffers it is the Mediator of God's work of judgment and salvation. Those who receive it are those in whom God is at work in the grace that saves through judgment. The cup itself is the Passover cup of blessing, but materially a reference to God's cup stands behind it.

c. Cup of the Lord and Cup of Demons (1 Cor. 10). In 1 Cor. 10:16ff. Paul refers to the cup of blessing, but the phrase "which we bless" makes the reference a special one to what we receive from the Lord in and with it. This cup means participation in Christ's blood, i.e., committal to him who died for us. It is the Lord's cup inasmuch as it relates us to his efficacious power. Hence believers cannot drink both this cup and that of demons (10:21). This is not because the eucharist differs from the cultic meals of paganism (Justin Apology 1.66), but because sacrifices not offered to God are dedicated to demons. Those who drink what is publicly or privately (1 Cor. 8:10; 10:27ff.) poured out to pagan deities fall victim to the rule of demons. They thus belong to another dominion than that of Christ. It is because no one can serve two masters (Mt. 6:24) that one cannot drink both the cup of the Lord and that of demons.

katapínō. Literally this word means "to gulp down," "to swallow" (used either of people or of, e.g., the earth). Figuratively it means "to assimilate," "to overwhelm," or "to consume," "to use up." The LXX often uses the term for destruction, whether by the earth (Ex. 15:12), the depths (Ps. 69:15), the enemy (Hos. 8:8), sinners (Ps. 35:25), or God (Job 8:18). In the absolute it denotes the extinction of human wisdom (Ps. 107:27). Philo refers to the swallowing up of the soul of the foolish by the body or to Balaam being engulfed by the river of folly (On the Giants 13; On the Unchangeableness of God 181). The NT follows the OT in various ways, combining the literal and figurative senses to suggest hostile destruction by superhuman forces. Thus we find overpowering by darkness or the devil in 1 Pet. 5:8, by hopeless remorse in 2 Cor. 7:9-10, or by God's work of judgment in the case of that which is hostile to him in Heb. 11:29; Rev. 12:6; 2 Cor. 5:4; 1 Cor. 15:54. The Egyptians are swallowed up by the sea in Heb. 11:29, the earth swallows up the river in Rev. 12:6, death is swallowed up by life in 2 Cor. 5:4, and death is swallowed up in victory in 1 Cor. 15:54. Only in the proverbial saying in Mt. 23:24 does the use differ. Here a comparison shows how foolish is the way in which the Pharisees struggle against transgression of the smallest statutes but easily accept nonobservance of the great commandments.

potízō. This word means "to cause or give to drink." In the OT God's potízein points to his continuing glory as Creator (Ps. 104:11, 13) and also to his work of salvation and wrath (Pss. 78:15; 60:3). The NT renews the ancient demand that the thirsty should be given drink but on a christological basis (Mk. 9:41; Mt. 25:35; Rom. 12:20). Various motives are seen for giving Jesus to drink on the cross (Mk. 15:36; Jn. 19:29). In 1 Cor. 3:2, 6ff. giving basic instruction in the community is like giving children milk to drink or watering a plant. In Rev. 14:8 Babylon makes the nations drink the wine of her fornication. Drinking of the one Spirit in 1 Cor. 12:13 carries a eucharistic reference. [L. GOPPELT, VI, 135-60]

pipráskō [to sell]

In secular Greek pipráskō means literally "to sell," "to sell for a bribe," or "to lease," and figuratively "betrayed," "sold out," "led astray," or "ruined." The NT also uses pipráskō literally for "to sell" (Mt. 13:46; 18:25; Acts 2:45, etc.), and the figurative sense appears in Rom. 7:14 to describe the desperate plight of the person "sold under sin." [H. PREISKER, VI, 160]

píptō [to fall], ptṓma [fall], ptṓsis [fall], ekpíptō [to fall away], katapíptō [to fall down], parapíptō [to go astray], paráptōma [to commit a fault], peripíptō [to encounter] píptō.

A. Outside the NT.

1. The basic meaning of píptō is "to fall (down)," "to plunge down." From this develop such senses as "to throw oneself down," "to fall (in battle)," "to perish," "to be lost," "to collapse," "to pass away." Moral delinquency is not at issue, but in the papyri a legal sense develops, "to fall under," i.e., "to be counted under."

2. píptō occurs over 400 times in the LXX and has the same range of meaning as outside the Bible except that we do not find the legal sense. A hint of the loss of salvation is found only in Prov. 11:28 and Sirach, although the loss suffered as a punishment is more likely misfortune.

3. Philo uses píptō for the sin of the noús or psychḗ but not in the sense "to sin." Josephus uses the term literally for the collapse of buildings, the falling of animals to the ground, the falling of snow, falling down before a ruler, and falling in battle.

B. The NT.

I. Literal Use.

1. General.

a. Common in the NT, píptō mostly has a literal sense. It first denotes unintentional falls, e.g., the collapse of walls (Heb. 11:30), houses (Mt. 7:25), or cities (Rev. 16:19); cf. the fall of Babylon (Rev. 14:8; 18:2) as a sign of divine judgment.

b. Another use is for the fall of a stone (Lk. 20:18), the falling of cliffs or hills (Lk. 23:30; Rev. 6:16), or the falling of crumbs (Mt. 15:27) or of seed (Mt. 13:4ff.).

c. A further use is for the falling of stars (Mt. 24:29).

d. Birds fall in Mt. 10:29, while humans may also fall unintentionally (Acts 20:9; Mt. 15:14), and they collapse when suddenly stricken by death (Acts 5:5, 10). On the borders of a figurative use, píptō means "to fall" in the sense "to die," "to be killed" (Lk. 21:24).

2. píptō and proskynéō. In most instances literal falling down is intentional, either in obeisance to a master (Mt. 18:26) or, with proskynéō, in connection with the worship of deity (Mt. 4:9; Acts 10:25; 1 Cor. 14:25; Rom. 4:10), or alone, in face of Jesus, to emphasize a petition, to express gratitude, or to show respect (Mk. 5:22; Lk. 17:16; Jn. 11:32). Jesus himself adopts this attitude in prayer (Mt. 26:39).

II. Figurative Use.

1. General. Acts 1:26 adopts the common idea of the lot falling on someone; the idea arose because the lot was originally shaken out of a container. When darkness or fear is said to fall on someone (Acts 13:11; Rev. 11:11), the term suggests a sudden and irresistible happening. The meaning in Lk. 16:17 is "to become null."

2. Falling as Becoming Guilty. Although píptō in the NT does not mean "to fall" in the sense of committing a specific sin, the NT deepens its use in relation to sin. Thus in Lk. 20:18 falling on the stone involves rejection of Christ's person and claim, in Rom. 11:11 falling means abandonment by God in guilt, and in Rom. 11:22 falling is identical to guilt. píptō may also be used for loss of faith and separation from grace (1 Cor. 10:12). At issue here is an apostasy from God or Christ which means disqualification (1 Cor. 9:27). In Rom. 14:4 standing and falling are oriented to the fact that each must answer to the Lord as Judge. The use is absolute in Heb. 4:11; a specific sin is not in view but apostasy. In Rev. 2:5 leaving the first love is the point. In 1 Cor. 13:8 love does not fall in the sense that it does not pass away, unless the idea is that it cannot be defeated, or indeed that it will never resist God's claim (cf. vv. 4ff.).

ptṓma. This word means "fall," "plunge," "collapse," "ruin," "corpse," "defeat," and, in the papyri, "windfall." It is used in the LXX for the collapse of a wall, the overturning of a chariot, falling in battle, overthrow, and carcass (Judg. 14:8). Philo uses it for "fall," "tumble," "corpse." The only NT meaning is "dead body"—of an animal in Mt. 24:28, of humans in Mt. 14:12 (the Baptist); Rev. 11:8-9 (the two witnesses); some versions of Mk. 15:45 (Jesus).

ptṓsis. This word, meaning "fall," is more common in the LXX than ptṓma in such senses as the fall of a tree (Ezek. 31:13), falling in battle (Nah. 3:3), and overthrow as a judgment. Josephus uses it for the fall from a roof in Antiquities 17.71. In the NT the "collapse" of a house is the point in Mt. 7:27, while "downfall" is meant in Lk. 2:34, i.e., the fate of those to whom Christ is an offense.

ekpíptō. This word means "to fall out of or down from," "to make a sortie," "to go forth," "to deviate or digress," "to be cast ashore," "to be expelled," "to be omitted,'" "to stretch," and "to let slip." It is mostly literal in the LXX for various Hebrew terms; thus it denotes an ax flying from the haft, a chopper slipping from the hand, a star falling from heaven, trees or horns that fall, flowers that fade, and figuratively commands going forth or people who hope in dreams going away empty. Josephus uses it for "to be expelled" and also "to escape." The range of meaning is very great in the ten NT instances. For the literal use one may turn to 1 Pet. 1:24 and Jms. 1:11 (based on Is. 40:7), as well as to Acts 12:7 (the chains falling off). The sense may be literal in Acts 17:32 as well, although, since the boat is already in the water, the idea is probably that of letting it float off, not letting it fall. The sense "to lose" occurs in 2 Pet. 3:17 (with some sense of falling away). "To lose" is also the sense in Gal. 5:4. "To be in vain" is the point in Rom. 9:6: the promise of God to Israel has not failed.

katapíptō. This word means literally "to fall down" (buildings etc.), but it also means "to fall into" (disloyalty etc.), and as a perfect participle it means "lowly." An interesting use in the LXX is for "to succumb" (to oppression, 3 Macc. 2:20). Josephus uses it in a phrase denoting "losing heart" (Antiquities 2.336). Only Luke has the word in the literal sense; cf. "to fall down" (Acts 26:14), "to fall down dead" (28:6). The seed in Lk. 8:6 falls on the rock.

A. The Group outside the NT.

1. The verb has such senses as "to fall beside (or aside)," "to stumble on something," "to be led aside or past," "to be mistaken." The noun means "slip" or "error."

2. In the LXX the verb means "to be in vain" in Esth. 6:10, "to err" in Wis. 6:9, and "to win" in Wis. 12:2; Ezek. 14:13; 15:8; 18:24. The noun generally means a "fault" in the LXX, mostly individual sins before God. The group plays little role in Philo, and Josephus uses only the verb in the general sense "to befall" (Antiquities 13.362).

B. The Group in the NT.

1. The verb occurs only in Heb. 6:6, where it means "to commit a fault" rather than "to fall away" but with no specific reference (cf. 10:26).

2. The noun occurs in Mt. 6:14-15; Mk. 11:25. Faults against others are at issue in Mt. 6:14, and against God in v. 15. The repetition brings out the severity of faults against others. The general use in Mk. 11:25 does not specify against whom we offend; offenses against others are also offenses against God. Paul often uses the noun. He has it for Adam's sin in Rom. 5:15, 17 and for the totality of sin in Rom. 5:20 (in distinction from parábasis as the transgression of commandments). A similar use occurs in Gal. 6:1, and in Rom. 11:11-12 the paráptōma of Israel consists of its rejection of the gospel.

C. The Group in the Apostolic Fathers. The usage in the apostolic fathers follows that of the NT (cf. 1 Clem. 51.1; Barn. 19.4).

peripíptō. This word means "to come on something by chance," "to be innocently involved in something," "to be overturned"; the noun is used for a "mishap" or "accident." Philo uses the verb for "to fall into" and also "to fall culpably." In Josephus we find the senses "to meet," "to overtake," "to be involved in (danger, misfortune, etc.)," "to fall into the hands," "to fall on one's sword." In Lk. 10:30 the meaning is not so much "to come upon the robbers unawares" as "to fall into their hands unexpectedly." In Acts 27:41 the idea is that of being brought somewhere by chance or unexpectedly. Running into trials unexpectedly is also what is meant in Jms. 1:2. In the apostolic fathers subjection to torments is the point in 1 Clem. 51.2, and the noun means "misfortunes" in 1.1. [W. MICHAELIS, VI, 161-73]

pisteúō [to believe, trust], pístis [faith, trust], pistós [faithful, trusting], pistóō [to make someone trust], ápistos [faithless, unbelieving], apistéō [to disbelieve, be unfaithful], apistía [unfaithfulness, unbelief], oligópistos [of little faith], oligopistía [littleness of faith]

A. Greek Usage.

I. Classical.

---

v. verse

1. pistós, which is attested first, means a. “trusting” (also with the nuance of “obedient”) and b. “trustworthy,” i.e., faithful, reliable.

2. ápistos means a. “distrustful” and b. “untrustworthy,” “unreliable.”

3. pístis has the sense of a. “confidence,” “certainty,” “trust,” then b. “trustworthiness,” and c. “guarantee” or “assurance” in the sense of a pledge or oath with the two nuances of “trustworthiness” and “proof.”

4. pisteúō means “to trust” (also “to obey”), “to believe” (words), and in the passive “to enjoy confidence” (cf. the later sense “to confide in”).

5. apisteúō usually means “to be distrustful” or “not to believe” (words).

6. apistía means “untrustworthiness,” “unreliability,” also “distrust.”

7. pistóō means “to make someone a pistós,” i.e., a person bound by a pledge or contract, and hence reliable. Another sense is to make a person one who trusts.

8. The words in pist- do not become religious terms in classical Greek. Faithfulness to a compact is a religious duty, fidelity is related to piety, and one may trust a deity, but pistós does not refer to a basic relationship with God. At most one finds only reliance on deities and trust in deities or their utterances.

II. Hellenistic.

1. Philosophical Discussion. In the debate with skepticism, philosophy comes to talk about belief in the gods and its distinctive certainty, which is given by the deity and is related to piety and general belief in the incorporeal. Conduct is affected by such belief, which carries with it belief in the soul’s immortality, membership in the divine world, and final judgment.

2. Religious Propaganda. Religious propaganda demands belief in the deities that are proclaimed. The Hermetic writings reflect this terminology, as do the Odes of Solomon, the papyri, the magical texts, and Celsus.

3. Stoic Usage. In older Stoicism pístis (“trust”) is fitting for the sage. In later Stoicism pístis means “faithfulness” as solidity of character. As God is pistós, so we should be. Primarily faithfulness to self, pístis makes possible faithfulness to others. pístis is religious, not as denoting relationship with deity, but in an actualizing of the relationship. [R. BULTMANN, VI, 174-82]

B. The OT Concept.

I. General Remarks. In the OT a theocentric view prevails. Hence faith is the human reaction to God’s primary action. At first faith is collective, and a wealth of usage appears only when individuals break free from the collective bond. The prophets give a new creative impulse to the vocabulary and imagery of faith. The greatest expansion takes place in the Psalms. Faith and fear are closely related in the OT; although contradictory, they shade into one another, and together they express the living tension and polar dynamic of the OT relationship to God. They occur more or less equally. Among the relevant stems, ’mn (pisteúein) comes only fourth statistically but is perhaps more important qualitatively. In each case the religious use has secular roots.

II. The Stem ’mn and Related Expressions.

1. Qal. In the qal the stem is used of the mothers, nurses, or attendants of children with the associated ideas of carrying and educating.

2. Niphal. The range is broader in this usage, the translation “firm,” “reliable,” “secure” being only an approximation. Thus we find the ideas of permanence, devastating effect, correspondence with the facts, and specificity. In the two last instances it is not just a matter of logical connection but of living experience as well. When used of people, e.g., servants, witnesses, messengers, or prophets, what is conveyed is truthfulness, perceptiveness, retentiveness of memory, understanding, and the ability to portray. The qualities vary; the point of intersection is the relationship between the qualities required and those actually present. Religiously, many aspects of God can be comprised under the stem. In Dt. 7:9 the "faithful" God keeps covenant with those who love and obey him. In Is. 49:7 faithfulness is shown in the election of Israel. In 1 Kgs. 8:26; Is. 55:3, etc. God's word comes into force either as promise or threat. The stem may also describe God's commandments or works (Pss. 19:7; 111:7). The material definition depends on the aspect in view, but always present is the thought of that which makes God God. When used of believers the term expresses the attitude to God that is in keeping with God's claim. Totality of disposition, not just a single action, is at issue.

3. When the stem takes the form of a verbal adjective, we are pointed in the same direction (cf. 1 Kgs. 1:36; Num. 5:22; Jer. 28:6; Neh. 8:6; Ps. 41:13). The concept embraces a twofold relation: recognition and acknowledgment of the connection between claim and reality, and the connection between the validity of the claim and its practical consequences for those who accept it.

4. Hiphil. The LXX renders the hiphil 45 times by pisteúein, five by empisteúein, and once each by katapisteúein and peíthesthai. The meaning is acknowledgment with all the consequences for both object and subject. Expressed is recognition both of the objective relation of object to reality and of the subjective relation of the believer to the object. Believing a report means taking cognizance of it, accepting its truth, and acting accordingly (Gen. 45:26; Ex. 4:1; 1 Kgs. 10:7, etc.). Trusting in vassals, friends, etc. means recognizing the claims inherent in the terms and the validity of the claims for those who trust (cf. 1 Sam. 27:12; Mic. 7:5; Prov. 26:25; Job 4:18). Behind the word that is believed stands the person who is trusted. As regards God, the first sense is that of saying Amen to God, i.e., acknowledging the relation into which he has entered with us, and setting oneself in that relation. Even when faith is required, God's initiative is thus presupposed. In content the orientation is to the aspect at issue, obedience relating to command, trust and worship to the promise (Dt. 9:23; Gen. 15:6). Yet the totality may also be in view. Thus on God's side his power, love, steadfastness, righteousness, choosing, and demanding might all be covered, namely, everything that makes him God, so that in a covenant context unbelief is tantamount to apostasy. On the human side, faith involves knowledge, will, and feeling, with an element of fear as well, in an attitude of extensive and intensive commitment that embraces the totality of external conduct and inner life. Only with the relation to the OT God is this kind of attitude even a possibility. As Isaiah sees it on the basis of his own experience (6:1 ff.), faith in this form, related to the idea of a remnant and a fellowship of faith, stands opposed to political considerations (7:1ff.), earthly security (28:14ff.), and trust in human might (30:15ff.), as a form of existence of those who are bound to God alone and find in this their strength (30:15), their being established (7:9). Such faith makes both autonomy and idolatry impossible; it also removes all fear of human power (7:1ff.).

5. ʾmn and Derivatives. The stress that Isaiah laid on the word and concept was never lost. We thus see an expansion of the meaning of all the relevant stems to embrace the relationship with God and the whole attitude of a life lived in faith (cf. Hab. 2:4; Jer. 7:28). Also expressed is the idea of the absoluteness and exclusiveness of true religion related to the true God.

6. The Religious Dymamic. The covenant, with its idea of the faithfulness of God, seems to have supplied the dynamic for this development. If there is little specific connection of faith with the covenant (cf. Neh. 10:1), its strong link with the relationship to God makes this apparent (Ex. 4:8-9; Num. 14:11; Dt. 1:32; 2 Kgs. 17:14; Ps. 78:22).

III. The Stem bṭḥ.

1. The State of Security. This stem first expresses the idea of being in a state of security with either an objective or a subjective emphasis (Judg. 18:7; Is. 32:9ff.). A state rather than a relation is the point. The idea of trust arises only through the thought of basing one's security on someone or something, e.g., work, power, righteousness, riches, chariots, wickedness (usually with a negative judgment). Along these lines, the term may be used without a qualm for trust in idols (Is. 42:17), which the prophets, of course, roundly condemn.

2. Assurance. The sense of security yields the more subjective thought of assurance with a strong assimilation to 'mn. This is especially so in Deuteronomy, Psalms, and Proverbs. In a weaker sense the term may denote the attitude of prayer (Pss. 91:2; 84:12; 25:2, etc.).

3. Comparison. As compared with 'mn, this development involves a shift in basic sense which is due to the growth of monotheistic faith, the influence of the prophets, the religious situation of the exile, the sense of being thrown back on God alone, and the rise of religious individualism. The influence of Isaiah is especially important (cf. Is. 30:15).

IV. The Stem ḥṣh.

1. Seeking Refuge. This stem undergoes a similar development. What is presupposed is the need of help or protection with a stress on the act of seeking.

2. Relation to God. The original sense is apparent when help is sought in God, but more weakly, in liturgical use, the whole relation to God may be covered.

V. The stems qwh, yḥl, ḥkh.

1. Basic Meaning. These three stems for hoping or waiting are often equivalent and undergo the same development in relation to faith. The basic sense is that of tautness or tenseness, and what may be expressed is lying in wait, waiting in vain, or lying in a state of painful expectation.

2. Religious Use. Religiously the terms express collectively the hope of salvation (Jer. 8:15) and individually the hope of being heard (Ps. 119:81) or helped. God's word and grace are hoped for, and God himself, but mostly along with some concrete expectation (Prov. 20:22). The hope of God's manifestation leads on to the later eschatological hope of a visible establishment of the divine rule.

3. Isaiah. In Is. 8:17 (cf. 2 Kgs. 6:33) waiting is a faith which endures in spite of divine judgment and wrath. This waiting is a faith that does not yet see but still believes. The tension is that of a venture of faith in a desperate external situation. Here is not the weak and resigned hope of a perhaps, but the energetic hope of a nevertheless that arises out of wrestling through to final assurance. The position is much the same in Is. 40:31, which refers the people to the wisdom and power of the hidden God (v. 27). Here hoping in God is a new form of life and energy that makes the impossible possible. The whole of the ensuing prophecy (including ch. 53) is proof of the victorious might of the energy of a faith that is inward master of life's most serious afflictions because it has its roots in the transcendent world.

4. Later References. The Psalms especially use stems of hope in this broader and deeper sense for the whole relationship with God (cf. 42:5, 11; 43:5; 130:5-6). Ps. 119 shows how the various tributaries flow into the one main stream of trust in God—the trust which characterizes the prayers of the righteous.

VI. Summary. In light of the whole development in the OT, one sees that the LXX and NT are right to relate pisteúein primarily to the stem 'mn, which may be quantitatively secondary but is qualitatively so preeminent that it absorbs the other terms, partly because of its formal character, partly because it is closest to the unique relation between God and Israel, and partly because the prophets give it a creative profundity that promotes inner triumph over the catastrophes of history and the afflictions of individual life. Faith in the OT expresses the being and life of the people of God in a vital divine relationship that spans the whole of this form of life and involves a certainty that releases new energies. [A. WEISER, VI, 182-96]

C. Faith in Judaism.

I. The OT Legacy. OT faith corresponds to Gk. pisteúein inasmuch as both involve trust in persons and belief in words (including God and his word). The OT term, however, carries a stronger element of acknowledgment and obedience. Thus the divine commandments can be objects of faith (Dt. 9:23), and believing God is acknowledging him as such in a unity of trust, hope, fear, and obedience. This faith has its ground in God's past actions, and has its own relation to the past in the form of faithfulness. But it also relates to the future as an assurance that God will do what he has promised, and to the present as obedience to the commands in demonstration of covenant faithfulness. In the OT faith always bears an essential relationship to the people, individuals being its subjects only as members of the people. As distinct from NT faith, this faith does not plainly cover the problem of death, still leaves some scope for an appeal to piety, and is so fulfilled in history that it is not a radical attitude of desecularization like the peace with God (Rom. 5:1) which is independent of national history and individual destiny in this world.

II. Faith in Judaism.

1. OT Motifs. All the motifs of OT faith appear in Judaism, but with a tendency in the rabbis to put an emphasis on obedience to the law, and a heavier stress on faithfulness in the Apocrypha and pseudepigrapha. Along with trust in God, believing that things are true (e.g., God's word and promises) is inherent in faith. While faith is usually defined by adding the object, the absolute use may also be found. The righteous are the faithful, and they are also believers as distinct from the ungodly or pagans.

2. The Difference from the OT. The main difference from the OT is that faith is no longer to the same degree either faithfulness to God's acts in history or trust in his future acts. It is much more strongly obedience to the law, the role of the present being merely to mediate canonized tradition. In its orientation to divine acts, faith is more one-sidedly either a belief in miracles or a general belief in providence, while hope looks ahead to supernataral events in which salvation is for the righteous and judgment means an individual retribution that is based on fulfilment or nonfulfilment of the divine commands, so that works tend to stand alongside faith, and faith itself may even be viewed as a merit.

III. Philo's Concept of Faith. For Philo faith is primarily belief in the one God and trust in his providence. Its real point is a turning from the transient world to the eternal God. This is a disposition of the soul rather than a response to the word. The influence of Platonism and Stoicism may be seen at these points. The relation to the people and its history is snapped, faith is oriented to pure being, which is finally accessible only to ecstasy, and in the last resort faith seems to be more a relation to the self than it is to God.

D. The pístis Group in the NT.

I. Formal Considerations.

1. pisteúō. Formally in the NT, as in Greek usage, pisteúō denotes reliance, trust, and belief. We find similar constructions to those in the Greek world. Semitic usage produces some new ones, e.g., with epí plus the dative or accusative, or with en. Distinctive is the use of pisteúein with eis, which has the new and strong sense of "believing in" and arises in the context of the church's mission. Another fairly common sense of pisteúein is "to entrust or commit oneself" (cf. Lk. 16:11; Jn. 2:24; also in the passive).

2. pístis. As in Greek, this word means "faithfulness" and more commonly (religious) "trust" or "faith," usually in the absolute, but with eis, prós, epí, en, and also with an objective genitive.

3. pistós. This word may mean either "faithful" or "trusting." The former sense is usually secular, and no special religious meaning attaches when the reference is to service of God (1 Cor. 4:2 etc.). The situation is different when we read of the loyalty of faith (Rev. 2:10) or of the faithful witness (2:13), but when preaching is pistós the idea is simply that it is reliable (and cf. the use in relation to God or Christ, 1

Cor. 10:13; 2 Cor. 1:18; 2 Tim. 2:13). When the idea is "trusting," pistós bears the religious sense of "believing."

*4. pistóō. This word occurs in the NT only in the passive at 2 Tim. 3:14 in the sense "to be made believing (certain)" (cf. 1 Clem. 42:3). In 1 Clem. 15:4, however, the sense is "to remain faithful to...."

*5. ápistos. This might mean "faithless" in Lk. 12:46, but the more likely sense is "unbelieving" (cf. more generally Mk. 9:19). In Acts 26:8 the meaning is "unworthy of credence."

*6. apistéō. This verb means "to be unfaithful" in Rom. 3:3, "not to believe" in Lk. 24:11, and more technically "to refuse to believe" in Mk. 16:16.

*7. apistía. This word means "unfaithfulness" in Rom. 3:3; Heb. 3:12 (closely related to disobedience; cf. Heb. 3:19), "unbelief" in Mk. 6:6, "unbelief" in words in Mk. 16:14, and "unbelief" regarding the Christian message in Rom. 11:20.

*8. oligópistos. This word derives from Judaism and occurs only in the Synoptists (Mt. 6:30; 8:26; 14:31; 16:8). oligopistía is a variant in Mt. 17:20.

II. General Christian Usage.

1. Continuation of the OT and Jewish Tradition.

a. pisteúō as "to believe." In the NT the group becomes a leading one to denote the relationship with God, partly on the OT basis and partly in connection with the Christian mission and its call for faith as a turning to God. The verb is often used for believing God's word, e.g., Scripture (Jn. 2:22), the prophets (Acts 26:27), Moses (Jn. 5:46-47), or what God says through an angel (Lk. 1:20) or the Baptist (Mk. 11:31). Along these lines the NT says that the people should believe Jesus and his words (Jn. 3:34; 5:38).

b. pisteúō as "to obey." Heb. 11 stresses that to believe is to obey, as in the OT. Paul in Rom. 1:8. 1 Th. 1:8 (cf. Rom. 15:18. 16:19) shows, too, that believing means obeying. He speaks about the obedience of faith in Rom. 1:5, and cf. 10:3; 2 Cor. 9:13.

c. pisteúō as "to trust." This sense is prominent where OT influence is strong, as in Heb. 11, and cf. Mk. 5:36; Acts 3:16; 14:9. A connection with prayer emerges in Mk. 11:22ff.; Jms. 1:6. Paul describes Abraham's faith as trust in God's miracle-working power (Rom. 4:17ff.; cf. also 9:33; 10:11).

d. pisteúō as "to hope." The relation between faith and hope is clear in Rom. 4:18 and Heb. 11:13. When hope is directed to what is invisible, it entails trust. Only faith, not sense, can perceive the heavenly reality and grasp the promised future (Heb. 11:1). When pístis is specifically faith in Christ, hope is mentioned separately, but such hope contains an element of believing confidence (1 Th. 1:3; 1 Cor. 13:13; 1 Pet. 1:21).

e. Faithfulness. The OT sense of "faithfulness" finds echoes in Heb. 12:1; 13:7; 2 Tim. 4:7; Rev. 2:13; Heb. 11:17; Jms. 1:2-3. This is the point for Paul, too, when he refers negatively to the apistía ("unfaithfulness") of Israel in Rom. 3:3. In 1 Cor. 16:13, however, pístis is the faith to which one should be faithful.

2. Specifically Christian Usage.

a. pístis as Acceptance of the Message. Especially when used with eis, pístis is saving acceptance of Christ's work as proclaimed in the gospel. This includes believing, obeying, trusting, hoping, and being faithful, but it is primarily faith in Christ. For Gentiles, it means conversion to the one God who has brought salvation in and through his Son.

b. The Content of Faith. Paul states the content of faith in Rom. 10:9. It involves acknowledgment of the risen Christ. Faith in Christ means faith in his resurrection, and his resurrection implies his prior death for sin (1 Cor. 15:11; cf. Rom. 4:24; 1 Th. 4:14; Phil. 2:6ff.). Kerygma and faith always go together (cf. Acts 2:22ff.), and the reference is always to Christ and what he has done (cf. Jn. 20:31; 16:27; 14:10; 8:24; Rom. 6:8).

c. Faith as Personal Relation to Christ. Believing eis Christ involves a personal relation similar to the relation to God in the OT, although the NT tends to use different constructions for believing in God and in Christ. Acceptance of the gospel is acceptance of Christ as Lord, for Christ and salvation history cannot be severed. Faith accepts the existence of Christ and its significance for the believer. It rests on the message, but as faith in the message it is faith in the person whom the message mediates. The personal aspect comes out in Rom. 10:9, 14; Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:29; 1 Pet. 1:8.

d. Believing. Faith may be acceptance of the message, as in Acts 20:21, or it may be continuation in believing, as in 1 Cor. 2:5. Since believing is dynamic, it may be weak or strong (Rom. 12:3; 14:1), it may grow (2 Cor. 10:15), it may endure (Col. 1:23), and there may also be references to its fullness (Acts 6:5), practice (1 Th. 1:3), and unity (Eph. 4:13).

e. The Faith. Paul can call the message itself pístis. As such, pístis is a principle, e.g., in contrast to law (Rom. 3:31; cf. 3:27: the law of faith). Along these lines pístis is Christianity either as being a Christian or as the Christian message or teaching (cf. Gal. 6:10; 1:23). Acts 6:7 and Eph. 4:5 offer similar uses, and cf. 1 Tim. 3:9; 4:1, 6. Orthodox doctrine is pístis in Jude 3, 20 and 2 Pet. 1:1. The phrases in 1 Tim. 1:2, 4; 2:7; Tit. 1:1, 4; 3:5 are to the same effect.

f. Development of the Use of pisteúō. The verb follows much the same pattern as the noun. It usually means "to receive the message," but it may also denote "to be believing," and the participles can have the same force as pistós, which is equivalent to "Christian."

3. Christian Faith and OT Faith. Faith in the NT is the same as faith in the OT inasmuch as it is belief in God's word, but with the difference that God's deed is now disclosed only in the word. The OT righteous believe in God on the basis of manifested acts, but NT believers believe in God in and with the act of the life, death, and resurrection of Christ as this is known only by gospel proclamation. God's act is here the word, for Jesus is himself God's word. Faith, then, is trust in God's eschatological act in Christ and hope for the consummation of the work that God has thus begun. In the interim it is trust that God will not let believers be confounded but that as they are dead with Christ, so they will be kept until they are also raised with him. Insofar as faith is faithfulness, it is faithfulness to God's saving act in Christ, to the one name in which is salvation (Acts 4:12). The obedience of faith is obedience to the way of salvation in Christ, which includes, of course, turning aside from sin. In every dimension it means a radical reorientation to God that governs all life. Hence faith is the Christian religion and believers are Christians. Yet the stress on Christ is a stress on God, for faith in Christ is faith in God's act in Christ. God meets believers (only) in Christ, in whom all God's fullness dwells. Christ is God's final act embracing already its future and definitive manifestation.

III. pístis and pisteúō in Paul.

1. Paul and the Common Christian Concept.

a. Acceptance of the Message. For Paul faith is primarily, not a disposition, but an acceptance of the message related to confession (Rom. 10:9). Faith is a historical, not a psychological, possibility (Gal. 3:25ff.). The event of salvation history is actualized in baptism; faith makes it the believer's. As belief in what the message proclaims, faith recognizes its personal validity. It entails obedience as acceptance of the divine act of both grace and judgment at the cross, which brings understanding both of God and of self, i.e., of the grace of God and of the self under grace. Trust and hope arise within this new understanding.

b. Ways of Believing. Since faith involves confession and obedience, it is a state as well as an act. One can have it (Rom. 14:22), be in it (2 Cor. 13:5), and stand in it (1 Cor. 16:13; cf. 1 Th. 3:8; Rom. 5:2). Yet standing in faith is not static, for faith is under assault and has to establish itself (cf. Rom. 11:20). There are degrees of faith (1 Th. 3:10; 2 Cor. 10:15). A weak faith (Rom. 14:1-2) is related to defective knowledge of right conduct (cf. 14:2, 23). Action must be from faith (Rom. 14:23) according to the measure that each enjoys (12:3). There is a work of faith (1 Th. 1:3); it works by love (Gal. 5:6). This work stands in contrast to the works of the law.

2. The Contrast with Judaism.

a. Faith and the Works of the Law. To express the new relation to God, Paul links salvation strictly to faith. Salvation means righteousness, but righteousness is given to faith, not to works. Faith need not be supplemented by works but is a committal to God and his grace. This committal, of course, is an act of will, but one in which a person is and does not merely do. Faith is the manner of life of those who now live in Christ (Gal. 2:19-20). As a negation of self-will, faith is the supreme act, and as such it is the opposite of works in every sense. It is correlative to grace, which stands in antithesis to works that merit payment. Paul does not oppose the content of works but the manner of their fulfilment. Works do not avail when they are a basis of boasting, i.e., of a claim on God, as in pagan as well as Jewish thinking. What Paul rejects is the attitude of self-assurance before God, or the attempt to attain it. Faith is the true obedience made possible by God’s gracious act in Christ.

b. Eschatological Faith. As the surrender of the natural man, determining all conduct, faith is an eschatological attitude made possible by God’s eschatological act, i.e., the attitude of the new man. Being in faith, like being in grace or in Christ, means being a new creature (2 Cor. 5:17). The age of grace has ended that of law (Rom. 6:14). The last time has come with faith (Gal. 3:23ff.).

3. Pauline Faith and Gnosticism.

a. Orientation to the Future. As an eschatological attitude, faith is not itself fulfilment. Believers are in conflict (Phil. 3:12ff.). It is provisional, like all historical being. It actualizes eschatological being in temporality. Referred back to God’s act in Christ, it is also referred forward to the consummation (Rom. 6:8). The past act of God controls the future; hence hope stands alongside faith (cf. 1 Th. 4:14). Faith abides (1 Cor. 13:13), but the present life in faith, not including sight, is provisional (2 Cor. 5:7).

b. Faith and Fear. Since grace is not an infused power, but meets us as the grace of judgment and forgiveness, it never lets us escape the concrete conditions of life. Faith removes the stress of trying to win salvation, but the divine imperative remains, and fear is appropriate as the sense that we do not stand on our own feet and must be careful not to fall in either frivolity or pride (cf. Phil. 2:12; Rom. 11:20). With the confidence of 2 Cor. 3:4 and the boldness of hope of 3:12, Paul knows the fear of the Lord in 5:11, namely, the sense of standing before God (2:17; 4:2).

c. Faith and Historical Existence. Existence in faith is existence in a not yet as well as a no longer (Phil. 3:12ff.). Faith’s resolve has abandoned self-confidence but must be sustained by renewal, by a constant forgetting of what is behind. Abandoning self-confidence means renunciation of the urge to possess and committal to grace; there is possession only in Christ.

IV. pisteúō in John.

1. As Acceptance of the Message. The noun pístis occurs only in 1 Jn. 5:4, but the verb is common in John, and often denotes acceptance of the message, whether with hóti clauses, with eis, or in the absolute.

2. With eis and the Dative. In John believing Jesus or his words is believing in him, for proclaimer and proclaimed are the same as the proclaimed himself meets and speaks with us. The act of God is word, and Jesus is this word-act (Jn. 1:1). Believing in Jesus is the same as coming to him, receiving him, or loving him (1:12; 5:43; 8:42).

3. Faith and Salvation. Faith in the word that Jesus proclaims, and that proclaims Jesus, brings salvation (3:18; 5:24). The word for salvation in John is life. What the world calls life is not life; the world is in error (8:44ff.). The world would believe Jesus if he would speak its language and show it a sign, but his sayings and signs are clear only to believers (16:25, 29). If he spoke the truth in the world's way, it would no longer be the truth.

4. Faith as Renunciation of the World. The world does not know true life or salvation, and must renounce itself in a turning to what is not seen (Jn. 20:29). People cannot believe when they seek honor from one another in a bid for security (5:44), or when they only want bread that will assure them of bodily life (ch. 6). Faith itself is not a worldly action; it has its roots in the other world as God's gift or act. One must be of God to hear God's voice (8:47). This characterizes faith as a miracle, an act of desecularizing. Believers are no longer of the world (15:19). The world, too, views God as an object of faith, but it cannot accept the incarnation of the Word (1:14) with its radical concept of desecularizing, not as human soaring up to another world, but by God's free, eschatological act which means judgment for the world but also salvation by revelation and faith. The invisible becomes visible in a way that offends the world (6:42; 7:27; 5:17ff.; 8:28, 58). The divine desecularizing is not a flight from the world but a reversal of the world's values, a turning of believers from evil (17:15), a breaking of the force of the world as a historical entity in which everyone has a share by conduct. Revelation challenges this world and is thus an offense to it. In contrast, faith accepts the divine desecularizing and banishes autonomous human power by grasping the revelation of the word.

5. Johannine Faith and Pauline Faith. The inner unity of John and Paul is plain. For neither is faith a good work. For both, however, it is an act with the character of obedience. For both it means renunciation of one's own power or self-achieved righteousness.

6. Johannine Faith and Gnosticism. In John, as distinct from Paul, the antithesis is not the Jewish striving for righteousness but the universal worldliness that this represents. The specific antithesis in John is the Christian form of this worldliness, i.e., Gnosticism. John uses Gnostic terms when he speaks about being taken out of the world or passing from death to life, but in the setting of the gospel he turns these phrases against Gnosticism. The believer has life only in faith and not as a possession. Seeing Christ's glory differs from ecstasy, for it comes by seeing the incarnate Lord. Direct vision lies ahead (17:24). Believers are not taken out of the world; they are still exposed to its assaults (17:15; 15:18ff.). Faith cannot break free from the word; it has life only as faith in the word in which alone God's revelation is present.

7. Faith and Knowledge. Faith does not set us in a desecularized state. It must abide in the word (8:31), which in turn abides in believers (15:4ff.). Knowledge of the truth comes with abiding (8:32). Knowledge is no rival to faith. The two have the same objects. Each may precede the other, so that they are not just initial and final stages. Knowledge is the knowledge of faith, unlike the mutual knowledge of Father and Son. Only when earthly existence ends will vision replace knowing faith. Then Christ's glory will be seen directly and not under the concealment of the flesh (17:24).

8. Faith and Love. If believers can overcome the world only by faith (1 Jn. 5:4), they can demonstrate desecularizing by their conduct as they keep the commandments of Jesus in an obedience and steadfastness of faith (2:3-4; 3:22). The content of the divine commandments corresponds to the unity of faith and love. Faith sees in Jesus the revealer of divine love (Jn. 3:16). Love is engendered by the receiving of this love (15:11ff.) and abiding in it (15:1ff.; cf. also 1 Jn. 2:5, 9ff.; 3:10-11;4:7ff.). Believers are known to be the disciples of Jesus by their love for one another (Jn. 13:35). [R. BULTMANN, VI, 197-228] planáō [to go astray, lead astray], planáomai [to be deceived, misled], apoplanáō [to mislead], apoplanáomai (to be misled], plánē [wandering, seduction], plános [leading astray], planḗtēs [wanderer], plánēs [wanderer]

A. Classical and Hellenistic Use of the Group.

I. Literal Usage. The idea behind the group is that of "going astray." Wandering is usually denoted, but the group may also be used for the pulsing of the blood through the body and the journeys of merchants. We find wanderers in tragedy, e.g., Io and Oedipus. In the case of Io the lack of a goal has an inner effect in a combination of geographical and spiritual wandering.

II. Transferred Usage.

1. The Verb in Epistemological and Ethical Statements. In a figurative sense the group denotes absence of a goal. Reasons are not always given, but when they are these are more often epistemological than religious.

a. planáō and apoplanáō can mean "to lead astray" or "to deceive," whether through conduct, speech, or writing. The labyrinth leads astray geographically but obscurity of reality or concepts does so in theoretical or ethical matters. A common Stoic and Neo-Platonic proverb refers to the deceived deceiver.

b. planáomai and apoplanáomai denote "vacillation" or "irregularity" in speech, action, or conduct. Digression, or making untrue or contradictory statements, may be at issue in speech. Usually "aberration" in judgment is the point, with doubt or hesitation implied. No censure is involved but a summons is issued to right perception and action.

2. Religious and Metaphysical Error.

a. Characters in tragedy are sometimes led into tragic error. Sent by the gods, this aberration leads to an appointed end (cf. Io and Oedipus).

b. Plato refers to the vacillation of the soul when the bodily senses lead it to what is transitory. The wise are saved from this entanglement by turning aside from the world of the senses to that of the ideas. The aberration may thus be a necessary detour on the way to true knowledge.

c. In Plutarch, wandering plays a similar role in the search of Isis, which initiates imitate cultically.

3. The Nouns and Adjectives.

a. plánē means "vacillation," "error," with the same range of meanings as the verb. The active sense of "deceit" is rare, and error does not have to imply guilt (the term may even denote an excursus that promotes truth), although confusion is the basis of wickedness in Plato.

b. planḗtēs means "unstable."

c. plános as an adjective has both the passive sense of "unstable" and the active sense of "seducing."

d. plános as a noun has various senses, e.g., a poetic "digression," the "vacillation" that the soul leaves behind when it renounces sense perception, the "confusion" of comedy, and, with a personal reference, the "conjurer."

B. The Word Group in the LXX.

I. Literal Usage.

a. planáō means "to confuse," "to lead astray," "to cause to stagger." One is not to lead the blind astray (Dt. 27:18). Staggering through wine is primarily literal, but with a hint of spiritual vacillation.

b. planáomai means "to wander" or "stagger about," e.g., on journeys, in flight, or in judgment. Wandering may be in affliction (Sir. 29:18), and staggering may result from wine (Job 12:25). In the eschaton there will be no more wandering (Is. 35:8). Animals also stray, e.g., the ox (Ex. 23:4), sheep (Dt. 22:1), and young ravens (Job 38:41).

c. planḗtēs is used for the “restless wanderer” (cf. God’s judgment on Israel in Hos. 9:17).

d. planḗtis occurs for Job’s wife in 2:9.

e. The other terms are used only in a transferred sense.

II. Transferred Usage.

a. planáō seldom denotes secular deceiving. Religious seduction, which leads to idolatry, is the work of false prophets and unfaithful rulers (Dt. 13:6; 2 Kgs. 21:9) or of false gods (Hos. 8:6; Am. 2:4). Israel is the object, signs etc. are used (Dt. 13:2-3), and bribes may be the motive (Is. 3:12). God himself may lead astray, e.g., the Gentiles in Job 12:23, the mighty in Job 12:24, lying prophets in Ezek. 14:9, and the people in Is. 63:17.

b. planáomai offers a similar usage. Thus Israel strays like sheep in Is. 53:6. If there is little censure in this verse, aberration is usually condemned as wandering from God or transgressing his will (Ezek. 14:11; Ps. 119:110). In the case of Gentiles, this wandering means idolatry (Is. 46:5, 8). In general the LXX uses the whole group in a strong rejection of false prophecy.

c. apoplanáō may denote secular deceiving but it may also denote leading into idolatry (2 Chr. 21:11) or offending against God’s will (Prov. 7:21). plánē as “error” or “seduction” is a general term for Israel’s disobedience or idolatry (Ezek. 33:10; Jer. 23:17), or for that of the Gentiles, or for individual sins (Prov. 14:8). plános denotes religious error, i.e., idolatry (Jer. 23:32), or the sin of weakness (Job 19:4).

d. Significant in the LXX is the negative judgment expressed in the group, first relative to Israel, then to the Gentiles. Erring is not due to metaphysical dualism but to refusing to hear and obey God. Judgment threatens aberration (Is. 46:8); salvation brings freedom from it (Is. 35:8). Only apocryphal references offer traces of dualism (Sir. 11:16 [variant reading]; Wis. 2:21).

C. Apocalyptic and Hellenistic Mystical Literature.

I. Philo. Philo uses the group both literally and in various senses, e.g., for “imprecision” in speech, “aberration” of sensory perception, “errant vacillation” of the mind, “spiritual aberration” as deviation from the straight path, orientation to the external, contempt for allegorizing, or star worship. Philo’s main concern is for aberration in the knowledge of God, which is culpable. Moral defects and idolatry are not so prominent. Sensory perception is inadequate if God is to be known. Aberration is not so much disobedience as bondage to the sensory world.

II. Dualistic Eschatological Use.

1. Seduction by Powers. While apocalyptic and mystical writings often use the group in the classical way, a special thought is that of seduction by spiritual forces, e.g., angels, Azazel, Beliar, unclean demons, evil spirits, the angel of darkness, Satan, the planets, the ungodly aeons, etc. Seduction involves transgression of the law, especially in licentiousness. Alternatively, it means confusion through lack of wisdom. Hopeless entanglement in chaos is one aspect of the soul’s wandering; this is presented as a cosmic destiny.

2. The Dualistic Background. Aberration takes place against the background and in the context of metaphysical dualism, e.g., that of light and darkness, truth and error, the world of sense and that of spirit, or mind and chaos.

3. The Eschatological Use.

a. The last things bring confusion, i.e., rumor, terror, and idolatry. Deceivers abound. False prophets seduce by means of winning speech, promises of miracles, and apparent signs. There is only a weak echo of this theme in the rabbis.

b. The last things also end error as the wicked spirits are punished and the Gentiles come to see that idolatry is transgression. Again, the rabbis offer only traces of such ideas, which are formally parallel to the Stoic concept of restoration and Hermetic hopes for the end of aberration.

D. The Word Group in the NT.

I. Literal and Semiliteral Use.

1. Combining in various ways the different uses, the NT employs planáomai literally in Heb. 11:38, which refers to those who lose a permanent dwelling for God's sake, thus displaying true faith.

2. Borrowing from the LXX, Mt. 18:12 speaks about the "straying" of a sheep (it is "lost" in Luke's depiction). The passage carries an allusion to backsliders. The straying is culpable but is ended by the mission of Jesus.

3. The same OT metaphor occurs in 1 Pet. 2:25 (cf. Is. 53:6). Christians have ceased to stray and come back to the Shepherd. The state of straying is here less pitiable and more culpable than in Is. 53.

II. Transferred Use.

1. OT and Later Jewish Use. In the NT the categories of error are mostly religious. Thus in Rom. 1:27 the deifying of the creature constitutes the error. Immorality is denoted in Tit. 3:3 and 2 Pet. 2:18. The backsliding of believers is the issue in Heb. 3:10 and Heb. 5:2. In Jms. 5:19-20 the one who wanders from the truth is a sinner. In Mk. 12:24, 27 and Mt. 22:29 the Sadducees err when they deny the resurrection, whether through ignorance of Scripture or of the power of God. In this incident the antithesis between a spiritual and a materialistic view of the resurrection, and the type of argument, correspond to rabbinic discussion and exegesis.

2. The Stoic Use of mḗ planásthe. The warning mḗ planásthe in 1 Cor. 6:9; Gal. 6:7,; Jms. 1:16; 1 Cor. 15:33 has formal roots in the Stoic diatribe. It almost serves as an interjection or transition. In 1 Cor. 6:9 it precedes a list of vices, in Gal. 6:7 it introduces a warning against mocking God, in Jms. 1:16 it contests the idea that good gifts might not come from God, and in 1 Cor. 15:33 it warns against contesting the resurrection or against the resultant immorality. Popular sayings are adduced in Gal. 6:7 and 1 Cor. 15:33.

3. The Dualistic Use.

a. In Eph. 4:14 plánē, as the opposite of growth by pursuit of the truth in love, is marked by craftiness and fickleness. A dualism of error and truth may be seen here.

b. A similar dualism occurs in 1 John, where plánē is the opposite of truth as the divine reality, and planṓntes are either false teachers or those who echo their words by denying sin (1:8-9) or the incarnation (4:2ff.). Ultimately the error is practical (4:6). The false teachers are human but the power of the kósmos, the diábolos, or the pneúma tḗs plánēs lies behind them (4:4; 3:8; 4:6). Having the Spirit and knowing the truth (2:20ff.), believers are proof against the error. The seducing forces have apocalyptic stature (2:18) but have taken the historical form of false teachers.

4. The Eschatological Use.

a. Later Jewish apocalyptic lies behind Mk. 13:5ff. and Mt. 24:4ff., where there are warnings against the false christs or prophets who will come with seductive promises, offer signs, and lead many astray, tempting even the elect. New elements as compared to Jewish models are that the deceivers appeal to Christ (Mk. 13:5), come in his name rather than their own (Mk. 13:6), and seek to lead members of the community away from Christ.

b. Using the same Jewish basis, Revelation presents the seducing powers in more strongly mythical garb and sees them trying to seduce the world rather than believers. The seducer is the dragon, the serpent, the devil, or Satan (12:9), who has fallen from heaven, is chained for a time, is released, and is then destroyed (12:9; 20:3ff.). The second beast is also a seducer, i.e., a seducing prophet who accompanies the first beast, or antichrist. Babylon, too, is a seducing power in 18:23. These forces persecute the community rather than seducing it; their seduction is aimed at the world and leads it into fornication and idolatry (18:3; 13:14-15) by means of false miracles (cf. 13:14) and sorcery (18:23).

c. The phrase "strong delusion" in 2 Th. 2:11, which sums up the phenomena listed in vv. 3-10, unites the apocalyptic motifs, but the context now is the delay in the parousia and the punishment of unbelievers.

5. The Rationalizing and Moralizing Use.

a. In 2 Th. 2:11 the seducers of the last time are false teachers of the present age and eschatological apostasy is backsliding into error.

b. In 1 Tim. 4:1 and related passages apostate teachers who follow seducing spirits and are deceived deceivers (2 Tim. 2:13) lead their followers into immorality, hypocrisy, sorcery, avarice, and Gnostic spiritualism (1 Tim. 4:2; 3:13; 6:10; 4:3ff.).

c. In describing false teachers Revelation compares them to Jezebel (2:20), and Jude and 2 Peter refer to Balaam (Jude 11; 2 Pet. 2:15). They are "wandering stars" in Jude 13; this brings out their demonic quality.

6. The Apostles and Christ as Deceivers. The apostles are regarded by their opponents as deceivers (2 Cor. 6:8), but Paul firmly denies that his appeal springs from error or deception (1 Th. 2:3). When the rulers refer to the report of the resurrection as the "last deception," they imply that all Christ's work and teaching are a fraud and that he himself is an impostor (Mt. 27:63; cf. Jn. 7:12, 47).

7. Summary. The references to charges that Christ and the apostles are deceivers show that the church has not appropriated the group to its own exclusive use, e.g., in opposition to the rabbinic view of the law or the Jewish striving for legal righteousness. At first the NT preserves the Jewish and apocalyptic content of the group and only gradually does it combine it with the Christ event. Everywhere the NT, like the LXX, stresses the culpability of error. God's eschatological work in Christ overcomes this culpable straying, whether in the form of the pre-Christian state or of the seduction and error that threaten believers.

E. Early Church Usage.

1. The Apostolic Fathers.

a. New Material Combinations. In the apostolic fathers individual branches of meaning tend to lose their individuality and extended use produces new material combinations. Thus demons practice seduction in Justin Dialogue 7 etc., the Jews are in error in Barn. 2.9, error is the opposite of reason in Justin Dialogue 3.3, prayer is made for those who go astray in 1 Clem. 59.4, they are commended to the care of the presbyters in Pol. 6. 1, the warning not to err is a warning to cleave to the church and the bishop in Ignatius Ephesians 5.2, and the straying of the soul is a rejection of asceticism in 2 Clem. 15.1.

b. New Linguistic Combinations. Along with the new material combinations we find new synonyms for the group which link it with the fall in Diog. 12.3, with offenses (Mk. 4:17) or nonabiding (cf. Jn. 15:7) in Hermas Mandates 10.1.5, and with believing myths in 2 Clem. 13.3.

2. The Later Period.

a. In the apocryphal Acts the group is set in a more consistently dualistic context and Jesus is presented as the liberator from error. He is a companion in the land of error and he destroys deception even though he is himself called a deceiver.

b. In the Pistis Sophia Jesus turns the powers in the reverse direction so that they are deceived or deluded and can no longer exert their influence. The NT hint of a deluding of rulers (1 Cor. 2:8) is here developed into the concept of a cosmological process.

c. Athanasius in his 39th Festal Letter, quoting Mt. 22:29 and 2 Cor. 11:3, speaks about self-deception, deception, and deceiving with reference to the true scope of the canon, i.e., in a warning against heterodoxy concerning the sources of revelation.

plássō [to fashion, form], plásma [figure, fabrication], plastós [formed, fabricated] plássō, plásma.

A. The Greek World.

1. The Verb. plássō and plássomai originally relate to the art or craft of "fashioning." They are rarely used of the activity of divine beings, though Hephaistos is said to have fashioned Pandora. Prometheus is later the one who fashions human and other living creatures. The chief deity does not concern itself with plássein but gives human beings their reason or soul. Created gods see to the fashioning of bodies, and nature does the fashioning in Aristotle. In other writers plássein is used for the training of the body or even its care.

2. The Noun. The word plásma has such varied senses as "figure," "forgery," and (literary) "style." It is commonly used for the products of artists or artisans. In magic it is the figure that is made of a person on whom magic is to be exerted. In the Hellenistic period it may denote the body in antithesis to the psyché̄.

B. Judaism.

I. The LXX.

1. The Verb.

a. In the active, God is the subject of the verb 36 times. He forms human and animal beings (Gen. 2:7-8, 19). The righteous confess that he formed them (Job 10:9; Ps. 139:5). He formed the eyes (Ps. 94:9), the breath (Prov. 24:12), the spirit (Zech. 12:1), and the heart (Ps. 33:15). He also formed the earth (Is. 45:18), all things (Jer. 51:19), and summer and spring (Ps. 74:17). He fashions in the election, guidance, and liberation of Israel, both collectively (Is. 43:1) and individually (Jer. 1:5). The use of the verb displays his absolute sovereignty (Job 10:8-9; Ps. 95:5). He can call a prophet or play with Leviathan (Jer. 1:5; Ps. 104:26). He brings salvation and inflicts chastisement (Is. 45:18; Hab. 1:12). He alone understands (Ps. 33:15), perceives (94:9), and revives (2 Macc. 7:23). He alone must teach (Ps. 119:73). Distinctive points are that God's fashioning is historical as well as natural and that it refers to the body as well as the heart or spirit, i.e., to the human totality with no dualistic distinctions.

b. The LXX never speaks neutrally of human plássein. The shaping done by the potter either serves to denote God's sovereignty (Is. 29:16) or is mentioned in attacks on idolatry (Wis. 15:8ff.). In Ps. 94:20 plássein denotes the harmful action of the unjust judge. The middle in 1 Kgs. 12:33 has to do with the arbitrary rearrangements of the feasts by Jeroboam. God is the implied subject of the passive in Job 34:15 and Ps. 139:16.

2. The Noun. The LXX uses plásma only six times, e.g., for the human figure in Ps. 103:14, for animals as God's created work in Job 40:19, and for the potter's work in Is. 29:16, especially the idol in Hab. 2:18. Stressed are God's sovereignty over his works in Job 40:19; Is. 29:16, and his pity for them in Ps. 103:14.

II. Philo.

1. plássō. Only God is the subject of plássein in Philo. It is he who fashions the human species and the human form, although Philo distinguishes between earthly humanity and humanity in the divine likeness, and uses different words for God's fashioning of them. In the middle, Philo uses the term for human inventions in the religious and legal fields. Dualism is pronounced in the passive use (cf. the allegorizing of Ex. 31:2ff.). As in the Greek world, but not the LXX, the passive can also denote "pretense" or "falsity" of word or attitude.

2. plásma. The noun has the same nuances as the verb. Mostly it denotes a “fabrication,” e.g., in combination with mýthos, as for the world conflagration of Stoicism or the Egyptian worship of the bull. As regards his dualism, Philo does not let this interfere with his monotheism by attributing plássein to an inferior deity, but it has a marked effect on his anthropology.

III. Hellenistic and Rabbinic Judaism. Judaism accepts the fact that God sovereignly fashions humanity. Rabbinic exegesis makes some play with the two verbs of Gen. 1:27 and 2:7. It also discusses the role of God in relation to the two impulses and the question what earth God used in human creation, e.g., earth from the later site of the altar, or from the four corners of the world.

C. The NT.

1. Paul uses the LXX image of the potter in Rom. 9:20 to stress God’s sovereignty. The words refer in the first instance to the potter, but the true subject is God. In Is. 45:9-10 the divine sovereignty brings salvation, but here it means both mercy and judgment with no possibility of appeal.

2. In 1 Tim. 2:13 Adam is said to be formed first, then Eve (cf. 1 Cor. 11:8). The LXX does not actually use the verb in relation to Eve, but Philo and Josephus do. The principle invoked is that the older ranks first; on this ground women are not to teach or have authority over men.

3. The NT does not use the group for God’s saving action in history or for his new and spiritual creation, but there is in it no element of dualism, as in Philo.

D. Later Christian Usage.

1. The Verb. The LXX influences later Christian use of the verb more than the NT. Features of this use are praise of the Maker (Barn. 2.10), recognition of his benefits (Diog. 10.2), fear of him (Barn. 19.2), and taking his work as a model for doing works of righteousness (1 Clem. 33.8).

2. The Noun. Creation in Gen. 1:27 is now seen as a pointer to spiritual renewal by the remission of sins (Barn. 6.12).

plastós. Literally this word means “formed” or “formable.” In dualistic works it has the sense of “merely physical.” Figuratively it means “fabricated” or “forged.” In 2 Pet. 2:3 the plastoí lógoi are the claims and teachings of false teachers, which are both speculative and immoral. These lógoi are plastoí because they lack seriousness and reflect an ethically spurious attitude. [H. BRAUN, VI, 254-62]

→ dēmiourgós, hetoimázō, theós, katergázomai, ktízō, poiéō

pleonázō [to increase, abound], hyperpleonázō [to superabound]

A. Outside the NT.

1. The pléon in this word first means “too much,” with, ethically, a note of censure. Gradually it also takes on the sense of “much.” Various things can be too much, e.g., parts of the body, status, or wealth. hyperpleonázō, which is very rare, is simply a more intensive form.

2. In ethics the term denotes the opposite of the golden mean. Excess stands opposed to reason or nature (cf. passions in Stoicism). In Philo, as in Stoicism, what is excessive is to be condemned and controlled.

3. In the LXX we find such senses as “to be over,” “to have in excess,” “to do too much,” “to become great,” “to increase.” The meaning in the transitive is “to make great.” Giving the mouth free rein for evil is the point in Ps. 50:19.

B. The NT.

1. Apart from 2 Pet. 1:8 the words are found only in Paul. They occur only in the intransitive and with abstract subjects, usually in the sense “to increase,” “to superabound,” and sometimes in an eschatological context.

2. In Rom. 5:20 pleonázō denotes the effect of the giving of the law, namely, that transgression superabounds and thus displays, not its irrationality as in Stoicism, but its ungodly reality and hence the depth of the human plight. In contrast, the grace of God abounds all the more to offset human wickedness, although this is no reason for continuing in sin. Paul’s own work has the increasing extension of grace as its goal (2 Cor. 4: 13ff.), for the grace of God has been rich beyond all measure to him (1 Tim. 1:13; cf. Gal. 1: 13ff.).

3. If the word has a superlative sense when used of grace, it has the comparative sense of “increasing” when used of love (cf. 1 Th. 3:12; 2 Th. 1:3), with fullness as the goal. In 2 Pet. 1:8 fruit will result when the preceding qualities abound. In Phil. 4:17 Paul, in thanking the church for its gift, states that he wants fruit that will abound to their account.

4. In 2 Cor. 8:15 Paul establishes a principle of equality by liberality (quoting Ex. 16:18). Those who receive much are not to have more but to impart freely to those who have received little. [G. DELLING, VI, 262-66]

pleonéktēs [covetous (person)], pleonektéō [to covet], pleonexía [covetousness]

A. The Greek Sphere. This group has the meanings a. “having more,” b. “receiving more,” and c. “wanting more,” with a reference to power etc. as well as property. In ethics we find an extension of meaning to “outdoing others,” “being superior,” “taking precedence,” “excelling,” or “forging ahead” (at others’ expense). In other developments we find such senses as “taking advantage,” “taking by force,” “violating” (e.g., laws), “greedily desiring” things, and “asserting oneself.” In Aristotle pleonexía means “covetousness.” Antiquity, with its basic ideal of relative equality, tries in different ways to limit excess. It posits the principle of moderation, links this to justice, and thinks covetousness damages the self as well as others, since it is a grasping for more than is ordained for us. There is no pleonexía in the divine world, and the checking of wants is a valuable antidote against it. Philosophy teaches the wise to avoid covetousness, and for this reason it should be taught to women as well as men. It is better to suffer wrong than to take advantage of others. Covetousness and avarice figure prominently in lists of vices, and avaritia plays a big part in popular Latin philosophy.

B. Jewish Greek Literature.

1. In the LXX the group is used for “ (unlawful) gain.” Striving for unlawful wealth leads to violence (Jer. 22:17). Ps. 119:36 asks that the heart be inclined to God’s testimonies and not to gain. The powerful disregard others’ rights in their lust for possessions (2 Macc. 4:50), but wisdom brings riches (Wis. 10:11).

2. The group is more common in other translations than the LXX, and always in the bad sense of material advantage and dishonest gain (e.g., usury and bribery).

3. In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs the group denotes covetousness or taking advantage.

4. The words also have a negative sense in Philo, being used for covetousness, immoderation, violence, violation of human orders, etc.

5. In Pseudo-Phocylides various admonitions bear on the question, e.g., not to cling to money, to give each his own, and to avoid oppressing the poor or receiving stolen property. Love of money is said to be the mother of all evil.

C. The NT.

1. In the NT, where the group occurs mainly in Paul, taking material advantage is the sense everywhere except in 2 Cor. 2:11. Lk. 12:15 warns against increasing material possessions as a means of security. In 1 Th. 4:6 believers are not to wrong other believers; the reference is not to business, nor to the matter of v. 4, but to disputes, which God will decide. In Eph. 4:19 immorality seems to be specifically in view. The pleonéktēs is an idolater according to Eph. 5:3 (cf. Mt. 6:24), for covetousness means subjection to an alien power. The community is thus to shun the pleonéktēs along with the idolater, reviler, etc. (1 Cor. 5:10-11). The robber is also included here (cf. 6:10), probably because the pleonéktēs seizes more by cunning than by force; a sexual sense is unlikely.

2. In 2 Pet. 2:3 false teachers exploit believers for greed (either for money or for power). They are practiced in covetousness (v. 14). Paul himself seems to have had to face a charge of seeking self-enrichment; he defends himself against this in 1 Th. 2:5 and again in 2 Cor. 7:2. In the latter verse a figurative sense is possible (he has kept back nothing), but in the context the reference seems to be similar to that of the question in 12:17-18 (cf. the implied suspicion in 8:20).

3. Corinthian charges perhaps underlie the choice of words in 2 Cor. 9:5, where the point is that the gift, as a gift of love and not of calculation, should be a blessing.

4. In 2 Cor. 2:11 the meaning is "to overpower" or "take advantage of." Satan takes advantage if the community denies forgiveness, e.g., by splitting Paul and the community on the issue and thus disrupting their fellowship.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. Here the group occurs in ethical connections with reference to coveting the possessions of others and often in lists of vices (cf. Barn. 10.4; Hermas Similitudes 6.5.5; Pol. 2.2, etc.). We never find the specialized sense of coveting the spouses of others. [G. DELLING, VI, 266-74] plḗthos [many, great], plēthýnō [to increase, multiply]

A. Nonbiblical Use.

1. General Usage. This word first means "crowd," then the "many." It becomes a term of measurement first in number and then in size, e.g., denoting number, amount, duration, etc. In Plato there is mostly a human reference to a "crowd," to "people," to the "majority," or to the "totality" (in antithesis to the one or the few). When a negative sense is apparent, it is where a judgment is implied, e.g., that most people cannot be philosophers, or that orators must please the crowd. In Aristotle plḗthos is synonymous with dḗmos. It usually means "the majority" but may also mean the "whole group." A distinction is made between majority and mob rule.

2. The One and the Many in Greek Philosophy. The implied opposite of the many is the one (or the few). Some philosophers argue that plurality would entail many ones, which is impossible, but Plato thinks that the "idea" is contained in the plurality of many individual things. Plurality is thus included in unity.

B. The LXX.

1. In the LXX plḗthos mostly means "plurality," "crowd," "totality," "quantity." Adjectivally it signifies "much," "great," "powerful." God's love is abundant in Ps. 106:45 (katá tó plḗthos), and so is his righteousness in Is. 63:7. His majesty and kindness are great in Ex. 15:7 and Ps. 145:7. In contrast the people has no great strength (Ps. 33:16) and it cannot rely on its many offerings (Is. 1:11). Stress falls instead on the multitude of its sins (Ps. 5:10), but God promises it descendants as numerous as the sand or stars (Gen. 32:13; Dt. 1:10).

2. In other connections plḗthos has such meanings as “numerous,” “many,” “much,” “more...than,” and “very much.”

3. For a different Hebrew term plḗthos first denotes “murmuring” or “roaring” and then, from “roaring crowd,” it has the transferred sense of “multitude.” It is far better adapted to express this, and the implied sense of noise is usually lost in the LXX. Thus in Ezek. 31:2, 18; 32:32 the original seems to have in view the tumult of Egypt, i.e., its pride, but the LXX sees a reference to the host or army.

4. In other passages we find the familiar senses of “numerous,” “host,” “people,” “number,” etc., sometimes in misinterpretation of the Hebrew (cf. Ps. 10:25; Mic. 4:13), or on the basis of other readings (Zech. 9:10).

5. In works for which there is no Hebrew original the normal meanings occur, sometimes with distinctions between the leaders (e.g., the elders or priests) and the people, sometimes with emphasis on the people as a whole.

C. The NT. In the NT, where seven of the 30 instances are in Luke and 17 in Acts, plḗthos has the sense of “crowd” with a wide range of meanings (Paul and the Synoptists often have hoi polloí in the same sense). Sometimes the “crowd” is distinguished from a smaller group (cf. Acts 6:2, 5; Lk. 1:10). The word may also denote the totality of a group, e.g., in Acts 4:32; 14:4; 15:12. In some cases the majority may be in view, although unanimity as well (cf. Lk. 19:37; 23:1; Acts 25:24). No disparagement is implied in Acts 21:36, but there is a hint of this in 25:24; 2:6. polý is added at times by way of strengthening (cf. Lk. 5:6) to indicate the greatness of the number (cf. Jms. 5:20; 1 Pet. 4:8). In Lk. 8:37 “all the people” is a phrase for the “population” of the area. Without the article plḗthos may be used adjectivally, as in Jn. 5:3; Lk. 2:13, etc. (cf. plḗthos with the article in the sense of “all” in Acts 4:32). “Number” is the sense in Acts 28:3 and probably in Heb. 11:12.

1. This word first means “to fill” or (intransitively) “to become full,” then “to abound.” We find it for the rising of the Nile, for the abundant flow of springs, and more generally for “to increase” or “to become numerous.”

2. In the LXX, where it is mostly transitive, the verb has such various meanings as “to increase,” “to multiply,” “to extend” (borders), “to exalt,” “to heap up,” etc.

3. In Heb. 6:14 (which quotes Gen. 22:17), the meaning is “to give numerous descendants.” In 2 Cor. 9:10 God will bring forth an abundant harvest from the gift. In Acts 6:1 the reference is to the increase in the number of disciples, but in 7:17 the multiplying of the people in Egypt is at issue. The growth of the church is the point in Acts 6:7; 9:31, and in view of 6:7 the increase of the word in 12:24 is probably the increase in the number of believers (cf. auxánein in 6:7; 12:24; 19:20). The use in Mt. 24:12 stands in contrast to the passages in Acts, for here wickedness multiplies and consequently love grows cold. In 1 and 2 Peter and Jude the term occurs in salutations; 1 and 2 Peter pray that grace and peace may be multiplied (1:2), and Jude (v. 2) prays that mercy and peace and love may be multiplied. Whether the idea is that of growth or of rich sharing, the wish, which has its roots in Judaism, is certainly that the fullness of the gifts of salvation may be at work in the churches (cf. the references in 1 Pet. 1:2 to sanctification, obedience, and sprinkling). plḗrēs.

1. The meaning of plḗrēs is "full," "filled," "manned" (ships), "full of" (e.g., sickness, delusions), "overfull" (cf. divine possession), "satisfied" (figuratively of the soul). Other meanings are "fully covered" (e.g., with fertile soil), "complete" (i.e., wholly filled), and "dense" or "thick" (i.e., fully pressed). "Fully paid" is a meaning in the papyri.

2. In the LXX, as the originals indicate, we find such senses as "satisfied," "intact," "overflowing," "full," "fully covered," and "complete."

3. Philo puts the term to philosophical, ethical, and religious use. Thus God is full of perfect goods or is perfect and complete. Philo refers, too, to the perfect good, e.g., the higher or ideal nature. Creation is complete.

4. The NT uses the term in a transferred sense to denote "rich fullness" (cf. Jn. 1:14, where grace and truth are the content, and the glory of the incarnate word which declares them is manifested). In Acts 6:8 Stephen possesses grace and power from God in abundant measure (cf. 6:3, 5). This is a permanent endowment, but a special grace is perhaps denoted in 7:55. In Lk. 4:1 Jesus' moving to Galilee (v. 14) is fully under the direction of the Spirit. Acts 13:9 stands in marked contrast to 13:8. The magician has satanic powers, but the Spirit comes on Paul to grant him divine authority. plḗrēs means "full" in Mt. 14:20; 15:37; Mk. 8:19, "wholly covered" in Lk. 5:12, and "complete" in Mk. 4:28 and 2 Jn. 8.

A. Nonbiblical Usage. This verb means "to fill," "to man" (ships), "to fill up" (passive), "to fill" in a figurative sense (with emotions, knowledge, etc.), "to satisfy or appease" (demands etc.), "to fulfil" (directions), "to round off or pay in full," "to pay off," "to run its course" (a span of time), "to fulfil" (promises), and "to come to fulfilment" (passive, e.g., of prophecies).

B. LXX Data. In the LXX plēróō occurs some 70 times for forms of ml' and other terms. Literal senses are "to fill" (e.g., with strong drink, or with people), "to fill the hand with offerings" (i.e., to sacrifice), "to be filled" (e.g., rivers with water), "to become full" (the moon), "to be satisfied." Figurative senses are "to fill" (with understanding, confusion, arrogance, etc.), "to fill up," "to satisfy" (desires), "to make or become full" (e.g., divine measures or spans of time), and "to fulfil" (e.g., divine promises).

C. God Fills the World in the OT and Judaism.

1. God knows all things, for he is omnipresent (Jer. 23:24). He sees and hears all things, for he fills heaven and earth. This does not mean that he permeates it materially; it is parallel to his upholding of creation.

2. Philo bases his ethics on the thought of God filling all things. God is distinct from the world. While not embraced by the cosmos, he leaves no part of it empty. He is everywhere at work to preserve it. His omnipresence relates to his self-revelation, but also to his judgment. No one can hide from God. Philo may make paradoxical statements by using philosophical terminology, but plainly he is not thinking of spatial permeation. The divine filling contrasts with the need and emptiness of the world.

3. The rabbis express similar thoughts. The cosmos cannot embrace God. It is by grace that his glory dwells in it. It pleases him to fill heaven and earth, although he himself is in the supreme heaven or above all heavens.

D. The Content of the Word in the NT.

1. Corresponding to the literal sense “to fill” (e.g., a place, Acts 5:28, or a lack, Phil. 4:19), plēróō nonliterally has first the sense “to fill with a content.” In the active, the subject may be abstract (Jn. 16:6), or it may be Satan (Acts 5:3), or God (Acts 2:28; Rom. 15:13). In the passive God is to be inferred as the one who fills richly (cf. Phil. 1:11; Col. 1:9). He gives knowledge and joy (Acts 13:52) with such fullness that they stamp the whole life and conduct, and claim the whole being, of the recipients. Along similar lines there is a filling with wisdom in Lk. 2:40, with the Spirit in Eph. 5:18 (in contrast to wine), and with comfort in 2 Cor. 7:4. In Eph. 4:10 Christ is the one who, having achieved dominion, dispenses the gifts of grace in fullness (vv. 7ff.). There is no reference here to spatial extension. Eph. 1:23 is to the same effect. “All” means all cosmic beings capable of will and decision, and “in all” means “in every respect” or “through all the forces that are subject to him” (v. 22). In virtue of his universal dominion Christ gives life and power to the whole church. The prayer of 3:19 is that the recipients may be filled absolutely with God’s boundless gifts. In Col. 2:10 there is a play on plḗrōma; the point is either that they have been brought to fullness in Christ’s sphere of life or that they are filled absolutely by him as the Giver.

2. A second nonliteral meaning in the NT is “to fulfil a divine demand or claim.” Thus (a) in Rom. 13:8; Gal. 5:14 believers fulfil the demand of the law in virtue of their new life in the Spirit (Rom. 8:4, 9-10). The idea is not that love fills up the law as though it were a vessel, but that it meets its norms. In Mt. 5:17 (b) the idea is not simply that of validating the law as distinct from abolishing it. The goal of Jesus’ mission is fulfilment. He does not simply affirm the law and the prophets but actualizes the will of God that is declared in them from the standpoint of both promise and demand. An example of such fulfilment may be seen already in Mt. 3:15.

3. A third nonliteral sense in the NT is “to fill up a specific measure.” The Jews (a) will fill up their fathers’ guilt by crucifying Jesus (Mt. 23:32). The predetermined number of martyrs (b) is completed (Rev. 6:11). Times come to an end (c) (Acts 7:23; 9:23; Lk. 21:24). The thought of the time (kairós) being fulfilled in Mk. 1:15 stresses the element of sovereign decision in God rather than impersonal foreordination. The mercy of the living God has brought about a fulfilment that opens the door to faith and forgiveness.

4. Another nonliteral sense in the NT is “to fulfil prophetic sayings.” God fulfils his word by actualizing it (Acts 3:18 and cf. 13:27). The NT uses various formulas for the proof from Scripture (cf. Mt. 1:22; Mk. 14:49; Acts 1:16; Lk. 4:21; Jms. 2:23; Jn. 13:18, etc.). The proof is most common in Matthew. In John it relates to details of the passion and especially to the betrayal by Judas (13:18) and rejection by the Jews (12:38). Fulfilment of Is. 53 is the answer to the apparent enigma of the death of Jesus. A final hína is important in the Scripture proofs, for it shows that events in Jesus’ life are grounded in God’s will as the OT declares this. Distinctive of the NT fulfilment is the eschatological content. God’s saving will achieves its full measure in the today of the Christ event. The NT concept of fulfilment is summed up in the person of Jesus. Paul has a similar view of OT fulfilment but does not put it in plēróō formulas. Lk. 22:16 refers to a fulfilment of the Passover in the future consummation but does not show how. Implied at least is the interrelating of the Passover as a type with the coming redemption as its antitype.

5. A final NT sense is “to complete.” With a temporal reference (a) this may mean “to finish” (cf. Lk. 7:1; Acts 13:25). Or it may mean (b) “to perform” (e.g., a divinely given task; cf. Col. 4:17; Acts 14:26; 12:25; Lk. 9:31). Or it may mean (c) “to bring to completion,” “to complete,” e.g., God’s counsel in 2 Th. 1:11, or Paul’s joy in Phil. 2:2; in the passive “to become complete,” e.g., the Corinthians‘ obedience in 2 Cor. 10:6. Especially completed or perfected in John is joy, e.g., that of the Baptist in 3:29, that of the recipients of revelation in 15:11 (cf. 1 Jn. 1:4; 2 Jn. 12). Joy is perfected because salvation is effected with the exalting of Jesus. In Jn. 16:24 those who pray for the salvation given in fellowship with Christ have the promise of perfect joy.

A. Outside the NT.

I. Lexical Data.

1. The first sense of plḗrōma is “that which fills,” “contents,” including, e.g., cargo, crew, population.

2. The idea of what fills yields such senses as “entirety,” “mass,” “totality,” “full measure,” “consummation,” also “crowd” (of people).

3. We also find the sense “what is filled” for a fully laden ship.

4. A final meaning is “the act of filling.”

II. Use in Specific Literary Groups.

1. In the LXX the term mostly has a spatial reference and denotes “content,” “fullness,” “totality” (cf. “totality” of population or “fullness” of the earth). The sense “act of filling” is perhaps in view in Ex. 35:27; 1 Chr. 29:2.

2. Ignatius uses the term in the sense of “supreme fullness,” e.g., of wishes or divine blessing. Justin has the fullness of the earth or sea in mind, and Clement of Alexandria (except in discussing Gnosticism) the means of sustenance.

3. The Hermetic writings have the term in the formal sense of fullness. Thus “God is all and one, for the fullness of all is one and in one.”

4. In Christian Gnosticism plḗrōma is a technical term for the totality of the 30 aeons. This totality is closest to God but is his product; he stands over it. The plḗrōma is the supreme spiritual world from which Jesus comes and into which the spiritual enter. Implied in the use of the term are the fullness and perfection of being. In the plural the aeons are called plērṓmata, and plḗrōma is also used at times for the Gnostics‘ angelic partners who help to carry them up into the spiritual world.

5. In mystical and Neo-Platonist works plḗrōma has the sense of content or totality, e.g., the sum of the qualities that constitute something.

B. The NT.

1. We find the sense “that which fills” in Mk. 6:43; 8:20; 1 Cor. 10:26 (cf. also Mk. 2:21).

2. In measurement (a) we first find the sense “full measure” in various connections, e.g., the number of the Gentiles in Rom. 11:25, full maturity in Eph. 4:13. We then find (b) the sense of “fullness” in, e.g., Rom. 15:29 (blessing), Eph. 3:19 (all God’s gifts), Jn. 1:16 (the grace of the incarnate word), Col. 1:19 (the fullness of the divine being in Christ), Col. 2:2-9 (the full deity). The plḗrōma statements in Colossians present the full unity of the person and work of God and Christ, yet in such a way that neither distinctness of person nor monotheism is imperiled. The differences between Ephesians and Colossians show that plḗrōma is not here a technical term, and the fact that plḗrēs or plēróō may be used instead supports this conclusion. In part the plḗrōma sayings relate to Christ’s headship of the church. From him as the bearer of the divine fullness (Col. 1:18ff.) vital powers flow into the church, so that he may be said to fill it.

3. In Eph. 1:23 the church as Christ’s body is his fullness as it is thus filled by his mighty working. Eph. 3:19 conveys similar teaching.

4. The “act of filling” is the sense (actively) in Rom. 13:10. Love here is not the sum of the law but the fulfilment of what God demands in it (cf. v. 8). “Act of filling” is also the sense (passively) in Rom. 11:12. When the number of Israel is filled up, the Gentiles will receive the fullness of eschatological consummation. Gal. 4:4 is another example. What is meant is not just that a period has run its course or that an ordained point has been reached, but that time has received its full content with the sending of the Son (cf. Eph. 1:10). God performs his eschatological act with the historical coming of Jesus. God’s decree had this fulfilment of the times in view (cf. 1 Cor. 10:11); Eph. 1:9-10 shows it to be grounded in the divine will and purpose.

1. This word means "to fill completely," "to fill up," "to complete," "to do completely," "to settle up," "to terminate," and "to appease."

2. In the LXX we find the senses "to insert," "to bring to full measure," "to complete," "to be full," and in the passive "to become full," "to come to an end."

3. In the NT we find the sense "to fill a gap," "to make up for," in 1 Cor. 16:7 and Phil. 2:30. The meaning "to fill up" occurs in 1 Th. 2:16; Judaism augments its sins by opposing the gospel. "To fill a place" is the point in 1 Cor. 14:16. In Gal. 6:2 believers fulfil Christ's law by bearing one another's burdens. The passive in Mt. 13:14 relates to the fulfilment of prophecy by the rejection of Christ's message and work.

antanaplēróō. This rare compound carries the nuance of "adding to," "supplementing," or "mutually augmenting." In the one NT instance in Col. 1:24 the thought is that of a vicarious filling up of the eschatological afflictions laid on the apostle in a wholly realistic fellowship of destiny with Christ on the basis of dying with him (cf. Phil. 3:10).

1. This word means a. "to fill" (e.g., to man ships), "to make up," "to furnish" (e.g., a house), "to fill up" (state coffers), "to bring to full measure," b. "to fulfil" (a duty), "to pay" (a debt), passive "to come to fulfilment," c. "to carry out" (a plan or proposal), and d. "to appease."

2. The only NT instance is in Acts 13:33, where Paul says, on the basis of Ps. 2:7, that the good news is that God has fulfilled his promise to the fathers by raising Jesus from the dead (cf. also Lk. 24:7; 1 Cor. 15:4).

1. This rare word means "filling," "completion," "perfecting," "satisfaction," "fulfilment."

2. The one NT instance is in Acts 21:26, where Paul gives notice in the temple when the days for purifying the four men will end.

symplēróō.

1. This word means "to fill with," "to fill completely," "to man," "to make complete," and in the passive "to be completed," "to become complete," "to be fulfilled."

2. Only the passive occurs in the NT. Literally the ship is being filled with water in Lk. 8:23. Days are fulfilled (i.e., the time has come) in Lk. 9:51 and Acts 2:1, with a suggestion that God's saving will is carried out in the event of Christ's going to Jerusalem or the descent of the Spirit. What is fulfilled is not just the period up to the event, but the time of the event itself, so that the term has here distinctive theological significance.

1. This late compound means "to bring to fullness" in such senses as a. "to fulfil or complete," b. "to satisfy," and c. "to convince" (passive "to come to full certainty").

2. The only LXX instance is in Eccl. 8:10, where the "full" has the sense of being "fully set" on doing evil.

3. In the NT the word means "to fulfil" in 2 Tim. 4:5 (cf. also the passive in 4:17). The meaning in Lk. 1:1 is "to accomplish," but since the reference is to the divine acts of salvation the nuance is that of bringing to fulfilment. Achieving certainty is the point in Rom. 4:21; it is because he is fully convinced that God will do what he promises that Abraham is a model for believers, saving faith being faith in the creative power of God that gives new life in Christ. The same meaning occurs again in Rom. 14:5, where Paul says that whether we observe days or not we should be fully convinced in our own judgment. This may also be the sense in Col. 4:12, but the combination with téleioi suggests that the thought is that of being brought to full maturity or completeness.

plērophoría. This word means a. "supreme fullness" and b. "certainty." In the NT it is parallel to power and the Holy Spirit in 1 Th. 2:5 (cf. 1 Cor. 2:4). It is thus one of the terms by which Paul describes the great richness of the divine work in the church's life and mission. In Col. 2:2 (with ploútos) it denotes the superabundance of a knowledge of God that is epitomized in Christ as the one in whom God actively reveals himself. In Heb. 6:11 the readers do not lack the zeal that leads to full preservation (or development) of their hope. In Heb. 10:22, however, the reference is to the full assurance of the faith that rests on appropriation of Christ's high-priestly work. Formally, of course, the idea of a full measure is still present. [G. DELLING, VI, 283-311]

plēsíon [neighbor]

A. The Greek World. Formed from plēsíos ("close by"), ho plēsíon is the "neighbor," "the person next to one," then more generally the "fellow human being." The word is a significant one in ethical discussions. [H. GREEVEN, VI, 311-12]

B. The OT and LXX.

1. plēsíon occurs some 225 times in the LXX, sometimes prepositionally, mostly as a noun, often with no Hebrew original, in other instances for various Hebrew terms, the chief of which is rēaʿ (also rendered phílos and allēl-).

2. Heb. rēaʿ comes from a verb meaning "to have dealings," "to associate." The noun reflects the range of possible dealings from the "friend" of the king to stereotyped use in a phrase like "one another." Thus it covers the friend, lover, companion, neighbor, or fellow human being.

3. Expressed is an encounter which in the OT takes place within the covenant and thus between those who worship the one God and stand under his command. When the term occurs in the legal texts, it has a relatively general character in view of the general validity of the ordinances, so that there is no formal restriction to members of the covenant people. Yet the setting shows that the laws are given specifically to Israel, so that their unequivocal application is to members of the people, with a clear extension only to resident aliens. Thus the use of the term in, e.g., Lev. 19:18, carries both restriction on the one side and extension on the other.

4. With the restriction, voices are heard in Judaism which favor a general extension. The rendering plēsíon is one such voice, the more so since it is used in the legal passages. The Hellenistic Jewish tradition, then, joins forces with one stream of Palestinian Judaism which on the basis of belief in the divine likeness demands respect and consideration for all people. [J. FICHTNER, VI, 312-15]

C. plēsíon in the NT.

1. Used in the NT only as a noun except in Jn. 4:5, plēsíon means "neighbor" and shows strong OT influence; there is allusion to Lev. 19:18 in 12 instances. In his summary of the law (Mk. 12:28ff.; Mt. 22:34ff.), Jesus refers to the command to love one's neighbor as well as God; the unity of the two commands is a distinctive feature in this teaching. Paul finds in the same command the fulfilment of the law (Gal. 5:14) or the sum of the commandments (Rom. 13:8ff.). James calls it the royal law (2:8). It epitomizes the commandments in the reply to the rich young ruler (Mt. 19:19).

---

2. The neighbor includes enemies as well as friends (Mt. 5:43ff.). At root, Jesus is here reversing the question. We are not to ask whom to love, for to love is to be a child of God, to be perfect as God is, and hence to love generously and spontaneously.

3. The parable of the Good Samaritan aptly illustrates this reversal. What counts is to be a neighbor to those in need. The neighbor is not generalized here, either into a compatriot or a fellow human being. An element of encounter is suggested by the term. Life itself shows who the neighbor is. The real point is not to define the neighbor but to be a neighbor.

4. In Rom. 15:2; Eph. 4:25; Jms. 4:12 the neighbor is the fellow Christian.

5. While neighbor and brother become virtually synonymous, the apostolic fathers continue to use plēsíon (cf. Barn. 19.5; Pol. 3.3). [H. GREEVEN, VI, 316-18] ploútos [wealth, riches], ploúsios [wealthy, rich], ploutéō [to be rich], ploutízō [to make rich]

A. Nonbiblical Use.

1. General Data.

a. Linguistic. This group is connected with a root meaning “to flow,” which is connected to “to fill.” The basic sense, then, is “fullness of goods,” and ploútos may mean either material wealth or spiritual wealth (of wisdom etc.).

b. Lexical. Lexicography supports the linguistic analysis. Thus ploútos means “wealth,” ploúsíos “well-to-do,” ploutéō “to be or become rich,” and ploutízō “to make rich.”

2. Riches and the Rich in Greek and Hellenistic Thought.

a. The Early Period. In Homer, nobility and wealth are identical. Gain or loss of either is in the hands of the gods. Wealth may consist of property and its products, but happy circumstances are also wealth. In Hesiod, wealth comes through work, which is honorable. But as in Homer, only riches bring virtue and blessing; poverty frays the nerve of life.

b. The Pre-Socratics to Aristotle. The classical period judges wealth from a social standpoint, i.e., that of its effect on the state. The pre-Socratics note that wealth confers no true security, for it is easily lost. Furthermore, the poor may be cultured as well as the rich, and wealth or poverty depends on the individual attitude. Some may decide for technical riches, but others seek the riches of virtue or wisdom. Debate arises whether wealth, poverty, or moderate possessions offer the best security in life. Plato and Aristotle find in riches a means, not an end. By liberating from labor, wealth should be a way to culture. If hereditary, it should promote a striving for justice and a dedication to virtue. Moderate wealth is best; the uncontrolled wealth that finds security in the constant accumulation of material goods leads to political ruin and renders the individual a-social. Plato, unlike Aristotle, keeps to the idea of spiritual as well as material wealth. Wisdom, virtue, and culture are the true riches.

c. The Cynics and Stoics. These groups focus on the individual rather than the state. They stress the inner attitude, but also censure riches because they bring dependence on material things. For the Cynics true wisdom is possible only for the poor. For the Stoics wealth is an indifferent matter, a loan which does not affect one’s true nature or destiny. It offers some advantages when properly handled but is easily handled amiss. True wealth consists of wisdom in harmony with the cosmic order.

B. Riches and the Rich in the OT.

1. Linguistic Data. The ploútos group occurs some 180 times in the LXX for various Hebrew terms (especially the root ʿšr). It is most common in the Wisdom literature, including Sirach (93 times).

2. The Evaluation of Riches.

a. The Early Period. As the infrequent use of the group shows, the question of riches is not a prominent one in the early period. Wealth consists of flocks, herds, and children. Material possessions come by breeding, dowry, and booty. Wealth is a gift of God and an expression of his blessing (Dt. 28:1ff.).

b. The Prophetic Criticism. Changed social circumstances, especially the development of cities and a plutocracy, bring criticism from the prophets (Is. 10:1ff.; Am. 2:6ff.; Ezek. 22:25ff.; Mic. 2:1ff.). The charge is that they entail forced labor and the depriving of widows etc. of their rights. Wealth is gained by cunning, graft, and violence, and it is contrary to God's will for his elect people (Jer. 5:26-27; Mic. 6:11-12). The rich are ungodly, they will come to ruin with God's judgment on the people, and their riches will be scattered (Is. 5:14; 29:5).

c. The Later Tradition. What the Wisdom literature says about wealth relates to practical experience. The rich have security, friends, and honor (Prov. 10:15; 14:20). Wealth comes through frugality and industry (24:4; Sir. 31:3). But there is also danger in wealth. It easily leads to pride (Prov. 18:10ff.) and to trust in it (Sir. 11:19). One is tempted to use wicked means to attain it (Prov. 28:6). It is impermanent (Eccl. 5:12ff.), carries disadvantages (5:11), and is only a relative good, e.g., compared to health or a good name (cf. Sir. 30:14ff.). Wealth is a divine blessing (Prov. 10:22) and poverty a divine judgment, but it is seen that many who are righteous are poor while the wicked are rich (cf. Pss. 37; 48; 72). In answer, a righteous order is expected (Ps. 37), but meantime there is stress on the impermanence of wealth (Ps. 48), and faith is confident that those who seek God will never suffer real lack (Ps. 34:10).

C. Riches and the Rich in Judaism.

1. The Non-Philonic Tradition. For the Sadducean hierarchy, wealth is still a constituent part of salvation. The Essenes, however, reject earthly riches as a sign of captivity to the passing world and look ahead to an eschatological reversal. Those who combine eschatology and nationalism include wealth in their expectation as a sign and gift. The Pharisees see that riches offer an opportunity for almsgiving and observance of the law, but find in knowledge and keeping of the law the true riches. Riches and poverty are instruments of divine testing: Will the rich be generous, and will the poor accept their lot without complaint? The common denominator in these various thoughts is that God is the only giver of riches and salvation, and that riches carry an obligation toward others. Pervasive, too, is the thought of retribution. Wealth either in this world or the next is a reward for keeping the commandments.

2. Philo. Influenced by Platonic and Stoic thought, Philo regards riches as indifferent. They are transitory and involve danger to the soul, but need not be despised. Philo realizes that God has created material goods to salvation. The main point is to use them with understanding as a loan from God. God himself, however, is the true wealth that can never be lost. The thought persists that this true wealth is earned as a reward rather than received as a free gift.

D. Riches and the Rich in the NT.

1. The Attitude of Jesus to Wealth in Mark and Matthew.

a. In Matthew Jesus abandons the traditional view of riches in favor of one that is wholly theocentric and eschatological. Neither wealth nor poverty is significant in itself (cf. 27:57). The delight in riches (13:22) and the difficulty of salvation for the rich (19:22ff.) simply typify the human situation in which nothing is gained even by winning the world if the soul is lost (6:25ff.), and the anxiety of pagan life stands in marked contrast to seeking righteousness and the kingdom (6:25ff.).

b. The problem of wealth has greater independence in Mark, e.g., in the explanation of the parable of the sower (4:19) and the story of the widow's mite (12:41ff.). Wealth is an obstacle to hearing the message of the kingdom.

2. In Luke. The question of the rich occupies more space in Luke. The setting of the story of the rich young ruler shortly after the parable of the publican (cf. 18:8ff., 18ff.) shows that more than wealth is at issue (cf. the setting of the story of the poor widow, the parable of Dives, and the story of Zacchaeus; 20-21; 16:14ff.; 19:1ff.). The rich, collectively, are opponents of Jesus, for the gospel involves a total reversal of the earthly order (1:53; 14:11, 24). The rich rely on their possessions; riches are thus an obstacle to discipleship (12:19ff.; 18:22-23). The rich should restore what is wrongfully gained (19:8) and give freely with no hope of return (14:12ff.). Separation from riches in discipleship results in much gain in both time and eternity.

3. The Group in Paul. Paul redefines wealth, going back to the basic sense of "fullness of goods." Christ and his work are the true wealth of the community. Christ himself is rich (2 Cor. 8:9). He grants his riches to those who call upon him (Rom. 10:12). God is rich in kindness and glory (Rom. 2:4; 9:23). Christ's word dwells richly in the community (Col. 3:16), which is rich through Christ's poverty (2 Cor. 8:9) and to which God has declared the riches of the glory of the mystery (Col. 1:26). God is rich in mercy and grace (Eph. 1:7; 2:4). The community knows the riches of his glorious inheritance by the Spirit (1:18). The apostle proclaims the unsearchable riches of Christ (3:8). This wealth is poverty to the world (1 Cor. 1:23). The way to it is that of Christ, who, though rich, becomes poor to make the world rich (2 Cor. 8:9). Thus the apostles, being poor, make many rich (6:10). True wealth consists of the love that self-sacrificially follows Jesus, not seeking its own (1 Cor. 13:4ff.), nor bragging about its riches, but trusting the God who supplies all needs according to his riches in glory (Phil. 4:19), and thus ready to give freely to others (2 Cor. 8:1ff.). Material wealth is simply an instrument in the ministry of love; one is to deal with it as though having no dealings with it, for it has no dignity of its own (1 Cor. 7:31).

4. The Other NT Writings. Warnings are given against coveting riches in 1 Tim. 6:9 and against trusting in riches in 6:17ff. Regard for wealth and estate is condemned in Jms. 2:1 ff. The rich should boast of their low estate (1:10-11); they are prone to violence (2:6-7), fraud (5:4), and voluptuous living (5:5), and their gold and silver, which rust, will witness against them at the judgment (5:3). The usage of Revelation is similar to that of Paul. The Lamb is worthy to receive riches (5:12). The church at Smyrna is truly rich (2:9), but that at Laodicea, though rich, is really poor and should seek its true wealth by repentance (3:17ff.). The rich of Babylon, who have gained their wealth by wickedness, will fall with their city (18:3ff.). In Heb. 11:25-26 Moses regards abuse for Christ's sake greater riches than the treasures of Egypt.

E. Riches and the Rich in the Postapostolic Period.

1. The Apostolic Fathers. The apostolic fathers follow NT teaching. Barnabas speaks of the rich declarations of God (1.2) and of grace having a rich source in God (1.3). Hermas in Similitudes 2.8 shows that wealth is useless as such, and in Mandates 8.3 etc. he warns against the luxury to which it leads. Yet wealth is God's gift (Hermas Similitudes 1.8). The poor whose prayer is rich toward God should intercede for the rich, who in turn should sustain the poor by material gifts (Similitudes 2.4ff.).

2. Clement of Alexandria and Cyprian. Clement in his work on the salvation of the rich teaches the ethical indifference of wealth and poverty; both rich and poor are open to temptation, and neither wealth nor poverty can decide their eternal destiny. The true rich are rich in virtues. Yet riches come from God, and their worth is decided by the use to which they are put, and hence by the attitude of those who have them. Proper use accords with Christ's will and takes the form of service to others. Cyprian, and later Basil of Caesarea, accept this view, but with more stress on avoiding bondage to wealth and the resultant seduction from Christ. The implied tension in the attitude to riches corresponds to the position of Christians as those who are in the world but not of it. [F. HAUCK and W. KASCH, VI, 318-32] pneúma, pneumatikós.

A. pneúma in the Greek World.

I. The Meaning of the Term.

1. Wind. From a root denoting vital force acting as a stream of air, pneúma first means wind both in its movement and its rarefied materiality. The wind may be stormy, or a normal wind, or a breeze, or even a vapor. It has an effect on climate, health, and character, and is seen as both natural and divine.

2. Breath. A second sense of pneúma is breath, inhaled and exhaled in breathing, and ranging from snorting to the fading breath. Poetically pneúma denotes the sound that human breath produces by blowing on flutes etc.

3. Life. Breath is a sign of life, and by way of the idea of the breath of life, pneúma comes to be used for life or living creature.

4. Soul. As the principle of life, pneúma means much the same as psychḗ. Bound to the body in life, it escapes it with the last breath and returns to the ethereal sphere.

5. Transferred Sense of Spirit. In a transferred sense pneúma is used for the spirit that blows in interpersonal relations. Thus it may denote the spirit of a city, or the influence of the gods or other people, or various forms of excitement.

6. pneúma and noús. In contrast to noús (mind), which resembles the calmer medium of light, pneúma (spirit) is a dynamic term suggesting the forceful movement of air that seizes us with elemental power and catches us up into tension or movement.

7. Mantic pneúma. In manticism and mantic poetry, pneúma is the spirit that stirs, enthuses, fills, and inspires (cf. priests, poets, and prophets). It may also denote lofty rhetorical speech, the captivating flow of the orator, etc.

8. Divine pneúma. Elemental and uncontrollable, pneúma is felt to be divine (e.g., in divine music). But there is in Greek no sense of a personal holy spirit. The divine spirit is immanent.

9. God and pneúma. In Stoicism pneúma is a cosmic power or substance, and as such it may be seen as the being or manifestation of deity itself.

1O. Non-Greek Development of Meaning. Under Jewish and Christian influence there is a twofold development of meaning. On one side pneúma is severed from nature and personified as the active cosmological or soteriological Spirit or God. On the other it is materialized as a demonic magical force that magicians manipulate for good or ill.

II. pneúma in Mythology and Religion.

1. Life-Creating pneúma. On the basis of the connection between wind or breath and generation and life, the idea is widespread that there is conception by wind. This concept may be found in poetry and natural science, and passes into the Stoic theory of pneúma. In both Egypt and Greece one reads of the gods begetting life by their breath. The mode of generation distinguishes the divine operation from human conception in accordance with the difference of essence or substantiality.

2. pneúma and Inspiration. The breath of wind or breathing is a form by which higher divine forces impart something of their power either for good or evil. Plato still uses epípnoia for inspiration, reserving pneúma for natural science. He distinguishes four forms of inspiration corresponding to the four cultural spheres, namely, poetic, mantic, mystic, and erotic.

a. Poetic. When Hesiod is called to be a poet, the Muses breathe into him a divine voice. Socrates ironically refers to his divine gift of poetic speech. A divine force (pneúma) lifts the poet above the normal order. Manticism offers a prototype.

b. Manticism. At Delphi Apollo in a kind of sacred marriage fills the woman with divine breath. The pneúma sets the Pythia in an ecstatic state which entails physical effects (e.g., streaming hair, panting breath, etc.). Sound effects are associated with the giving of the oracle. The pneúma fills the house, and especially the inner being of recipients, carrying them off into the ecstatic sphere, and disclosing hidden things. Uncontrollable, it possesses rather than being possessed, and its theme, content, and source are divine. Mantic inspiration of this kind fills with deity, as Plato puts it, and thus makes people ministering organs of the gods. But it also robs them of understanding, so that their utterances are not their own. The philosopher is needed to assess and interpret the sayings, just as the priests at Delphi clarify the burblings of the Pythia to make them valid oracles. For Plato mantic inspiration is the prototype for poetic inspiration and for the element of enthusiasm in his own philosophy. Plutarch takes up and develops this concept. While rejecting direct inspiration, under Stoic influence he suggests that a natural force acts as the medium of inspiration in poetry and prophecy. This does not lead to irreligion, for the earth and the sun, which bring forth pneúma, are for Plutarch divine essences. In Iamblichus divine inspiration or spirit is a pure gift from the gods. Spirit here is more closely associated with light than breath, and epípnoia is spiritualized as illumination. While pneúma is divine, the deity itself is distinct and more worthy of reverence. Not all people are equally adapted for operations of the pneúma. The simpler and younger are more receptive. The intensity and forms of manifestation are as different as the gods (or angels and demons); union with the deity is the supreme form.

III. pneúma in Natural Science and Philosophy. The term pneúma does not seem to play much part in earlier physical theories; aḗr and psychḗ are more common terms. Later, of course, the three are equated as the comprehensive life-principle that integrates all things. In medicine pneúma is more important. As the air that is taken in with breathing and nourishment, it is a vital and decisive element in health. Distinction is made between the colder external air and the warmer internal air that circulates in the body and has, its seat in the heart. For Aristotle pneúma is the breath of life that gives soul to varying degrees. In higher creatures outward pneúma is added to inner pneúma. Both moving and moved, it brings warmth and directs and sustains the body in its movements and experiences. Stoicism makes of this scientific theory a universal principle which explains the whole world in its constitution, unity, tension, and vitality. pneúma is here a separate substance that unites fire and air, that is the source and principle of the four elements, that permeates and gives soul to all reality in all its forms, and that is also the basis of individuality in ascending degrees of purity from the inorganic to the organic and finally the human world. Even as the chief organ of the soul, pneúma is not a mere principle but a substance, although in rarefied form; the rational pneúma is a portion of the most rarefied cosmic divine pneúma. It embodies God in the inner being of humanity.

pneúma, then, is both the vital force and substance that generates and permeates all things, and the rational soul whose functions of guidance and control it executes. In the indissoluble unity of matter, power, life, and form, pneúma is ultimately God, who is by nature pneúma. Destiny, then, is a pneumatic power, and in religion, myth, and poetry, Zeus is the cosmic pneúma. Because Stoicism regards pneúma as material, however, Plotinus finds in psychḗ a higher principle; pneúma can no more constitute the essence of life than blood. In Hermetic writings pneúma belongs to the ethereal sphere, has the form of immaterial light, and forms a bridge between body and soul, enabling the soul both to descend into the world and also to ascend out of it. Whether people are good or evil depends on whether the psychḗ rules the pneúma on which it rests or is ruled by it. Here again pneúma is matter; it is thus a phenomenon of second rank in the cosmic and human world.

IV The Greek Concept of pneúma and the NT.

1. In spite of formal parallels, e.g., the idea of pneúma as a power, pneúma plays only a secondary role in Greek thought as compared to the NT. Belonging to the material world, it is never "spiritual" in the NT sense. As a cosmic factor, it is a vital, impersonal, natural force. It can be the seat or agent of mental and spiritual functions but not their true subject. Stoic monism makes it the essence and power of deity permeating the cosmos, but the saying in Jn. 4:24 offers only a formal parallel. The Apologists and Alexandrians see the difference; God, for them, cannot be material pneúma.

2. Even in poetry and manticism pneúma is never wholly free from matter. Here, of course, it is something exceptional imparted to the few and bearing an ecstatic character. Again there is a formal parallel to the Holy Spirit and spiritual gifts, but in assessing these the NT avoids the religious vocabulary of secular Greek, coining instead a new and distinctive term like glossolalia.

3. Greek thought has a theoretical interest in the process and nature of pneúma. This interest is alien to the NT, which is oriented to the divine content.

4. In medicine, philosophy, and religion, pneúma has a mediatorial role on the border between the material and the immaterial. The Holy Spirit plays a similar part, but the theological presuppositions are totally different. Secular Greek knows no person of the Spirit as a divine entity; pneúma is always a thing, not a person.

5. The Greek view can never completely break free from the idea of pneúma as a natural phenomenon. In the NT, however, this idea is no longer present when the Spirit is proclaimed as the Spirit of truth who reacts to sin and gives birth to faith in Christ. The fundamental difference between the Greek and NT concepts is that a different God stands behind them. [H. KLEINKNECHT, VI, 332-59]

B. Spirit in the OT.

I. Review of the Term.

1. rû(a)ḥ in the OT.

a. Breath, Wind.

OT Old Testament

(a) Breath of the Mouth. As breath of the mouth, rû (a)ḥ means breath (cf. Job 19:17) in such expressions as drawing breath (Job 9:18), gasping for breath (Jer. 2:24), breathing heavily (Job 15:13), the breath of life (Jer. 10:14).

(b) Breath of air. As wind, rû (a)ḥ may be a soft wind (Job 4:15), a daily west wind (Gen. 3:8), a strong wind (Is. 32:2), a tearing wind (Ps. 55:8), a hot wind (v. 11). The four winds are the four corners of the earth (Zech. 6:5). Figuratively wind is vanity or futility or deception (Job 6:26); we read of windy knowledge, speech, etc., as well as of vain striving.

(a) The Life Principle. rû(a)ḥ gives life to the animal or human body (cf. Gen. 7:22). Its entry gives life (Ezek. 37:5-6), its removal means death (Ps. 104:29). Terms used in this connection are reviving, vanishing, languishing, expiring, becoming powerless, etc.

(b) Seat of the Emotions, Intellect, and Will. Emotionally we find such concepts as disquiet, unhappiness, despondency, lack of spirit, impatience, irritation, bad temper, terror, jealousy, arrogance, etc. Intellectually there are references to cleverness, insight into divine mysteries, artistic sense, and planning; negatively to lack of perception, error, and lack of religious or moral insight. Volitionally associated ideas are readiness for things, attitudes of will, courage, forbearance, freedom, longing for God, renewal, and, negatively, unfaithfulness and ungodliness.

(c) Divinely Effected rû (a)ḥ. God, the God of spirits (Num. 16:22), gives vital force (Is. 42:5), upholds it (Job 10:12), and takes it away (Ps. 10:29). Life is in his power (Job 12:10). He causes disquiet (2 Kgs. 19:7), gives fervor (Zech. 12:10), grants reason (Job 32:8), and imparts artistic sense (Ex. 28:3). He is behind planning (Jer. 51:1) and may frustrate it (Is. 19:3). He gives or hardens the moral power of the will (Ezek. 11:19; Dt. 2:30). The divine spirit is given with laying on of hands (Dt. 34:9).

c. God's rû(a)ḥ.

(a) Effective Divine Power. God's rû(a)ḥ gives power to the cherubim (Ezek. 1:12) and Samson (Judg. 13:25), and sets the prophet on his feet (Ezek. 2:2). It induces ecstasy (Num. 11:25), lifts up (1 Kgs. 18:12), snatches away (Ezek. 3:14), gives prophetic speech (Gen. 41:38), grants visions (Ezek. 8:3), endows with the gift of leadership (Judg. 3:10), and is behind human wickedness (Judg. 9:23).

(b) Creative Divine Power. God's power creates life (Ezek. 37:9), injects (37:14), sends (Ps. 104:30), and withdraws it (Job 34:14). It creates the cosmos and life within it (Gen. 1:2; Ps. 33:5). It gives mental abilities, e.g., artistic skill, enlightenment, and wisdom (Ex. 31:3; Dan. 5:14). It gives the gift of prophecy (Mic. 3:8). It equips for kingship (Is. 11:2). It also gives moral qualities, e.g., sanctification (Is. 59:12). It is a power to judge (Is. 4:4) and to save (Is. 32:15). It gives help (Ps. 143:10), shows what is right (Neh. 9:20), and is put in the hearts of the people (Is. 63:11).

(c) God's Inner Nature. rû (a)ḥ denotes God's sustaining power (Is. 31:3), omnipresence (Ps. 139:7), wisdom and power (Is. 40:13), command (Is. 34:16), holiness (Is. 63:10), and patience (Mic. 2:7).

(d) Personal Being. rû(a)ḥ has a personal aspect in 1 Kgs. 22:21; Ezek. 37:9; perhaps Is. 48:16.

2. nəšāmâ in the OT.

---

cf. confer, compare

v. verse

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

a. As Breath. This word occurs for strong breathing in Is. 2:22, for God's wrathful breath in Is. 30:33.

b. Human Breath. The reference is to the breath of life in Gen. 7:22, to vital force in Is. 42:5, to living things in Dt. 20:16, to the seat of understanding or inspiration in Job 26:4.

c. God's Breath. Used of God, the term refers (a) to the principle that gives life (Job 33:4) and (b) to that which gives insight (32:8).

3.'ôḇ in the OT. This term occurs in the OT with reference to a. the spirits of the dead (Lev. 19:31) and b. those who conjure up such spirits (1 Sam. 28:3, 9).

II. The Spirit of God.

1. God's Spirit represents true power in Is. 31:3. The Spirit changes the desert into paradise in Is. 32:15ff. The power of the Spirit has an ethical character (cf. Is. 30:1). It fashions creatively (Ps. 51:10-11). It works through the servant (Is. 42:1ff.). It perfects the people (Ezek. 36:26-27). It is already at work (Is. 31:3); the transformation of the people takes place through divine judgments in history (Ezek. 11:19; 18:31; 36:26). It both ends and consummates Israel's history. This is not polytheistic power but the personal work of God's will. Divine powers are not habitually present in humanity. People are subject to God's power. Though experienced as God's work, it is inscrutable. Even the prophets do not give precise details of its operation. Its dynamic is plain, but its logic defies analysis.

2. God's Spirit is creative, life-giving power (Gen. 1:2). All life derives from this dynamism (cf. Gen. 2:7). By it God sustains his work (cf. Job 34:14). The Spirit's power is personal. It is no immanent force of nature; nature is de-deified in the OT. God's creative power is free, sovereign, and inscrutable (cf. Gen. 6:3). Its dynamism is known but unsearchable.

3. By the Spirit, God raises up charismatic leaders, e.g., Gideon, Saul, and David (Judg. 6:34; 1 Sam. 11:6; 16:13). The mysterious aspect here finds expression in ecstasy (1 Sam. 10:6). Ecstasy marks the descent of the Spirit on the 70 elders (Num. 11:24ff.). Again we see God's unpredictable and irresistible power. The dynamism is known but the logic is hidden.

4. Similar phenomena occur in other religions, but prophecy lifts the thought of God's rû (a)ḥ out of religious and ethical neutrality and sees it as the teleological will and work of personal divine power in creative historical action. God's Spirit expresses his inner nature and presence. Even in judgment God is present as the Lord of history (Hag. 2:5). His is finally a saving action (Zech. 6:1ff.). His Spirit seals his covenant faithfulness (Is. 59:21).

5. The OT even anchors the demonic in the concept of spirits that come from God. Thus God sends an evil spirit in Judg. 9:23 and a lying spirit comes from God in 1 Kgs. 22:19 (cf. Job 1:6ff.). Cosmic spirits are thus deprived of their autonomy.

C. Spirit in Judaism.

I. pneúma in the LXX.

l. The Translation of the Hebrew Terms.

a. The LXX uses pneúma 277 times for rû (a)ḥ, ánemos 52 times, and various other words on occasion.

b. The usual rendering of nəšāmâ is pnoḗ.

c. engastrímythos is the normal equivalent of 'ôḇ. [F. BAUMGÄRTEL, VI, 359-68]

2. pneúma as Wind. Two references for this sense are Jon. 4:8 and Jer. 4:11.

3. pneúma as Breath of Life.

LXX Septuagint

a. God sends, controls, and withdraws this breath (Job 27:3; Dan. 5:4; Tob. 3:6). One may yield it up but not retrieve it (2 Macc. 12:19; Wis. 16:14).

b. The vital force can retire temporarily (Dan. 10:17) and then return (Judg. 15:19) or be restored (1 Sam. 30:12).

c. The pneúma constructs and fills the world as cosmic spirit (Jdt. 16:14). God is the God of spirits (Num. 16:22), but the LXX avoids the dualism of a material and a spiritual world (cf. Is. 31:3).

d. In the last time God gives the pneúma as resurrecting power (Ezek. 37:6, 14).

4. pneúma as the Power of Blessing and Punishment. In Is. 11:4 pneúma and lógos are parallel. God gives a spirit of stupefaction in Is. 29:10. The pneúma inspires the teacher of wisdom in Sir. 39:6.

5. pneúma as Spiritual Ability, Resolve, Constitution of Soul. God fills with artistic sense and gives understanding (Ex. 28:3; Job 32:8). He stirs up a will to build (1 Esdr. 2:5). pneúma is the seat of the functions of the soul (Wis. 5:3). Fullness of thoughts constrains (Job 32:18). The spirit may lack, or may be given, understanding (Job 20:3; Sus. 45). Courage ebbs (Jdt. 7:19) and flows (1 Macc. 13:7).

6. pneúma as Eschatological Gift. God's Spirit may be one of judgment and burning (Is. 4:4). God can destroy by a breath (Wis. 11:20). His breath of judgment is like a stream in flood (Is. 30:28). It puts the unclean spirit to flight (Zech. 13:2). In the day of salvation the Spirit will bring animals together (Is. 34:16). God will give his people a new spirit (Is. 44:3). He will pour out his Spirit and give a spirit of grace and pity (Joel 2:28; Zech. 12:10). The Spirit will stand in the midst of the people (Hag. 2:5). The servant will bear the Spirit (Is. 42:1). Those who cannot escape the Spirit (Ps. 139:7) but commit their spirits to God (Ps. 31:5) long for messianic salvation (Is. 26:18).

7. pneúma in Ecclesiastes. pneúma is always an anthropological-psychological term in Ecclesiastes. proaíresis pneúmatos is the LXX term for vain striving in 1:14; 2:11; 4:4, etc. The same expression occurs in 2:22 for the arbitrariness of the human spirit in its aspirations.

8. pneúma in Wisdom.

a. The Principle of Life. The author of Wisdom thinks God inbreathes or loans the principle of life (15:11, 16). God gives himself to the individual entity, so that while people lose the breath of life at death they gain immortality (5:15).

b. Wisdom. The pneúma as wisdom is granted in answer to prayer (7:7). It is a power of clear insight that is oriented to the good. It does not permeate all things or people, but only the prayerful, thoughtful, and morally pure, who may thus be called pneúmata (7:23). The pneúma that fills the pneúmata is superior to all things human, free from care, unlimited in possibility, able to see and hear all things, and uniquely related to God (1:7). As a spirit of discipline, it has no fellowship with evil. Representing God's activity in the world, it has some hypostatic independence, but is still subject to God (9:17). Whether it is material or immaterial is not stated; God is the immaterial God, but he acts in the material world. The pneúma shares God's transcendence and yet also his participation in events. The pneúma may be equated with the psyche̅́ on the one side, but it is identical with sophía on the other. The author thus perceives a twofold cosmic activity of the pneúma which is to the advantage both of the elect and of all humanity.

II. pneúma in Hellenistic Judaism.

1. Philo.

a. pneúma in Philo is a term for the higher element of the air, for wind, and for human and animal breath.

b. pneúma as the substance of air holds things together; all matter is permeated by it, and by its binding power the earth itself consists.

c. Blood and pneúma are the soul's essence. The nonrational soul has blood as its essence; the rational soul, which is distinctively human, has pneúma. pneúma is the impress of divine power that begets thought.

d. Different is God's pneúma. As rational beings, humans receive the divine pneúma by inbreathing. The total life of the soul is a divine gift. The refined purity of the mind of heavenly humanity depends on participation in the divine pneúma as distinct from the pneúma as the impress of divine power (cf. Gen. 1:2; 2:7). Philo's statements about the divine pneúma are hampered by his philosophical vocabulary, but for him the influx of the spirit has an ethical character and he maintains the divine transcendence over against Stoic pantheism. At times he calls the noús the divine pneúma, but only if those who bear it make ethically good decisions. If reason is a genuine impress of the divine pneúma, it is the divine pneúma only on an ethical basis. If imprecise, the distinction that Philo makes here is a firm one.

e. The Prophetic Spirit. Philo refers to the prophetic spirit but believes that he himself, as an expositor, has the spirit of inspiration like Moses. The prophetic spirit is the supreme divine spirit conferring knowledge that even the noús (mind) cannot have in spite of its spiritual endowment. The worlds of rational enlightenment and divine prophecy meet in the sage. Pneumatically permeated rationalism reaches its limit in prophetic ecstasy. The new thing received with the divine pneúma points to the world of revelation of a transcendent God. If rational beings receive the divine pneúma, they live in the forecourt of a pneumatic reality imparted to the chosen in prophetic ecstasy.

2. Josephus. The usage of Josephus is related to that of the LXX and Philo. pneúma is the constitution of the soul or the seat of martial ardor. Saul has an evil spirit. daimónia are equated with the pneúmata of the wicked dead, and the divine angel and the divine pneúma are equated. Josephus normally avoids pneúma theoú for the spirit of inspiration. He uses it only when the reference is to the biblical prophets, preferring pneúma theíon for present inspiration. Zealots and Essenes prophesy, but they have nothing to do with God's Spirit. In Antiquities 1.27 Josephus has pneúmatos epithéontos for the Spirit of God of Gen. 1:2; he probably has breath in view, but the Latin rendering (spiritus dei) suggests the cosmic Creator-Spirit. [W. BIEDER, VI, 368-75]

III. rû (a)ḥ in Palestinian Judaism.

1. Wind, Quarter of the World. As in the OT, rû (a)ḥ is the common term for "wind." We also find the expression "the four winds"; thus rû (a)ḥ can denote "side" or "direction."

2. Angels and Evil Spirits. Beings in the heavenly world can be called spirits, especially in apocalyptic. The elemental spirits are a special class reigning over natural events. The fallen angels, mingling with women, have begotten evil spirits that live on earth. Belief in demons is widespread among religious leaders and scribes as well as the people. Satan and the evil spirits are God's foes seducing or harming people. They arise only in a distortion of God's creation. Thus absolute dualism is avoided, and their activity is integrated into God's rule. In the last time they will be bound and punished. .

3. The Deceased. The term spirit also applies to the deceased in graves who may roam the earth at night or may be guests in heaven to overhear divine secrets.

4. The Human Spirit. Later Jewish anthropology strongly underlines the idea of the human spirit.

a. Vocabulary. It is hard to fix distinctions in the terms that denote the human soul. Various words are used, but the soul is one. A relative distinction is made linguistically between the soul as vital force and the soul as it comes down from heaven, but there are many exceptions.

b. The OT Legacy. The OT view of spirit as vital force and the seat of spiritual functions remains the same in Judaism, with an emphasis on the emotional and volitional element, e.g., the proud, rapacious, or humble spirit, the spirit which may be refreshed with joy or given rest. God's spirit finds pleasure in those whose human spirit finds pleasure in him.

c. Spirit and Body. The rabbis develop the distinction between body and soul—the former earthly, the latter heavenly and hence preexistent and immortal. At creation, God already creates a fixed number of souls that are stored up until bodies are ready. These souls are pure and holy and must be returned to heaven pure and holy. The preexistent soul is the spirit that God puts in us. It preserves some independence of the body, as in sleep. After death, it is in a hidden place in heaven or in the realm of the dead awaiting reunion with the body at the resurrection for judgment. The souls of the righteous are kept apart from those of the wicked. At the resurrection, when soul and body are reunited, life is restored either by the returning human spirit or by the Spirit of God.

d. Age of the Ideas of Preexistence and Immortality. These ideas exist quite early in Hellenistic Judaism. The thought of the immortality of the spirit may be found in Palestinian Judaism in Jubilees and Ethiopian Enoch. The Pharisees accept both the soul's immortality and the resurrection. Preexistence, however, is less clearly taught in Palestinian Judaism. The ideas of the soul coming from heaven and of a fixed number of people occur, but these do not necessarily imply preexistence, for which there is firm attestation only from the second century A.D.

e. The Historical Problem. Palestinian as well as Hellenistic Judaism shows Greek influence in its anthropology. On the other hand, the ancient view that the spirit that comes from God is the vital force in humanity remains. The OT legacy thus prevents a complete Hellenizing, especially by ruling out the view that the body is the seat of evil.

5. The Spirit of God.

a. Terminology. In apocryphal and pseudepigraphical writings we find the titles "the Spirit," "God's Spirit," and occasionally "the Holy Spirit." The spirit in us may be called the spirit of God, but the Spirit of God in the strict sense is an entity that is separate from us.

b. The Works of the Spirit.

(a) The OT speaks about a spirit of wisdom, understanding, etc., and increasingly these qualities are seen as works of God's Spirit. Prophecy in particular is a work of the Spirit, and so is a moral life. Knowing all human deeds, the Spirit may accuse in the judgment.

(b) The Spirit finds manifestation in light or sound, but in the rabbis God's Spirit never appears as a dove.

c. The Spirit and the OT. For the rabbis the Spirit is the prophetic Spirit who speaks in the OT. Each book is inspired by the Spirit and hence canonical. In exposition some passages may be ascribed to Israel or other speakers and some directly to the Spirit. Some words may even be said by the Spirit to God. But Scripture as a whole is still inspired by the Spirit.

d. The Spirit and Righteousness. The gift of the Spirit is for the rabbis a reward for righteous conduct which further promotes such conduct. The Spirit turns aside from sinners and will not work in unclean places. At first the Spirit works among the Gentiles (cf. Balaam) but he is then restricted to Israel. Health and strength of body and soul are also conditions for the gift of the Spirit.

e. Past, Future, and Present Endowment with the Spirit.

(a) Great figures of the past, e.g., the prophets, Rebekah, Jacob, the righteous, speak and act under the Spirit's influence. This applies especially to the patriarchs and to those who write Scripture.

(b) In the last time the Messiah will have the Spirit, although the Messiah is not equated with the Spirit. The redeemed righteous will also receive the Spirit, undergoing moral renewal by an alteration of the human spirit which either God or the Spirit effects. On the basis of Ezek. 36:26-27 and 37:14 resurrection by the Spirit is expected.

(c) Although the great age of prophetic inspiration has passed, those who obey the law may receive the Spirit today. Apocalyptic writers speak and write in the Spirit in the names of others, and occasionally there are prophetic experiences. The rabbis do not expect the Spirit as in the past, but they think that a life that pleases God leads to the Spirit, and rabbis at times have visions through the Spirit. Ordination is not viewed as impartation of the Spirit, although later the thesis is advanced that the Spirit is not taken from the wise, i.e., the scribes.

f. The Cosmic Function of the Spirit. The Spirit's function at creation finds a place in Judaism but is secondary in the rabbis to the concept of the Spirit as the agent of prophecy and a gift to the righteous.

g. The Autonomy of the Spirit. The rabbis often speak of the Spirit in personal categories, e.g., speaking, sorrowing, rejoicing, etc. Yet the Spirit is not a separate heavenly being like an angel. He is an objective divine reality encountering us, and as such may also be described in impersonal categories. This reality represents God but is not identical with God. The personal categories derive from the rabbis' love of personification and are always associated with words of Scripture. For all the Spirit's autonomy, the Spirit finally is God's Spirit and comes from God. The Spirit is not a substitute for God's presence nor is the Spirit identical with the Shekinah. Since he comes from God and represents him, his possession means a link with God himself.

h. The Spirit as Advocate. This thought is only weakly attested in Judaism. It occurs clearly only in expositions of Prov. 24:28-29 and in a passage where the bath qol, which is a substitute for the Spirit, is called an advocate. [E. SJÖBERG, VI, 375-89]

D. Development to the Pneumatic Self in Gnosticism.

I. The Dead Sea Scrolls and Their Influence.

1. When the soul is seen as a responsible ego that survives death, the question of its salvation becomes an urgent one, for dealings with the Spirit of God seem to be involved, and speculation arises as to the nature of life after death. In Judaism the idea that the Spirit is the power of ethical goodness becomes increasingly important. Under the impact of Persian dualism, the Spirit as a determinative force is the good for which one has to decide. At Qumran a struggle is seen between the spirit of knowledge and the spirit of darkness. The counsels of the good spirit command various virtues. One must either live by the power of God's Spirit or fall victim to evil. At the same time, the Spirit may be the human spirit embracing both understanding and acts and hence identical with the self.

2. Similar thoughts occur in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs and the Hermetic writings. Contrasted with the good Spirit are evil spirits. These strive for control of people, who are then indwelt by them and do either good or evil. A problem, however, is that the human spirit represents responsible existence before God. A possible solution is to view the human spirit as the spirit that is determined by ethical decision and thus given back to God either corrupt or intact and renewed.

II. Gnosticism.

1. The Problem: The Spirit as Creator of Matter. In contact with Greek thought the creative role of the Spirit in Gen. 1:2 becomes highly significant as Spirit is understood increasingly in terms of substance. If spirit denotes divinely given spiritual existence, Hellenists equate this with the soul that comes from God, is imprisoned in the body, and will return to the heavenly sphere. A parallel thought in Judaism is that of the restoration of paradise, with the associated ideas of a primal and eschatological man, easily construed by Hellenists in terms of the myth of a descending and ascending god, and the identification of believers with the destiny of the god. Put in the language of substance, this means that the original heavenly substance comes into matter to liberate the substance of the human soul. But how, then, can the Spirit be the Creator of matter?

2. The Redemption of the pneúma from Matter. For Gnostics, God is spiritual by nature. Somehow spiritual substance has been bound to matter and must be freed from it. The answer lies in the distinction of pneúma from psychḗ. The pneúma, which is of the nature of God or Christ, is a seed or spark that Christ gathers up and takes back with him when he consigns body and psychḗ to chaos and commits pneúma to God. Redemption is completed with the reassembling of redeemed pneúmata into the great spiritual body.

3. Trichotomy. The separation of the pneúma from the psychḗ produces a threefold division of humanity. Early triads include noús, psychḗ, and sṓma, or theíon, psychḗ, and sṓma. In Judaism the Spirit of God stands over against the human body and soul. Here the idea of a transcendent pneúma is decisive. The same idea recurs in Irenaeus, for whom the Spirit of God is the power that resurrects body and soul, although granting perfection by adding spirit.

E. The NT.

I. Mark and Matthew.

1. The Demonic and Anthropological Spirit. Of the 23 pneúma sayings in Mark, 14 refer to an unclean spirit or the like. Matthew has "spirits" in 8:14. Anthropologically in Mk. 2:8 and 8:12 pneúma is the seat of perceptions and feelings, and in Mt. 27:50 it is the vital force. In Mk. 14:38 the spirit that is willing in contrast to the weak flesh is not a better part. On the basis of Ps. 51:12, it is the Spirit of God that is given to us and that strives against our human weakness.

2. The Spirit as the power of God. pneúma is mostly used in Mark and Matthew for God's power to perform special acts. Not to see God at work in Jesus' exorcisms is to blaspheme against the Spirit (Mk. 3:28ff.). The community finds here an assurance that the Spirit is with it, and hence an enhancement of the seriousness of the decision it demands. Yet the emphasis is on forgiveness; judgment falls only when there is willful defiance that does not want forgiveness. Mt. 12:28 equates the power of the Spirit in exorcisms with the presence of the kingdom (cf. 12:18, where the healings are seen to denote the dawn of the end-time). Mk. 1:12 is to the same effect. As in the OT, the Holy Spirit is the irresistible power of God operative in the salvation event.

3. General Endowment with the Spirit. The Spirit is equated with Scripture in Mk. 12:36 and is active in the present in Mk. 13:11, where the Spirit's speaking is a sign of God's help in affliction. Mk. 1:8 mentions a general endowment with the Spirit. The imparting of the Spirit corresponds to eschatological expectation. The addition "and fire" in Mt. 3:11 may suggest judgment, and if so, the Spirit hints perhaps at a stormy wind that scatters the chaff. Yet already in baptism believers undergo a sifting and purifying judgment which is itself deliverance.

4. Jesus' Endowment with the Spirit. In Mk. 1:9ff. Jesus' baptism is more than a prophetic call; it depicts the endowment of the Messiah with the Spirit, as attested by the dove and the heavenly voice. God's new age begins, although this beginning involves no conflict with Jesus' prior conception by the Spirit. Jesus is unique in virtue of God's direct work upon him at decisive points. The Hellenistic categories of substance are not used; God himself is at work.

5. Verses Peculiar to Matthew. In Mt. 5:3 the reference is not to those who are poor in the Holy Spirit. The dative is one of relation; the blessing rests on those who are not rich in religious knowledge or achievement but who find their sole help in God. In Mt. 28:19 the new feature is the association of the pneúma with the name. Once the Lord is associated with God, it is easy to associate the Spirit too. This is not the result of speculation or logical inference. It rests on the fact that God is encountered only where he confronts the community, i.e., in the Son, or in the Spirit in whom there is encounter with the Son.

6. Jesus' Conception by the Spirit. Mt. 1:18ff. does not narrate the event but has an angel dispel suspicion about Jesus' conception. As in Luke, the Spirit is God's creative power fashioning the life of this unique child. Popular writings and the exegesis of Is. 7:14 in Hellenistic Judaism form a background, as do many religious parallels. The creative power of the Spirit (cf. the OT) is simply transferred to the process of conception.

7. Summary. The paucity of statements about the Spirit in Mark and Matthew is surprising. Yet it supports the fidelity of the tradition. The temptation to portray Jesus as a pneumatic is resisted. He is clearly the bearer of the Spirit, as his power and authority demonstrate. Yet he does not speak much about the Spirit, perhaps because his disciples cannot understand such things until his work is complete. When the community experiences the outpouring of the Spirit that stamps it as the people of the end-time, it realizes that this rests solely on the coming of Jesus and faith in him. Yet it also perceives that to depict Jesus as a pneumatic is to suggest that he makes it the people of the end-time merely as Example or Teacher. The real point is that God meets his people in Jesus. The Spirit-statements stress his uniqueness, his eschatological status, the direct presence of God in him (cf. Mt. 12:18, 28; Mk. 1:10; 3:29-30; Mt. 1:20). The Spirit is God's power making possible speech and action that are beyond human resources. The phenomena of the Spirit are subordinate to the realization that the messianic age has dawned. They have a christological reference.

II. Luke and Acts.

1. The Relation of the Spirit to Jesus. In Luke and Acts pneúma occurs three times more often than in Mark. In Lk. 4:1 Jesus is full of the Spirit, not subject to the Spirit but acting by the Spirit. In 4:18 the Spirit abides on Jesus. In the conception by the Spirit (1:35), the pneúma is God's life-giving power, but the result of the act is what counts, namely, that Jesus has the Spirit from the first. If the Spirit is later given at baptism, this does not denote growth but shows that each actualization is a new divine act. Himself having the Spirit, Jesus dispenses the Spirit after the resurrection (24:49). Jesus, then, is not a pneumatic like pneumatics in the church. The Spirit manifests himself for the first time in Jesus, and through Jesus comes to the community (cf. Acts 2:33; 10:14, 19).

2. The Abiding of the Spirit with the Community. The Spirit does not leap on the community and then leave it. He shapes its whole existence, not as a natural possession, but as God's abiding Spirit. Thus the term "full of the Spirit" (Acts 6:3; 11:24) stresses the lasting union, while repeated "filling with the Spirit" retains the dynamic aspect (4:8; 13:9).

3. The Outward Manifestations of the Spirit. At the baptism of Jesus, "in bodily form as a dove" stresses the objectivity of the event. The same applies to the phenomena at Pentecost (Acts 2:1ff.) and the earthquake of Acts 4:31. Glossolalia is also an outward manifestation. The Spirit subordinates physical nature to God by extending his work to this area.

4. The Works of the Spirit. In Lk. 12:10 the Spirit is the power of God in the inspired sayings of the witnesses of Jesus; he is the Spirit of prophecy (cf. 4:23ff.). In Luke healings are not associated with the Spirit but with the name of Jesus, with faith in Jesus, with Jesus himself, with prayer, with bodily contact with apostles, and with the power of Jesus. The Spirit enables disciples to speak with tongues and to prophesy (Acts 2:4; Lk. 1:41, 67). He also grants discerning of the heart (Acts 13:9). Above all he gives power to preaching. Prophesying is the work of the Spirit. The eschatological community is a community of prophets. In Acts 5:3, 9 it is hardly likely that we have blasphemy against the Spirit. Perhaps the idea is that the lying is to those who are full of the Spirit (cf. 13:9). A special event takes place in Acts 8:39. Along with prophecy, the Spirit grants other gifts and is also at work in the ethical life of the community. If, as a Hellenist, Luke is interested in the visibility of the Spirit's work, under OT influence he stresses the centrality of prophetic proclamation in this work.

5. The Spirit as a Feature of the Age of the Church. Lk. 11:13 promises the Spirit to those who ask (cf. Mt. 7:11). The Spirit is the absolute gift. The coming of the Spirit is an eschatological event which fulfils the promise of the Spirit to the people of the end-time (cf. Num. 11:29). All the baptized possess the Spirit (Acts 19:2). The Gentiles are included (15:8-9). Endowment with the Spirit goes hand in hand with coming to faith. The outpouring of the Spirit (Acts 2:1ff.) is a renewal of the covenant paralleling in some sense the lawgiving at Sinai. The church age begins, bringing a new speech which all may understand. Yet the Christ event, not the outpouring of the Spirit, is the true eschatological event at the center of time. Hence there can be new outpourings of the Spirit when new steps are taken (cf. 8:17-18; 10:44-45). Again, there may be filling with the Spirit even before the coming of Jesus (Lk. 1-2). At the same time, the Spirit is now given to the church in totality. All God's people are prophets. The Spirit gives believers special gifts enabling them to express their faith in an ongoing history of mission. Luke does not specifically attribute faith, salvation, or obedience to the Spirit. Nor is prayer the Spirit's work. These things precede endowment with the Spirit, which is more specifically an enablement to discharge special tasks. By not attributing the mere existence of the community to the Spirit, Luke reminds it of the task which is indissolubly associated with its existence.

6. The Reception of the Spirit. The Spirit comes with baptism in 2:38; 9:17-18; 19:2, but precedes baptism in 10:44ff. Baptism is not, then, a necessary means of obtaining the Spirit. In the case of Apollos and those at Ephesus, the point is not to relate baptism to the Spirit but to show the movement of salvation from the OT by way of the Baptist to the church. Baptism is a self-evident expression of conversion and as such it is related to the imparting of the Spirit. But prayer and faith are the true preparation for reception. In Acts the freedom of the Spirit is to the fore. If baptism is important, the Spirit may come on people before it (10:44) or without it (2:1ff.). Only in 8:14ff. is endowment with the Spirit linked with the apostolic laying on of hands. Here, however, the relationship with Jerusalem may be the important point. As there is a link with Judaism in Lk. 1-2, so believers in new regions are now associated with the existing community. Prophets and apostles come from Jerusalem (11:27; 8:14). Both Jesus and Paul journey to Jerusalem. God's history goes out from Jerusalem and returns to it. The new act of the Spirit relates to previous acts.

7. Different Meanings of pneúma. Anthropological use occurs in Lk. 1:48, 80, but with a strong sense of divine power (cf. Acts 17:16). The spirit is the part that survives death in Lk. 8:55. In Lk. 24:37 pneúma denotes a shadowy, noncorporeal existence which does not constitute the true I (v. 39).

III. Paul.

1. OT and Hellenistic Strands.

a. The Problem. Thus far the Spirit has been seen as the sign of what is still to come. His outpouring is a prelude to the parousia. His gifts, however, confer power for historical mission. Hellenism finds this a difficult thought, for in its view power means substance. Gnosticism, then, works out the idea that Jesus as the Bearer of the Spirit brings a heavenly substance into the world, attachment to Jesus being attachment to this substantial power. Along these lines the impartation of the Spirit is itself salvation. The role of Jesus is primarily to give instruction. The cross loses its role, and the incarnation becomes a deception of hostile powers.

b. Hellenistic Ideas in Paul. For Paul the cross and resurrection are the great turning point, and life in the Spirit is the life of the new creation: the new existence of the community and not just an added phenomenon. In Rom. 1:3-4 the pneúma denotes the heavenly sphere (cf. 1 Tim. 3:16; 1 Pet. 3:18). Jesus is Son of David in the flesh and Son of God in the Spirit. At his resurrection Jesus, already God's Son in v. 3, is designated the Son by entry into the sphere of divine glory, which stands opposed to the earthly sphere. Yet while the relationship of Christ to the Spirit may be formally a statement about his substance (as in Hellenism), materially it is a statement about his power. The Lord's spiritual body embraces all the members (cf. the phrase "in Christ"). The one body is Christ himself (1 Cor. 12:12). It is not just a coming body but the existing body into which believers are baptized. The en pneúmati of 1 Cor. 12:13 is probably instrumental ("by one Spirit"). The Lord is equated with the Spirit in 2 Cor. 3:17. The point of the saying is that turning to Jesus is turning to the new covenant in the Spirit and hence the removal of the veil that rests over the old covenant. To come to Christ is to come into the sphere of the Spirit. The term "Spirit of the Lord" denotes Christ's mode of existence and the power with which he encounters the community. In his powerful action he is equated with the Spirit, in his lordship over it he is differentiated from the Spirit. The union of believers with Christ in his spiritual body comes out plainly in 1 Cor. 6:17. Christ is a life-giving Spirit in 1 Cor. 15:45, and as such he will give believers a spiritual body (v. 44). Union with Christ insures believers of spiritual life, which is life in the community.

c. Primitive Christian Eschatology. Paul differs from Gnosticism by starting with the resurrection. He never speaks of the spiritual substance of the preexistent Lord. The idea of the spiritual body of the risen Lord is simply an aid to understanding. The spiritual body will be given only at the resurrection as a creative act of the risen Lord. No spiritual body underlies the earthly body. Paul's opponents perhaps believe in a spiritual body that will survive death. For Paul, however, our present image is that of the man of dust (v. 49). We are heavenly only in faith in Christ, who one day will make us heavenly in resurrection reality. Paul does not suggest, of course, that the body itself is a continuum, first physical and then spiritual. The body is marked by weakness and corruptibility. Continuity between the physical and the spiritual body is a work of God's creative power. Humanity is first made of dust but will then be made from heaven. The spiritual body is not made of pneúma but controlled by pneúma. The terms may be Hellenistic, but the matter is biblical. Similarly, in 1 Cor. 6:14 it is clear that consubstantiality with Christ, which the sexual union seems to express, is not the real point. What counts is that God has raised up Jesus and will raise up believers with him. The body here is not a physical substance; it is distinguished from the stomach (v. 13). The union with Christ, though bodily, is personal, not physical. Rom. 8:11 also starts with the resurrection. The God who raised up Jesus is already at work in believers by the Spirit, and in virtue of the work of the Spirit the righteous will rise again.

d. pneúma as a Sign of What Is to Come. If the resurrection and the parousia are decisive, the Spirit is a sign and pledge of what is still to come. The Spirit is the firstfruits (Rom. 8:23) or seal (1 Cor. 1:22). His mighty acts (1 Th. 5:19; Eph. 5:18) are manifestations of his presence. Paul can list tongues, healing, and miracles among these acts (1 Cor. 12). Formally these may resemble the ecstatic phenomena of paganism, but confession of Christ as Lord is a criterion by which to distinguish them (cf. 1 Jn. 4:2 and the ethical test in Mt. 7:16). All Christians are bearers of the Spirit (1 Cor. 14:37). All have gifts-some extraordinary, some not (cf. Rom. 12:7-8). Speaking in tongues has no special importance (1 Cor. 14:5ff.). The criterion of the extraordinary does not apply. The true criterion is confession of Christ and hence the edification of the community.

2. Paul's Interpretation.

a. The Problem. Paul adopts Hellenistic terms that enable him to present the Spirit as representing the new existence in relation to Christ. But he corrects Hellenistic thought along OT lines by showing that salvation is not a human possession. The Spirit represents the new life, for the new creation is present, but there is this new creation and new life only by the decisive event of the cross and resurrection.

b. pneúma as the Power of Faith. In 1 Cor. 2:6ff. the Spirit is the power that mediates understanding of the gospel of the cross. The Spirit fixes both the form and content of preaching. The content is formally Gnostic ("the depths of God" in v. 10) but materially it is the very opposite (God's saving work at the cross). The wisdom of God revealed by the Spirit (vv. 7ff.) is foolishness to the nonspiritual (v. 14). The cross divides the old world and the new. If the Spirit is the power that takes us out of the old age, union with the Lord is given, not in pneumatic materiality, but with the knowledge that the Spirit gives of the crucified Lord. The significance of the spiritual body, then, is that of entry into the saving event of the crucifixion and resurrection. Bearers of the Spirit do not live by a new substance but wholly by God's work. The Spirit gives the new life, but not as supplementary miraculous power nor as substantial possession. The new knowledge is supernatural, yet not because it is taught or received ecstatically. The knowledge relates to the act of divine love at the cross, and the miracle is believing that God is for us in Jesus Christ. Hence the Spirit is the Spirit of faith (2 Cor. 4:13). The primary gift is confession of Christ (1 Cor. 12:3). No human merit secures the Spirit (Gal. 3:14). The work of the Spirit lies in ongoing as well as initial faith (Gal. 5:5). The whole life of sonship derives from the Spirit (4:6). Integration both into God's saving event and hence also into the body of Christ is ascribed to the Spirit (1 Cor. 6:11). Being in the Spirit is the same as being in Christ, for the Spirit, as the subjective cause of justification, reveals Christ. The orientation is still to the future. Thus the hope of righteousness (Gal. 5:5), or awareness of the coming redemption (Rom. 8:23), is the gift of the Spirit. The Spirit is no magical power but the power of God for affirmative life. Creating faith, the Spirit is the norm by which faith lives. Thus in Gal. 5:25 the Spirit is the power of God that sustains life, but believers must let their lives be shaped thereby. To live in the Spirit is to renounce the flesh and to be responsive to God and neighbor.

c. Renunciation of the Flesh. The antithesis of Spirit and flesh is that of divine power and human weakness (Gal. 3:2, 5). Living in the Spirit is relying on God's power, not on one's own strength. Worshipping God in the Spirit means having no confidence in the flesh but glorying in Christ (Phil. 3:3). Revelation of God's work by the Spirit demands renunciation of human wisdom (1 Cor. 2:6ff.). Circumcision of the heart in the Spirit sets aside human criteria (Rom. 2:29; cf. 2 Cor. 3:6). Whereas the law uncovers sin, and even incites to it, the Spirit gives the new life of service (Rom. 7:5-6). In Gal. 4:25ff. the two births (by the flesh and the Spirit) represent living by human possibilities and living by divine promise. In Gal. 5:17 believers are not just neutral. The flesh is their own will, but having crucified the flesh they may live and walk by the Spirit. Their life is thus determined by whether they sow to the Spirit or to the flesh (6:8). The liberating norm of the Spirit is that God has done what the law could not do. While the flesh to which one might sow is one's own, the Spirit is a divinely given possibility. To walk in the Spirit (Rom. 8:4-5) is to accept the normative power of God. This implies a decision of faith, although this, too, is God's act. On the basis of God's saving work, those who walk in the Spirit fulfil the law (Rom. 8:4). The antithesis of Spirit and flesh is not a cosmological factor. It arises through God's act in Christ as this is accepted by the Spirit in faith, or rejected.

d. The Spirit as Response to God and Neighbor. The proper act of the Spirit is prayer (Rom. 8:15, 27; Gal. 4:6). The Spirit bears witness to the sonship established in Christ and makes the life of sonship possible. Sonship, however, means service, meeting the demands of the law and not fulfilling the desires of the flesh (Rom. 7:5-6). Loving others is faith at work (Gal. 5:6, 14). Living by Christ, by grace, by the cross, means freedom from the law and freedom for love. The Spirit produces fruit, not works (5:22). But this fruit finds expression in concrete acts, e.g., of worship (1 Cor. 12-14) and love (1 Cor. 13). Love includes all else (Col. 1:8). Yet love relates to faith and is oriented to other gifts. Similarly, when the Spirit sanctifies (Rom. 15:16; 1 Cor. 6:11), this means both that he sets us in God's saving action and that he enables us to live thereby in obedience. He does not destroy individuality (as in Gnosticism) or bring separation from others by knowledge, for knowledge is subordinate to love. The Spirit frees from self and opens up to others, restoring an individuality whereby one may stand before God and live for one's neighbor. The community thus becomes a regulative concept. Spiritual gifts are valuable if they edify, and each has some gift. The Spirit as God's power allows no appeal to wonderful religious potentialities but makes trust in oneself impossible and opens up the self to a life of love. The cross is both the ransom and the call to repentance, i.e., to the shattering of false security. The Spirit is no additional phenomenon. The Spirit is the power of God bringing people to faith in Christ's cross and resurrection, both as a dynamic force and as the basis of a lasting being in Christ. This power determines the new life of faith.

3. The Spirit and Christ. In Rom. 8:1ff. Paul alternates such phrases as the Spirit dwelling in you (v. 9) and Christ being in you (v. 10). This might suggest that the exalted Christ is Spirit, but "in the Spirit" might also be taken instrumentally. Paul's concern, of course, is not to differentiate Christ and the Spirit as persons, but to state in what sphere of power believers live. The pneúma in Paul is often impersonal (1 Th. 5:19), and the term may alternate with wisdom or power (1 Cor. 2:4-5). Indeed, the pneúma may be the spirit that is given to us. Even if the pneúma is said to speak etc., the same is said of wisdom or the flesh. Nevertheless, the Spirit is not an obscure or anonymous force. The Lord is present by the Spirit (cf. 2 Cor. 3:17- 18), and God, Christ, and Spirit are associated inasmuch as they encounter believers in the same event (cf. 1 Cor. 12:4ff.). In 2 Cor. 13:13, the genitive could be objective (cf. Phil. 3:10), but the parallels are against this; fellowship with the Spirit (as granted by the Spirit) is the point. The three terms also occur together in Rom. 5:1ff. and Gal. 4:4ff., which show that God's work in the Son or Spirit is always genuinely God's own work. The mode of relationship is not, of course, an issue.

4. The Anthropological pneúma. Since the Holy Spirit affects the whole person and cannot be explained psychologically, Paul adopts popular anthropological ideas quite freely. He uses pneúma for psychological functions in 1 Cor. 7:34; 2 Cor. 7:1. It is parallel to psychḗ in Phil. 1:27, denotes the whole person in 2 Cor. 2:13, and is equivalent to "you" in closing greetings (Gal. 6:18; Phil. 4:23). In the last resort, however, the pneúma is for Paul the God-given pneúma that is alien to us (cf. 1 Cor. 14:14; Rom. 1:9). In 1 Cor. 5:3ff. the pneúma seems to be the new I of faith which will be saved if purifying judgment is exercised on the flesh. Paul's pneúma, however, is his divinely given authority. The human pneúma is not the soul perfected by the Spirit, for it, too, is given by God (Rom. 8:15). The secret of Paul's use lies in the priority of the work of the Holy Spirit and the determination of the believer's existence thereby. The Spirit manifests Christ's saving work and makes responsible acceptance of it possible. Hence pneúma denotes both God's Spirit and the innermost being of those who no longer live by the self but by God's being for them.

5. pneumatikós. The pneumatikoí are for Paul those who know God's saving work by the Spirit (1 Cor. 2:13-15). The psychikoí do not know it and are thus controlled by the spirit of the world. A distinction is made between pneumatic and physical bodies in 1 Cor. 15:44-46. The spiritual know spiritual things (pneumatiká; 1 Cor. 2:13; 9:11; Rom. 15:27) in contrast to earthly things, i.e., those pertaining to natural life. Spiritual gifts are called pneumatiká in 1 Cor. 14:1. The law, too, is pneumatikós (Rom. 7:14). It is the law of God (vv. 22, 25) deriving from the divine world, not the human.

IV John.

1. The Significance of Eschatology. John strongly proclaims the presence of the salvation that will one day be consummated. He does not depict Jesus as a pneumatic, nor ascribe his words and acts to the Spirit. In Christ one meets the Father himself and not just his gift. The descent of the Spirit in Jn. 1:33 demonstrates but does not effect the divine sonship of Jesus. It is believers who are born of the Spirit in 1:13.

2. pneúma as a Sphere in Antithesis to sárx. pneúma and sárx represent the spheres of God and the world in Jn. 3:6; 6:63. pneúma is the equivalent of theós, sárx of diábolos or kósmos. God is pneúma in 4:24. The eschatological hour has come, but it is a summons to encounter with God in Christ, not a meeting of the substance of God with a similar substance in humanity. To worship God in pneúma is not to worship in one's own spirituality but to worship in the world of God and hence of true reality. The true God (1 Jn. 5:20) has entered the world in Christ. True worship is thus oriented to the incarnate Son. To know truth is to know the true God in Jesus (cf. Jn. 8:32; 17:3). "In spirit," then, is equivalent to Paul's "in Christ." No worship is "in spirit" unless it is based on the divine act in Christ.

3. pneúma as Life-giving Power in Antithesis to sárx. In Jn. 3:3ff. pneúma is the divine world that is accessible only to those who live in the spirit because they are born of the Spirit. For John life is knowledge (17:3). Christ abolishes the distinction between God and world. The pneúma is the world of God as the sphere that controls the new life. Birth of the Spirit is the given realization that in Jesus God has come into the world. This realization is not within human capability. It means renunciation of human possibilities and acceptance of God's gift in faith. The wind (pneúma; 3:8) is like the Spirit, but the point is that those who are born of the Spirit are compared to the wind; the world knows nothing of their whence or whither. Although faith leads to love, the world has no criteria by which to measure regeneration by the Spirit. In 6:63 the sárx profits nothing but the pneúma gives life through Jesus' words. Here (cf. vv. 51ff.) the sárx is that of Jesus, which avails only when the pneúma grants the realization that life is to be found in it, i.e., when the Spirit shows in the sárx of Jesus the glory of the Father. We are not to try to take the external element spiritually (cf. the sacraments), nor to seek life in it alone; we can discern glory and find life only in the Spirit's power. Similarly in 7:38-39 the point is that the Spirit as the water of life will flow into the community in proclamation by word and act, but only after the death of Jesus. In the imparting of the Spirit in Jn. 20:22 the Spirit is the power of proclamation which leads to the knowledge of the true God that means life. The authority of this proclamation is of decisive concern.

4. The Paraclete. As the Spirit of truth (14:17; 15:26; 16:13), the Paraclete represents the world of reality. In him the world of God, present in Jesus, will continue to be present in the word (17:13ff.). He is in the disciples (14:17). The disciples know both him and Jesus (14:17; 16:3), who are both sent by the Father (14:24, 26), teaching and witnessing, yet not speaking about themselves (17:14; 14:26; 8:14; 15:26; 14:10; 16:13). The Paraclete is another Paraclete in whom Jesus comes but who is not Jesus (14:18; 16:7). He abides with believers forever (14:16). He alone truly discloses Jesus to them (14:26), showing that the historical Jesus is the Son and giving force to his words (16:8ff.). While the Spirit's own words are the same as those of Jesus (6:63) and the community (20:22-23), it is thus that he is advocate and supporter. God is pneúma, and only those who come to him are in the pneúma. But pneúma is not a heavenly substance; pneúma is the power that gives encounter with God through the knowledge of Christ, the power that is present in the proclamation of the community, shaping the life of the eschatological people of God and in so doing summoning and judging the world.

V. The Rest of the NT.

1. The Pauline Circle.

a. Ephesians. pneúma is here the power of growth (3:16), of prayer (6:18), and of revelation (1:17). The Spirit works in Scripture (6:17). The one Spirit is related to the one body of Christ (4:4). An evil pneúma works in the lost, and evil spiritual powers rule in the air (2:2; 6:12). The Spirit is a seal in 1:13-14; 4:30, although with no sense of a substance.

b. The Pastorals. Here we have formulas in 1 Tim. 3:16; 2 Tim. 4:22. The prophetic Spirit is at issue in 1 Tim. 4:1. Everyday qualities manifest the work of the Spirit (cf. 2 Tim. 1:7). In Tit. 3:5 the Spirit effects the new birth which means justification and hope. 1 Tim. 4:1 refers to seducing spirits.

2. Hebrews. In Heb. 12:23 the spirits are the departed. In 1:14 angels are meant. The Spirit who speaks in Scripture is at issue in 3:7; 9:8; 10:15. pneúma and psychḗ are distinguished in 4:12. Miracles are works of the Spirit in 2:4; 6:4-5. The Spirit apportions his gifts as he wills (2:4) and offers a foretaste of the coming aeon (6:4-5). He is a sign of eschatological grace in 10:29. In 9:14 Christ offers himself as one who comes from the sphere of the Spirit and who has the Spirit; hence he brings a salvation that lasts beyond the sárx. The diá (“through”) denotes the nature and manner of the sacrifice.

3. The Catholic Epistles.

a. James. The use in Jms. 2:26 is anthropological (body and spirit). Similarly in 4:5 the spirit is the spirit which God has set in us and will require of us.

b. 1 Peter. The Spirit of 1 Pet. 1:11-12 is the prophetic Spirit working in the OT prophets and the apostles. In 1:2 the Spirit is the power of sanctification. The spirit of glory rests on those who are reproached for the name in 4:14. 3:18-19 and 4:6 refer to the spheres in which judgment and deliverance are enacted. In 3:19 the en hṓ probably has the general sense “wherein”; one event of the resurrection is intended. The spirits in prison are the departed, not demons. The dead of 4:6 are probably not the spiritually dead and can hardly be dead Christians. “Judged in the flesh” seems to refer to death as a judgment in the earthly sphere.

c. 2 Peter and Jude. In 2 Pet. 1:21 the Spirit is the prophetic Spirit inspiring canonical Scripture. In Jude 19-20 worldly people are devoid of the Spirit, but believers pray in the Spirit as they also keep themselves in God’s love and wait for the mercy of Christ.

d. 1 John. In 1 John the pneúma marks the great turning point of the ages; this consists of Christ’s abiding in his people (3:24). The Spirit is a gift (4:13). He bears witness (5:6ff.) as the power of proclamation. His testimony to the incarnate Christ opposes the spirit of antichrist (4:2ff.). This is the criterion by which to know his authentic utterances.

4. Revelation. Unclean demonic forces are pneúmata in Rev. 16:13-14; 18:2. The Spirit of prophecy plays a dominant role (19:10). The pneúma gives visions and leads off into wonderful regions (17:3; 21:10). In 11:8 pneumatikṓs means “in prophetic speech.” The Spirit still speaks (14:13); the one through whom he speaks is immaterial (cf. 2:17; 14:13). The Lord speaks as the Spirit speaks (cf. 2:1, 7, 8, 11). The church calls for its Lord in the power of the Spirit (22:17). The seven spirits are probably the seven archangels; grace and peace go forth from them (1:4); they stand before the throne (4:5); they are sent out over the earth (5:6); they represent the Spirit in all his fullness; they are also parallel to the angels of the churches. If they depict God’s work in concrete figures, the work is still God’s, and they thus represent God’s own action.

F. The Apostolic Fathers.

1. The Gnostic-Substantial Strand. Three dangers develop in the post-NT period. First, Christ tends to be made a spiritual substance. This applies to the preexistent Lord in 2 Clem. 9.5; Hermas Similitudes 9.1.1. Even Ignatius sees in Christ a union of the substances of flesh and spirit (Ephesians 7.2; Smyrneans 3.2-3).

2. The Ecstatic Strand. Second, the Spirit is confused with psychological phenomena (Hermas Visions 1.1.3), which may be a reward for special faith (1 Clem. 2.2).

3. The Official Strand. Third, those instituted to office are seen to have the guarantee of endowment by the Spirit (Ignatius Philadelphians 7.1-2; 1 Clem. 4.1-2).

1. pnéō denotes a. the blowing of the wind, b. breathing or snorting, c. wafting forth, and d. full of, or panting for.

2. The first two senses occur in the LXX (cf. the wind in Ps. 148:8 and the breath of God in Is. 40:24). empnéō occurs for the inbreathing of the soul in Gen. 2:7.

3. In the NT the blowing of various winds is what is meant in Mt. 7:25; Jn. 6:18; Lk. 12:55; Rev. 7:1. The blowing of the wind denotes the Spirit's work in Jn. 3:8. Only in Acts 9:1 do we have the sense "breathing out" (empnéō).

4. The sense "to be fragrant" occurs in Mart. Pol. 15.2 (the scent of the dying martyr is like incense) and Ignatius Ephesians 17.1 (the anointed Jesus wafts incorruption on the church as a divine fragrance).

ekpnéō. This word means "to breathe out," "to blow out," "to flag," "to expire." In the NT it occurs only in Mk. 15:37, 39 with a suggestion of the vital force leaving the body at death. Mt. 27:50; Jn. 19:30; Lk. 23:46 show that the true self may still survive with the handing over of the spirit to God.

1. This word means "blowing" (wind or fire), "snorting," "afflation," the "sound" of a wind instrument, e.g., the flute.

2. In the LXX it denotes the stormy wind as God's breath (2 Sam. 22:16). The human spirit is God's inbreathing (Job 27:3). pnéō is the human spirit or wisdom in such passages as Prov. 1:23; 11:13; 20:27; 24:12.

3. Philo in Allegorical Interpretation of Laws 1.33.42 suggests that pnoḗ in Gen. 2:7 signifies the spirit that is created in the divine image.

4. A mighty wind (pnoḗ) announces the Spirit's coming in Acts 2:2. The Creator gives the breath of life to all people in 17:25.

theópneustos. This word is used for the wisdom or dreams that come from God. In the NT it occurs only in 2 Tim. 3:16, where, along with "sacred," it describes the OT writings that have divine authority. In the Hellenistic world the idea of inspiration is common but seldom refers to writings. In Judaism, however, God inscribes the commandments on tablets (Ex. 24:12) and inspires the prophets (Num. 24:2ff.). The law, being taught, dictated, or written directly by God, has supreme authority, but later works, being inspired by God, have a secondary authority. Philo regards all the OT authors as prophets. 2 Tim. 3:16 advances no particular theory of enthusiastic inspiration, uses no comparisons such as that of the flow of air through the flute, and offers no criteria such as the agreement of witnesses, the age of the writing, or the fulfilment of prophecies. The stress is on the work of Scripture. [E. SCHWEIZER, VI, 389-455]

pnígō [to choke, strangle], apopnígō [to choke], sympnígō [to choke out], pniktós [choked, strangled]

1. In this group, which comes from tragedy, the compounds are more common but have the same meanings as the simple form: a. "to stifle," b. "to choke," c. "to strangle," "throttle," and d. figuratively "to afflict," "to alarm." In the passive pnígesthai often means "to drown." The verbal adjective pniktós means "strangled" or "suffocated."

2. The group is rare in the LXX (cf. 1 Sam. 16:14-15; Nah. 2:13).

3. In the NT the swine are drowned (Mk. 5:1ff.), the seed is choked by thorns (Mt. 13:7; Lk. 8:7; Mk. 4:7), i.e., by riches, cares, desires, or pleasures (Mk. 4: 13ff.; Mt. 13:22; Lk. 8:14), the wicked servant seizes his fellow servant by the throat (Mt. 18:28), and the crowd almost suffocates Jesus (Lk. 8:42) when he is on his way to raise Jairus' daughter. The use of pniktón raises special problems in Acts 15:20, 29; 21:25. It is open to textual challenge, especially in Acts 15. The issue is the prohibiting of certain foods on the basis of Lev. 17:13-14; Dt. 12:16, 23. The OT regulations had been sharpened by the rabbis, but the NT does not use the terms found in the LXX, preferring pniktón, which does not occur there. It seems that the practice of eating the flesh of strangled or choked animals falls under the OT prohibition, and since Gentile customs are connected with the cultus they cause particular aversion to Jews, including Jewish Christians. The apostolic decree in its four-membered form is a measure taken against pagan practices. [H. BIETENHARD, VI, 455-58]

poiéō [to create, make, do, act], poíēma [creation, work, action], poíēsis [creating, making, doing], poiētḗs [Creator, maker, doer]

A. God's Action as Creator and in Dealings with Humanity.

I. The Greek World and Stoicism.

1. In myths poiéō denotes the creative activity of deity. Zeus creates all things, including heaven and the gods. Plato has the term for creating by the chief deity but not for fashioning by the demiurge. God is ho poiṓn.

2. The Stoics seldom use the group for their deity. The lógos ho theós dwelling in hýlē is tó poioún for Zeno etc., but later writers do not use the group apart from Epictetus with his more personal view of God as poiētḗs or patḗr. Stoicism in general is more interested in the permeation of the world by deity and its resultant beauty and harmony.

II. The LXX.

1. The LXX often uses the group for God's creative activity. God created heaven and earth (Gen. l:lff.). He created humanity (1:27). He is ho poiḗsas (Prov. 14:31). He is the Creator of the chosen people (Is. 43:1). poíēsis denotes either his creating (Ps. 19:2) or his creation (Sir. 16:26).

2. The LXX often uses the terms for God's dealings in history. The poiēmata denote his actions or works (Eccl. 1:14). These take the twofold form of judgment (Num. 14:35; Ezek. 5:10) and salvation (Ex. 13:8). Signs and mighty acts testify to his working (Ex. 15:11; Dt. 11:3).

3. Angels etc. execute God's word (Job 40:19; Ps. 103:20).

III. Rabbinic Judaism. The rabbis often refer to God's creation, e.g., in prayer and thanksgiving. The Qumran writings see in God the creator of the two kinds of spirits. The creation of man and woman by God is an argument against polygamy. Miracles display God's creative work.

IV. Josephus, Philo, and the Hermetic Writings.

1. Josephus uses LXX language with only slight modifications.

2. Philo follows the LXX, but philosophical influence appears in his distinction of terms for various objects of God's work (plássō and poiéō) and his refusal to see in God the creator of bad impulses. He stresses the ongoing nature of God's action, compares it to begetting, and does not refer to miraculous works. On the other hand, he stresses creation out of nothing. In his view God may obviously be known from his work.

3. In the Hermetic writings the patḗr is poiētḗs. Generation is parallel to poieín. God creates all things; hence the cosmos testifies to the existence of the one Creator. Yet a pantheistic element is present and there is a dualistic strand, for only good things derive from God. In a Gnostic development the Noús dēmiourgós is interposed between the supreme God and earthly elements.

V. The NT and Early Christianity.

1. The NT takes it for granted that God is Creator, but seldom uses the poie- group. In Acts 4:24; 14:15; Rev. 14:7 God is Creator of heaven and earth (cf. Ex. 20:11). In Mk. 10:6 the indissolubility of marriage rests on the fact that in the beginning God made them male and female. Acts 7:50 quotes Is. 66:2, Acts 17:24 Is. 42:5, and Heb. 1:7 Ps. 104:4. In Heb. 3:2 God is the one who appoints (poiḗsas) Jesus. Rom. 9:20 echoes the LXX but Acts 17:26 is more Hellenistic. Heb. 12:27 contrasts what has been made and may be shaken with what cannot be shaken. For Paul God's works of creation guarantee his knowability in principle (Rom. 1-2), but in fact humanity refuses this knowledge. In Heb. 1:2 the Son is the one through whom God made the world; John does not use the group in this connection. The NT uses neither poiētḗs nor poíēsis for God's creative work.

2. Apart from creation, the group denotes God's judicial and more often his redemptive activity. References to immanent or eschatological judgment occur in Lk. 1:51; 18:7-8; Mt. 18:35; Jude 15. God's saving work is the theme in Lk. 1:68, 72; Heb. 13:21; 8:9. God makes the gospel known to the Gentiles (Acts 15:17), acts through the apostles (14:27), and ends temptation (1 Cor. 10:13). His work surpasses all we can ask or think (Eph. 3:20). He makes all things new (Rev. 21:5). Christians are his poíēma (Eph. 2:10). He does what he promises (Rom. 4:21). He finishes what he has begun (1 Th. 5:24). He does signs and wonders (Acts 2:22; 15:12; 19:11). He works out his purpose in Jesus (Eph. 3:11), making him sin at the cross (2 Cor. 5:21) and instituting him Lord (Acts 2:36). The Father works in the words of Jesus (Jn. 5:19-20). Luke likes the group, Paul uses it for God's faithfulness in the Christ event, and John gives it a christological reference. Much of the material derives from the LXX, but John takes Gnostic usage and historicizes it.

3. The NT speaks, too, of the work of supernatural beings, but only negatively and in Revelation. The work of the beasts, the dragon, and the unclean spirits is to instigate war (Rev. 11:7), perform miracles (13:13), persecute the church (12:15), and seduce the world (13:12).

B. Human Work before God.

I. The Greek World and Stoicism.

1. Human Work and Salvation.

a. In Plato other groups are used to express the destiny of the soul in the judgment. What counts is apprehension of the good rather than conduct. pán poieín means making every effort, and since conduct according to the idea of the good is natural to humanity, it is attainable. Doing is no problem.

b. Stoicism agrees. Immanent deity coincides with the law by which sages direct their steps and which it is natural for them to follow. Censure arises only in relation to secondary things. Right poieín comes when the external that is not in one's power is disregarded. The orientation is to what is in keeping with phýsis.

2. Details of Usage. poieín is used for making such things as houses, graves, and temples. In Plato it denotes the humbler work of the artisan, but it is also parallel to prássein. Things done include good and evil. One may also make war or bring peace. poieín can also denote the celebrating of feasts or the producing of fruit by the earth. Other senses are "to suppose," "to spend time," "to bring out," and "to value." A common meaning is "to act." The human poiētḗs is the "maker," e.g., of laws, then the "poet." poíēma is what is produced either externally or intellectually. It is also "action"; hence poiḗmata are "deeds." poíēsis is both manual and intellectual activity; it acquires the special sense of "poetry" or "poem."

II. The LXX.

I. Noncommanded Secular poieín. Many LXX references are to secular activity that is not specially commanded, e.g., making cakes (Gen. 18:6), traversing roads (Judg. 17:8), making war (Gen. 14:2), or appointing overseers (1 Macc. 1:51). For the most part this activity is of no theological significance.

2. Noncommanded Secular poieín in Parables. In the LXX poieín is rare in parables. The work of the potter illustrates God's sovereignty in Jer. 18:4. As the vessel cannot argue with its poiḗsas, so human beings cannot argue with God (Is. 29:16; 45:9).

3. Commanded Secular poieín. Human action is mainly commanded or forbidden. God asks about the poieín of Eve and Cain (Gen. 3:13; 4:10). Acts of kings are under divine judgment. God's will lies behind the finding of a bride for Isaac (Gen. 24:66). God commands the making of the ark (Gen. 6:14ff.) and cultic objects, e.g., the altar, the ark, and the sanctuary, for which he gives the necessary skill (Ex. 31). Israel is not to make images (Ex. 20:4). Also commanded is right conduct, e.g., in inheritance (Ex. 21:9) or handling a dangerous ox (21:31).

4. Commanded poieín toward One's Neighbor. Commands and prohibitions apply especially to conduct toward one's neighbor. We first find this in concrete acts, e.g., doing what is right (Gen. 20:13) or showing mercy (Josh. 2:12). Wrong acts may also be denoted; thus Isaac is not to hurt Abimelech (Gen. 26:29). poieín, then, may be good, bad, or neutral (Judg. 13:8), but emphasis falls on the doing of good (2 Sam. 2:6; Zech. 7:9; 2 Chr. 9:8), i.e., on the doing of what is right because God expressly demands it.

5. Commanded poieín toward the Law, the Will of God, or Individual Commands.

a. Terminology. In the sense "to do" poieín is used with the neuter of the relative pronoun or with relative clauses; in the sense "to execute" it has many objects, e.g., statutes, righteousness, truth; in the sense "to act" we find "in accordance with," e.g., the law. Often we find "all the law or statutes" to express complete obedience. God may demand specific actions, e.g., in the cultus (feasts, sacrifices, etc.). poieín may also be used for transgression of God's commandments, doing wrong, committing sins, which may seem right in human eyes but are wrong in God's eyes. Trying to make a name in Gen. 11:4 expresses the arrogance of those who build the tower of Babel. The Canaanites might make Israel sin in Ex. 23:33, and Manasseh sets up soothsayers in 2 Chr. 33:6.

b. Human Work and Salvation. Doing what is commanded underlies the covenant. Jeremiah postulates an eschatological new covenant (31:31ff.) and Isaiah invokes unseen forces to make a highway for God (40:3). But it is by doing the law that there is life (Lev. 18:4-5). Observance is presupposed (15:31). Ezekiel calls for the making of a new heart and spirit (18:31). Only willful sins cannot be expiated (cf.

Num. 15:30). Sin occurs, and it involves dependence on God, but God has provided cultic means for dealing with it.

6. The Doing of Miracles. Various individuals like Moses, Elijah, and Elisha perform miracles (Ex. 4:17, 30; 2 Kgs. 8:4). They do so as the Lord commands (Ex. 7:6).

7. poieín as Bringing Forth. The earth brings forth fruit (Gen. 41:47; Lev. 25:21, etc.).

a. poíēma. This word denotes human products, works, acts, or deeds in a negative, neutral, or positive sense. It carries a semiskeptical nuance in Ecclesiastes.

b. poíēsis. Actively human poíēsis is performance, doing, or keeping, and passively it is being made. The meaning "poetry" does not occur.

c. poiētḗs. The human poiētḗs in 1 Macc. 2:67 is the doer (not the maker) of the law. The meaning "poet" does not occur.

III. Rabbinic and Apocalyptic Judaism. The rabbis have doubts about a doing of the law that will be adequate at the judgment, and the Qumran sect and the Essenes intensify legal observance in answer to the problem. The thought of judgment is a spur to work. Apocalyptists stress the value of confession, and Qumran thinks right conduct is truly possible only with conversion to the sect.

IV. Philo and the Hermetic Writings.

1. Usage. Philo finds a link between légein and poieín. He uses poieín in the sense "to work." poíēsis and poiētḗs are for him poetic terms whereby he shows himself sympathetic to Hellenistic culture.

2. Human Work and Salvation. If, for Philo, goodness comes from God, it also coincides with human activity, and faith is a state of soul that does not stand in contrast to works. On the higher level of the noús, activity is left behind in the vision of God, and works lose their point. In the Hermetic writings the regenerate are summoned to good works, but regeneration is a regrasping of the innate divine element; because, in regeneration, initiates are no longer identical with their empirical selves, ethical acts are not of real concern. The appeal is not for concrete works but for forsaking death, ignorance, and error. As in Philo, then, the problem of works is bypassed.

3. Magic. A special use of poieín is for performing magical acts which take place in the name of a specific deity and which involve incantations. poíēsis is the term for the performance of these magical acts.

V. The NT.

1. The Works of Jesus. As regards Jesus, the main reference is not to the purposes or works of the exalted Lord (cf. Jn. 14:23; Rev. 3:9; 1:6; 3:12), but to the poieín of the earthly Jesus. Secular and cultic acts play only a minor role here (cf. Jn. 2:5; Mt. 26:18). The works are mostly acts of power. poieín denotes the appointment of the disciples in Mk. 1:7. Jesus is asked to justify his works (Mk. 11:28); in them he is thought to make himself equal to God (Jn. 5:18 etc.). He does the Father's works; this does not express his subordination but the fact that God forces people to decision in his words and works. His work on the cross makes peace between Jews and Gentiles (Eph. 2:14-15). This is the unique and once-for-all sacrifice for sin (Heb. 1:3; 7:27). He committed no sin (1 Pet. 2:22). His ministry consisted of doing and teaching (Acts 1:1). The stress on doing fences off the teaching from rationalistic misunderstanding and safeguards his historical singularity against ontological dissolution.

*2. Noncommanded Secular poieín. This type of poieín is seldom at issue in the NT. It is ascribed to political figures (Mk. 6:20), opponents (Mk. 15:15), minor characters (Acts 27:18), and disciples (Lk. 5:29). It may be the observing of customs (Mk. 15:8). Often God's will is implied or probable (cf. Jn.

19:23). As regards Christians, the Christ event embraces all their poieín (1 Cor. 10:31). As regards Christ himself, and also the church, the authority of God is everywhere dominant. Acts in 17:28 uses poiētaí for the poets, but even they are indirectly God's witnesses. poíēma and poíēsis never denote poetry in the NT.

3. Noncommanded Secular poieín in Parables. This type of poieín is much more common in the NT than in the LXX; cf. the unjust steward (Lk. 16:3-4), the servant with the talents (Mt. 25:16), making the hair white or black (Mt. 5:36), the rich fool (Lk. 12:17-18), the vinedressers (Mt. 21:36). The parables of the two sons and the servant (Mt. 21:31; Lk. 17:9) are directed against the Pharisees; action is obedience. The parables reflect God's dealings, either directly (Mk. 12:9) or less directly. The equal reward for varied poieín (Mt. 20:5, 12, 15) contests the equation of reward and merit and teaches God's sovereign generosity. The servant who does not know what his master is doing contrasts with Jesus himself (Jn. 15:15). The relations between Jesus and common people, which are offensive to religious leaders, lie behind many of the parables depicting God's work.

4. Commanded Secular poieín. This type of poieín is rare in the NT. Cultically one may adduce Mk. 9:5; Acts 7:40; Rev. 13:14; Heb. 8:5 (Ex. 25:40). The disciples are censured when they obey Jesus in Mk. 11:3, 5, as is Paul in Acts 24:12. Joseph obeys in Mt. 1:24, Peter in Acts 10:33, the disciples in Mt. 21:6, believers in Col. 4:16, and the kings in Rev. 17:16.

5. Commanded or Forbidden poieín toward One's Neighbor.

a. Doing Good. Material for this kind of poieín is plentiful. Doing good has the sense of showing love in Mt. 5:46-47 etc., of almsgiving in Mt. 6:2-3; Acts 11:30, of preaching freely in 2 Cor. 11:7, of intercession in Rom. 1:9, of establishing joy and peace in Acts 15:3, of making converts in Mt. 23:15; Acts 26:28.

b. Doing Harm. poieín is seldom neutral. When the action is negative, it is censured or forbidden, e.g., wrong treatment by believers (Mt. 25:45), sexual offenses (5:32), the harm done by persecution (Mk. 9:13). Good should be done to all people, for the command of love is unconditional and the required obedience is radical.

6. Commanded poieín toward Jesus. People meet the earthly Jesus in various ways, positively with cultic correctitude (Lk. 2:27), seeking healing (Mk. 5:32), and showing reverence (Mk. 14:8-9), and negatively with lack of understanding (Jn. 6:15) and enmity, both before (Lk. 6:11) and during the passion (Mk. 15:1 etc.). The exalted Lord is either accepted (Mt. 25:40) or rejected (25:45). Only in the light of Easter is right conduct toward Jesus emphasized as important, and even later it is by way of needy brethren or the community that one acts toward the Lord (Mt. 25:40, 45; Acts 26:10).

7. Commanded poieín toward the Law, God's Will, and the Proclamation of Jesus.

a. Terminology. Most of the NT poieín passages belong under 7., no matter whether the sense is "to do," "to execute," or "to act." One is to do as God commands, and an account must be rendered to God. Obedience is of paramount importance; faith means involvement (Jn. 7:17). Believers are to do God's will (Eph. 6:6) and bring forth fruit (Mt. 3:8). Sin is not to be committed (Mt. 13:41). There must be agreement between saying (Mt. 7:21) or hearing (Lk. 6:47) and doing, or between the hearer and doer (poiētḗs; Rom. 2:13).

b. Human Work and Salvation.

(a) The focus on conversion to Jesus raises the question what we must do (Mk. 10:17; Acts 2:37). Jesus answers this question on his own authority, not setting aside the law, but stressing love above cultic observance, emphasizing motivation, and rejecting all claims on God. At one and the same time sharpening the demand, negating merit, and pointing to God's unconditional grace, Jesus both requires and makes possible a true doing of the law.

(b) Developing the same points, Paul contrasts doing law-righteousness with doing faith-righteousness. Only the latter leads to salvation (Rom. 10:5-6; Gal. 3:10, 12). There are no true poiētaí of the law (Rom. 2:13); if there were, the work of Christ would not be needed. The demand of the law remains, but the law is now to be done in the obedience of faith. Faith sets life under the law in a new light. This life involves a contradiction between what is willed and what is done (Rom. 7:15, 19). Hence legalism cannot lead to its goal. On the basis of salvation and the Spirit, however, believers may both will and do (Gal. 5:17) in a walk which embraces all the commands of love (1 Cor. 10:31; Phil. 2:14; Col. 3:17). God's gracious Yes is the basis of the Christian life, making it possible for believers, who walk in the Spirit, to do what God wills and they themselves also will.

(c) In John the origin of people determines what they do. Committing sin is a sign of corrupt origin (Jn. 8:34, 41, 44). To do good works one must be a shoot of the true vine (15:5). Coming from the Father, Jesus displays the kind of action required (13:5). His going to the Father enables his followers to do greater works (14:12) as temporal restrictions are removed. In 1 John those who are born of God do naturally what is good (2:29; 3:7ff.). Works are not in tension with salvation but are integrated into it. Love manifests itself in keeping the commandments (5:2). Doing righteousness stands in paradoxical unity with confessing sin (1:8ff.). Prayer is heard when what pleases God is done (3:22).

(d) A relaxing of the tension between faith and works may be seen in Mt. 5:19 and Acts 28:17. The point is made in 1 Tim. 1:13 that Paul acted ignorantly in unbelief when he persecuted Christ. God's mercy brings knowledge, and salvation through Christ makes true fulfilment of the law possible.

c. Cultic Action. Except in relation to OT feasts (Acts 18:21) or in cultic exegesis (Heb. 11:28), cultic action occurs only in the eucharistic formula of 1 Cor. 11:24-25 (cf. Lk. 22:19) and the vow that James tells Paul to undertake (Acts 21:23).

8. Doing Miracles. The NT often refers to working signs, wonders, etc. (Mk. 9:39; Jn. 3:2; Acts 6:8). The doers are either individuals (Acts 3:12; 6:8; 8:6) or the disciples or church in general (Mk. 6:30 etc.). The works are done in Jesus' name (Mk. 9:39; Acts 3:12). Jesus continues his work in his followers; the signs testify to his sending by the Father. Miracles as such may be performed by demons too (Acts 19:14); hence they cannot replace true commitment (Mt. 7:22).

9. poieín as Bringing Forth. With material objects poieín may mean "to do" (Mt. 6:3) or "to bring about" (26:73), but mostly it means "to bring forth" (trees etc., Mt. 3:10; Lk. 13:9; Rev. 22:2; also capital yielding interest, Lk. 19:18). This use is mainly figurative for the producing of ethical fruits (Mt. 3:10) or the growth of the church (Eph. 4:16).

VI. Early Catholic Use. Certain features call for notice. poiētḗs is used for "poet" only with reservations. Developing sacramentalism may be observed in the use with the bread and cup. Asceticism and moralism also increase (cf. Did. 11.11; 1 Clem. 31.2; 2 Clem. 11.7). Pious action is now back in the vicinity of later Jewish casuistry (Did. 6:2; Ignatius Philadelphians 8.1).   [H. BRAUN, VI, 458-84] poikílos [various, multicolored], polypoíkilos [most varied] poikílos.

1. This word has the sense of "many-colored" but more often of "various," "manifold."

2. Only the sense "various," "of many kinds" occurs in the NT (cf. Mk. 1:34; Heb. 2:4; 2 Tim. 3:6; Jms. 1:2). In 1 Pet. 4:10 the point is that God's grace manifests itself in many different ways, i.e., in the various charisms (cf. Rom. 12:6ff.; 1 Cor. 12).

polypoíkilos. This stronger form ("most varied") occurs in Eph. 3:10: God's wisdom has shown itself in Christ with boundless variety or richness. [H. SEESEMANN, VI, 484-85]

poimḗn [shepherd], archpoímēn [chief shepherd], poimaínō [to tend], poímnē [flock], poímnion [flock]

A. The Palestinian Shepherd. Tending flocks and herds is an important part of the Palestinian economy in biblical times. The sheep and cattle have to roam widely, and caring for them is an independent and responsible job that can even involve danger. Owners or their sons may do it (Lk. 15:6; Jn. 10:12), but shepherds are also hired.

B. Transferred Usage.

I. The Ancient Near East.

Shepherd is a common designation for rulers and combines a number of associated tasks or attributes (e.g., in Babylon, Assyria, and Egypt). The gods may also be viewed as shepherds; thus Amun is a strong drover who guards his cattle.

II. The OT.

1. God is early called the Shepherd of Israel who goes before the flock (Ps. 68:7), guides it (Ps. 23:3), leads it to food and water (Ps. 23:2), protects it (Ps. 23:4), and carries its young (Is. 40:11). Embedded in the living piety of believers, the metaphor brings out the fact that the people is sheltered in God.

2. In Jeremiah the term is applied to political and military rulers, but not as a title. The shepherds have proved unfaithful; hence God himself will take up the office and appoint better shepherds (Jer. 3:15; 23:4). He will set up one shepherd who will reunite the people (Ezek. 34:23-24; 37:22, 24). The term thus takes on a messianic significance which undergoes unique development in Zechariah. After the exile bad shepherds bring down judgment, but a shepherd suffers death according to God's will and in so doing ushers in the time of salvation (12:10; 13:1ff.).

C. Later Judaism.

I. Palestinian Judaism.

a. Shepherds are classified by the rabbis as thieves and cheats, and thus lose certain civil rights. Their roving life enables them to steal from the flocks; it is thus forbidden to buy milk, wool, or kids from them.

b. In spite of the bad reputation of shepherds, God is still called Israel's Shepherd, who has led his flock out of Egypt, guides it in the present, and will one day gather it again. Leaders and teachers, e.g., Moses and David, are also called faithful shepherds. In the Damascus Document the leader is a shepherd, and Ps. Sol. 17:40 compares the Messiah to a shepherd.

II. Philo. Philo develops a shepherd typology from the OT stories. The noús is a shepherd of irrational powers of the soul, rulers are shepherds, and God is the Shepherd who feeds the world and all that is in it through his lógos.

D. The NT.

I. Jesus and Shepherds. The NT does not judge shepherds adversely. They know their sheep (Jn. 10:3), seek lost sheep (Lk. 15:4ff.), and hazard their lives for the flock (Jn. 10:11-12). The shepherd is a figure for God himself (Lk. 15:4ff.). The depiction rests on Jesus' real acquaintance with shepherds and sympathy with their lot.

II. The Nativity Story. Mention of actual shepherds occurs only in the birth story in Lk. 2. Theories explaining their presence are (1) that there is similarity to the story of the child Osiris; (2) that they represent the ideal world; (3) that they represent the sinners for whom the gospel is intended; (4) that they carry a reference to David; and (5) that they are the only ones awake at the time. The probability is that the stall in which Jesus is born belongs to the shepherds, and this is why they are told that as a sign the Savior will be found lying there.

III. The Shepherd as a Picture of God. The NT never calls God a shepherd, and only in the parable of the lost sheep (Lk. 15:4ff.; Mt. 18:12ff.) does the comparison occur. Here God, like the rejoicing shepherd of the parable, takes joy in the forgiveness and restoration of the sinner. The choice of the image reflects vividly the contrast between Jesus‘ love for sinners and the Pharisees’ contempt for them.

IV. Jesus the Good Shepherd.

1. Sayings of Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels.

a. To describe his mission Jesus uses the image of gathering the scattered flock (cf. Mt. 10:6; 15:24; Lk. 19:10 [Ezek. 34]).

b. In Mk. 14:27-28; Mt. 26:31-32 Jesus uses the shepherd comparison in intimation of his death and return (with an allusion to Zech. 13:7). The death of Jesus initiates the scattering of the flock and the testing of the remnant, but it is followed by the gathering of the purified flock under the shepherd’s leadership (Zech. 13:7ff.).

c. The nations assemble like a flock at the judgment in Mt. 25:31-32, and the shepherd separates the sheep from the goats.

2. Christological Statements of the Primitive Church. In 1 Pet. 2:25 Christ is the shepherd of souls, providing for his people and watching over them. In Heb. 13:20 he is the “great shepherd,” surpassing all who precede him, like Moses. In 1 Pet. 5:4 he is the “chief shepherd” to whom all others must render an account. As the earthly Lord he has pity on the leaderless flock (Mk. 6:34), as the exalted Lord he is the Lamb who leads his people to springs of living water (Rev. 7:17), and as the returning Lord he is the eschatological ruler who rules the nations with an iron rod (Rev. 12:5; 19:15).

3. John 10:1-30.

a. Apart from a possible but hardly probable confusion of order, there are good reasons to treat Jn. 10:1-30 as a unity without critical manipulation.

b. The section 10:1-5 is a simple parable contrasting the shepherd with the thief and the stranger. Unlike the thief he comes through the door, and unlike the stranger he knows his sheep and is known by them. In interpretation Jesus first compares himself to the door (vv. 7ff.) and then to the shepherd (vv. 11ff.). Unlike the hireling, the true shepherd is ready to give his life for the sheep that he knows so intimately (v. 14). Jesus’ office as the shepherd extends beyond Israel, thus fulfilling the promise of one flock and one shepherd. The sacrifice of life will be followed by the taking of it again (vv. 17-18).

c. The Palestinian materials and the many Semitisms point to an OT setting. The motifs are in full agreement with the sayings in the Synoptic Gospels. The thought of the shepherd’s death as voluntary and vicarious develops an impulse already present in Mk. 14:27-28. No parallels exist in the syncretistic or Gnostic world apart from Mandaean allegories that are clearly based on Jn. 10.

4. Postcanonical Writings and Early Christian Art. In early shepherd statements the didactic element steadily develops as Logos Christology endows Christ with the symbols and features of the Logos shepherd. Yet Christ as teaching shepherd leads people, not to freedom from the reign of the senses, but to eternal truth and salvation. From the third century depictions of the Good Shepherd portray Christ as a radiantly youthful figure who is not simply a guide of souls but the teacher and redeemer who brings salvation.

V. Shepherd as a Term for Congregational Leaders. Only in Eph. 4:11 are congregational leaders called shepherds. The pastors and teachers are a single group of ministers. Shepherd is not yet an established title. Parallel passages are 1 Pet. 5:2; Acts 20:28; Jn. 21:15ff. Only in the last of these is a wider ministry in view. Pastors are to care for the congregation, seek the lost, and combat error. The chief shepherd is an example (1 Pet. 5:3), and he will grant recognition at his coming (v. 4).

E. The Shepherd of Hermas. In this second-century work, the angel of repentance appears in shepherd garb to mediate revelations. Sent by the Most Holy Shepherd Christ (Visions 5.2), this shepherd is a teacher and companion of Hermas as he proclaims the revealed message of one repentance for sin after baptism. The idea of a mediating angel shepherd does not come from the NT but possibly from the Hermetic sphere.

A. The Palestinian Flock. The term poímnē or poímnion is used for flocks or herds of sheep or cattle numbering from 20 to over 500. A mixed herd is in view in Mt. 25:32; such herds are common in ancient Palestine. The sheep and goats pasture together but are separated at night because goats are more susceptible to cold. On summer nights several shepherds come together with their flocks and watch over them in open fields. For better protection the flock might be kept in a walled court with the door closed and the shepherds on guard.

B. Flock as a Term for the Community in the OT and Pre-Christian Judaism. The OT describes Israel as the flock of God, the flock of his pasture, the sheep of his pasture, the sheep of his hand or possession (cf. Pss. 95:7; 100:3; Mic. 7:14; also Hos. 4:16; Jer. 13:17; 23:1-2). In Sir. 18:13 and Eth. En. 85ff. the flock will include all nations at the consummation. Ps. Sol. 17:40ff. restricts the flock that the Messiah feeds to Israel, but the reign of the Messiah will extend to the Gentiles too (vv. 30ff.).

C. The Community as the Flock in the NT.

1. OT usage (Israel as God's flock) occurs in Mt. 10:6; 15:24. Jesus goes after the dispersed of the flock in Lk. 19:10 (Ezek. 34:16). He bewails the absence of a shepherd in Mk. 6:34 (Num. 27:17). He has pity on the exhausted flock in Mt. 9:36.

2. In the NT however, the disciples are mainly the flock as God's eschatological people (Mk. 14:27-28; Mt. 10:16; Lk. 12:32; Jn. 10:1ff.). They are a little flock (Lk. 12:32) but need not fear because they are promised dominion (cf. Dan. 7:27). Threats come from wolves both without (Mt. 10:16) and within (7:15). The flock will be scattered but then regathered (Mk. 14:27-28), and the righteous of all peoples will belong to it (Mt. 26:31-32). In John the flock replaces the missing term ekklēsía. Its members know the Good Shepherd, believe in him, hear him, and follow him (Jn. 10). In Jn. 10:26 the meaning might be that only predestined members of the flock can believe, but in the context of v. 24 the point seems to be that the witness that finds a hearing and obedience in Jesus' sheep is neither understood nor believed by his opponents (cf. Mk. 4:11-12). The flock is the community which Jesus assembles from Israel and with which he then associates the children of God among the Gentiles (v. 16). After his death and resurrection the straying sheep (1 Pet. 2:25) that do not belong to the flock (Jn. 10:16), but are scattered children of God (11:52), are gathered into the eschatological flock. Christ's atoning death mediates membership in the community of salvation. [J. JEREMIAS, VI, 485-502]

pólemos [war, conflict], poleméō [to wage war, fight]

A. The Religious Understanding of War in the Greek World and Hellenism.

1. The Problem.

a. Homer and Hesiod. Even before Homer it is felt that divine favor rests on holy wars and that the gods invoked in treaties are displeased when treaties are broken. In Homer war is bound up with the rule of the gods. While there may not be gods of war in the strict sense, Ares is the ideal hero and Athene promotes and rewards martial activity. Hesiod accepts the view that divine counsels stand behind human wars, but war is not for him a natural divinely ordained human activity.

b. Religious Practice. Young Athenians swear their readiness for war in the name of Ares, and troops go into battle with the nickname of Ares on their lips.

c. Critical Reflection. Various views arise as a result of critical reflection. War might be seen as a valid principle of life even though it is without parallel in nature. The true goal of reflection might be seen as the prevention rather than the prosecution of war, since war profits nobody. The Greeks are too realistic to suppose that war is a humble submission to the wisdom of Athene, who steps in to settle things according to the divine will when human counsel fails. Wars are too often due to shortsightedness and unscrupulous self-interest. The view thus arises that war, while it might prevent overpopulation, is an evil in which human wickedness or injustice is always involved. War and evil are thus equated, and war can be averted only when there is a serious resolve to fight inner evil, which has its root in humanity itself.

2. General Attitude to the Political Reality of War. The practical question arises how individuals and individual states can actualize peaceful impulses when their neighbors will not let them. To fight only intellectually evades the question in the eyes of leaders. War is an unavoidable evil. Only a world state can end it. In practice, then, peace is won only from war and is like an island menaced by its floods. Treaties have only limited validity and secure peace only until conditions change. They have to be sworn by higher powers in the hope that these powers will look with displeasure on those who break them.

3. Expectation of Peace in the First Imperial Period. The creation of the empire promises peace with the inauguration of a single world state. The inner fight against the evil of war has not been won, but the hope is present that the march of epochs has led, by divine regulation, to a return of the golden age. Augustus has ended war and is thus hailed as a divine figure. The wars that still break out are only the last gasps of the passing order. Treaties no longer need to be confirmed by oaths. Quickly, however, the facts do not bear out this hope. Bad neighbors still challenge the Roman peace. Faith in the divine mission of the ruler fades. Philosophers like Marcus Aurelius, who want nothing to do with war, have to devote much of their energy to campaigns. The soldiers of Probus mutiny when he protests against the majesty of war.

B. The Religious Understanding of War in the OT and Later Judaism.

1. The Tradition.

a. The Holy War. The term “holy war” does not occur in the OT but the reality is present. God protects Israel defensively against invaders by charismatic leaders and personal intervention. Troops assemble voluntarily from the tribes, coming to the help of the Lord (Judg. 5:23), but they prevail, not because of numbers or equipment, but because God is with them to give them courage and confound their foes (Judg. 4:14ff.; 5:2, 9; 7:2ff.; Dt. 20:4; Ex. 15:14ff., etc.). Later, wars are more carefully organized, but the dynamic is the same. The chariots and horsemen of Israel (2 Kgs. 2:12; 13:14) are the people’s final defense. The prophets constantly call the people back to their true refuge, not in political or military planning, but in God, and in the distant future they perceive a general attack on Israel that a final holy war will repel (Mic. 4:12). The acquisition of the promised land is understood to be the work of God, but with the ultimate goal of subjection to God in defiance of every idol.

b. God’s War against Israel. While God’s conflict is primarily with arrogant idolatrous nations, it may also be with Israel herself if Israel reverts to idolatry. God uses foreign peoples in this conflict, and the resultant war might almost be regarded as itself a holy war (Am. 2:14ff.). Already reverses in the past are seen as due to God’s withdrawal of his help or even his helping of enemies (Lev. 23:36; Josh. 7:5; 1 Sam. 17:11). Israel always runs the risk, by unfaithfulness, of falling into a hopeless war against the overwhelming strength of God put forth in judgment.

c. Divine and Human Initiatives. Human military initiative is less important in the OT than in Homer. Certain things must be done, but there is confidence that God decides the issue, as at the Red Sea or the fall of Jericho (Ex. 15; Josh. 6).

2. The Problem. In the OT many wars can hardly be regarded as holy wars (e.g., those between the tribes). If there is no discussion of the general problem, the main points are clear. Holy wars are directed against human arrogance and idolatry, the holy war against Israel is directed against her unfaithfulness, and other wars are brought on by human sin and are mysteriously integrated into God’s overriding plan.

3. General Attitude to the Political Reality of War. War in the OT is a normal if undesired reality in human dealings, especially in view of the religious antithesis between Israel and other nations.

4. Expectation of a State of Peace. The hope of a warless future rests on the confidence that although God summons to holy war, he also will usher in a reign of peace (Ps. 46:9; Is. 2:4).

5. Later Judaism.

a. The picture is much the same as in the OT except that the final war has enhanced significance. Those involved will have to be ready for great suffering and sacrifice. Sometimes the final war, or at least the prelude to it, will be fought by believers, but with the guarantee of divine help. Sometimes God or the Messiah is viewed as waging the war directly without human participation, the only role of the righteous being the doing of good works.

b. For Philo the worship of many gods carries the seeds of conflict. One must combat the state of war that exists even in what is called peace. Only a structural change in creation can bring true peace, and only God can bring this about, first by taming the beasts in the human psychḗ, then by ending the war in the animal kingdom, and finally by subduing bloodlessly those who joy in battle.

C. The NT.

1. War in the Events of the Last Time. The NT inherits the concept of a campaign of the Davidic Messiah, but never even dreams of believers being summoned openly to war, not even in the final conflict. Revelation shows how the war that is related to the judgment will overcome war between the millennium and the new heaven and earth. An apparently invincible foe steps forth; but in righteousness (19:11), and executing a heavenly plan, the Word makes war and overthrows the enemy. Unbelievers are unaware of the nearness of this final event, and even believers must be warned about it (cf. 2:16; 14; 16). Rulers, seduced by the authority of the beast, wage war on the prophets, the community, the city, and the Lamb (11:7; 12:17; 20:8-9; 17:14). The second horseman personifies the conflict (6:3-4). Only those who trust in the righteousness of the King of kings can doubt the power of these big battalions.

2. Other References to War. Only Heb. 11:34 construes past events in the light of the divine goal. The idea of holy wars waged by the new community is quite alien to the NT. No discussion arises concerning wars between the OT and the final conflict. Christians are not told to serve as soldiers, nor are soldiers who become Christians told to leave the service. Terms from soldiering are adopted to illustrate the Christian life. This does not mean that honor is paid to war as such. The terms pólemos and poleméō are never used to describe either literally or figuratively what Christians should do. Indeed, warrings and fightings are incompatible with being a Christian (Jms. 4:2). [O. BAUERNFEIND, VI, 502-15]

pólis [city], polítēs [citizen], politeúomai [to be a citizen] politeía [citizenship, conduct], políteuma [commonwealth]

A. Nonbiblical Greek.

I. Lexicography.

1. Of unexplained etymology, pólis first means a fortified settlement. With political development, the idea of fortification drops away. Thus Sparta is a complex of four or five open villages. This development makes pólis apt to signify a state as distinct from the spatially defined ásty. The pólis is the ruling center-first a town, then the wider area ruled from it.

2. The polítēs is one who shares in the pólis, i.e., the "citizen" with a11 the relevant active and passive privileges.

3. politeúō has such meanings as "to be a citizen," "to live or act as such," "to share in government," "to rule," "to prosecute state business." Other senses are "to have business dealings" and the weaker one "to behave."

4. politeía has the meanings "citizenship," "political activity," "constitution," "the state" as such, and "conduct."

5. políteuma has such senses as “political acts,” “acts of government departments,” “government,” “commonwealth,” “citizenship,” and “foreign colony.”

II. Ideal Content. A distinctive phenomenon in antiquity, the pólis draws its significance from the ideal content of the term. The establishment of the pólis leads to culture. This takes place through free union endowed by Zeus with righteousness and piety. Spiritual values develop, and culture is achieved, by freedom under the authority of laws that protect the common welfare. The freedom of the pólis stands opposed to barbarian tyranny. Individuals find true self-development in the common national life. Religious awe encircles state law; the order of state has a religious sanction. The pólis is thus a sacral organization. Its origin is with the supreme God, who is polioúchos, the protector of the state. The tragedy of Greek history is that the reality does not match the ideal. Rational criticism, self-interest, party conflict, mob action, and the cantonal confinement of the state combine to frustrate the achievement of the ideal. The Stoics introduce a wider vision, and Alexander tries to give it political shape in a world kingdom, although for the Stoics it is an ideal fellowship of the wise that does not need legal or social institutions. Indeed, the Stoics use the term pólis for the cosmos itself as a totality that is governed by a single divine law. As history leaves the Greek pólis behind, the concept loses its vitality and falls victim to philosophical spiritualizing.

B. The LXX and Later Judaism.

I. pólis.

1. Hebrew Originals. pólis occurs often in the LXX, usually for ʿîr a few times for qiryâ and qereṯ. Heb. ʿîr embraces any fortified place, e.g., a fortress or even a watchtower. Customarily, however, it is a walled town.

2. Description of Cities. Cities are described by name, location, nationality, residents (individuals or clans), and special features, but not by constitution.

3. Importance of Cities. Cities in Israel are not important as centers of culture or government. Nor is the city a basic form of the state. In the Near East states are kingdoms. The term pólis is “depoliticized” in the LXX. Cities are important because they can resist aggressors (cf. Jericho in Josh. 6). When Israel conquers Palestine, the cities are quickly rebuilt for the security they seem to offer (Dt. 28:52). Taking a city is hard (cf. Proverbs), but living in it gives a sense of security (10:15). Yet even high walls cannot protect the pólis against God’s judgment (Dt. 28:52). The city of Gen. 11 with its lofty tower represents the ungodly arrogance of the human race. Unless the Lord keeps the city, the watchman stays awake in vain (Ps. 126:1).

4. Jerusalem. Jerusalem is unique in Israel (Ezek. 7:23). God has set his name there (Dt. 12:5, 11). He has chosen it as the place of worship (2 Chr. 6:38). Prayer is offered toward it (1 Kgs. 8:44). It is the city of God, of the great King, of the Lord (Pss. 46:4; 48:2; Is. 60:14). It is the holy city (Is. 48:2). It symbolizes religious faith and national independence. Yet its people are wicked (Jer. 6:7). Judgment falls on their violence and idolatry (Ezek. 22:2ff.). God still loves it, however, and will finally establish it (Ps. 87:1-2; Jer. 31:38). His glory leaves it (Ezek. 11:23) but will return, and it will be called the faithful city (Zech. 8:3). National hopes focus on this restoration (Joel 3:17). The OT city thus reaches beyond history to the final change that God will effect.

Heb. Hebrew

5. Jerusalem in the Hope of Later Judaism. The Prayer of Eighteen Benedictions sustains the hope of a restored Jerusalem as a cultic center. The darker the present situation, the loftier is the hope. Jerusalem is already present in heaven and will be finally manifested. Its temple will be infinitely more glorious than that of the historical city. The wicked will be excluded, and in the thinking of some aliens will also be shut out.

II. polítēs, politeía, politeúomai, políteuma in the OT.

1. Except for polítēs these words occur only in apocryphal writings (especially 2-4 Maccabees). polítēs normally means "neighbor" in the sense of compatriot or coreligionist, with a social and ethical flavoring. Nine of the instances are in 2 Maccabees, one in 3 Maccabees, and only seven elsewhere.

2. politeía, too, is a religious and moral concept rather than a political one. It refers mostly to a pious order of life in accordance with the law. Only in 3 Macc. 3:21, 23 does it have the sense of civil rights.

3. politeúomai also refers to conduct rather than citizenship. The reference is religious. Religion regulates the life of society and individual behavior within it. The total claim of divine law gives a different character to the society to which Jews belong, and this determines the use of the term.

4. políteuma occurs only in 2 Macc. 12:7, where it means "commonwealth."

III. Josephus and Philo.

1. Josephus makes rich use of the group, and for him the reference is to such things as the constitution and civil rights. Yet the political sense may yield at times to the more general one of conduct. As a political Hellenist Josephus thinks that Greek terms may help to clarify the alien structure of Israel. Yet he has a keen sense of the differences. Moses established Israel as a theocracy. By using political language, Josephus masks to some extent the religious orientation of political thinking in the OT and Judaism. He sacrifices the eschatological hope of a new Jerusalem for the sake of peace with Rome, applying to Vespasian the oracle of a future world ruler.

2. Philo engages in a spiritualizing transposition. Adam is for him a cosmopolitan. The noetic cosmos is the metropolis of the wise. For world citizens of this type individual states are of lesser worth. Political life is the theater of base passion and degrading dependence. Wisely the Essenes avoid city life. Philo himself lives in Alexandria, advocates democracy as the best constitution, and would like to see philosophers as rulers, but he has no concept of the dignity of the state or of political action. Nor does he share a true eschatological hope. Jerusalem is the holy city but only inasmuch as it represents the cosmos or the soul of the wise. His psychological and ethical cosmopolitanism dissolves history and eschatology.

C. The NT.

1. Distribution and Secular Use. The term pólis, which has lost the aura that surrounds it in the Greek world, occurs some 160 times, mostly in the Lucan writings, and especially with a historical eschatological (Revelation) reference. The term never means "state," for which the NT has king, authorities, etc. When cities are denoted, they are not political organisms. árchontes occurs for city officials only loosely in Acts 16:19. The pólis in the NT is an enclosed place of human habitation as distinct from villages, isolated dwellings, or uninhabited places. At times it can also mean "population" (Mt. 8:34). It is not sharply distinguished from kōmē (Mk. 1:38; cf. Lk. 4:43). The pólis is the walled city and larger center, while the kōmai are subordinate towns. Individual cities may be mentioned, as in Mt. 8:33; 21:17; Acts 8:5. Or additions may be made relating the city to a locality (Lk. 4:31), a nation (Mt. 10:5), inhabitants (Acts 19:35), or an individual (Lk. 2:4, 11).

2. Jerusalem the Holy City. As in the OT, Jerusalem is the holy or beloved city (Mt. 4:5; 27:53; Rev. 11:2). The reference may be either to the historical or to the heavenly city. The usage reflects Jewish tradition but also points to the importance of Jerusalem for the primitive church. Jerusalem is the Christian center in a religious as well as a practical sense.

3. The Heavenly Jerusalem. The historical Jerusalem will be destroyed (Mk. 13:2), so that hope centers on the heavenly and purified Jerusalem that will come to the new earth with the consummation (Rev. 21:10). Law-free Christians already belong to this city that is above (Gal. 4:25-26). The patriarchs seek it as the only city that will endure (Heb. 11:10, 16). Glimpsing it only from afar, they live by faith as pilgrims and strangers on earth (11:14, 16). God has built it for them in heaven (cf. 12:22ff.). Christians look ahead to it, having no abiding city here (13:14). It exists in heaven as the true reality, the city of the fellowship of believers of all ages along with the angelic world . In Rev. 21 this city is prepared as a bride. It is the perfected community of those who bear its name (3:12). Various motifs combine in the image, but these are only metaphors (the walls, the streets of gold, the pure river, the precious stones, etc.) to describe the blessedness of the consummation. Purged of nationalistic features, and opened to believers of all nations, this Jerusalem is not just a replacement for the old one. It inherits the name, but all things are made new. At the same time, the eschatological concept bears no relation to Stoic or Philonic cosmopolitanism. It is still oriented to history.

4. The Vulgate Translation civitas. Except in Acts 16:12, 39 the Vulgate always renders pólis by civitas. This gives the term a political slant which is retained in Augustine's use of it in The City of God, where it tends to lose its eschatological and figurative character and becomes a concept of ecclesiastical and philosophical thought.

*II. polítēs, politeúomai, politeía, políteuma.

1. There is nothing theological about the four instances of polítēs in the NT (Heb. 8:11; Acts 21:39; Lk. 15:15; 19:12ff.). The meaning varies from "compatriot" or "citizen" to "independent inhabitant," but the usage remains within everyday limits.

2. politeúomai occurs only in Acts 23:1 and Phil. 1:27. In both cases it refers to conduct that is shaped by religion with no political implications.

3. politeía, too, occurs only twice. In Acts 22:28 Paul appeals to his status as a Roman citizen to avoid examination by scourging. In Eph. 2:12 the word refers to the privileged position of Israel. Once excluded, believers now belong, not to the Jewish state, but to the people of God. Having access to God, they share spiritual citizenship with the saints as members of God's household (2:19).

4. políteuma occurs only in Phil. 3:20. Exhorting believers to appropriate conduct, Paul tells them that their true homeland is in heaven. On earth (cf. 1 Pet. 2:11) they have no right of domicile; they are not citizens rooted in nature, thought, or interests. The point is not that they are a foreign colony in earthly states, but aliens in the earthly sphere as such. By constitutional right, they belong to the heavenly kingdom of Christ. The kingdom of heaven is their políteuma. They should act accordingly.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. The usage here is similar to that of the NT. The everyday sense occurs. In Hermas Similitudes 1.1ff. the Christian pólis is contrasted with the temporal world . Diog. 5.5 uses politeía for "conduct." In Diog. 5.9 politeúomai can mean "to be a citizen," but mostly the term refers to conduct. Used of God in Diog. 10.7, it denotes his reign. The meaning in 1 Clem. 54.4 is that we should conduct ourselves as citizens of God. [H. STRATHMANN, VI, 516-35]

polloí [(the) many]

A. Inclusive Meaning in Judaism.

I. The OT.

1. As Noun.

a. With Article. In Greek polloí is used exclusively ("the many" as distinct from "all"), but in the OT it has an inclusive sense, due to the fact that Hebrew has no plural word for "all." This is especially clear when the article occurs (cf. 1 Kgs. 18:25; Is. 53:11; Dan. 9:27).

b. Without Article. Even without the article the use is often inclusive, as in Pss. 109:30; 71:7; Ex. 23:2.

2. As Adjective. Inclusive use of the adjective is found only in the expression "the [whole] host of peoples" (cf. Is. 2:2-4; 52:15).

3. Is. 52:13-53:12. Four instances of the noun and one of the adjective occur in this section (52:14; 53:11, 12; 52:15). While the reference is obscure, there is little doubt that the use is inclusive in every case, as shown by the expression in 52:15, the use of the article in 53:11, 12, the parallel in 53:12, and later interpretation.

II. Postbiblical Judaism.

1. As Noun.

a. With Article. The many Jewish examples confirm the inclusive significance of the use with the article, e.g., in the Qumran writings.

b. Without Article. Without the article, too, we sometimes find an inclusive sense (cf. the use of the Latin multi in a comprehensive sense in 4 Esdr. 8:1, 3).

2. As Adjective. Postbiblical Judaism offers further instances of the inclusive sense of the adjective in the phrase "the [whole] host of peoples."

3. Is. 52:13-53:12 in Later Jewish Writings. Ignoring post-Christian exposition, we find that the many who are astonished embrace all kings and mighty men and that the sinless one will die for the ungodly, although whether the ungodly here are Jews, Gentiles, or both is debatable.

B. Inclusive Meaning in the NT.

I. Passages Not Relating to Is. 53.

1. As Noun.

a. With Article. An exclusive sense ("most") may be found in the NT only in Mt. 24:12 and 2 Cor. 2:17. In Rom. 5:15 the meaning and context both support an inclusive sense. Other Pauline instances are Rom. 12:5; 1 Cor. 10:17. Elsewhere cf. Mk. 6:2; 9:26; Heb. 12:15 ("the many" for "the community").

b. Without Article. Parallel passages show that without the article, too, polloí may have an inclusive meaning (cf. Mk. 1:32). In Mt. 8:11 the point is that great numbers will come. The polloí of Lk. 1:14 are the saved people. In Lk. 2:34-35 some will fall and some will be raised up, but the thoughts of all of them will be disclosed. In Jn. 5:28 an inclusive use is obvious, and both the noun and the adjective of 2 Cor. 1:11 are inclusive. Mt. 20:16 takes the rule of Mk. 10:31 inclusively, but Lk. 13:30 gives it an exclusive application. In Mt. 22:14 we have a formal antithesis between great and small numbers, but materially the many represent the totality; the invitation embraces all, but the choice falls only on the few. Appended to the parable, the statement applies the invitation to both Jews and Gentiles.

2. As Adjective. Rom. 4:11 suggests that when Paul quotes Gen. 17:5 in Rom. 4:17 he has all nations in view. As an adjective polloí is also inclusive in 2 Cor. 1:11; Heb. 2:10; Lk. 7:47 ("as many as there are").

II. Statements about Jesus' Saving Work.

1. With Article. In Rom. 5:15, 19 Paul gives the greatest conceivable breadth to hoi polloí, as is shown by the pántes ánthrōpoi of v. 18. Christ's obedience, like Adam's disobedience, has an effect on the whole of the human race. In 5:19, then, Paul takes the many of Is. 53:11 inclusively (cf. 5:16 and Jn. 1:29).

2. Without Article. The real problem arises in the four passages where there is no article, i.e., Mk. 10:45; 14:24; Rom. 5:16; Heb. 9:28.

a. NT Interpretations. 1 Tim. 2:6 has pántōn for the pollṓn of Mk. 10:45. We also find pántes in Rom. 5:12 and Heb. 2:9. As regards 14:24 the restrictive hymeís seems to be the equivalent in 1 Cor. 11:24, but ho kósmos is the broader equivalent in Jn. 6:51. In 1 Cor. 11:24, however, the use is liturgical rather than theological, in contrast with 2 Cor. 5:14.

b. The Original Sense.

(a) Age of the Tradition. Mk. 10:45 and 14:24 both have a Semitic character, and the existence of other renderings also suggests a Palestinian original. So does the use of the Hebrew of Is. 53. Semitic usage, especially in Is. 53, is thus the probable basis.

(b) References to Is. 53. All four of the debatable passages are based on Is. 53. Mk. 10:45 rests on Is. 53:10ff., Mk. 14:24, and Heb. 9:28, and Rom. 5:16 on 53:12. The Hebrew is followed in all instances except Heb. 9:28. LXX influence may be discounted in view of the deviations of the LXX from the Hebrew text. Since Paul and John agree with Jewish interpretation in taking the many of Is. 53 inclusively, one may take it that Jesus himself has the same inclusive sense in view in the sayings in Mk. 10:45 and 14:24. [J. JEREMIAS, VI, 536-46]

polylogía [loquacity, verbosity]

1. This word means “loquacity,” “volubility,” “talkativeness,” with a negative ring.

2. The only LXX instance is in Prov. 10:19: In much talking is sin, but material parallels may be found in Is. 1:15; Eccl. 5:1-2; 1 Kgs. 18:26ff.

3. Later Judaism carries warnings against much speaking, but in prayer there is tension between praise of crispness and a preference for length.

4. The only NT example is in Mt. 6:7, where “verbosity” is the point. The saying is parallel to those about almsgiving and prayer, but is not so strictly constructed, and is directed against pagan piety. The much speaking refers either to the enumeration of many deities or to the effort to wear down the gods by repetition. Quantity to the point of verbosity replaces quality. Jesus bases the assurance of being heard, not on the petitioner and the number of words, but on the readiness of the Father to hear. The Lord’s Prayer teaches us to pray for great things in few words; the Father knows the needs even before we ask. [C. MAURER, VI, 545-46]

polypoíkilos → poikílos; polýs → polloí; polýsplanchnos → splanchnízomai; póma → pínō

ponērós [bad, wicked], ponēría [evil, wickedness] ponērós.

A. The Greek World.

I. The Classical Period. This word, from a group denoting poverty or need, has the senses 1.,“sorrowful,” “unhappy,” “laden with care,” 2. “bringing trouble,” 3. “pitiable,” “poor,” “unfit,” “unattractive,” “bad,” “unlucky,” 4. “unsuccessful,” 5. “plebeian,” 6. “politically useless,” “worthless,” and finally 7. “morally reprehensible” with the various nuances.

II. Hellenistic Period. The sense does not undergo much change in Hellenistic usage. We thus find the usual meanings “full of trouble,” “useless,” “wrong,” “harmful,” “contrary,” and “morally bad,” “evil.” We also find the idea of the ponērós daímōn or ponērón pneúma, the latter deriving from LXX influence.

B. The OT and Later Judaism.

I. The LXX and Other OT Translations. ponērós carries the various meanings of the Hebrew original, i.e., "bad" or "worthless" (animals, fruit, land, people), "ill-natured,'' "unfavorable" (reputation), "prejudicial," "sorrowful" (appearance), "unhappy," "hurtful," "futile," "evil" (words), and "evil" in a more general moral sense (thoughts, the eye, and acts). Acts are evil before God (Gen. 38:7), who decides what is good and evil (Is. 5:20). An absolute use is possible for the wicked person (1 Sam. 25:3) who breaks the law (Dt. 17:7) and is marked by pride (Job 35:12). ho ponērós is not yet used for Satan. In contrast to the ponērós is the person who seeks God and will be guided by him (Ezek. 11:2). Among the wicked may be men, women, and children (Gen. 13:13; Sir. 25:16; Wis. 3:12). The inner part is evil (Is. 3:9). The organs at the disposal of the evil will and thoughts are also evil (Jer. 23:14). Reference is made to evil in the absolute in 2 Sam. 13:22. For evil before God, see Num. 32:12; Dt. 4:25; evil always stands in antithesis to God and his will even when this is not expressly stated.

II. Later Judaism.

1. Qumran. Here, too, the Hebrew term denotes what is evil in both a general and a moral sense. Enumerations show plainly what is regarded as evil, e.g., abominations in a spirit of fornication and apostasy, and a lack of desire to do good.

2. The Rabbis. The general and moral senses, i.e., what is harmful and what is morally bad, occur among the rabbis too. The two ways depict what is bad and what is good. A bad eye, heart, or companion will lead on to the bad way. God fixes what is bad, and everything bad is contrary to him. Calumniation is a tongue of evil. The evil impulse is directed to earthly, ungodly, and corruptible matters and especially to what runs contrary to the law. This impulse relates to Satan, but Satan is not called the evil one.

III. Hellenistic Judaism.

1. The Pseudepigrapha. Although the sense of "harmful" occurs in these works, the moral sense predominates, and the idea of evil spirits is now common. These may be moralized (cf. the spirits of desire, excitement, extravagance, and avarice in wine, or covetousness working like an evil spirit).

2. Philo and Josephus. Along with the basic senses of "full of trouble" and "detrimental," we find in Josephus the meaning "politically reprehensible" and in Philo the moral sense of "bad." For Philo thinking that focuses on the divine mysteries sets the body in an unfavorable light. The ponēroí, in contrast to the agathoí, seek only pleasures. The ponēroí in a social sense need not be ponēroí in the moral sense.

C. The NT.

I. The Sense of Bad, Harmful, Unserviceable, Useless.

1. This sense occurs in the NT. Thus the sores in Rev. 16:2 are troublesome, the days of the end-time in Eph. 5:16 are darkened by its woes (unless moral corruption is in view), the day of Eph. 6:13 is a day of distress (whether as an ordinary day, the day of death, the day of judgment, or a day when the devil has special power), and the aeon of Gal. 1:4 is filled with temptation and suffering.

2. In Mt. 7:18 the fruits are "useless" (as distinct from the fruits of the good tree), and in Mt. 18:32; 25:26; 19:22 the servant is no good.

II. The Moral Sense.

1. Adjectival Use.

a. Persons. Human beings, in contrast to God (Mk. 10:18), are morally bad (Mt. 7:11). They are so in a stronger sense when they oppose God (Mt. 12:34-35). They bring forth evil words from an evil store within (12:35). The generation that wants messianic signs is a wicked one (Mt. 12:39), as its encounter with the word discloses. The term receives its content from decision regarding Jesus, or later the apostolic message (cf. 2 Tim. 3:13). In 2 Th. 3:2 the wicked are those who oppose believers and their faith. Something of a social stigma attaches to the use in Acts 17:5: the "rabble."

b. Things and Concepts. The names of Jesus and his disciples are regarded as evil (cf. Jms. 2:7) by opponents. The evil eye is the covetous one. In Mt. 6:23; Lk. 11:34 the meaning might be "sick" in view of the reference to the body, the ensuing application, and a parallel in Philo, but "evil" is also possible, for the OT and NT assume a close relation between heart and eye, and the idea of the wicked or covetous eye is a common one. In Mt. 15:19 evil thoughts come from within (cf. Mk. 7:21). In Jms. 2:4 the reference is most likely to base motives, e.g., love of fame or money. Insinuations or evil suspicions are meant in 1 Tim. 6:4. In Heb. 3:12 the inner person is evil because of self-willed apostasy (cf. 10:22, where the bad conscience separates from God). Words and deeds can be evil (cf. the boasting of Jms. 4:16, the pre-Christian works of Col. 1:21, or the things done to God's messengers in 2 Tim. 4:18). In Jn. 3:19 the antithesis of light and darkness determines the content of ponērós (cf. vv. 20-21). In Jn. 7:7 the works of the world are evil because God does not do them. What is against the gospel is wicked, not just immorality but error and its propagation (2 Jn. 11) and hostile lógoi (3 Jn. 11). Wicked works result from rejection of God's salvation. On the lips of Gallio in Acts 18:14, however, the term has the more secular sense of legal wrongdoing punishable by law. The NT often refers to evil spirits (Mt. 12:45; Lk. 11:26). Jesus and the apostles grant release from them (Lk. 7:21;, Acts 19:12ff.).

2. Use as Noun.

a. Bad People. The ponēroí are often the wicked as opposed to the agathoí (Mt. 22:10) or díkaioi (13:49). The social sense is possible in Mt. 22:10. Mt. 5:45 may be compared with Prov. 15:3. God is kind to both ungrateful and ponēroí in Lk. 6:35. At the final separation the ponēroí are those who do not meet God's righteous demand (Mt. 13:49). The singular occurs in 1 Cor. 5:13 for one who offends against God's law.

b. The Devil. Since the content of ponērós is determined largely by opposition to God's word or will or the message of Jesus, the singular noun may refer to the absolute antithesis, i.e., the devil. There are no models for this, but ho ponērós is clearly the devil in Mt. 13:19 and perhaps in Eph. 6:16. The usage possibly develops through a desire not to use the name Satan. It is most common in 1 John (2:13-14; 5:18). The evil one does not touch those who are born of God. In 1 Jn. 3:12 (cf. Jn. 18:37) we might have an abstract use, but Jn. 8:44 suggests a masculine. A masculine is supported in 1 Jn. 5:19 by the antithetical "of God." The devil is the prince of this world in Jn. 12:31; the idea, then, is that the world lies in his power.

c. Evil. Debatable is Mt. 13:38, which contrasts the sons toú ponēroú with those of the kingdom. Since the enemy is the devil (v. 39), some argue that "sons of the devil" is meant (cf. 1 Jn. 3:8, 10), but others point out that the antithesis is the kingdom, so that the reference is simply to the wicked. A masculine is to be preferred in Jn. 17:15, although nothing is at stake if the term is taken as a neuter. Hotly contested is Mt. 6:13, which the east has construed as a masculine and the west as a neuter. Mt. 13:19 supports the masculine, but the neuter ("evil") is a more common usage. The petition, then, is probably a request for deliverance from all evil according to Jewish models. The evil in view includes temporal evils but extends beyond these to moral and eschatological evils. In the same way we most likely have a neuter in 2 Th. 3:3, although some see a masculine here too. A masculine is ruled out in Mt. 5:39 by Jms. 4:7; 1 Pet. 5:9 if the devil is in view, but a wicked person is possible (cf. 1 Cor. 5:13). On the other hand, wicked acts are just as likely. In 1 Th. 5:22 the reference is not so much to the appearance of evil as to every kind of evil. In Mt. 5:11 the evil that opponents ascribe to the disciples is the point. The evil in Mt. 9:4 refers to the thoughts of the scribes, and "all these evil things" in Mk. 7:23 summarizes the preceding vices. The plural has a very general sense in Lk. 3:19 (cf. Acts 25:18). In Rom. 12:9 the singular is neuter and what is morally bad is at issue.

A. Classical and Hellenistic Greek. This word has such meanings as “defectiveness,” “sickness,” “imperfection,” and “lack.” Morally it means “baseness,” “depravity,” “intentionally practiced evil will.”

B. The OT and Later Judaism. In the LXX the term has such senses as “uselessness,” “badness,” “ugliness,” “displeasure,” “misfortune,” “trouble,” and, morally, “evil” (disposition, plan, will, or acts). The usage of later Judaism is similar; meanings of the equivalent terms range from “imperfection” to “wickedness.”

C. Hellenistic Judaism.

l. LXX. In the LXX ponēría is an alternative to kakía, and only when it has the sense of “misfortune” or “sad mien” in Ecclesiastes is there any distinction. Indeed, even in Ecclesiastes ponēría can mean “wickedness” too.

2. pseudepigrapha. In these works ponēría may mean “affliction,” “misfortune,” but it mostly has the moral sense of “wickedness,” and as such it is traced back to Beliar or to evil spirits.

3. Philo and Josephus. ponēría may denote political wrongs for Josephus, but the main sense is moral evil, although Philo prefers kakía (as do the Hermetic writings).

D. The NT. The term has a generalized moral sense in the NT (cf. Rom. 1:29; 1 Cor. 5:29). It occurs alongside kakía in the list in Mk. 7:22. The plural in Acts 3:26 carries a reference to various kinds of iniquity, and cf. Lk. 11:39. Often there is an association with covetousness (Rom. 1:29; Lk. 11:39: extortion). In Mt. 22:18 ponēría is the wicked purpose of the Pharisees. The genitive in Eph. 6:12 characterizes the spiritual forces; it does not describe their origin.

E. The Apostolic Fathers. In the apostolic fathers the moral sense predominates, i.e., “wickedness,” “wicked conduct,” “baseness” (cf. Hermas Visions 3.5.4; 3.6.1; Similitudes 9.18.1). The vices in Hermas Mandates 8.3 are collectively ponēríai. Thus ponēría may on the one hand be a collective term for wickedness, while on the other it denotes specific conduct or the disposition that it expresses. [G. HARDER, VI, 546-66]

poreúomai [to go, send], eisporeúomai [to go into], ekporeúomai [to go out] poreúomai.

A. Nonbiblical Usage.

1. Meaning. The active of poreúomai has such senses as “to set in motion,” “to convey,” “to lead,” “to bring,” “to send”; the middle means “to go,” “to travel,” “to journey” (figuratively, but rarely, “to traverse the way of life”).

2. Journeys to the Hereafter. In connection with death, the idea of a journey to the hereafter occurs. The land of no return lies in the west, where the sun sets. The way to the abode of the gods lies across a vast waste and a fiery river, although privileged dead are snatched away there at once. The Greeks refer to journeying in Hades and also speak about the western isles of the blest. In poetry some travelers to the underworld return. With the distinction of soul and body, only the immortal soul makes the final journey back to its heavenly home. Judgment decides which course the soul shall take. The idea of the ascent of the soul occurs in the Iranian myth which passes in different forms into Mithraic, Mandaean, Christian, and Jewish thinking. Souls may also travel abroad in dreams or ecstatic rapture, although in the case of ecstasy, which is passive, poreúomai does not strictly apply.

B. The LXX and Later Judaism.

1. In the LXX poreúomai has the literal sense "to go," "to travel" (cf. Gen. 11:31;, 12:4-5; Dt. 1:19), as well as "to wander about" (1 Sam. 23:13) and "to creep" (the serpent in Gen. 3:14). It may have such varied references as to flowing streams, the tossing sea, spreading branches, and the blowing wind. A common closing salutation is: "Go in peace" (1 Sam. 1:17; 2 Sam. 3:21).

2. Deriving from the Hebrew original, the sense "to pass away" is also found (Hos. 13:3; Cant. 2:11; cf. Lam. 4:9).

3. The transferred sense is common in the LXX. Thus conduct is a walking (1 Kigs. 3:14), and the use of "way" or "ways" completes the metaphor (2 Chr. 11:7). The message of the OT is that one should go on God's way, not as a way that leads to God, but as a mode of life that one should live as a member of the covenant people. Various definitions of true or false walking may be given, e.g., in righteousness or truth (Is. 33:15; Prov. 28:6), or in falsehood or confusion (Jer. 23:14; Is. 45:16). Walking in the law of the Lord is contrasted with walking in pagan statutes (Ps. 119:1; Lev. 18:3). Walking in the law is walking in the light (Is. 60:3), for God's countenance shines upon it. The obedient, not trying to evade God's searching glance, are said to walk before God (1 Kgs. 2:4; 8:23; Is. 38:3).

4. The term acquires a theological sense, again on the basis of the Hebrew, when it signifies "to go after" with the nuance "to be subject." Thus Israel is summoned to follow God (1 Kgs. 18:21), and apostasy is following other gods (Dt. 6:14), specifically Baal (Jer. 2:23).

5. In the OT poreúomai may also be used in the imperative for sending out on a divine mission. The fact that God himself sends gives this ordinary usage a special content, for those sent thus are bearers of a divine commission (cf. Abraham in Gen. 22:2, Nathan in 2 Sam. 7:5, Elijah in 1 Kgs. 19:15, etc.).

6. As death ends life's journey, it is a "going the way of all the earth" (1 Kgs. 2:2). This is a going with no return (2 Sam. 12:23). The dead are gathered to the fathers in the place of the dead. Later this place is seen as a holding area prior to judgment and resurrection. God does not journey into Hades. The OT refers to the rapture of Enoch (Gen. 5:24) and the ascension of Elijah (2 Kgs. 2:11), but only in later Judaism do we find accounts of heavenly journeys by the heroes of faith or of ascents into heaven or paradise during life with the accompanying disclosure of the secrets of things to come.

7. Philo makes no great use of poreúomai and never refers to walking under God's claim. Where he uses the term, it has a moral flavor. The king's highway is for Philo the royal way of virtue and the true middle way. He allegorizes the serpent's creeping (Gen. 3:14), and the interpretation of the name Zilpah as "accompanying mouth" suggests to him that Zilpah should keep her virtue by what she says. The usage of Josephus contains nothing distinctive.

C. The NT.

1. Literal Usage. Used by the NT in the middle and passive, the verb means "to go," "to travel," "to journey" (Lk. 13:33; Acts 9:3). It occurs in parting salutations (Lk. 7:50). It denotes going to a task in Jn.

LXX Septuagint

cf. confer, compare

OT Old Testament

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

NT New Testament

11:11. Details about the going may be given, e.g., through Galilee (Mk. 9:30), before the sheep (Jn. 10:4), to Israel (Mt. 2:20), after demagogues (Lk. 21:8). Hebraisms are common (Mt. 2:8 etc.).

2. Going to Death. The concept of going to death occurs in the NT. For Jesus this is a divinely appointed way (Lk. 22:22), and Peter expresses a readiness to tread it with Jesus (22:23). At the judgment the wicked are told to depart into eternal fire (Mt. 25:41), and the traitor goes to his own place in Acts 1:25.

3. Imperative Use. The imperative expresses God’s sovereign command to Joseph in Mt. 2:20. Jesus in healing power tells the sick man to go home in Lk. 5:24 (cf. Jn. 4:50; Mt. 8:9). He sends out his disciples on their mission in Mt. 10:6-7. An indicative often follows such imperatives (Mt. 2:21; Lk. 5:25, etc.).

4. The Mission of Jesus. The Baptist declares to those who go out to him the message of threatening eschatological judgment. Jesus goes to the people, so that poreúomai, while describing his travels, also expresses his mission. At times he goes off to pray or to seek solitude (Lk. 4:42). But he also goes ahead under divine compulsion (Mt. 19:15) even though this be to rejection (Lk. 13:33). His going is a model for his followers (Lk. 9:57-58). He goes out to find his sheep (Mt. 18:12); he goes before his flock to protect and provide for it (Jn. 10:4).

5. The Apostles. As itinerants, the disciples carry Jesus‘ message to the lost sheep of Israel (Mt. 10:6). Mary Magdalene is sent out by the risen Lord to tell of his resurrection (Jn. 20:17). The disciples are then sent out to preach judgment and salvation (Mt. 28:19). Philip is sent to a lonely road (Acts 8:26), Ananias to the persecutor (9:15), and Peter to the Gentiles (10:20). Paul is an indefatigable itinerant (Acts 9:3; 19:21; 22:5, 10, 21).

6. Transferred Moral and Religious Use. The NT seldom uses poreúomai for the moral or religious walk. One instance is in Lk. 1:6, another in Acts 9:31. References to an ungodly walk occur in 1 Pet. 4:3; Jude 16, 18; 2 Pet. 3:3. Acts 14:16 says that God let all the nations walk in their own ways, probably with a religious nuance.

7. Parting Discourses. In Jn. 14:2-3, 12, 28; 16:7, 28 Jesus speaks of going to the Father. He goes on ahead to prepare a place for his disciples (14:2), and at his coming will take them to be with himself (14:3). When he goes, the disciples will do greater works (14:12). His going is his exaltation (14:28). It makes way for the coming of the Paraclete (16:7), completing his own redemptive work (16:28).

8. The Ascension of Jesus. In the NT poreúomai is used for the ascension in Acts 1:10-11; 1 Pet. 3:22. The ascension differs from the heavenly journey of the soul; it is an ascension of the total person. As an integral part of the exaltation of the resurrection, it leads to the enthronement and dominion of Jesus, and is the presupposition of his coming again in glory (Acts 1:11).

9. The Descent into Hades. 1 Pet. 3:19 uses poreúomai for the descent into Hades. The location and timing are debated, but the event takes place as part of the complex of crucifixion and resurrection, and the emphasis falls on the proclaiming of the gospel to seducing forces and seduced people. It is a mighty declaration of the victory of Jesus over all opposing forces.

1. This word means “to go in,” “to enter.”

2. The LXX uses it for entry into a land (Ex. 1:1), a house (Lev. 14:46), and the sanctuary (Ex. 28:30). The expression “going in and out” is a common one (Dt. 28:19). There is a sexual nuance in Gen. 6:4.

3. In the NT the literal use occurs in Mk. 1:21 (Capernaum); 5:40 (the house); Acts 3:2 (the temple), and cf. “going in and out” in Acts 9:28. Figuratively the food that enters the body in Mk. 7:15 cannot make unclean (7:19), desires enter the heart in Mk. 4:19, and one enters God’s kingdom in Lk. 18:24.

1. This word means “to go or march out,” “to flow out,” “to emerge.”

2. In the LXX it occurs for "going out" to war, for the "exodus," in the phrase "going out and in," for the "bursting forth" of springs, for "going out" of the sanctuary, for the "going forth" of words from the mouth or of God's word, for the "emerging" of infants from the womb, and for the "breaking out" of wrath.

3. In the NT the term means "to go forth" in Mt. 20:29, "to go out" in Acts 25:4. The people "go out" to John in Mt. 3:5. When the disciples "leave" they are to give testimony against unbelievers in Mk. 6:11. The dead will "emerge" from the tombs in Jn. 5:29. Demons "go out" in Acts 19:12. The word "goes forth" in Mt. 4:4. Words of grace "go forth" from the mouth of Jesus in Lk. 4:22. Words that "go forth" may also pollute (Mt 15:11). Vile words, then should not "go forth" from Christian lips (Eph 4:29). The Paraclete is the Spirit of truth who "proceeds" from the Father (Jn. 15:26). Many things "break forth" in Revelation, e.g., lightnings (4:5), fire (11:5), fire and brimstone (9:17-18), and unclean spirits (16:14). The word "issues" from the Lord's mouth (1:16), and a river of living water "flows forth" from the throne of God and the Lamb (22:1). [F. HAUCK and S. SCHULZ, VI, 566-79]

pórnē [harlot], pórnos [fornicator], porneía [prostitution, fornication], porneúō [to commit fornication], ekporneúō [to live licentiously]

A. The Non-Jewish World.

I. Usage.

1. pórnē; (from pérnēmi, "to sell") literally means "harlot for hire" (Greek harlots were usually slaves).

2. pórnos means "whoremonger," then "male prostitute."

3. porneía means "licentiousness" or "fornication" (rare in classical Greek).

4. porneúō means a. "to prostitute" (passive "to prostitute oneself"), and b. "to commit fornication."

5. ekporneúō means "to live licentiously."

II. Extramarital Intercourse.

1. Cultic Prostitution. This includes both the single act and a general state. The former is common in Persia. The latter is widespread in cults of mother deities and in Syria and Egypt. Greece rejects it, but it finds an entrance at Corinth and Athens, probably through trade with the Near East.

2. Secular Prostitution. Prostitutes are unknown in the Homeric age, but men often have concubines, e.g., female slaves. Prostitution arises with increasing prosperity. Slaves provide a source, as does depriving alien women of civil rights. The professional "friend" becomes a common figure in Greek society, and since intercourse is regarded as just as natural as eating and drinking, extramarital affairs are permitted for husbands. Yet excess is censured, and Plato defends intercourse with harlots only as long as it is secret and causes no offense. Sparta maintains stronger sexual discipline but is also the home of homosexuality. This becomes widespread, lesbianism less so. Among harlots those in brothels form the lowest class, those with some artistic skills a higher group, and independent harlots who can command high prices another higher class.

3. The Sex Ethics of Stoicism. Seeking liberation from passion, Stoicism condemns and resists extramarital intercourse, even with female slaves. By unclean acts a person defiles the deity within. Chastity is extolled and adultery regarded as unlawful and infamous.

B. The OT.

I. Usage.

1. The porneúō group is mostly used for the root znh and has such senses as "to be unfaithful," "to play the harlot." It may be used of the prostitute or of the betrothed or married woman who proves unfaithful.

2. porneía means "fornication" (sometimes involving adultery); figuratively it is a term for apostasy as unfaithfulness to God.

3. pórnē means “harlot.”

4. pórnos occurs only in the Apocrypha.

5. ekporneúō means “to commit fornication” “to lead into fornication,” and figuratively “to turn aside from God and go after other gods.”

II. Fornication in the OT. The harlot is a familiar figure in the older histories (cf. Tamar in Gen. 38:15, Rahab in Josh. 2:1; cf. also Judg. 11:1; 16:1; 1 Kgs. 3:16). Social problems promote prostitution (Am. 7:17). Custom protects virgins (Gen. 34:31), but men are allowed some freedom so long as they avoid the wives of others. Sacral prostitution comes in with pagan worship (Jer. 3:2). The prophets combat both the secular and sacral forms (Am. 2:7; Jer. 5:7). The law provides severe penalties for betrothed women who are unfaithful (Dt. 22:21). The priest is not allowed to marry a harlot (Lev. 21:7, 14). No child of fornication may be a member of the covenant people (Dt. 23:3). Prov. 5 warns against the harlot. This is not just a warning against foreign wisdom, nor against foreigners acting as harlots, nor against the wives of others, but against all women, especially from other areas, that are a source of temptation. The repudiation of cultic prostitution goes hand in hand with a condemnation of all forms of porneía.

III. Cultic Prostitution in the OT. As noted, cultic prostitution comes into Israel from various pagan cults (cf. 1 Kgs. 14:24). Asa and Jehoshaphat try to end it (1 Kgs. 15:12; 22:47), but it is still there in Hosea’s day (4:14). Deuteronomy forbids it (23:17), and Josiah roots it out from the temple (2 Kgs. 23:7). The translators avoid any special term for it, using the more general pórnē group or engaging in paraphrase.

IV. Israel’s Unfaithfulness as porneía. Hos. 1-3 portrays the unfaithfulness of Israel to God as a form of adultery. Is. 1:21 uses the same image. Jeremiah, rejecting sacral prostitution, also depicts Israel and Judah as unfaithful women who play the harlot with many lovers (3:2). Ezekiel develops the image in extended allegories (16; 23). In a rather different use, Is. 23:15ff. and Nah. 3:1ff. describe Tyre and Nineveh as harlots because they ensnare and seduce people with their commerce and political devices.

C. Later Judaism.

1. Later Judaism shows how the use of porneía broadens out to include not only fornication or adultery but incest, sodomy, unlawful marriage, and sexual intercourse in general.

2. Sirach issues warnings against fornicating husbands and unfaithful wives (23:16ff.). Wine and women lead to apostasy (18:30ff.). The Wisdom of Solomon thinks the devising of idols is the source of porneía (14:12, 24ff.).

3. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs give various warnings against porneía. The first of seven evil spirits is, porneía, to which women are more subject than men, and which leads to idolatry. In Jubilees Joseph maintains his purity in temptation. Fornication involves paganism and defiles the individual, the family, and the land. Marriage ties with Gentiles are a form of impurity and desecration. The Damascus Document calls licentiousness one of the three nets of Belial. For Qumran it is a mark of the children of darkness, whom the children of light are to shun.

4. Philo views porneía as a blot and a disgrace. Allegorically pórnoi are polytheists. The honorable woman is aretḗ, the dishonorable woman hēdonḗ. Josephus as an apologist for his people eliminates or softens references to fornication, e.g., in relation to Rahab or Jephthah’s mother.

5. The later rabbis condemn not only extramarital intercouse but also unlawful marriages, e.g., with women guilty of cohabitation outside marriage. If the illegality comes to light only later, prior intercourse becomes porneía. Unnatural forms of intercourse are viewed as licentiousness, but there is some vacillation on the condemnation of husbands who might practice it with their wives. The rabbis commend early marriage as a safeguard against fornication. The Noachic law makes fornication an offense for Gentiles. In this regard fornication becomes with murder and idolatry one of the three chief transgressions, to which blasphemy, judging, and theft are often added.

D. The NT.

I. The Proclamation of Jesus. The NT presupposes the existence of harlots in Palestine and the sinfulness of their trade (Mt. 21:31-32; Lk. 15:30). It also depicts their responsiveness to the message of the Baptist and the invitation of Jesus (Lk. 7:50; Mt. 21:31-32). Jesus proclaims grace and forgiveness to all who repent; the true defilement is within (Mt. 15:18-19), and it is a mark of unbelief. As regards divorce, debate arises concerning Mt. 5:32 and 19:9. In Mk. 10:9; 16:18; 1 Cor. 7:10 Jesus teaches the indissolubility of marriage as God's unconditional will. He thus sets aside the practice based on Dt. 24:1, which stricter schools take to apply to moral offenses, laxer schools to anything objectionable. The problem in Mt. 5:32 and 19:9 is perhaps that Jewish Christians who keep the law are required to divorce adulterous wives and hence cannot be responsible if these contract a new relationship which is from a Christian standpoint itself adulterous. Divorce itself is not conceded. In Jn. 8:41 the Jews claim that they are not born of fornication (porneía), but their works show that they are children of the devil rather than of Abraham or God (v. 44).

II. Acts. The only instances of the group in Acts are the three examples of porneía in 15:20, 29; 21:15. The apostolic council requires Gentile believers only to avoid four things, of which porneía is one (cf. Lev. 17-18). In a simplified version, the prohibitions refer to the three chief sins of idolatry, murder, and fornication, but this is probably secondary.

III. Paul, Hebrews, and James. Paul shows that porneia has no part in God's kingdom. The pórnos is excluded (1 Cor. 6:9; Eph. 5:5). Idolatry and licentiousness are linked together in 1 Cor. 6:9. The desert generation offers a warning (1 Cor. 10:8, 11). Unnatural sex in the pagan world is an outworking of divine judgment (Rom. 1:18ff.). The church must keep itself pure from such vices (1 Cor. 5:1ff.). Individual porneía pollutes the whole church (2 Cor. 12:19ff.). God's will for his people is sanctification (1 Th. 4:3ff.). The Christian is a temple of the Spirit and may not give to a harlot members that belong to Christ (1 Cor. 6:15-16). To do so is to shame both self and the church. Licentiousness is a work of the sárx, and is earthly; the Spirit opposes it, and believers are to seek what is above (Gal. 5:19ff.; Col. 3:1ff.). Marriage is a protection against it (1 Cor. 7:2). Serious though fornication is, there is forgiveness for it (1 Cor. 6:11). Thus Rahab is justified by a faith (Heb. 11:31) that shows itself in works (Jms. 2:25).

IV. Revelation. In the letters to Pergamum and Thyatira, the writer of Revelation condemns libertines in the congregations who permit the eating of idol meats and free sex as a demonstration of their superiority (2:14, 20-21). Among pagan sins in the last days Rev. 9:21 mentions sexual indulgence along with idolatry, murder, witchcraft, and theft. In 17-19 pōrnē and porneúō are comprehensive terms for the degeneracy of the world power. Like a city harlot of the day, it bears its name on a headband, and the name declares its nature (17:5). The nations seek its favors (18:3,9) and ape its customs. Above all, it is pórnē as the center of paganism with its harlot-like apostasy from God. The drink that it offers promises pleasure but it is a cup of divine wrath. In contrast to the great harlot is the bride of Christ to which no unclean person belongs (21:27) because she worships God and the Lamb alone. The second death awaits pórnoi along with idolaters, murderers, and others (21:8; 22:15).

E. The Apostolic Fathers. Hermas Mandates 4.1.1 warns against porneía, which differs from but also includes adultery (cf. Mandates 8.3; 4.1.5). We do not find the transferred use in the apostolic fathers, who abandon the terminology of the OT prophets. [F. HAUCK and S. SCHULZ, VI, 579-95]

pósis → pínō

potamós [river], potamophórētos [swept away by a stream], Iordánēs [the Jordan] potamós.

A. Greek Usage outside the NT.

1. Secular Greek. The primary sense of potamós is “water rushing swiftly by,” hence “flowing water,” “stream,” “river.” The ocean that streams around the earth can be called potamós; from it derive all seas, rivers, springs, and wells. In Egypt potamós with the article denotes the Nile. potamoí are early personified as river gods, often depicted as bulls because the noise and tossing of running water remind of bulls. A figurative use occurs, e.g., streams of fire; the idea is that of violent forces that carry things off with them.

2. The LXX. In the LXX potamós with the article denotes the Nile. More generally the term suggests water with a lasting flow. This is important relative to the river of paradise in Gen. 2:10ff. and the eschatological river of Ezek. 47:1ff.; Zech. 14:8. The Hebrew term for wadi is not usually rendered by potamós, for it denotes the dry streambed rather than the torrent of the rainy season. The idea of lasting fullness controls the figurative use, possibly on the basis of the waters of the Nile (cf. Is. 48:18; Am. 8:8; 9:5). In Dan. 7:19 we have a stream of fire; other apocalyptic passages suggest that this is a feature of divine epiphany. potamós is an image of fullness in Sirach (cf. 39:22; 47:14).

3. Philo. Along with the ordinary use, especially for the Nile, Philo has a developed figurative use. Thus the Euphrates signifies divine wisdom, and the noús and lógos are both associated with potamós.

4. Josephus. Along with the river of paradise, Josephus mentions various streams with a steady flow, e.g., the Jordan, Euphrates, Nile, and Arnon. The Jabbok is a potamós, but the Kidron cheimárrous (wadi) (cf. Jn. 18:1).

B. The River in the OT and Later Judaism.

1. The OT. God creates the rivers and is thus their Lord. He can dry them up, even the Nile (Is. 19:5). He can change their water into blood (Ex. 7:14ff.). He fixes their course (Hab. 3:9), and can make them flow even in arid places (Ps. 105:41). They thus join in the chorus of praise to him (Ps. 98:8). River gods are excluded; there are no examples of the worship of water deities in Palestine. No idolatrous notions are associated with fish, although the commandment forbids making images of them. Prior to the conquest river gods might have been worshipped, for the rabbis forbid immolations into seas and rivers, but hard evidence is difficult to come by.

2. The Rabbis.

a. Rivers play an important role in casuistry. Thus salvation from death through the overflowing of a river is a reason for relaxing commands or prohibitions, and the damage done by swollen rivers plays a role.

b. For the rabbis the Euphrates rather than the Jordan is the river. Important is the conviction that the Euphrates is the eastern border of the land (Gen. 15:18). Sight of this river in particular leads to benediction of the Creator, and washing in it is said to keep people free of leprosy.

c. Rivers play a big role in rabbinic lustrations, but precautions have to be taken against impurities in the water. At times bathing is for refreshment rather than ritual purification, but there are no references to bathing for healing as prescribed by Greek doctors.

d. Rivers do not figure in proselyte baptism. River water might be used for this (cf. the demand for the washing of the whole body in flowing water), but later practice assumes that it takes place in the special bathhouse, where spring or well water is used.

C. The NT.

1. Ordinary Use.

a. Mt. 3:6 and Mk. 1:5 tell how the masses are baptized by John in the river Jordan, confessing their sins. That the Jordan is a river has importance both in connection with this baptism and as a historical reference. Some textual witnesses omit potamṓ, either because it is regarded as superfluous or because of the specific association of baptism with running water (cf. Did 7.1ff.). The expression en tṓ Iordánē potamō is an unusual one but it reflects, not a dogmatic interest, but the historical circumstance that, unlike proselyte baptism, this baptism takes place in a river, which alone is adequate for the crowds that demand it.

b. In Acts 16:13 Paul and his companions speak at a gathering by a potamós, a constant stream close to Philippi. The situation of the meeting place, probably a house, makes possible an observance of the rules of purification, although well water is more correct for this purpose. It may be noted that the ritual bath is permissible on the sabbath.

c. Paul meets dangers from swollen rivers according to 2 Cor. 11:26. The parable in Mt. 7:24ff.; Lk. 6:47ff. describes the force of water; in the rainy season it can sweep down torrentially and carry houses away. The parable is eschatological but it is based on the actuality of the land and its climate and need not be related to the flood or to the woes of the end-time.

a. In Rev. 8:10-11 and 16:4 the potamioí, as one part of the world, are ruined as they are turned into wormwood or blood. Without unpolluted rivers life is impossible.

b. The references to the Euphrates in 9:14 and 16:12 adopt OT terms and depict this river as the eastern boundary. When God dries it up, it loses its protective function, and as a result the chosen land will be the theater of the final battle. It may be recalled that the Euphrates serves as the frontier of the Roman empire.

c. In Rev. 12:15 the dragon pours water like a river to sweep away the woman; the use here carries a stress on the element of fullness.

d. The river of the water of life in 22:1 combines the primal river of paradise (Gen. 2:10ff.) with the eschatological temple river of Ezekiel (47:1ff.). The thought of fullness of life is suggested, and the tree of life links up with the similar tree in Gen. 2:9. God’s consummating work both restores and transcends his creative work with new and unrestricted fullness. Apart from Jn. 7:38 there is no precise parallel for the idea of the river of the water of life, although we find references, as at Qumran, to the source of life or the water of life. Older motifs may be adopted, but they are integrated here into the concept of consummated fullness. The sanctuaries of Aesculapius contain sacred springs flowing from under the sanctuary and thus offer some parallel to the depiction of the river as flowing forth from the throne of God and the Lamb. It may be noted that the river does not divide like that of paradise. Here, then, is no mere restoration except at a higher level.

3. The Saying in Jn. 7:37-38. On the last day of Tabernacles, with its solemn dispensing of water, Jesus issues the enigmatic saying Jn. 7:37-38. Problems arise regarding the proper division of the verse, its placing, and the use of the formula hē graphḗ. In view of the associated Rev. 22:1, which also associates the river with the Lamb, it may be noted that Jesus is more the dispenser of the water than its source (cf. also Jn. 4:10). The invitation resembles the ancient invitation to the Passover—an argument for the traditional punctuation. The interpretation in v. 39 is also important. When Jesus has gone, it is the Spirit who makes possible the continuation of his work in and through the disciples. The use of potamós suggests that the force and fullness of life will remain unrestrictedly at work; streams of living water will flow out by way of the disciples into the world and will be available for the thirsty who believe. Along these lines one can understand the statement that rivers of living water will flow out of those who drink, although what precise Scripture is in view is still debatable (cf. Is. 12:3; 44:3).

potamophórētos. This word occurs in Egyptian papyri with reference to damage done by the Nile. There is no corresponding term in rabbinic writings, but these often refer to floods and their effects. The one NT instance is in Rev. 12:15. Here the dragon, by sending a stream of water after the woman, seeks to sweep her away like a flood, i.e., to rob her of control of her own destiny.

Iordánēs.

1. The Name and Its Meaning.

a. The Course. The river Jordan rises on Mt. Hermon, flows along the Great Rift Valley, passes through the lake of Galilee, and empties into the Dead Sea about 400 meters below sea level. It is not navigable in its lower reaches but contains fish up to the place where its waters mingle with those of the Dead Sea.

b. The Name. The Greek name is usually Iordánēs, but Iórdanos also occurs, e.g., in Josephus. Philo and Josephus do not always have the article; the NT does.

c. The Meaning of the Name. Philo links the name with the Hebrew for katabaínō, and can thus see in its crossing by Jacob (Gen. 32:11) a type of the overcoming of low spiritual periods. Josephus connects it with Dan, perhaps an early tradition which Jerome later adopts when he says that the meaning is “the river of Dan.” Parallel names exist in other areas in Europe and Asia Minor, and this suggests that it is perhaps a general term for a stream which later becomes a proper name. As yet, however, this is merely a conjecture.

2. The Jordan in the OT and Later Judaism.

a. Geographical Position. Num. 34:10ff. fixes the Jordan as the eastern frontier. Although some tribes remain on the far side, the conquest proper begins with the crossing of the Jordan (Josh. 3ff.). The river is a frontier in the NT, and the customs post there brings out its significance as such. In the promise of Gen. 15:18, however, the Jordan is part of the land, and the Euphrates is the eastern border. Scribal materials, then, sometimes group the territory on the far side of the river with Galilee and Judea.

b. Evaluation of the Water. Naaman is cleansed by washing in the Jordan (2 Kgs. 5), and Elisha works another miracle there in 2 Kgs. 6:1ff., but the focus is on the prophet, not on the water as such. Like the OT, later Judaism ascribes no special dignity to the river. Qumran has no particular relation to the river and the Damascus Document does not mention it. The rabbis reject the suitability of its water for certain cultic acts. Theoretically proselyte baptism may be given in it, but there are no records of any actual instances. Below the lake of Galilee access to it is difficult, and the road from Jerusalem to Jericho is a dangerous one in NT times (Lk. 10:30).

3. The River God Jordan. The Titus arch in Rome carries a depiction of the Jordan personifying the conquered province, but this is the only known instance of the association of the river with a god on ancient monuments, and the rabbis either do not know the myth or ignore it. Christian art, however, adopts the personification of the Jordan in connection with Joshua, Elijah, and especially Jesus, but with no

suggestion, of course, that the river is a god, and probably with a view to making the point that the water of baptism takes the place of the water of Jordan and involves participation with Christ.

4. The Jordan in the NT and Primitive Christianity.

a. Survey. Iordánēs occurs 15 times in the NT (six in Matthew, four in Mark, two in Luke, and three in John). The references are mostly to the work of the Baptist or to that of Jesus. In general the NT shows great restraint. This is repeated even in the apocryphal gospels, while the apostolic fathers do not mention the river at all, and only Justin among the Apologists does so. It commands no basic interest.

b. The Baptist. Baptism in the Jordan seems to be initiated by the Baptist. He presumably works both east and west of the river, but the data do not enable us to fix the locations with any precision. Indeed, only Matthew and Mark say specifically that he baptized in the river. John does not contest this, but wants to stress that baptism is with water, not especially with that of the Jordan.

c. Jesus and the Jordan. Jesus is among those baptized in the Jordan, but the river is not significant as such. In Luke Jesus' baptism is closely integrated into the Baptist's movement; his prayer, however, expresses his obedient waiting for God's call to begin his own ministry. The Gospel of John, too, sets Jesus at the heart of the Baptist's movement and relates the event to the mission and call of Jesus. In Jesus' later ministry the river Jordan plays no special role. We simply read that people from the Jordan region throng to Jesus (Mt. 4:25) and that he ministers there on the way to Jerusalem (Mt. 19:1; cf. Jn. 3:22ff.; 10:40). The Jordan is not even mentioned in the Zacchaeus incident in Lk. 19:1ff., although this is not due to any desire to separate Jesus' ministry from that of John. The reserve of the NT regarding the river suggests that some principle is at issue regarding what is specifically Christian.

d. Primitive Christianity and the Jordan. Acts does not relate primitive baptismal practice to the Jordan. Neither in Acts 2:37ff., 8:9ff., 8:26ff., nor 10:47-48 can there be any question of baptism in the Jordan. References to the Baptist mention water and repentance, but not the Jordan. The other books do not mention John at all and say nothing about any particular water in relation to baptism. The only requirement for baptism is that there be some kind of water available (Acts 8:36). Such water is in no way linked to that of the Jordan.

e. The Early Church. Justin mentions the Jordan in his Dialogue with Trypho, but only in such a way as to show that it is a site of God's working in salvation history (49.3; 51.2; 88.3.7). Elisha's miracle in 2 Kgs. 6:1ff. becomes a type of water baptism. Jesus' baptism in the Jordan is combined with the idea of a consecration of water by his immersion. Water is important, but not specifically the water of the Jordan. Unlike Did. 7.1-2, Justin makes no plea for the use of flowing water. Some groups seem to have regarded this as important, following Jewish practice and maintaining a closer link with that of John. But these are probably marginal groups. Thus Tertullian (On Baptism 4) argues that all water may serve in baptism in virtue of Jesus' baptism. Some liturgies describe all consecrated water as Jordan, and this may have influenced the Mandaeans in their insistence on running water and their mention of the Jordan. But Jewish Christians in Jerusalem are not responsible for the idea that running water, symbolized by the Jordan, is the proper water for Christian baptism. The final question, perhaps, is whether the church baptizes in continuation of John's baptism, or because Jesus was baptized, or because he began his work in connection with his baptism. Where running water is esteemed, there is a closer link to John and hence to the Jordan. In Rom. 6:3ff., however, Paul relates Christian baptism to the death of Jesus as well as his baptism, and Acts connects it with the receiving of the Spirit (10:44ff.). The separation of baptism from the Jordan, like that of the Lord's Supper from the Passover, reflects the understanding of the church as something not merely different but new. Around A.D. 400 some believers are still being baptized in the Jordan but there are also baptisteries in Jerusalem which are decorated with pictures of the baptism of Jesus. What takes place, then, is the same as what took place in Jesus' baptism, whether or not the baptism takes place in the Jordan or in running water similar to it. [K. H. RENGSTORF, VI, 593-623]

poús [foot]

A. Secular Greek. This word means human or animal “foot,” the “foot” of an artifact, or the “lower end” of something, whether footlike or not. As a foot, it serves as a measure of length. Poetically it expresses movement and hence occurs in phrases denoting involvement or evaluating persons. Address to the feet of the powerful expresses subordination.

B. Comparative Religion. Connected with the idea of power is the belief that the footprints of gods or divine persons can bring about cures. References to worship of the foot of Sarapis may be found. Feet also occur in theophanies, and they are all that may be seen in ascensions. Baring the foot in worship is a common practice. The aim is to put off defiled coverings, to make direct contact with the power of deity, or to avoid magical hindrances caused by knots or ties.

C. The OT and Judaism.

1. The LXX uses poús for various Hebrew words meaning “sole,” “heel,” “hoof,” “foot,” “step,” and “what lies at the foot.”

2. The term is used figuratively in connection with people treading a path, i.e., a way of life (cf. poús and psychḗ as parallels in Ps. 57:6).

3. The foot is a sign of power in Josh. 10:24; 14:9; 2 Sam. 22:39; Ps. 47:3. In contrast, we find a low estimation of the foot in the euphemism in Judg. 3:24.

4. The foot is uncovered for religious reasons in Ex. 3:5; Josh. 5:13ff. There are no shoes in the list of priestly vestments in Lev. 8. The reason for uncovering the foot in the OT and Judaism is reverent abasement before God.

5. In connection with theophanies we find references to the feet, the footprints, or the footstool of God in, e.g., Pss. 18:9; 77:19; Ex. 24:10. Hab. 3:5 speaks of the treading of God’s feet, and Zech. 14:4 says that when God comes on the last day his feet will stand on the Mount of Olives.

D. The NT.

1. Use for the Whole Person. In the NT, which uses poús infrequently and sometimes for the leg and not just the foot (Rev. 1:15), the whole person is meant in some cases, e.g., Mt. 4:6; Acts 5:9.

2. Transferred Use. On an OT basis the poús may refer to the person who is ready or active (cf. Lk. 1:79 [Is. 59:8]; Heb. 12:13 [Prov. 4:26]; Rom. 10:15 [Is. 52:7]), which has the mission of those who preach salvation in view. The poús that gives offense in Mk. 9:45 is partly literal (the foot is the instrument) and partly figurative (the way of life is what really scandalizes).

3. As a Symbol of Power. Only in Revelation do we find the OT use of the foot to denote suppression and subjection (Rev. 3:9). The promise of Rom. 16:20 is that God will crush Satan under believers’ feet. Jesus fulfils eschatologically the expectations of Pss. 8:6 and 110:1. Interest focuses, then, not on power plays in politics but on the final conflict. Strength and rule are denoted when the feet of the angel are compared to pillars of fire in Rev. 10:1 and the woman has the moon under her feet in 12:1 (cf. also the bear’s feet of the beast in 13:2).

4. Subordination. Respect for the law underlies the expression in Acts 22:3. The apostles represent God when offerings are laid at their feet in Acts 4:35 (cf. 5:10). Shaking the dust off the feet is a judicial gesture in Mk. 6:11. But the authority is that of God or Christ, for Peter will not let Cornelius fall at his feet (Acts 10:25), nor will the angel let the divine fall down to worship him in Rev. 19:10.

5. Veneration of Jesus. No restriction is placed on the veneration of Jesus. The Baptist confesses his unworthiness to unloose his shoes (Mk. 1:7). The divine in Rev. 1:17 falls at his feet. Sometimes the gesture of falling at his feet or grasping them is one of courtesy or respect for the Messiah, but in many instances it is plainly one of worship (cf. Mk. 5:22; 7:25; Mt. 15:30; Jn. 11:32). The majesty of Jesus is seen and he is worshipped as God on his throne is worshipped in Rev. 7:11. Sitting at Jesus' feet may express only readiness to learn and grateful discipleship, but grasping the feet of the risen Lord in Mt. 28:9 is plainly obeisance. The same is true of the washing, anointing, and kissing of the feet of Jesus in Lk. 7:36ff. As the one who forgives sins, Jesus is exalted far above sinners, and it is to his feet (as in theophanies) that worship must be addressed and an offering made (cf. Jn. 11:2; 12:3).

6. The Foot Washing. It is paradoxical that the Lord of glory should wash human feet, but the paradox is the point of the incident. What Jesus does is not to initiate a rite but to interpret his saving work as a self-humbling in the service of others. As an example, this action urges the disciples to discharge a similar mission with the same humility. In 1 Tim. 5:10 washing of the saints' feet by widows is perhaps to be construed along similar lines and may rest on the same tradition.

7. Cultic Uncovering. This is not commanded in the NT and the only reference is in Stephen's speech (Acts 7:33), where he quotes Ex. 3:5. [K. WEISS, VI, 624-31] prássō [to do], prágma [deed, event, task], pragmateía [business], pragmateúomai [to be occupied with], diapragmateúomai [to gain by trading], práktōr [bailiff], práxis [action, works] prássō.

A. Outside the NT.

I. Secular Greek.

l. Meaning. This word first means a. "to cross," "to traverse," "to advance," then b. "to travel so as to achieve something," c. "to be busy with," "to pursue," d. financially "to demand," "to collect," e. "to do," "to act" (with adverb denoting moral worth or circumstances), and finally f., in magic, "to perform a magical act." A bad sense g. "to betray" appears early in history.

2. Survey. Only rarely is the verb used for acts of deity. Thus Plato uses poieín etc. for divine creating, but not prássein. The only application to the gods is when divine action is compared to human.

3. Human prássein. As regards human action there is much overlapping with poieín but prássein denotes the activity rather than the outcome (at least in later Greek). It is thus an apt term in philosophical inquiry which consider human action apart from its content and objects, i.e., the nature and purpose of action. Lack of knowledge rather than capacity lies behind defective action according to a common Greek view. In Epictetus imparted knowledge enables one to perceive and overcome the antithesis between will and act.

II. The LXX. In the LXX prássein plays a much smaller role than poieín, perhaps because it is too weak to express either divine creating or human action in obedience, and perhaps also because it has too much the sense of business. An ethically negative sense clings to it in Wisdom writings (cf. Prov. 14:17; Job 27:6; 36:21, 23). Only in Maccabees does it have a positive sense (cf. 2 Macc. 12:43; 4 Macc. 3:20).

III. Philo and Josephus.

l. Philo. Philo refers only once to divine prássein. As regards human action, he seeks a harmony of thought, will, and action. Love of God controls piety, but God tends to be equated with nature along Stoic lines. Thus the antithesis of will and action is no serious problem for the sage.

2. Josephus. Josephus often uses both the simple prássein and various compounds.

B. The NT.

1. Positive Evaluation. The NT never uses prássein for God's work and mostly gives it a negative sense relative to human action. Of the 39 instances, 19 are in Luke and Acts, and 18 in Paul. A positive sense occurs only in Acts 26:20, Rom. 2:25, Phil. 4:9, and Acts 15:29 (either "you will do well" or "it will go well with you"). The use is neutral in Acts 5:35, Rom. 9:11, 2 Cor. 5:10, Acts 26:26, 1 Cor. 9:17, and 1 Th. 4:11. The exacting of money is the issue in Lk. 3:13 and 19:23.

2. Negative Evaluation. The context makes a negative evaluation clear in Acts 19:19. The expression in Acts 16:28 is a singular one (cf. Lk. 22:23). Mitigating circumstances are not the point in Acts 3:17 but the divine forbearance. While prássein is synonymous with other verbs of action in Rom. 13:4 and 1 Cor. 5:2, its negative import is apparent in 1 Th. 4:11; Jn. 3:20-21; 5:29. In Rom. 1:32 prássein is used for those who are rotting in vices while poieín is the term for the willful transgression of God's command (cf. 2:1ff.). Even in relation to sin prássein is less precise and poieín more definite. This is perhaps the point in Rom. 7:15, 19 as well. In v. 15 the act that is only a doing is prássein but the act that is hated is poieín. In v. 19, however, poieín denotes the seriousness of the situation in which what is not willed is done, while prássein expresses the stupid doing of the evil that is not willed.

3. Acts 26:31 etc. In this context Paul is said not to have done anything worthy of death, in conscious parallelism to the declaration of Jesus' innocence by Pilate (Lk. 23:4, 14-15, 22). In the case of Jesus the declaration does not shift the blame from Pilate to the Jews, for Herod concurs (Lk. 23:14-15), and the execution of an innocent person is the true injustice. Luke's point is rather that God overrules the execution of the innocent Jesus in order to bring salvation to the guilty. Paul, too, becomes God's instrument in Rome by being treated as guilty even though innocent. In contrast, he himself admits that he earlier thought he should do many things against the name of Jesus (Acts 26:9).

C. Apostolic Fathers. The tendency in these authors is to use prássein mainly for bad conduct (1 Clem. 35:6; 2 Clem. 4:5; Hermas Mandates 3.3).

1. This word has the following senses: a. "undertaking," "obligation," "task";, b. "cause," "affair," "phenomenon"; c. "act," "fact," "event"; d. "circumstances," "relations," "situation"; and e. "legal process," "trial."

2. In the LXX the usual sense is "matter," "affair," although "word" is also possible. With reference to God's acts we read of "wondrous things" in Is. 25:1. Indefinitely "something" (or, negatively, "nothing") might be meant. prágma denotes "evil" in Lev. 7:21. In the plural, affairs of state are at issue in 2 Macc. 9:24, and other senses are heroic deeds (Jdt. 8:32) and legal affairs (1 Macc. 10:35).

3. In six of eleven NT instances the meaning is the neutral one of "affairs" (Mt. 18:19), "business" (Rom. 16:2), "events" (Lk. 1:1), or "things" (Heb. 6:18; 10:1). In Heb. 11:1 we do not have a subjective genitive, as though unseen things were the proof. Faith, oriented to God, brings assurance regarding the promises. A negative evaluation occurs in Acts 5:4; 2 Cor. 7:11. In 1 Th. 4:6 "business" is possible, as is "lawsuit," but "matter" is the most natural meaning, the content being supplied by what precedes. Christians are not to wrong one another in the matter of sex, and one of the decisive factors in pagan society is thus set under the sanctification that God wills (v. 3). This is not simply a matter of interpersonal relations but of obedience to God (v. 8).

4. Among the apostolic fathers Hermas especially uses the term, mostly in the colorless sense of "thing," "affair," "matter" (Visions 3.11.3; Mandates 5.2.2).

1. This word means a. “zealous concern about something,” b. “business,” “work,” “affairs,” “duties”; c. “trade”; d. “writing,” “treatise.”

2. The usual senses occur in the eight LXX instances.

3. In the rabbis we find adoption of the term as a loanword for “business.”

4. The only NT occurrence is in 2 Tim. 2:4, where “civilian affairs” is the point. Pay is not the main issue (cf. 1 Cor. 9:7) but turning aside from the various demands of life to prompt and total service of Christ.

5. Only Hermas of the apostolic fathers uses the term, e.g., for “affairs” in Mandates 10.1.4 and “business” in Visions 3.6.5.

1. pragmateúomai is used for “to be occupied with,” with reference to affairs of state, literary composition, or business. The only NT instance in Lk. 19:13 obviously relates to trading.

2. diapragmateúomai is a more intensive form. In Lk. 19:15, the only NT instance, it signifies the profit gained by trading.

1. This word, originally meaning “avenger,” comes to be used for those who execute judgments, exact penalties, or collect taxes, although a more general sense is also possible. The one NT example is in Lk. 12:58, where “bailiff” is the meaning; the parable calls for repentance before the divine decision is made and judgment takes its ineluctable course.

1. In secular Greek this word means a. “act” (including the result); b. “action”; c. “individual completed act”; d. “situation,” “condition,” “destiny”; e. “magical action”; f. “deception”; g. “sexual intercourse.”

2. The LXX seldom uses the term, and when it does, it takes it in the ordinary Greek senses. Only in Sir. 35:22 does it have a religious sense, i.e., “works.”

3. In Philo it is controlled by the verb. There is no reference to God’s práxis. For specific acts Philo usually has the plural. He stresses acts more than words, but strongly supports the Stoic unity of word, will, and act.

4. The seven NT instances are by no means uniform, although all tend to carry a derogatory nuance. Acts are “works” in Mt. 16:27. Lk. 23:51 echoes the Stoic unity of word, will, and act. Action or mode of action—not so much the deeds as the inner nature—is the point in Rom. 8:13. Similarly in Col. 3:9 the old nature, which is to be mortified, has already been put off in Christ. In Acts 19:18 there might be a forsaking of wicked acts in general, but in context it seems that “magical practices” are in view. The title of Acts (práxeis apostólōn) probably comes from the second century. It hardly accords with Luke’s own usage or with his attributing of the church’s missionary activity to the exalted Lord and his word rather than to the apostles. The latter emphasis rules out any idea that the “experiences” of the apostles are the theme.

5. In the apostolic fathers práxis is most common in Hermas; it refers to human deeds, usually in a bad sense (cf. Mandates 4.2.1; Similitude 4.4). [C. MAURER, VI, 632-44]

praüpátheia → páschō

praū́s [gentle, meek], praū́tēs [gentleness, meekness]

A. Secular Greek.

1. praū́s. This word means a. “mild” of things, b. “tame” of animals, c. “gentle” or “pleasant” of persons, d. “kindly” or “lenient” of such things as activities or punishments. The adverb práōs denotes quiet and friendly composure.

*2. praū́tēs. This word means “mild and gentle friendliness.” The Greeks value this virtue highly so long as there is compensating strength. Thus rulers should be gentle with their own people and stern with others. Laws should be severe but judges should show leniency. Gentleness is a mark of culture and wisdom if it does not degenerate into self-abasement. It is especially a virtue in women and characterizes female deities. For Aristotle it is a mean between bad temper and spineless incompetence, between extreme anger and indifference.

B. The LXX and Hellenistic Judaism.

1. The OT. praū́s occurs 12 times for various Hebrew terms. Since the Hebrew relates primarily to the social position of a servant or inferior, and thus carries the nuance of humble, praū́s is never used of God. In the Pentateuch praū́s is used only in Num. 12:3 for Moses. In Joel 3:10 there is no Hebrew original for praū́s; the point is that the gentle must become warriors. Zech. 9:9-10 depicts the king of salvation as the king of peace. In Ps. 45:4 praū́tēs is a quality of the royal hero, and although the group does not occur in Proverbs, Sirach values praū́tēs as pleasing to God (1:27), an adornment of women (36:23), and an antidote to arrogance (10:28). Since the prophets castigate the wealthy, the lowly come to be seen as the bearers of the promise who keep God’s commandments (Zeph. 2:3). A quiet and expectant bearing of destiny that is grounded in God is a mark of piety (cf. Is. 26:6; Pss. 76:9; 37:9ff.).

2. Philo. On the basis of the LXX and Greek ethics, Philo praises God’s judicial mildness and depicts Moses as one who moderates passion. The Jews deserve high praise for their meekness in persecution.

3. Josephus. Josephus uses the group for meekness in affliction.

4. Qumran. The Qumran texts demand mildness from members of the sect in accordance with a dualistic view of power which makes gentleness constitutive for the children of light.

C. The NT.

l. Matthew. In accordance with their different emphases in Christology, Mark, Luke, John, and Hebrews never use the group, and Paul uses only the noun. Matthew alone of the Synoptists uses praū́s (Mt. 5:5; 11:29; 21:5). In 11:25ff. Jesus calls himself praū́s. His is a lowly mission, and his heart is fixed only on God; for this very reason he can invite with full authority. In 21:5 (cf. Zech. 9:9) he makes a peaceful entry into Jerusalem in sharp contrast to Zealot hopes. In Mt. 5:5 the meek to whom the inheritance is promised are those who acknowledge the great and gracious will of God. The emphasis here is on the future; they will rule with God in the eschaton.

2. Paul. Dealing with the contentious Corinthians, Paul brings to bear the meekness of Christ that has its basis in love (2 Cor. 10:1; 1 Cor. 4:21), not in weakness. praū́tēs is a gift of the Spirit in Gal. 5:23; it enables the believer to correct others without arrogance (6:1). In Col. 3:12 it is one of the gifts of election, and in Eph. 4:2 it is worthy of Christian calling.

3. Pastoral Epistles. In 2 Tim. 2:25 correcting opponents with gentleness will perhaps bring about their conversion. Tit. 3:2 commends gentleness to all people, and in 1 Pet. 3:16 the defense of the faith should be with gentleness.

4. James. Jms. 1:21 contrasts praū́tēs with anger (v. 20); it entails a readiness to be taught in the word. The divine wisdom is gentle and peaceable (3:13, 17), and its gentleness will be a mark of the righteous in pleasing contrast to bitterness and contention.

D. Apostolic Fathers. The usage here is much the same as in the NT. The adjective and noun occur in lists or along with other virtues. praǘtēs is an essential Christian virtue expected in a bishop. Surprisingly, no appeal is made to the example of Jesus. [F. HAUCK and S. SCHULZ, VI, 644-51]

présbys [old, elder], presbýteros [older, elder], presbýtēs [old man], sympresbýteros [fellow elder], presbytérion [council of elders], presbeúō [to be older, be an ambassador] présbys, presbýteros, sympresbýteros (→ epískopos), presbytérion.

A. Meaning and Occurrence.

1. presbýteros, comparative of présbys, means a. "older," or simply "old," with no negative connotations but rather a sense of venerability. It then comes into use b. for presidents, members of various guilds, committees etc., village officials, executive committees of priests, and senior groups of different types. c. In the Jewish and Christian sphere it is often hard to distinguish between the designation of age and the title of office. Age is clearly the point in Gen. 18:11-12 and Jn. 8:9; Acts 2:17. Elsewhere the presbýteroi are the bearers of a tradition (Mt. 15:2), and a title is at issue when the reference is to members of governing bodies, as in the nation, the synagogue, or the church.

2. tó presbytérion, which occurs in pre-Christian works only in Sus. 50 for the "dignity of elders," occurs in the NT for a. "the Sanhedrin," and b. "the council of elders" in the church (cf. Lk. 22:66; 1 Tim. 4:14). Common in Ignatius, the term signifies for him the council of presbyters, which parallels that of the apostles (Philadelphians 5.1) and functions as the bishop's council (8.1).

3. The sympresbýteros is the "fellow elder" (1 Pet. 5:5); it becomes a common collegial form used by bishops in addressing presbyters.

B. Elders in Israel and Judah.

1. Elders are presupposed in all strata of the OT. As the heads of large families or clans they are leaders of large units of the people. Yet they lose their original tribal relationship and appear in the OT as representatives of the whole nation along with and under figures like Moses and Joshua. At God's command Moses assembles them to declare to them the approaching exodus and to go with them to Pharaoh (Ex. 3:16, 18). It is they who supervise the Passover and receive God's revelation at Sinai (Ex. 12:21; 19:7). Some of them witness the miracle at Horeb, and 70 see God's glory at the making of the covenant (Ex. 17:5; 24:1). The elders lead the attack on Ai and are specially summoned to the council at Shechem (Josh. 8:10; 24:1). A special group is appointed by God to share the burdens of Moses (Num. 11:16-17, 24-25) and is validated by receiving a portion of Moses' spirit. The rabbis later lay great stress on Ex. 24 and Num. 11. The latter passages form a model for the Sanhedrin and offer support for rabbinic ordination.

2. In the age of the judges and the monarchy elders are leading members of the municipalities who make decisions in political, military, and judicial matters. In addition, elders from the districts or tribes meet for common decisions (1 Sam. 30:26 etc.). It is the elders who bring up the ark in 1 Sam. 4:3, who demand a king in 8:4, whom David wins over in 2 Sam. 5:3, who defect in 17:4, who represent the people in 1 Kgs. 8:1. Their power declines with the rise of a royal bureaucracy, but the king has to turn to them in critical situations or when important decisions must be taken (1 Kgs. 20:7-8; 21:8, 11).

3. Deuteronomy accords the elders specific powers, although only in the local sphere and in company with judges and minor officials. For examples of their functions, see Dt. 19:11ff.; 21:18ff.; 22:13ff. Whereas judges and officials have to be newly appointed (16:18), the elders are local colleges with limited administrative powers. They are much to the fore in special assemblies (29:9), although not in this case as an official corporation.

4. During and after the exile the elders still play a role both at home and abroad. Local elders plead for Jeremiah in Jer. 26:17, but representative elders in Jerusalem engage in idolatry (Ezek. 8:1). In exile the elders emerge once again as the main leaders in limited self-government. Families are now more important and an aristocracy develops. The elders owe their authority to the special position of the families to which they belong. Thus new terms, e.g., "heads of families," begin to appear. Governors like Nehemiah have considerable difficulty with this new nobility. City elders still play a role (Ezr. 10:7ff.) but these are not identical with the group that Ezra selects in 10:16. As suggested by Neh. 5:17, the trend is toward the establishment of a kind of senate made up of representatives of the leading families in Jerusalem and acting as a centralized college.

5. The beginnings of the council of elders, the Sanhedrin, go back to the Persian period. At first all the members, then only lay members, are called elders; the two other groups are the scribes and the priests, the dominant group. After the fall of Jerusalem the Sanhedrin of Jamnia, composed of 72 elders, takes control, but with no political and only limited judicial power. It consists exclusively of scribes.

6. Elder is a term that is also used for leading older scholars, who may often be members of the Sanhedrin. This use prepares the way for the designation of ordained scholars as elders. It is also reflected in the tradition that 72 elders, i.e., those of good repute and scholarship, translated the OT into Greek.

7. In later Judaism presbýteroi is also a term for local authorities and for members of synagogue councils, although it is less common in this sense among dispersion Jews. The use for older people and for notable citizens, e.g., heads of leading families, continues.

C. The Tradition of the Elders in Jesus' Teaching. In the debate of Mk. 7:1ff. Jesus contrasts the commandments of God with the tradition of the elders (7:8). Jesus is not here setting the law as such against its extension, i.e., the Sadducees against the Pharisees. At times he can both amend the law (Mk. 10:1ff.) and use tradition (Mt. 12:11). Nevertheless, the command of God takes precedence over tradition, for, as Mt. 23 shows, tradition often takes the form of a hypocritical exposition that fails to subordinate ceremonial matters to the law of love.

D. Presbyters in the Primitive Christian Community.

1. The First Jerusalem Church. Acts 11:30 refers to elders in the first Jerusalem church. We also read of these elders in Acts 15:2ff. and 21:18; in 15:2ff. they are mentioned along with the apostles. If in 11:30 and 21:18 they obviously represent the congregation like a synagogue council, in 15:2ff. they function (with the apostles) more after the manner of the Sanhedrin. The formation of a body of elders probably takes place as the apostles leave Jerusalem and James assumes the leadership. Its functions are patterned partly after the synagogue council and partly after the Sanhedrin.

2. The Pauline Churches. Paul for the most part refers to leaders of the churches in terms of function rather than office. He enjoins obedience to them but more because of their ministry than their status. The constitutional principle is that of a plurality of gifts. This does not rule out, however, the existence of bishops and deacons (Phil. 1:1).

3. Presbyteral Development.

a. James. Jms. 5:14 says that the elders should anoint and pray for the sick. These elders are not just charismatic older believers but officebearers, although obviously with a gift of healing intercession. Since mutual confession and intercession are enjoined in 5:16, the passage does not support the view that these elders are confessors or liturgical leaders.

b. Acts. In Acts.14:23 Paul and Barnabas ordain elders in the Gentile churches. The address of 20:18ff. shows that they are to be overseers and pastors administering the apostles' legacy, following their example, and protecting the people against error. The designation of the elders as bishops in 20:28 (the only use in Acts) is of special interest.

c. 1 Peter. In 1 Pet. 5:1ff. the writer addresses the elders and younger believers as though these were age groups, but obviously the elders are a college of officebearers with a pastoral function. The warnings of

vv. 2-3 show that they have charge of the funds and exercise authority. Yet their powers are not autonomous, for they are responsible to Christ, who alone is called epískopos (2:25). The dignity of the office may be seen in Peter's self-designation as sympresbýteros, for if this modestly sets him alongside them, it also sets them alongside him.

d. The Pastorals. In 1 Tim. 5:1 age is obviously denoted by presbýteros, but elsewhere an office is at issue. The presbytérion is a college (1 Tim. 4:14). Titus is to ordain presbýteroi (1:5), and presbýteroi are to be rewarded if they rule well (1 Tim. 5:17) and protected against frivolous charges (5:19). Preaching and teaching are a special function of at least some of the elders (5:17). The bishops and presbyters seem to be much the same (cf. Tit. 1:5, 7ff.). Yet the bishop is always in the singular and the presbyters are always plural (even in Tit. 1:5ff.). Already, then, there may be a tendency for a leading presbyter to take over administrative functions within the presbyteral college—the probable starting point for the later development of the monarchical bishop.

4. Revelation. In Rev. 4:4; 5:6ff., etc. 24 elders surround God's throne. The fact that they sit on thrones (4:4) and are adorned with white robes and crowns (4:4) suggests that they are a heavenly council, yet they have no judicial office but simply discharge a function of worship (4:10; 5:8ff.). Their divine service in heaven accompanies the work of God on earth. Differentiated both from transfigured saints (14:1ff.) and from the angels that surround the throne (5:11), they seem to be closer to the divine throne, and one of them speaks to the divine (5:5; 7:13) and is addressed by him as kýrios. Parallels may be seen in 1 Kgs. 22:19; Ps. 89:7; Dan. 7:9-10; Is. 24:23. The number (24) may be influenced by nonbiblical sources (Babylonia and Persia), but one may also think of the 24 classes of priests and Levites in 1 Chr. 24:5 (cf. 25:1). It is unlikely that the picture of a chorus of 24 heavenly presbyters has any bearing on the constitution of the churches of Revelation, in which the prophetic and spiritual aspects are still prominent.

5. 2 and 3 John. In 3 John the author, who calls himself "the elder" (2 Jn. 1; 3 Jn. 1), is clearly in conflict with an opponent who contests the authority he has previously enjoyed, and who seems to be acting as a monarchical bishop (vv. 9-10). Here the presbyter cannot simply be an older man, nor is he a local officebearer, but he probably describes himself as elder because of his special position as a bearer of the apostolic tradition.

E. The Postapostolic Period and the Early Church.

1. Clement. 1 Clement is close to 1 Peter. It defends elders who for some unspecified reason have been violently deposed by the church at Corinth. The presbyters here are to be honored as older people are (1.3); they constitute a patriarchal college. Within this college are leaders who are called epískopoi (44.1.6). The order is divinely instituted, deriving from God by way of Christ and the apostles. It has a cultic ministry, i.e., to present the church's offerings (44.4). The whole ordering of the congregation may thus be compared to that of Israel in the OT (40ff.), and this guarantees the inviolability of the presbyteral office. The deposed elders should be reinstated (57.1).

2. Hermas. While this work allows for general prophesying (Visions 3.8.11), it mentions a college of presbyters (including bishops and deacons) with pastoral functions and a high dignity based on their apostolic associations (cf. Visions 2.4.2-3; 3.5.1; 3.9.7; Similitudes 9.31.5-6). True prophets are marked by humility (Mandates 11.8); no conflict arises between them and the presbyters (cf. Visions 2.4.3).

3. Ignatius. In Ignatius there is a single bishop and the elders function as his council (Philadelphians 8.1). The church must obey them as a spiritual order (Ephesians 2.2) but only within a hierarchy culminating in the bishop. The church's unity reflects the divine hierarchy of God, Christ, and the apostles (cf. Smyrneans 8.1).

4. Polycarp. The pattern for which Ignatius contends is obviously not the prevailing norm, for in his letter to the Philippians Polycarp refers only to deacons and presbyters (5.2-3). For Polycarp the bishops and elders are virtually the same, as his initial greeting bears witness ("Polycarp and the presbyters with him"). The functions of presbyters include financial administration (11.1-2), discipline, pastoral care, and preaching. If there is any tendency toward the emergence of a single bishop, this is taking place within a presbyterian order.

5. Papias, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen.

a. Papias. In Papias the term presbyters is used for reliable and revered teachers of the authentic tradition. In his own work he wants to collect and present what he has learned from them. They are not the apostles but their immediate pupils, who are itinerants rather than officebearers in specific churches.

b. Irenaeus. Familiar with the work of Papias, Irenaeus uses presbýteroi in a similar sense and states clearly that they are disciples of the apostles (Against Heresies 5.5.1). Polycarp is one of them; a disciple of John, he taught the young Irenaeus. These elders sponsor both the acts and sayings of Jesus and the true exposition of Scripture. As distinct from false presbyters, they are in a valid historical and doctrinal succession from the apostles. An equation of these presbyters with the bishops is thus made on apologetic grounds. This is possible because of the clericalizing of what had at first been a freer teaching office.

c. Clement of Alexandria. In Clement the teaching office of the presbyters retains its freer form. The elders here are teachers of an earlier generation who have transmitted the early records and authentic biblical exposition either orally or in writing. They do not have to be pupils of the apostles nor to hold congregational office, which is of no great importance for Clement. An analogy may be seen to the rabbinic teaching succession.

d. Origen. Like Clement, Origen appeals to earlier teachers, but he believes that such teachers should be ordained. He himself seeks ordination and finally achieves it in Caesarea.

6. The Syrian Didascalia and Hippolytan Church Order. In the first of these documents the bishop holds a position of primacy with administrative and sacramental functions, and the presbyters share in this ministry but as the bishop's delegates. In the second document, too, the clergy are graded, the bishop having the right of ordination, but the presbyters, participating in the Spirit, also having authority to baptize and assist at the eucharist.

1. This word means "to be older or eldest," "to occupy first place" (transitive "to honor"), then "to act as emissary," e.g., in transmitting messages or in negotiations (cf. envoys, imperial legates, business agents). A transferred sense is "to represent."

2. The idea of an envoy occurs in the religious sphere, e.g., in Philo (angels, Moses, etc.), or in Gnostic texts (the Redeemer). In Stoic circles itinerant teachers are seen as God's messengers. Ignatius of Antioch later takes up this idea of envoys carrying divinely authorized messages to the churches (Philadelphians 10.1).

3. In 2 Cor. 5:20 Paul calls his own ministry an embassy. God's reconciling of the world to himself has instituted a ministry of reconciliation (5:18-19). This is not just a passing on of the news but part of the total act (v. 19; cf. 6:1). Through the mouth of the ambassador Christ or God himself speaks. The word of reconciliation presents the completed act as a summons or invitation to its appropriation in faith. The focus is on the authority of the message rather than that of the one who conveys it. The hypér Christoú of v. 20 shows that the apostles speak in Christ's stead or on his behalf, although with no suggestion that Christ is absent or that the apostles are continuing his work. In Eph. 6:20, unlike 2 Cor. 5:20, Paul is an ambassador for the gospel rather than for Christ. He thus speaks in its favor rather than on its behalf.

presbýtēs. Paul calls himself presbýtēs in Phlm. 9, probably in the sense of an older man rather than an ambassador. Pleading for Onesimus, he appeals to Philemon's love, his bonds, his relation to Onesimus, and his age rather than to his authority. [G. BORNKAMM, VI, 651-83]

pró [at, in front of, before]

A. Linguistic Data: pró in the NT.

1. Spatially pró occurs in such phrases as "at the door(s)" (Acts 12:6; Jms. 5:9), "before the face" (Mt. 11:10), and "before the city" (Acts 14:13).

2. Temporally the meaning is "before," e.g., the flood (Mt. 24:38), the meal (Lk. 11:38), winter (2 Tim. 4:21), the ages (1 Cor. 2:7), all eternity (Jude 25). We also find such expressions as "before you" (Mt. 5:12), "before you ask" (Mt. 6:8), and "before it happened" (Jn. 13:19). The phrase in Acts 12:34 means "before his coming," while "six days from [i.e., before] Passover" is the sense in Jn. 12:1.

3. Metaphorically pró expresses preference in Jms. 5:12, and it may suggest protection in Acts 14:13.

B. Biblical Theology: pró in Salvation History.

1. The OT. The ideas of primeval time, priority, and antiquity are important in the OT. God is before the world (Ps. 90:2). His majestic eternity embraces the remotest conceivable time. As Lord of history he is Lord of time (Is. 40:28). His eternity is coincident with his power. His wisdom, too, predates the world (Prov. 8:22ff.). His sovereign calling of his people and prophets is before the historical event.

2. The NT. In the NT, too, God's preexistence is linked to his rule of the world and history. He foreordained before all times the sending of the Son and the salvation effected by him. His glory is before all eternity (Jude 25; cf. Jn. 17:5, 24). The Creator Logos is in the beginning with God, although pró does not occur in Jn. l:lff., nor in Phil. 2:5ff. In Col. 1:17 Christ is before all things; they exist through and to him, so that preexistence and dominion are again seen together. Christ's passion is foreordained (1 Pet. 1:20). Thus priority is given to grace (cf. also 2 Tim. 1:9; Tit. 1:2). The eternal secret is known through the Christ event and the gospel. Believers as the recipients of grace are chosen in Christ before the world's foundation. God foresees and foreordains events, e.g., the name of Mary's child (Lk. 2:21) and human needs (Mt. 6:8); cf. Jesus in Jn. 1:48. Events in salvation history follow a divine plan (Lk. 21:12) whereby we are first prisoners under the law (Gal. 3:23). Evil spirits have an inkling of the plan but think Christ has come before the time (Mt. 8:29). Believers must not judge before the time (1 Cor. 4:5). Some of them are in Christ before others (Rom. 16:7). The prophets and John are forerunners (Mt. 5:12; 11:10). But before Christ are also thieves and robbers (Jn. 10:8) who lead people astray.

3. The Apostolic Eathers. Ignatius Magnesians 6.1 and 2 Clem. 14. 1 mention Christ's preexistence, and Ignatius Ephesians, Preface, says that the Ephesian church was foreordained before eternal times to attain to glory. [B. REICKE, VI, 683-88]

proágō → agōgḗ

próbaton [sheep], probátion [lamb, sheep]

A. Outside the NT.

1. Domestic sheep are valued for their wool and meat. Tending them is a common occupation in Palestine. They are often used in sacrifice.

2. próbaton (also the diminutive probátion) is rare in older Greek. It denotes a. a four-footed (domestic) animal, b. a simple person, and c. a fish. The Stoics use it for stupid people, or for those who must be guided by them. References are made to the attachment between shepherds and their sheep.

3. The LXX uses próbaton for small cattle, offerings, and booty, as well as for a gift on the manumission of slaves (cf. Gen. 30:38; 22:7; Num. 31:28ff.; Dt. 15:14). The people are sheep (2 Sam. 24:17; Is. 63:11; Num. 27:17), and God is their shepherd (Ps. 100:3) who leads and saves them (Pss. 77:20; 78:52). Moses or the king may act on God's behalf (Ps. 77:20; Jer. 13:10). The sheep suffer severely at the hands of unfaithful shepherds (Ezek. 34:23ff.). On their own they stray (Ps. 119:176; Is. 53:6). The innocent Servant is dumb like a sheep (Is. 53:7). With the restoration, the people will increase like sheep (Ezek. 36:24).

4. The rabbis, too, compare Israel to sheep. Eth. En. 89-90 calls leaders like Moses, David, etc. sheep, and distinguishes between deaf or blind sheep and the white sheep of the holy community whose Lord is God. Philo uses the term literally but also allegorically; thus noús is the shepherd of the sheep.

B. The NT.

1. In the NT the literal sense occurs in the illustration in Mt. 12:11, in the parable of Mt. 18:12, in the reference to offerings in Jn. 2:14-15, and in the list of imports in Rev. 18:13.

2. Figuratively Christians were previously lost sheep (1 Pet. 2:21 ff.). The sheep and God's people at the judgment (Mt. 25:32ff.). The Jews wander like lost sheep that need to be led and fed by the shepherd (Mk. 6:34ff.). Jesus sends out his disciples like defenseless sheep (Mk. 10:16). God's hand is behind the smiting of the shepherd and the scattering of the sheep (Mk. 14:27). Wolves may come in sheep's clothing (Mt. 7:15). Jesus is the great Shepherd of the sheep (Heb. 13:20), and under him the apostles care for the flock (Jn. 21:16-17). In Jn. 10:1ff. Jesus calls, knows, precedes, and gives his life for his sheep. On the one side, then, the NT uses the image of the sheep for God's ancient people, while on the other it uses it for the new people of God in eschatological affliction and salvation.

C. The Apostolic Fathers. In Did. 13.3 the firstfruits of the flock belong to the prophets. In Ignatius Philadelphians 2.1 the sheep are to follow the bishop as their shepherd. In Hermas Similitudes 6.1.5-6 gamboling sheep signify those who follow their lusts and fall into trouble. In Hermas Similitudes 9.1.9, however, sheep resting under the shade are like poor saints sheltered by the bishops and congregations. The term próbaton often occurs in quotations (cf. 1 Clem. 16.7; 59.4; Barn. 5.2; 16.5). [H. PREISKER and S. SCHULZ, VI, 689-92]

proéchomai [to have the advantage]

1. Outside the NT. Transitively this world means "to hold up," "to hold up one's hands," "to hold up as an excuse," as well as "to have or to have received in advance." Intransitively it means "to stand out." "be prominent," "surpass," "have the advantage over." In the OT it occurs only in an alternative reading in Job 27:6: "stand out in righteousness."

2. In the NT. In the use in Rom. 3:9 there are three possible meanings. First, Paul might be asking: "Do I make excuses?"—but this is unlikely. Second, the point might be: "Are we [the Jews] surpassed?"—but this is awkward. Third, and most simply, Paul is asking: "Have we an advantage?" Having dealt with various arguments in vv. 5ff., Paul asks whether the Jews are any better off, and he rejects the notion. God's promises do not relieve the Jews of the guilt of ch. 2. Only in Rom. 9-11 will the relation between God's promises and Israel's guilt be resolved. [C. MAURER, VI, 692-93]

proēgéomai* → hēgéomai; próthesis → *títhēmi

próthymos [ready, willing, eager], prothymía [readiness, inclination, eagerness] próthymos.

A. Outside the NT.

1. This word means "ready," "willing," "eager," "active," "passionate."

2. In the LXX it carries such senses as "ready," "willing," "resolute," "brave."

3. A parallel use to that of the LXX may be seen at Qumran.

4. Philo uses próthymos for "ready" or "courageous," and Josephus has it as an adverb for "willingly" or "eagerly."

B. The NT.

1. In Mt. 26:41 Jesus tells his sleepy disciples that the spirit is próthymos but the flesh is weak. The sense is more that of "eager" than "willing." Doubt has been cast on the authenticity of the saying because the antithesis of spirit and flesh seems to be more typical of Paul than Jesus. But the antithesis here is a different one. The point at issue is taking the right way. An inner eagerness is not enough to accomplish this; it runs up against human limitation. The disciples declare their solidarity with Jesus (Mt. 26:35) but they are unable to live up to their good intentions.

2. In Rom. 1:15 Paul expresses his eager resolve to discharge his apostolic office in Rome; he has a sense of obligation to Rome, too, within his apostolic calling (1:5).

C. The Apostolic Fathers. In the apostolic fathers we find the usual senses "ready,","willing," "resolved" (1 Clem. 34.2; Hermas Mandates 12.5.1). The adverb prothýmōs occurs, sometimes with martyrdom as the goal (Hermas Similitudes 9.28.2; cf. Mart. Pol. 8.13).

prothymía.

A. Outside the NT.

1. This word has such varied nuances as "inclination," "readiness," "desire," and "resoluteness." It is common in eulogies.

2. Philo follows the general use. At times the term takes on the sense of "self-awareness" in his works. If one's prothymía conflicts with the divine will it is to be rejected.

3. The only LXX instance is in Sir. 45:23 where the word expresses an "initiative" producing "courage" or "resolution" in obedience to God.

4. Josephus uses the word for "inclination," "attraction," "readiness," and also for "impetuosity" in battle.

5. The corresponding term in rabbinic Judaism carries the twofold suggestion of "voluntariness" (in offerings) and "plenty."

6. The idea of voluntariness is also present in the Qumran writings. A willing and cheerful treading of the divine path is denoted.

B. The NT.

1. In Acts 17:11 the Jews at Berea receive the word with "zeal" or "eagerness."

2. In 2 Cor. 8:11-12 and 9:2 Paul hopes for "readiness" on the part of his readers to raise an offering for Jerusalem. It is with such readiness that he himself is organizing it (8:19). Paul clearly wants action, not just agreement, but he has no wish to exert compulsion. He thus uses this term, and associates himself with it, in an effort to promote voluntary compliance in a project which is to God's glory. The "cheerful resolution" that he hopes for cannot be separated as such from being a Christian.

3. In the apostolic fathers the term occurs in 1 Clem. 2.3; Hermas Similitudes 5.3.4; Diog. 1.1. [K. H. RENGSTORF, VI, 694-700]

proḯstēmi [to be at the head of, rule, care for]

1. This common word means “to put before,” “to present,” or, in the intransitive middle, “to go before,” “to preside,” and figuratively “to surpass,” “to lead,” “to direct,” “to assist,” “to protect,” “to represent,” “to care for,” “to sponsor,” “to arrange,” “to apply oneself to.”

2. In the LXX the word is used for various Hebrew terms, and in translation each instance must be considered on its own merits.

3. Only intransitive forms occur in the eight NT instances. The two senses usually involved are “to lead” and “to care for.” The reference in Rom. 12:8 is to the special charism of caring for others. The same applies in 1 Th. 5:12. Whether specific offices are at issue is much debated; gift and office are not antithetical in the NT. In 1 Tim. 3:4-5 ruling and caring are closely related. The point in 3:12 is similar: Deacons should be heads of their households but with an emphasis on proper care for them. Again, in 5:17 the elders who rule well are those who exercise a proper care of souls (cf. the preaching and teaching), although this does not exclude their role as leaders. The combination of leading and caring that one may see in NT usage agrees well with the principle of Lk. 22:26 that the leader is to be as one who serves. The use of prostátis in Rom. 16:2 offers further illustration of the same point. In Tit. 3:8, 14 we have examples of the sense “to apply oneself to” (i.e., to good works).

4. The senses “to lead” and “to sponsor” are rare in the apostolic fathers. The former occurs in Hermas Visions 2.4.3, the latter in Diog. 5.3. [B. REICKE, VI, 700-703]

prokopḗ [progress, advancement], prokóptō [to go forward, make progress]

A. The Word Group in Greek

1. History and Meaning.

a. This word seems to be originally nautical for “to make headway,” “to forge ahead.” b. Transitively it means “to promote,” middle “to get on,” and then intransitively “to go ahead.”

c. The verb and noun are neutral as such (there may be progress in evil), but they usually have a good sense.

d. They thus signify “fortune,” “success,” “blessing,” “distinction” (in rank, honor, etc.), “military success,” “progress in healing.”

e. prokopḗ also denotes moral and spiritual development, cultural progress, or advance in virtue.

f. Antiquity has no sense of the more general progress of humanity or the world; the ideas of cosmic perfection and of eternal becoming and perishing block such a notion.

2. prokopḗ as a Technical Term in Stoicism. In Stoic ethics prokopḗ occupies middle ground between good and evil. Older Stoicism still reckons it on the side of imperfection but later Stoicism finds few if any true sages and thus takes a more hopeful view of those in process of development. A natural impulse toward progress is helped by instruction, self-examination, and self-accusation, although there may also be regressions. The perfection toward which there is progress embraces wisdom, virtue, and piety.

B. Progress in the OT.

1. OT thinking is historical and the idea of progress in salvation history is a natural one. The term prokopḗ is not used for this, and ideas as to the center and goal of salvation vary, but there is a common belief that God controls events in a movement from promise to fulfilment. Hence God’s history is in a constant flux of election, sending, judgment, and renewal. The human contribution is ambivalent, for while humanity is under a divine demand to be like God (Lev. 19:2), this very goal, falsely understood, is also the cause of progress in evil (Gen. 3).

2. Directed by the law, the people of God advances toward the goal proclaimed in the past. Yet in the prophets there is also a future orientation. A final goal will vindicate and give meaning to all that has gone before. It will be reached, not by steady progress, but by a new creation.

3. Individual as well as corporate history is in movement. Thus the patriarchs walk before and under God. Resistance to this movement, as in the people as a whole, is set aside only by divine intervention and forgiveness. Wisdom literature portrays wisdom as the beginning of a process (Prov. 1:7; Ps. 111:10) that leads to full personal development. If the OT does not use a general term like prokopḗ, this is because each event is taken separately. The late instance of prokopḗ in Sir. 51:17 probably has the sense of "blessing."

C. The Group in Hellenistic Judaism.

1. Apart from Sir. 51:17 the LXX has prokopḗ only in 2 Maccabees for "military success" (cf. Ps. 45:5). The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Aristeas, and Josephus use it in the ordinary senses of "progress," "development," "success."

2. In Philo we find a more Stoic usage for individual development. The starting point and impulse are in nature, behind which stands God. Thus, while individuals and their teachers are important, it is only by divine beneficence that the goal is reached. The field of progress is the whole sphere of wisdom and virtue. Philo highly regards those who are making firm and constant progress even though there are still imperfections in them and they rank below the truly wise. He finds examples of the various stages of progress in the OT.

D. The Group in the NT.

1. Linguistic Data.

a. prokóptō and prokopḗ are Hellenistic rather than intrinsically biblical words. They are rare in the NT (9 instances) and occur only in the Pauline and Lucan material (Gal. 1:14; Rom. 13:12; Phil. 1:12,25; 1 Tim. 4:15; 2 Tim. 2:16; 3:9, 13; Lk. 2:52).

b. In part the usage is that of everyday speech.

c. There are distant echoes of Hellenistic philosophy in Lk. 2:52; Gal. 1:14; 1 Tim. 4:15.

d. Paul himself seems to have coined the phrases in Phil. 1:12, 25.

2. Individual prokopḗ.

a. The subject in the NT is mostly personal. Exceptions are the night in Rom. 13:12, the gospel in Phil. 1:12, and the faith in 1:25.

b. The personal progress is partly individual and partly corporate. Passages that speak of personal advance (Lk. 2:52; 1 Tim. 4:15; Gal. 1:14) are closest to Hellenism. Thus the phrase in Lk. 2:52 sounds Hellenistic. It might be based on current expressions or on Sir. 51:17, but it has an OT content, for the stress is on spiritual progress and (as in 2:40) the controlling concept is that of favor with God reflected in favor with man. Luke never follows up on the progress of Jesus, and the verse offers no basis for speaking about his growth in self-awareness or his moral development. 1 Tim. 4:15 is relatively closer to the Hellenistic concept. Timothy is to develop the charism of v. 14, giving visible evidence of growth in faith, love, and purity, and devoting himself to preaching and teaching. The progress, however, must take outward form and it is ultimately a matter of divine gift. In Gal. 1:15 (Paul's advance in Judaism) the element of human achievement is stronger as Paul forges ahead in knowledge and observance of the law, but the term has an ironic ring, for this progress is the very opposite of what he now regards as prokopḗ (cf. Phil. 1:12, 25; 1 Tim. 4:15); it is closer to the progress in ungodliness of 2 Tim. 2:16 or the going from bad to worse of 2 Tim. 3:13.

3. The prokopḗ of the Community and the Gospel. The NT gives the term a distinctive turn relative to the community and the gospel. In Phil. 1:25 the prokopḗ might stand alone and denote spiritual advance, or

(with joy) it might go with faith and denote advance in faith. Although there is only one saving faith (Eph. 4:5), there are different measures or stages of faith (Mk. 4:24-25; Rom. 12:3), and there may thus be progress in it (Lk. 17:5; 2 Th. 1:3). If Paul stays alive, he may help to promote this progress in faith, although the Spirit, of course, is the ultimate force behind it. If Paul's life serves the prokopḗ of faith, his suffering serves that of the gospel in 1:12. As a prisoner he helps to spread the gospel among pagans and to confirm it in Christians, so that there is both outer and inner advance.

4. The prokopḗ of Heresy. Over against the gospel, heresy and its teachers also make progress. Nourished by demonic forces, error spreads like a cancer (2 Tim. 2:17). Its power is that of deceit and seduction (3:13). It leads away from God (2:16) to the depth of perdition (3:13). The threefold use of the term in 2 Tim. 2:16-3:13 is perhaps the author's answer to the claim of false teachers that they are progressive theologians. The progress of heresy is part of the multiplying of wickedness (Mt. 24:12) and the eschatological tribulation, but it is not without a limit (2 Tim. 3:9).

5. The prokopḗ of the Aeons. Eschatological overtones are plain in Rom. 13:12. The passing of the night signifies the march of time. We are still in the ambivalent period of the already and the not yet. The night is reaching the dark period before the dawn, but it is also almost over; the time has come to wake up. The NT leaves no room here for the thought of human progress. As the history of the world, history has no teleology of its own. Only in the light of the gospel may one see a divinely ordained prokopḗ.

E. The Group in the Early Church.

1. Apostolic Fathers and Apologists. In these writers there is no specific or theological use. In 2 Clem. 17.3 the exhortation reflects a more legal understanding of the Christian life. In the Apologists the use is mostly everyday (cf. Justin Dialogue 11.5). More philosophical usage occurs only in Justin Dialogue 2.6. Irenaeus speaks of progress to God (Against Heresies 4.11.2) but he contests the view of development held by the Gnostics, who think of themselves as progressives.

2. Clement of Alexandria. Clement makes considerable use of both verb and noun, giving the idea broader significance than Philo but also giving it a fuller biblical content as he subjects Stoic and Platonic ideas to the NT. He uses prokopḗ for ascent but also for "step" and "highest step," then for "rank in heaven," embracing Christ's exaltation and the angelic hierarchy. For Clement endless progress is a basic principle of creation. Eternal life is eternal progress. The principle embraces all peoples, but God leads to perfection through the Christian faith. The starting point is the desire for change, but the power of true progress is faith. Discipline and instruction further progress, but God is its real giver and Christ supplies the motive power. On the Greek side culture serves progress but the gospel is the proper sphere of ascent, and philosophy must merge into it to achieve its goal. This goal may be variously described as virtue, the vision of God, immortality, perfection, knowledge, etc. In the long run NT influence is decisive in this view of progress. The progress that Clement finally seeks is progress in perfection and rank in the world to come with its gradations of heavenly destiny. [G. STÄHLIN, VI, 703-19]

prós [before, at, near, toward, etc.]

A. With Genitive. The general sense of prós is "before." With the genitive it normally expresses going out "from," but in the one use in Acts 27:34 it has the transferred sense of "being essential for" (cf. 1 Clem. 20:10).

B. With Dative.

1. Spatially prós with the dative denotes a. place, "before," "at," "by," or "about," and b. direction, "to."

2. Quantitatively it means "besides," but this use does not occur in the NT.

C. With Accusative.

1. Spatially, the common use of prós with the accusative, expressing movement toward, occurs a. with an intransitive verb, e.g., going to or entering (but not with a mystical sense; cf. Rev. 3:20; Jn. 7:33); b. with a transitive verb, e.g., sending, bringing, leading, etc., often in the NT with theological significance, e.g., when Jesus on the cross draws people to himself (Jn. 12:32), or when there is access to the Father (Eph. 2:18), or turning to the Lord or to God (2 Cor. 3:16; 1 Th. 1:9), or adherence to idols (1 Cor. 12:2); c. passively with a verb of motion denoting "at" or "by" (cf. Mk. 1:33; 11:4; 14:54; Mt. 3:10), although loosely the same idea may be present without a verb (cf. Mt. 13:56), sometimes with an assumed movement (Mt. 26:18; 2 Cor. 7:12; the formulas in Mk. 2:2; Rom. 15:17; Mt. 27:4); d. with associated verbs of sending and speaking to denote bringing or imparting a message (Mt. 27:19; Mk. 3:31; without the verb of speaking, Acts 10:33).

2. Psychologically, in the sense "to," "toward, prós occurs with verbs of speaking to denote "saying something to someone" (e.g., Lk. 1:13; Acts 1:7; with a special reference to God's direct address and hence the assigning of a definite position or task, Rom. 10:21; Heb. 1:8; in the phrase prós ti, "with reference to," Lk. 18:1; with verbs of praying or blaspheming; with God or Jesus as object, Acts 8:24; Rev. 13:6); b. with verbs or nouns expressing an attitude, either friendly (2 Cor. 3:4; 2 Tim. 2:24), hostile (Lk. 5:30; Acts 6:1), or neutral (Acts 24:16).

3. Temporally, prós with the accusative expresses a. approach to a point in time (Lk. 24:29); b. a period, e.g., "for a while" (Lk. 8:13), "for a few days" (Heb. 12:10), usually with a future reference.

4. Finally, prós a. denotes the aim of an action, "with a view to" or even "for the sake of," e.g., Jn. 11:4; Acts 3:10; Rom. 15:2; 1 Cor. 7:35, often with an infinitive, e.g., Mt. 6:1, or elliptically, e.g., Lk. 14:32; Jn. 13:28; b. expresses "attaining or corresponding to" (cf. Lk. 12:47; Mt. 19:8).

5. Consecutively, the use with the accusative denotes "up to" or "so that," e.g., "white enough for harvest" in Jn. 4:35, leading "to the satisfaction of the flesh" in Col. 2:23 "to the point of envy" in Jms. 4:5, "resulting in death" in 1 Jn. 5:16, "to the point of lust" in Mt 5:28   [B. REICKE, VI, 720-25]

prosdokáō [to wait for, expect], prosdokía [expectation]

A. Outside the NT.

1. The word prosdokáō means "to wait or look for," "to expect," with some tension of fear and hope. The noun means "expectation" of either good or bad.

2. In the LXX the focus is on God and his acts. Thus it speaks of hoping in God (Ps. 104:27), in his salvation (119:166), in his mercy (Wis. 12:22), in the resurrection (2 Macc. 7:14). But this applies only to the verb; of nine instances of the noun, only Gen. 49:10 and Ps. 119:116 relate to God.

B. The NT.

1.a. In the NT the verb often denotes eschatological hope. Thus in Mt. 11:3 and Lk. 7:19-20 the question is whether Jesus fulfils the messianic hope.

b. In Mt. 24:50; Lk. 12:46; 2 Pet. 3:12ff. the returning Christ is the object of expectation. In 2 Pet. 3:12 and 14 the participles have an indicative and causal character. Waiting for the day of God, believers live holy lives. Hence prosdokán is protected against psychological disintegration and oriented to the hope of salvation.

2. In Lk. 21:26 the noun has the Hellenistic sense of "fearful expectation," and in Acts 12:11 it refers to the expectations of the Jewish people on the arrest of Peter.

C. The Apostolic Fathers. Except in Hermas Visions 3.11.3 and Diog. 9.2, prosdokáō in the apostolic fathers always refers to divine blessings. The noun does not occur. Of the Apologists Justin makes frequent use of the group in connection with OT and NT promises (e.g., Dialogue 52.1; 120.3). [C. MAURER, VI, 725-27]

prosḗlytos [proselyte]

A. Occurrence. This word has been found only in Jewish and Christian writings, although épēlys and epēlýtēs (epḗlytos) are found in the same sense in secular Greek.

B. The Alien in the OT. There are two classes of aliens in the OT, visitors (Dt. 14:21) and temporary or permanent residents (Ex. 12:49). The former have no rights and are outside the national and cultic fellowship. The latter are under protection and enjoy personal freedom but have no independent status. Ex. 22:20ff. insures them of God's interest, and Ex. 23:9 appeals to Israel's experience in Egypt. Aliens must keep the sabbath (Ex. 20:10), for, being in the land, they are set in a religious relationship. As the sense of election develops, and hence the distinction from other peoples, resident aliens are drawn into the cultic fellowship. Dt. 5:14; 16:10-11, 13-14 require that they keep the festivals, although they may keep the Passover only if they are circumcised. Aliens, then, are much like later proselytes, except that they have to be resident; hence a sociological difference remains.

C. prosḗlytos in Later Judaism.

I. Hellenistic Judaism. The final development of proselyte as a technical term takes place in dispersion Judaism. This provides a different sociological structure in which Jews live among non-Jews, learn non-Jewish culture, and commence a Jewish mission. The relatively few who fully accept Judaism and are circumcised are called prosḗlytoi. Religiously, but not sociologically, they are like resident aliens. Many more Gentiles accept OT monotheism and keep some parts of the cultic law but are not circumcised; these are God-fearers (sebómenoi or phoboúmenoi tón theón). Hellenistic Jews regard it as more important that Gentiles should believe in God and follow his ethical commands than that they should be circumcised.

Linguistically 1. the LXX uses prosḗlytos 77 times for the resident alien, in eleven instances using pároikos, twice g (e)iṓras, and once xénos.

2. Philo develops the new understanding of the OT term, although he prefers épēlys or epēlýtēs (epḗlytos) to the less familiar prosḗlytos. He defines prosḗlytos as one who has left country, relatives, and friends to come under the Jewish constitution. This presupposes circumcision, although Philo stresses the need to circumcise lusts and passions.

3. Josephus avoids prosḗlytos, which his readers would not understand, but he uses other terms for full converts to Judaism as distinct from God-fearers.

4. Jewish inscriptions refer to proselytes, but only in one instance from Palestine. True proselytes may be buried among Jews, having separated themselves from everything Gentile. They are fully integrated into the community and sometimes have new Jewish names. In Italy there are more women than men, for full conversion is easier for women; we also find slaves and adopted children, for whom conversion brings advantages. Restrictive legislation, e.g., under Hadrian, might have affected the distribution. Some inscriptions refer to God-fearers (theosebḗs; Lat. metuens).

II. Later Palestinian Judaism. In later Palestinian Judaism the proselyte and the resident alien are much the same; the latter term has lost its sociological sense. Full conversion is more important in Palestine. Those who wish to come over to Judaism must accept the law in its entirety, or they are still Gentiles. Among older proselytes we find such illustrious groups as the Herod family and King Izates of Adiabene and his mother and brother. A certain Simon who played a great role as a guerilla in the first Jewish war was also known as ho (toú) Giṓra; his father was a proselyte. In the Apocrypha Tob. 1:8 refers to alms that are given to proselytes. The Damascus Document mentions the four orders of priests, Levites, Israelites, and gerim (Qumran has only the first three). The gerim here are full proselytes, not just resident aliens. As Syr. Bar. 41:4 puts it, they are those who have forsaken their vain life and found refuge beneath God's wings (cf. also 42:5).

III. Rabbinic Judaism.

1. The Term. The rabbis now use the OT term for full Gentile converts to Judaism. Distinction is made between false proselytes, who seek personal advantage, and true proselytes, who become Jews by conviction and keep the whole law (as distinct from those who attend worship and keep the Noachic law).

2. The Attitude. Some rabbis encourage proselytes, others at first treat them with caution. When conversion is made almost impossible under Hadrian they are welcomed, for only those who are sincerely motivated take the risk. Later a less favorable attitude manifests itself again in the view that proselytes delay the coming of the Messiah, or that no more proselytes will be received when the Messiah comes.

3. The Reception. The rite of reception consists of circumcision, baptism, and a sacrifice. Circumcision is the oldest part. The precise age and original meaning and form of baptism are unknown. It is perhaps at first a cultic purification but later it is a fixed public rite of admission involving instruction in the law. The offering lapsed with the destruction of the temple. Rabbis find a basis for the three conditions in the conditions of the Sinai covenant in Ex. 12:48; 24:5; 19:10. When the conditions are fulfilled, converts are regarded as in every respect Jews.

4. Legal Position. Being like newborn children, proselytes cannot be held guilty of Gentile transgressions. Children begotten before conversion cannot be heirs even if they are converted with their parents. Converts may inherit from Gentile fathers so long as no idolatry is involved. The OT laws of incest apply to former Gentile marriages only insofar as Gentile law agrees with them. Women proselytes may not marry priests under the ruling of Lev. 21:13-14, although only on suspicion of fornication, so that the rule does not apply to girls converted under three years of age. Rules providing help for resident aliens (Lev. 19:10) are applied to proselytes.

5. Non-Jews. The rabbis apply to Gentiles who keep the Noachic commands the sociological term that the OT uses for resident aliens. These include the God-fearers, who are sometimes favorably viewed as righteous people who have a share in the world to come. In general, however, the rabbis are not content to have uncircumcised Gentiles as loose adherents. The point is made that they cannot learn the law if they are not already circumcised. They are thus regarded as fully Gentile if they do not take the step of full conversion 12 months after accepting the Noachic law.

D. The NT.

I. prosḗlytos.

1. Of the four NT instances, the first is in Mt. 23:15, where Jesus denounces the legalistic missionary work of the Pharisees, who are not content with loose adherence but make hypocrites by imposing strict legal observance.

2. Acts 2:11 lists proselytes among the dispersion groups present in Jerusalem for the feast. Proselytes and Jews are terms that denote the religious position of those who come from the geographical locations also mentioned.

3. Since in 6:1 Hellēnistaí means Jews of Hellenistic origin, Nicolaus as a prosḗlytos is distinguished from the other six; he is a convert from paganism who has come to Jerusalem from Antioch.

4. Acts 13:43 lists among those who follow the apostles God-fearing proselytes. This is a unique combination even in Acts and raises the question whether sebómenoi or prosḗlytoi is the technical term. If the former, prosēlytoi is materially incorrect; if the latter, sebómenoi has some such sense as "devout."

II. sebómenoi (phoboúmenoi) tón theón.

1. These phrases occur in Acts—phoboúmenoi in the first section, sebómenoi in the second. Some Palestinian Christians seem to have thought at first that salvation was only for full Jews (cf. Acts 11:3, where Peter is charged for associating with the phoboúmenos Cornelius, and 11:19, where the Palestinian missionaries at first preach only to Jews, although some, who belong to Cyprus and Cyrene, preach to Héllēnes, or sebómenoi, as well [v. 20]).

2. Paul first preaches in the synagogues to Jews, i.e., full members of the Jewish people by birth or conversion, and Héllēnes, i.e., God-fearing Gentiles who attend Jewish worship (cf. Acts 14:1; 18:4; 19:10; also 13:16, 26; 16:14; 17:17; 18:7; also 17:4). His main success seems to be among the God-fearers. Paul does not demand circumcision, but monotheism is not enough; faith in Christ is necessary to salvation (13:39). The preaching of Christ stirs up Jewish opposition and leads Paul, e.g., in Corinth, to go to God-fearing Gentiles (18:6). The usage in Acts conforms exactly to the existing situation and supports the historicity of the accounts. [K. G. KUHN, VI, 727-44] proskóptō [to strike, stumble against, give offense], próskomma [fall, stone of stumbling], proskopḗ [taking or giving offense], apróskopos [not taking or giving offense]

A. Usage.

I. proskóptō.

1. Literally, this word means "to strike," "to dash against." Intransitively it means "to stumble against," "bump," "slip," "fall," "suffer harm," "perish."

2. In a transferred sense, proskóptō means "to give offense," "to cause displeasure," or "to take offense," "to be annoyed or enraged," "to experience displeasure."

II. próskomma.

1. This noun may denote the result of falling, hence "damage," "wound," "bump," or more generally "hurt," "destruction," "ruin," and morally "fall," "sin."

2. It may also denote a quality as in the phrase "stone of stumbling."

3. Finally, it may indicate a cause of hurt, e.g., an “obstacle,” or more generally a cause of ruin, e.g., a “hindrance” to faith, a “temptation” that causes a fall into sin.

III. proskopḗ. This rare verbal noun usually denotes 1. “taking offense,” “aversion,” “irritation,” “antipathy.” It may also be used 2. for “cause of falling or taking offense,” “reason for antipathy.”

IV. apróskopos. This rare and late verbal adjective means 1. “not causing to fall,” “not stumbling,” “intact,” and 2. “not giving offense,” “inoffensive,” “blameless,” “not taking offense” (e.g., a clear conscience).

B. The OT and Judaism.

I. Equivalents. There are various Hebrew equivalents with such senses as “causing to fall,” “pushing,” “striking,” also “falling” or “stumbling.”

II. Metaphors. Two metaphors are associated with the group, 1. that of the way, and 2. that of the stone, but the two may also be combined (Prov. 4:12; Lam. 3:9; Mt. 16:23). proskómmata are usually harmful obstacles in contrast to the smooth ways of the righteous, but they may also be a mark of the right way (cf. Mt. 7:13-14).

III. Theological Use.

1.a. Often used in connection with the doctrine of retribution, the group denotes idolatry as a stumbling block resulting in destruction.

b. Even apart from idols, falling is a punishment for disobedience. God himself may be the cause of falling (cf. Is. 59:10) as the people do not rely on him. In Prov. 4:19 unrighteous individuals fall in the darkness of their ignorance.

c. Specifically in Is. 8:14 God is a rock of stumbling and a snare, although he is also a rock of refuge, so that the rock depicts both his wrath and his grace just as his action means either salvation or perdition (cf. Ps. 18:25ff.; 1 Cor. 1:23-24).

d. Only outside the canon is the devil a cause of destruction (Test. Reub. 4:7).

e. Only rarely in the Wisdom literature does a nonsupernatural power cause destruction (cf. gold and wine in Sir. 31:7).

2. It is arguable whether the group is used in the LXX for temptation and falling into sin. Is. 29:21 and Sir. 17:25 might be cited in this connection. On the other hand, the Hebrew equivalents in the rabbis often have this sense (cf. also Qumran).

C. The NT.

I. The OT Basis.

1. The NT follows the OT in the form of quotations, e.g., Mt. 4:6; Rom. 9:32-33.

2. It also adopts similar expressions (cf. Rom. 14:13, 21; 1 Cor. 8:9). The main difference in the NT is that unbelief rather than disobedience is now a cause of eternal spiritual perdition, not just temporal destruction. External injury is in view in Mt. 4:6, and cf. the meaning “offense,” but spiritual injury is the primary reference in, e.g., Rom. 14:13; 1 Cor. 10:32; 2 Cor. 6:3.

II. Specific NT Use.

1. Jesus and Falling.

a. In Mt. 4:6-7 the tempter fails to mention that the promise is for those who trust in God. He thus seeks to make Jesus into one who tempts God, using the very promise to try to bring about a fall. As a literal fall this would destroy Jesus at the outset. As a spiritual fall, it would be deeper and more fateful than that of Adam.

b. The metaphor of the way is present in Jn. 11:9-10. One does not stumble and fall in the light of day. There is perhaps an allusion here to the approaching passion of Jesus, i.e., his fall into death.

2. Falling in Faith.

a. (a) Humans may be the cause of falling by others. Thus the valid freedom of the strong at Rome and Corinth (Rom. 14:21; 1 Cor. 8:9) can be a stumbling block to the weak, who see in it a compromise with the pagan world . Love, then, demands renunciation of the freedom lest it cause others to fall.

(b) It is a principle for all Christians (1 Cor. 10:32) that they should not give offense either to believers or to those outside. This does not mean simply that they should be pleasant to others. It means that they should do nothing to weaken their faith or to keep them from faith. For himself Paul puts no obstacle in the way of others (2 Cor. 6:3). He tries not to do anything that will bring reproach on the apostolic ministry. His concern is again for the salvation of those among whom he works.

b. Rom. 9:32-33 and 1 Pet. 2:6ff. apply Is. 8:14 and 28:16 to Christ, although in different contexts and combinations. In Romans Israel stumbles on Christ, while in 1 Peter Christ is primarily a precious stone for the elect. Israel stumbles because she has a wrong view of salvation and fails to see in Jesus the Messiah. In 1 Peter the stone supports the building but is a danger to those who stumble over it, so that one must either be built into the divine building or fall on it by taking offense and failing to believe. In both passages Christ has a twofold effect. By means of God’s concealed revelation in him, with its justification of the sinner, the summons goes out which leads either to salvation in faith or to perdition in unbelief. God himself has laid the stone and given it this function.

c. In Phil. 1:10 being apróskopos is an eschatological goal. The meaning might be either “blameless,” “without offense for God,” or “not falling” (cf. Jude 24). The context suggests that what is in view is much the same as “being saved” in 1 Cor. 1:18. Paul’s prayer is that he may not cause the Philippians to stumble on the path of faith, that they might not slip and fall now, and that they will thus stand in the judgment. It is important that this is possible only through Christ or his Spirit, and that if the goal is attained the praise and glory are God’s alone.

3. Offense of Conscience (Rom. 14:20; Acts 24:16).

a. In Rom. 14:20 the subject of the section is faith in its relation to conscience. The reference might be to falling in faith, or it might be to giving offense to conscience. If the first view is right, próskomma agrees with the proskóptō of v. 21. But the second view accords better with the theme of the cleavage between conduct and conscience (cf. v. 23). It is not uncommon for Paul to use the same words, or words of the same group, in two different senses in the same passage (cf. krínō in 14:13).

b. The thought of a conscience that takes no offense is clearly present in Acts 24:16 either in the sense of a quiet conscience or an unharmed conscience (cf. 2 Tim. 1:3). Paul’s concern for the conscience is apparent in Rom. 14 and 1 Cor. 8; the statement has, then, an authentic ring.

D. The Early Church. The NT use is less prominent in early writings. The thought of stumbling is present in the metaphor of the two ways (cf. Hermas Mandates 6.1.3-4; also Justin Apology 1.52.10). But the main sense is " (giving) offense" (1 Clem. 21.5), and apróskopos is common for "blameless service" (1 Clem. 20:10; cf. 61.1). The focus is more on the threat to the reputation of officebearers than on the threat to the faith of those set under their direction. [G. STÄHLIN, VI, 745-58]

proskynéō [to bow down, worship], proskynētḗs [worshipper] proskynéō.

A. Meaning for the Greeks. Usually connected with the Old High German Kuss, although in different ways, proskynéō is an ancient term for reverent adoration of the gods, which in the case of chthonic deities would mean stooping to kiss the earth. The Greeks abandon the outward gesture but keep the term for the inner attitude. Later the word takes on a much more general sense expressing love and respect.

B. Jewish Understanding.

1. The LXX uses the term for various words meaning "to bow," "to kiss," "to serve," and "to worship." Most of the instances relate to veneration of the God of Israel or of false gods. proskyneín may also be directed to angels, to the righteous, to rulers, to the prophets, and to the shade of Samuel (Saul). While it may express regard, it also suggests that those thus honored are in some way God's instruments (cf. Gen. 18:2; 19:1). In Gen. 23:7, 12 observance of the formalities stresses the legality of the purchase. Mordecai's refusal to do proskýnēsis to Haman is the focus of the dramatic action in Esther. Obeisance is always intended except later in 4 Macc. 5:12. The LXX prefers the dative or a preposition to the Greek transitive and accusative. This is partly due to the Hebrew, but partly to the fact that transitive kissing is impossible where there is no image of God.

2. Josephus follows the LXX in his use of the term for worship and respect. Yet he tends to restrict proskyneín to Gentile worship, to avoid the term with a human reference when speaking of the Jews of his own day, and to use it in relation to the temple and the law in the sense of respect rather than worship (for even the Romans respect the holy place; Jewish War 5.402).

3. Philo's usage is mostly secular rather than religious except when he censures the worship of wealth or various forms of idolatry in city life. He accepts proskyneín to others as a form of respect but is critical of proskýnēsis to the emperor as a contradiction of ancient Roman freedom. He, too, speaks of a proskyneín directed to the temple, Scripture, and the Day of Atonement.

4. In rabbinic Judaism proskýnesis is an attitude in prayer (although standing is more customary). It may also be a means of showing respect to rabbis as those who are in a close relation to God because of their study of the law.

C. The NT.

1. The NT uses proskyneín only in relation to a divine object. Even Mt. 18:26 is no true exception, for in view of the importance of proskýnēsis in Matthew (cf. 8:2; 9:18; 14:33; 15:25; 20:2) the divine king plainly stands behind the king of the parable. Thus when those who seek help from Jesus fall at his feet, this is more than a gesture of respect. The wise men bow in worship (Mt. 2:2, 11). The tempter seeks the worship that belongs to God (4:9-10). The disciples worship Jesus when they begin to grasp his divine sonship (14:33) and when they meet the risen Lord (28:9). The thought of God's transcendence forbids any weakening of the term in the NT. Peter rejects proskýnēsis in Acts 10:25-26. Even the angel forbids it in Rev. 19:10. The gesture is expressly mentioned in Acts 10:25.

2. In Jn. 4:20ff. proskyneín seems to have a wholly figurative sense. Yet the act of worship stands in the background. What Jesus says is that there is no one place to worship. The concrete act is lifted up into the sphere of spirit and truth which now controls it. This does not mean a total spiritualizing of worship but the possibility of true worship at all times and in all places.

3. The worship of heaven involves repeated proskýnēsis (Rev. 4:10; 5:14; 7:11; 11:16; 19:4). Those who fear God (and those who worship the beast!) are also proskynoúntes (Rev. 11:1; 13:4). Those who worship Satan will finally bow down at the feet of the angel of the church of Philadelphia (3:9), and all nations shall come and worship God at the last day (15:4).

4. While proskyneín is common in the Gospels and Acts, and then again in Revelation, it occurs in the epistles only in Heb. 1:6; 11:21 and 1 Cor 14:25. The last verse offers the only instance of proskyneín in the Christian community and it refers along OT lines to the unconditional subjection expressed by an unbeliever. Elsewhere we read of kneeling or raising hands in prayer (Acts 9:40; 1 Tim. 2:8), but the word proskyneín does not occur. Being a concrete term, proskyneín demands visible majesty. It is thus apposite only when the incarnate Christ is present or when the exalted Lord is again manifested.

D. The Early Church. The data in the apostolic fathers are much the same as in the NT. Mostly the reference is to pagan worship. Veneration of Christ is differentiated from the respect paid to martyrs in Mart. Pol. 17.3. Later the term is given very limited significance. Thus the Council of Nicea in 787 allows proskýnēsis to icons but reserves true latreía for the divine nature. The Greek accusative reappears alongside the more common dative, but with no consistent difference of sense.

1. Outside the NT this term occurs first only on an inscription from the third century A.D.

2. The one NT instance is in Jn. 4:23, where the reference is to “true worshippers”, true being defined by “in spirit and truth.” [H. GREEVEN, VI, 758-66]

prósphatos [new], prosphátōs [recently]

1. Of uncertain etymology, this word means “fresh” (fruit etc.) or “new” (people or events); the adverb means “newly,” “lately,” “recently.”

2. The LXX has the usual senses of “fresh” and “new,” but at times with the suggestion of illegitimate (new gods). The adverb means “just,” “recently.”

3. The NT uses the adjective only in Heb. 10:20 to describe the new way that Christ has opened up through the veil. By Christ’s self-offering the community has the right of access to God. This is new compared to the old way into the holy of holies. It is also fresh in quality as compared to dead rites and ceremonies. The way leads via the event of redemption in Christ’s life and death. Hence it is by his flesh, which is the very opposite of an obstacle on the way to God. The adverb occurs in Acts 18:2 in the sense of “shortly before.”‘ [C. MAURER, VI, 766-67]

prósōpon.

A. Greek Usage.

1. Face. The basic sense of prósōpon is "face," "countenance." The plural occurs in Homer and the tragedians, but later the singular takes over. Human faces, or at times those of the gods, are at issue, with only occasional exceptions. A wider sense is "personal appearance," "form," "figure." With katá "personal presence" is denoted. A figurative use is for a military front or the front of a building.

2. Mask. The mask worn by actors resembles a face and is thus called a prósōpon. The role or part is then denoted by the term. Another use is for the anonymous opponent in a dialogue.

3. Person. A further meaning is the person either socially or grammatically or, at a later time, legally.

B. The LXX and Later Jewish Usage.

I. The LXX.

1. Face. Occurring some 850 times or more in the LXX, prósōpon first means "face." Falling on the face is an expression of veneration (Gen. 17:3). Seeing a king's face means having an audience. The face of an animal is meant in Ezek. 1:10. "Appearance" is the sense in Gen. 40:7 (of a matter in 2 Sam. 14:20). The prósōpon denotes the whole person in 2 Sam. 17:11 (Absalom).

2. Front Side. Like the Hebrew original, prósōpon may denote "surface" (Gen. 2:6), or "edge" (Eccl. 10:10), or "front" in prepositional phrases signifying movement to or from, e.g., with apó (from), eis (to or before), ek (from), en (before), epí (on), katá (before or over against), metá (with), and pró (before).

3. God's Countenance.

a. Frequently prósōpon denotes God's countenance in anthropomorphic expressions. God's lifting his countenance means grace and peace. Prayer is made that his face may shine on Israel (Num. 6:25). Hiding his face denotes withdrawal of grace (Dt. 32:20). In penal wrath God turns his face against sinners (Ps. 34:16). Seeing God's face is a special privilege (Gen. 32:3). Because of God's holiness it involves peril; hence even Moses sees God's glory only from behind (Ex. 32:23). God reveals himself through his word, not through seeing his face.

b. Various cultic expressions use the term. Thus "to see God's face" is to visit the sanctuary; believers seek God's face (Ps. 42:3; Zech. 8:21-22). The accent here is not on seeing God but on assurance of his presence and favor. In Ps. 105:4 seeking God's face is a daily procedure; it is a matter of supreme concern in Ps. 27:8. The holy bread is the bread of the prosōpon in 1 Sam. 21:6, i.e., the bread of the presence.

II. Later Judaism.

1. Philo and Josephus.

a. For Philo the face is the most important part of the body; it is controlled by the number seven. Philo refers often to God's face. Representing his essential being, it is hidden from us. At times Philo uses prósōpon for "person."

b. In Josephus we find the senses "face," "features," "role," and "person."

2. Pseudepigrapha and Rabbinic Works. The pseudepigrapha speak of the faces of the righteous shining like the sun as God causes his light to shine on them. Their seventh joy will be to press on to see God's face. The rabbis say that all people see God's face at the hour of death. The wicked see it to receive punishment; the righteous see the face of the Shekinah. To see or greet the face of the Shekinah is also a rabbinic phrase for temple or (later) synagogue worship. Those who pray and study also greet God's face inasmuch as he draws near to them.

C. NT Usage.

1. Face. prósōpon often means "face" in the NT (cf. Mt. 6:16-17; Acts 16:5; Rev. 4:7). Falling on the face expresses veneration or respect (Mt. 17:6; Lk. 5:12). The faces of the angel (Rev. 10:1) and Jesus (Mt. 17:2) shine like the sun. The face of Moses has a passing radiance (2 Cor. 3:7ff.). For Paul the veil that he puts over it signifies the veil over the OT that conceals its true sense from Israel. Christians, however, see with uncovered face the glory of the Lord and are changed from glory to glory (cf. also 2 Cor. 4:6). Seeing the face means meeting a person in Acts 20:25, and knowing by face denotes personal knowledge in Gal. 1:22. Setting the face in a specific direction announces a firm resolve to follow a particular course. The phrase has great significance for the whole of salvation history in Lk. 9:51. At times the appearance of a person or object may be denoted, e.g., in Jms. 1:23; 1:11; Mt. 16:3.

2. The Front Side. As in the LXX prósōpon may denote the front, often with prepositions, e.g., apó (from, Acts 3:19; 5:4-5), eis (before, 2 Cor. 8:24), en (in, 2 Cor. 2:10; 5:12), katá (before, 2 Cor. 10:1, 7), metá (with, Acts 2:28), and pró (before, Mk. 1:2; Acts 13:24).

3. God's Countenance. As OT worshippers "see God's face" when they visit the temple, so Christ in Heb. 9:24 appears before the face of God when he enters the heavenly sanctuary. Angels watching over the little ones always see God's face in Mt. 18:10. In the consummation God's servants will see his face (Rev. 22:4). We now see in a mirror dimly, i.e., imperfectly, but we shall then see face to face, i.e., with perfect vision and knowledge (1 Cor. 13:12).

4. Person. This sense occurs in the NT only in 2 Cor. 1:11 ("many persons").

D. Early Church Usage.

1. Apostolic Fathers. No peculiarities occur in these authors. We find the normal meanings "face," "front," and "person," although references to God's countenance are found only in OT quotations, e.g., in 1 Clem. 18.9; 22.6.

2. Christology and Trinitarian Teaching. The word prósōpon becomes a crucial one in debates about the person of Christ and the Trinity. The legal sense is not yet important in the early stages, and the term receives its content from the discussions. The fathers realize that the term is an inadequate one, so that what it is meant to express must fix its meaning.

euprosōpéō. This word, meaning "to have a good appearance," occurs in the NT only in Gal. 6:12 for "to make a good showing," "to stand well with others."

prosōpolēmpsía, prosōpolḗmptēs, prosōpolēmptéō, aprosōpolḗmptōs.

1. In the OT one finds various phrases that express respectful greeting or reception, e.g., bowing the face, lifting up the face. Out of these arises the idea of showing preference or partiality to certain people. God in contrast respects the face of no one (Dt. 10:17).

2. Following the OT, the NT has different expressions for showing respect of persons, e.g., in Mk. 12:14; Lk. 12:21; Jude 16. God, however, shows no partiality (Gal. 2:6). To express this thought the noun prosōpolēmpsía is coined (Rom. 2:11; Eph. 6:9; Col. 3:25; Jms. 2:1). In the judgment Jews and Gentiles are treated alike. Over both employers and employees is a Lord who shows partiality to neither. Sinners will be repaid with no respect of persons. God opens salvation to the Gentiles too (Acts 10:34). Believers must be like God in their treatment of one another, not favoring the rich or despising the poor (Jms. 2:1). To show partiality is to commit sin and to fall under conviction by the law (2:9).

3. The theme is treated by the apostolic fathers in Barn. 19:4; Did. 4.3; Pol. 6.1; 1 Clem. 1.3; Barn. 4.12. [E. LOHSE, VI, 768-80]

protíthēmi → títhēmi

prophḗtēs [prophet], prophḗtis [prophetess], prophēteúō [to prophesy], prophēteía [prophecy], prophētikós [prophetic], pseudoprophḗtēs [false prophet]

A. Secular Greek.

I. Linguistic Aspects.

1. The prefix pro- causes some ambiguity regarding the precise sense of prophḗtēs, but it would seem that the original sense in Greek is "one who proclaims," although soon the idea of "one who predicts" also occurs.

2. The word prophḗtis (from the end of the fifth century B.C.) is the feminine form.

3. The verb prophēteúō has the twofold sense "to proclaim" and "to be an oracle prophet."

4. prophēteía denotes a. "ability to declare the divine will," b. "proclamation," and c. "prophetic office."

5. prophētikós means "belonging to a prophet," "prophetic."

6. In the word pseudoprophḗtēs the first part can be an object ("prophet of lies") or it may be adjectival ("false prophet").

II. Material Aspects.

1. Oracle prophets.

a. Although the terms are found only from the fifth century B.C., the reality is much older. Thus compounds like hypophḗtēs refer to those who wait to hear the will of the gods declared, and then expound and proclaim it to those seeking advice. The exact process (e.g., the role of priestesses) is not wholly clear, but questions are put and answers are issued as divine decisions or directions relating to specific situations.

b. The Delphic oracle brings the prophḗtēs group into specific use. Here the Pythia is stirred to mantic frenzy and then becomes the prophḗtis through whom the god speaks. The prophḗtēs plays a role too, probably as an interpreter of the words that are uttered ecstatically and enigmatically (cf. Plato). The prophḗtēs is not inspired as the Pythia is, but exercises rational discernment. The Pythia probably speaks in words, but the prophḗtēs must give these words form and convey them to the person seeking advice. The answers may be in hexameters but are mostly in prose, exclusively so later. The function of the oracle is to preserve standards of conduct, to preserve tradition, and to make a specific application, but the language, making heavy use of metaphors and riddles, is obscure and paradoxical. Apollo, the god of the oracle, may himself be called Diós prophḗtēs as the true mántis and the spokesman of Zeus.

c. The process in the case of other oracles seems to be essentially the same as at Delphi.

d. A divergent use of the term prophḗtēs appears in Lucian in his satire on Alexandros, who calls himself a prophḗtēs as a "divine man" who predicts events, heals the sick, etc., and is characterized by outlandish clothing, wild ecstasy, extravagant claims, and a readiness to pass on oracles unasked.

e. Although the same person may be both prophḗtēs and mántis, the functions denoted by the two terms are different, for the mántis offers illumination and the prophḗtēs then declares it.

f. Inspiration manticism, which is exercised only by women in Greece but by men in Asia Minor, takes the form of ecstatic possession whereby the soul becomes an agent or zither of the god and reason is lost.

g. In sum, prophets in the Greek world are people who declare things imparted by the gods in direct inspiration or through signs, their task being one of interpretation. Oracle prophets proclaim the will or counsel of the gods in answer to direct questions that cover the whole range of private, political, and cultic life. Human criteria control the selection of oracle prophets, who usually come from higher social classes, and even their inspiration tends to be induced by human initiative. Oracle prophets enjoy high esteem and have official positions, so that they may often be asked to lead delegations etc. In some cases the verb prophēteúō may include stating and presenting the question.

2. The Poet as Prophet.

a. In early Greek poetry one finds the belief in a link between the divine Muses and the human poet. The Muses have seen and know all things and give poets the power to portray them. Hesiod regards himself as called by the Muses, who breathe into him a divine voice. Pindar uses the term prophḗtēs to denote the link. The poet is a chosen herald of wise sayings, lauding virtues and instructing in them. The Muses play the mantic role and poets the prophetic role. The poet offers himself as a prophḗtēs who can mediate divine knowledge. He has a divinely imparted genius that equips him for the task.

b. On occasion the poet may also be a prophḗtēs as a spokesman or advocate for other people, expressing public opinion.

3. The Broader Use.

a. The term prophḗtēs finds varied religious use for spokesmen who deplore immorality, for the frenzied heralds of Dionysus, for the heralds of the goddess of fate, for grasshoppers as prophets of the Muses, for leaders in cultic purification.

b. In Egypt members of the upper priestly class are given the title prophḗtēs in Greek.

c. Officebearers outside the oracle also bear the title on inscriptions.

d. The group finds philosophical use for those who lead inquiries, for spokesmen of noús, for those who teach a philosophy, for specialists in science, or for quacks in medicine. prophḗtis may denote the study of history,or grammar as exegesis of the poets.

e. In poetry, too, the group comes into varied use for heralds of victors at the games, for the cup at the symposium, for hunger as a warning of the need for food.

4. Summary.

a. The group is a solemn but formal one. It expresses the function of proclaiming and can cover a wide sphere. Yet its primary reference is religious. Historical seers are not prophḗtai unless connected with an oracle, and demons or lesser gods may be prophḗtai of higher gods. Prophets have a mediatorial role, representing the gods to us and us to the gods. The future aspect of the prefix is a late development.

b. Since the group has a formal character, it can cover a wide sphere, although the religious element is usually clear. The most proper use is in relation to the oracle prophets, but since these have a measure of independence, poets, too, can be called prophets.

c. Because of its solemnity prophḗtēs can become a title of office.

d. Because of its formal character the prophḗtēs group is a useful one in translation; it can pick up the most diverse contents. [H. KRÄMER, VI, 781-96]

B. The OT. The picture of prophecy presented by the OT is by no means uniform, and to write a history of OT prophecy is difficult. The difficulty is even linguistic, for the common nāḇîʼ group covers only one side of prophecy. There also seem to be prophetic groups on the one side and independent individual prophets on the other, with only tenuous relationships between them.

I. Derivation of nāḇîʼ. The derivation of the term is contested, links with Akkadian and Arabic being favored. Whether the term is primarily an active one for "proclaimer" or a passive one for "called" is debatable. The term, however, quickly acquires a fixed usage.

II. The Verb.

1. Older Texts. At first ecstatic features are to the fore (cf. 1 Sam. 10:5-6; 19:18ff.). The Spirit seizes Saul, musical instruments are used, and Saul takes off his clothes. This type of ecstatic prophecy may be found in Egypt too, and in the OT one may recall Balaam (Num. 24:2) and the attempts of the priests of Baal to gain a hearing with cultic dancing and self-mutilation (1 Kgs. 18:26ff.). In 1 Kgs. 22:10-11 we first see the visible aspects and then the speaking.

2. The Prophetic Books. In these works the verb occurs only in Amos, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Joel, and Zechariah. In Amos it denotes authentic speaking prophecy in 3:8; 7:15-16. The later use is similar (cf. Jer. 20:1; 23:16, etc.; Ezek. 6:2; 13:17, etc.; Joel 2:28 [general prophecy]; Zech. 13:2 [cutting off of false prophets]).

3. The Chronicler. The verb occurs in 2 Chr. 18:7ff. on the basis of 1 Kgs. 22:8ff. Cf. also 2 Chr. 20:37. In Ezr. 5:1 the verb denotes the work of Haggai and Zechariah. In 1 Chr. 25:1, however, the temple musicians are said to prophesy with their lyres, harps, and cymbals—a distinctive usage.

III. The Noun.

1. Prophetic Groups. The history books refer to groups of prophets (1 Kgs. 18-19). Ahab consults these in 1 Kgs. 22. Elisha seems to be head of a prophetic fellowship with locations at Bethel, Jericho, and Gilgal (2 Kgs. 2-9). They meet together, hold common meals, preserve traditions, and live modestly, although they may marry and have their own homes (2 Kgs. 4:1ff.). We do not read of ecstatic features but find crisp oracular pronouncements (2 Kgs. 2:21; 3:16-17) which include political and eschatological sayings. The prophets at times oppose rulers and even anoint successors (cf. 2 Kgs. 9:3). During the later monarchy, however, we no longer read of such groups.

2. Individuals. The tradition concerning individuals is complex. Samuel is among the prophets (1 Sam. 19:18ff.) but also stands apart. Elijah is the lone survivor of a prophetic massacre (1 Kgs. 18:22) and, like Elisha, both acts individually and is associated with groups. Later, individuals are to the fore and are of very different types. The common feature is that they speak by God's commission (cf. 1 Sam. 3:19-20; 1 Kgs. 16:7, etc.). In the case of Gad, Jehu, Jonah, Huldah, and the anonymous prophet of 1 Kgs. 20:13ff. the only thing we know is that they come with a word from God (cf. 1 Sam. 22:5; 1 Kgs. 16:1ff.; 2 Kgs. 14:25; 22:14ff.). Gad and especially Nathan have an institutional connection but this does not imply dependence, for Gad proclaims God's judgment on David, and Nathan, although involved in political affairs, rebukes David sharply (2 Sam. 12). At times people may consult prophets (1 Sam. 28:6), but often they come unasked, in many cases with a message of judgment that is directed primarily to the royal house (2 Sam. 12:1ff. etc.), but will also affect all Israel, or in some instances a particular place like Bethel (1 Kgs. 13:2-3). Promises may also be issued (2 Sam. 7; 1 Kgs. 20:13, 28), or answers to prayers (2 Kgs. 20:5-6). Like the prophetic groups, the court prophets seem to have an institutional aspect, but there is no obvious relation between the two forms, and not all prophets fit into either. The connection between prophecy and the cultus is also not wholly clear. Samuel receives his call in the temple (1 Sam. 3), but his position is unusual. Nathan speaks to David about building the temple (2 Sam. 7:1ff.) but is not related to the cultus in any other way. Elijah battles Baal in the cultic sphere but has no official cultic functions. Elisha is consulted on the new moon or sabbath but plays no role in worship. The relationship is positive, but not close.

3. Transferring of the Term to Earlier Figures. The OT transfers the term to Abraham in connection with his intercession in Gen. 20:7. Aaron is a prophet for Moses in Ex. 7:1. Miriam prophesies in Ex. 20:1-

2 to the accompaniment of timbrels and dancing. Moses is a prophet and more than a prophet (Num. 12:6ff.). A portion of his spirit can cause the 70 elders to prophesy (11:24-25). If there has been none like Moses since according to Dt. 34:10, a successor is promised in 18:15ff.; this prophet will serve as a mediator and declare God's will to the people. Deborah is also called a prophetess in Judg. 4:4.

4. The Prophetic Books.

a. The writing prophets may be called prophets. Amos rejects the title (7:14), and Isaiah does not use it, but Hosea calls himself a prophet, and the title is common for Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Later in Habakkuk, Haggai, and Zechariah the term occurs both in the titles and within the books. Even Amos does not reject the term in principle, for he uses the verb in 7:15.

b. The prophets sometimes use the term positively for others, usually in the plural and with a reference to the past (cf. Hos. 6:5; 12:11; Jer. 5:13-14; Ezek. 38:17; Am. 2:11-12;3:7).

c. Yet what is said about other prophets is mostly polemical (cf. Hos. 4:5; Is. 3:1ff.; Mic. 3:5ff.; Jer. 5:31; 6:13-14; 23:14; Zeph. 3:3-4; Ezek. 13:2ff.; Zech. 13:2ff.).

d. The writing prophets thus find themselves in opposition to official prophets, who are often associated with priests, but who have no close connection with the cultus and are, indeed, mentioned along with other national leaders (cf. Jer. 2:26 as well as 6:13 etc.). It is not even conclusive that there is a definite prophetic profession as such.

e. The real difference between the writing prophets and others is not one of terminology but of message (Jer. 14:13- 14; 28). A prophet like Jeremiah proclaims a word of judgment that conflicts with the accepted tradition, which has, perhaps, institutional backing. Yet one should recall that Isaiah can also prophesy salvation, so that the distinction is not simply that the message of the writing prophets is always one of disaster. The real issue is that they carry a true word from God which often brings them into conflict with the popular view.

5. The True and False Prophet in Deuteronomy. Dt. 13:2ff. offers the criterion that a prophet who summons the people to idolatry is false. Dt. 18:20 offers the further criterion that a prophet is false if he speaks in the name of other gods. Whether what is proclaimed comes to pass or not is another test in 18:22.

6. The Term in Other Works. In Pss. 51 and 105:15 Nathan and Abraham are called prophets, and Ps. 74:9 complains that there are no longer any prophets. Lam. 2 says that prophets were slain in the sanctuary (v. 20), that the prophets have no vision (v. 9), and that they gave misleading oracles (v. 14). Daniel refers to past prophets (9:6), specifically mentioning Jeremiah (v. 2). Chronicles often speaks of the prophets or refers to individual prophets. Neh. 6 and 9 mention prophets, and Ezr. 5:1-2 calls Haggai and Zechariah prophets. Sir. 36:20-21 prays for the fulfilment of prophecies and the validation of the prophets. Sir. 48:1 refers to Elijah as a prophet and 49:6-7 to Jeremiah. Prophecy does not seem to play as big a role after the exile. The prophets are mostly mentioned in retrospect, and often the writing prophets are in view.

IV. Other Terms.

1. "Man of God" often means the same as prophet (1 Sam. 2:27ff.), particularly when it refers to someone who comes with a word from God. It is common in the Elisha stories and seems to be a title of honor used by others in address or in reference (1 Sam. 9:6ff.; 1 Kgs. 17:18-19). Moses is called a man of God in Dt. 33:1.

2. "Seer" is a term for Samuel in 1 Sam. 9:11, 18-19 (cf. 1 Chr. 9:22 etc.). The text explains that this was an older term for prophet.

3. Another term for "seer" is Gad's title in 2 Sam. 24:11, perhaps denoting his position at court (cf. Am. 7:12).

V. Form and Content of Prophetic Proclamation. The word is the decisive feature of OT prophecy. The prophet must pass on the word that he receives. God sets his word on Jeremiah's lips (Jer. 1:9). When God gives it, he must speak it (1:17). Judgment will fall on those who hamper him (5:13-14). God's word is said to come (2 Sam. 7:4). "Thus says the Lord" is a common prophetic formula (Ex. 4:22; 1 Sam. 10:18; 2

Sam. 7:5; Jeremiah and Ezekiel, but not Hosea, Joel, Jonah, Habakkuk, or Zephaniah). The content is mostly in the first person of God who gives the commission (cf. 2 Sam. 12:11; Am. 6:14, etc.). The saying is usually about an imminent act of salvation or judgment and is thus a promise or a threat. The reference may also be broadly eschatological, often with a messianic element (Jer. 11:1 ff.). Threats are mostly directed against the whole people, sometimes against kings, priests, or prophets (2 Sam. 12:7ff.; Am. 7:17). The calamity may be war, exile, etc., or a natural disaster, e.g., famine, earthquake, or plague. The prophets are involuntary instruments of the word that they pass on. They show those whom they address their sin (cf. Jer. 6:27). Rebuke and calamity are closely related. The common charge is disregarding what God thinks right, including especially idolatry, trusting in foreign powers, and cultic abuses. Admonitions and warnings are part of prophecy in an effort to avert judgment (cf. the watchman's office in Ezek. 3:17 etc.). We also find prophetic intercession (Is. 37:1ff.; Jer. 7:16). Forms vary according to the different situations and needs. Thus disputations, legal pronouncements, salvation oracles, and songs may all be found. Visions occur (Is. 6; Jer. 1:4ff.; Ezek. 1ff.; Zech. 1-6; Am. 7:1ff.), but these usually culminate in a word from God. In symbolic acts (Is. 20:1ff. etc.) the prophets are drawn into their proclamation. Their personal lives are affected as they themselves become a sign (cf. Hos. 1; 3; Jer. 16:1ff.; Ezek. 24: 15ff.). Personal involvement may take the form of martyrdom (Jer. 37-38; Is. 53).

VI. LXX Usage.

1. The LXX mostly uses prophḗtēs, but for "seer" other terms might be used, e.g., ho blépōn in 1 Chr. 9:22 or ho horṓn in 21:9.

2. Prophetess is always prophḗtis.

3. For the late noun "prophecy" prophēteía is always used (cf. Neh. 6:12; Ezr. 6:14).

4. As regards the verb forms, the LXX indiscriminately uses prophēteúō except in 1 Chr. 25:1-3.

5. An attempt at distinction occurs in Jeremiah with the use of pseudoprophḗtēs for those who oppose Jeremiah. [R. RENDTORFF, VI, 796-812]

C. Judaism in the Hellenistic-Roman Period.

I. Contemporary Prophecy.

1. Nonrabbinic Witness.

a. In Zech. 13:2-3, 4ff. there is a sharp attack on contemporary prophets. On "that day" they will be accused by their parents and will set aside their hairy mantles. In view, perhaps, are ecstatics who wore the prophetic cloak as a guild sign. But the references to Dt. 13:5-6 and Am. 7:14 indicate that oracle-giving priests or cultic prophets might also be under attack.

b. Ps. 74:9 seems to suggest that true prophecy has now come to an end (cf. 1 Macc. 4:38, 46; 9:27; 14:41). Yet the permanent ruins of Ps. 74:3 point us to the destruction of Solomon's temple, so that the temporary silence of the prophets is more likely at issue. If so, the lament has no bearing on postexilic prophecy.

c. The lament of Azariah in Dan. 3:38 LXX also refers to the exilic period.

d. In the Epistle of Baruch prophets seem to be restricted to a canonical period of salvation, although only as "helpers," so that oracles might still be given.

2. 1 Macc. 4:46; 9:27; 14:41. In 1 Macc. 4:46 the stones of the old altar are left until a prophet arises who says what should be done with them. In 9:27 the people is going through a time of affliction such as there had never been since a prophet last appeared. In 14:41 Simon is appointed leader until an authentic prophet arises. From these verses some have argued that 1 Maccabees looks ahead to an eschatological prophet, but others think that the story climaxes with the threefold office of John Hyrcanus as prophet, priest, and king.

3. The Rabbinic Tradition. The rabbis restrict legitimate prophecy to a classical period which coincides with the composition of the canon. The Holy Spirit, the Spirit of prophecy, is specifically at work up to the destruction of the temple in 587 B.C., although with some extension to the immediate postexilic period, i.e., that of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi as “the latter prophets.” After this period the Spirit of prophecy departs and God declares his will directly by the voice from heaven. Josephus adopts a similar schema in which there is movement from the age of prophecy through the present to a future general outpouring of the Spirit. Pharisaic rabbinism relates the prophets specifically to the law, which already contains the salvation history whose stages are actualized according to the divine plan. Thus all later prophecy derives from that of Moses. The prophets are the earliest authorized expositors of the law. Prophets abound, but only those whom the law needs in its self-development have come down to us in writing. As expositors of the law, the prophets are secondary to the law and no different in principle from the wise men whose sayings constitute oral law. The voice from heaven is a valid continuation of the lost Spirit of prophecy. In this whole development a combination of the eruptive work of the Spirit in the prophets with the orderly work of the Spirit in the wise men is achieved. Yet the fusion is not complete, for on the one side some rabbis are hostile to prophecy, while on the other an eschatologically oriented charismatic element, to which Pharisaism contributes, plays a big part in the revolts under Vespasian and Hadrian.

II. Historical Manifestations.

1. Prophetic Experience in Palestinian Sources. Dan. 9:1ff., 20ff. describes a pneumatic experience that includes fasting, prayer, mourning, and finally an angelic visitation and a glimpse into the future. In the Qumran exegesis of Hab. 2:2 the prophet is a blind instrument of God who does not know the meaning of his words, but the teacher of righteousness has been granted understanding and brings to light their hidden meaning. In Josephus Jewish War 2.159 the Essenes are seers as they study Scripture, engage in purifications, and enter a state of ecstasy in which interpretation of dreams is one form of the pneumatic experience (Antiquities 17.345ff.). Josephus Jewish War 6.300ff. tells the story of a rough ecstatic (Jesus ben Ananias) whose appearance reminds us of Zech. 13:2ff.

2. Prophecy in the Light of Alexandrian Theology. In the Wisdom of Solomon it is wisdom that engenders prophecy in its direction of salvation history. Philo finds in the law the starting point of the salvation event and depicts the patriarchs and Moses as prophets. Moses is a bearer of revelation as ruler, lawgiver, priest, and prophet in one. He rules the people which, with Abraham as its father, is the people of the prophets and a priestly people for all nations. Himself enjoying pneumatic experiences, Philo says that according to Scripture all sages have a prophetic gift. The righteous, too, bear the prophetic Spirit. The way to prophetic experience is that of ecstasy, which involves the four stages of raving, external stimulation, quietness, and divine seizure in which the prophet is a simple organ of the Spirit with no understanding of what is said. The terminology of Plato and the mysteries influences this depiction, but his statements find their basis in Scripture. He attacks a literal understanding of Scripture mainly because he favors its contemplative consideration under the direction of the invisible spirit who grants spiritual instruction.

3. Seers and Prophets.

a. Various people emerge who claim to be prophets. Thus Josephus Antiquities 13.311ff. mentions a famous Essene seer called Simon, 15.373ff. tells the story of the Essene seer Menachem who has a gift of prediction, and 17.345ff. refers to another Simon who foretells the downfall of Archelaus of the house of Herod. Josephus also says that many Essenes have insight into divine things.

b. The Pharisees, too, have their prophets. Antiquities 17.43ff. mentions a prophetic group at Herod’s court. Josephus himself has a dream in which he learns that an oracle which plays a big role prior to the Jewish War means disaster for Israel. Tradition has it that many rabbis are seers in different ways, e.g., Gamaliel II, Samuel, and Akiba, who in spite of opposition helped to stir up the revolt against Hadrian.

c. Apart from the Essenes and Pharisees there are other prophets of good and evil. Josephus in Jewish War 6.286 mentions a Zealot prophet during the temple revolt who proclaims imminent salvation. Jewish War 6.300ff. introduces Jesus ben Ananias who in A.D. 62 proclaims disaster to a prosperous Jerusalem, is arrested, and then after being released continues his unsettling ministry until he is himself killed during the siege.

4. The Ruler with the Threefold Office. After the example of Moses there arises in the later postexilic period the priestly ruler who also has a prophetic gift. John Hyrcanus I (135-104 B.C.) is a ruler of this kind. He receives auditions in the temple and can predict the future (Antiquities 13.282-83, 300). He is thus an eschatological counterpart of Moses and of the paradisal king; his task is to restore the ideal state to the whole of the human race. Qumran, however, seems to hold the kingly, priestly, and prophetic offices apart. The first two alone are messianic offices, the priest taking precedence over the king. The precise role of the prophet alongside the priest and king is hard to determine.

5. Messianic Prophets. Whereas the charismatic priest-king embodies present salvation, messianic prophets are oriented to the imminent future. They expect a miracle of accreditation that will initiate the new age. Since the new age will bring a reenactment of past salvation events, Moses and Joshua are their models. Josephus Antiquities 18.85ff. mentions a Samaritan who plays such a role, 20.97-98 tells the story of Theudas, 20.169ff. refers to an Egyptian prophet, and Jewish War 7.437ff. introduces a Zealot in Cyrene who after the Jewish War leads poorer people into the desert in search of signs. As late as the fifth century A.D. there are reports of a messianic movement in Crete in which someone who claims to be Moses stirs up many people to attempt a repetition of the march through the sea to the promised land, but disappears when they are drowned off the coast of Crete.

III. The Apocalyptic Literature. Apocalyptic, which has its roots in Iran, integrates the doctrine of two world epochs into the understanding of salvation history. It also follows the principle of offering history in future form by putting prophecies on the lips of figures from the past. The fact that the writing prophets relate their work to history facilitates this development. At times seers offer their own contemplations and experiences, but by and large these works relate to the prophetic manifestations of the period only by offering a basis for the belief of messianic prophets that they will initiate the new aeon.

IV. The End of Prophecy. There was never a purely prophetic age in Israel, for prophecy always has to contend with opposing trends, and it can also live on in constantly new forms. Yet after the defeat of A.D. 70 rabbinism establishes a new patriarchate on the basis of the law and canon which begins to eliminate other movements and to make the wise men the successors of the prophets. The failure of the revolt under Hadrian brings the final suppression of the charismatic element and the reconstruction of the synagogue under the domination of nomistic rationalism. [R. MEYER, VI, 812-28]

D. Prophets and Prophecies in the NT.

I. Occurrence and Meaning of the Words.

1. In the NT prophḗtēs is easily the most common term of the group. It occurs 144 times, mostly in Matthew, Luke, Acts, and John. The prophet is normally a biblical proclaimer of a divinely inspired message. Apart from Balaam (2 Pet. 2:16), only one Gentile, the Cretan poet in Tit. 1:12, is called a prophḗtēs. The biblical prophet can predict the future (cf. Acts 11:28), can know the past (Jn. 4:19), and can look into the heart (Lk. 7:39), but is essentially a proclaimer of the word, not a magician or soothsayer. Since the message of the OT prophets is contained in books, their writings may also be called the prophets.

2. prophḗtis occurs in the NT only in Lk. 2:36 (Anna) and Rev. 2:20 (Jezebel), although other women have a prophetic gift (Acts 2:17-18; 21:9; 1 Cor. 11:5).

3. The verb prophēteúō is more prominent in Paul (11 of 28 instances). It means a. "to proclaim a divinely imparted message" (1 Cor. 11:4-5), b. "to foretell" (Mk. 7:6; Lk. 1:67), c. "to bring to light something that is hidden" (Mk. 14:65), d. "to teach, admonish, comfort" (1 Cor. 14:3, 31), e. "to glorify God ecstatically" (Acts 10:46-47), f. "to have a prophetic gift" (Acts 21:9), and possibly g. "to act as a prophet" (Mt. 7:22).

4. Of the 19 instances of prophēteía seven are in Paul. The word carries the nuances of a. the gift (1 Cor. 12:10), b. the word (1 Cor. 14:6), often as a prediction (Mt. 13:14), c. the authoritative direction (1 Tim. 1:18), and d. the work (Rev. 11:6).

5. The adjective prophētikós qualifies graphaí in Rom. 16:26 and lógos in 2 Pet. 1:19, both times with reference to the OT prophets.

6. Of the eleven instances of pseudoprophḗtēs in the NT, three are in Matthew and three in Revelation. The context must decide whether the falsity refers to the claim or the content. Usually the claim is at issue (Mk. 13:22; Mt. 24:24; 1 Jn. 4:1). But in 1 Jn. 4:1ff. the false prophet is also one who proclaims what is false. The same is true in 2 Pet. 2:1. The main stress, however, is on the false claim which will also entail false teaching.

II. The OT Prophets.

1. Various OT prophets are mentioned in the NT, especially Isaiah (Mt. 3:3; Mk. 7:6; Lk. 3:4; Jn. 12:38; Acts 8:28), also Samuel (Acts 13:20), David (Acts 2:30), Enoch (Jude 14), Elisha (Lk. 4:27), Jeremiah (Mt. 2:17), Daniel (Mt. 24:15), and Jonah (Mt. 12:39), with references to Hosea, Amos, Micah, Habakkuk, and Zechariah, and cf. Balaam in 2 Pet. 2:16.

2. The OT prophets are the mouth through which God speaks (Acts 3:21; Mt. 1:22; 2:15). Heb. 1:1 uses en rather than diá, perhaps to denote God's presence in the prophets, or his speaking with them. In 2 Pet. 1:21 the prophets are involuntary instruments of the Spirit. In 1 Pet. 1:11 the preexistent Christ speaks through them. Mt. 13:35 is perhaps to the same effect, and cf. Jn. 12:38.

3. The prophets write as well as speak (Mt. 2:5; Mk. 1:2; Rom. 1:2, etc.). Hence the writings are also called the prophets (Mk. 1:2). The prophets are combined with the law (or Moses) (Mt. 11:13; Acts 26:22), as well as with the Psalms (Lk. 24:44).

4. The prophets proclaim what is fulfilled in Christ (Rom. 1:2). The pro- has here the sense of telling in advance. All prophecy focuses on Christ (Jn. 1:45; Acts 3:24), who fulfils all God's promises (2 Cor. 1:20). They foretell his birth (Mt. 1:23), the return from Egypt (2:15), the work of the Baptist (Mk. 1:2), down to the resurrection (Lk. 18:31ff.), Pentecost (Acts 2:16), the parousia (2 Pet. 3:2), the judgment (Jude 14-15), and the new order (Acts 3:21). Rejection by Israel is also predicted (Mk. 7:6). The passion and resurrection are at the heart of their message (Mt. 26:56; Lk. 24:44ff.). Only God or the Spirit grants the true understanding of prophecy whereby the prophetic promise becomes the apostolic gospel (Rom. 1:1-2). Paul says only what Moses and the prophets foretold (Acts 26:22-23). The prophetic sayings have a reference to their own time (cf. Mt. 2:15 and Hos. 11:1; 2:17-18 and Jer. 31:15; Mk. 7:6 and Is. 29:13), but in the light of the fulfilment the NT sees predictions in their depictions.

5. The prophets do not merely foretell events but are also authorities supporting the truth of the word and work of Jesus (cf. Mk. 11:17; Jn. 6:45). They proclaim forgiveness to all believers in Christ's name (Acts 10:43). They justify the reception of Gentiles into the church (Acts 15:15).

6. The NT often refers to the persecution or execution of the prophets (Lk. 13:33-34; Mt. 23:31; Heb. 11:36-37). The disciples are their heirs in this regard (Mt. 5:12; cf. Jms. 5:10). Mt. 23:34 christianizes an apocryphal wisdom saying, and Acts 7:52 connects the persecution of the prophets with the crucifixion of Jesus.

III. Pre-Christian Prophets.

1. The NT refers to prophets at the beginning of the gospel story. Thus Zacharias utters a prophecy under the inspiration of the Spirit in Lk. 1:67ff.

2. Elizabeth also speaks prophetically in Lk. 1:41-42 and is thus enabled to recognize in Mary the mother of the Messiah.

3. The aged Simeon comes into the temple under the inspiration of the Spirit, having been told that he would see the Lord’s Christ; hence he, too, speaks about the infant Jesus prophetically (Lk. 2:25ff.).

4. Anna is expressly called a prophetess in Lk. 2:36. As such, she proclaims Christ as the eschatological Savior (v. 38). Like the others, she is a pious Jew, and all four bear a close relation to the temple, thus denoting a harmony of temple and prophecy in this pre-Christian period.

IV. John the Baptist.

1. John the Baptist is everywhere called a prophet (Mk. 11:32; Mt. 11:9; Lk. 1:76; Jn. 1:25). Jesus, indeed, says that he is more than a prophet (Mt. 11:9).

2. The Synoptists describe his call, appearance, and preaching after the OT model. His call is like that of Jeremiah (Jer. 1:1-2; Lk. 3:1-2). He proclaims judgment and calls for conversion. He confronts the ruler like a true prophet (Mk. 6: 17ff.; cf. 1 Sam. 15:10ff.; 2 Sam. 12:1ff.; 1 Kgs. 21:17ff.). He prophesies the mightier one who comes after him (Mk. 1:7-8). His baptism is perhaps a prophetic sign.

3. a. The Baptist has a messianic and eschatological character. This may be seen in Lk. 1:4ff., which shows that his birth and word and work usher in the time of eschatological salvation for the people.

b. His baptizing is the work of an eschatological prophet. It is not a mere rite of purification, nor is it proselyte baptism. It is a once-for-all action for all who will receive eschatological salvation as penitents. By his food and clothing he plainly comes from the desert like Moses, the eschatological redeemer of the old covenant (cf. 1 Cor. 10:1ff.). Jn. 1:25 sees in the baptism a proof of the messianic nature of his ministry; it carries messianic associations for those who question him.

c. Herod, too, fears the Baptist as an eschatological prophet whose coming will shatter the old order. The fact that some people think that he has risen again and is at work in Jesus indicates that they view them as an eschatological deliverer (cf. Mk. 6:14).

d. The statements in Mt. 11:9, 11 confirm the fact that John is more than an ordinary prophet (cf. Lk. 16:16). Mt. 11:13 says that the prophets and the law prophesied until John. This carries the implication that the time of fulfilment has now come, although strictly the meaning might be that they prophesied with reference to John.

e. Other NT verses show that John’s special position is that of the precursor of Jesus. He is not himself the Messiah, although some of his disciples perhaps thought so. If John has eschatological significance, it is as the forerunner of the messianic age, the last prophet before the Messiah (cf. Jn. 1:21, 23; Lk. 1:76; Mt. 11:10, 14).

V. Jesus.

1. Jesus is seldom called a prophet in the NT (cf. Mk. 6:15; 8:28; Mt. 21:11, 46; Lk. 7:16; Acts 3:22-23; Jn. 4:19; 6:14). Mostly it is the people that calls him a prophet (Mk. 6:15; Mt. 21:11, etc.), or individuals like the Samaritan woman (Jn. 4:19) and the man born blind (9:17). The disciples see in him a prophet (Lk. 24:19; Acts 3:22). He does not call himself a prophet except perhaps in Lk. 13:33.

2. An ordinary prophet of the time is meant in Mk. 6:15. The Samaritan woman associates prophecy with Jesus’ knowledge of her past. Simon the Pharisee thinks Jesus should see that the woman is a sinner if he is a true prophet (Lk. 7:39). He displays such knowledge in the conversation that follows.

3. Some verses compare Jesus to the biblical prophets (Lk. 9:8; Mt. 16:14). Like them he calls for conversion (Mk. 1:15), censures mere externality in worship, and speaks with power (Mt. 7:29). He also performs symbolic actions (Mk. 11:13-14). His passion continues the persecution of the prophets (Lk. 13:33). Yet he is also shown to be superior to the prophets (Mt. 12:41). He brings the new age that they foretold (Lk. 10:24). He fulfils the prophecies.

4. a. Like the OT prophets, Jesus utters promises and threats (Lk. 6:20ff., 24).

b. He has visions, auditions, and ecstatic experiences (Mk. 1:10-11; Lk. 10:18; Jn. 12:28; Lk. 10:21).

c. He scans human thoughts (Mk. 2:5; Lk. 5:22; 6:8; 9:47; Jn. 2:24-25, etc.).

d. He knows future events (Mk. 11:2; 14:13ff.; Mt. 26:21; Mk. 8:31; Lk. 13:33; Jn. 14:29; 16:4, etc.). Even though some scholars contend that details have been added later (e.g., in the passion predictions in Mk. 8:31), the authenticity of prediction by Jesus is beyond dispute.

5. a. Some NT verses depict Jesus as the promised prophet of the last time. Thus Peter and Stephen (Acts 3:22; 7:37) both refer to Dt. 18:15. One might also quote Jn. 6:14; 7:40; Mk. 6:14; Mt. 21:11; Lk. 7:16; 24:19ff.; 1:68,78.

b. Various stories reflect the idea that Jesus is the prophet of Dt. 18:15 (cf. the birth stories in Mt. 1-2, the 40 days in the wilderness in Mt. 4:2, the reply to the Baptist in Mt. 11:5, the feeding of the crowds in Jn. 6, the teaching of the Sermon on the Mount (in which “But I say” replaces “Thus says the Lord”), and the miracles that follow (Mt. 8-9). In many of these stories and teachings Jesus is set in antithetical typology to Moses; he is the prophet of the last days who brings salvation.

c. As in Judaism, messianic titles and functions merge into one another. Thus Jesus is the kingly as well as the prophetic Messiah in Jn. 6:14-15; Mt. 21:9ff. He is Christ as well as prophet in Acts 3: 18ff.

d. If he never calls himself the prophet, this is in accord with the messianic secret; he might still have viewed himself as such. The NT probably does not use the term too frequently because Jewish Christians saw him merely as a second Moses. Again, the title prophet does not adequately represent his uniqueness; it thus yields to fuller titles like Son of Man, Lord, and Son of God.

VI. Church Prophets.

1. The Nature of Primitive Christian Prophecy. This prophecy is the utterance of charismatic preachers regarding the divine mysteries (1 Cor. 13:2), God’s saving will (Eph. 3:5-6), future events (Acts 21:10-11; Rev. 22:6-7), and contemporary matters (Acts 13:1ff.; 1 Tim. 1:18). The prophets admonish, console, encourage, and censure (cf. 1 Cor. 14:3, 25).

2. Comparison with OT Prophecy. Similarities include the use of actions (Acts 21:10-11), prophetic style (11:11), and visions at calling (cf. Rev. 1:9ff.; 10:8ff.). A main difference is that, while there are some outstanding prophets, all members of the community are now called to prophesy (Acts 2:4, 16ff.; 4:31). Like the OT prophets, NT prophets disclose hidden things (Eph. 3:5) but enjoy less authority, since they are subject to the judgment of their brethren (Mt. 7:16). The divine of Revelation is closest to an OT prophet with his authoritative and decisively significant message (1:2-3; 19:9) which determines the destiny of those who accept or reject it (22:18-19).

3. The Most Important Charisma. Paul prefers prophecy to other gifts (1 Cor. 14:1; cf. 12:28-29; Eph. 4:11). The prophets Barnabas and Silas are leaders of the church (Acts 15:22, 32). The prophets also have a special place in Rev. 11:18; 16:6; 18:24; prophecy is here the revelation and testimony of Jesus Christ. Some prophets may be itinerants (cf. Acts 11:27-28 and 21:10), but this is not a general rule. Even prophecy is transitory (1 Cor. 13:8-9, 12). Paul does not call himself a prophet, although he speaks prophetically (1 Cor. 14:6; cf. Rom. 11:25ff.; 1 Cor. 15:51 ff.; 1 Th. 4:13ff.; Acts 20:22-23; 27:22ff.).

4. Ecstasy and Prophecy. The NT never refers to exclusion of the individual ego even though prophecy has ecstatic features (cf. Acts 2:4ff.; 10:44ff.; Rev. 1:10; 4:2). Its chief mark is proclamation of God’s word in which the speaker’s personhood remains intact (1 Cor. 14). It stays on the sober ground of faith (cf. Rom. 12:6). God gives, and believers make responsible use of the gift.

5. Glossolalia and Prophecy. These two gifts of the Spirit have much in common (Acts 2:4, 17; 19:6). Yet prophecy ranks higher (1 Cor. 14:1 ff.). It declares God’s counsels openly (1 Cor. 14:5). Both gifts edify, but tongues edify only the speakers, prophecy the whole church (14:2-3). To those outside speakers in tongues seem to be mad, but in prophecy spiritual experience is presented in intelligible speech that all may understand (14:24-25).

6. Prayer and Prophecy. Prayer is a mark of the OT prophets and of Anna, and in the NT, too, prayer and prophecy often go together (Acts 13:1ff.; 1 Cor. 11:4-5; 1 Th. 5: 17ff.). Prayer is not a separate charisma; perhaps the prophets lead in prayer (cf. 1 Cor. 14:13ff., where the prophets pray with the mind, and even outsiders may thus join in the Amen).

7. Revelation and Prophecy. Prophecy rests on revelation. Revelation is imparted to the prophet and becomes prophetic proclamation (1 Cor. 14:26ff.). In Revelation we see a transition from prophecy to apocalyptic. Revelation is the Apocalypse of Jesus Christ, has an apocalyptic theme, and introduces apocalyptic features like the angel, visions, and cryptic numbers. It is also genuine prophecy with its call for repentance (11:3) and its message of admonition and comfort (2-3). The element of prediction, however, is now central.

8. gnṓsis and Prophecy. Knowledge and prophecy are both gifts in 1 Cor. 13:8ff., but prophecy rates higher, for it attains to knowledge by inspiration rather than by thought. Furthermore, although both teach, gnṓsis is individualistic and easily puffs up (1 Cor. 8:1), whereas prophecy edifies (14:3-4).

9. Teaching and Prophecy. Prophets are often mentioned with teachers (Acts 13:1) and they themselves teach (1 Cor. 14:31), but more on the basis of revelations and in specific situations, hence with more freedom.

10. Evangelism and Prophecy. Like evangelism, prophecy is proclamation but primarily to believers and for edification (1 Cor. 14:3-4). Yet as evangelism also preserves the community, so prophecy may convict nonbelievers (14:24-25). Whereas evangelism presents the great acts of God, prophecy sets out God's will for the world and the church under the direction of the Spirit.

VII. False Prophets.

1. In the NT the word pseudoprophḗtēs covers various kinds of false prophets, e.g., Jewish prophets in Lk. 6:26; 2 Pet. 2:1, the magician in Acts 13:6, and false Christian teachers in 2 Pet. 2:1; 2 Jn. 7; 1 Jn. 2:18 (cf. Jezebel in Rev. 2:20). False prophets are common in the last days (Mt. 24:11). The second beast of Rev. 13:11 ff. is at their head.

2. Prophets must be tested, not rationally, but spiritually and charismatically (1 Cor. 12:10) by other prophets (14:29). False prophets may perform miracles (Mk. 13:22; Rev. 13:13). Christological confession forms a test (1 Jn. 4:2-3). So do fruits (Mt. 7:16; cf. Rev. 2:20).

E. Prophets in the Early Church.

I. The OT Prophets.

1. Barnabas often refers to OT prophets in the proof from prophecy, although illumination and love are needed to interpret them (5.6; 6.2ff.). The prophets speak especially of Christ (5.5ff.; 6.6-7) but also of Christians (11.1ff.), who are the holy people of the covenant (14.6ff.).

2. Justin develops the proof from prophecy even more explicitly. Philosophy builds on prophecy and myth imitates it (Apology 32; 44.8ff.; 54). The prophetic writings cover the entire OT, all of which relates to Christ, although sometimes obscurely. Later prophets are more precise and expound older prophecies. The Holy Spirit has fully intimated Christ in the prophets, with references to his virgin birth, miracles, entry into Jerusalem, arrest, silence, mocking, crucifixion, death, resurrection, and return (cf. Apology and Dialogue).

II. Jesus as prophet. The theme of Jesus as a prophet is most fully developed in the Pseudo-Clementine writings. These present "prophet" as a christological title. Jesus is the prophet of Dt. 18:15 who does signs and wonders like Moses. Sayings and stories from the Gospels are adduced in support of this. In Gnostic style, however, Jesus is the preacher of truth rather than the eschatological deliverer. Although he is unique, the one true prophet predates him, being incarnate in Adam and coming in Abraham, Moses, etc. to bring saving truth to the world.

III. Church Prophets. Prophets are held in high esteem in Did. 13.1ff., where tithes should be paid to them. They may give thanks freely (10.7) and are not to be treated critically unless they prove to be false prophets. They are being replaced, however, by bishops and deacons (15.1-2). Hermas does not call himself a prophet but knows prophets who wait upon the Spirit and speak as the Spirit decides (Mandates 11.8-9). In general, prophets gradually become less prominent as charismatic powers fade and false prophets bring discredit on prophecy. Irenaeus claims prophetic gifts but gives priority to the bishops, presbyters, and deacons. Contesting pagan prophecy, Origen quotes OT rather than Christian prophets. Tertullian values Montanist prophets but does not give prophets any very decisive role in the churches. Officebearers and Scripture replace them.

IV. False Prophets. False prophets obviously cause a good deal of trouble. Did. 11.8ff. shows that they are marked by inconsistency of teaching and conduct. Hermas offers moral criteria by which to unmask them (Mandates 11.2-3, 12-13). They are bold, ambitious, talkative, etc., offer consultations like soothsayers, take fees, and tell people what they want to hear. The Montanist prophets are regarded as false prophets on the grounds that they produce no miracles, that their prediction of the coming of the new Jerusalem at Pepuza is false, that they prophesy in ecstatic trances, that they accept gifts and adopt an unseemly mode of life, and that Jesus himself said that there would be no more prophets after John. There may be little basis for many of the criticisms, for Tertullian respects the Montanists, they live ascetically, it is generally agreed that they are doctrinally orthodox, and ecstasy is not rejected by the church in principle. With the defeat of Montanism the institutional ministry gains a decisive victory over prophecy. [G. FRIEDRICH, VI, 828-61]

procheirízō [to appoint]

1. This verb, developed from the adjective prócheiros, means “to hold ready,” “to handle,” “to prepare,” “to appoint” (people).

2. In the LXX the adjective occurs in Prov. 11:3, and the verb is used for “to elect,” “to name” (Ex. 4:13).

3. Philo uses the adjective for “close at hand” (ideas etc.). Neither he nor Josephus uses the verb.

4. In the NT Acts has the verb three times. In the accounts of Paul’s conversion in 22:14 and 26:16 it means “to choose,” “to appoint,” “to ordain.” It does not carry a sense of foreordination but of appointment to a function. This is also the sense in Acts 3:20, where Peter tells the people that Christ has been appointed for them, i.e., for their restoration, whether with his earthly ministry, resurrection, or return, or from the very beginning.

5. There are no instances of the verb in early Christian writings. [W. MICHAELIS, VI, 862-64] prṓtos [first], prṓton [first, at first], prōtokathedría [best seat], prōtoklisía [first place], prōtótokos [firstborn], prōtotokeía [birthright], prōteúo [to be first] prṓtos.

1. From Homer prṓtos signifies the “first” in space, time, number, or rank.

2. The word occurs in the LXX some 240 times, half in Genesis to Nehemiah, and mostly with reference to number, though also at times rank.

3. Philo uses the term in various connections (e.g., ho prṓtos is the only true God for the sage); in Josephus the term is used for leaders in the tribe, people, or priesthood (e.g., Ezra), as well as for the first in time.

4.a. Although prṓtos occurs over 90 times in the NT, the spatial sense is rare (cf. Heb. 9:2, 6, 8).

b. More common is the meaning “first” in time, number, or sequence (cf. Mk. 14:12; 1 Cor. 16:1). The use for “earlier” or “preceding” is very common (Rev. 2:5; 1 Tim. 5:12). As regards the covenant of Heb. 8:7, 13; 9:1, 15, 18), the opposite is mostly kainḗ or néa (deutéra only in 8:7). Similarly the new heaven and earth will replace the first in Rev. 21:1. A more common NT antithesis is first and last (éschatos). Christ is the first and last in Rev. 1:17; 2:8; he is before and after all time. In Mt. 12:45; 27:64; 2 Pet. 2:20 prṓtos means former and éschatos later or last. In 1 Cor. 15:45 the first Adam is not preexistent, and Christ as the second Adam is the present Christ of the resurrection; the former initiated the old humanity, Christ has initiated the new. Although Christ is the second ánthrōpos, he is not the second Adam, for as the new Adam he is also the last.

c. The antithesis prṓtos/éschatos may also carry a reference to rank, as in Mt. 20:16 (cf. 19:30). When the disciples squabble about rank, prṓtos is a key word (Mk. 10:44); the opposite may be doúlos or diákonos as well as éschatos (Mk. 9:35). The first commandment of Mk. 12:28 is the same as the great commandment of Mt. 22:36; in this case comparison is made with a second that is like it. Eph. 6:2 (the first commandment with promise) uses prṓtē entolḗ in a different way. hoi prṓtoi for "leaders" occurs in Mk. 6:21; Lk. 19:47; Acts 13:50.

5. In 2 Clem. 14.1 the preexistent church is hē ekklēsiá hē prṓtē, and in Hermas Mandates 3.4.1 the archangels are hoi ángeloi hoi prṓtoi ktisthéntes.

1. As an adverb, this word means "first," "at first," "in the first instance," "before," "earlier"; there are only eight plainly attested instances in the LXX.

2.a. Some of the more than 60 instances in the NT call for special notice. Thus Paul stresses in Rom. 1:16 that, although the gospel is for all who believe, it is for the Jew first (cf. 2:9-10). In 1 Pet. 4:17 judgment comes first upon believers as the household of God.

b. In certain demands of Jesus prṓton indicates priority. Thus we are first to be reconciled (Mt. 5:24), or to pull the beam out of our own eyes (7:5), or to count the cost (Lk. 14:28). In the sequence of eschatological events, Elijah is to come first (Mk. 9:11-12), the Son of Man must be rejected first (Lk. 17:25), and apostasy must first come (2 Th. 2:3). This may well be the sense in Mk. 13:10, where "above all" is also possible. But one should not take the verse out of context as offering a general basis for mission, since in its position between v. 9 and v. 11 it plainly relates to the testimony given to councils and rulers.

c. The sense "above all" is the obvious one in Mt. 6:33, for Jesus is not teaching that we should seek the kingdom first and then other things, but that there should be exclusive orientation to the divine kingdom and righteousness.

prōtokathedría, prōtoklisía. These words occur together in Mk. 12:39 and parallels; the former also occurs in Lk. 11:43 and the latter in 14:7-8. The terms are rare outside the NT but in context their meaning is clear: "the first place," "the place of honor." Jesus criticizes those who always want to occupy places of honor, and he warns his disciples against self-exaltation in the parables of Lk. 14:8ff.

prōtótokos, prōtotokeía.

A. Outside the NT.

1. prōtótokos, "firstborn," is rare outside the Bible and does not occur prior to the LXX. Instead we find prōtógonos, which can also mean "first in rank." Of the few nonbiblical examples, many refer to animals.

2.a. There are some 130 instances in the LXX, of which 74 are in the Pentateuch and 29 in 1 Chronicles. The reference may be to animals, to humans and animals together (Ex. 11:5), to humans with huiós, or as a noun without huiós but with a proper name (cf. Gen. 25:25; 10:15; 22:21).

b. The examples stress the great importance of the firstborn. God has a claim to the firstborn of humans and animals (as well as firstfruits). The firstborn of cattle are brought as offerings. In the family the firstborn take precedence; this is the basis of the later transferred use.

c. As regards the transferred use, the main Hebrew original (bəḵôr) is not connected with terms for giving birth nor with terms for "head" or "chief." Again, a comparison with others is not necessarily suggested, since the first may also be the only one.

d. Ex. 4:22, in calling Israel a firstborn son, is not suggesting that other nations are also God's children but is stressing the fact that it is the object of God's special love. Similarly in Ps. 89:27 the point is the closeness of the king to God. The idea of even a figurative birth is not present, nor is that of a priority in time over other sons. The thought is that of special dearness in God's eyes.

e. The LXX also uses prōtotokéō, "to give birth for the first time" (1 Sam. 6:7, 10; Jer. 4:31); prōtotokeúō, "to grant the right of a firstborn" (Dt. 21:16); tá prōtotokeía, "the right of the firstborn" (Gen. 25:31ff.); cf. prōtotokía or prōtotokeía (Gen. 25:34).

3. Philo uses prōtótokos as both adjective and noun on an OT basis. In one instance Cain is called prōtótokos as the first man to come into the world by birth; the idea of firstborn is prominent here. Josephus uses prōtótokos for the firstborn of men and cattle. In his version of Josh. 6:26 he uses prṓtos país.

4. The OT use continues in the pseudepigrapha, where the term denotes the special position of Isaac as Abraham's son, or of Jacob as God's son, or of the seed of Jacob (Israel) as God's firstborn.

5. In the rabbis the term denotes the special position of Israel, the law, Adam, or the Messiah, with a reference either to the special love of God or to the special qualities of those to whom the term applies.

B. The NT.

1. Lk. 2:7 says that Mary gave birth to her firstborn son. Birth is plainly in view here. The statement perhaps stresses the virginity of Mary, and it also prepares the way for vv. 22ff. Of itself it does not necessarily imply that Mary has other children. But it also does not mean monogenḗs; indeed, it includes the possibility and expectation that other children will follow.

2. The metaphor of the firstborn among many brethren is used by Paul in Rom. 8:29. In view here is the perfected fellowship with the risen Christ that comes with resurrection on the last day when transfigured believers attain to their inheritance as the brothers and sisters of Christ, who retains his primacy as the firstborn.

3. In Col. 1:18 Christ is the first to rise from the dead, but with a definite primacy as such, as the term "head" and the "that" clause show.

4. In Rev. 1:5, too, the prōtótokos signifies not only priority in time but also the primacy of rank that accrues to Jesus with his resurrection.

5. In Col. 1:15 the "for" clause brings out the meaning, namely, that all things owe their creation to Christ's mediation. The point, then, is not that Christ is the first creature. This would demand a stress on the -tokos and would also bring birth into conflict with creation. What is stated is Christ's supremacy over creation as its mediator. The term prōtótokos is used, then, because of its importance as a word for rank. In spite of v. 4 it does not here denote Christ's special relation to the Father. The twofold use does not necessarily derive from Gnostic ideas of the primal man or the redeemed redeemer. As the mediator of the first creation, Christ is also the mediator of the new creation with his resurrection from the dead (v. 18).

6. Heb. 1:6 perhaps refers to the enthronement of the exalted Christ at his coming. On the other hand, entry into the world seems to fit the incarnation better. In connection with the "son" of v. 2, prōtótokos denotes Christ's unique relation of sonship, with a primary although not exclusive reference to his preexistence. The term is not based on the "begotten thee" of the quotation from Ps. 2:7 in v. 5, for Christ is not the firstborn in comparison with the angels. It is probably adopted as a familiar title which is well adapted to bring out Christ's uniqueness.

7. The assembly of the firstborn in Heb. 12:23 is not the company of angels nor the community of Israel but the saved company of Christian believers. How exactly this use fits in with that in the rest of the NT is hard to say. The prōtótokos of Rom. 8:29 cannot be transferred to believers, and it is unlikely that the relation to the rest of creation is in view (Jms. 1:18).

1. This word means "to be first" (in rank), often with a genitive and the person over whom one takes precedence.

2. The LXX uses the term in Esth. 5:11; 2 Macc. 6:18. Other versions have it in Zech. 4:7. Josephus uses prōteúontes for "leaders."

3. In Col. 1:18 the subsidiary clause denotes the divine aim, summing up and intensifying what is said in 1:15. As firstborn of all creation, head of the church, and firstborn from the dead, Christ is prōteúōn ("preeminent") in everything. [W. MICHAELIS, VI, 865-82]

ptaíō [to stumble, slip, sin]

1. ptaíō, of uncertain etymology, has such senses as "to stumble against," "to collide with," or, in the more usual intransitive, "to stumble," "to fall," "to suffer a reverse," and figuratively "to err," "to sin."

2. In the LXX ptaíō has the figurative sense "to slip" in Sir. 37:12. Elsewhere it is used for the defeat of an army, e.g., 1 Sam. 4:2, 10.

3. In Philo it means either "to suffer misfortune" or "to sin."

4. In the five NT instances the main meaning is the figurative one "to slip," "to err," "to sin" (Jms. 2:10; 3:2; 2 Pet. 1:10, though "suffer a reverse" is also possible here). In Rom. 11:11 the basic sense "to stumble" is plain, and there is perhaps a distinction from falling inasmuch as those who merely stumble may regain their balance, but falling has the greater finality of eternal ruin. Such a fall is not the purpose of the stumbling of the Jews.

5. In 1 Clem. 51.1—the one example in the apostolic fathers-forgiveness is sought for what is done amiss through the snares of the adversary. [K. L. SCHMIDT, VI, 883-84]

pterýgion → hierós*; *ptṓma, ptṓsis → píptō

ptōchós [poor, destitute], ptōcheía [poverty, destitution], ptōcheúō [to become (extremely) poor]

A. ptōchós in the Greek World.

I. Meaning.

1. ptōchós as an adjective means “destitute,” “mendicant.”

2. ptōcheúō in the transitive means “to beg from someone,” in the intransitive “to be destitute,” “to lead the life of a beggar.”

3. ptōcheía means “destitution,” “begging.” It is worthy of note that in distinction from pénēs, which refers to those who are poor and have to work for a living, the ptōchós group refers to the total poverty which reduces people to begging.

II. View of Poverty. Some beggars are people who will not work and prey on others. But there are also beggars who have lost their property and wander about in great unhappiness. In general, beggars are despised, but small gifts are given to them, and Homer can even say at times that they come from God. The Greeks have no system of poor relief. They protect the rights of orphans and distribute grain to citizens, but the indigent are dependent on the expected generosity of others. Poverty is nowhere commended. [F. HAUCK, VI, 885-87]

B. The OT.

I. Hebrew Equivalents.

1. The main Hebrew term has the primary sense of dependence, with the more developed implications of lowliness, dispossession, poverty, and, in the religious world, humility or piety. Since the poverty is undeserved, God is regarded especially as the protector of the poor.

2. Another term rendered ptōchós in the LXX denotes either physical weakness or wretched status.

3. Another term means “beggar” or “very poor person,” but here again with the religious nuance of one who is humble before God, i.e., needy in prayer.

4. Other terms meaning “needy” in a social or economic sense, or “dependent” and “inferior,” are also translated ptōchós, which occurs some 100 times in the LXX.

II. Attitude to the Poor.

1. In the seminomadic phase there are no sharp distinctions between rich and poor. At the conquest all receive an inheritance but social distinctions in the Canaanite towns exert an influence. The law makes provision for the poor and forbids their oppression. God himself defends them in the courts and restitution ought to be made every seventh year.

2. Economic development during the monarchy brings sharper distinctions and the greater landowners, who also function as judges, reduce many owners of smaller inheritances to poverty. The prophets take up the cause of the poor in the name of God (cf. Am. 2:7; Is. 3:15). They proclaim God’s judgment on the wrongdoing of the wealthy (Am. 2:6ff.). The poor are not specially elected but commitment to the law means commitment to those who suffer from its violation.

3. Although Deuteronomy does not use ptōchós, it shows that God has given Israel a bountiful land in which all are to have a portion (15:4ff.) and poverty is thus unnecessary. In addition, it offers protective measures to provide for any who become impoverished (15:1ff.; 23:20, 25-26). Unfortunately the laws are not kept, and with the deterioration of the social situation and the final collapse of the state the problem of poverty is increased and perpetuated.

4. In the Psalms the poor are not merely under divine punishment but even more so under divine protection (Pss. 72:2ff.; 132:15). Failure to give the destitute their right is castigated (Ps. 82). The poor turn to God when harried by their enemies (Ps. 9:12), who may be political foes, foreign adversaries, or impersonal forces such as sickness. The poor come to be equated with petitioners, who may not be poor in a financial sense, but who are oppressed in other ways, and thus claim divine protection. The prospect of material aid maintains a link with the literal sense. Thanksgivings are offered when relief is granted.

5. The tragedy of the exile leads to a general collective use of the terms, although more in connection with God's promises, and with no suggestion that God will help because the people is now in some ideal state of poverty. A material reference is still present, and the final solution will be a semieschatological balancing of accounts.

6. The Wisdom literature accepts the social order but links its thoughts on poverty closely to God. Some poverty may be due to laziness or self-indulgence (Prov. 6:6ff.; 21:17). But it is better to be poor and righteous than rich and a liar (19:22). There is sympathy with the poor (14:20; 18:23; Eccl. 9:16). Obligations toward them must not be forgotten (Prov. 22:2). In general, Proverbs tends to have more admonitions for the rich than the poor, and Sirach makes a gentle appeal on their behalf. Job complains that his generosity to the poor receives no recognition (29-30), and that the poor are delivered up to oppressors (24:14), but he holds out hope that God will finally help them (5:15).

C. Later Judaism.

I. Usage.

1. The rabbis know the terms for the poor but make little use of them.

2. Josephus makes more use of the pénēs group than the ptōchós group, and Philo, who is not concerned about the problem, never uses ptōchós at all.

II. The Poor in the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha.

1. Some of these works ignore the social situation, while others complain about it but without using ptōchós or suggesting an antithesis to the rich.

2. Another group demands pity for the poor, commends generosity, gives examples of it, and considers its rewards.

3. Other works hold out the hope that poverty will vanish in the new aeon. Prior to the end the poor will be in conflict with the rich and will then be set above them. Poverty is threatened for those who follow the harlot Babylon.

4. Yet another group complains violently against the wealthy and interfuses the concepts of poverty and piety.

5. In the Psalms of Solomon (5:2, 11; 10:6, etc.) the poor are considered in relation to God. The term ptōchós is used here for various forms of affliction, including material poverty, but in particular it denotes an inner quality. In a martyr theology poverty is integrated into God's dealings in history. The passive mood prevents the development of active movements on behalf of the poor.

III. Qumran.

1. Individuals and groups are called poor in the Qumran literature. God uses them to defeat his enemies. "Community of the poor" becomes a common term for the movement but the use does not enable us to draw any conclusions as to its composition.

2. Members of the community renounce private possessions. There are severe penalties for false statements or for misappropriation of community funds. Property is not wrong in itself; the community is an economic unit, although with its erasing of the distinctions between rich and poor it reflects the life of the coming age when property is left behind. The Damascus Document allows some private property along with common sharing, and the Essenes follow a similar pattern. Philo suggests that the Therapeutae renounce all their goods, but his description is highly rhetorical.

IV. The Poor in Palestinian Judaism.

1. The post-Maccabean age is one of great social tensions, but more settled conditions come with the Herods. The Pharisees grow apart from the masses, among whom extremists find some support. The revolts against Rome bring an ethos of poverty, but wealth increases again and results in social cleavages in which the masses are despised and the poor neglected, although some sectaries continue to glorify them.

2. Legally the poor pay minimum taxes and are also entitled to support (cf. the poor tax based on Dt. 14:29, which is often a dead letter, but which the Pharisees observe as a duty and which becomes more important later). The poor also enjoy traditional gleaning rights.

3. Established custom makes voluntary philanthropy an important source of help for the poor, though it is often abused by beggars. An accepted principle is that, as sin offerings bring atonement for Israel, so does philanthropy for the Gentiles. After the destruction of the temple the latter plays a bigger role for Israel too. Some groups, e.g., the Essenes, make it a duty, food and clothes being given as well as money.

4. After the Jewish War an official system of poor relief comes into effect. The synagogues arrange levies and offerings, provide daily and weekly support, and also set up hospices. But social distinctions remain.

V. The Rabbis. After the exile the rabbis take a negative view of poverty, scorning the modest offerings of the poor and not recognizing in poverty an excuse for not studying the law. Although misfortune might strike anyone, poverty rates as a curse or a punishment. Yet one still finds statements to the effect that the poor are primary objects of the divine mercy.

D. The NT.

I. The Gospels.

1. Mark. In the NT ptōchós, not pénēs, is the usual term for the poor. Of 31-35 instances, 14-15 are in the Synoptics, and 4-5 in Mark. The use in Mark is literal. Mt. 12:41ff. states that the tiny gift of the poor widow is of more value than the large gifts of the wealthy. In 10:17ff. Jesus challenges the rich landowner to sell his property and give to the poor. In Mk. 14:5,7 the special circumstances explain what might seem to be a strange rejection of the valid concern of the group around Jesus.

2. Matthew. Mt. 19:21 associates the giving of the ruler's property to the poor with being téleios. 26:11 tightens the formulation in Mark but with no change of sense. 11:5 gives special emphasis to the preaching of the gospel to the poor; it stands in correlation to the mission of ch. 10, on which the Baptist must have had information. 5:3 (cf. 5:5)—the first beatitude—lifts the stress from the material to the spiritual sphere.

3. Luke. Lk. 18:22 adds a pánta to the demand that the rich young ruler should sell his possessions, and the context implies that a whole class fails to fulfil it. The saying in 7:22 is incorporated into the story. 6:20 might derive from a different source from Mt. 5:3, although the question of priority cannot be settled. The theme of rich and poor plays a role in the Lucan infancy stories. In 4:18 preaching the gospel to the poor has thematic significance. In 14:21, which refers to the eschatological banquet, the poor are invited along with the maimed and blind, and in 14:13 it is these that one should invite to a feast. In 16:19ff. the poor man is the recipient of divine grace and the rich man, by his self-centeredness, is ineluctably alienated from God. In contrast, the rich Zacchaeus, when he meets Jesus, displays extraordinary generosity to the poor. Other passages (6:24-25; 8:14; 12:15ff.; 14:33; 16:10ff.) stress the perils of wealth. There is no primary interest here in the poor as such, but in the salvation of the rich, whom their wealth rivets to this world.

4. John. Jn. 12:5-6 ascribes impure motives to Judas' concern for the poor, and this gives a special slant to the reply of Jesus in v. 8. In 13:29 the disciples assume that Judas, who keeps the purse, has been sent out to give the customary Passover alms to the poor.

II. Luke 14ff., Jesus, and the Baptist. Lk. 14ff. refers often to the theme of the rich and the poor and implies a special identification with the poor, widows, sinners, and little people. Lk. 4:18 is to much the same effect, and in Lk. 7:22 (cf. Mt. 11:5) there is emphasis on the fact that the gospel is especially for the poor. Jesus sets himself among the tired and lowly in Mt. 11:28 but will not let himself be tied down to a social principle (Mk. 14:7) or nourish the expectation of fulfilling material expectations. Although ptōchós does not occur in the preaching of the Baptist, we find related terms; his message is rich in social overtones, so that a theology of poverty is to some extent present.

III. Paul. Although Paul rarely uses ptōchos, and not at all in the context of the removal of distinctions by Christ, the passages in which he does use the term are central. Thus in Gal. 2:10 and Rom. 15:26 he energetically promotes the collection for the poor, or the poor among the Jerusalem saints. This is a voluntary offering, not a tax, but Paul regards it as particularly important. The phrase in Rom. 15:26 may be a term that the Jerusalem church uses for itself. In Gal. 4:9 Paul calls the elemental spirits weak and ptōchá, i.e., beggarly. In 2 Cor. 6:3ff., in a series of paradoxes, he points out that the apostles, while materially poor, make many spiritually rich. In 1 Cor. 15:10 ptōchḗ is a possible and not implausible reading to describe God's grace to Paul; it was not beggarly. Paul usually seems to have taken over the term ptōchós from prior tradition or from an actual situation. He knows the problem of poverty and takes steps to deal with it, but his orientation is too strongly eschatological to let it be a major concern or a subject of theological transvaluation. Thus Paul does not use ptōchós as a title for Christians, nor is ptōcheía a figurative term for the Christian life.

IV. James. James attacks the rich both inside and outside the church, and opposes to them the humble or the poor. God has chosen the poor in the world to be rich in faith (2:5). The church no longer feels solidarity with the oppressed now that wealthier people are coming into it, and the author protests against dishonoring the poor (2:6).

V. Revelation. In 2:9 the spiritual wealth of the Smyrna church stands in contrast to its material poverty. In 3:17 the supposed spiritual wealth of Laodicea is unmasked as poverty. In 13:16 the rich and poor are the two classes of the materially rich and the materially poor.

VI. The Primitive Community. Rather strangely Acts does not use ptōchós when describing the sharing of goods in the Jerusalem church. If Rom. 15:26 contains a title for this church, it suggests the development of a structure that does away with social distinctions, as Acts records. The common meals and the handing over of personal property for administration by the apostles and later by the seven give evidence of a care for the poor that goes far beyond normal synagogue practice, although it is in accord with much Palestinian thinking.

E. The Postapostolic Age.

I. Later Jewish Christianity. The term Ebiōnaíoi or Ebiōnítai (Ebionaei) becomes a common one in the Jewish Christian sphere, this rendering being preferred to ptōchoí even by Jewish Christians. Symmachus in his translation seems to try to dissociate the two concepts, and we find a similar shunning of ptōchoí in the Pseudo-Clementines, along with aloofness to the ideal of external poverty.

II. The Apostolic Fathers. Early exhortation commends generosity to the poor (cf. Did. 5.2). The prayers of the poor are efficacious (Hermas Similitudes 2.5ff.). The church orders make provision for the poor. Asceticism fosters opposition to property, but argues that lack of desire is true wealth. In an odd twist gifts to martyrs are esteemed more highly than gifts to the poor. Wealth as such is not an evil, only attachment to it (Irenaeus Against Heresies 4.30). Poverty indeed may stand in the way of knowledge of God (Clement of Alexandria Paedagogus 3.35.1). Almsgiving is stressed, but for the salvation of the giver more than the relief of the poor. [E. BAMMEL, VI, 888-915]

pygmḗ [fist-fight], pykteúō [to box]

1. pygmḗ means "fight with the fists," "fight," "affray." In Mk. 7:3 the term is textually uncertain; if it is retained, it seems to denote rubbing the palm of one hand with the fist of the other.

2. The verb pykteúō means "to box." Paul uses it figuratively in 1 Cor. 9:26 when he says that he does not box as one who beats the air. What Paul has in mind is either a poor boxer who misses his opponent, or a sham boxer who will not face an opponent at all but simply engages in shadow-boxing. Another possibility is that of boxers engaged only in preliminary sparring. In any case, lack of seriousness is the issue. Paul has no time for incompetent or frivolous lunging. He is engaged in a vital contest and he exerts himself to achieve the prize. [K. L. SCHMIDT, VI, 915-17]

pýthōn [spirit of divination]

1. pýthōn is the name of the snake that guards the Delphic oracle, and it is also used from the early imperial period for a ventriloquist, through whom, as many think, a god is supposed to speak, and who is thus regarded as a soothsayer. How pýthōn comes to be equated with engastrímythos, the ventriloquist, is not certain. It may be because the Delphic Pythia, like the ventriloquist, speaks in strange sounds. There is no evidence in first-century imperial Rome for the idea of a spirit of soothsaying.

2. The LXX uses engastrímythos for a Hebrew term of uncertain meaning.

3. On the basis of 1 Sam. 28:8 Josephus uses engastrímythoi for those who by divination conjure up the spirits of the dead, and for the underlying Hebrew the Vulgate later uses such terms as magus, python, pythonicus spiritus (Lev. 19:31; 1 Sam. 28:3, 9; 2 Chr. 33:6). At first only the LXX links ventriloquism and conjuring up the spirits of the dead; the fathers ask whether the engastrímythos can really do this.

4. In Acts 16:16 the "spirit" might be in apposition: a spirit, namely, a pýthōn, or named Pýthōn; or we might translate the phrase "a pythonian spirit." The point, perhaps, is that pýthōn denotes the spirit that speaks through the girl. As a soothsayer—ventriloquist she stands in relation to the demonic. Although many ventriloquists who claim to be prophets are frauds, for this girl ventriloquism is connected with a supposed or authentic gift of divination.

5. In early church writings pýthōn is used, not for the ventriloquist, but for the spirit that speaks from him or her. Jerome in Is. 8:20 refers to the unmasking of ventriloquists as python-demons. [W. FOERSTER, VI, 917-20]

pýlē [gate], pylṓn [gateway]

A. The Literal Sense. The pýlē is the gate of a city, temple, or prison. The pylṓn is the gateway of a city, temple, house, or complex of houses. In Heb. 13:12 Jesus is said to be crucified outside the gate. This emphasizes the separation from Judaism. The priests have no part in the Christian altar. As the sin offering on the Day of Atonement is burned outside the camp, so Jesus, the sin offering of the new covenant, dies outside the holy city. The execution outside the gate is part of the shame of being numbered among transgressors (Lev. 24:14; Num. 15:35), but it is also an essential aspect of the one true offering for sin.

B. The Narrow Gate of Mt. 7:13-14. Some texts omit pýlē from v. 13 as an interpolation from v. 14, but a few also omit it from v. 14, and in view of the parallelism it is best to keep it in both. The link with "way" does not mean that the gate is the entrance to the way or a passage on it. The comparison of entrance into God's kingdom with a gate is a common one in eschatological parlance. The narrowness of the gate and the way indicates the difficulty of entry. Disciples must accept self-sacrifice and suffering if they are to pass through the gate to the eternal city. In Lk. 13:23-24 the image is the different one of the one door (thýra) to a banqueting hall which is now open and will soon be shut (v. 25); the lesson, then, is to enter while there is still time.

C. The Gates of Hades in Mt.16:18. Many peoples in antiquity view the underworld as a land, city, fortress, or prison with strong gates (cf. Babylon, Egypt, and Greece). In the OT we read of the gates of the world of the dead only in Is. 38:10, but cf. the gates of death in Ps. 9:13, or of darkness in Job 38:17, and the bars of the world of the dead in Job 17:16. References to the gates of the world of the dead then occur in Sir. 51:9; Wis. 16:13; Ps. Sol. 16:2; 3 Macc. 5:51. The idea, if not the phrase, is also present in many rabbis. The only NT instance is in the semitism in Mt. 16:18. Here hádēs might be the world of the dead, and the thought might then be that the gates cannot withstand either the church's attack to rescue others or the exodus of believers on the descent or resurrection of Jesus. If the phrase is more figurative, the statement might be either that Peter will not die before the parousia, that death has no power over believers, or that believers will not share the fate of the wicked. In context, the most likely meaning is that the gates of Hades stand for the ungodly forces of the underworld which attack the rock but cannot prevail against it. Later the "gates of Hades" figure especially in references to Christ's descent into Hades, over whose gates he has supreme power (cf. Rev. 1:18). [J. JEREMIAS, VI, 921-28]

pýr [fire], pyróō [to burn, set on fire], pýrōsis [burning, fiery], pýrinos [fiery], pyrrós [fiery-red] pýr.

A. The Greek and Hellenistic World.

I. General Usage.

1. Literal. pýr is "fire" in its various forms and uses, e.g., for burning, lighting, and warming. Fire is a beneficent and civilizing power but also a destructive and terrifying force. In war it destroys ships, cities, etc., but industrially it serves to purify metals etc.

2. Transferred. Fire denotes violence, irresistibility, desire, and yearning. It figures in various expressions, e.g., "pouring oil on flames," "out of the frying pan into the fire."

II. Philosophy. In philosophy fire is one of the two, four, or five elements. For Heraclitus it is the basic material; the world is the play of fire in various forms of change, namely, from fire to water to earth and back again. In Stoicism all reality is physical. The purest substance is a rational firelike breath that shapes, upholds, and overrules all things. The world is a form of the primal fire in an endless cycle. The soul, as fire, continues after death but returns to the primal fire at the cosmic conflagration.

III. Religion.

1. At first fire is an antidote to evil influences. At death polluted fire is put out and new fire brought. Fire forms a part of various ceremonies, e.g., after birth, before assemblies, etc. In some rites living animals are burned on funeral pyres on hilltops. When cremation establishes itself, the belief persists that fire cannot destroy the soul.

2. In the worship of the gods, Hephaistos and Hestia are associated with the fire of the volcano and the fire of the hearth. Pythagoreans regard the central fire as the hearth of the cosmos, and from the sacred national hearth colonists take fire for the hearth in new settlements. Zeus, Hermes, and Dionysus are also associated in different ways with fire. In theophanies fire is an expression of glory. Fiery phenomena also serve as omens, and descriptions of the underworld contain many references to fire, sometimes with a purifying function.

3. Fire plays a big part in the mysteries in connection with purification before initiation. As a source of light it symbolizes the transfer from darkness to light. In the Roman Bacchanalia raving women fling torches into the Tiber. The fire-god Aeon is called the lord of fire and is said to breathe fire, to sow fire, to be strong and joyous in fire, and to be fire-roaring and fire-whirling. For all its destructive aspects, fire is for the most part connected with deity and spirit.

B. Persian Fire Worship. Fire is especially worshipped in Persia. In cosmological dualism fire and the snake represent truth and falsehood. In the human struggle for good conduct, fire is on the good side. Worship is thus paid to it as an embodiment of spiritual divine power. Nothing connected with deformity or death must come into contact with it; thus corpses are exposed to beasts of prey, which embody the world of the evil spirit. In eschatology fire serves the purpose of final testing. All people will go into molten metal, the righteous coming through unscathed, the wicked suffering. The renewed earth will be a smooth, ice-free plain. At first worship is at a flaming altar in the open, but later a temple of fire comes into use, at whose center is the sacred fire that no human hand must touch or human breath defile, so that the priests who tend it wear mittens and gags and use ritually purified wood. From the sacred hearth new fire is fetched to burn in the houses.

C. The OT, Later Judaism, and Gnosticism.

I. The OT.

1. In the LXX, where it occurs some 490 times, pýr usually renders Heb. ’ ēš. Other originals are rare. Some 100 instances occur in works that are only in Greek.

2. Technical Use. In everyday use, fire serves in cooking, manufacture, metal work, war, etc. Kindling fires is forbidden on the sabbath (Ex. 35:3). In the cultus the altar fire is kept burning (Lev. 6:2, 6). It alone is to be used for sacrifice (cf. Lev. 10:1). Offering children is strictly forbidden (Lev. 20:2, but cf. 2 Kgs. 16:3; 21:6). Fire is also a means of purification (Lev. 13:52). In nature, lightning is God’s fire (Job 1:16; Ex. 9:28). In Am. 7:4 ’ēš means summer heat or drought. Job 28:5 compares mining to volcanic activity; the reference may be to “firing,” i.e., prying hard rocks loose with a fire of wood.

3. Transferred Use. Destructive human passions are compared to fire (Prov. 26:20-21; Sir. 28:10-11; Prov. 6:27-28). Fire also represents God’s judicial wrath (Jer. 4:4; Ezek. 21:36; Zeph. 1:18; Nah. 1:6; Ps. 79:5). Various thoughts are present, e.g., the forest fire in Jer. 21:14, the fiery oven in Ps. 21:9, the refining fire in Mal. 3:2, lightning in Lam. 1:13. Irresistibility is a primary concept. Escaping great danger is compared to a brand plucked from the burning in Zech. 3:2. Fire expresses dissolution in Mic. 1:4 and purifying in Is. 1:22. Illumination by fire plays only a very small role (cf. Nah. 2:4).

4. Fire in Relation to God.

a. Theophany. In most OT theophanies fire represents God’s holiness and glory. The fire may be natural (Ex. 19) or it may be the unusual fire of the burning bush (3:2; cf. Judg. 6:21). The pillar of fire represents God’s ongoing presence (Ex. 13:21-22). At Horeb God himself is not in the fire (1 Kgs. 19:12); true revelation is by the word. At the call of Isaiah (ch. 6) fire purges unclean lips. In Ezek. 1:28 fire expresses the divine radiance (cf. Dan. 7).

b. A Means of Judgment. God judges by fire and brimstone in Gen. 19:24. Fire and hail form the seventh plague in Ex. 9:24. Fire from God or from heaven is a phrase for judgment in Lev. 10:2; 2 Kgs. 1:10. Fire smites both Israel’s enemies (Am. 1:4ff.) and disobedient Israel herself (Am. 2:5). Eschatologically, fire is a sign of the day of the Lord (Joel 2:20), it denotes final destruction (Mal. 3:19), and it stands for eternal punishment (Mal. 3:19).

c. A Sign of Grace. Fire indicates God’s gracious acceptance of sacrifices in Gen. 15:17. It plays a role in the taking up of Elijah in 2 Kgs. 2:11. It is a sign of guidance and protection in Ex. 13:21-22 (cf. 2 Kgs. 6:17). It depicts God’s final dwelling among his people in Is. 4:5.

d. A Term for God. The description of God as a consuming fire (Dt. 4:24) denotes his majestic being embracing grace and judgment. In the OT fire is viewed theocentrically rather than cosmologically. It expresses God’s glory in revelation and judgment.

II. Later Judaism.

Heb. Hebrew

1. Apocalyptic. In apocalyptic the stars are called fiery bodies, humans are said to be composed of earth, water, air, and fire, the idea of a cosmic conflagration occurs, angels are fiery beings, and fire represents punishment in the world to come.

2. The Rabbis. Some rabbinic works view fire as preexistent, others speak of its creation. Various forms of fire are distinguished, e.g., fever, the fire of Gabriel, and God's fire, along with other ordinary forms. The law is associated with fire, and fire marks its students, so that the fire of hell has no power over them. The place of the dead becomes a place of fire in punishment of the wicked. Sheol is an intermediate stage, Gehinnom the final place of punishment. Punishments in the intermediate place are for purification, and prayers and almsgiving may shorten or alleviate them. All transgressors in Israel as well as the eternally rejected will go through the intermediate place. Various descriptions are given of the intermediate and final fire, e.g., its heat, intensity, duration, etc. Fire characterizes the heavenly world, e.g., the angels and the finger of God.

3. Qumran. The Qumran works also expect a final fiery judgment on God's enemies. Fire denotes affliction, but there is also an eternal fire of hell. Traces of the idea of a cosmic conflagration may be seen.

4. Hellenistic Judaism.

a. Philo adopts the idea of four elements and depicts the nature and cultural significance of fire after the manner of Greek philosophy. Yet he does not equate the human spirit with fire. For him the penal aspect is less important; in the case of Nadab and Abihu the judgment leads to fellowship with God. His stress on God's transcendence protects him from the fire-monism of Stoicism.

b. Josephus uses fire in the literal sense; he also has pureíon for "fuel" and puretós for "fever."

III. Gnostic Usage.

1. Hermetic Writings. In these works fire denotes the material cosmos, the planetary and demonic sphere, and sensual passion.

2. Coptic Gnostic Works. Here the sublunar world is surrounded by fiery spheres. The ascending soul must pass through the fire zone of the archons. Fiery judgments punish sinners according to their deeds. Along with the baptism of water and the Spirit, there is a baptism of fire.

3. Mandaean Literature. These works contrast living fire and consuming fire. Positively, fire belongs to the victorious and eternal king of light and clothes or crowns his envoys. The soul, too, is living fire. Negatively, consuming or flaming fire is that of material life or judgment. It marks the wicked world, the body, and passion on the one side, eschatological judgment on the other. In one work fire is the root of all things. Visible fire arises out of invisible. Everything material will be dissolved in the final conflagration.

D. The NT.

I. The Earthly Phenomenon. Only rarely does pýr denote the earthly phenomenon in the NT. Lightning is meant in Heb. 1:7, heat in Rev. 16:8, everyday fire in Mk. 9:22, a kind of watchfire in Lk. 22:55, a fire for warming in Acts 28:2ff., fire as a means of execution in Heb. 11:34, and as a weapon of war in Rev. 17:16. There is no cultic fire in the NT (but cf. Rev. 8:5).

II. Figurative Use.

1. Fire is a figure of final judgment (cf. the unfruitful tree in Mt. 3:10, chaff in Mt. 3:12, tares in Mt. 13:40, unfruitful branches in Jn. 15:6). Jms. 5:3 interweaves the material and figurative elements more closely. The testing fire of Prov. 17:3 is applied in 1 Pet. 1:7 to the keeping of hope and faith in afflictions, and in Rev. 3:18 to repentance with a view to true riches.

2. The destructive power of the tongue is a fire in Jms. 3:5; it has the force of cosmic conflagration. The context of Lk. 12:49 suggests that the fire of discord is in view.

III. Theological Use.

1. Theophanies. Stephen alludes to the fire at the bush in Acts 7:30, and Hebrews refers to the divine self-revelation at Sinai in 12:18ff. When Christ appears to Paul, however, there is only light, not fire (Acts 9:3).

2. A Means of Judgment. Fire in temporal judgments occurs only with OT references (cf, Lk. 9:54; 17:26ff.). The NT usually has eschatological fire in view.

a. Fire symbolizes this judgment in Revelation. Fire and hail in 8:7 remind us of the seventh plague. The allusion in 8:8 is to a volcano or a star. The horses of 9:17-18 spew out fire. Divine fire protects the two witnesses in 11:3. In the last days false prophets bring down fire from heaven (13:13). An angel of fire comes forth to execute judgment in 14:18.

b. More directly fire represents the eschatological fire of judgment.

(a) The Baptist portrays judgment in terms of fire in Mt. 3:11.

(b) Jesus perhaps has this fire in mind in the paradox of Mk. 9:49: Those who do not accept God’s judgment by self-denial fall victim to the wrath to come (cf. Mt. 10:39; Mk. 10:25ff.). In Lk. 12:49-50 the one who baptizes with the Spirit and fire must first take the way of suffering himself (cf. v. 50). Judgment is already present in and with Jesus; relationship to him decides between alienation from God and fellowship with him.

(c) pýr denotes final judgment in the three instances in Paul. In 1 Cor. 3:13 the last judgment will disclose the value of Christian service. Poor work will be burned up, but the workers will be saved “as through fire,” i.e., not by purgation but by the skin of their teeth. Combined here are the thoughts of the house on fire, the Lord’s coming with fire, purifying fire, and a narrow escape. In 2 Th. 1:7-8 Jesus will come again with fire; this is plainly the fire of judgment. In Rom. 12:20 Paul quotes Prov. 25:21-22 to back up his call for renunciation of revenge. The idea is that we should avenge ourselves by doing good, but the phrase “coals of fire” carries a secondary reference to the final judgment that will come on enemies if they do not react with a change of heart.

(d) In other NT books pýr is the fire of final judgment in Heb. 12:29. In Rev. 20:9 God inflicts fiery judgment on Gog and Magog in the last struggle. In 2 Pet. 3:7 a final conflagration will end the present world order as the flood overwhelmed the primal world.

c. In the NT fire is often hellfire.

(a) In the sayings of Jesus pýr is the opposite of basileía or zōḗ (Mt. 13:42; 18:8-9,; Mk. 9:43). Mk. 9:49 quotes Is. 66:24, and this verse lies behind the “unquenchable fire” of Mk. 9:43 (cf. the “eternal fire” of Mt. 18:8).

(b) In Jude 7 the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah already suffer hellfire, and in v. 23 the proverbial snatching from the fire denotes saving from hellfire.

(c) In Revelation fire and brimstone denote eternal punishment (14:10). Hell is the abyss in 20:3 and the lake of fire in 19:20; 20:10; 21:8; the imagery may well derive from phenomena at the Dead Sea.

(d) John with its stronger emphasis on present decision does not refer to fire, although a place remains for Christ’s return in judgment.

3. A Sign of Heavenly Glory. Fire signifies heavenly glory in Rev. 1:9ff.: The eyes of the glorified Jesus are as a flame of fire, and his feet are like bronze refined in a furnace (cf. also 2:18). Angels have feet like pillars of fire in 10:1; this denotes their heavenly glory. Fire also expresses the splendor of heaven when 4:5 equates the seven torches with the seven spirits of God. The crystal sea before God’s throne (4:6) is the heavenly counterpart of the molten sea of the temple (1 Kgs. 7:23); it is mingled with fire in 15:2. In Acts 2:3 the comparison with fire indicates the heavenly origin of the descending Spirit. In the main, fire signifies judgment in the NT, but the divine judgment and the divine glory go together. Fire signifies the whole eschatological denouement, whether in hell or in heaven.

E. The Apostolic Fathers.

I. The Biblical Tradition. The apostolic fathers usually follow the biblical tradition, either quoting the Bible (2 Clem. 7.6 etc.) or using fire for the fire of judgment (Ignatius Ephesians 16.2) or hellfire (2 Clem. 17:7). Diog. 8.2 contests the Stoic equation of fire and deity in the light of hellfire. Only 2 Clement and Hermas refer to a cosmic conflagration. As in the OT fire may be a temporal judgment (1 Clem. 11:1). Some martyrs are executed by fire, but this fire cannot really harm them (Mart. Pol. 15- 16). Fire is a test in Hermas Visions 4.3.4; Did. 16.4-5.

II. Alien Influences. The Gnostic opposing of fire and water may be seen in Ignatius Romans 7.2. Fire as love of the world or impulse toward matter occurs in Ignatius Romans 6.2. Diognetus sees in fire one of the elements. For the most part, however, alien factors are slight compared to the strong biblical impact.

A. The Greek World.

1. This word means a. “to burn,” “to destroy with fire,” b. “to treat with fire,” e.g., “to bake,” “to roast,” “to smelt,” “to smoke out,” c. “to make fire” or, passively, “to become fire,” and d. “to be hot to the taste,” “to suffer heartburn.”

2. Figurative senses are “to be incensed” and “to be seized with love.”

B. Judaism.

1. In the LXX the literal sense is late. The most common use is for refining metals, hence for divine testing (Is. 1:25) and certifying (2 Sam. 22:31).

2. Philo uses only the passive either literally, “to be glowing with heat,” or more often figuratively, “to be inflamed with emotion” (good or bad), e.g., thanksgiving, righteous indignation, zeal, passion. Philo combines the thought of divine testing with the Stoic concept of fiery reason.

3. Josephus uses the verb only in the literal sense “to burn.”

4. Qumran refers to the testing of the sect by opposition.

C. The NT.

1. Paul uses the verb only in the figurative and the passive for being inflamed with emotion. In 1 Cor. 7:9 it is better to marry than to burn with desire. In 2 Cor. 11:29 Paul is consumed with sympathy when a member of the church is offended. An attack on the church is an attack on him.

2. The Christian armor of Eph. 6:11ff. includes the shield of faith which can quench the fiery darts of the wicked. The thought is that of the conflict between believers and the hosts of Belial (cf. Qumran).

3. A literal sense occurs in 2 Pet. 3:12 in depiction of the final conflagration.

4. Revelation adopts the OT metaphor of the testing of precious metals. In 3:18 purified gold signifies genuine faith and salvation. This metaphor helps us to understand the expression in 1:15.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. The reference in Mart. Pol. 15.2 is to the metals, not the furnace. Hermas Visions 4.3.4 regards the image of testing gold as a call to help in building the tower.

pýrōsis.

1. This word means “burning,” “baking,” “burning desire,” “fever.”

2. In Prov. 27:21 it means testing in the fire, and in Am. 4:9 the blasting of crops.

3. Josephus uses it for the punishment of Sodom (Antiquities 1.203).

4. In Rev. 18:9 pýrōsis denotes the destruction of Babylon by fire. A testing by fire is the point in 1 Pet. 4:12; a link is seen here with the coming revelation of Christ in glory (v. 13).

5. The idea of a future trial by fire is present in Did. 16.5.

1. This word means “fiery” and occurs for fiery bodies, things that are fiery hot, or, figuratively, great violence.

2. In the LXX, where it is rare, the term denotes the radiance of heavenly phenomena (Ezek. 28:14, 16).

3. The only NT instance is in Rev. 9:17, where the riders wear fiery breastplates, i.e., either the color of fire or engulfed in the fire from their mouths. The description shows that they are destructive demonic beings.

pyrrós.

1. This word means “fiery-red” or “flame-colored.” It is used for hair, for the manes of lions etc., for the bloodshot eyes of dogs, and for blushes.

2. The LXX uses the term for the red pottage of Gen. 25:30, the red heifer of Num. 19:2, the water red like blood of 2 Kgs. 3:22, and the red horses of Zech. 1:8.

3. Philo does not use the word but Josephus has it in Antiquities 1.34.

4. The colors of the horsemen in Rev. 6:1ff. are based on those of Zechariah. The rider on the red horse causes war and bloodshed. The red color of the fiery dragon of 12:3 signifies his bellicose and bloodthirsty character.

5. In the apostolic fathers 1 Clem. 8:3 is based on Is. 1:18, although the expression in v. 4 is a proverbial one. [F. LANG, VI, 928-52]

pýrgos [tower]

1. pýrgos has such senses as a “tower,” “fortress,” “siege-tower,” “castle,” “column (of an army),” “high building,” and in the papyri “outbuildings.”

2. In the LXX the pýrgos is usually a “tower,” “citadel,” “tower on a city wall,” or “watchtower.”

3. Philo construes the tower of Babel symbolically. Josephus often mentions various kinds of fortifications. The pseudepigrapha use the term to characterize the sojourning of the patriarchs among the Gentiles. Qumran has a tower and walls, and these are common metaphors in the Scrolls.

4. In the NT the pýrgos of the parable in Mk. 12:1 is a field tower (cf. Is. 5:2). The tower of Lk. 13:4 that collapsed must have been of some size. The reference in Lk. 14:28 is probably to a lofty private dwelling, unless “outbuildings” are meant, as often in the papyri.

5. In Barn. 16.5 the tower in context seems to be for flocks. In Hermas the allegories of the tower relate to the church. [F. MICHAELIS, VI, 953-56]

pyréssō [to have a fever], pyretós [fever]

1. The word pyretós describes the symptom of “fever.” Greek medicine distinguishes types of fever, and ascribes them to natural causes. Popular belief thinks gods or demons can both cause and cure fevers.

2. OT words for “fever” also have to do with burning, and some rabbinic statements see in fevers threats of divine judgment. The LXX seldom uses pyretós (Dt. 28:22) and never pyréssō.

3. The rabbis know the distinctions of Greek medicine and the suggested natural causes and remedies, but they tend to regard fevers as demonically or divinely caused.

LXX Septuagint

NT New Testament

cf. confer, compare

OT Old Testament

4. The NT mentions pyretós three times among the sicknesses cured by Jesus or the apostles (Mk. 1:30-31; Jn. 4:52; Acts 28:8). Only Acts 28:8 shows what fever is meant, i.e., feverish dysentery. The Lucan parallel to Mk. 1:30-31 describes the fever as a serious one. Religious forces are associated with the fevers in all three cases, whether in the form of demonic influence or divine punishment. The fevers are thus overcome by the invocation of God or Christ, who, taking on himself the penalty of sin, drives out demons by the finger of God (Lk. 11:20). The healing of fevers demonstrates the dominion of Christ over sin and the devil and is thus a sign that awakens faith (Jn. 4:53-54) in the messianic salvation that he brings (Mt. 11:4-5) and the dawn of God's eschatological rule. The resuming of the daily round in Mk. 1:31 suggests the restoration of the state of creation. [K. WEISS, VI, 956-59]

pṓlos [young (ass)]

1. Related to "foal," pṓlos is used for the young of a horse or ass, then of other animals, e.g., the elephant, camel, swallow, etc., also figuratively boy or girl. Pṓlos is also a proper name.

2. In the OT the term is used for young asses in Gen. 32:16 (cf. also in parallelism Gen. 49:11 and Zech. 9:9).

3. In later rabbinic tradition, which has various words for the young ass, the bull and ass are messianic images.

4. In Mk. 11:2ff. Jesus enters Jerusalem on a pṓlos (cf. Gen. 49:11). Lk. 19:30ff. also uses pṓlos. Mt. 21:2ff. refers to a she-ass and a colt. Jn. 12:15 quotes Zech. 9:9 LXX. The messianic significance of the term is plain. [O. MICHEL, VI, 959-61]

pōróō, pṓrōsis → pýr

rhábbi [rabbi], rhabbouní [master]

A. Judaism.

1. The term raḇ denotes one who holds a respected position, e.g., an official. It is used by an inferior to a superior. Students use it in addressing their teachers, but it may also be used for the Messiah or for God as Lord of the world.

2. The use for teachers goes back to the second century B.C. Students follow their teachers with respectful obedience. When qualified to teach, they themselves are given the title, which the people as a whole also uses. It occurs on many inscriptions from Palestine, Syria, Cyprus, and Italy.

B. The NT.

1. In the NT rhábbi occurs only in the Gospels. Mt. 23:7 censures the scribes for desiring the title. The Baptist is called rhábbi in Jn. 3:26.

2. Jesus is called rhábbi by Peter in Mk. 9:5 and Judas in 14:45. The term didáskalos in Mk. 4:38; 9:17, etc. has the same force. John explains the use in 1:38. Jesus is addressed as rhábbi in 1:49; 3:2; 4:31; 6:25; 9:2; 11:8. rhabbouní in Mk. 10:51 and Jn. 20:16 is an alternative form. The use of rhábbi shows that Jesus

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

is viewed as a teacher by his disciples and the people. He differs from an ordinary scribe in that he chooses his own disciples and teaches authoritatively. Since the disciples never become rabbis as Jesus is, he also has a unique status as their kýrios (Mt. 8:25; 20:33).

3. As the Palestinian tradition becomes less prominent, rhábbi does not occur in other Christian writings. [E. LOHSE, VI, 961-65]

rhábdos [rod, staff, stick], rhabdízō [to strike with a stick], rhabdoúchos [police with clubs] rhábdos.

A. Outside the NT.

I. The Meaning in Greek.

1. This word means “staff,” “rod,” “stick,” “sceptre.” It may be used for a riding switch, a magician’s rod, an official staff, an angler’s rod or pole, a lime twig to catch birds, a metal plate, a stripe in clothes, the shaft of a spear, the shoot of a tree, or a line of poetry.

2. In the LXX the term is used generally for a staff or rod, and specifically for a stick, a shepherd’s staff, a staff for walkers or the elderly, a magician’s rod, an angel’s wand, or a sceptre.

B. The NT.

1. The term is used for a surveyor’s measuring rod in Rev. 11:1 (cf. Ezek. 40:3ff.). This verse promises that the community will come through the last time unscathed.

2. The meaning in 1 Cor. 4:21 is the teacher’s stick for beating. Since Jewish teachers use straps, the Hellenistic teacher is in view.

3. In Rev. 2:27; 12:5; 19:15 (cf. Ps. 2:9) the reference is to the shepherd’s staff, which often has an iron point. The disciple will carry the staff in 2:27, but Christ himself will carry it according to the other two verses.

4. In Mk. 6:8 Jesus allows his disciples to take a traveler’s staff (though cf. Mt. 10:10; Lk. 9:3). The staff is normally carried by itinerant teachers, whether Cynics or rabbis, and is necessary on long journeys in the Near East.

5. In Heb. 11:21 the author follows the LXX (Gen. 47:31) and refers to the staff which is a common feature of old age (cf. Greek vases, rabbinic works).

6. Heb. 9:4 speaks of Aaron’s rod that buds, but without saying what its prototype is in the heavenly temple. It is mentioned by Philo and Josephus, and is associated with the ark in Jewish works, which say that it was created on the evening of the first sabbath, serves as a sceptre, and will return in the messianic kingdom. In Ignatius Trallians 11.2 it becomes the wood of the cross, and in later saga it is a sign of pardoning grace.

7. In Heb. 1:8 Christ holds the sceptre of legitimate divine government.

8. The NT does not mention the magician’s rod, but cf. Hermas Visions 3.2.4 and the art of the catacombs, which portrays Jesus with a rod when he feeds the crowd and raises the dead.

rhabdízō.

1. This word means “to strike with a stick,” “to scourge,” “to thresh,” “to beat down.”

2. The only LXX use is for “to thresh” (Judg. 6:11; Ruth 2:17).

3. Paul uses the term in 2 Cor. 11:25 for his three beatings (cf. Acts 16:22, where the beating is a means of police coercion, is probably public, and is illegal in Paul’s case, although he protests against it only later).

rhabdoúchos. This word is used of police with cudgels, referees, supervisors at religious festivals, and ladies accompanying a princess. In Acts 16:35, 38 it refers to the police at Philippi who report to the magistrates and who seem to escort Paul out of the city as a mark of respect. [C. SCHNEIDER, VI, 966-71]

rhadioúrgēma [deception, transgression], rhadiourgía [falsification, wickedness]

The term rhadiourgós comes from rhádios in the sense of "unburdened," and denotes lack of self-discipline, drifting, ethical carelessness. rhadioúrgēma comes into use for deception and then for all kinds of transgressions, while rhadiourgía denotes negligence, falsification, wickedness. In Acts 18:14 the proconsul is interested only in vicious crime. In Acts 13:10 the wickedness of Elymas implies a loosening of all moral restraints as a result of his association with the devil in magic and pseudoprophecy. [O. BAUERNFEIND, VI, 972-73]

rhaká [blockhead, fool]

1. Derivation. In spite of the double a, this term derives from an Aramaic term of abuse. Matthew does not translate it in Mt. 5:22; he is thus writing for readers who speak Greek but will be familiar with the term (probably in Syria).

2. The Aramaic term expresses disparagement accompanied by anger and contempt. Addressed to the foolish, thoughtless, or presumptuous person, it means "blockhead," and is the most common term of abuse in Jesus' day.

3. The structure of Mt. 5:21-22 shows that the reference is to three ascending forms of the same penalty rather than to three courts, and that the sins that are equivalent to murder are all sins of the tongue arranged in a kind of crescendo: Whoso is angry, says "blockhead," or says "fool," deserves to be punished with death, to be condemned to death, to suffer death in hell.

This paradox whereby apparently harmless words are put on a par with murder shows how very serious sins of the tongue are in God's eyes, and it carries a warning against ill feelings that may seem innocuous but poison relationships. Against authenticity it is argued that there is no true crescendo from wrath to insult, but it should be noted that the speech, style, and outlook are all Palestinian and that the teaching accords with Mk. 7:15; Mt. 12:36-37. [J. JEREMIAS, VI, 973-76]

rhantízō [to sprinkle], rhantismós [sprinkling]

A. Meaning in Greek.

1. rhantízo is a rare and late form of rhaínō, which is used for spraying or sprinkling something on something or something with something.

2. rhantismós has not been found in nonbiblical usage.

B. The OT.

I. Linguistic Data.

1. rhantízō occurs three times in the OT and rhaínō 13 times; rhaínō is the preferred cultic term. The more common use is for sprinkling something on something (cf. the Hebrew). Mostly sprinkled are blood, oil, and water, but we also find solids in Prov. 7:17 and righteousness in Is. 45:8.

2. The usual Hebrew original is nzh, which is usually rendered rhaínō, and means "to sprinkle," "to be sprinkled," or "to cause to sprinkle." For other terms rhaínō and compounds have such senses as "to gush out" in Ezek. 36:25, "to pour forth" in Is. 45:8, "to strew" in Prov. 7:17.

3. rhantismós occurs only in the expressions "water of sprinkling" or "of cleansing." It stresses the process, whereas the Hebrew stresses the purpose.

II. Material Aspects.

1. The secular uses play only a minor role in the OT (cf. 2 Kgs. 9:33; Is. 63:3; 52:15; Prov. 7:17).

2. The cultic uses predominates. Blood, oil, and water are used in cultic sprinkling, the sanctuary, people, and objects are sprinkled, cleansing and dedication are the purposes, and contact with the dead, making the covenant, offering for sin, and the consecration of priests are the occasions. Water is usually qualified ("of cleansing"), may be mixed with ashes, hyssop, etc., and is used after defilement, e.g., with a dead body, a leper, etc. Oil is used (at times with blood) for consecration. Blood is used at sacrifices as part of the offering, or in purification. The main concept in sprinkling is that of cleansing and expiation, as in Lev. 16 and Num. 19.

3. In Ps. 51:7 a ritual underlies the metaphor (cf. Is. 1:18) but the reference is to purifying by God. In Ezek. 36:25 God's sprinkling signifies his eschatological recreation of the people (cf. vv. 26-27). In Is. 45:8 the pouring down of righteousness is an eschatological promise.

4. Though the group is not used in Ex. 24:8, the sprinkling of the blood of the covenant establishes fellowship between the covenant partners and seals the covenant.

C. The NT.

1. The only firmly attested examples in the NT are five in Hebrews and one in 1 Peter. The verb rhantízō occurs in Heb. 9:13, 19, 21; 10:22: "to sprinkle something with something." The noun rhantismós occurs in Heb. 12:24; 1 Pet. 1:2. "Blood of sprinkling" in Heb. 12:24 is analogous to "water of sprinkling" in the OT.

2. OT cultic use governs the use in the NT. Sprinkling with Christ's blood is compared to OT rites; as expiatory blood it has more force than that of Abel in Heb. 12:24. The reference in Heb. 9:18ff. is to the conclusion of the covenant at Sinai. Christ's blood takes on meaning as the blood of the eternal covenant (13:20) in the light of the Sinai ritual (cf. 9:20). Heb. 9:13-14 has the Day of Atonement in view. The blood of this day can cleanse only the sárx in contrast to Christ's blood, which purifies the conscience. Since the blood of the Day of Atonement is not sprinkled on the people, the cleansing ashes of the red heifer are set alongside it in this context. Sprinkling plays an essential role in the NT as in the OT, both for cleansing and for the conclusion of the covenant, but since the sprinkled blood is Christ's the use is figurative and the cleansing is immeasurably superior, for now the heavenly high priest with his own blood purifies his people and brings them into the new and eternal covenant. The second half of Heb. 10:22 shows that baptism is associated with this sprinkling inasmuch as it signifies the granting of participation in the atoning, purifying, and covenant-making power of the blood of Christ.

3. 1 Pet. 1:2 also seems to have baptism in mind (cf. the sanctification by the Spirit and the pledging to obedience, which are here put first; cf. Acts 10:44ff. and the liturgical order). This verse shows that the idea of sprinkling with Christ's blood is not peculiar to Hebrews but is part of an early baptismal tradition.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. The only references in these works are in Barn. 5.1, Barn. 8.1ff. (a typological interpretation of Num. 19), 1 Clem. 18:7 (quoting Ps. 51:1ff.), and Hermas Similitudes 9.10.3 (rhaínō in the secular sense of "cleaning"). [C.-H. HUNZINGER, VI, 976-84]

rhíza [root], rhizóō [to cause to take root], ekrizóō [to uproot] rhíza.

---

vv. verses

1. Secular Greek. This word means literally “root” of a plant, figuratively “foot” of a mountain, historically “founding” of a city, genealogically “origin” or “stem” of a family, cosmologically “origin” of things (i.e., the earth), and psychologically the soul as our “origin.”

2. The LXX. In the LXX the word is fairly common but is seldom used for “root” or for such things as the “foot” of a mountain (Jdt. 6:13) or “depths” of the sea (Job 36:30). The phrase “root and branch” occurs in Job 28:9; 31:12. Mostly the use is figurative and refers to the roots of the righteous or the unrighteous with references to firm rootage (Prov. 12:3), good soil (12:12), and ample water (Job 29:19). God has planted Israel in good soil (Is. 5:1ff.; Ps. 80:8ff.). Ezek. 16:3 alludes to the historical origin of Israel. From its root a fallen tree may renew itself (Job 14:7ff.). The abiding root symbolizes the holy remnant (Is. 6:13). Is. 11:1ff. refers to the root of Jesse in a messianic sense. From this house will come the new shoot that will establish the kingdom of righteousness and peace. In v. 1 the genitive is one of apposition, but in v. 10 it is one of origin. Is. 53:2 perhaps carries the same messianic sense, although the traditional LXX rendering compares the proclamation rather than the Servant to a root.

3. Later Judaism. The concept of Israel as God’s plant is common. The planting goes back to Abraham as its root. Israel is the race of the elect root. God will plant righteous Gentiles in Israel. The idea of the Messiah as the root of Jesse is also common. Some conclude from Is. 11:10 that it is the Gentiles that need the Messiah; Israel has the law. Philo does not refer to the Davidic shoot. For him the metaphor of the root is a stylistic device. Thus the Ten Commandments are the root of individual statutes.

4. The NT. Of the 17 NT instances, eight are in the Synoptics, six in Paul, one in Hebrews, and two in Revelation. In Mk. 4:6 and parallels the root that needs good ground is the source of sap for the plant. Mk. 4:17 gives the idea of a personal reference. Mal. 3-4 forms the background of Mt. 3:10 and Lk. 3:9. Israel as God’s plant is threatened with complete destruction if she does not repent. In Rom. 11:16ff. the Gentiles are warned not to give up fallen Israel, for the special position of Israel is the premise of all expectation; the branches depend on the root. Israel here is not just Christian Israel. The patriarchs are probably in view in v. 16. As the root, these were chosen with salvation in Christ as the goal. Their holiness embraces all Israel and cannot be cancelled even by Israel’s guilt. Against nature, the Gentiles have been grafted in as wild branches, but this process demands and promotes the planting in again of the good branches. Gentiles scorn their own root if they scorn Israel. In Rom. 15:12 Paul quotes Is. 11:10: The root of Jesse is the one in whom the Gentiles hope. Is. 11:10 also lies behind the title “root of David” in Rev. 5:5; 22:16 in the sense of “shoot out of David.” Figurative use occurs in 1 Tim. 6:10 when it describes the love of money as the root or origin of all evil. Heb. 12:15 also offers a figurative use (cf. Dt. 29:17 LXX). In this case we have the passive sense of “shoot.” The bitter root springs from apostasy from grace, and involves defiling conflict.

5. The Apostolic Fathers. Hermas Similitudes 9.30.1-2 uses the plural for the “feet” of the mountain, and 9.1.6 compares doubters and nominal believers to plants whose upper parts are still green but whose roots are withered. Pol. 1.2 offers a positive counterpart to 1 Tim. 6:10.

1. This word means “to cause to take root,” or in the passive “to take root.”

2. The LXX has the active for unrighteousness and wisdom taking root in Sir. 3:28; 24:12, and the passive with reference to princes in Is. 40:24.

3. Philo speaks of rooted virtue (Allegorical Interpretation of Laws 1.45) and the rooted cosmos (On Noah’s Work as a Planter 11).

4. In the NT Col. 2:7 and Eph. 3:17 refer to the personal rootage of believers. In Christ they find life-giving soil and also their sustaining foundation (“rooted and built up”).

v. verse

ekrizóō. This word, meaning "to uproot," is used literally in Lk. 17:6 and in the parable in Mt. 13:29. The reference in Mt. 15:13 and Jude 12 is to judgment on the Pharisees and false teachers. 1 Clem. 6.4 shows how strife extirpates great peoples, and Hermas Mandates 9.9 how doubt uproots faith. [C. MAURER, VI, 985-91]

rhíptō [to throw], epiríptō [to throw on], aporíptō [to throw oneself

A. Greek Usage. rhíptō means "to throw," "to cast to the ground," "to throw away," "to cast off."

B. OT Usage.

1. Hebrew Terms. rhíptō is mostly used for Heb. šlk (61 times), for which aporíptō is also used 20 times and epiríptō 14 times.

2. God's Throwing. God throws stones at Israel's enemies in Josh. 10:11, casts off the people in Jer. 22:26, casts down kings in Is. 14:19, repels or rejects in Jon. 2:4, casts sins behind him in Is. 38:17.

3. Human Throwing. Literally Joseph's brothers cast him in the well in Gen. 37:20, and the dust of the overthrown altars is thrown into the water in Dt. 9:21. Figuratively Jeroboam rejects God in 1 Kgs. 14:9, and the righteous cast their care on God in Ps. 55:22.

C. NT Usage.

1. rhíptō. In Mt. 15:30 the sick are cast at the feet of Jesus, in 27:5 Judas throws the money into the temple, in Lk. 4:35 the demon throws the man down when exorcised, in 17:2 those who harm little ones are threatened with destruction, in Acts 22:23 the throwing off of clothes expresses resolve, and in Mt. 9:36 the people are like sheep lying on the ground without a shepherd.

2. epiríptō. 1 Pet. 5:7 echoes Ps. 55:22 but with a reference to the community, which under God's lordship may cast all its care on God.

3. aporíptō. This verb is used intransitively in Acts 27:43: "throw oneself."

D. Apostolic Fathers. Hermas Visions 3.2.7 speaks of the throwing away of stones as a symbol of rejection, and Similitudes 2.3 uses rhíptō to show that the vine can lie on the ground without the elm's support. The exposing of infants is meant in Diog. 5.6. Barn. 4.8 is modeled on Ex. 32:19 (cf. 14.8). [W. BIEDER, VI, 991-93]

rhomphaía [sword]

A. Outside the NT.

1. This word denotes a Thracian weapon, a large javelin, lance, or sword.

2. Uncommon in Greek, the word occurs some 230 times in the LXX, mostly in the sense of "sword" rather than "spear" (cf. Gen. 3:24; 1 Sam. 17:45).

3. Philo is influenced by LXX usage, e.g., in relation to Gen. 3:24. Josephus, too, follows the LXX, and the term also occurs in the pseudepigrapha, although the rabbis do not have it as a loanword, as they do máchaira and xíphos.

B. The NT.

1. The NT has máchaira 27 times but also, under LXX influence, has rhomphaía seven times. The aged Simeon in Lk. 2:34-35 looks ahead to the destiny of Jesus which will also bring sorrow to his mother.

Heb. Hebrew

Ps. 37:15 (rather than Ezek. 14:21) perhaps underlies the saying. Any likeness to Sib. 3.316 is purely formal.

2. The other six instances are in Revelation. The only literal use is in 6:8, where rhomphaía, as distinct from máchaira in 6:4, perhaps denotes murder. In 1:16; 2:12, 16; 19:15, 21 the sword proceeds from Christ's mouth. With this sword, i.e., his word, he judges and if necessary punishes the churches. With it he is also the eschatological judge of the nations. Judgment begins at God's house, and although its severity is stressed, the only weapon used is the word.

C. The Apostolic Fathers. The only example in the apostolic fathers is in Barn. 5.13 (quoting Ps. 22:20). Justin uses the term six times in OT quotations. [W. MICHAELIS, VI, 993-98]

rhýomai [to save, protect]

A. Basic Meaning.

1. This word has such senses as "to save," "to protect," "to guard," "to ward off," "to deliver."

2. The LXX uses the word more often than sṓzō for Heb. nsl (84 times). It also uses it 12 times for g'l, "to release," "to buy back." It is used, too, for other terms meaning "to free," "to redeem," and "to keep."

B. Use.

I. Greek.

1. A first use of the verb in Greek is for keeping or saving by the gods, whether of people or of cities, walls, the land, etc.

2. People, too, offer protection, e.g., princes, warriors, priests, guards, nations. Objects like helmets or walls also protect. But human protection is limited, as indeed is that of the gods in the face of destiny.

II. The OT.

1. Similarities to Greek Usage. God's saving and keeping is in many ways parallel to that of the Greek gods. The OT also refers to human deliverers, e.g., Moses, the judges, and the king in 2 Sam. 19:10.

2. Distinctiveness of OT Usage. God, however, is not limited by ontological laws as are both mortals and immortals among the Greeks. He saves according to his mercy (Neh. 9:8), for his name's sake (Ps. 79:9), and as he wills. His very name is Deliverer (Is. 63:16). Again, his salvation is not magical but personal. As a salvation in history, it always relates to the community or to individuals as deliverance from situations caused by the hostile intent of others. It means preservation in God's gracious presence; hence faith or trust is demanded on the human side (Ps. 22:4-5). This faith has ethical implications; it goes hand in hand with obedience (cf. Ps. 34:19). Yet God also saves when guilt is confessed (Ps. 39:8). The understanding in terms of will or person tends to expunge the Greek distinction between "protect" and "deliver" and to rule out the use of the term for salvation by things, e.g., walls, weapons, or money, which can be no more than instruments in God's hands.

III. The NT.

1. The word is uncommon in the NT. In the Gospels it occurs only in Mt. 6:13; 27:43; Lk. 1:74, in Paul only three times in Romans, three in 2 Cor. 1:10, and once each in Colossians, 1 Thessalonians, and 2 Thessalonians (cf. also three times in 2 Timothy and two in 2 Peter).

2. The meaning in the NT is always "to save" with God as subject and persons as object. In seven instances there are OT quotations or allusions.

3. The term takes on an eschatological sense in Mt. 6:13; Rom. 11:26; Col. 1:13; 1 Th. 1:10; 2 Tim. 4:18; 2 Pet. 2:9. Salvation is ultimately eternal preservation. Eschatological salvation rests on present deliverance from sin and from the power that rules in this sinful aeon. Prayer is made for final preservation (Mt. 6:13) but with the confidence that God is the Lord who impresses even evil into his service, so that in the very prayer for deliverance evil is overcome by the divinely conferred affirmation of God's will. [W. KASCH, VI, 998-1003]

σ s

sábbaton [the sabbath], sabbatismós [sabbath rest], paraskeuḗ [day of preparation] sábbaton, paraskeuḗ.

A. The Sabbath in the OT.

1. Origin. The sabbath law is found in Ex. 34:21; 23:12; 20:8ff.; Dt. 5:12ff.; Lev. 23:1ff.; 19:3; 26:2; Ex. 31: 12ff.; 35:1ff. Parallels have been found in Babylon, but in connection with the cycle of the moon and as a day of penance. The meaning and content of the OT sabbath are controlled by Israel's faith.

2. The Preexilic Age. The sabbath commandment enjoins absolute rest for all, including servants and animals, on the ground that God made heaven and earth and also redeemed Israel. On the sabbath (and new moon) business stops, offerings are made, feasts are held, and the man of God may be consulted (2 Kgs. 4:23).

3. The Postexilic Period. In the exile circumcision and the sabbath are important marks of distinction (Ezek. 20:12). Sabbath desecration has been a cause of the disaster (20:13). Details about sabbath rest are worked out (cf. Ezek. 45:17; Neh. 13:15ff.). The rules of Ex. 35:3; 16:22ff.; Lev. 24:8 are enforced. Keeping the sabbath holy is pleasing to God (Is. 58:13-14).

4. The Sabbatical Year. The Seventh Year brings remission of all legal and financial obligations, the duty of leaving the land fallow, and the redistribution of property. In the fiftieth year, the Year of Jubilee, slaves are to be freed. It seems unlikely that all these regulations were strictly kept.

B. The Sabbath in Judaism.

1. Development of the Sabbath.

a. Usage. Judaism takes over the sabbath, using the Hebrew or Aramaic term in Palestine and the Greek term sábbaton (with anápausis as an explanation) in the diaspora. The plural tá sábbata may mean one sabbath, several sabbaths, or the whole week (like the Hebrew term). "Seventh day" is also used for the sabbath. The verb sabbatízein occurs for keeping the sabbath.

b. The Maccabean Period to the Editing of the Mishnah. The sabbath is a sign of election and grants a foretaste of glory. Even the wicked in Gehenna enjoy respite on it. There is a great reward for observing it. It stands at the heart of the law; hence the Maccabean struggle to keep it, even to the point of refusing to attack enemies on the sabbath. Rules about journeys, driving or rescuing cattle, drawing water, moving vessels, and the like are developed in different circles, although the Pharisees and scribes try to adjust the laws to practical situations. Hellenistic Judaism invests the sabbath with philosophical significance in presenting it to the Gentile world (cf. the cosmological importance of the number seven, or the sabbath as a day for philosophizing).

2. The Prohibition of Work.

a. Jubilees and the Damascus Document. Jubilees lists activities that are forbidden on the sabbath on penalty of death, e.g., preparing food, drawing water, fetching, and carrying. The Damascus Document restricts travel and forbids rescuing from pits, driving cattle, and making sacrifices other than the burnt offering.

b. Rabbinic Works. The rabbis give even more detailed lists of what is prohibited, forty save one tasks in all, but extended by grouping six subsidiary tasks under each main one. The tasks include plowing, threshing, sewing, hunting, writing, carrying, riding, climbing trees, judging. Casuistry fixes what is permissible, e.g., carrying small objects, carrying for minute distances, or carrying shared burdens. In this way a fence is kept around the law but the rules are brought into harmony with practical necessities.

c. Superseding of the Sabbath Law. Inescapable obligations supersede the sabbath law. Thus priests may prepare and sacrifice the burnt offerings. The sabbath may be broken when a person is in mortal danger (cf. self-defense, or helping in grave sickness or childbirth). Circumcision also takes precedence over the sabbath.

3. The Celebration.

a. At Home. All things are made ready the previous day, e.g., the meal or the lamps. Three trumpet blasts herald the sabbath. A meal of dedication introduces the day; at this meal the cup of blessing is followed by a second cup of consecration. As a feast day the sabbath is a day for three meals instead of the usual two; the main meal comes at midday after worship, and guests are often invited. A special blessing closes the day.

b. Worship on the Sabbath. The appointed offerings are made in the temple, more priests being needed than on other days. The change in courses takes place on the sabbath. Synagogue services, including recitation of the Shema, prayer, Scripture readings, and exposition, take place. For public reading, the Pentateuch is divided into sections in one- or three-year cycles. A reading from the prophets concludes the service (sometimes with an exposition).

c. Non-Jewish Views of the Sabbath. In the Roman world Jews are allowed to keep the sabbath unhindered. Some Greek and Latin authors, however, ridicule the sabbath as a day of sloth, or explain it as an unlucky day, or equate it with pagan practices. Yet many Gentiles are impressed by the observance, and God-fearers as well as proselytes join in keeping the sabbath as a day of rest.

4. The Sabbatical Year

a. Fallow Ground and Remission of Debts. Strict attempts are made to keep the rule of a fallow year, leading to hardship in difficult times. The Romans remit taxes during this seventh year. Remission of debts is less strictly observed, since lenders will advance money only on the condition that they be allowed to collect at any time.

b. The Cosmic Week and Sabbath. Apocalyptic makes much play with the number seven (cf. the 70 weeks of Dan. 9:24ff.). Slav. En. 33:1-2 refers to the seven millennia of world history; the seventh millennium will be a great sabbath and will be followed by the new creation.

C. The Sabbath in the NT.

1. The Jewish Sabbath. NT usage agrees with Jewish usage; the sabbath is tó sábbaton, hē hēméra toú sabbátou, tá sábbata, or hē hebdómē. Observance is in keeping with what is known from Jewish sources: the body of Jesus is buried prior to the sabbath (Mk. 15:42ff.), plucking ears of grain is forbidden (Mk. 2:23-24), those not in danger of death are not to be helped or healed (Mk. 3:1 etc.), objects are not to be carried (Jn. 5:9-10), travel is restricted (Acts 1:12), priestly work (Mt. 12:4-5) and circumcision (Jn. 7:22-23) are permissible, the sabbath is a day of rest (Lk. 23:56), guests are invited (Lk. 14:1), Scripture is read (Acts 13:15, 27), worship is held in the synagogue (Lk. 4:16ff.), and expositions are given (Acts 13:14-15, 42ff.; 16:13).

2. Jesus and the Sabbath.

a. The Gospel stories. In Mk. 2-3 conflict arises between Jesus and the Pharisees over the plucking of ears of grain on the sabbath (2:23ff.). Jesus shows from the OT that on occasion the righteous may infringe sabbath rules. In principle human needs are more important than the sabbath (2:27). Jesus is its Lord and decides when the sabbath applies and when it is to be transcended (2:28). Mt. 12:1ff. adds that the sacrifices take precedence over the sabbath commandment, and that in Jesus one who is greater than the temple is present, whose law of mercy or of love (Hos. 6:6) imposes an even more imperious command. A second confrontation then takes place with the healing of Mk. 3:1ff. The rule that healing is permitted only when there is danger of death is obviously broken, but doing good and saving life are imperatives that leave no room for casuistry. Jesus, then, displays his lordship by healing the withered arm. Mt. 12:9ff.

presses home the supremacy of human needs by the comparison with helping animals in distress, which some rabbis, although not all, permit even on the sabbath.

b. Lucan Stories. Lk. 13:10ff. and 14:13ff. contain two other stories of sabbath healings. In the former, comparison is made with the feeding of animals, and the story serves to stress the impenitence of Jesus' adversaries (cf. vv. 1-9). In 14:1ff. the story demonstrates yet again the supremacy of human need. The sabbath conflicts in Luke form part of the movement which by way of resistance and rejection leads from an initial synagogue ministry to the Gentile mission.

c. Johannine Stories. Two healings in John lead to sharp controversy. In Jn. 5 the carrying of the bed involves infringement of the prohibition of carrying. Jesus replies by pointing to God's own work on the sabbath, which both Palestinian and Hellenistic Jews accept. Authorized by the father, Jesus works as God does. Hence the decisive issue is whether Jesus is recognized as the one who has transcendent authority in virtue of his divine sending. The debate continues in 7:19ff., where Jesus appeals to the giving of circumcision on the sabbath. Again, the ultimate issue is the divine sending of Jesus. His work expresses his divine authority (vv. 16-17). In answer to human need, this authority overrides sabbath legislation. Jesus in 9:1ff. breaks the sabbath not only by healing but also by kneading the spittle into clay. To some this shows him to be a sinner, but to others his works prove the contrary. In the healing, Jesus comes as the light of the world (9:5) in encounter with whom decision is made as to who is really blind and who really sees. For those who have eyes to see, God's work is manifest in this granting of sight to blind eyes.

3. The Sabbath in the Churches. Christ rises on the first day of the week (Mk. 16:2; Mt. 28:1), the day of Christian worship (Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2; cf. Rev. 1:10). Jewish Christians still keep the sabbath (cf. Mt. 24:20), as at first they make offerings in the temple and pay the temple tax (Mt. 5:23; 17:24ff.). Judaizers try to force the same rules on Gentile Christians, but Paul resists them (cf. Gal. 4:8ff.; Rom. 10:4). Among the Colossians a strange syncretism combines keeping the sabbath with angel worship and asceticism in subjection to cosmic forces. In reply, the apostle points out that believers are dead with Christ to all such forces and are thus freed from bondage to them. Neither the supposed necessity of the law to salvation nor the dominion of cosmic powers obliges Christians to keep the sabbath law.

D. The Sabbath and the Early Church.

1. Sabbath and Sunday. The churches observe Sunday as the day of Christ's resurrection (Barn. 15.9; Ignatius Magnesians 9.1; Did. 14.1). There is no obligation to keep the sabbath law. Barn. 2.5 shows that the Lord's Day is superior to the sabbath, and although Barn. 15 looks ahead to the seventh millennium as a cosmic sabbath, Christians keep the eighth day as the beginning of the new creation.

2. The Jewish Week. The church takes over the Jewish week, which runs from the first day to the sabbath, and it even uses sábbaton or sábbata for the week, and calls the sixth day prosábbaton and the seventh sábbaton. Catechumens bathe on the fifth day, fast on the day of preparation, assemble on the sabbath, and receive baptism early on Easter Day.

3. The Sabbath. Jewish Christians cling to the sabbath, citing its general observance by Jesus, and in some cases combining Gnostic ideas with it. The main body of the church worships on the first day and warns Jewish Christians not to set the sabbath above this day of Christ's resurrection, which unites all believers as a day of joy and jubilation (cf. Justin Apology 167.7).

sabbatismós. This uncommon word, not found in the OT, occurs in the NT only in Heb. 4:9. The desert generation did not enter into katápausis because of unbelief. Hence the promise of katápausis—rest from enemies and from work—is still to be fulfilled. This sabbath rest (sabbatismós) which remains for God's people will be the perfect sabbath of heavenly blessing toward which the pilgrim community is moving and which will mean cessation from its own labors. In a hortatory thrust the author warns his readers not to miss this prepared and promised rest by disobedience. [E. LOHSE, VII, 1-35]

Saddoukaíos [Sadducee]

A. Usage. Based on the Hebrew, this word occurs in the NT and Josephus, always in the plural. Not found outside Jewish and Christian works, it refers to different groups and mostly has a disparaging accent.

B. Sadduceeism in Judaism.

I. Origin of the Term.

1. Zadokites and Sadducees.

a. The term Sadducee comes from Zadok, and thus raises the question of the relation between the Zadokites and Sadducees.

b. Zadok, a ruling priest under David, supports Solomon and becomes high priest. His descendants establish a priestly dynasty which gains strength under Josiah and provides the high priests after the exile, who claim Aaronic descent by way of Ithamar or Phinehas. Sirach refers to Phinehas in his praise of famous men (45:25).

c. After 170 B.C. battles for the high priesthood lead to the elimination of the Zadokites, who set up a new center in Egypt.

d. Yet Zadokite traditions remain alive, preserved by groups that are faithful to the law. Thus the Damascus Document presupposes a priestly community with the Zadokites as leaders, and Qumran calls the Zadokites God’s chosen priests.

e. A this-worldly eschatology characterizes the Zadokite tradition, so that the concept of resurrection plays little part in it.

f. The Zadokites of the NT period are at odds with the temple government and cannot be simply equated with the Sadducees.

2. Zadok and Boethos.

a. In a rabbinic tradition, Antigonos in the early second century B.C. has two pupils, Zadok and Boethos, who found two sects, the Sadducees and the Boethusians. These look for a temporal reward and thus exclude the resurrection.

b. In A.D. 6/7 Zadok founds the Zealot party with the aim of setting up God’s kingdom by eschatological war. Zadok, in legend, becomes the eponymous hero of the Sadducees, who also have a this-worldly eschatology.

c. A certain Joazar ben Boethos opposes Zadok’s call for revolt against Rome. In the main the rabbis link the Sadducees with the Boethusians, perhaps because the founder of their dynasty comes from Egypt and possibly has a connection with the Zadokites there; this may well explain the link with Zadok.

3. A Political Group. Before the Maccabean revolt the high priests bring the high priesthood into disrepute by their Hellenizing. Since the Zadokites are identified strongly with this group, the term Zadokite or Sadducee may thus be used for those who favor political compromise, even though this contradicts the true Zadokite tradition preserved in the communities and in Egypt.

II. The Sadducees of Jerusalem.

1. Sadducees and Hasmoneams. The Sadducees are first mentioned by Josephus as a party under Hyrcanus I (135-104 B.C.). Although at first a Pharisee, Hyrcanus goes over to the Sadducees, removing the stigma of illegitimacy by alignment with the priestly aristocracy of “Zadokites,” whose particularist eschatology fits in well with the Hasmonean wars of expansion.

2. The Sadducees under Herod and the Romans. When Herod, who favors cooperation with Rome, comes to power, he eliminates the older priestly aristocracy, abolishes the high priesthood for life, and appoints men of his own persuasion to office. The house of Boethos achieves prominence in priestly circles when Simon ben Boethos becomes high priest. In spite of a possible connection with the Egyptian Zadokites, the Boethusians bring the priesthood into disrepute among the righteous with what seems to be their semi-Gentile position. Yet elements within the priesthood maintain the particularist eschatology, attempt to keep the temple state alive, and finally go down with it in the disaster of A.D. 70.

III. Sadduceeism as a Religious Phenomenon.

1. Dogmatics.

a. The Sadducees balance divine and human action synergistically. Good and evil have their origin in the human will, not in divine providence.

b. The Sadducees reject individual survival and future judgment.

c. In particular they deny the resurrection, claiming that it has no clear support in the law.

d. In this regard they defend an older interpretation at a time of dogmatic development which stresses hope for the world to come and thinks in terms of the present and future aeons. In their view the present world is the place of the one encounter with God and the related reward and punishment. This older official position still comes to expression at Qumran, which finds no essential place for the motif of resurrection. The ruling priesthood at Jerusalem regards this teaching as the true orthodoxy, although with the triumph of Pharisaic rabbinism it comes to be presented as heresy and apostasy.

2. View of the Law. The Sadducees reject oral law. In so doing they judge more strictly than the Pharisees, whose casuistry adjusts the law to circumstances, but in this way often lessens its rigor in Sadducean eyes. The same distinction may be seen cultically at Tabernacles, when the Sadducees try to block the custom of smiting the earth around the altar with twigs on the seventh day if this day falls on the sabbath. With oral tradition the Pharisees can legalize popular practices whereas the Sadducees with their stricter view of the written law resist them.

C. The Sadducees in the NT.

I. The Synoptic Gospels. The Sadducees are present only on the margin in the NT. In their question in Mk. 12:18ff., in which they show hostility to Jesus, they deny the resurrection. The message of Jesus unavoidably conflicts with the older official teaching that they represent. In Matthew the Sadducees are lumped together with the Pharisees in 3:7; 16:1, 5ff., 11-12 but only in the terms of the common opposition to the Baptist or to Jesus and with no attempt to pinpoint their distinctive teachings.

II. Acts. Acts mentions the Sadducees three times in 4:1ff.; 5: 17ff.; 23:6ff. In 4:1ff. they control the politics and theology of the temple, and in particular they oppose the message of resurrection and the eschatological claim of the church. In 5:17ff. they again attack the resurrection but obviously with an eye on apostolic eschatology and its possible political implications. They plainly control the most important ecclesiastical and political offices. In 23:6ff. Paul causes division by raising the issue of the resurrection. When he also refers to angels and spirits, it may be that the popular belief is in view, since other sources do not say that they reject angels altogether. In this case, as the judicial hearing becomes more of an academic debate, the Pharisees rally behind their former pupil. For all the differences, the gospel is closer to the roots of Pharisaic belief than to the official orthodoxy of the Sadducees. [R. MEYER, VII, 35-54]

saínō [to wag, unsettle, flatter]

1. saínō, meaning “to wag,” is used literally of dogs wagging their tails, and then in transferred usage has such senses as “to fawn,” “to greet warmly,” “to gladden,” “to entice,” “to agitate,” “to unsettle.” The main figurative meaning is “to flatter,” but with various nuances.

2. The term does not occur in the LXX but Josephus uses it for “friendly treatment.”

3. In the NT the only use is in the passive in 1 Th. 3:3. Two meanings are possible. (1) The main Greek use favors “to be deluded.” In this case Paul’s point is that escaping affliction by apostasy is enticing but is still a delusion, since it means the loss of eternal salvation.

(2) The Greek expositors and older translations prefer “to be shaken,” and the papyri and lexicography support what is a more obvious meaning in context. Paul’s aim is that believers should not be shaken or unsettled in their faith by assaults.

4. The word does not occur in the apostolic fathers. [F. LANG, VII, 54-56]

sákkos [sackcloth]

A. Origin and Meaning. This word originally means “haircloth,” i.e., the coarse fabric, mostly of goats’ hair, out of which tents, sails, carpets, etc. are made. The term then comes to be applied to things made of this fabric, especially the “sack,” but also “carpet,” “sackcloth,” “hairnet”; figuratively it refers to a big beard like a sack.

B. Use and Significance of Sackcloth in Antiquity and the OT.

1. In the Semitic world sackcloth is from early days the garb of mourning and penitence. It is also prophetic garb in the OT. Originally perhaps a mere loincloth, it becomes a lower garment fastened with a cord or girdle and worn over the naked body.

2. In mourning it leaves the breast free for beating. Since goats‘ hair is dark, its color is that of mourning. It is used in the OT both in private mourning (Gen. 37:34) and national mourning (2 Sam. 3:31).

3. In penitence its use seems to derive from Babylon but quickly spreads to Israel. It signifies self-abasement (along with ashes and sometimes self-disfigurement) either before God (2 Kgs. 19:1) or others (1 Kgs. 20:31ff.). It is also worn at night (1 Kgs. 21:27). Personal crises (Ps. 30:11) and times of national emergency (Esth. 4:1-2) or imminent eschatological destruction (Joel 1:13) are occasions for its penitential use. It has become a rite in Neh. 9:1 etc., and its purely formal use comes under prophetic criticism (Is. 58:5). Fasting often accompanies it (Ps. 35:13).

4. For its prophetic use see C.3.

C. The NT.

1. In Rev. 6:12 the dark color of sackcloth explains the use. When the sun is eschatologically darkened (cf. Is. 50:3 etc.), it becomes as black as sackcloth. This darkening, which precedes the parousia in Mk. 13:24ff., is one of the events with which the opening of the next to the last seal introduces the great day of wrath.

2. sákkos is a sign of conversion and penitence in the saying in Mt. 11:21 and Lk. 10:13, whether in the sense of the garment or the penitential mat. Jesus perhaps has Jon. 3:4ff. in mind; but clearly conversion itself, not the external sign, is what matters.

3. The sákkoi in which the two prophets of Rev. 11:3 are garbed seem to be modeled on Elijah’s clothing in 2 Kgs. 1:8, although this is made of the skin, not the woven hair. The dress suggests that the prophetic message is a threat of judgment and a summons to repentance (cf. the clothing of John in Mk. 1:6).

D. The Post-New Testament Period.

1. In the apostolic fathers and Apologists the use is colored by the OT (cf. 1 Clem. 8.3; Justin Dialogue 15.4). Only in Hermas Mandates 8.4.1 do we have a working garment.

2. Sackcloth soon becomes part of the practice of penance (cf. Tertullian, Cyprian, and the Council of Toledo in A.D. 400). The roughness symbolizes sorrow and self-abasement. Sackcloth is also laid over the seriously ill, and in private use it is worn in preparation for death or as the garb of death.

3. The monastic use of sackcloth as permanent dress signifies a life of penitence, although voices are raised against it as a source of vanity and a hindrance to the work monks are commanded to do.

4. Groups of fratres saccati and saccariae arise, sometimes suspected of heretical teachings. The Byzantine sákkos also becomes the ornate purple garb of patriarchs and metropolitans or the black but festive garb worn as a diadem by the emperors and empresses. [G. STÄHLIN, VII, 56-64] saleúō [to shake], sálos [shaking]

A. Secular Greek. This word is used for the tossing of the sea, the shaking of an earthquake, natural becoming and perishing, political unrest, earthly uncertainty, human vacillation, and physical change. In contrast, Hellenism seeks unshakability in the world to come. Astrological texts refer to eschatological shakings of the earth in political events or natural disasters.

B. The Greek OT. With no fixed Hebrew original, the term in the Greek OT is used for the shaking of the earth, the raging of the sea, human agitation or quaking. God's shaking of the earth, its trembling before him, staggering with strong drink (cf. the cup of staggering), shaking when Jerusalem or Babylon is taken, shaking through confusion or fear of death. In contrast, saleúō may be used with the negative to denote unshakable faith or confidence in God, the unshakableness of the earth under God's rule, the unshakableness of figures like Elisha, or the unshakableness of the city of God. The righteous know they will stumble on their own, but they also know that God gives them an unshakableness that keeps them from falling and gives them confidence in spite of the shattering events of nature and history.

C. Philo. The use in Philo is mainly psychological. He defines what is divine as unshakable, e.g., the law, cosmic order, and reason. On the other hand, what is merely human is uncertain and vacillating. Through the movement of the emotions the peace of virtue is attained with the help of wisdom. Grounded in reason, the wise share God's unshakability in contrast to those who are at the mercy of the tossing sea of life. The vibration of the legal statutes, like the harmonious movement of heavenly forces, keeps us attentive.

D. The NT. In Acts 17:13 the verb characterizes the agitators who follow Paul from Thessalonica and stir up the people of Berea. It denotes vacillation in Mt. 21:10; 2 Th. 2:2. The Baptist, however, is not a reed shaken by the wind (Mt. 11:7). In Acts 2:25ff. the reference is to the steadfastness of Christ as crucified and risen Lord. Lk. 6:38 uses saleúō in a crescendo to denote the superabundance of the divine gift (pressed down, shaken, and overflowing), while 6:48 points out that the house built on the rock cannot be shaken by the storm and flood. Earthquakes that shake the ground are taken as a sign of answered prayer in Acts 4:31 and 16:26, while eschatological quaking is predicted in Lk. 21:25-26; Heb. 12:26; Revelation. What is made is subject to change; what cannot be shaken remains (1 Cor. 7:27ff.). But this is an eschatological rather than a cosmological hope (cf. Heb. 12:28). Creation stands under the threat of divine shaking, but also under the promise of divine unshakability.

[G. BERTRAM, VII, 65-70]

sálpinx [trumpet, trumpet call], salpízō [to sound the trumpet], salpistḗs [trumpeter]

A. The Greek World.

I. Meaning.

1. sálpinx. This word denotes a wind instrument, made of bronze or iron with a mouthpiece of horn, and broadening out to a megaphone, i.e., a "trumpet." The word may also denote the sound made by the instrument, its signal or playing. Other uses are for thunder as a heavenly trumpet sound or for a human speaker as a trumpet.

2. salpízō. This word means "to blow on a trumpet," "to give a trumpet blast or signal," "to blow on an instrument," "to thunder."

3. salpistḗs. This is one form of the word for “trumpeter.”

II. Origin and Use.

l. Origin. Trumpets are used from an early date in the Near East (cf. the Persians, Hittites, and Egyptians). The Greeks know them from the time of Homer but not at first as military instruments.

2. The War Trumpet. The trumpet soon finds use in the army for giving signals. It replaces the earlier Spartan flute and Cretan lyre. It passes on signals, fires with courage, terrifies enemies, signals retreat, rallies the scattered, ends battles. In the Roman camp it gives the signal for sleeping, watching, and waking.

3. The Trumpet in Peace. Shepherds use trumpets to gather their flocks. Heralds initiate trials by trumpet sounds. Trumpets silence the people for prayer or summon them to sacrifice. Trumpeters have a place in funerals and triumphs. Trumpet competitions are part of the games. Only a few notes can be played but trumpet playing is an art in view of the strong lungs that it requires.

4. A Musical Instrument. It is doubtful whether the trumpet has much of a role as a musical instrument. The Egyptian trumpets have only two notes. They may give signals and set rhythms but not play real music. Trumpets have a loud and penetrating sound that is sometimes compared to the braying of an ass or roaring of a bull.

B. The OT.

I. Hebrew Equivalents.

1. sálpinx. This word is most often used for a Hebrew term that is better translated as a ram’s horn or a horn in general. Trumpet is a more accurate rendering in the case of the cultic instruments of Num. 10:21; 2 Kgs. 11:14; 2 Chr. 5:12-13. This superior instrument then tends to supplant the ram’s horn and has an important place in priestly ministry (2 Chr. 29:26ff.). The instrument of Josh. 6:5 seems to be an animal horn; it has a place in Nebuchadnezzar’s “orchestra” in Daniel. Another word used in Gen. 4:21 has various senses, e.g., horn, trumpet, signal, or the feast announced by such a signal; it means “horn” in Ex. 19:19, but in Josh. 6:4ff. it denotes, not an instrument, but the material of which the instruments are made. In Lev. 23:24 sálpinx is used for a word that really means “noise” (Josh. 6:5) or “alarm” (Num. 10:5). The true reference in Ezek. 7:14 seems to be to blowing rather than to an instrument.

2. salpízō. This word is used for various Hebrew terms in such senses as “to blow an alarm,” “to cry,” “to draw out a note,” “to sound.”

3. salpistḗs. This noun does not occur in the OT, which has no special term for those who blow trumpets, e.g., priests in 2 Chr. 29:26; Ezr. 3:10. (For details of the Hebrew terms see TDNT, VII, 76-78.)

II. Use and Significance.

1. In War. Horns or trumpets play an important role in war, whether to give warning, to summon to battle, to sound an attack, to frighten enemies, or, religiously, to invoke God’s help. The horn also sounds a retreat, announces victory, and dismisses the host.

2. In peace. Horns or trumpets are used at coronations, at the laying of the temple’s foundation, at its dedication, in festal processions, and in solemn self-dedication to God.

3. Cultic Use. The trumpet or horn is sounded at offerings, at the temple dedication, at feasts, at fasts, and at the initiation of the year of release.

4. Theophanies. In both war and peace there is a strict relation to God, but there is a special use of the trumpet at Sinai (Ex. 19:16ff.; cf. Zech. 9:14), where the trumpet seems to denote the inexpressible voice of God.

5. Eschatological Significance. The horn will announce the day of the Lord (Joel 2:1; Zeph. 1:16), the last judgment, and the age of salvation (Is. 27:13; Zech. 9:14).

6. Musical Instruments. The horn or trumpet is a musical instrument in Babylon in Dan. 3:5ff. and in temple praise in 2 Chr. 5:13; Ps. 150:3. Horns and trumpets do not play melodies but stress the rhythm and strengthen the sound.

C. Judaism.

I. Words. Judaism uses the various OT terms for the horns that are blown at feasts, for priestly trumpets, and for horn instruments in a more general sense.

II. Significance.

1. War Signals. The Qumran scrolls give details about the use of trumpets in war, e.g., to summon to battle, to form ranks, to attack, to pursue, to signal the return home. Different ways of blowing are used for different signals.

2. In Peace. Trumpets are blown to announce fasts in special emergencies, to intimate deaths, and to impose or lift excommunications.

3. Cultic Use. Trumpets signal the opening of the temple, the offering of regular sacrifices, the beginning of the sabbath, the coming of the new moon or the new year. The blowing is an act of prayer and not just a signal. It disposes God to mercy and confuses the adversary.

4. Eschatological Significance. The trumpet proclaims the last time, the return from exile, and the raising of the dead. This last trumpet is blown by the archangel or by God himself.

5. As Musical Instruments. In Judaism the horn and trumpet are not musical instruments like harps or zithers. At most they can only give the signal for striking up a song; they are too loud for musical use.

D. The NT.

I. The Words.

1. sálpinx. This term denotes the instrument (1 Cor. 14:8; Heb. 12:19, etc.), and occasionally the sound or signal (Mt. 24:31; 1 Cor. 15:52; 1 Th. 4:16).

2. salpízō. This word occurs mostly in Revelation.

3. salpistḗs. The only instance is in Rev. 18:22.

II. Significance.

1. In War. Paul uses the metaphor of the military trumpet in 1 Cor. 14:8.

2. On Solemn Occasions. In Mt. 6:2 the use is perhaps figurative (“to blaze abroad”) or perhaps an actual practice is in view, e.g., blowing a horn when very generous gifts are given so as to stir up others and to commend the donors in prayer. As Jesus points out, God does not need such reminders, which serve more to bring human glory.

3. Theophanies and Visions. In Heb. 12:19 the trumpet sound is an accompanying phenomenon at Sinai. In Rev. 1:10; 4:1 the divine hears a sound like a trumpet, probably the voice of God. The great voice in 1:10 introduces the epistles, and that in 4:1 the visions.

4. Eschatology.

a. The trumpet proclaims the last judgment. In Rev. 8-9 the seven trumpets of the seven angels bring successive judgments which aim at conversion (cf. 9:20-21). The series culminates with the proclamation of the divine mystery in 10:7 and the establishment of the dominion of God and Christ in 11:15ff.

b. A trumpet blast gathers the elect in Mt. 24:31.

c. The living are changed and the dead are raised at the sound of the last trumpet in 1 Cor. 15:52, i.e., the eschatological signal which sounds forth when Christ returns (1 Th. 4:16).

5. As a Musical Instrument. The trumpet is a musical instrument in the NT only in pagan Babylon, whose trumpeters are silenced with its fall in Rev. 18:22. [G. FRIEDRICH, VII, 71-88]

Samáreia [Samaria], Samarítēs [Samaritan], Samarítis [Samaritan woman]

A. The Samaritans in the NT Period.

1. The Samaritan Religion. After 27 B.C. Samaria denotes only the territory (which has its own senate) and not the city, which Herod renames Sebastḗ. During the Persian period this territory is detached from Jerusalem and sets up its own cultic center at Gerizim. The Samaritans see in Gerizim the chosen place of worship and accept only the Pentateuch as canonical. They do not believe in the resurrection and do not associate the Messiah with the Davidic house but expect only the prophet like Moses of Dt. 18:15ff. Simon Magus gains quite a following in Samaria in Acts 8:9-10.

2. Jews and Samaritans.

a. Up to A.D. 300. Relations fluctuate, being embittered when John Hyrcanus destroys the Gerizim temple and when Samaritans defile the Jerusalem temple, taking a milder turn in the second century A.D., but ending in a complete break in A.D. 300 when the Samaritans are classified as Gentiles.

b. In the Days of Jesus. The days of Jesus are a period of strained relations. The Jews do not accept the patriarchal descent of the Samaritans and question the validity of their worship. They thus exclude them from the cultus and restrict dealings with them, treating them in practice like Gentiles.

B. The Samaritans in the NT.

1. Hostility between Jews and Samaritans. The NT reflects the current animosity in Jn. 8:48; Lk. 9:54; 10:37; Jn. 4:9; Lk. 9:53.

2. Jesus' Attitude.

a. Jesus accepts the exclusion of Samaritans from the community (Mt. 10:5-6; Lk. 17:18).

b. Yet he rebukes his disciples for their hostility (Lk. 9:55), asks the Samaritan woman for a drink (Jn. 4:7), heals a Samaritan leper (Lk. 17:16), extols a Samaritan for neighborly love (10:30ff.) and gratitude to God (17:11ff.), and preaches to Samaritans (Jn. 4:40ff.). This is not just magnanimity on Jesus‘ part but proleptically announces the hour of fulfilment when the age of salvation comes and after a first proclamation to Israel a share in God's salvation is offered to the Gentiles too, from whom all uncleanness is taken away with the dawn of God's royal dominion.

3. The Samaritan Mission.

a. In Acts 1:8 the Lord sends out the disciples as witnesses to Samaria. Philip opens the Samaritan mission in 8:5. Perhaps the lasting results are not too strong, for Justin Apology 1.26.3 refers to the popularity of Simon's teaching in Samaria. Nevertheless the preaching to Samaria has great significance as the first step in the Gentile mission.

b. Jn. 4:4ff. shows that Jesus himself stands behind the Samaritan mission. It also points to the final goal when the strife about temples ends and religious separation yields to worship of the Father in spirit and in truth. [J. JEREMIAS, VII, 88-94]

saprós [rotting, decaying], sḗpō [to rot, decay]

1. Relating to the process of decay, sḗpō means "to cause to decay," or, in the passive, "to decay," "to rot," and figuratively "to perish." saprós means "rotting," either literally or figuratively, and the sense of "unpleasant" (even to the ears) is also possible. A person is saprós when old, and the same applies to food and drink, which may be better when saprós (e.g., ripe cheese). In general, what is saprós is "unserviceable'' rather than "offensive," but the word may also mean "harmful" or "notorious" (someone's name).

2. In the LXX sḗpō means "to destroy" in Job 40:12 and "to rot" in 19:20. saprós does not occur in the LXX, Philo, or Josephus.

3. In Jms. 5:2 sḗpō has the extended sense “to decay.” saprós in Eph. 4:29 means “unserviceable.” The point in Mt. 13:47ff. is not that the fish are rotting but that they are no good for food. The same applies in Mt. 7:17ff.; 12:33; Lk. 6:43: the trees are useless, and by the same token one should see that false prophets are of no value to the community.

4. Hermas Similitudes 2.3-4 uses the terms for the decaying fruit of the vine, 1 Clem. 25.3 speaks of the rotting flesh of the phoenix, and Hermas Simititudes 9.6.4 refers to useless stones. [O. BAUERNFEIND, VII, 94-97]

sárx [flesh, body], sarkikós [fleshly, earthly], sárkinos [fleshly, fleshy]

A. The Greek World.

1. sárx as the Muscular Part of the Body. In older usage sárx denotes the flesh of humans, animals, or fish. “Flesh” is often accompanied by “bones” and “blood.” As muscle it protects the limbs or bones against cold or heat. The body consists of bones, sinews, flesh, and skin. At first the plural is more common even when sárx takes on the more general sense of “body.” sárx can also mean “meat,” but kréas is more common for this.

2. The Origin of sárx. sárx supposedly develops out of the four elements, or out of female seed, or perhaps flesh and bone are themselves elements. Plato thinks flesh arises out of blood, while Aristotle seeks its origin in moisture and theorizes that thick blood arises out of flesh.

3. sárx as Body. The use of sárx broadens out to include the whole body, especially the physical body, which may be young, aging, or dead. Thus the plural sárkes may on occasion signify a corpse.

4. Special Meanings. The inner part of the skin, as dried-up flesh, is also sárx, the flesh of fruits is sárx, and swellings are sárkes. The phrase eis sárka pēmaínein means “to hurt to the flesh, i.e., “to the quick.”

5. sárkinos. This word has such meanings as “consisting of flesh,” “corpulent,” and “real” as distinct from imaginary. It can carry the nuance of “corruptible.”

6. The Corruptible sárx. In Homer the flesh and bones decay at death but the thýmos and psychḗ persist. One must put off all flesh at death. The noús may also be the incorruptible part that escapes death. Reference is made to the “alien garb of flesh” or to pure beauty untainted by the flesh (Plato). Plutarch contrasts sárx and psychḗ (as well as sṓma and psychḗ) as the two elements in humanity, the former perishable and the latter imperishable.

7. sárx as the Seat of Emotions. Stimuli affect the sárx, e.g., heat or cold, fear or pity. For Epicurus the sárx is the seat of desire. Choices may be made, but in choices the soul heeds the summons of nature. The sárx is the seat of sorrow, too, but pleasure surpasses sorrow. True happiness, however, consists of more than the present well-being of the sárx.

8. The Influence of Epicurus. In its popularized version Epicureanism supposedly advocates the enthronement of bodily desires. Its opponents, who think that bodily cravings pollute the soul, regard it as a summons to the crudest forms of pleasure. Even Cicero calls the followers of Epicurus voluptuaries. The sárx, as the source of uncontrolled sensuality and immoderate gluttony, supposedly makes the freedom of the soul impossible. [E. SCHWEIZER, VII, 98-105]

B. The OT.

1. The most common original for sárx in Hebrew is bāśār, which may mean flesh in the strict sense (Lev. 13:2ff.) or in the extended sense of the body (Gen. 2:23), which may have collective force (Gen. 6:17; Num. 18:15), which may denote blood relationship (Gen. 2:23), which can be used euphemistically (Ex. 28:42), which may, figuratively, signify external life (Ps. 16:9), inner attitude (Ps. 63:1), or human frailty and impotence (Gen. 6:3), or which can have a metaphorical sense (e.g., Ezek. 11:19; Is. 17:4; cf. also Is. 10:18).

2. A second Hebrew term is šəʼēr, which also means flesh in the strict sense (Ex. 21:10), denotes blood relationships (Lev. 18:12-13), and has the transferred sense of our external existence (Prov. 5:11; Ps. 73:26).

3. LXX Translations.

a. For bāśār the LXX uses sárx 145 times, kréas 79, sṓma 23, and chrṓs 14, with a few other renderings such as ánthrōpos in Gen. 6:13. For šəʼēr the LXX has oikeíos seven times, sárx five, and sṓma four, and at times such translations as tá déonta (Ex. 21:10) or trápeza (Ps. 28:2). [F. BAUMGÄRTEL, VII, 105-08]

b. The LXX does not connect sárx with sensuality, relates it to circumcision, never uses it for the flesh of sacrifice, and distinguishes the spheres of spirit and flesh (Num. 16:22), although not equating this cosmic dualism with the ethical dualism of Creator and creature, as tends to be the case at times in Judaism.

4. Noncanonical Texts. Common features are the use of pása sárx for animals, humans, or both, the reference to the flesh of circumcision, the description of woman as the very flesh of man, and the use of sárx for the corruptible body. New points are the use of flesh and blood for human beings and the expression sṓma sarkós (cf. Sir. 14:18; 23:17). The basileús sárkinos is contrasted with the basileús tṓn theṓn in Esth. 4:17. The contrast between sárx and pneúma continues, and under Hellenistic influence there is a tendency to equate the sárx with sinful sexuality or passion. In Sir. 40:8 the sárx stamps humans as subject to frailty, sickness, etc., and in Sir. 28:5 the point is perhaps that if man, who is flesh, can restrain his anger, God may be expected to do so too. [E. SCHWEIZER, VII, 108-10]

C. Judaism.

I. Qumran.

1. General Concept. The ordinances of the Qumran community are regarded as more efficacious than the flesh of sacrifices. Wicked priests suffer punishment in the flesh. Those smitten in the flesh, i.e., with bodily defects, are excluded from the community.

2. Term for Person. The whole person can be flesh, or soul and flesh. The flesh may also denote the true ego.

3. Collective Use. Those outside the community are a gathering of flesh (cf. sons of Adam). There are also references to “all flesh” for “all people.”

4. Corruptibility. Flesh expresses human lowliness and corruptibility in distinction from the Creator. In this respect, i.e., before God, flesh and spirit are on the same level. Yet God’s mighty acts are proclaimed to flesh.

5. Sin. In some references Qumran relates flesh closely to sin and pride. It evaluates flesh negatively. God has a controversy with flesh, judges it, and gives strength to war against it. God will also expunge evil from the inner part of the flesh of the elect, although here the spirit of evil and the Holy Spirit are opposed rather than flesh and spirit. The elect, however, are exalted above flesh. They belong to the fellowship of the flesh of iniquity, and they may stumble through the sinfulness of the flesh, whose spirit cannot understand the divine mysteries. Yet God pardons them, and does not plant carnal striving in them, or abandon them to the striving of the flesh.

6. Flesh and Spirit. Flesh is sometimes neutral, but it also denotes human creatureliness. This is bound up with sinfulness and ignorance, but it does not itself stand in contrast to spirit; instead it is the battleground of conflict between the spirit of evil and the Holy Spirit. Hence flesh does not belong in principle to the ungodly sphere, nor is it the prison of the soul.

II. The Targums. These works use flesh in much the same way as Qumran. Neutrally the term means "living creatures." It carries a stress on human mortality and creaturely distance from God. It may simply mean humanity but it may also denote sinful and arrogant humanity. It does not seem to be distinguished dualistically from spirit.

III. Talmud and Midrash.

1. Here again flesh denotes human existence either collectively or individually.

2. Whereas the older use of flesh and blood for humanity continues, the term gup now comes into use for body or person.

3. This term, which has the basic sense of "hollow" or "cavity," suggests a body that needs to be filled by a soul. Although the concept of unity is unbroken, the emphasis of body now rests on its physical and corruptible side. By nature, then, it differs from the soul—the body deriving from earth and the soul from heaven, the body inclining to sin, the soul to obedience. Yet the expectation of a reuniting of body and soul, whether for salvation or perdition, keeps popular dualism in check. The soul, when put to test in the body, may start back from it in view of its corruptibility, but it will have to give an account in concert with it at the last judgment. [R. MEYER, VII, 110-19]

IV. Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha.

1. LXX usage for the human body, the phrase "all flesh," the connection with circumcision, etc. all continue.

2. The dualism of God and humanity is increasingly linked with that of the world of spirits and that of flesh. Human limitation does not always rest on corporeality, for the angels, too, are sinful, but when angelic sin involves contact with human flesh dualism is evident (cf. Eth. En. 84:4ff.; 15:4ff.). Cf. also the setting aside of flesh at death (102:5, 13-14).

3. Jubilees and later works distinguish the realm of spirit from that of carnal beings. Pure spirits have no bodies. Carnal beings cannot see what spiritual beings see. One can see God only in the spirit.

4. The thought of the resurrection of the body restrains anthropological dualism, but the idea of a spiritual flesh helps to promote the distinction of the spirit or soul from the flesh that encloses it and that is put off at death.

5. At times flesh is linked to sin, and asceticism seeks to curb the body, e.g., vegetarianism or total abstinence from wine, luxury, or sex. Being made of flesh and blood, however, may still be equated with humanity as such, and sin and ignorance traced to seduction by evil spirits.

V. Philo and Josephus.

1. Philo is pulled two ways. In general he takes a negative view of sárx as the seat of passion etc., but although he associates the inclination to sin with the sárx, he sees that illogical passions are in the soul too, and the right thing is to make responsible choice, not blaming sin on one's carnal side. God, of course, is noncorporeal, and may thus be known only by those who set aside the husk of flesh, which is for the soul a burden or coffin or corpse, and acts as a drag on its spiritual flight to God. The antithesis becomes ethically significant when the soul is content to remain in the flesh and refuses to make the upward flight.

2. In Josephus sárkes means animal or human flesh. The sárx is vulnerable, and the psychḗ leaves it at death, achieving an unencumbered state.

D. Historical Summary.

1. In Greek thought the concern is the anthropological one of the relation between the different component parts of humanity. Humanity is understood in terms of its nature, i.e., the parts and their conflict, controlling center, distinction, and interrelationship.

2. In the OT the concern is the theological one of the relation of humanity to God. Humanity is understood in terms of its creatureliness, its response to God. The only dualism is that of Creator and creature or obedience and disobedience.

3. In Hellenism humanity belongs to the earthly sphere by destiny rather than by decision, is tied to it during earthly life, and seeks to rise above it through ecstasy and secret formulas.

E. The NT.

I. Synoptic Gospels and Acts.

1. Synoptics. In its use of sárx the NT stands under OT influence. Except in OT quotations in Mk. 10:8 and Lk. 3:6, however, the term occurs only three times in Matthew, Mark, and Luke. In Mt. 16:17 “flesh and blood” denotes humanity in its inability to know God; God is the opposite. In Mk. 14:38 the dualism is only apparent, for the prayer is that God will make good the weakness of the flesh. In Lk. 24:39 “flesh and bones” indicates the reality of Christ’s resurrection.

2. Acts. Apart from the quotations in 2:17, 26 the only instance is in 2:31, which refers to the incorruptibility of the sárx of Jesus, but avoids dualism by not repeating the psychḗ of v. 17, using “he” instead.

II. Paul.

1. sárx as Body. Though Paul never uses “flesh and bones,” he uses sárx in the ordinary sense in, e.g., 2 Cor. 12:7 (the thorn in the “flesh”). In 1 Cor. 15:39 sárx is the whole physical existence (cf. Gal. 4:13), although in Rom. 6:19 weakness of perception is the point, and in 2 Cor. 7:5 sárx embraces inner anxieties as well. The phrase “body and spirit” in 2 Cor. 7:1 is not distinguishing a better and worse part, for both must be cleansed. The “mortal flesh” in 2 Cor. 4:11 is Paul’s earthly existence, whose very weakness means life for the churches and thus manifests Christ’s risen power. Earthly life is also meant in 2 Cor. 10:3; Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:22, 24. In it we may die to the law and live for God in faith.

2. sárx as the Earthly Sphere. In Rom. 1:3-4 Paul contrasts the sphere of sárx with that of heaven or pneúma. In this limited and provisional sphere Jesus is the Davidic Messiah, but the decisive thing comes in the sphere of the pneúma. In Rom. 9:3 sárx denotes an earthly relationship (cf. 4:1; 9:5, 8); this relationship is not evil but is also not decisive. The genitive in 9:8 indicates sphere rather than origin. In 1 Cor. 1:26 wisdom according to the flesh means wisdom according to the categories of this world. There may be wise of this kind in the church, but not many. In Phlm. 16 sárx and kýrios are linked; Onesimus has a social relationship as well as the more decisive Christian relationship to Philemon. The present aeon or cosmos may be equivalent to sárx (cf. 1 Cor. 2:6), but the real antithesis is between God and humanity. God’s wisdom is contrasted with that of the sárx and God’s power with the weapons of the sárx (1 Cor. 1:24ff.; 2 Cor. 10:4). Again, God’s promise is the opposite of sárx (Rom. 9:8). In Christ the divine sphere has invaded the human.

3. “Flesh and Blood” and “All Flesh.”

a. In Gal. 1:16 “flesh and blood” means humanity but with God as the opposite (cf. Mt. 16:17). The point of the phrase in 1 Cor. 15:50 is not to differentiate a part of us that cannot inherit the kingdom from a part that can, but to show that humanity as a whole cannot inherit the kingdom without transformation. There is perhaps a hint here of human vulnerability to temptation as well as corruption.

b. The phrase “all flesh” occurs in Rom. 3:20; Gal. 2:16; 1 Cor. 1:29 in contexts in which the point is that all humanity stands under divine judgment.

4. Trust in the sárx. In Rom. 2:28 Paul contrasts circumcision of the bodily member with that of the heart. But sárx takes on a negative aspect because people can see it and boast about it (vv. 23, 27, 29). Gal. 6:12-13 makes a similar point, although in v. 12 the flesh might simply mean the earthly sphere. In Phil. 3:3-4 sárx denotes national descent, legal observance, etc. It is not wrong in itself, but only when confidence is put in it instead of in Christ, whose righteousness makes all else loss.

5. katá sárka with Verb. In 2 Cor. 10:2-3 earthly life is the meaning; this is wrong only when wrongly oriented to the sárx as a norm, which leads to boasting about earthly things (11:18) (cf. the worldly planning of 1:17). In 2 Cor. 5:16 Paul is rejecting judgment from a human standpoint; thus to judge Christ simply as one historical figure among others, as he used to do, is to miss the real point. In Gal. 4:23, 29 birth katá sárka is birth according to human possibilities in contrast to the promise. This birth has a long-range impact inasmuch as it means walking katá sárka (Rom. 8:4) and not according to the Spirit. A basic orientation of all life is obviously at issue.

6. sárx as the Subject of Sin. The sárx does not work as the Spirit does (Phil. 3:3; Rom. 8:13-14; Gal. 4:23; 5:18). It is the subject of an action only in the shadow of the work of the Spirit. The spheres are not controlling forces as in dualism. Building on the sárx or trusting in it is sinful. Yet the sárx as norm becomes the sárx as power, and there are thus works of the sárx (Gal. 5:16, 19; Rom. 13:14). Legal observance, however, is itself a manifestation of the sárx (Gal. 3:3; 4:8ff.). Everything human and earthly is sárx, and as people trust in sárx in this sense, it becomes a power that opposes the working of the Spirit (Gal. 5:13, 17). Subjection to sárx is not fate but guilt. A life oriented to it serves it and carries out its thinking. The opposite of the sárx is God, who in the form of the Son comes in the likeness of sinful flesh, i.e., in full humanity, and condemns sin in the flesh. Rom. 7:18, 25 might seem to suggest cleavage into sárx and noús, but the depiction is that of the pre-Christian life in which what is contrasts sharply with what ought to be. Sincere people might wish to serve God but even in so doing they fall into the sin of establishing their own righteousness. Right desires become carnal action, so that only in retrospect can one differentiate the will which opposes the sárx but precisely in so doing makes its work responsible and guilty.

7. Vanquished sárx. Believers have crucified the sárx (Rom. 7:5; 8:8-9; Gal. 5:24). They do not escape corporeality by asceticism etc. (cf. Gal. 2:19-20). They enter a life that in Christ is determined by the relation to God (2:20). Works of the flesh are illogical and call for recommitment. Life is not split up into single acts. It is one érgon under one determination, sárx or pneúma. Believers are no longer building on the sárx but on Christ. This is what they are to achieve in the daily practice of the life of faith.

8. Summary.

a. Humanity is qualified by the relation to God.

b. Salvation does not lie in a retreat from the physical to the spiritual.

c. Flesh is not a separate and intrinsically bad sphere but becomes bad only with orientation to it either in licentiousness or legalism.

d. The flesh as a wrong disposition away from God seems to become a controlling power.

e. Salvation through Christ means liberation from earthly goals in a life that is lived by God’s gift.

III. Colossians, Ephesians, Pastorals.

1. Colossians. sárx is the external sphere in 2:1, that of human relations in 3:22, and that of physical existence in 1:24. In 2:23 sárx denotes those who measure by their own standards and not God’s. In 2:13 the Gentiles are in view; their sin comes out in licentiousness (3:5). In 1:22 the body of flesh is Christ’s crucified body, but in 2:11 (cf. 2:18) it denotes the body that is to be put off in the circumcision of Christ.

2. Ephesians. In 5:31 the wife is a man’s own flesh in a union that reflects that of Christ and the church. 2:14 refers to Christ’s crucified body. 2:11 shows that the distinction between Jew and Gentile is a provisional one in the earthly sphere. In 2:3 (cf. 2:2) sárx has a demonic character. The division into sárx and diánoiai is surprising, but the latter, too, are corrupt.

3. Pastorals. 1 Tim. 3:16 says that Christ’s appearing in the earthly sphere is already a mighty saving act.

IV John.

1. The Gospel. sárx seldom occurs in this work. pása sárx in 17:2 is traditional. In 8:15 judgment according to the flesh is blind and ignorant. In 7:27 assessment of Jesus by his known descent yields no adequate understanding. In 3:6 everything human is sárx. sárx is the earthly sphere in which there is no knowledge of God and nothing to save from lostness. Only through unbelief, however, and not through sárx does the world become sinful. In 1:13 sárx is the principle of natural birth and characterizes humanity apart from God. In 1:14 the Logos does not take on sin, nor simply enter the earthly sphere, but takes human form so as to manifest the Father’s glory in mighty acts and obedience even to the cross. Only this witness of full commitment, not mere impartation of knowledge, gives rise to faith. In 6:63 the antithesis could be that of 3:6, but, in the light of vv. 51-58, it is more likely that of 8:15. To consider the external appearance of Jesus does not help, for only his preaching is pneúma or zōḗ. In the eucharist the sárx is not the medicine of immortality. Faith, as it eats the sárx of Jesus, sees that he is the Son who has come in the sárx for the world’s salvation, accepts this, and lives by it.

2. The Epistles. In 1 Jn. 4:2 and 2 Jn. 7 the coming in the flesh serves to distinguish true faith from false; the former accepts the humanity as well as the deity. In 1 Jn. 2:16 the warning not to trust in the world becomes a stronger warning against love of it, and the world includes carnal desire, the reference apparently being to sense impressions that stimulate desire.

V. Hebrews. In 5:7 (cf. 2:14) Jesus’ earthly existence is denoted, i.e., the whole of his human nature. In 12:9 God as the Lord of the upper world is contrasted with earthly ancestors. The reference in 9:10 (cf. 9:13) is to cultic purity; this symbolizes the earthly sphere and stands in contrast to the inner purity of the heavenly priest. In 10:20 the sárx might be the crucifixion, or Christ’s human nature, or the place where the heavenly and earthly spheres meet, but the most likely meaning is that the way to heaven leads believers by Christ’s sárx in such a manner that through it they go to the heavenly high priest. Hebrews never links sin to the sárx; the sárx is the provisional earthly sphere under threat of death.

VI. Catholic Epistles.

1. Jms. 5:3 (plural) refers to the consuming of human flesh.

2. 1 Peter follows traditional lines (cf. pása sárx in 1:24; 3:18). In 4:1 “in the flesh” echoes 3:18 and signifies the transition from living by the passions to living by God’s will. In 3:21 sárx as the external aspect is contrasted with the conscience as in Hebrews.

3. In Jude 7 sárx is “corporeality,” the object of a sexual desire that is wicked only in perversion (cf. 2 Pet. 2:10; also v. 18, which has “passions of the flesh” where Jude 16 simply has “passions”). In Jude 6 and 23 sárx seems to be human existence as polluted by sin.

VII. sárkinos, sarkikós. Used of the tables of the heart in 2 Cor. 3:3, this term refers to the inner being in distinction from external legal fulfilment. In Heb. 6:16, however, it denotes the earthly sphere. In 1 Cor. 3:1ff. the readers show by their conduct that they are still of the flesh. In Rom. 7:14 Paul uses the term to describe his pre-Christian state. sarkikós in Rom. 15:27 and 1 Cor. 9:11 denotes external things in a neutral sense. It is parallel to sárkinos in 1 Cor. 3:1ff., and in 2 Cor. 10:4 it denotes carnal power as distinct from divine. 1 Pet. 2:11 postulates conflict between the soul and the passions of the flesh.

F. The Post—New Testament Period.

1. Apostolic Fathers. While OT influence persists, e.g., in the use of “flesh and blood,” or of sárx for human life or the earthly life of Jesus, a Hellenistic hierarchy of flesh and soul (or spirit) emerges. This does not necessarily have a dualistic sense, for both are stained, Jesus comes in the flesh, and the flesh has a share in the resurrection. Thus salvation is not the overcoming of the flesh by the spirit but the union of the two. There is in some works a tendency to associate desires more strongly with the flesh, and also a certain ascetic thrust, yet there is no flight from the flesh, which is to be kept like a temple, which becomes immortal through union with the Holy Spirit, and which will finally be raised again.

2. Apocryphal Acts. In these works sárx may denote earthly life, but suspicion of the flesh is strong in some cases, e.g., Acts of Thomas.

3. Apologists. sárx is in these works an important term for the incarnation. It may also denote external circumcision. Flesh and blood are the principle of natural generation, faith and spirit of divine generation. The idea of the resurrection of the flesh is present. Sexual intercourse is a union of sárx and sárx in Athenagoras, who also thinks that to serve flesh and blood is to serve earthly desires, and who regards fallen angels as subject to the sárx (Supplication 24.5; 31.2; 33.2). The resurrection of the flesh forms a bulwark against Hellenistic dualism.

4. Gnosticism. The Gnostics find only a likeness of flesh in the incarnation, although the Gospel of Thomas accepts a full appearance in the flesh. In humans sárx is the evil principle, but it plays no great part in early systems and may at times be neutral. Jesus has the true flesh of which ours is a copy, and along these lines there may be resurrection of the flesh. The divine soul is concealed in the flesh for Valentinians, and some works find in redemption a release from the flesh. For the Naassenes the perfect ánthrōpos is not sarkikós but pneumatikós, and among the Manichees the carnal body gives birth to demons and is the root of all evil. In general, however, the negative evaluation of the flesh is not total, and while two-sphere thinking in substantial categories exerts an influence, we do not have a total antithesis to the NT. [E. SCHWEIZER, VII, 119-51]

satanás [Satan]

A. Qumran and Later Jewish Satanology.

1. Qumran. In one place the Scrolls oppose the prince of light to the angel of darkness. Since elsewhere the Scrolls assert God’s absolute sovereignty, this cannot imply dualism. The angel of darkness is the same as Belial elsewhere, whom God has created, with whom he is in conflict, who oppresses the righteous, and who will finally be judged. The term stn occurs in the Scrolls only three times in obscure connections.

2. Later Judaism. In Jubilees, Ethiopian Enoch, and rabbinic works the devil is still the accuser. The rabbis suggest that the devil is a fallen angel, although Qumran finds no place for this view. The pseudepigrapha play with the story of Gen. 6:1ff. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs poses a choice between the law of God and the work of Belial. Thus free decision replaces the stronger view of election held at Qumran, and this tends to crowd out the figure of Satan. A conviction common to all Judaism is that evil will finally be destroyed.

B. The NT.

l. The Accuser and His Fall. Satan in Lk. 22:31 has a role similar to that found in Job, but Jesus now opposes him with his intercession. In Rev. 12:7ff. Michael fights with Satan. The definitive fall of Satan takes place with the coming of Jesus (cf. Lk. 10:18). This terminates Satan's work of accusation and breaks his power to harm where the power of Jesus is at work. Jn. 12:31 agrees that the ruler of this world is already cast out (or judged, according to 16:11). In general, the NT does not refer to a primal fall of Satan. Thus Jn. 8:44 speaks of lying from (rather than in) the beginning (cf. 1 Jn. 3:8). Rev. 12:9 equates Satan with the serpent, but the NT does not relate Satan to the angel of death or the evil impulse.

2. Satan Sayings in the Synoptists. Mark and the special Lucan material use ho satanás. Elsewhere we find ho peirázōn, sataná, ho diábolos, ho echthrós, and ho ponērós. At the temptation Jesus gains a decisive victory over Satan's attempt to stop the coming of the kingdom of God. In Mt. 8:33 sataná might simply mean "opponent," but the point is that Peter is playing the same role as that played by Satan at the temptation. In Lk. 22:3 Satan enters Judas, but beyond that Satan has little part in the passion except inasmuch as the passion works out the victory at the temptation. In Mk. 3:22ff. the kingdom of evil forms a unit under the headship of Satan, and the possessed are liberated from subjection to this kingdom. In Lk. 13:16 Satan is also behind the woman's sickness (cf. Acts 10:38). Jesus, however, is stronger than the strong man and he binds him by his victory at the temptation, in which the cross and resurrection are already germinally present. In Mt. 13:19 the evil one snatches away the seed that falls along the path, and in Mt. 13:28 an enemy sows weeds among the wheat, so that children of the devil are present in the church (13:38-39), and the need for discipline arises (18:15ff.). No explanation of the origin of Satan is present in the Synoptists but they portray a single force that seeks human destruction and that is broken, although not yet completely eliminated, by the work of Jesus.

3. Satan Sayings in the Epistles. The older epistles usually have ho satanás ho peirázōn, or ho ponērṓs. Later epistles also use ho diábolos, and Revelation has ho satanás and ho diábolos, as well as ho katḗgōr, ho óphis, and ho drákōn. The devil attacks the community by means of persecutions (Rev. 2:10; 1 Pet. 5:8) and especially temptations (1 Th. 1ff.; 1 Cor. 7:5; 2 Cor. 2:11; Eph. 6:11; 1 Tim. 3:7; 2 Tim. 2:26). He may take the form of an angel of light in, e.g., libertinistic ideas (2 Cor. 11:14; cf. Rom. 16:20). Christ's blood, faith, and avoidance are the main defenses against his seduction (Rev. 12:11; Eph. 6:16; 1 Cor. 7:5). Satan may also block journeys (1 Th. 2:18) or cause sickness (Phil. 2:25ff.). In 1 Cor. 5:5, however, his destructive work can be put to saving use (cf. 2 Cor. 12:7). Outside the church his sway continues, so that an apostle's task is to enable people to turn from his power to God (Acts 26:18). At the end he will presumably be destroyed with every rule and authority (1 Cor. 15:24ff.).

4. The Prince of This World in John. John uses ho diábolos, ho satanás, ho ponērós, and ho árchōn toú kósmou as terms for the devil. The devil determines one's whole being (Jn. 8:44). Indeed, Judas can be called a devil (6:70; cf. Mk. 8:33; Lk. 22:3). 8:44 calls the devil a murderer, a liar, and the father of lies. This verse ignores theories as to Satan's origin. Believers are of God, sinners of the devil (1 Jn. 3:8, 12). The indicative contains an imperative (cf. 5:18), but victory is possible (2:13-14) only in virtue of Christ's intercession (Jn. 17:15). [W. FOERSTER, VII, 151-63]

C. The Apostolic Fathers.

1. Terms. Various terms are used in these works, e.g., diábolos, árchōn (qualified in different ways), energṓn, ponērós, antízēlos, báskanos, and ánomos.

2. General Material. The center of concern is salvation. Satan's power has been broken by the event of salvation. Yet he still opposes Christians.

3. The Church. In its unity the church defies Satan (Ignatius Ephesians 13.1), but his work may be seen in the breaking of unity (Trallians 8. 1). External hostility is discerned in Mart. Pol. 17. 1.

4. The Martyr. Martyrs wrestle with Satan (Mart. Pol. 3. 1). The devil uses the torments of martyrdom to try to break their will and win them over (Ignatius Romans 7.1).

5. Individual Christians. Living in the devil's world, Christians must be on guard (Barn. 18.1-2). Satan is the tempter (1 Clem. 51.1). In Hermas he may deceitfully speak truth through false prophets (Mandates 11.3), but the main point is that Christians choose between good and evil. Satan achieves power, therefore, in those who lack moral resolution or fail to use the chance given by the angel of repentance (Mandates 7.1ff.; 12.4ff.). [K. SCHÄFERDIEK, VII, 163-65]

sbénnymi [to quench]

A. The Greek World.

1. Literal Use.

a. This word means "to quench," passive "to go out"; b. "to suck dry" ("dry up"); c. "to die"; d. "to steam"; and e. in a transferred sense "to still," "damp down," "restrain," or intransitively "to rest," "abate," "die down."

2. Transferred Use. With various references to emotions, influence, strength, attraction, etc. the term means "to calm," "to suppress," or, passively, "to die out," "fade," "wane," "disappear."

B. Hellenistic Judaism.

1. In the LXX (some 45 times) the term is used literally for the quenching of fire or burning objects, figuratively for light or lamps going out, and in a transferred sense for the extinguishing of anger or stilling of emotions.

2. Philo and Josephus use the word similarly.

C. The NT.

1. Literal Use. Mk. 9:48 depicts eternal judgment under the figure of unquenchable fire. In Mt. 25:8 the foolish virgins find that their lamps are going out. Heb. 11:34 alludes to the protection of the three men in Dan. 3:23ff.

2. Figurative Use. Mt. 12:18ff. refers to Jesus the saying of Is. 42:1ff. about not quenching the smoldering wick. In Eph. 6:16 the shield of faith quenches the flaming darts of the evil one; they go out after striking the shield and falling to the ground.

3. Transferred Use. In 1 Th. 5:19 the admonition not to quench the Spirit has reference to the restraint of his manifestations in charisms (cf. v. 20), not to his suppression by impurity or sloth. In the context of a short church order the warning probably does not relate to any particular problem at Thessalonica.

D. Apostolic Fathers. In these works the term occurs only in biblical quotations or echoes. [F. LANG, VII, 165-68]

sébomai [reverence, worship], sebázomai [to worship], sébasma [object of worship], Sebastós [His Majesty], eusebḗs [pious], eusébeia [piety], eusebéō [to be pious], asebḗs [impious], asébeia [impiety], asebéō [to get impiously], semnós [worthy of respect], semnótēs [reverence] sébomai.

A. The Greek World.

1. Homeric Usage. In tune with the sense of the stem ("to fall back before"), Homer first uses this term for "to shrink from." The idea of shrinking from the gods leads to the sense of awe or reverence, first in the general form of respect, then in the more specifically religious form of veneration.

2. Classical and Hellenistic Usage. The meaning "to shrink from" still occurs, but respect is commonly the sense, e.g., for beauty or majesty, for country, parents, the dead, heroes, or benefactors, and, of course, the gods. Relative to the gods, the term takes an active turn and comes to be used not for mere reverence but for worship as a cultic act.

B. The LXX, Pseudepigrapha, Josephus, and Philo.

1. In the few instances in the LXX (cf. Josh. 4:24; Job 1:9; Jon. 1:9), often with no Hebrew original, sébomai may be rendered "to fear," but "to serve" is in some cases the best translation (as in Job 1:9).

2. The word is rare in the pseudepigrapha, phobeísthai being more common. When used, it expresses worship of the one true God in contrast to false gods.

3. Josephus uses the term for worship either of God or idols, and with an echo of the more general meaning "reverence." The same applies in Philo.

C. The NT. Mk. 7:7 uses the term when quoting Is. 29:13. It occurs in the accusation of Paul before Gallio in Acts 18:13, and also for the worship of Artemis in 19:27. Six times in Acts the sebómenoi are God-fearers (equivalent to phoboúmenoi, which would have sounded odd to the Greeks). The term denotes worship of the one true God and indicates that the Gentiles thus styled do not merely honor God but actively worship him.

1. This word, used for tenses of sébomai other than the present, undergoes the same development as sébomai.

2. It does not occur in the LXX but means "to worship" in, e.g., Sib. 5.405.

3. In the one NT instance in Rom. 1:25 the parallel latreúein shows that it bears the sense of active worship.

1. This term is used for an object of worship, e.g., an idol.

2. In Acts 17:23 it denotes objects of worship, including the altar as that toward which one worships. In 2 Th. 2:4 the reference is again a general one: The man of lawlessness exalts himself above all that is called God and every object of worship. This might include not only sacred objects but the orders of family, state, and law that are thought to stand under divine protection.

Sebastós.

1. This word, conferred on the emperor as a title in 27 B.C. (Lat.: Augustus), carries the sense of "sacred" or "holy."

2. As a general term the rare Gk. sebastós denotes anything to which religious reverence is paid. Used of the emperor, it denotes majesty, but it plays a special role when dead and later living emperors are the objects of worship.

3. In the NT only Festus uses it in Acts 25:21, 25, where it has an official ring. In Acts 27:1 speíra Sebastḗ is a term used elsewhere for auxiliary troops.

eusebḗs, eusébeia, eusebéō.

A. The Greek World.

1. Although these words have a general reference, they usually relate to the gods, as more precise definitions show, and they carry the sense of "piety."

2. In addition to the gods, relatives, rulers, judges, oaths, the law, and the good may all be objects; enjoying divine protection, they must be respected and upheld.

3. Whereas Plato finds piety in serving the gods by doing good, the popular view equates it with cultic worship, although often with some sense of the need for knowledge and an inner attitude of devotion.

4. In the Hellenistic period the main sense is worship, but the term still denotes respect for, e.g., relatives, spouses, or emperors. Philosophers locate true piety in living according to the will of the gods. For Plutarch true piety, as distinct from superstition, expects what is good from the gods. Worship means reverence for what is great and lofty, which is to be equated with the divine. Piety, then, is a virtue, not an unconditional personal commitment, but as awe at the pure and exalted world of divinity, as cultic worship, and as respect for the orders.

B. Judaism.

1. eusebeín does not occur in the LXX and is rare in other works. eusébeia is found in Is. 11:2; 33:6; Prov. 1:7; Sir. 49:3, and is common in 4 Maccabees. eusebḗs occurs eight times in the LXX.

2. In the Epistle of Aristeas eusébeia is connected with dikaiosýnē and denotes both Gentile respect for the OT God and respectful conduct toward others. It does not relate to the law, but it is a predominant theme in 4 Maccabees, which finds eusébeia in worshipping God and serving him by keeping the law.

3. Josephus displays a general usage but also equates eusébeia with keeping the law, a main part of which, of course, consists of faith and worship. If Josephus differs from the Greeks by making virtue a part of piety (instead of the reverse), he also regards piety as the cardinal virtue. He avoids speaking of the phóbos theoú (the fear of God).

4. In Philo, who uses the group some 200 times, the religious content is dominant. Relative to rulers or parents, the meaning is "to respect," but for the most part eusébeia denotes the relation to God. Legal observance is a matter of eusébeia but it embraces a true view of God and a turning from the sensory world to the spiritual world of true being. Greek influence emerges in his concept of eusébeia as the mean between superstition on the one side and impiety (asébeia) on the other.

C. The NT.

1. Except in the Pastorals and 2 Peter, the euseb- group never refers in the NT to Christian faith and life. In Acts 3:12 Peter claims no eusébeia, Cornelius and his soldier are called eusebḗs in Acts 10:2, 7, and Paul uses the verb for the worship of the Athenians in Acts 17:23. In this regard the NT follows the OT, sensing that eusébeia relates to divinity rather than to God and that it implies a moralistic view of conduct. On such grounds Paul speaks of faith and love rather than piety.

2. In the Pastorals the group denotes a manner of life. Thus the adverbs in Tit. 2:12 refer to conduct relative to self, others, and God. In 1 Tim. 4:7 exercise in eusébeia holds out a lasting promise. 1 Tim. 6:11 carries an exhortation to pursue it, but its omission in 2 Tim. 2:22 shows that it is not indispensable like faith or love. Over against the way of life associated with false teaching, eusébeia is the godliness that accords with sound teaching (1 Tim. 6:3; Tit. 1:1). False teachers have a form of it but it does not shape their lives, and they use it for gain (2 Tim. 3:5; 1 Tim. 6:5-6), thus missing the gain of true godliness. Christian eusébeia is not moralistic, for it is rooted in the Christ event (1 Tim. 3:16). It is not just outward worship, nor a mere concept of God, nor a virtue, nor an ideal. Over against a Gnosticizing asceticism that regards creation as bad and dissolves its orders, true eusébeia, born of faith, covers everyday conduct in honoring God as Creator and Redeemer, even though it may expect persecution from the very orders of God which it respects. The term eusébeia plays a role here probably because the author hopes that a manner of life that exhibits eusébeia will elicit a favorable verdict from non-Christians who set store by it. In this sense it is profitable for this world as well as the next (1 Tim. 4:8). Respect for the orders, however, is now grounded in the will of the Creator who is also Savior (4:10).

3. In 2 Pet. 1:6-7 self-control leads to steadfast waiting for the promises, and this to godliness, and this in turn to brotherly affection and love. In 2:7ff. eusébeia is the opposite of an ungodly walk. The plural in 3:11 covers the sum of godly actions. Similarly the singular in 1:3 has the general sense of a godly life, i.e., one that is morally good.

D. The Apostolic Fathers.

1. In 1 Clement eusébeia and eusebḗs (1.3; 11.1; 15.1) describe the life that is lived with an eye on God and which includes trust in him.

2. In 2 Clement there is a tendency to use eusébeia as a general term for “piety” or “religion” from the Christian standpoint.

3. The term theosébeia (cf. 1 Tim. 2:10) and derivatives incline in the same direction (cf. especially Diog. 1.1; 3.1ff.; 4.5-6; 6.4).

asebḗs, asébeia, asebéō.

A. The Greek World.

1. The development of this negative group parallels that of the positive euseb- group. Thus the first meaning is the more general one of contempt for established orders.

2. A usage may then be observed that restricts the group to the gods or to the divine sphere. Refusal to worship the city gods, or to fulfil cultic duties, is asébeia. Philosophers who reject popular deities are guilty of it in the mind of the people. For Plato asébeia embraces unworthy ideas of deity, and for Epictetus the refusal to honor divine gifts or to accept one’s divinely ordained lot is asébeia.

3. With the decline of the city-state and its official worship, philosophers distinguish between atheótēs (denial of the official gods) and asébeia (transgression of the ordinances). This distinction is an important one for Christians. Denying the official gods, they rank as átheoi, but they need not rank as asebeís. For this reason the Pastorals and 1 Peter admonish them to show eusébeia by their conduct, and in this way to refute the pagan charge that they are wrongdoers (1 Pet. 2:12).

B. Greek Judaism.

1. The LXX makes common use of the group, especially asebḗs. It always denotes action and not just attitude, nor is it restricted to the cultic sphere. Objective fact rather than subjective disposition is at issue (Am. 1:2). All deeds that transgress the law are asébeiai. The opposite of asebḗs in Proverbs is díkaios; a life is either contrary to God and the law or oriented to them. The LXX can make much freer use of the negative aseb- group than the euseb- group because, whereas the latter is too weak to denote the proper fear of God, the former serves excellently to express the contempt for God and his will that marks the wicked.

2. The group is rare in the pseudepigrapha.

3. Josephus uses the terms fairly often, usually with God as object, and at times with a distinction between asébeia and adikía.

4. Philo connects denial of God's existence (atheótēs) with asébeia. He associates asébeia with the desire that is the root of all evil. By opposing the asebḗs to the díkaios, he seems not to distinguish asébeia from adikía.

C. The NT.

1. The group does not occur in the Synoptic Gospels or Johannine writings, nor in James or Hebrews. There are four instances in Romans. In 1:18 Paul perhaps has offenses against the first and second tables of the law in view, although one should note that the common "all" connects asébeia and adikía, that the rabbis do not usually distinguish the two tables, and that the díkē against which there is offense (adikía) is God's righteousness. In Rom. 4:5 the ungodly might be the "irreverent" but are more likely "transgressors." This is clearly the point in 5:6. Rom. 11:26 is a quotation from Is. 59:20.

2. In the Pastorals, 1 Tim. 1:9 materially combines asebḗs and hamartōlós. The moral and religious consequences of teachings are the point in 2 Tim. 2:16; and in Tit. 2:12, although "irreligion" is probable as the opposite of eusébeia, willful transgression of the orders might also be included.

3. In 1 Pet. 4:18 (quoting Prov. 11:31) we find the common combination with hamartōlós. In Jude and 2 Peter great sinners of the past are called ungodly (2 Pet. 2:5-6), and false teachers are asebeís on account of their lives (and teaching?) (Jude 4, 18; 2 Pet. 2:6; 3:7).

semnós, semnótēs.

A. The Greek World.

1. As an attribute of the gods or divine things, semnós means "lofty."

2. Used of objects, it means "majestic," "splendid," "magnificent," and of music, poetry, oratory, etc. "sublime" (although also "proud").

3. semnós may denote the inner majesty of things, e.g., the number seven, human position, or deportment. semnós is that which evokes sébesthai in others. It thus embraces what is majestic or splendid, but only if signs of a higher order may be detected in it, and if it has an appropriate solemnity or seriousness (although not necessarily severity).

B. The LXX and Judaism.

1. semnós and semnótēs occur only eleven times in Proverbs and 2 and 4 Maccabees. In Prov. 6:8 and 8:6 the sense is probably "holy" or "sacred" (cf. 2 Maccabees). In 4 Maccabees the term expresses a favorable judgment on martyrs and the law, i.e., "worthy (of God)."

2. In the Epistle of Aristeas we find a use for the law but also a more general sense.

3. The use in Josephus and Philo parallels that in Greek authors. It may be noted, however, that Philo applies the group to God and the law and also to the suprasensory world, but as a human evaluation.

C. The NT.

1. In Phil. 4:8 semnós relates to human conduct. Paul, with an eye to outsiders, urges his readers to ponder and practice what is serious and noble and worthy of reverence, although he does not simply accept the judgment of outsiders on what this is.

2. The Pastorals require that the deacon, the deacon's wife, and the older person should be semnós (1 Tim. 3:8, 11; Tit. 2:2). The sense is "serious and worthy."

3. semnótēs occurs with eusébeia in 1 Tim. 2:2 in the sense of serious and worthy conduct. In 1 Tim. 3:4 the point is that children's obedience should be won by an authority that commands respect. In Tit. 2:7 the reference is to the manner and content of the teaching of Titus. With outsiders or opponents in view, it should show gravity or dignity.

D. The Apostolic Fathers.

1. In 1 Clem. 1.3 semnós denotes worthy, honorable, and disciplined conduct. This also seems to be the point of the noun in 41.1 (cf. also 7.2; 48.1).

2. A Christian attribute is denoted by the terms in Hermas (cf. Mandates 4.3.6; 5.2.8; 6.2.3; Similitudes 8.3.8). Everything connected with the world of Christian faith is semnós, and semnótēs is proper to it. [W. FOERSTER, VII, 168-96]

seíō [to shake, tremble], seismós [shaking, earthquake]

1. seíō goes back to a root denoting violent movement. It means "to move to and fro," "to disturb," "to shake." The noun usually means earthquake, the name Poseidon being associated with it. Earthquakes are regarded as bad omens. Philosophers attribute them to congestion of air or the movement of subterranean water. Astrologers relate them to signs of the zodiac and try to make out what they predict. They are commonly thought to accompany or presage theophanies.

2. The OT has vivid depictions of earthquakes, usually in theophanic connections (Ex. 19:18; 1 Kgs. 19:11-12). Earthquakes occur when God marches out to the holy war (Judg. 5:2ff.; Ps. 68:7ff.). The day of the Lord brings a shaking of heaven and earth (Is. 13:1ff.; Ezek. 7:1ff.). In Prov. 30:31 the personified earth shakes because of events that disturb its order.

3. The motif of the shaking of heaven and earth is a common one in later Jewish apocalyptic.

4. In the NT seíō has a transferred sense in Mt. 28:4 (the trembling of the guards) and 21:10 (the people's excitement). anaseíō (transitive) means "to stir up" in Mk. 15:11. Cosmic disturbances are at issue in Mt. 27:51; Heb. 12:26; Rev. 6:13. Earthquakes are among the signs of the last time in Mk. 13:8; Mt. 24:7; Lk. 21:11, and Revelation includes them among the terrors of the end in 6:12; 8:5; 11:13, 19; 16:18. Heb. 12:26 contrasts the shaking of the earth alone at Sinai with the final shaking of both heaven and earth. Mt. 8:23 uses seismós for the great storm that arises on the lake, perhaps suggesting a parallel with the events of the last time and the ongoing protection of the disciples by Jesus. Matthew also refers to earthquakes accompanying Christ's death and resurrection (27:51, 54; 28:2). These indicate the eschatological significance of Christ's work, and the associated raising of the saints denotes the invading of the realm of the dead by the divine Victor. As shaking (salythḗnai) signifies God's answer to prayer in Acts 4:31, so a liberating earthquake is God's response to the prayers and songs of Paul and Silas in 16:25-26. [G. BORNKAMM, VII, 196-200]

NT New Testament

sēmeíon [sign, mark], sēmaínō [to signify, indicate], sēmeióō [to denote, signify], ásēmos [insignificant], epísēmos [distinguished], sýssēmon [signal, standard] sēmeíon.

A. The Greek World.

I. Linguistic Data. sēmeíon develops from sḗma and shares with it the sense of "sign" or "mark."

II. Usage.

1. Early Epic.

a. In Homer sḗma denotes optical impressions that convey insights, e.g., signs like lightning that indicate the will of Zeus. The signs, which may, of course, be simply pointers, are characterized by prominence and visibility. At first the word contains an active element. sēmeíon perhaps develops because of the need for a more abstract term.

b. Acoustic omens come to be included among signs (e.g., thunder), although at first the visible aspect remains strong, as may be seen from the use of phaínō for perceiving the sign, and from the continuing emphasis on the clarity of the sḗma.

c. The general sense of a mark by which someone or something is recognized makes possible a varied use, e.g., for monuments, finishing posts in races, or identifying marks on the body.

d. Despite divergent use, the sense is uniform. What is meant is an object or circumstance that conveys a perception or insight. The perception may be moral or religious, but the term as such is not intrinsically a religious one.

2. Other Works.

a. Direct Use. In its direct use the sḗma or sēmeíon may be the symptom of an illness, the scent of an animal, the ensign of a ship, the certifying mark on an animal for sacrifice, the diadem of a ruler, the signet of a ring, the device on a shield, the brand on flocks, etc. sēmeíon tends to crowd out sḗma, but the latter continues to be used for monuments. In every instance one thing makes possible the correct identification and classification of another.

b. Transferred Use. In the military sphere the sēmeíon becomes a command to depart. It is a manifestation of will that impresses itself on others. In the religious sphere the gods give such manifestations of their will, although in this case interpretations must be given. In philosophy sēmeíon takes on the sense of demonstration with a logical reference. Everywhere the term is a technical one with a stress on perception and resolve.

c. sēmeía kaí térata. At first these terms come together to denote omens that the superstitious perceive in times of crisis. Two things that are not really the same combine in the formula because both are significant in times of human helplessness.

III. Gnosticism. sēmeíon plays no independent role in Gnosticism. In the Hermetic writings it has such varied senses as "constellation," "proof," "mark," and "form in which the nature of a thing comes to expression." The equivalent in Mandaean works simply means "sign," "mark," or "characteristic." Baptism is a "pure sign" or a "sign of life."

B. The Jewish World.

I. The Greek OT.

1. General Material. sēmeíon occurs in the Greek OT some 125 times. The main usage is in the Pentateuch and the prophets. In Ezek. 9:4, 6 sēmeíon conveys the sense of the original, as also perhaps in Jer. 6:1. In Num. 21:8-9; Is. 11:12 the reference is to something easily perceived. In some four-fifths of the instances in the canon, however, sēmeíon is used for Heb. 'ôṯ.

2. 'ôṯ in the OT.

a. Linguistic Data. The term is of uncertain etymology and meaning. Attempts to link it with an Akkadian ittu for "oracular sign," or to construe it commercially as "advice," or to find an original sense of a "fixed time," are all unsuccessful.

b. The Lachish Ostraca. In this military report the term obviously means the "signal" that can be given by some signaling device for the transmission of information.

c. General OT Use. Found some 79 times in the OT, mostly in the Pentateuch, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, the term often (18 times) goes together with that for "wonders," which always comes second and which occurs alone only in later books.

d. An Object of Sense Perception. The term denotes something that may be perceived, and especially seen. Thus Ps. 86:17 prays for a visible sign of favor. In Gen. 9:12ff. the rainbow is a covenant sign. Num. 14:22 refers to signs done in Egypt. Circumcision is a visible sign in Gen. 17:10ff. So is the blood daubed on the doorposts at the exodus in Ex. 12:7ff. Each tribe has its sign in Num. 2:2. The stones that mark the crossing of the Jordan are visible signs and a lasting memorial in Josh. 4:6ff. Hearing is associated with a sign only in Ex. 4:8, and even here the hearing follows a visible sign that validates Moses and thus gains a hearing for him. The verbs used with 'ôt stress its visible character (cf. Ex. 10:1-2; Gen. 4:15; Ps. 135:9; 1 Sam. 2:34), and so does the reference to God's hand in connection with the signs in Egypt. The concept is a formal one that derives its more precise sense from the circumstances in which it occurs, whether these be secular or sacral. It does not in itself denote divine revelation, but in its function of indicating, confirming, and promising insight it may be a pointer to revelation.

e. A Means of Confirmation. In some cases the sign does not merely indicate but establishes a certainty not previously present and thus serves to confirm. This is the point in Job 21:29, where experience shows that the doctrine of retribution does not hold water. In Josh. 2:1ff. the sign confirms the oath to Rahab that her family will be saved. In Josh. 4:1ff. (cf. Gen. 9:15) the signs serve as reminders and are thus a basis of confidence. The mark of Cain in Gen. 4:15 serves as a sign of protection rather than a mark of guilt. The expression "to be [as] a sign" (Ex. 13:8; Num. 16:38) makes a similar point. Thus in Ex. 8:18-19 the plague makes it plain to Pharaoh with whom he has to do, although in this instance it has the effect of hardening rather than instructing. In Num. 14:11 faith ought to be the result (cf. also Ex. 4:8). In the OT the sign is an external reality in history that is directed to eyewitnesses and points them to something else with a view to conveying insight, granting confirmation, and evoking decisions that have historical consequences.

f. God's Signs and Wonders. Relative to God's signs and wonders the style takes on almost a hymnic character. The reference is usually to the exodus and the combination is especially common in Deuteronomy. The emphasis in it is on God's action in a revolutionary intervention in human affairs (cf. also Is. 8:18).

cf. confer, compare

g. Symbolical Prophetic Actions. Actions claiming to be signs are common in the prophets. God commands these signs, they presuppose eyewitnesses, they have an intrinsic quality of proclamation, and they acquire force from the prophetic word. Unlike oracular signs, they do not try to read the future but to extract the future from the present.

h. Daniel and the Targums. The Aramaic equivalent occurs three times in Daniel (3:32-33; 6:28) in a way that confirms the general OT use. In the Targums the reference is to the plagues of Egypt and the usage preserves the formal character of the term.

i. Summary. The survey brings to light the formal nature of the Hebrew term that the LXX renders sēmeíon and also the tendency of the term to lose its original breadth in the postexilic period.

3. sēmeíon in the LXX.

a. Formal Character. Being also formal, sēmeíon serves well as an equivalent for the Hebrew, e.g., as a mark, an emblem, a monument, the Passover blood, a covenant sign (the rainbow, circumcision, the sabbath), a prophetic sign, or a divine action. Under Hebrew influence the formal character becomes stricter. This limits the use but increases the interpretative aptness.

b. Interpretatively. In some passages sēmeíon adds precision where the Hebrew does not use ’ôṯ e.g., Ex. 7:9; 11:9-10; 2 Chr. 32:24; Is. 11:12; Ezek. 9:4, 6, etc. In Josh. 2:18 the translation uses sēmeíon to show why Rahab is to hang out the cord that she is given.

c. sēmeía kaí térata. This formula, based on the parallel Hebrew in Deuteronomy, denotes God’s wonders in Egypt. It may be noted that Θ drops the verse Dan. 4:2 in which Nebuchadnezzar speaks of signs and wonders to himself, but retains 6:27 (Darius).

II. Greek Judaism outside the Bible.

1. Philo. Philo follows LXX usage at times (e.g., the mark of Cain or the stars as sēmeía). Yet he also uses sēmeíon in wider Greek senses, e.g., for symptom or proof. In allegory it has the meaning “pointer.” The Bible is for Philo a treasury of sēmeía. Miracles, however, play little part in his usage and he uses sēmeía kaí térata only traditionally for the wonders in Egypt.

2. Josephus. Like Philo, Josephus follows the LXX (e.g., the mark of Cain) but also uses sēmeía for military “signals” or “passwords.” As a formal term sēmeíon can also denote for Josephus something that produces knowledge or certainty by means of impressions, e.g., an experience that carries with it intimations. The sēmeíon might be a miracle (a téras) but does not have to be. Wishing to protect the wonders in Egypt from a magical understanding, Josephus simply calls them sēmeía, not sēmeía kaí térata. When God works a téras, it is important only as a sēmeíon whereby God shows that he is the one and only true God.

3. Apocalyptic. A common idea in later Jewish apocalyptic is that visible cosmic changes will precede the beginning of the end; these are sēmeía.

C. Postbiblical Judaism.

I. Dead Sea Scrolls.

LXX Septuagint

1. Biblical Usage. In the Qumran material we find instances of the use of ’ôṯ for visible phenomena that serve to confirm or indicate. These range from heavenly luminaries to battle standards (perhaps influenced by Lat. signum).

2. A New Sense? In one place the meaning “letter” is possible, but the common “sign” is also a possibility.

II. Rabbinic Literature.

1. Mark. ’ôt plays only a modest role in the rabbis. It first has the sense of a distinguishing mark or sign, but the term is rare in this sense.

2. Letter. The main use of ’ôt in the rabbis is for a single letter of the Hebrew alphabet, whose characters reveal God’s will and are thus regarded sacrally.

III. sîmān in Rabbinic Usage.

1. General Considerations. This word, which may be a loanword, and is shaped by ’ôt, tends to replace the latter for “mark” or “sign.”

2. Mark. It serves to denote symptoms of an illness, features of a place, characteristics of a person, intimations of the future, signs of God’s favor or disfavor, astronomical signs whereby to fix the calendar.

3. Special Use. A special academic use is for a “cue” or “catchword,” for a “proof text,” or for “n” as a kind of diacritical mark.

D. The NT.

I. General Data.

1. Statistics. In the NT sēmeíon occurs some 73 times, ten in Matthew, seven in Mark, ten in Luke, 24 in Johannine works, 13 in Acts 1-15 (mostly plural and nine times with téras), eight in Paul, and one in Hebrews.

2. Parallels.

a. téras. This word occurs only in the plural with sēmeía.

b. dýnamis. This occurs with sēmeía kaí térata in Acts 2:22; 2 Th. 2:9, but also independently in the plural for miracles, especially in Matthew, but not at all in John (though cf. the verb in Jn. 3:2; 9:16).

c. érgon. This word lies alongside sēmeíon in John, and one has thus to define the exact relation between them.

3. Preliminary Remarks. On the one side sēmeíon occurs with verbs that denote human activity or that objectify it so that one can ask for it, see it, or accept or deny it. On the other side it is from heaven or from God. In two instances (the sign of healing in Acts 4:22 and that of the Son of Man in Mt. 24:30) what is signified is beyond human competence but comes into the human sphere by means of the sēmeíon. When a sēmeíon occurs in the NT, humans are always involved and there is a pointer to human responsibility, but the variety of possibilities makes classification difficult.

II. The Synoptic Gospels and Acts.

1. Sign or Mark. In the OT phrase that Luke uses in 2:12, the sign demonstrates the truth of the message. Perception of certain data serves a purpose of confirmation. The sēmeíon given to the shepherds sets them in motion (v. 15) so that they themselves implicitly become a sign to Mary. In Mt. 26:48 Judas uses the kiss as a sign indicating whom the guard should arrest. In Mt. 24:3 the disciples ask for a sign of

v. verse

Christ's parousia. This does not have to be a miraculous or apocalyptic sign. In itself it simply makes the parousia recognizable. The sēmeía in Lk. 21:25 are astronomical signs but even these signs of the parousia are not apocalyptic as such.

2. The Sign of Jonah. In Mt. 12:39-40 Jesus applies to himself the sign of Jonah. The point of this obscure statement is that Jonah himself is the sign in the sense that God chooses him and works through him and through his call for repentance. The stress on the person comes out in the added saying that a greater than Jonah is now present (12:41). The sign takes on added significance with Christ's death and resurrection (cf. the future in Lk. 11:30), but in any case Jesus in his prophetic self-portrayal bursts through prophetic categories (cf. also the enigmatic comparatives in Mt. 11:9 and 12:6; Lk. 7:26).

3. The Demand for a sēmeíon. The saying in Mt. 12:38ff. is the reply to the demand for a sēmeíon (cf. Mt. 16:1; Lk. 23:8). This demand arises primarily in scribal circles and is for one sign, with God as the author, that will convincingly authenticate the ministry of Jesus and refute all doubts concerning him. The Synoptists use dýnamis, not sēmeíon, for the miracles of Jesus, and it is these dynámeis (which opponents attribute to sorcery) that prompt the demand for a sign; for the rabbis, who ground their authority in Scripture, suspect miracles if they are purely human acts that lack a specific divine commission. The demand seems natural inasmuch as Jesus acts in his own power and asserts his freedom from tradition. Yet it is a wrong demand inasmuch as it seeks to impose its own principles on God and is thus an attack on the divine freedom (cf. Lk. 11:29; Mt. 12:39).

4. The Sign of the Son of Man. This phrase occurs only in Matthew (24:30), where the sign appears prior to the coming and the gathering of the elect. Although mysterious, it is clearly terrifying and brings the present order to an ineluctable end. Like Rev. 1:7, Mt. 24:30 combines Zech. 12:12, 14 and Dan. 7:13-14, but Revelation puts Daniel first, whereas Matthew puts Zechariah first. Possibly the sign is given so that there may be a last chance to repent. The sign can hardly be the cross, nor the Son of Man himself, but it plainly intimates the imminent parousia.

5. sēmeíon antilegómenon (Lk. 2:34). In a passage that has an OT coloring Simeon calls the child Jesus a sign that is spoken against. God posits this sign for the disclosure of inner thoughts as some accept it and others contest it. It is in relation to this sign, therefore, that there is falling and rising in Israel in fulfilment of the messianic mission of Jesus.

6. Acts. In Acts 4:16, 22 sēmeíon occurs in connection with the healing of the lame man, and in 8:6, 13 (with dynámeis in v. 13) it describes the work of Philip. As in the nine instances of sēmeía kaí térata, the usage is much the same as in the Synoptics. The works are signs inasmuch as they are evident happenings that point to him in whose name and power they are performed. By them, as by the word, Jesus shows that he is the living Lord whom God himself authenticates. The new feature in Acts is that in the new situation inaugurated by Christ's death and resurrection there is now a chain of sēmeía, i.e., of indications that no one can miss. The mighty works are not marvels. They demand interpretation and are thus subordinate to the word (by which faith lives) as obedient and unselfish acts that are done in the power of Jesus and for his sake.

7. sēmeía kaí térata. This phrase occurs in Mt. 24:24/Mk. 13:22, nine times in Acts 1-8, three times in Paul, and once in Jn. 4:48.

i.e. id est, that is

a. In Mt. 24:24/Mk. 13:22 the doing of sēmeía kaí térata is projected into the future as part of the picture of pseudo-messiahs, although this does not rule out their performance by the true Messiah as the promised prophet.

b. In Acts present sēmeía kaí térata mark the new age of eschatological redemption as they previously marked the time of Mosaic liberation. Acts 2:19 and 7:36 carry allusions to Joel 2:30 and Ex. 7:3 and typologically demonstrate that the predicted eschatological age has come.

(a) In a first group of sēmeía kaí térata references Jesus, Moses, and the apostles all have a place (cf. 6-7).

(b) In a second group the spotlight is on the apostles but in such a way that it moves from Jesus to them, for he it is who is at work in their acts (4:30; 14:3). Where typology is to the fore, the order térata kaí sēmeía occurs (cf. 6:8; 7:36), although in view of the common theme it is not wholly clear why this should be so.

III. sēmeíon in the Johannine Writings.

1. General Features.

a. John has sēmeíon in the formal sense of “sign” or “pointer” (cf. “portent” in Rev. 12:1, 3, “proof” in Jn. 2:18, “wonderful act” in Rev. 13:13-14).

b. The common reference is to visual perception and the confirmation it gives (cf. Jn. 2:23; 6:14; Rev. 15:11; Jn. 10:32ff.; 14:9ff.).

c. As in the Synoptics, people ask Jesus for a sēmeíon (even after the miracle of feeding in 6:1ff.; cf. also 2:18).

d. The phrase sēmeía kaí térata occurs in 4:48 in a polemical context, but perhaps echoing again the Mosaic redemption. The point is that now that Jesus is himself present sēmeía kaí térata are superfluous and must not be made a basis of faith. Jesus does not have to perform signs and wonders in self-authentication even though he comes as the new Moses; at this point there is perhaps a difference between the type and the antitype. At any rate the resurrection grants the church independence of sēmeía kaí térata (cf. 20:29).

2. Distinctive Aspects.

a. In both John and Revelation sēmeíon takes over the role of dýmamis in the Synoptics. Johannine sēmeía are acts related to him who does them (Jn. 3:2). Their quality derives from the quality of their author (9:16). Thus the beast, too, performs great signs but these lead into idolatry (13:13ff.). The many signs of Jesus are distinctly miraculous (2:23; 3:2; 11:47; 12:37), but they bear a messianic character (2:11; 4:54; 6:14) inasmuch as they put an end to disease and want. John does not refer to the curing of lepers or to exorcisms; he mentions sēmeía that seem designed to present Jesus as the Messiah.

b. John never calls a saying of Jesus a sēmeíon.

c. It is mostly the author (2:11, 23, etc.) or others (3:2; 7:31; 9:16) who use the term sēmeíon, Jesus himself only in 6:26. In John, as distinct from the Synoptics, Acts, or the surrounding world, the term is a key one in theological interpretation.

3. sēmeíon and érgon.

a. General. In John the 27 érga passages bear a clear relation to the sēmeía (cf. 5:20, 36; 6:29; 7:3, 21; 9:3-4; 10:25, etc.). The érga are sēmeía as God's own érga (4:34; 5:36; 9:3-4). Jesus uses érgon for what the author calls sēmeíon.

b. Sign Character of the érga.

(a) Although the érga are Jesus' own, he does not call them his. He does them (5:36 etc.) in a unique fellowship with the Father (3:35; 8:19; 12:45; 14:9ff.). He does them only when his hour comes (2:4), but he knows this hour (13:1) and in it does God's own acts (2:1ff.; 6:1ff.; 11:1ff.), i.e., the acts God gives him to do (5:36).

(b) The érga are sēmeía because as his they serve God's self-revelation. They are not just miracles; they bring a new view of God inasmuch as the Father may be known only through the Son (8:19, 54-55; 14:7). Only Jesus can truly interpret the sēmeía, as he does in the revelatory discourses that follow them.

c. The sēmeía as God's Witness to the Son. In Jn. 12:37ff. (cf. Is. 53:1) the sēmeía are attributed to God. In Jesus human destiny is decided here and now according to God's will. His érga have divisive power. Promoting God's self-revelation, they also characterize Jesus as the Son. They are not mere symbols imparting knowledge; reflecting the nature of Jesus, they call for faith, into which, of course, knowledge is integrated.

4. sēmeíon and Faith. The aim of the gospel is faith in Jesus as the Christ, God's Son (Jn. 20:31). The sēmeía establish faith, but God is the content of this faith, not the sēmeía. The sēmeía are the Son's revelation of the Father and the Father's confession of the Son. As such they are a basis of faith in God. Although discourses often expound the sēmeía, in 2:1ff. and 4:47ff. there is a causal connection between faith and the sēmeíon. Encounter with the person of Jesus in the sēmeíon leads to seeing or knowing (2:11; 4:53). The added words of revelation confer on the sēmeía an enduring power to establish faith, so that they become a permanent part of the divine message. The sēmeía neither relate to mere compassion nor to prophetic claims. They are signs that Jesus is the Christ as both Revealer and Revealed. They take precedence over the word so long as Jesus is in the flesh (1:14; 7:39). After Easter the community has the word, and new sēmeía are not essential.

5. sēmeíon and Word. In John the sēmeía point indirectly to the one Jesus really is, while the lógoi give direct information. The lógoi display the same freedom as the érga. They interpret the sēmeía; the sēmeía confirm the lógoi. They both find their unity in the person of him who shows himself to be he who acts and who has the right to say "I am." Whereas in the OT human interpreters say who God is and what he wills and does, in John Jesus himself interprets what he does with reference to himself and the Father (cf. 5:17; 8:25; 11:1ff.).

6. sēmeíon and dóxa. The glory of Christ or God is manifested at Cana and in the raising of Lazarus, and the faith of the disciples is linked with this manifestation. Faith arises when it sees the glory in the sēmeíon (1:14; 12:37ff.). The glory of Jesus is that of his true being. It is the presupposition of his doing God's work and hence a sign of his preexistence. The glory manifests his omnipotence and impresses the disciples with his majesty. The link with glory shows that for John a sēmeíon is no mere symbol. The term is a central one both theologically and christologically. Since it discloses human sin, its anthropological bearing is ethical (9:41). In the sēmeía of Jesus the eschatological krísis that he brings becomes unmistakable and unavoidable.

7. sēmeía of the Risen Lord. The reference in Jn. 20:30-31 is not to the resurrection or the resurrection appearances, for in John these are more directly the work of God, and the issue in Jn. 20 is the self-witness of the risen Lord (vv. 17, 20, 27), not the giving of new sēmeía. Nor do we have here a reference to the crucifixion, which in John does not present a sign even though the Father glorifies the Son therein. The "many other signs," then, are the various works that Jesus did from which the author has made a selection; the number as such is unimportant. The "many other things" (not signs) of 21:25 might include the events of ch. 21, but John seems careful not to number the crucifixion and resurrection among the signs.

8. John's Special Use of sēmeía.

a. Distinctiveness. The use of sēmeía for Jesus' self-manifestation in his works is peculiar to John. It finds a negative counterpart in Revelation with its use of the term for the miracles of the prophet of antichrist.

b. OT Background. The use derives, not from Hellenistic Gnosticism, but from the LXX. Here sēmeíon points to the self-declaration of the one God as Israel's God, and it bears a relation to faith on the one side and glory on the other. The works of Jesus are of the same kind as God's works at the exodus. The glory of the works, as in the OT, lies in the manifestation of the divine power. The difference is that the reference is now to Jesus, who unites with God those who unite themselves to him.

c. The Typological Character of Johannine sēmeía. John gives the sēmeía a typological accent, emphasizing that Jesus is the "prophet" (4:19) and the Passover lamb of eschatological redemption. The sēmeía thus have a similar function to the sēmeía of the exodus. Yet as Jesus surpasses Moses, so his work surpasses that of Moses. Hence the sēmeía acquire enhanced significance. Jesus is a new Moses but he is more, for he acts as God and thereby shows himself to be the Son of God.

IV. The Rest of the NT.

1. Paul.

a. General. Paul uses sēmeíon only eight times. sēmeía kaí tērata occurs in Rom. 15:19; 2 Cor. 12:12; 2 Th. 2:9. The usage is traditional. In the new situation of apostolic witness, the problem of the sēmeíon that arises for Jesus now arises for his authorized representatives.

b. Specific. In Rom. 4:11 the meaning is "sign" or "mark," perhaps indicating that circumcision is a covenant sign (cf. the reading peritomḗn rather than peritomḗs). In 2 Cor. 12:12 the signs of an apostle are visible things that identify an apostle, i.e. the mighty works of the age of redemption. In 1 Cor. 1:22 Paul rejects the Jewish demand that he should prove his claim with signs. In 1 Cor. 14:22 tongues are a sign for unbelievers inasmuch as they make evident to them their unbelief. In 2 Th. 3:17 the sēmeíon is a proof of authenticity. It is something visible that confers assurance. Why Paul adds his own greeting as a sēmeíon is not immediately clear. In Rom. 15:19 Paul applies sēmeía kaí térata to the works that he does as an apostle in the power of the Spirit (cf. 2 Cor. 12:12). In 2 Th. 2:9, however, the parousia of antichrist, aping that of Christ, is accompanied by pretended signs and wonders.

2. Hebrews. Heb. 2:4 uses an expanded form of the sēmeía kaí térata formula to describe the things that God does to accredit apostolic preaching and to show the superiority of the gospel to the law. The reference of the sēmeía kaí térata is to the credibility of preachers. Their supporting function is rooted in God's will.

E. The Apostolic Fathers. The term is rare in the apostolic fathers, and the few instances conform to ordinary usage. Lot's wife is a sign in 1 Clem. 11.2, the mark on Rahab's house is a sign in 12.7, a verse of Scripture is a pointer in 2 Clem. 15.4, the phenomena of the parousia are proofs in Did. 16.4, the phoenix myth is a sign in 1 Clem. 25.1ff. 1 Clem. 51.5 uses sēmeía kaí térata for the wonders in Egypt, and Barn. 5.8 uses the phrase in a typological understanding of the age of Moses relative to that of Jesus. Barn. 12.5 refers the serpent typologically to Jesus as a sēmeíon. Did. 16.6 is obscure: The opening of heaven, or the outstretching of the arms of Jesus on the cross, may be the sēmeíon intended.

A. Greek Use. This word means "to indicate," often in the sense "to order," "to direct." It is used in such senses as "to give a sign or signal," "to signify," "to announce," "to declare," and "to mean."

B. Greek Judaism.

1. sēmaínō is used for various Hebrew terms meaning "to impart," "to point," "to intimate," and even "to blow [the trumpet] as a sign."

2. In Philo the term means "to signify," "to represent," "to denote," "to mean" (especially with reference to the deeper signification of the OT).

3. In Josephus the meanings are "to tell," "to notify," "to intimate," "to make known," "to signify," and, with reference to documents, "to seal."

C. The NT.

1. In Acts 25:27 Festus needs to examine Paul further in order that he may be able to "indicate" or "show" what the charges against him are.

2. In Acts 11:28 Agabus "signifies by the Spirit," i.e., foretells, that there will be a famine. In Rev. 1:1 the thought is similar: God gives Jesus the revelation to show his servants what must take place, and Jesus then "makes it known" to John through the angel, i.e., "indicates" or "declares" it.

3. Jn. 12:33; 18:32; 21:19 contain intimations of Jesus concerning the manner of death, first of himself, then of Peter. None of us knows either the time or the manner of death unless God shows it, but Jesus can tell how both he and Peter will die. Hence sēmaínō in this context points to his divine dignity even while retaining its purely formal character.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. In these works semaínō occurs only in some versions of Barn. 15.4, where, in an exposition of Gen. 2:2, it has the sense "to have the deeper meaning" (cf. Philo).

1. This word means "to denote," "to signify," "to seal," "to signal," "to mark for oneself," "to diagnose," "to certify."

2. The LXX uses the word only in Ps. 4:6: In God's turning worshippers receive a sign that good things are present for them in God.

3. Philo uses only the middle in such senses as "to characterize," "to show," "to signify," "to get proof."

4. In the NT 2 Th. 3:14 contains the admonition to note those who refuse to obey the apostolic injunctions. The shunning probably applies to spiritual fellowship or common meals, not to everyday matters.

5. 1 Clem. 43.1 uses the word for "to note" with reference to Moses and the hieraí bíbloi written by him.

1. This word means "without sḗma or characteristic," and takes on such senses as "unstamped," "without emblems," "inarticulate," "obscure," "insignificant," but also "without blemish," i.e., distinguishing mark.
2. In the LXX the meanings are "unimportant" and "insignificant" (Gen. 30:42; Job 42:11).
3. Philo refers to an "insignificant" family, and Josephus speaks of those who are of "obscure or doubtful" lineage.
4. Acts 21:39 has Paul use a common literary device when he calls his native Tarsus "no mean city"; the deliberately restrained description gives the greater emphasis.

epísēmos.

1. This word means "having a distinguishing mark" and takes on such senses as "stamped," "labeled," "showing symptoms."
2. In the LXX it denotes a feast day in Esth. 5:4, an outstanding person in 3 Macc. 6:1, and a generally visible place in 1 Macc. 11:37.
3. Philo uses the word in such senses as "recognizable," "distinguished," "superior," and "clear." In Josephus it means "stamped," "distinguished," "significant," and also "infamous" or "notorious."
4. Rom. 16:7 uses the term in a good sense when it refers to Andronicus and Junias as "significant" or "highly regarded" men in the apostolic circle. In Mt. 27:16, however, Barabbas is outstanding in the bad sense of "notorious." The word is not here a technical one for the leader of a band of Zealots.
5. In the apostolic fathers the word occurs only in the Martyrdom of Polycarp, in which it reflects incipient martyr terminology (3.1) as well as describing Polycarp as an "outstanding" teacher (1i.1).

1. This late word has such senses as "signal," "standard," and in the plural "insignia."
2. In the LXX it means "signal" in Judg. 20:38 and "banner" in Is. 5:26.
3. Mk. 14:44 calls Judas' kiss a sýssēmon, thus showing that it is a "prearranged sign."
4. The apostolic fathers use the term only once in Ignatius Smyrneans 1.2, which gives Is. 5:26 a christological reference. [K. H. RENGSTORF, VII, 200-269]

sḗmeron [today]

A. Presuppositions in Greek. This word denotes a span of human activity embracing a day up to the evening. It is the time at our disposal, perhaps the last such.

B. Presuppositions in the OT and Judaism.

1. The OT day begins in the evening, and the day is the time of dealings with God. What takes place "today" is from God. On the sabbath believers are bound to "this day." Today means fulfilment, whether in revelation, salvation, or judgment. What is said today, e.g., an oath or covenant, decides what follows. If today is lost, existence is threatened. God's word and today should be commensurate. Today becomes address, and hence looks back to the past and forward to the future. It discloses its truth as the claim to obedience issued by the Lord of history who shows his people what they should do. It is the time of decision between God and his people (cf. Dt. 4:1; 26:17ff.; 30:15ff.).
2. Philo in his use of the term reflects the OT unity between God's word and the reality that is thereby ordained either positively or negatively for us.

3. Josephus, like Philo, uses the term mostly in OT quotations. Apart from the nontheological use, the term is significant because in it God's revelation seeks expression in Israel's history; his will is proclaimed "today."

C. NT Usage.

1. Nontheological Usage.

a. In Mt. 27:19 Pilate's wife has had a bad dream today; this is an omen for a decisive day, but the immediate sense is the ordinary one. The usual sense is also present in the petition of Mt. 6:11: believers ask today for their daily bread from God. Similarly in 6:30 believers should orient themselves to God's provision today if they are to escape anxiety. In 16:3 the reference is to today's weather, in 21:28 the father asks his son to work today, and in Mk. 14:30 sḗmeron is juxtaposed with "this very night" to the extent that the day begins rather than ends with the evening; Mt. 26:34 leaves out sḗmeron.

b. In Acts 4:9; 19:40; 20:26; 24:21; 26:2, 29; 27:33 sḗmeron is the day when a speaker gives his address. A foolish sense of mastery over one's own time is the point in Jms. 4:13. There is some allegorizing in Lk. 13:31ff.; the hóti clause in v. 33 gives the saying theological significance.

c. The emphatic saying in Lk. 23:43 is that of one who is on the point of death; it sets the immediate future in contrast with the present situation.

2. Theological Usage.

a. The style is liturgical in Heb. 13:8. Rom. 11:8 and Mt. 27:8 use a common LXX phrase. The note in Mt. 28:15 points up the emptiness of the explanation. A different judgment is present in Mt. 11:23. Paul stresses the alternative of judgment and promise in 2 Cor. 3:14 (cf. also Lk. 4:21; 5:25; 2:11 for the fulfilment of the promise). Acts 13:33 relates the resurrection to the second psalm. Jesus, who proclaims Scripture to be valid, is himself the fulfilment.

b. Hebrews confirms this point in the enthronement exegesis of 1-2 and the exposition of Ps. 95 in 3-4. Since the "today" of the psalm comes in the time of neither Joshua nor David, it applies to those who, hearing today, hold fast their confession of Jesus as the Son of God and High Priest, for he has united his heavenly rank with his high-priestly sacrifice (cf. 5:5-6), and has thus given the "today" its decisive and definitive theological meaning.

D. Apostolic Fathers. In these works the term occurs some seven or eight times, mostly in quotations. It carries a full stress in the prayer of Mart. Pol. 14.2.

→ heméra, nýn [E. FUCHS, VII, 269-75]

sḗpō → saprós

sḗs [moth], sētóbrōtos [moth-eaten]

1. Various kinds of butterflies or moths are denoted by the noun; the usual reference is to moths in clothes.

2. Is. 51:8 offers the only OT instance with the specific Hebrew original.

3. The moth illustrates feminine malice in Sir. 42:13 and transitoriness in Job 27:18. Prov. 14:30 uses sḗs, and Job 13:28 has the adjective ("consumed by moths"). Job 4:19; 27:18; Is. 50:9 also use sḗs.

4. Jesus in Mt. 6:19-20; Lk. 12:33 demands renunciation of earthly treasures, which are all threatened by moth, rust, or theft; the emphasis, however, is on orientation to the true and lasting treasures that are secure from damage or loss. Jms. 5:2 threatens the imminent and ineluctable end of earthly riches with a realism that is enhanced apocalyptically; no efforts can save this kind of wealth.

5. Depicting weak believers, Hermas Similitudes 8.1 uses the image of staves that are consumed by moths or small insects. In OT quotations sḗs also occurs in 1 Clem. 39.5 and Barn. 6.2. [O. BAUERNFEIND, VII, 275-78]

sikários [assassin, dagger-carrier]

1. The Sicarii in Roman Law. From sicarius, this word means "dagger-carrier," "assassin." Rome has laws against sicarii, i.e., assassins or violent murderers. There are also laws against latrones, i.e., armed robbers in bands.

2. The Sicarii in Josephus. Josephus calls the freedom fighters of the Jewish revolt "robbers" and "assassins" (sikaríous). The sicarii first appear under Felix. They follow Menahem, are partisans in Egypt, and instigate revolt in Cyrene. They seem not to be an organized group but are the guerillas of the Zealot movement. They begin to use the (concealed) dagger when Felix takes harsh measures to crush resistance. During the revolt they use the dagger against Jews who are friendly to the Romans. They are motivated, not by lawlessness or fanaticism, but by zeal for God's honor and the law. They prefer suicide or martyrdom to Roman rule. The Romans defile the land by taxes, coins, statues, and the census; Jews who support them are renegades and no better than Gentiles, and political priests seduce the people into idolatry. By purging out such elements the sicarii hope to prepare the land for God's coming and to shield it from God's wrath. They confiscate property, destroy palaces, and burn documents with a view to the overthrow of unrighteous mammon and the inauguration of the jubilee of freedom and equality.

3. The Sicarii in Rabbinic Works. The rabbis use the term in condemnation of the Zealots and their acts of violence, e.g., burning hoarded food and destroying water conduits. They do not mention assassination.

4. The Sicarii in the NT.

a. The tribune in Acts 21:38 suspects that Paul is the Egyptian who has incited to revolt and led 4,000 sicarii into the desert. Josephus tells of this event in two accounts that differ in details (Jewish War 2.261ff.; Antiquities 20.169). Although Josephus does not use the term sicarii in these accounts, it is understandable on the lips of a Roman officer, for whom all such freedom fighters rank as sicarii.

b. The 40 Jews who plot to assassinate Paul in Acts 23:12ff. might well be sicarii seeking to eliminate a false teacher who is also suspected of desecrating the temple.

5. The Sicarii in the Fathers. Hippolytus equates the sicarii with the Zealots but mistakenly thinks they are a class of Essenes. Origen also refers to them. [O. BETZ, VII, 278-82]

Siná [Sinai]

A. The OT and Jewish Tradition.

1. The OT links the Sinai revelation with the exodus. Ex. 19-24 narrates the preparation and the theophany, Ex. 32-34 the people's sin and the destruction and replacement of the tablets, Ex. 25-31 the giving of cultic ordinances. Sinai, also called Horeb in Deuteronomy, is traditionally associated with Mt. Sinai in the south of the Sinaitic peninsula. The tradition uniformly declares that after the exodus God led his people to Sinai and gave it the law there.

2. Judaism often refers to the event at Sinai and gives expanded descriptions of it. Philo thinks that at Sinai Israel is set in paradisal conditions but it becomes subject to infirmities again with its sin. Later rabbinic tradition concurs. Even the evil impulse is withdrawn and the people again receives the radiance given to Adam in paradise. But the sin of the golden calf intervenes, and the radiance will return only in the messianic age. The law, which also contains oral tradition, is given in all languages, being meant for the Gentiles too. But the Gentiles refuse it; only Israel shapes its life by the divine statutes. Sinai is a high and holy mountain, the place of God's presence (Philo). God will come to it again at the end of the days; as he spoke his word there once, he will speak it again at the eschaton. Sinai links heaven and earth, it will finally be God's throne, it will bear the tree of life, and it will merge with the mountain of paradise (Ethiopian Enoch). Tabor and Carmel will also join with it to be the site of God's sanctuary, according to one rabbinic tradition.

B. The NT.

1. Stephen in Acts 7 refers to the call of Moses in the wilderness of Mt. Sinai (v. 30) and then to his receiving the law at Mt. Sinai (v. 38). This account is in close accord with the historical preaching of Judaism.

2. Paul links Sinai with Hagar in the allegory of Gal. 4:21ff. The equation occurs in the note in v. 25, which is so difficult exegetically that some versions leave out Hagar and simply say that Mt. Sinai is in Arabia. The obvious point is that Hagar signifies Mt. Sinai, and this in turn leads us to present-day Jerusalem. The common term is bondage. The Sinai covenant mediates an enslaving law, but this no longer applies in the Jerusalem which is above, where the children of the free woman live and freedom rules.

C. The Apostolic Fathers. In these works Sinai appears only in OT quotations in Barn. 11.3 and 14.1 and in a reference to the commandments in 15.1. In 14.1 the author claims that, while God gave the covenant at Sinai, the people was unworthy of it on account of its sin. In 15.1 he argues that the sabbath commandment comes to its true fulfilment in the eschatological rest that the church achieves in its observance of the Lord's day. [E. LOHSE, VII, 282-87]

sínapi [mustard]

1. Of obscure origin, sínapi means "mustard." A derived verb is sinapízō, which means "to give a sour look," but medically "to treat with mustard." A sinapismós is a "mustard plaster."

2. Mustard is not mentioned in the OT, but later Jewish tradition refers to it. It is grown in the fields, but there is no mention of its medical use. Its seed is proverbially small, but the plant can achieve considerable height, although not on the scale of accounts that are meant to stress the fertility of the land.

3. In the NT sínapi occurs in the parable of the grain of mustard seed (Mk. 4:30ff.; Mt. 13:31-32; Lk. 13:18-19) and in the comparison of faith to a grain of mustard seed (Mt. 17:20; Lk. 17:6). The proverbial smallness figures in both references. Some commentators suggest that the so-called mustard tree might be meant, but sínapi is not used for this, and the plentiful growth of the mustard plant fits the sayings well. If the seed of the black mustard is not absolutely the smallest seed, it is extremely small.

a. The saying about the small faith that works miracles comes in three different versions and in different contexts. The grain of mustard seed is used in order to show that the largest promise attaches even to the smallest faith. What counts is simply faith, not the quantity of faith. Faith, looking to God, lets God work, and so the impossible is possible for it. This explains the link with prayer in Mk. 11:23 (cf. Mt. 17:20 in the light of Mk. 9:29).

b. The parable of the grain of mustard seed also comes in different versions. The Marcan version stresses the fact of the contrast between the small seed and the plentiful growth, Lk. 13:18-19 pays more attention to the process, and Mt. 13:31-32 combines the two emphases. Behind the parable is the teaching that the kingdom is already present in Jesus but in hidden and inconspicuous form. This form should not be an offense but a ground of confidence, for in the concealment of God's present work lies the promise of his victorious rule. Having made a beginning, God will carry through his cause to the end. [C.-H. HUNZINGER, VII, 287-91]

siniázō [to sift]

From siníon, "sieve," siniázō means "to sift." In Lk. 22:31 Satan desires to sift Simon Peter like wheat, but the Lord prays for him, and therefore in spite of his weakness his faith will not be overthrown. The saying is obviously figurative. The sifting is a test of faith (cf. Job 1). Peter will fail (v. 34), but the Lord will uphold and restore him, so that he can then strengthen others. [E. FUCHS, VII, 291-92]

Siṓn [Zion], Ierousalḗm [Jerusalem], Hierosólyma [Jerusalem], Hierosolymítēs [inhabitant of Jerusalem]

A. Zion and Jerusalem in the OT.

I. Occurrence, Etymology, and Meaning.

1. Zion and Related Terms.

a. The word "Zion" occurs in the OT 154 times, sometimes with an addition, e.g., Mount, daughter, sons or daughters, gates, or song. Parallel terms are city of David, Jerusalem, Salem, city of God, holy mountain, sanctuary, and Israel.

b. The etymology is obscure, but as a proper name it is undoubtedly pre-Israelite, and perhaps relates to the nature of the terrain.

c. Originally Zion is a topographical term for the southeast hill of the later city of Jerusalem. After a period of disuse, it then denotes the whole east hill, the whole city, or the northeast hill as the temple hill. A transferred sense occurs in Am. 6:1 where those who are at ease in Zion (the southern capital) are like those who feel secure on the mountain of Samaria (the northern capital).

2. Jerusalem and Related Terms.

a. Jerusalem occurs 660 times in the OT for the Canaanite city, the capital of David and Solomon, the capital of Judah, and the cultic center. Additions are environs, hill, gates, walls, places, inhabitants, daughter (s), prophets, and remnant. Parallel terms are Jebus, city or ridges of the Jebusites, Zion, people, hill of Yahweh Zebaoth, and temple. Combinations include Samaria and Jerusalem (antithetical), house of David and inhabitants of Jerusalem, Jerusalem and all its towns. In apposition we find holy city, holy mountain, and throne of Yahweh.

b. The name comes down in various forms, including an ancient form Ursalem or Urusalim, and also Jerusalajim.

c. The etymology is uncertain.

d. Unlike Zion the term Jerusalem has always applied to the whole settlement.

3. Rare Terms.

a. The name Salem occurs in Ps. 76:2 and Gen. 14:18.

b. In Is. 29:1-2, 7 we find the name Ariel, probably in the sense of Ezek. 43:15-16 ("altar hearth").

4. The Use of Zion and Jerusalem. Zion is less prominent in Ezekiel, Malachi, Ezra, and Nehemiah (cf. also 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, 1 and 2 Chronicles, Jeremiah, Zechariah, and Canticles). It is more prominent in Psalms and Lamentations. Its most common use is for the city of end-time salvation. It also occurs to denote the royal residence, capital, and cultic center, but only rarely the city of sin and judgment. In the later chapters of Isaiah it is a symbol of the community, in Psalms it is the city of God, the community, and the temple. The name Jerusalem does not concentrate on specific aspects but is used fairly evenly for all aspects.

II. Historical Development of the Significance of Zion and Jerusalem.

1. Early Period. Not favorably placed geographically, Jerusalem owes its rise to historical factors. It is first a city of the Jebusites ruled by its own king. It seems to have been settled prior to the nineteenth century B.C. Melchizedek is the priest-king in Gen. 14:18, and the Amarna Letters contain letters from King Abdi-Hera in the thirteenth century B.C. The city is assigned to Benjamin (Josh. 15:8), but the tribe cannot take it and after the conquest it is an alien city (Judg. 19:11-12) dividing north and south.

2. The Davidic Monarchy to Josiah.

a. When David becomes king of the whole land he sees the need to remove the barrier and captures Jerusalem in a surprise attack (2 Sam. 5:6ff.). He makes it his own city and builds his palace there. He takes over the cultic duties of the previous rulers and makes it the center of worship with Zadok as the officiating priest (at first with Abiathar), the ark as a safeguard against Canaanite intrusions, and the temple as a planned cultic center.

b. Solomon enlarges the city and puts up new public buildings. Set alongside the palace, the temple is associated with the dynasty and functions as a national shrine in which God has his dwelling.

c. After Solomon, national unity is broken, but the Davidic dynasty clings to Jerusalem even though it is close to the border. Work is done on the walls, the water supply is improved under Hezekiah, and the temple continues to play the role assigned to it by Solomon. Sennacherib unexpectedly fails to capture the city in 701 B.C., and Josiah carries through political and religious reforms when the Assyrian empire begins to crumble after 626 B.C. By his conquests he makes Jerusalem a more important capital, and by suppressing local shrines he gives the temple a more truly central place.

3. The Last kings and the Exile. Babylon destroys the state of Judah but allows Jemsalem to function as a small city-state. Yet the city retains its cultic importance (cf. Jer. 41:5) even though the Babylonians destroy the temple and shake the belief in Zion’s invincibility as the place of God’s presence. In fact, the importance of the city grows among the exiles (Ps. 137). The sacred site is the focal point for believers, not as the royal residence, but as a spiritual center and the theme of eschatological expectation.

4. The Postexilic Period.

a. Under the Persians the deported leaders return, reestablish the earlier social structure apart from the monarchy, and invest the city with renewed cultic authority. The people now becomes a cultic community and the second temple is more truly the temple of the people rather than of the royal house.

b. Nehemiah establishes Judah as a separate province and rebuilds the walls of the city, which is once again the capital of a larger area. Under Ezra and Nehemiah the population is now almost exclusively Israelite as religious separation is achieved. As the land of the people, Judah, with Jerusalem as its capital, can maintain itself under the Ptolemies in spite of the rash attempt of Antiochus Epiphanes to turn Jerusalem into a Hellenistic pólis. Extension over the western hill takes place, and a new wall encloses and defends the expanded territory.

III. Aspects and Meanings of the Terms.

1. Royal Residence and Capital.

a. Often the term Jerusalem, and less often Zion, denotes the political center, e.g., in the Canaanite period, under David, during the monarchy, and again under Nehemiah.

b. In this regard it may be simply the city-state or it may be mentioned along with provincial towns, the whole state of Judah, or both Judah and Israel.

2. Court-Sacral Aspects. As both capital and cultic center Jerusalem plays a part in a developing court theology; cf. the bringing up of the ark, the enthronement and investiture ceremonies, the concept of the divine election of the Davidic dynasty (Ps. 132), and God’s choice of Zion. On this basis there is expectation of the stability of the monarchy and material blessing for a righteous people.

3. Symbol of the People or Community.

a. The city symbolizes its inhabitants and may thus speak, suffer, and be saved in an equation with the people or the community (cf. Ps. 79:1-2; Mic. 7:8ff.; Is. 51:17ff.;46:13).

b. From the time of Jeremiah the city is a symbol of the people or community as such (Jer. 1:3; 4:11; 13:9-10). When Jer. 4:14 summons Jerusalem to repent, the people is in view. The “daughter of Jerusalem” refers partly to the city and partly to the people. In Is. 40:1-2 Jerusalem is God’s people in every place and time. The same equation occurs in eschatological expectation (cf. Is. 65:19ff.). This equation of city and people means that none but Israelites should live in it (Neh. 2:20).

4. Seat and City of God.

a. The bringing up of the ark and building of the temple establish Jerusalem or Zion as God’s dwelling. The primary reference is perhaps to the holy hill or temple, but the whole city comes to be included. The temple is God’s palace side by side with the king’s palace (cf. Jer. 8:19). Ps. 9:11 says that God is enthroned in Zion. God has prepared a dwelling to reign there forever (Ex. 15:17-18). He has chosen Zion and causes his name to dwell there (1 Kgs. 11:13, 32, 36; 2 Chr. 7:16; 12:13).

b. To be noted in this development is the extending or transferring of the holy center from the ark to the temple, the temple to the hill, and the hill to the whole city. Founded on the holy hills, Jerusalem is itself the city of God (Ps. 46:4) or of the great King (48:2); it is the holy city (Is. 48:2; Neh. 11:1).

c. God is thus present in Zion or Jerusalem, even in judgment (Ezek. 9:3; 10:2ff.; 11:22-23). It is there that he now appears (Pss. 68:17; 50:2; Joel 3:16; Am. 1:2). Mt. Zion and Jerusalem are symbols of divine protection (Ps. 125:1-2), and blessing may be pronounced from them (128:5).

d. Judgment may fall on the temple and city (Jer. 26:6ff.; Mic. 3:12), but as God’s holy foundation (Is. 14:32-33) it will survive, so that even during the exile the relation between it and the community remains strong. Membership in the temple community has redemptive significance (Is. 56:1ff.), and the temple is to be a center for all nations (56:7). Although distinction may be made between temple and city (Ps. 68:29), the whole city is the temple city (Ps. 48), and Zion is both the site of the cultus and the cultus itself.

5. The City of Sin and Judgment.

a. The prophets denounce the city as sinful, ascribing to it, as the capital, the chief blame for the sins of the people (Mic. 1:5). The true sin is that of apostasy and revolt against God (Is. 3:8, 16-17). The idolatrous city is like an unfaithful harlot. Ethical and social sin accompanies religious sin (Mic. 3:10). The very essence of the city is oppression (Jer. 6:6-7); it is a city of blood-guiltiness (Ezek. 22:2-3). There is also the political sin of wooing the great powers (Ezek. 16:23ff.). “This city” is the contemptuous term used for Jerusalem by Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Pagan by origin, the people is worthless by nature (Ezek. 15:6; 16:1ff.). The saving of a remnant brings out the justice of the punishment (14:22).

b. As a city of sin, Jerusalem is also a city of judgment (Is. 29:1ff.; 32:13-14). God will bring it to account (Zeph. 1:12). Babylon is his agent (Ezek. 21:25ff.). The judgment takes the form of war and deportation (Jer. 6:23; Ezek. 12:1ff.). It is pitiless; only radical conversion could avert it (Jer. 4:3-4; 15:5). If the disaster seems incomprehensible in Lamentations, it has been impending for some time (Ps. 137:7).

6. City of the Age of Eschatological Salvation.

a. During the exile the prophetic message is that of judgment followed by restoration and final salvation. Lam. 4:22 announces the end of judgment, Is. 40:1 ff. offers a message of comfort and return, and Zech. 8:15 promises the future age of salvation.

b. God himself, who does not desert his people (Is. 49:14-15), declares and grants deliverance (Is. 41:27; 46:13). The exile enables him to show his power (Mic. 4:10). The shining of his glory means salvation for Jerusalem in a new creation (Is. 60). God has still chosen Zion (Zech. 3:2), and the building of the second temple presages restoration (Hag. 2:19). God himself returns (Ezek. 43:1ff.), and messengers of joy and peace announce his coming (Is. 52:7ff.). Dwelling again in Zion (Is. 4:5; 30:29; Zech. 2:14), he will inaugurate his eschatological rule (Is. 24:23 etc.). Not merely the Messiah (Zech. 9:9-10) but God himself has his residence there, establishing an acceptable regime (Jer. 3:15), protecting the city, and constituting its inner glory (Zech. 2:9).

c. The city’s glory rests wholly on God’s saving work (Is. 62; 66:10ff.). Reconstructed with unbelievable magnificence, extending beyond its walls, and open day and night to trade, the new city, as the eschatological capital and religious center, receives new names that God confers and that express his rights (cf. Is. 62:4, 12; Jer. 3:17; 33:16; Ezek. 48:35; Zech. 8:3). The depictions contain human traits, for eschatology deals with historical factors; but God’s saving action creates a far more glorious Jerusalem, which forms the starting point for the concept of a heavenly Jerusalem.

d. God washes away the sin of the inhabitants (Is. 4:4). The holy remnant of the redeemed returns to the city (35:10). Hope is held out for a more extensive return from all nations (27:13). The goal of the return is the establishing of a lasting covenant relationship (Jer. 50:5) in divinely imparted faithfulness and righteousness (Zech. 8:8). A new and upright people is born in Zion (Is. 26:2; 66:8), which lives a secure and abundant life (Zech. 8:4-5), enjoys prosperity (2:8), experiences joy (2:4), and pours forth praise and thanksgiving (Is. 12:4ff.).

e. Judgement falls on Babylon and Edom (Jer. 51:24; Obad. 17-18, 21), and the nations that attack Jerusalem will be defeated and destroyed (Is. 17:12ff.; Joel 3:9ff.). It is God who judges the nations and preserves Jerusalem, but in another strand of prophecy God has a saving purpose for the nations too (Is. 18:7; 25:6-7; 45:14). They will go up to the temple and be taught there (Is. 2:2ff.). They will seek God and serve him (Zech. 8:22; Ps. 102:22). They will find a home in Jerusalem (Ps. 87:5). Confessing the true God, they will belong to his people and peace will reign (Zech. 2:15; Is. 2:4).

7. Mythical Aspects.

a. Mythical elements, divested of their mythical character, provide metaphors that bring out the significance of Zion, especially the myths of the highest mountain and the water of life (cf. Is. 2:2; Ezek. 47:1ff.; Zech. 14:8).

b. Less common are the ideas of Jerusalem as the navel of the earth (Ezek. 5:5; 38:12), that of the city standing firm in the conflict with chaos (Ps. 46:1ff.), that of its judgment as a paradisal fall (Lam. 2:1), and that of the city as a cosmic tree shading the peoples (Ezek. 17:22ff.).

8. City of Theocracy. In Chronicles, Jerusalem is a theocratic center. God has chosen it, set up the monarchy there, acknowledged the temple, and made the city a holy place to which Gentiles and true believers from the northern state may come. Even now God has thus actualized his rule in and around it.

9. Summary. The special position of Jerusalem expresses humble faith and obedience under God’s established or awaited rule but may also be a ground of obstinacy and frivolous self-assurance in which the cry “The temple, the temple” becomes an excuse for evasion of God’s demands. The prophets set Jerusalem under the same obligations, threats, and promises as all other cities, for it is God himself who is supreme, and while he may choose Jerusalem and have a future for it, he is not tied to it, but may meet his people at any time or place. [G. FOHRER, VII, 292-319]

B. Zion and Jerusalem in Postbiblical Judaism.

I. Usage. The Greek of Zion is Seiṓn or Siṓn. For Jerusalem the LXX has Ierousalḗm (hē is the article), but the form Hierosólyma also occurs, and Hellenistic Jews prefer it because it echoes hierós. The use is similar to what one finds in the OT.

II. From the Maccabean Period to A.D. 70. From the days of the Persians Jerusalem plays only a minor political role but achieves increasing importance as the center of worship for all believing Jews. Those impressed by Hellenistic culture try to turn it into a Hellenistic city with a gymnasium and pagan practices. The attempt by Antiochus Epiphanes to replace God with Zeus leads to the Maccabean revolt and the cleansing of the temple. After the capture of the fortress, the restored city becomes the residence of the Hasmoneans, who unite the priesthood with the monarchy and open the door to pagan customs. Pompey takes the city in 63 B.C., even entering the temple. With Roman consent, Herod establishes himself in Jerusalem and undertakes big building projects, e.g., strengthening the fortress, constructing a new palace, and rebuilding the temple. When the Romans transfer rule to the procurators, these reside in Caesarea and pay only occasional visits to Jerusalem. In A.D. 66 the Jews drive the Romans out, but the legions encompass the city and after a long siege capture it in A.D. 70. Titus enters the temple, but it then goes up in flames. The righteous see here a divine visitation.

III. Jerusalem in the Days of Jesus. In the days of Jesus Jerusalem is a large city with a population of not less than 25,000. As a result of Herod’s projects it is prosperous. The supreme court, the Sanhedrin, meets there to decide religious questions. Renowned scribes teach the law in Jerusalem, and students come from far and wide to profit from their learning. Many synagogues offer opportunities for worship and for the reading and exposition of the law. The temple lies on Mt. Zion in new splendor. Gentiles may enter the outer court, but then a barrier with an express prohibition sets off the court of women, the court of Israelites, the court of priests, the altar of burnt offering, and the sanctuary.

IV. Jerusalem the Sacred Metropolis. Jews pray three times a day toward Jerusalem. Those who live in the city pray toward the temple. Jews abroad send gifts to the temple. Those who are able go up there for the feasts. Citizens entertain pilgrims without charge. From afar the temple looks like a snow-capped hill. Prayer in the holy place carries a special promise. Even for those who withdraw to the desert Jerusalem is still the elect city. Judgment will fall on unholy priests, but in the age of salvation the temple will be rebuilt in the new Jerusalem as Scripture enjoins.

V. The New Jerusalem. The daily prayer is that God will have mercy on Jerusalem and return to Zion. When the last attack of ungodly powers is repulsed, God will reconstruct the city and it will be the place of eschatological salvation. The new Jerusalem is either the city of David rebuilt with new glory or the preexistent city that is built by God in heaven and comes down with the dawn of a new world. Apocalyptic presents the latter view, but the rabbis favor the former view, whereby God or the Messiah will rebuild the city with great magnificence and greatly enlarge its borders so that it can accommodate the Jews and the many Gentiles who stream into it. The holy vessels and the ark will return to the holy place, the saints will dwell there, and all peoples will come there to worship. Paradise will return with the new Jerusalem.

C. Zion and Jerusalem in the NT.

I. Occurrence and Usage.

1. There are seven instances of Siṓn in the NT, five in OT quotations, the other two in Heb. 12:22 and Rev. 14:1.

2. Jerusalem is often mentioned in the Gospels and Acts, and sometimes in Paul, Hebrews, and Revelation, but never in the Catholic Epistles. Jerusalem is probably the city on the hill in Mt. 5:14, and it is the holy city in Mt. 4:5; 27:53; Rev. 11:2, the beloved city in Rev. 20:9, and the city of the great king in Mt. 5:35. In most instances the actual city is in view, but the inhabitants may be included, e.g., in Mt. 2:3. Both Greek forms occur. Revelation and Hebrews use only Ierousalḗm, Paul normally has this form, Luke prefers it, but the other Gospels mostly have Hierosólyma.

II. Sayings of Jesus about Jerusalem.

1. Except in references to the passion Jerusalem occurs only three times in Jesus’ preaching. In Lk. 10:30 a man goes down from Jerusalem to Jericho. In Lk. 13:4 those on whom the tower falls are not more guilty than others who live in Jerusalem; the summons to all is to repent. In Mt. 5:35 to swear by Jerusalem is to take God’s name in vain, for Jerusalem is the city of the great king.

2. The two sayings in Lk. 13:33 and Mt. 23:37ff. deal with martyrdom. It is a common belief that prophets must suffer in Jerusalem, and Jesus expects his own prophetic passion there, for Jerusalem is the place of decision. The lament probably refers not so much to Jesus‘ own ministry in the city as to the repeated invitation of God or the divine wisdom. The forsaking of Jerusalem will last until the parousia, when the returning Jesus will be joyfully hailed as the Messiah.

3. Jesus is crucified before the gates of Jerusalem. He predicts his death there in Mk. 8:31; 9:31; 10:32ff. and parallels. Details accord with the apostolic kerygma, and Mt. 16:21 implies that the passion is by divine ordination. The name of Jerusalem does not actually occur in Mk. 9:31 and parallels.

III. Jerusalem in the Four Gospels.

l. Mark. Jerusalem is seldom mentioned in Mark except in the passion predictions and passion story. Its inhabitants go out to listen to the Baptist (Mk. 1:5) and also to Jesus (3:8). Scribes from Jerusalem accuse Jesus of driving out demons with the help of Beelzebul (3:22). Scribes and Pharisees from the city attack him for breaking the law (7:1ff.). Jerusalem is the residence of his bitterest enemies (11:18; 14:1-2). When he dies, the ripping of the temple curtain initiates the divine judgment on the city (15:38).

2. Matthew. Jerusalem occurs in the infancy stories in Matthew. The Wise Men come there, and Herod and the city are startled by their coming (2:1ff.). Jerusalem is the holy city in 4:5. The Son of Man must go there to die (16:21). Jesus has his decisive debate with the scribes (v. 23) and teaches his disciples about the last things there (vv. 24-25). At his death graves open before the gates and dead saints appear to many in the holy city (27:51-52). Judgment will fall on the city for rejecting God's invitation (22:7), but on the last day it will greet the returning Lord with jubilation (23:39).

3. Luke. Giving more emphasis to Jerusalem, Luke begins and ends in the temple (1:5ff.; 24:53). Jesus and the new community fulfil the ancient promises. The intimation to Zechariah takes place in the temple (1:5ff.), where the parents of Jesus also present him (2:24), and Simeon and Anna await redemption (2:38). Jesus goes up to the temple at the age of 12 and is at home there (2:41ff.). He vanquishes the tempter on a pinnacle of the temple (4:9). He debates with scribes and Pharisees from Jerusalem (5:17), and people flock to him from many places, including Jerusalem (6:17). He sets his journey to Jerusalem under the sign of the passion (9:51ff.). His entry brings him to the temple, which he cleanses and uses as a place for teaching (19:45ff.). Jerusalem is destroyed because it does not know what belongs to its peace (19:42ff.). Hence its daughters should weep for themselves and their children (23:28). In and around Jerusalem the risen Lord appears to his disciples (24:13ff.) and commissions them to proclaim his saving death and resurrection. His disciples meet in the temple and praise God there (24:53).

4. John. In John Jerusalem alternates with Galilee as the center of Jesus' ministry. Meeting representatives of the unbelieving cosmos there, he makes it a place for the manifesting of his glory. Various sites receive specific mention, e.g., the pool of Bethesda in 5:2, and the pool of Siloam in 9:7. He teaches in the temple (7:14), and specifically in Solomon's portico (10:22-23). He stays in Bethany with Mary and Martha. At the end he teaches only the disciples, and John does not mention Jerusalem in the passion story. The time has come when the Father is worshipped in neither Gerizim nor Jerusalem (4:23).

IV. Jerusalem and the Primitive Community.

l. The Community in Jerusalem. A group of disciples comes together in the holy city and there the Holy Spirit comes upon it. It inherits the promises of the old covenant as the church of God. When Hellenistic Jews are expelled, they carry the gospel abroad. All believers honor the Jerusalem church under the leadership of Peter and then of James, the Lord's brother. From it messengers and prophets go to other churches (Acts 8:14; 11:22, 27; 15:32). Christians gather there to discuss matters of common concern (Gal. 2:1ff.; Acts 15:1ff.), and missionaries return there after fulfilling their tasks (11:2; 13:13; 19:21; 21:15).

2. Jerusalem in Paul. Paul recognizes that the gospel has come from Jerusalem (Rom. 15:19), and that the community there has a right to love and respect. But he has not received his apostleship from the apostles in Jerusalem (Gal. 1:1), nor does he need their confirmation (1:18ff.; 2:1-2). They agree that he should share in the church's mission and arrange the collection (Gal. 2:7ff.). The gifts he brings to Jerusalem are an offering of love, not a tax. Although he does not work in Jerusalem, he describes his ministry as extending from Jerusalem as far around as Illyricum (Rom. 15:19).

3. Jerusalem in Acts. The disciples stay in Jerusalem as the Lord commands (Lk. 24:49; Acts 1:4). After the Spirit descends, they preach Christ there (2:36). Many residents and resident aliens receive their message (2:43; 5:16). The rulers oppose them (4:5) but cannot stop the spread of the word (6:7). The community worships in the temple (2:46; 3:1ff.). When the church grows in Judea and Samaria it accepts the leadership of Jerusalem (Acts 8:14ff.; 11:2ff.). Saul persecutes the church in Jerusalem (9:13, 21); he is well known in the city for his exemplary life (26:4). Soon after conversion he comes back to Jerusalem, and Barnabas introduces him to the apostles (9:26ff.). In the temple he receives his commission to go to the Gentiles (22:17-18). He visits Jerusalem as an envoy of the church at Antioch (11:27ff.; 12:25; 15:2, 4). At Ephesus he resolves to go to Jerusalem for Pentecost as a pilgrim (19:21; 20:16, 22). The elders of the church receive him (21:17) but the Jews arrange his arrest (21:27ff.). Since his case cannot be decided in Jerusalem he finally goes to Rome (28:17) and is thus enabled to bear witness in both Jerusalem and Rome as the Lord declares (23:11).

4. Zion and Jerusalem in Revelation. In Rev. 14:1 the divine sees the Lamb on Mt. Zion, i.e., the place of eschatological preservation which shelters the 144,000. The city of ch. 11 is clearly Jerusalem. As the theater of Christ's suffering, which is now the seat of blasphemy and obduracy, it comes under God's judgment, although the temple, i.e., God's people, will be saved (11:1).

V The New Jerusalem.

l. Paul. In Gal. 4:21ff. Paul equates the son of the slave with the Sinaitic covenant and present-day Jerusalem, but the son of the free woman with the promise and the Jerusalem above. He adds that the free Jerusalem is our mother. Since the present freedom of believers is at issue, the Jerusalem that is above represents an eschatological salvation that is not just future but has come already.

2. Hebrews. In Heb. 12:22 the heavenly mount and the heavenly city are the site of the gathering of angels and the community. The city here is not just the goal of pilgrimage. Believers have come to it already as the place of the new covenant from which they can journey on to the eternal city.

3. Revelation. In Rev. 3:12 those who bear the name of God belong to the heavenly Jerusalem which comes down from God to earth (21:10). Paradise will return with this city (22:1ff.). A wealth of images describes it, but it will have no temple (21:22).

D. Zion and Jerusalem in the Early Church.

1. The only two instances in the apostolic fathers are in Barn. 6.2 (quoting Is. 28:16) and 1 Clem. 41.2 (the example of divinely established order).

2. The apocryphal gospels often mention Jerusalem.

3. Theologians apply the allegorical interpretation of the name Jerusalem to the church or believers (cf. Origen). The soul oppressed by evil powers is Jebus (trodden down), but when transformed by divine teaching it is Jerusalem, the city of peace.

4. Clement of Alexandria employs the idea of the Jerusalem above to portray the ideal city in Platonic terms. Gnostic dualism also makes use of the contrast between the lower and upper Jerusalems. The latter belongs to the incorruptible world of light and is wisdom for the Valentinians. [E. LOHSE, VII, 319-38]

skándalon [cause of offense, stumbling block], skandalízō [to give offense, cause to stumble]

A. Derivation and Nonbiblical Usage.

1. The original stem has the sense of "springing forward and back," "slamming to," "closing on something," or "trapping," but later the meaning "offense," or "reason for punishment," occurs in the papyri.

2. There are no instances of the verb outside the biblical sphere but skandalistḗs presupposes skandalízō in the sense "to set traps."

B. The OT.

I. Hebrew Terms. The LXX uses the group for two sets of Hebrew terms with the different senses of striking or catching in a snare, and slipping or stumbling (with the transferred meaning "occasion of sin").

II. The LXX.

1. skándalon. In translation of the Hebrew próskomma, skṓlon, and skándalon are used, and by assimilation skándalon can mean both "trap" and "stumbling block" or,"cause of ruin" either with idols in view or offenses against the law. As a ground of divine punishment skándalon can then denote an occasion of sinning or a temptation to sin.

2. skandalízō. This verb, which is rare in the LXX, carries the senses "to catch oneself," i.e., "to fall into sin," and in the active (Ps. Sol. 16:7) "to lead astray."

C. Later Translations of the OT.

1. Aquila. Following a rigid principle of translation, Aquila uses skándalon for,“cause of ruin,” skandalismós for “disaster,” and skandalízomai for “to come to hurt.”

2. Symmachus. Less rigidly Symmachus, too, uses skándalon for “cause of disaster” or “death” (Prov. 29:6; 13:14; 14:27).

3. Theodotion. There is nothing independent in this translation.

C. The NT.

I. Dependence on the OT. Formally and materially NT usage depends on that of the OT. The terms occur in sayings of Jesus, in Paul, and in John. Luke avoids some instances or uses other terms. In Lk. 2:34, although ptṓsis occurs rather than skándalon, the NT concept comes to clear expression; the ministry of Jesus can result in death or life, for his person and work will either evoke faith or stir up opposition. Various LXX phrases may be found (cf. Rom. 14:13; 1 Cor. 1:23), and OT allusions and quotations occur (Mt. 13:41; Rom. 11:9). In the NT, as in the OT, the issue in skándalon is one’s relation to God. The skándalon is an obstacle to faith and hence a cause of falling and destruction.

II. Sayings of Jesus.

1. OT Prophecies. In Mt. 13:41 and 24:10 Jesus quotes OT sayings with an eschatological slant (Zeph. 1:3; Dan. 11:41). Mt. 24:10 refers to the final skandalismós, and 13:41 to the uprooting of skándala. In 13:41 the skándala are probably persons who bring ruin by seducing into sin and whose end will come with that of the devil and his hosts. The gathering of the elect (cf. 24:31) is the counterpart of this uprooting.

2. Present skándala.

a. The eschatological apostasy has begun already, for the coming of Jesus has brought skándala that accompany the demand for faith. In Mt. 18:7 the coming of skándala is inevitable but woes are pronounced on those who participate passively or actively in their coming. They are extremely dangerous, for they involve eternal ruin. They apply to all people but, while unavoidable, they are integrated into God’s plan, for history consists of decisions for and against God.

b. In Mt. 16:23 Peter, who has been given a role similar to that of Jesus himself, both foundation stone (1 Cor. 3:11) and rock of offense (Rom. 9:33), becomes a stone of stumbling to Jesus. Opposing human thoughts to the divine will, he acts as an instrument of Satan. Finding the way of Jesus to the cross a skándalon, he becomes a skándalon, i.e., a personified temptation to turn aside from the will of God.

3. Present skandalismós.

a. Apostasy of the Unstable. When the word of the kingdom is preached, afflictions arise that result in skandalízesthai or falling away (Mt. 13:20-21) as a prelude to eschatological skandalismós. In this instance people of unstable and superficial character receive the word but their easily kindled enthusiasm just as quickly cools. The apostasy means ruin, so that the skándalon which is an occasion of sin is also the cause of destruction.

b. skandalismós at Jesus. When reasons are given for skandalízesthai, the reference is to Jesus (Mt. 26:31; 33; 13:57). Offense at Jesus is the opposite of faith in him. The disciples take offense and fall at the passion (Mk. 14:27; Mt. 26:31). The sufferings of the Messiah bring panic to his followers and scatter them (cf. Zech. 13:7). Peter falls victim to this skándalon in spite of his professed readiness to accept suffering for himself (Mk. 14:29; Mt. 26:33). In the reply to the Baptist Jesus pronounces blessing on those who do not lose confidence in him (Mt. 11:6). The age of salvation is the age of decision. The presence of Jesus may result either in faith or in the missing of faith. A cause of unbelief attaches to his words, even though avoidance of skandalismós is the goal. The people of Nazareth, finding a contradiction between his origin and his work, take offense and refuse to believe (Mt. 13:53ff.). Indeed, their unbelief becomes mortal hatred (Lk. 4:28-29). The Pharisees, too, are not just hurt at the attacks of Jesus (Mt. 15:12); they reject his teaching and thereby show that they are not God's plant but blind leading the blind, i.e., unbelievers. The occasions of stumbling are irritation at the freedom of Jesus, annoyance at his distinction between law and tradition, and offense at his person even though, as in the case of the tax (Mt. 17:27), he forgoes his own freedom (cf. Rom. 14:13) so as not to arouse opposition.

c. Not Causing Others to Stumble. Avoiding skandalismós is the point in Mk. 9:42. Here the punishment, i.e., eternal perdition, fits the offense, i.e., causing loss of faith and therefore loss of salvation. A similar eschatological light falls on Mk. 9:43ff.; Mt. 5:29-30; 18:8-9. The meaning of skandalízō here is "to entice into sin" and therefore to plunge into unbelief and perdition. No price is too high to avoid this; hence the relentless demand of Jesus.

III. Paul.

1. The skándalon of the Gospel. Paul refers first to an unavoidable skándalon (Rom. 9:33). Jesus brings salvation but may also be a cause of perdition. 1 Pet. 2:6ff. contains the same thought and uses the same OT quotations. Unbelievers take offense at Jesus and hence he is for them a stone of stumbling. By divine appointment the word serves a twofold function depending on whether its hearers obey or disobey it. An essential mark of faith is that it overcomes the skándalon of God's saving work in Christ. As 1 Cor. 1:18ff. shows, the cross is religiously offensive to the Jews, as it is folly to the Greeks. Part of the skándalon, of course, is the liberation from the law that it effects (Gal. 5:11). To enforce circumcision is to weaken the skándalon by compromise. For the Jews, however, the skándalon, foretold in Ps. 69:22, means stumbling but not falling (v. 11). Nor are Christians immune from skandalízesthai. In 2 Cor. 11:29 Paul is ready to share the weakness of the weak but he is indignant if any are made to fall.

2. The Danger of Falling. Tensions in the churches are the occasion of skándalon (cf. the debates between the strong and the weak in Rom. 14-15 and 1 Cor. 8:1ff.; 10:23ff.). The freedom of those who have fully cast off the past causes offense to those who have not, but it also creates the danger that these will act against their consciences or with wavering faith. In this case the danger is the serious one of an ultimate eschatological fall (Rom. 14:15, 23). The strong with their freedom may destroy the weak and therefore overturn God's work in Christ. Paul, then, sides with the weak even though he shares the faith of the strong (Rom. 15:1).

3. The skándalon of Heresy. False teachers cause both divisions and skándala, which are probably temptations to abandon sound doctrine. A similar use of skándalon occurs in Rev. 2:14 (cf. also Mt. 13:41), where "to put a stumbling block" recalls Lev. 19:14 and carries the sense of seduction into apostasy and immorality (cf. vv. 15, 20).

IV. John. The noun is semifigurative in 1 Jn. 2:10 ("cause of aberration"). Blindness or darkness is here the presupposition. Where there is love there is light and therefore no reason to go astray and fall. In Jn. 6:61 a crisis of faith is apparent. Lack of understanding causes many disciples to leave Jesus. Only the power of the Spirit illumining the word can overcome the skandalismós (v. 63). Peter's confession confirms the truth of this (v. 68). The parting discourses have the aim of keeping the disciples from falling away (Jn. 16:1). Here again the Spirit and his witness will play the crucial role (15:26-27), for the Spirit will enable the disciples to understand the approaching passion, which Jesus himself both intimates and supports with a proof from Scripture (15:18ff.).

D. Patristic Writings. The word group occurs only rarely in the post-NT period. Where it is used, it undergoes psychological and moralistic trivializing. [G. STÄHLIN, VII, 339-58]

skeúos [vessel]

A. Secular Greek.

1. skeúos, meaning "vessel" or "container," is used literally for household utensils, agricultural implements, baggage, military equipment, nautical gear, and cultic vessels.

2. In a transferred sense some people are the tools of others, the body is the vessel of the soul, and the skeúos is also the reproductive organ.

B. The LXX.

1. Gk. skeúos covers much the same field as Heb. kəlî, being used for it in some 270 of 320 instances and in such senses as vessels, yokes, weapons, baggage, ship's gear, and sacred vessels.

2. In the figurative use, a mark of the OT term is that the human instrument is fragile (Hos. 8:8), that God is radically superior to it (Is. 10:15), and that he shapes it as the potter does his vessel (Jer. 18:1ff.). The meaning in 1 Sam. 21:6 is either "body" or "reproductive organ."

C. Later Judaism.

1. In later Judaism the literal use is similar to that of the OT.

2. In a transferred sense the law is a costly vessel, people are instruments of God or the devil, the body is a vessel for the person, the serpent is a tool of the devil, and the body is a vessel for the soul.

3.a. As regards the use of "vessel" for "woman" it may be noted that harlots are "vessels" in Egyptian Aramaic texts.

b. A similar sexual sense occurs in the rabbinic sphere in which "to use as a vessel" seems to be a euphemism for having sexual intercourse.

c. This may also be the meaning when a widow refuses marriage on the ground that a vessel that has been used for what is holy should not be used for what is profane.

d. The phrase "to make the formless mass of woman a ready or complete vessel" also seems to have marriage in view.

e. In sum, "vessel" means "woman" only in a formal sense but carries the suggestion of "using woman as a vessel" in a sexual sense.

D. The NT.

1. In the NT skeúos denotes a vessel that can be carried in Mk. 11:16, a household utensil in Rev. 2:27; Jn. 19:29; Lk. 8:16; Acts 10:11, 16, nautical gear in Acts 27:17, and a liturgical vessel in Heb. 9:21.

2.a. Figuratively skeúos occurs in Rom. 9:19ff. The concern in context is with the relations between the old and new covenant peoples; vv. 22ff. bring out the teleological link between the two as God forges them for different ends. The "vessels" denoted here are obviously utensils but the sense of instruments is also to the fore. Although God has perhaps made some vessels for destruction and some for glory, mercy may be seen even in relation to the former, for they are not yet smashed, God's wrath against them brings out his mercy to the latter vessels, and this mercy will finally lead to a fullness of glory. The genitive in "vessels of wrath" is a qualitative one; on and through these vessels God works out his wrath. The line that runs from Esau by way of Pharaoh to disobedient Israel stands in antithesis to that which runs from Isaac by way of Moses to the church, but which includes both Gentiles from the world of Pharaoh and believers from Israel, so that there is no absolute antithesis. Implicit is the thought that even the vessel of wrath may be reshaped into a vessel of mercy.

b. In 2 Tim. 2:20-21 the vessels are evaluated according to both purpose and material. The passage is a summons to purification from error with a view to being a consecrated and useful vessel.

c. Paul himself is a “chosen vessel” in Acts 9:15 (cf. Gal. 1:15-16). He is elected to service and suffering (2 Cor. 11:23ff.). He and his colleagues have the treasure of the gospel in “earthen vessels,” i.e., not just their bodies but their whole persons with all their lowliness and frailty (2 Cor. 4:7).

3. The reference in 1 Th. 4:4 may be to the “body,” as in Greek thought, or to the “wife,” as in the Jewish euphemism. The verb may also mean either “to gain” or “to possess.” If the wife is the skeúos, then we have an exhortation either to marry as a remedy against fornication or to hold one’s wife in esteem. For Paul, who knows both Hebrew and Greek, the most likely meaning is that his readers should know how to live with their wives in sanctification and honor rather than in the lust of passion. Against the rendering of skeúos as “body,” one may cite the context, the absence in Paul of any concept of the body as the container of the soul, and Paul’s lack of interest in an ethics centered on the body. On the other hand, a call for sanctification in marriage is wholly in keeping with both the context and Paul’s training (cf. also 1 Cor. 7:2). 1 Pet. 3:7 offers an apt commentary. Linking the marriage relationship to the ordination of both partners to their future inheritance, it gives this relationship its supreme justification and ultimate profundity.

E. Apostolic Fathers. The apostolic fathers use skeúos for utensils, for believers as vessels of the Spirit, and for Christ’s body and also the land of Jacob as a vessel of the Spirit. 2 Clem. 8.2 summons to repentance in this life on the ground that the potter can refashion vessels only so long as he has not fired them. [C. MAURER, VII, 358-67]

skēnḗ [tent], skḗnos [tent, body], skḗnōma [tent, temple], skēnóō [to live, dwell], episkēnóō [to take up residence], kataskēnóō [to cause to dwell], skēnopegía [pitching tents, Tabernacles], skēnopoiós [tent-maker] skēnḗ.

A. Greek Usage. Of uncertain etymology, skēnḗ consistently means “tent,” although with such nuances as market booth, accommodation in a tent, portable shrine, stage of a theater (originally a framework of pillars with portable walls), cover of a wagon, and cabin on the deck of a ship. The idea of transitoriness is inherent in the term, although later it can have the more general sense of dwelling or lodging.

B. The LXX.

1. skēnḗ occurs some 435 times in the OT, mostly for Heb.’hl. About two-thirds of the references are to the tent of meeting.

2. The use of tents is common in Israel; cf. Abraham (Gen. 12:8), Jethro (Ex. 18:7), Korah (Num. 16:26-27), and Achan (Josh. 7:21 ff.). Nomads (Gen. 4:20), herdsmen (Judg. 6:5), and soldiers (2 Kgs. 7:7-8) live in tents. At Tabernacles living in tents recalls the wilderness period (Lev. 23:42-43).

3. The OT tells us little about the construction of tents. Cedar is mentioned in Cant. 1:5, and we read of pegs (Judg. 4:21) and hangings (Is. 54:2). Pointed tents and matted structures both seem to be in vogue (cf. 2 Sam. 11:11). The structures used at Tabernacles are the latter, i.e., booths or huts of thickly intertwined leaves.

4. The tent of meeting is always called a tent in the OT (’hl or mškn). Later it perhaps becomes a matted structure, but originally it is the place where one meets God rather than the place where he resides, and skēnḗ (or skḗnōma) is chosen as the rendering, not because it bears the general sense of dwelling, but because it represents the original sense of tent, and probably also because the three consonants skn also occur in Heb. mškn. Yet in time the tabernacle comes to be regarded as the place of God's dwelling and this tends to give to skēnḗ more of the sense of a dwelling in this context.

5. A few poetic statements refer to God's dwelling in heaven or on earth as in a skēnḗ (cf. Is. 40:22; Ps. 18:11; Job 36:29). In Ps. 27:5 (skēnḗ) the idea is that of protection. Ex. 26:30 presupposes a heavenly prototype for the tabernacle, but this does not imply that in heaven God lives in a skēnḗ.

6. The idea of living in tents plays no role in eschatology. Ps. 118:15 is not meant eschatologically, and in Hos. 12:9 the point is not the dwelling in tents but the parallel between the wilderness period and the end-time. There is no promise that God himself will tabernacle among his people nor is there any prophecy that the Messiah will dwell in a tent.

C. Nonbiblical Judaism.

1. Philo uses skēnḗ in OT connections and in relation to Tabernacles. Allegorically wisdom is a tent in which the wise dwell, and the tent of meeting symbolizes virtue.

2. Josephus, too, uses skēnḗ for ordinary tents, in connection with Tabernacles, and as a specific term for the tent of meeting. This is the prṓtē skēnḗ compared to Solomon's temple.

3. The pseudepigrapha give evidence of OT influence. Jub. 16:21 mentions Tabernacles, and 1:10 calls the tabernacle (or temple) God's tent. In the Qumran hymns there is reference to God's holy dwelling and the place of his tent, but this seems to be conventional usage.

D. The NT.

1. skēnḗ occurs 20 times in the NT, ten of the instances being in Hebrews and eight in Heb. 8-9. In Acts 7:43 (quoting Am. 5:27ff. LXX) the skēnḗ is a cultic tent. In Acts 15:16 the rise of the church is the restoration of David's skēnḗ according to Am. 9:11-12. Jewish Christians fulfil the first part of the prophecy and Gentile Christians the second. In Acts 4:44 the skēnḗ is the tent of witness, carried into Canaan in v. 45. Rev. 15:5 refers to God's temple in heaven (11:19) as "the temple of the tent of witness in heaven."

2. Heb. 8:1-2 distinguishes between the true and heavenly tent and the earthly one. God has pitched the true tent, whereas he ordered but did not himself erect the earthly tent. The heavenly tent is a model for the earthly one, but it also serves its own purpose as a preexistent tent that is eternal in character. The earthly tent in 9:1ff. is twofold; there is an outer and an inner tent, and the way to the inner tent is not yet opened so long as the outer tent still stands (9:8). Similarly the heavenly tent seems to have both an outer and an inner sanctuary, though it is not suggested that God dwells in the heavenly holy of holies. It is through the outer tent that Christ by his blood gains access to the inner tent (9:11-12). What precisely the outer tent is, the author does not say. It is in the light of the exposition in chs. 8-9 that 13:10 refers to those who "serve the tent," i.e., the priests of the OT sanctuary. The fact that Abraham lives in tents (11:9) emphasizes his alien status; the city toward which he moves as a pilgrim is that which God builds.

3. In Rev. 13:6 the beast blasphemes the skēnḗ of God. The choice of the word here is probably based on the use of the verb in 7:15, to which corresponds 12:12 with its reference to those who dwell in heaven. These verses help to explain the combination of temple and tent in 15:5, which catches up the naós toú theoú of 11:19 (cf. also 21:3).

4. Lk. 16:9 speaks of eschatological skēnaí in the plural. Huts or tents seem to be in contradiction with the idea of permanence. The thought, however, is not that the last age corresponds to the wilderness period, but rather that these are eternal dwellings, with perhaps a suggestion of the indwelling of the divine glory. Peter's proposal to build three skēnaí at the transfiguration (Mk. 9:5) obviously has a lengthy stay in view, and since the skēnaí are for Jesus, Moses, and Elijah, a messianic or eschatological understanding seems to be present. There is no clear connection with the tent of meeting and only a slight suggestion of Moses' transfiguration on the Mount. Since the booths are not for the disciples, the idea is not that the people of the last time will dwell in tents as in the wilderness. Nor is the proposal related to the idea of God's eschatological tabernacling, nor to that of the Messiah. Moses is a type of the Messiah and Elijah the precursor, but what the proposal expresses seems to be the more general concept of the gracious and abiding presence of God.

5. God dwells in a tent according to Rev. 21:3. Zech. 2:14-15 and Ezek. 37:27 influence this statement, which is not suggesting that in the eschaton there will be a vast heavenly camp with God's tent in the middle, but simply offering a vivid metaphor for God's eternal presence. Emphasis lies on the close relationship between God and his people ("with men," "with them"). The skēnḗ theoú is the new Jerusalem or the new heaven and earth (21:1-2). It denotes future eschatological salvation. This prospect is the climax of the history of skēnḗ in the NT.

E. The Apostolic Fathers. The term skēnḗ occurs three times in 1 Clem. 43 for the OT tent of meeting.

1. This word means "tent" but is normally used in a transferred sense for a live or dead "body," human or animal.

2. In the LXX it occurs only in Wis. 9:15 for "body."

3. It does not seem to occur in Philo or Josephus.

4. In the NT it occurs only in 2 Cor. 5:1, 4. If it has here the usual sense of "body" rather than "tent," the antithesis of oikía and skḗnos is lessened. Yet if our present corporeality can be called an oikía, this term is neutral as regards durability. Only the eternal, heavenly oikía that God builds is a lasting one. Possibly, then, Paul chooses skḗnos in order to bring out the corruptibility of the earthly mode of existence. A certain kinship with Gnosticism may perhaps be discerned in the use of skḗnos, but if the term bears the normal sense of body this is less pronounced, for the Gnostics prefer skēnḗ in their equation of tent and body. The term has no apparent connection with Tabernacles in 2 Cor. 5, nor does it bear an ecclesiological reference.

5. skḗnos does not occur in the apostolic fathers.

1. This word means "tent," "tentlike dwelling," "temple," and, rarely, "body."

2. It occurs some 80 times in the LXX as a synonym of skēnḗ and with no apparent reasons for the choice sometimes of the one and sometimes of the other. The tabernacle and temple are comparatively rarely called skḗnōma.

3. Philo does not use skḗnōma, but Josephus has it in Antiquities 11.187 (cf. Esth. 1:5).

4. The only NT instances are in Acts 7:46 and 2 Pet. 1:13-14. Acts 7:46-47 carries a hint that Solomon errs by building a solid house for God as distinct from a skḗnōma. 2 Pet. 1:13-14 uses the term in the sense of “body,” as the verb in v. 14 shows. The expression reminds us of 2 Cor. 5:1, 4 but may simply reflect common usage, especially as 2 Peter, unlike 1 Peter, does not stress the idea of pilgrimage and corruptibility.

5. The only instance in the apostolic fathers is in Diog. 6.8, where “dwelling” or “body” is the sense and the thought of pilgrimage is present.

skēnóō

1. This word (more commonly skēnéō) means “to live or camp in a tent” (or other dwelling), and, transitively, “to pitch or inhabit a tent.”

2. The simple form is rare in the LXX compared to the compound kataskēnóō.

3. Philo does not have skēnóō but Josephus uses it in On the Life of Moses 244.

4. In the NT the verb occurs in Jn. 1:14 and several times in Revelation, but never in the literal sense. Rev. 7:15 refers to God’s permanent dwelling among the redeemed (cf. 21:3) in abiding and gracious presence. In 13:6, since a tent obviously cannot dwell in a tent, the verb suggests the abiding of God’s name and presence. The thought of permanence is also present in 12:12: The redeemed dwell forever in heaven. In Jn. 1:14 the term implies that the earthly stay of the incarnate Logos is an impermanent one between his preexistence and postexistence as the exalted Lord. Yet this is not where the emphasis rests, for the term more specifically shows that what we have here is the presence of the eternal Word in time.

5. skēnóō does not occur in the apostolic fathers or Apologists.

1. This rare word means “to enter or take up residence in a tent.”

2. The only NT use is in 2 Cor. 12:9, where the idea is that the power of Christ enters into, rather than descends upon, the apostle, i.e., resides in him precisely in his human weakness. The combination of the thought of Christ’s gracious presence with epí (cf. Rev. 7:15) perhaps suggests the rare word.

3. The term occurs neither in the apostolic fathers nor in the Apologists.

1. This uncommon term means “to pitch or enter a tent,” “to camp.”

2. The word is surprisingly common in the LXX, possibly under the influence of the Hebrew, though the usage is not uniform. It is designed to stress the thought of a longer stay. Secure and lasting dwelling is at issue in, e.g., Num. 14:30; Dt. 33:12; Ps. 16:9; Prov. 1:12. The meaning “cause to dwell” occurs in Ps. 23:2. In Mic. 4:10 living in the country rather than the city is the point. The noun kataskḗnōsis occurs six times in the LXX. It refers to the sanctuary in Ezek. 37:27 and means the act of building in 1 Chr. 28:2.

3. Philo equates the tabernacle with wisdom in Allegorical Interpretation of Laws 3.46. Josephus uses the term in Antiquities 9.34 for Elijah’s dwelling in a tent and in 3.202 and 8.106 for God’s dwelling in the tent or temple.

4. OT influence fixes the usage in the NT. Acts 2:25ff. quotes Ps. 16:8ff. Hope is not here the place of dwelling but means “as may be hoped.” Hence kataskēnóō has the absolute sense “to live on,” as is fulfilled in the resurrection. In Mk. 4:32 (cf. Dan. 4:12, 21) the idea is that of the birds nesting in the branches rather than simply alighting temporarily on them. Whether there is an allegorical reference to the Gentiles is open to question, but the parable undoubtedly intimates a reign of security and peace.

5. In the apostolic fathers kataskēnóō means “to cause to dwell” in Did. 10.2 (God’s name at baptism). 1 Clement quotes Prov. 1:33 in 57.7 and 58.1.

1. This word denotes the pitching of a tent or nesting of birds. The verb skanopagéomai also occurs in a cultic context for the erection of tents or booths (cf. skēnopēgéō)

2. The noun occurs nine times in the LXX, always (except in 2 Maccabees) in connection with Tabernacles. 2 Macc. 1:9, 18 refers to the temple dedication in 164 B.C. and even here there is an analogy to Tabernacles. The LXX use probably derives from the nonbiblical, although this offers no instance of the noun in a cultic context.

3. Josephus plainly connects the noun with Tabernacles (e.g., Antiquities 8.123) and an inscription from Cyrenaica (13 B.C.) shows that this is a widespread use.

4. The only NT instance is in Jn. 7:2, where the term denotes the Feast of Tabernacles, as the use in apposition shows. On the middle day of the seven- or eight-day feast Jesus visits the temple (v. 14), and on the great day (the seventh), on which water is dispensed and which forms the true climax, he invites the people to come to him for living water. The account alludes only to the details of the festival. Tabernacles is not of intrinsic theological significance but forms the setting for this visit and the associated teaching of Jesus.

1. This rare word, which combines skēnḗ and poiéō, generally refers to the pitching of a tent, but it also seems to mean "tent maker," and, since tents are often made of leather, it may mean "leather worker."

2. The only NT instance is in Acts 18:3, where Paul stays with Aquila and Priscilla in Corinth because he works at the same trade. If the trade is that of making tents of goats' hair, Paul is perhaps weaving fabric. But rabbinic scholars do not favor weaving, and it is thus more likely that Paul is a "leather worker," and that as such he is a "tent maker." At any rate, he supports himself so as not to have to depend on the churches (1 Cor. 9). [W. MICHAELIS, VII, 368-94][17]

skiá [shadow], aposkíasma [shadow cast by variation], episkiázō [to overshadow] skiá.

A. Greek Usage.

1. This word means "shadow," "shade."

2. In the more common transferred sense it means "shadow" in contrast to "reality" and denotes the worthlessness of things. It is also used for the "shade" of a dead person.

B. The OT.

1. Heb. ṣēl usually means "shadow" in the literal sense (Is. 38:8; 32:2; 16:3; Gen. 19:8). Poetically we read of the sheltering shadow of God's wings (Ps. 17:8). The word may also denote human transitoriness (Ps. 102:11).

2. salmāweṯ means "darkness" (Am. 5:8; Job 3:5). Figuratively it denotes distress (Is. 9:1), danger of death (Jer. 2:6), or the world of the dead (Job 10:21-22).

C. The LXX and Later Judaism.

OT Old Testament

Heb. Hebrew

1. The LXX. In the LXX skiá occurs some 30 times. It is mostly used for ṣēl. At times it means "shadow" in the literal sense (e.g., of the sundial or trees, or evening shadows). But it has mainly a figurative sense, e.g., in the phrase "shadow of death" to which even the righteous are exposed (Job 3:5), into which God can bring us (Job 12:22), but out of which he leads the redeemed (Ps. 107:14). Another figurative use is for the shadow of God's wings (Ps. 57:2), or for the shadow of the Lord's anointed under which the people shall live (Lam. 4:20). skiá also bears a positive sense in Ezek. 17:23 and Is. 32:2, which may be messianic.

2. Philo. The term usually has a transferred sense in Philo, especially in his development of the concept of original and copy. The lógos is God's skiá and as such the archetype of other beings. God's works are skiá but move us toward the reality. As skiá, human work is empty. The world of skiá is finally related to that of sṓma as semblance is to substance. The wording of a statement is skiá as distinct from the meaning, which is the reality.

3. Josephus. Archelaus in Jewish War 2.28, by grasping the reality of rule, makes the emperor the lord, not of things, but of names (skiá). In the besieged city in Jewish War 6.194 only the shadow of food seems to be available.

4. Qumran. In two figurative references oppressors are said to build a fence in the shade (i.e., cause severe distress) and a mythical tree gives shade to the nations.

5. The Rabbis. Apart from the literal use, we find human life compared to the shadow of a flying bird, and the advice is given that it is better to eat simply and sit in the shade than to eat dainties and be exposed to creditors.

D. The NT.

1. Synoptic Gospels and Acts. The literal use occurs in Mk. 4:32 (the birds nesting in the shade) and Acts 5:15 (the shadow of Peter). In a transferred sense Mt. 4:13ff. finds Is. 9:1 fulfilled in Jesus' work in Galilee. The land and shadow of death denote the Gentiles to whom the Messiah alone comes with the light of eschatological salvation. Lk. 1:79 uses the phrase "shadow of death" in a similar way. Here there dawns with the Baptist the light that will enlighten those who, alienated from God, live in darkness and are delivered up to death.

2. Colossians. In Col. 2:17 the law is the shadow of future things in contrast to Christ. Since there is no body without shadow, the shadow points to the body. The Hellenistic concept of appearance and reality receives here a typical Pauline development both eschatologically ("future things") and christologically (Christ as the body).

3. Hebrews. Heb. 8:1-10:18 uses the category of heavenly reality and earthly shadow to relativize the OT priesthood by the high-priestly ministry of Christ. Since the law contains only a shadow, it cannot achieve the necessary perfection.

aposkíasma. This word, found only in post-Christian texts, occurs in the NT in Jms. 1:17 with reference to the darkness caused on earth by the movement of heavenly bodies.

LXX Septuagint

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

i.e. id est, that is

NT New Testament

episkiázō.

1. This word means “to shade,” “to overshadow,” “to cast a shadow,” “to cover.” The use is mostly negative; to overshadow is to obscure. In one instance, Darius’ overshadowing of Asia and Europe, political power is at issue.

2. The term is rare in the LXX. In Prov. 18:11 and Ex. 40:34-35 what is suggested is the manifestation of power, and the idea of sheltering occurs in Ps. 91:4.

3. Philo often uses the term, mostly in a transferred sense. Thus the spirit overshadows the senses when awake, desire puts reason in the shade in irrational people, and humans cast a shadow over virtue and truth and the divine glory.

4. In the NT the literal sense occurs in Acts 5:15 (Peter’s shadow) and Mk. 9:7 (the cloud at the transfiguration). In Lk. 1:35 the power of the Most High overshadows Mary, denoting divine generation but not describing the mode except in terms of the operation of the Spirit.

5. There are no instances in the apostolic fathers. [S. SCHULZ, VII, 394-400]

skirtáō [to leap]

A. Greek Usage. This word, which first refers to the galloping of young horses, comes to denote restless and undisciplined people, although when used for animals it bears a more favorable sense (cf. the leaping of dogs or gamboling of lambs).

B. Hellenistic Judaism.

1. In the LXX the term describes the restless movement of calves (Joel 1:17), the leaping of released calves (Mal. 4:2), the skipping of mountains like rams (Ps. 114:4), and the jostling of the twins in the womb (Gen. 25:22).

2. Philo uses the term in a parable for an animal that throws off the reins, and Josephus has it for leaping for joy at a successful military stratagem.

C. The NT. The term denotes joy in Lk. 6:23 and joyful movement in 1:41, 44. The movement in the womb is prefigured in Gen. 25:22 and eschatological joy in Mal. 4:2.

D. The Post-NT Period. In Diog. 11.6 the term is a metaphor for joy, but in Hermas Similitudes 6.1.6 and 2.3ff. those who give themselves to the world are like sheep leaping on lush pastures. [G. FITZER, VII, 400-402]

sklērokardía* → kardía; sklērós, sklērótēs, sklērotráchēlos, sklērýnō → *pachýnō

skoliós [crooked]

A. Secular Greek.

1. Used literally of rivers and roads, this term, meaning “winding,” “twisted,” relates also to the movements of snakes, and may refer, too, to a labyrinth or to ringlets or matted hair.

2. In a transferred sense the term denotes what is “crooked.” Deceit spoils things, bondage leads to crooked action, and an ambiguous oracle is skoliós.

B. The Greek OT.

1. Of 28 instances of skoliós in the OT, 14 are in Proverbs, and three each in Job, Isaiah, and Wisdom of Solomon. The term is used for various Hebrew roots, especially ‘qs and hpk.

---

cf. confer, compare

2. The literal use occurs in Is. 27:1, but the word is poetic in Ps. 125:5 and also in Is. 40:3ff., where the road is uneven rather than crooked (cf. 42:16; 57:14). The free rendering in Hos. 9:8 refers to the nets that are set on the prophet's path.

3. The transferred sense is common in Proverbs. Thus 2:15 warns against crooked paths, which people of little moral worth tread in 28:18. Crookedness is associated with dishonesty in 14:2 and with slander in 10:8. In the main the term in the Greek OT expresses the nature of those who do not walk in the straightness and uprightness that God commands but walk in a cramped and crooked way that merits punishment.

C. The NT.

1. In Lk. 3:5, based on Is. 40:3ff., saving from corruption is the decisive work of God or Christ for which the Baptist prepares by calling for repentance. Carrying an ethical nuance, the term skoliós denotes here the social misconduct that has its root in unbelief and that will be set right when the Messiah comes with salvation that all can see.

2. Acts 2:40 and Phil. 2:15 adopt the OT expression "crooked generation" with reference either to contemporary Judaism or to the whole human race. Based on Jesus' own teaching in Mk. 9:19; Mt. 17:17; Lk. 9:41, the phrase describes those among whom believers must live blameless lives and to whom they must bring the light.

3. In 1 Pet. 2:18 the term is perhaps a general ethical concept denoting the perverse master to whom slaves must still show respect. Yet there may also be a specific reference to pagan masters who are still enslaved in idolatry.

D. The Early Church. 1 Clem. 39 quotes Job 4:18, Hermas Visions 3.9.1 uses skoliótēs as a general term for sin, Barn. 20.1 uses the figure of the crooked way, and Justin Dialogue 50.3 quotes Is. 40:3ff.   [G. BERTRAM, VII, 403-08]

skólops [pointed stake, thorn]

1. This rare term denotes a "pointed stake," such as is used in pits or palisades. Being fastened to such a stake is a form of execution; the reference is to crucifixion on a T-shaped cross, or to impaling and exposure on a stake. Corpses are also impaled on stakes as a sign of disgrace.

2. Another meaning in the LXX is a "thorn" or "splinter" on the foot, finger, etc., which doctors remove by plasters or ointments. Spines of palms are used in magic, and demons supposedly put prickles on women's temples. In the OT God blocks the way of Israel with thickets in Hos. 2:8, and oppressors are splinters in the eyes of Israel in Num. 33:55 or thorns in Ezek. 28:24.

3. In 2 Cor. 12:7 Paul is speaking about bodily afflictions, and among these he mentions a skólops that God sends, that acts as a messenger of Satan, and that is obviously painful. The idea is not that of a stake to which the apostle is impaled, nor of a barb of depression, e.g., at his failure to win the Jews to Christ, or in reaction from ecstasy. Physical ill-treatment or a physical disability seems to be in view, but there can be no saying what it is. Although it hampers his work, God uses it to keep him from arrogance and to point him to his true strength.

4. Only rarely do Christians use the group with reference to Jesus' execution (cf. Origen Against Celsus 2.55.68-69). It lies outside the usage that soon develops in relation to the cross (cf. the paucity of anastauroún).   [G. DELLING, VII, 409-13]

skopós [overseer, mark], skopéō [to inspect], kataskopéō [to spy out, inspect], katáskopos [spy, inspector] skopós.

1. This word has the two senses of "overseer" and "mark" at which one shoots. It is commonly used for a military "guard," "spy," or "scout."

2. It occurs in both the main senses in the LXX (Jer. 6:17; Job 16:12).

3. The only NT instance is in Phil. 3:14. The background is that of the contest in the arena, and the point is that Christians have a mark that is given by the word of the cross. They aim at a future goal, uniting their wills with God's will and in faith pursuing the goal that he sets.

4. The theme of the games is common in the apostolic fathers. We read of the goal of peace in 1 Clem. 19.2, and cf. 63.1. In 2 Clem. 19.1 skopós has the sense of "model."

skopéō.

A. Outside the NT.

1. This word means "to look at (critically)," "to inspect." It may also mean "to hold up something as a model."

2. The only LXX instances are in Esth. 8:12 LXX and 2 Macc. 4:5.

B. The NT.

1. Apart from Lk. 11:35 skopeín is peculiar to Paul. In Phil. 3:17 it means "to inspect and hold up as a model." The meaning is less precise in Rom. 16:17: "to take note." In 2 Cor. 4:18 the thought is that of considering things transitory and things eternal with a view to making a critical decision between them. In Gal. 6:1, as we see the faults of others, we must examine ourselves, but in Phil. 2:4 we must have an eye to others as well as ourselves.

2. In Lk. 11:35 the scrutiny in the sphere of the whole person (the sṓma) has to do with the will and its orientation. We must test whether we are free from stimuli that cloud the glance, for this conveys what the will intends.

C. The Apostolic Fathers. 1 Clem. 51.1 contains an interesting instance of skopeín.

1. This word means "to look around critically" or "to spy out."

2. The LXX prefers kataskopeúein.

3. The one NT instance is in Gal. 2:4, where Paul refers to the legalistic believers who, having joined the church to put things right, are wrongly spying out what is to them an intolerable freedom. Since their aim is to reintroduce bondage, their attitude is incompatible with the eschatological gospel of joy.

katáskopos.

1. This word means "spy" or "inspector."

2. It occurs ten times in the LXX for "spy," mostly in Gen. 42:9ff.

3. The only NT instance is in Heb. 11:31 for the spies of Josh. 2:1ff. [E. FUCHS, VII, 413-18]

skorpízō [to scatter, disperse], diaskorpízō [to scatter, disperse], skorpismós [scattering]

1. skorpízō means "to scatter," "to disperse," "to divide."

2. In the LXX it has much the same sense as diaspeírein (diasporá).

3. It is used in the OT for God's judgment on enemies (2 Sam. 22:15). The Egyptians are scattered according to Wis. 17:3. The judgment on Jerusalem in Ezek. 5:1ff. includes scattering as well as fire and sword. The sheep will be scattered when the shepherd is smitten in Zech. 13:7ff.

4. That Zech. 13:7ff. is understood messianically may be seen in Damasc. 19:7ff.; the Damascus community equates itself with the scattered sheep. On the basis of Dt. 4:27-28; 28:64 later Judaism regards the dispersion as a divine judgment. Yet God's presence is with the scattered people. A constant prayer is that judgment will be lifted and the people regathered. Philo recalls that those who are dispersed may be bitten by the serpent of lust and passion; he associates the eskorpisménoi with the scorpion (Dt. 8:15). Josephus uses the term for the spreading of rumors, and the rabbis speak of dispersing money to the poor.

5. In Mt. 13:30; Lk. 11:23 Jesus says that those who do not gather with him scatter abroad, i.e., they hinder God's work. He is perhaps referring to undecided and procrastinating hearers. The antithesis of gathering and scattering occurs in rabbinic sayings, and Christ's work is that of gathering in Jn. 11:52. In Mk. 14:27; Mt. 26:31 Jesus relates to himself and his disciples the saying in Zech. 13:7 (cf. Jn. 16:32). Jesus dies, however, in order to gather into one God's dispersed children (Jn. 11:52). The Gentiles are in view here as well as Israel, for all who belong to God's family by faith, and who are now scattered among the nations, are to be gathered. In Jn. 10:1ff. the good shepherd gathers and protects the flock, but the wolf scatters it (cf. Acts 20:29). In Lk. 1:51 God scatters the proud (cf. Ps. 89:10), but in 2 Cor. 9:9 (Ps. 112:9) the righteous distribute generously to the poor. The juxtaposition in Mt. 25:24ff. suggests the scattering of seed, although the reference might be to winnowing. Lk. 15:13 carries the nuance of squandering (cf. 16:1), but the use in Acts 5:37 is military: The followers of Judas the Galilean are scattered.

6. Did. 9.4 refers to the bread scattered on the mountains and then gathered together and made one. Ignatius in Romans 5.3 speaks of the scattering of his bones. Far from being a sign of dereliction, this is a mark of fellowship with Christ. [O. MICHEL, VII, 418-22]

skótos [darkness], skotía [darkness], skotóō [to be darkened], skotízō [to be darkened], skoteinós [dark]

A. Classical Greek.

1. Usage. The word skótos means "obscurity," "darkness." The feminine skotía is Hellenistic. The classical verb is skotóō, and the Hellenistic verb skotízō. Both forms occur in the NT but only in the passive.

2. Meaning. Used in both a literal and a transferred sense, skótos denotes darkness experienced as an enveloping sphere that has significance for existence, e.g., by hampering movement or foresight, or causing anxiety or danger. If light means potentiality, going into the dark means death. The realm of the dead is a dark realm. It projects already into the present life. Darkness can take the form of blindness. The transferred senses arise as follows. Subjectively, darkness is (1) secrecy or deception, (2) the obscurity of an object or speaker, or (3) lack of knowledge or insight.

3. Philosophy. Greek epistemology starts with the process of illumination, i.e., the movement from darkness to light. Darkness has no great conceptual significance; it serves only as a foil to light. There is no direct line from what is said about illumination to later dualism.

B. The OT.

1. Background. Brightness and darkness denote salvation and perdition. The natural basis of light is always clear. The sun shines by night in the Egyptian underworld. Dark ages of crisis are followed by an age of salvation. Creation succeeds primal darkness. How far Iranian dualism, which does not expressly oppose light and darkness, influences Judaism is debatable.

2. Usage. The group ḥšḵ dominates the field in Hebrew, and 'pl has the same sense. The skot- group is the consistent rendering of ḥšḵ. The group is most common in the Wisdom writings and some parts of the prophets. The three spheres of use are cosmological, eschatological, and anthropological.

3. General Features. Natural darkness, associated with the rhythm of day and night or with the movement of clouds, envelops us (Job 23:17) It describes the human situation (Jer. 13:16). It denotes the range of what is evil or harmful. Darkness of the eyes is sorrow (Lam. 5:17). Darkness expresses captivity (Ps. 107:10ff.) and wickedness (10:7-8). It marks the underworld and the ocean depths as spheres of nonbeing. The realm of the dead is one of darkness and supreme terror (cf. Ps. 88:6; Job 17:12-13).

4. Specific Features. God creates light and darkness, and is Lord of both (Is. 45:7). No darkness can hide from him (Job 34:22). He darkens the eyes but also makes darkness bright (Is. 42:16ff.). Darkness is not dark with him (Ps. 139:11-12). It sets forth his sovereignty by expressing his hiddenness (1 Kgs. 8:12), but it is only a penultimate reality.

5. Cosmology. Darkness is connected with chaos, and creation begins with light. The stress is not on an original darkness but on its overcoming by God's word of power. Darkness belongs to creation only with the creation of light. It is connected with destruction as creation is with salvation (cf. Is. 45:7).

6. Eschatology. Amos proclaims the day of the Lord as a day of darkness (5:20). He has the historical judgment of Israel in view, but the onset of chaos lies behind the metaphor. Yet even this is under God's control (8:9). Darkness describes the "day" in Joel 2:2.

7. Anthropology. God sends light to the mind, but darkness smites the wicked and their light is put out (Job 15:22ff.; 18:15ff.). Even in darkness the righteous may hope in God (Ps. 97:11). A broad spiritualized and transferred use develops in Wis. 17:19-20.

C. Judaism.

1. Usage. Modifications of OT use include stronger legal thinking, more stress on God's transcendence, and a development of belief in the hereafter and apocalyptic expectation. Darkness is now damnation. A more spatial view of the cosmos finds less place for the rhythm of day and night. Much is said about eschatological darkness, but darkness will finally be destroyed. There are two ways of life, that of light and that of darkness.

2. Qumran. At Qumran light and darkness present a dualism of eschatological decision. Two spheres determine our being and destiny. We must decide between them. The sphere determines individual acts. Converts move into the sphere of light, although they then see that the movement is God's work. In this sphere their movement is away from the children of darkness. The present battle is a foretaste of the eschatological conflict which will see the destruction of darkness. The wicked will experience eternal perdition in the fire of dark places. In the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, which belongs to the same milieu, Beliar represents the darkness that God will finally repel. But Wisdom influence may be seen in the Testaments, e.g., in the stronger psychologizing and the closer interweaving of ethical concepts.

3. Rabbinic Writings. The word "darkness" is less prominent in these works. The opposite of light is its absence, and the equation of darkness and wickedness occurs mostly in exegesis.

D. Hellenism and Gnosticism.

1. General Data. Light symbolism now becomes a metaphysics of light. Light is a transcendent sphere and illumination is rapture and divinization. Darkness is not a counterforce but what one leaves behind. The skótos group is thus less prominent. It becomes important again only when Gnostics distinguish cosmic light (which is skoteinón) from transcendent light.

2. Philo. Philo is of the illumination school. He finds an antithesis, not between light and darkness, but between heavenly and earthly light. He continues the usual transferred use but forges a new product by fusing the OT and Plato.

3. The Hermetic Works. As compared with light, darkness is rare in these writings. Light and darkness are spheres, but light surrounds darkness. Earthly light, however, is not true light. Since darkness is related to the body, salvation means bringing into light by ascent from the body.

4. Odes of Solomon. Humanity is in darkness-both a place and a situation—and its dispelling by light is not a natural but a transcendent possibility.

5. The Mandaeans. In a bewildering medley of ideas the main point is that the soul is lost and only revelation by heavenly envoys can lead it to the world of light. The world is an evil sphere and earthly light stands in the service of this sphere. The world lives by the elements of light within it. Darkness is a force and substance binding us to the dark house of the body. Its children are doomed to destruction and all its works are bad. It does not understand light and fights against it. Only by a call from above is there redemption from it.

6. The Manichees. Here again we find two opposing forces or spheres. Darkness develops by a revolt from below. It finds expression in the sphere of nature. Yet light is superior in quality, as its cosmic bearers show. This superiority finds expression in the work of the envoys of light. The cosmic process, revealed through Mani, is not just a doctrine but a task.

7. Christian Gnosticism. Light depicts transcendent salvation, but darkness is less prominent as its opposite. Where darkness occurs, it is the sphere of lostness represented by its own forces. Redemption is deliverance from the bands of darkness.

E. The NT. skótos (in the neuter) is most common, but John prefers skotía. skotízomai (five times) and skotóomai (three) are always passive. The group is used both literally and figuratively but has theological significance only in John.

I. The Synoptics, Acts, and Revelation.

1. Literal Use.

a. An eclipse darkens the sun at the crucifixion (Mk. 15:33). This displays the cosmic significance of the event. It also brings out its depth (cf. the dereliction, which, as a fulfilment of prophecy, is in accordance with the divine will).

b. The underworld is a place of darkness (Mt. 8:12). Its power rules in the passion (Lk. 22:3).

c. Cosmic darkness ushers in the last time (Mk. 13:24); it is a preceding sign in the final period of wickedness. A quotation from Joel 2:28ff. reinforces the picture of the last time in Acts 2:17ff., but the time is now one of epiphany. Darkness also plays a role in Revelation. Thus the stars lose some of their radiance in 8:12, smoke obscures the sun in 9:2, and the kingdom of the beast is darkened in 16:10, leading to a last desperate revolt.

2. Figurative Use. Mt. 4:15-16 and Lk. 1:79 adopt the metaphor of Is. 8:23; 9:1-2. By using the Hebrew perfect, not the LXX future, Matthew stresses the fulfilment.

3. Transferred Use. What is dark is hidden in Mt. 10:27 (Lk. 12:3-4). The time of Jesus' earthly work is that of concealment, the time of the church that of proclamation. The expression in Mt. 6:22-23 (cf. Lk. 11:34ff.) is paradoxical. The contrast is one of health and sickness, but Matthew also has the evil eye in view, as the context shows. Luke makes the saying an exhortation and changes the final warning into a promise.

II. The Pauline Corpus.

1. Paul. The group has no special significance for Paul. Conversion is illumination in analogy to creation (2 Cor. 4:6). Darkness characterizes paganism (Rom. 13:12). We are to set aside its works. Darkness denotes what is hidden and will finally be disclosed (1 Cor. 4:5). Darkness of the heart is a punishment for the perversion of knowledge of God (Rom. 1:21). A dualism of decision occurs in 2 Cor. 6:14.

2. Colossians and Ephesians. Darkness has its sphere of power (Col. 1:13). Conversion is again illumination (Eph. 5:8ff.; cf. 1 Pet. 2:9). Believers war with the rulers of this present darkness (Eph. 6:12).

III. John. John presents a theological duality of light and darkness. The greatness of light and its manifestation are the starting point. The world is in darkness (Jn. 8:12), which is a sphere but not a substance. But darkness can neither understand nor resist light. It incurs guilt by trying to fight it. The manifestation of light, not the nature of the world, sets up the situation of decision (3:19). Wickedness actualizes itself in a decision against light. The decision is definitive (cf. 12:46). To walk in darkness is to go astray (12:35). The thrust in 1 Jn. 1:5-6 is ethical. In a practical application of the ontological thesis, there is attack on an enthusiasm that preaches habitual sinlessness. We walk in the light but do not claim sinlessness. A similar ethical concern appears in 2:8ff. If in 1:6 walking in darkness is a reason for breach of fellowship with God, here it is a result. The horizon is not the world but the church in the world. Darkness is disappearing; one can look ahead to the victory of light.

F. The Apostolic Fathers. Ignatius does not use the group, 1 Clem. 36.2 has it for the darkening of the diánoia, and Barnabas uses it in characterizing the two ways (5.4; 18.1).

[H. CONZELMANN, VII, 423-45]

skýbalon [refuse, dung]

A. The Greek World. Of uncertain etymology, skýbalon means literally "dung," "scraps," "refuse." It finds transferred use as "dregs," "filth" to denote what is worthless. The term skybálisma is used for "crumbs," skybalismós denotes "contempt," skybaleúein means "to treat contemptuously," skybalikós means "scorned" or "filthy," and skybalṓdēs means "waste."

B. Hellenistic Judaism. In the LXX the term occurs only in Sir. 27:4. Philo and Josephus have it only in the literal sense.

C. The NT. The only NT instance is in Phil. 3:8, where Paul evaluates as "refuse" or "dung" all that he has previously regarded as important. The perfect tense in v. 7 relates to his conversion, and the present tenses in v. 8 show that this is his present view. The vulgar term stresses the force of the renunciation he has made for Christ's sake. He does not disown the divine privileges of Israel but unmasks the striving for self-righteousness as a carnal enterprise that stands in antithesis to faith, serves the flesh, and is just as worthless as the sárx. [F. LANG, VII, 445-47]

Skýthēs [Scythian]

1. The Scythians. The Scythians are Iranian nomads who invade Asia Minor about 700 B.C. and thence terrorize the Near East but without establishing any lasting kingdom. Their alliance with Babylon enables the latter to overthrow Assyria.

2. The Scythians in the OT. The OT depicts the Scythian threat in Jer. 4:6; 6:22-23; 5:15; Zeph. 1:2ff., although the equation is not certain. In Gen. 10:3 Ashkenaz (perhaps Ashkuz) may represent the Scythians (cf. Jer. 51:27).

3. The Scythians in the Graeco-Roman World. By colonizing the north shore of the Black Sea the Greeks make contact with the Scythians, whom they regard as a simple and strong people, but also crude, cruel, and uncultured. Later the Scythians represent a slave-type located around the Black Sea. Cicero views them as a good example of barbarians.

4. The Scythians in Later Judaism. The Greek name of Beth-Shan, Skythópolis, derives from a Scythian invasion. The Jews, too, abhor the cruelty of the Scythians. Philo, grouping them with the Parthians, says they are no less wild than the Germans. The Egyptians and Scythians represent two different barbarian peoples.

v. verse

5. The Scythians in the NT. Col. 3:10-11 perhaps contains phrases from a baptismal liturgy which in praise and thanksgiving celebrates the new humanity and its elimination of all distinctions. In the linking of barbarian and Scythian the author is perhaps following traditional usage, or he may have the situation at Colossae in mind. Whether barbarians and Scythians are distinguished or the Scythians are an outstanding example of barbarians is debatable. In any case, baptism overcomes the offense that even Scythians give to natural sensibility.

6. The Scythians in the Apologists. Justin in Dialogue with Trypho 28 shows that the new Christian order, which rests on knowledge of God and Christ, enables even rude and immoral peoples like the Scythians and Parthians to be friends of God. [O. MICHEL, VII, 447-50]

skythrōpós [sad-looking]

A. Outside the NT.

1. skythrōpós means "serious- or sad-looking" with various nuances, e.g., gloominess, solemnity, embitterment, depression, sorrow, or melancholy.

2. In the OT we find it in Gen. 40:7; Dan. 1:10 Θ, and verb forms occur in Ps. 35:15; Prov. 15:13.

3. Forms of the stem occur in Josephus Antiquities 2.19; 11.54; 11.164.

B. In the NT. In Mt. 6:16 the skythrōpoí are those who want to appear sad when they fast. Jesus calls them hypocrites because their serious mien makes them seem other than they are, and because they do not turn to the Judge who sees what is hidden. Jesus demands cheerful repentance of his disciples because they find in the Judge a forgiving Father. The two who go to Emmaus are skythrōpoí because Jesus seems not to have fulfilled their hopes of deliverance (Lk. 24:17ff.). [W. BIEDER, VII, 450-51]

skṓlēx [worm], skōlēkóbrōtos [worm-eaten]

skṓlēx

A. The Greek World. This word means literally "worm," and is also used for the the larvae of insects. In a transferred sense it means "thread," "wave," a "cake" shaped like a worm, and a "heap" of threshed grain.

B. The OT and Later Judaism.

1. The OT.

a. Use. The word occurs 18 times in the LXX, nine times in writings only in Greek. The usual Hebrew equivalent can also signify "crimson," since the crushed eggs and bodies of shield-lice constitute a crimson dye (cf. Is. 1:18; Lam. 4:5).

b. Meaning. The skṓlēx is sometimes the "worm" in the literal sense (cf. Dt. 28:39; Jon. 4:7). Figuratively the term suggests what is weak or insignificant (Job 25:6; Ps. 22:6).

c. The Worm a Sign of Damnation. This thought is present in Is. 66:24. In the Vale of Hinnom the corpses of apostate Israelites are subject to corruption and burning. That the worm does not die denotes either total destruction or the experience of unending bodily corruption by the soul (cf. Is. 50:11).

2. The Rabbis. The rabbis continue OT usage. Wood with worms in it must not come on the altar. Worms are the human lot in the tomb. Whereas ordinary sinners suffer annihilation of body and soul, very bad ones undergo eternal punishment according to Is. 66:24.

3. Philo and Josephus. The word does not occur in Philo, and Josephus has it only in the literal sense (Antiquities 3.30).

4. Qumran. In the Qumran writings the worm denotes human vanity and corruptibility. With dust, it signifies death and the grave. There is no express reference to the worm in connection with eternal damnation.

C. The NT. The only NT instance is in Mk. 9:44ff. (quoting Is. 66:24). With géenna the term denotes eschatological perdition. As in Is. 66:24 the reference may be either to definitive destruction or to unremitting corruption; the latter is more likely. Worm and fire go together; the former does not suggest the gnawing of conscience, nor the latter physical pain.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. The worm symbolizes human pettiness in 1 Clem. 16.15 and eternal perdition in 2 Clem. 7.6. The reference to the worm that emerges from the decaying flesh of the phoenix is a new feature in 1 Clem. 25.3.

skōlēkóbrōtos.

1. Outside the NT. This word means "consumed by worms," "worm-eaten." It has not been found as a medical term but we do find references to people being eaten by worms. Josephus tells how Herod the Great in his last illness suffers from sores in the entrails.

2. In the NT. The one NT instance is in Acts 12:23 with reference to the death of Herod Agrippa, who because of his arrogance is smitten by an angel and "eaten by worms." Josephus in Antiquities 19.346ff. speaks of the severe pains that lead to his speedy death. [F. LANG, VII, 452-57]

smýrna [myrrh], smyrnízō [to treat with myrrh]

smýrna.

1. This word means "myrrh," which the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans use as perfume, medicine, and incense. mýrra is an alternative but rare form.

2. In the OT myrrh plays an important role in Ex. 40:23; Ps. 45:8; Cant. 3:6; 4:14; 5:5.

3. In the NT smýrna occurs in Mt. 2:11 as one of the gifts brought by the Wise Men, possibly incense. Another instance is in Jn. 19:39, where it is one of the substances in which the body of Jesus is wrapped to prevent rapid decomposition. Those who carry out the burial rites do not expect a speedy resurrection.

smyrnízō. This verb occurs in Mk. 15:23, where the soldiers offer Jesus spiced wine prior to the crucifixion (v. 24). Although Jewish ladies offer wine mixed with frankincense to condemned persons to blunt their self-awareness, it is not clear that the drink of Mk. 15:23 is meant in the same sense (cf. Mt. 27:34). [W. MICHAELIS, VII, 457-59]

Solomṓn [Solomon]

A. King Solomon in Tradition and Legend. The stories in 1 Kgs. 2-11 refer to the wealth and wisdom of Solomon but also to his foreign marriages, idolatry, and punishment—aspects which are played down in 2 Chr. 1-9. Later accounts magnify his inspiration as poet and author, the magnificence of his court, the range of his knowledge, and his magical powers.

1. Inspiration. 1 Kgs. 4:32 refers to the proverbs and songs of Solomon, and Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles are mainly ascribed to him. Later he is accepted as the author of the Psalms of Solomon, and he speaks pseudepigraphically in the Wisdom of Solomon (cf. also the Odes and Testament of Solomon). Josephus in Antiquities 8.44-45 refers to the vast range of Solomon's knowledge; he ascribes to him 1,005 books, odes, and songs as well as 3,000 parables and proverbs.

2. Magnificence. Jewish tradition offers staggering numbers for the workers and materials used in building the temple and for its costly furnishings. The same applies to the lavishness of his court. Yet the rabbis blame him for his foreign marriages and for letting his wives engage in idolatry.

3. Wisdom. Legend portrays Solomon as the wisest of rulers. He answers all the riddles of Hiram and the questions of the Queen of Sheba. He controls demons and can cure illnesses. Those who see him in a dream can hope to be wise. His wisdom derives from study of the law. Only Moses surpasses him in knowledge and exposition of the law (cf. Dt. 34:10).

4. Magical Powers. As Solomon has knowledge of the plant and animal kingdoms (1 Kgs. 4:32ff.), he supposedly has astrological learning too, and has demons at his command. In non-Jewish circles, therefore, his name passes into magical use, and his magical skills are widely known and extolled.

B. King Solomon in the NT.

1. Solomon's Temple. There are few references to this in the NT. Stephen says that Solomon was allowed to build God's house (Acts 7:47), and we read of the portico of Solomon-supposedly a part of the original structure—in Jn. 10:23; Acts 3:11;, 5:12. Although believers assemble here, we gather from Stephen's speech that they attach no significance to it as a place of true worship; only stiff-necked people tie God down to houses made with hands.

2. Solomon as the Ancestor of Jesus. In the genealogy of Matthew Solomon is a link in the chain that leads from Abraham to Jesus. Precisely through the offense of David which produces Solomon, God pushes forward his people's history.

3. Solomon's Glory and Wisdom. Jesus refers to the splendor of Solomon in the saying in Mt. 6:29 (cf. Lk. 12:27). Believers need not be anxious, for God clothes even passing flowers in more glorious attire than that of Solomon. The wisdom of Solomon also comes up for comparison in Mt. 12:42 (cf. Lk. 11:31). The Queen of Sheba comes from afar to hear Solomon's wisdom but this impenitent generation will not heed the greater than Solomon who is present, and will have no answer to the Queen's indictment. David's eschatological Son is incomparably superior to his historical son. [E. LOHSE, VII, 459-65] sophía [wisdom], sophós [wise], sophízō [to make wise] sophía, sophós.

A. The Early Greek Period to Later Philosophical Usage.

1. The Early Period to Socrates. The noun sophía derives from the adjective sophós and hence always denotes a quality rather than an activity. At first it covers any skill, then suffers restriction to intellectual knowledge, and finally unites the practical and theoretical aspects. Mastery of a skill is the primary meaning in Homer and for some time later. sophía is not just the skill itself, but mastery of it, and hence sophía is an attribute of the gods and their gift to humanity. The Muses mediate it to poets, who are precursors of the philosophers. The first sages are wise in conduct as well as learning, and their learning embraces practical wisdom, e.g., in political judgment. Under Ionic leadership, however, a new type of sage develops who is devoted to theoretical inquiry. The Sophists contest the knowability of being and reduce wisdom to a power of speech which may be taught, but they go down under the devastating criticism of Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle.

2. Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle. Socrates' wisdom consists of the critical knowledge that autonomous wisdom is no wisdom at all. True wisdom knows being, but humans are not granted this knowledge. For Plato wisdom is acceptance of being. Ignorance brings us under the power of érōs. As the idea is divine, wisdom is proper only to God, but philosophy is possible in the power of érōs, and through it one may attain to the four virtues, wisdom being the greatest of virtues. Aristotle equates wisdom and philosophy. Wisdom is attainable as the first and most complete form of knowledge, i.e., the knowledge of first causes. Wisdom is a theoretical virtue, not a practical one as in Plato. It contemplates the truth of first causes, not just what results from them.

3. Hellenistic Schools. As individuals become detached from the city-states, a new ideal of the sage develops. Philosophers are often tutors to the sons of the wealthy, preparing them for life in the broadest sense. Stoicism finds wisdom in the harmony of thought and the cosmic order. It is a basic attitude with an ethical connotation. As actualized knowledge, it combines theory and practice. The sage alone has knowledge, is divine by nature, does all things well, possesses all virtues, and is the only truly happy person. The heads of the Stoic school, however, are hesitant to claim that they themselves are sages in this ideal sense.

4. Later Antiquity. Various ideas overlap in later antiquity. In Middle Platonism wisdom is the fulfilment of philosophical approximation to the divine. For Plotinus sophía is a vision of the spirit, and it perfects the natural virtues. In a later description sophía is knowledge that leads us into light; it takes the form of illumination. [U. WILCKENS, VII, 465-476]

B. The OT.

I. Terminology. The LXX mostly uses sophía/sophós for the Hebrew stem ḥkm, of which the verb form occurs 26 times, the adjectival noun form 135 times, and the noun form 147 times, mostly in the Wisdom books, but fairly often in the historical books too, where technical skill or knowledge is usually at issue. In the prophets the terms denote human ability, including the wisdom and magic of surrounding nations. The translation "wise" or "wisdom" is inexact; it catches neither the range nor the precise meaning of the originals, which suggest experienced and competent mastery of life and its various problems. The most common parallels have to do with perception, understanding, or skill, although parallels with uprightness and honesty are also common. The parallels show that action rather than thought is the point. In contrast, folly is a disorder that also finds expression in behavior.

II. Wisdom in the Ancient Near East and the OT.

1. Mesopotamia. While wisdom undergoes special development in the OT, its content may be defined in part by the surrounding world of thought. In Mesopotamia we find no word corresponding to the Hebrew, but an extensive wisdom literature exists. Thus collections of proverbs seek to understand and master life, and other texts deal with ethical questions, impart practical advice, and tackle the problems resulting from an attempt to bring life into accord with a general order. Traditional fables, disputes, and debates are also found. In addition, there is the wisdom that is skill in the fields of cultus and magic.

2. Egypt. Egypt displays an impulse toward a norm of conduct that is defined as truth, rightness, or order, and that obtains in both the heavenly and the earthly spheres. The goal of wisdom is to open the way to this order by the transmission of knowledge. The order itself is unchangeable, and subjection to it is the wisdom which produces mastery and self-control, and brings success in life. On the other hand, offense against it is transgression against God and brings loss. Since cosmic and human order coincide, Egyptian wisdom literatare embraces both serial knowledge and instruction for life.

3. Other Nations. Israel knows the wisdom of other nations such as the Canaanites (Ezek. 28:3) and Edomites (Jer. 49:7), but little of this has survived. Prov. 30:1ff. and 31:1ff. both derive from tribes outside Israel.

4. Israel.

a. Since at all cultural stages an attempt is made to order and control life, popular proverbs soon develop which embody and transmit experience (cf. 1 Sam. 24:14; Prov. 11:2; 16:18). Often a second line is added to such proverbs to bring out their practical application (cf. Prov. 25:23; 26:20).

b. In Solomon's reign a school of wisdom develops under the king's leadership (1 Kgs. 4:32-33). This embraces both serial knowledge relating to the plant and animal kingdoms and practical wisdom covering moral and religious conduct. Riddles and fables find a place, too. The prophets are critical of this school, which seems to play an important role in the days of Hezekiah (Prov. 25:1). Thus far wisdom has been mostly a preserve of the establishment, but its base broadens in the time of Jeremiah (cf. 50:35) as wisdom teachers transmit it. The underlying ideal is that of the culture of the whole person who can not merely handle the world but who achieves self-mastery.

c. After the exile the concept is worked out more theologically. Wisdom is a divine principle that issues a summons to the race. Hence all theology is in a sense wisdom thinking.

d. Wisdom is not nationalized and integrated into the people's life. It covers the general human situation and transcends social frontiers. Yet in subordination to Israel's faith it acquires a stronger ethical emphasis and presupposes faith. In keeping with the meaning of the stem, however, it still has a broad practical range.

III. Human Wisdom.

1. Magic and Manticism. In some instances wise men may be magicians, soothsayers, etc. (cf. Gen. 41:8; Is. 44:25; cf. also the astrologers of Esth. 6:13). The wise men of Babylon are a college of such persons (Dan. 2:27; 4:3).

2. Skill and Ability. Wisdom is skill or mastery, even though it be of wickedness (Jer. 4:22). Thus women know laments (Jer. 9:16) and priests the law (8:8-9). Artisans have wisdom in this sense (Ex. 36:8; 1 Chr. 22:15, etc.). The term also covers the art of government (Eccl. 4:13) and judicial ability (1 Kgs. 3:28).

3. Cleverness and Cunning. Animals are adept in self-preservation (Prov. 30:24ff.). The woman who sends Joab to David shows cleverness (2 Sam. 14:2). Political cunning may work adversely for Israel (Ex. 1:10) or for rivals (1 Kgs. 2:6, 9). Wisdom in a bad sense means cunning in the sense of crafty machinations (cf. Dt. 32:5; Job 32:13).

4. Practical Wisdom. Related to prudence, wisdom is practical mastery of life and its situations (cf. Prov. 1:5), whether in wealth or poverty, joy or pain. It knows how to deal with others and how to enjoy life. It recognizes God's rule, knows good and evil, and is aware of the ways of the world.

5. Culture. Wisdom embraces a more general knowledge that covers organic and inorganic nature (1 Kgs. 4:29ff.) as well as the nations and various human types (cf. Gen. 10; Job 24:5ff.). The final goal is finding a secret that will give control as well as knowledge of the world (Job 28). The OT, however, allows little place for cultural wisdom in this wider sense.

6. Rules of Conduct. The concept of wisdom in the OT often has rules of conduct in view (cf. Job 33:33; Prov. 2:2). Possessing knowledge, the wise impart it (Prov. 14:24; 15:2, 7). Fools betray themselves when they try to offer counsel. Instructive words from the heart are like a springing well (16:21ff.; 18:4). Wise people listen to such words (15:12) and may go on to nourish others with their instruction (6:23; 10:17; 13:14; 15:24).

7. Ethical Conduct. Right conduct presupposes understanding, which only reverent seeking can attain. To achieve understanding one must shun such corrupting influences as strong drink, bad company, strange women, unlawful gain, and violent speech (cf. Prov. 23:20-21; 2:12ff., 16ff.; Eccl. 7:7; Job 15:2). The divine law is the source of ethical conduct; it involves uprightness, liberality to the poor, and a right attitude to others in a life governed by wise rules.

8. Piety. Wisdom in the OT may also denote piety, for the wise know God, understand his words and ways, and humbly perceive their sin and the divine lordship. Fear of God is the starting point of true wisdom (Prov. 9:10; Ps. 11 1:10). It is not itself wisdom but leads to it as a reverence that comes to expression, not in the cultus, but in conduct. Expressing the fear of God in daily life offers valuable insight into life itself. Its correlative is not doing evil (Job 1:1), i.e., its careful avoidance. Wisdom sees that God tests the heart (Prov. 16:2), that he takes pleasure in good and not in evil (11:1), and that he controls human potentialities (16:9, 19; 19:21). It thus comes to put its trust in God (22:19).

9. Academic Wisdom. A well-rounded body of wisdom develops with teachers to transmit it. Thus Job 8:8 and Ecclesiastes presuppose a more closed body of teaching (Eccl. 2:12ff.; 8:17). The Preacher has learned from this (1:13, 16) but is also critical of it.

10. Eschatological Blessing and Apocalyptic Endowment. In Is. 33:6 wisdom is an eschatological blessing associated with righteousness (v. 5). In Is. 11:2 God's Spirit will fall on the messianic ruler as the Spirit of wisdom etc., imparting strength and understanding beyond the normal human measure. Daniel (2:30; 5:11) has a divinely given wisdom that surpasses ordinary understanding and enables him to know the secrets of the future.

IV. God's Wisdom.

1. God Has Wisdom. Only rarely does the OT ascribe wisdom to God. Yet wisdom comes from God (e.g., as a gift to Solomon), and Isaiah in 31:1-2 appeals to the divine wisdom. Later God's wisdom is found in his works (Is. 40:13-14; Job 26:12; 37:16) and acts (Job 11:6). Since God has all knowledge and might, no human understanding can stand against him (Prov. 21:30; Is. 19:11ff.).

2. God Attains and Creates Wisdom. a. In Job 28 God alone has found wisdom and used it in creation in the sense of practical mastery. Wisdom here is a quasi-independent entity to which God has access. It has its own reality, although it lies beyond the scope of human inquiry. The idea is similar to the Babylonian or Egyptian concept of an eternal divine wisdom that is proper to the gods.

b. In Prov. 1-9 wisdom plays the part of a teacher or revealer who seeks a dwelling within the race. It precedes creation (8:22ff.) but is created by God as a kind of personal entity. It offers instruction as Preacher (1:20), bride (4:6ff.), companion (6:22), and hostess (9:1). As the figurative depictions show, wisdom here is not just neutral teaching but carries with it a summons. Like a prophet, it authoritatively invites, threatens, and forces to decision. It reveals God's will, and hence we must track it down (2:4), find it (3:13), woo it (4:7), and accept its invitation (4:6ff.). This concept, which incorporates the prophetic element, in no way weakens the basic faith in God himself.

V. The Origin and Source of Wisdom and Knowledge.

1. Tradition. In contrast to the situation in Egypt, tradition is only one source of wisdom and knowledge in the OT (cf. Is. 19:11). The friends of Job appeal to tradition. Thus Bildad argues that past generations are superior to one individual or one generation (Job 8:8ff.), and Eliphaz claims that he has received the teaching of the fathers in unperverted form (15:18-19).

2. Personal Experience. Experience also gives knowledge, hence respect for older people (Job 12:12). Eliphaz appeals to experience (8:4), and so, too, does Job (21:6). Experience plays a big role in Ecclesiastes (1:13; 16-17, etc.).

3. Means. It is by instruction and correction that wisdom is imparted or learned (Prov. 19:20; 21:11). Converse with the wise brings knowledge, but since learning is hard, chastisement may also be necessary (Prov. 8:33).

4. The Gift of God.

a. God endows special people with wisdom in an extraordinary way, e.g., Joseph, Solomon, and Daniel. In this regard one may refer to prophetic inspiration (Jer. 9:11), artistic ability (Ex. 28:3), and nocturnal revelation (Job 4: 12ff.). God may give wisdom or hold far from it (Job 11:6; 17:4).

b. According to the concept of the primal man (cf. Ezek. 28:1ff.) the idea of access to the heavenly counsel arises; Eliphaz denies that Job has this kind of wisdom (Job 15:7-8).

c. Elihu claims a knowledge that comes from God by the spirit as the portion that God has given him (Job 32ff.). This resembles the knowledge imparted to the prophets but has a more general application, opening up wisdom to all people irrespective of tradition or experience.

VI. Value, Result, and Criticism.

1. Value and Result. Instruction is valuable (Prov. 18:4) and a teacher profitable (25:12), for wisdom is a supreme treasure (21:20). It offers protection (2:8) and brings success and honor (3:35), for when applied it is strength (21:22). Being directed to a particular result, it might seem to be utilitarian, but the worth and result of good conduct coincide, and the result testifies to God's retributive justice in upholding the order of the world and life. Wisdom stands or falls with the correspondence of act and state, although the innocent may undergo educative suffering and the wicked may seem to prosper for the moment (cf. Job 5:17; 15:20ff.).

2. Criticism. Early criticism focuses on soothsaying and then on clever politics. Ecclesiastes, however, attacks academic wisdom (1:16-17; 2:15). This is helpless when faced by death (2:15). God determines destiny, not pious conduct (8:17). True wisdom is thus to accept life. Job, too, questions the doctrine of retribution. Real understanding comes only from personal encounter with God, and right conduct is resting in God, whose acts are inscrutable but purposeful. Fellowship with God outweighs all else (cf. Job 40:4-5; 42:2-3; Ps. 73:25ff.). [G. FOHRER, VII, 476-96]

C. Judaism.

1. The LXX. The LXX regularly translates the Hebrew terms by sophía and sophós, or, in the case of the verb, sophós eínai or gígnesthai. The Hebrew and Greek traditions overlap, however, only in respect to technical ability. Elsewhere the Hebrew terms are alien to the Greek spirit, e.g., in the juxtaposition of wisdom and the fear of the Lord. In places the translators tend to change the text according to their own intellectual tradition (cf. Prov. 10:14).

2. Wisdom in Hellenistic Judaism.

a. Sirach in general stands within the Hebrew tradition. That which contributes to a devout and happy life constitutes wisdom. New features are the clearer personification of wisdom and the enhancing of its heavenly nature. It is the grace of special revelation to find it.

b. In the Wisdom of Solomon wisdom lives with God. To know wisdom is to attain to it, to be of like nature with it. Wisdom has insight into the secrets of creation, in which it had a hand. Union with wisdom repeats mystically the union of wisdom with God. The knowledge that it mediates is direct revelation, and it brings salvation. Hence one must pray for wisdom.

c. Philo’s teaching is similar. Various strands intertwine in him. Wisdom frees us from earthly desire. It is the sphere of the royal way to the sacred lógos, i.e., to God. It is itself the way or guide, mediating revelation. It is the divine consort by which one may achieve direct proximity to God. Union with it corresponds to God’s union with it. The wise, then, enter into union with God and enjoy the vision of God.

d. In other writings one finds the same idea of preexistent wisdom leading to knowledge of the truth, although wisdom may also be intellectual superiority or a respectable life.

e. For Josephus wisdom is the content of the law, so that only the scribes are wise. This wisdom is the basis of all human wisdom. Those who know and keep the law achieve comprehensive culture and virtue.

3. Jewish Apocalyptic. Apocalyptic contains many wisdom passages. The divine relationship involves keeping the law. The law is equated with wisdom, and its observance is wisdom. Since wisdom is righteousness, the first and basic redemptive gift to the righteous is wisdom. God creates in wisdom, gives the law in wisdom, and grants apocalyptists a glimpse of the mysteries of his wisdom. Wisdom manifests the Son of Man as the just and holy one with whom are wells of wisdom.

4. Qumran. In the Scrolls all things are set in order by the wisdom of the divine knowledge. God’s wisdom planned all events from the first. In the wisdom of his glory he has prepared antithetical spirits. He will give the wisdom of heavenly sons to the elect of the good spirit. In the mystery of wisdom he corrects them; they alone are wise and righteous. Wisdom as a special knowledge of God’s plan corresponds to the wisdom of keeping the law.

5. Rabbinic Judaism. Among the rabbis wisdom coincides with the law, and wisdom comes through its study, so that the scribes are the wise, and rabbinic teaching is wisdom. Preexistent wisdom is the law. The good things that wisdom confers are fruits of teaching the law. Compared to earthly wisdom, the treasure of the law is inestimable, but even in earthly wisdom the rabbis are sometimes said to surpass the wise of this world.

6. A Wisdom Myth. The idea of wisdom as a heavenly person is often explained only generally as a hypostatizing. In the surrounding world we find similar wisdom deities, but a specific religious influence may be seen in the Jewish sphere. What really happens, then, is perhaps an adaptation of alien myths to the structure of Israel’s faith. A common wisdom myth is most apparent in Eth. En. 42, which refers to the descent and reascent of wisdom. Hints of the same idea may be found in Prov. 1:20ff., Sir. 24, and Bar. 3:9ff., although in these texts wisdom, as the law, finds a dwelling in Israel. Essentially alien to Israel’s faith, the myth can be adjusted to it only with difficulty. It finds more fruitful soil in Gnosticism.

D. Gnosticism.

1. Odes of Solomon. Throughout Gnosticism Sophía plays an essential role and the Sophia myth is one of the few common structural elements in the movement. Sophía is of divine nature, has fallen from its high estate, has to be redeemed out of the world, and prototypically plays the role of a redeemer for Gnostics. Goodness has this role in the Odes of Solomon. It comes down, issues its summons, and leads those who heed it from destruction to the ways of truth.

2. Simon. Here énnoia is originally in union with the supreme power (Simon), plunges into the depths, and is liberated by the supreme power, thus offering a type of the Gnostics who receive redeeming gnōsis from Simon.

3. Barbeliognosis and the Gnostics in Irenaeus. Here, too, we read of the fall and reascent of Sophía. Sophía leaves portions of light captive in the world but works for their redemption, ultimately by sending Christ.

4. The Gnostics in Plotinus. In the system censured by Plotinus we have a fall of the soul and of wisdom with it, and again Sophía is redeemed and engages in redemptive activity.

5. Coptic Gnostic Texts. In these texts we read of redemption by Christ in union with the wisdom also redeemed by him. The redeemer is the union of the male sōtḗr and the female sophía. In one variant Christ in his saving descent puts on the Father’s wisdom and thus descends and reascends unrecognized by the demonic powers.

6. The Valentinians. The Valentinian system has a similar account of the fall and redemption of Sophía, which initiate the creation of the world and the redemption of Gnostics from it. The completion of redemption is the full union of redeeming Sophía with the redeemed. The marriage of Sophía with the Father is hymned in Acts of Thomas 6-7; this marriage symbolizes perfected gnōsis.

7. Manicheeism. Manichean texts equate Jesus with wisdom, but wisdom is also a term for Mani’s doctrine of revelation which as the true wisdom instructs souls and as the wisdom of the living Spirit builds the new heaven. In general, Gnostic wisdom is a heavenly being which loses its heavenly estate, involves humanity in its fall, finds redemption, and redeems the Gnostics by imparting knowledge of human destiny in identity with it. This myth is not only akin to the Jewish wisdom myth but seems to be directly connected with it; its understanding of redemption has roots in the Jewish doctrine of revelation.

E. The NT.

1. Traditional Usage. When Lk. 2:40 says that Jesus grows in wisdom, this reflects OT usage (cf. 1 Sam. 2:26); the reference is to knowledge of the law and a pious mode of life. The same applies to Stephen in Acts 6:3, 10 except that wisdom here finds manifestation in his speech (cf. Lk. 21:15 and Acts 7:10). In Mk. 6:2 Jesus’ wisdom causes astonishment. In view is his teaching in the synagogue with charismatic power (cf. Mt. 7:29).

2. The Logia. The two threats in Mt. 23:34ff. and 23:37ff. reflect eschatological wisdom sayings in Jewish apocalyptic. Jesus himself is wisdom here. He has come down preaching and seeking a home; his rejection means destruction. The point is much the same in Mt. 11:16ff. John and Jesus are messengers of wisdom, which will be justified even though the generation treats it capriciously. In Mt. 12:42, too, the Queen of Sheba, who hears Solomon’s wisdom, will testify against those who will not hear the wisdom of God in Jesus. The invitation of wisdom perhaps underlies the sayings in Mt. 11:25ff. as well, since knowledge comes by special revelation to babes, and the gift of rest that Jesus offers to the weary is commonly a gift of wisdom. Remarkably, the Revealer is himself the content of revelation, and he calls his own to himself. A distinctive feature is the concealment of revelation from the wise and understanding.

3. Paul.

a. Paul uses traditional language when he calls himself a wise (i.e., skilled) master builder (1 Cor. 3:10), and again when he asks (perhaps with an ironic undertone) whether there is none wise enough to settle disputes in the church (6:5).

b. In Rom. 11:33ff. Paul extols the divine plan of salvation in wisdom terms and with wisdom ideas. The difference is that the divine wisdom must now be related, not to the law, but to Christ, since faith in Christ is the only way of salvation (Rom. 10:4, 9-10).

c. Yet Paul does not make of the gospel a simple word of wisdom as the Corinthians seem to do (cf. 1 Cor. 1:17; 2:1, 4). It is the word of the cross (1:18ff.). At the same time, adopting the language of his critics, Paul describes this word as true wisdom. For the Corinthians, wisdom is apparently not of this aeon but is a blessing of salvation, previously concealed, but now revealed for our eschatological glorification. A form of the wisdom myth lies behind this understanding. Knowing in the descended and exalted Lord the wisdom of God, those who have received revelation have become spiritual and wise, know all things present and future, and are on the far side of judgment in the perfection of the new aeon. Paul deflates this madness, which bypasses the cross, by calling it a wordly wisdom. God has revealed himself only in the folly of the cross which is “wiser” than men (1:25). Christ lives only by the power of God, and similarly believers have no wisdom of their own, but are wise only as they become fools and look to Christ alone for their power and wisdom. God calls fools to himself, and in so doing he confounds the wise. He has chosen things that are not so as to negate things that are. God has made Jesus himself our wisdom, and hence boasting is excluded. The cross makes foolish the wisdom of both Hellenes and scribes. If God invests the world with his wisdom, so that all may know God, the world does not know God through its wisdom (1:21). It is through the foolishness of preaching that God saves believers, the very form of proclamation corresponding to the message (2:1). On this basis, Paul can affirm what the Corinthians say about Christ as the wisdom of God, but only on the basis of the divine initiative at the cross and with firm adherence to the temporal distance of believers relative to the eschaton. Many expositors, of course, refer the wisdom of the world to Greek philosophy, and hence conclude that Paul is here opposing the philosophical and rhetorical presentation of the gospel that would appeal to educated circles in Corinth, not a specific form of Gnosticism and the associated charismatic utterance.

4. Colossians and Ephesians. In Col. 1:9 and Eph. 1:8 growth in Christian knowledge, which includes knowledge of God’s will and worthy conduct, is called sophía. This wisdom comes by grace (Eph. 1:7). It embraces knowledge of eschatological blessings in Christ (1:17-18). It is understanding of the mystery of Christ, in whom all the treasures of wisdom are hid (Col. 1:26-27). It contrasts with the false sophía of Gnostic teachers (cf. 2:8), which is human teaching. In Eph. 3:10 the context demands that the manifold wisdom of God be the divine plan of salvation that is fulfilled with the common entry of Jews and Gentiles into Christ. But perhaps the idea of a hidden and later reascending wisdom shapes the formulation.

5. Revelation. In Rev. 5:12 the slain Lamb is worthy to receive wisdom as one of the eschatological gifts (cf. 7:12). In 13:18 and 17:9 wisdom is esoteric knowledge. Special understanding is needed to reckon the number of the beast and to interpret the vision of 17:1ff. Only confessors can see the meaning and ramification of what is taking place in their day.

6. James. In James wisdom is a morally upright walk (cf. 3:13, 17-18). This wisdom does not lead to strife and disorder but to peace. In this regard, it stands in antithesis to the wisdom sought or taught by opponents. It is not speculative but manifests itself in practical moral results.

7. 2 Peter. 2 Pet. 3:15 says that Paul wrote “according to the wisdom given him”; it thus equates wisdom with apostolic teaching.

F. Apostolic Fathers and Apologists.

1. Sophia Christology. The early church does not develop Sophia Christology, but 1 Clem. 57.3ff. quotes Prov. 1:23ff., Justin Dialogue 61.1ff. adduces Prov. 8:21 ff. in favor of the preexistence of the Son, and Athenagoras Supplication 24.1 has the christological triad of noús, lógos, and sophía.

2. Common Christian Usage. sophía normally denotes blameless conduct or the knowledge of faith. In Barn. 21.5 wisdom is knowing God’s statutes, and in 1 Clem. 38.2 it is knowing the divine secrets. True wisdom is only by faith (Justin Dialogue 102.4; 1 Clem. 32.4). Tatian Address to the Greeks 13.3 finds in Christians, not the Greeks, the proponents of true philosophical wisdom. The word of wisdom shines into the depths of the heart and the understanding (Justin Dialogue 121.2).

1. In the active this word means “to make wise,” in the middle “to understand.”

2. Wisdom dominates the use of the term in the LXX. It can have a negative emphasis, e.g., in Eccl. 7:16. In Ps. 19:7 it is the law that makes wise (cf. 119:98).

3. The use in 2 Tim. 3:14-15 is similar to that in Pss. 19:7 and 119:98. Christian instruction in OT Scripture confers the wisdom that means salvation through faith in Christ and that issues in blameless conduct (vv. 16-17). In the passive in 2 Pet. 1:16 the term is used to characterize errors as cunningly devised myths as distinct from the realities of salvation. Christianity has nothing whatever to do with the insubstantial pseudo-wisdom of heresies. [U. WILCKENS, VII, 496-528]

spéndomai [to be offered up]

1. spéndō in the Graeco-Roman World.

a. The verb spéndō is a cultic term for the offering of libations to the gods. Libations are important in the Greek world either alone or with other offerings. They first occur on special occasions, supported by prayer, but later are offered on all occasions. Official public libations are common. To some chthonic deities water or milk is poured out rather than wine. Unmixed wine is offered at the solemn swearing of oaths.

b. From libations at oaths comes the use of the middle for “to conclude a treaty.”

c. In a few instances spéndō denotes the pouring out of blood in sacrifice.

d. In a transferred sense spéndō may be used for the pouring out of tears and lamentations for the dead, or for the shedding of the blood of tyrants, or for the pouring out of melodious sounds on the poet.

e. The Latin word is libare, and Roman libations are similar to those of the Greeks.

2. spéndō in the OT.

a. The LXX uses the term for the pouring out of drink offerings, with spondḗ as the related noun. Israel follows the common practice of offering libations (cf. Jacob at Bethel in Gen. 35:14). In the offerings of Lev. 23:37 and Num. 29:36ff. the libation seems to be independent, but elsewhere it is an appendix to the main offering (Ex. 29:38ff.). Ps. 16:4 refers to libations of blood in connection with some alien cult.

vv. verses

b. A special use is for the expiatory shedding of the blood of animals in sacrificial rites (Ex. 29:12; Lev. 4:7ff.). Related is the shedding of human blood in murder (Gen. 9:6). Violent death may be compared to the offering of a sacrifice (Jer. 11:19). In Is. 53:12 the Servant of the Lord "poured out his soul to death." Denoted here is the vicarious sacrifice which is offered with the voluntary surrender of his life.

3. spéndō in Later Palestinian Judaism.

a. In later Judaism spéndō is normatively controlled by the understanding of the cultus. Various accounts either describe or presuppose libations. A spiritualizing trend develops, e.g., in references to the sprinkling of spiritual baptism or the expiatory force of praise or chastisement.

b. Sprinkling of blood plays a great role in the temple rites, at the Passover, and on the Day of Atonement. The pouring out of water is part of the ritual of Tabernacles. A rabbinic saying (probably Zealot) describes the shedding of the blood of the wicked as a sacrifice.

4. Josephus and Philo.

a. Josephus refers to the drink offering and describes the shedding of human blood as a cultic transgression when it takes place in interruption of sacrifices (cf. Lk. 13:1).

b. Philo spiritualizes the sprinkling of blood around the altar; it denotes readiness for total service of God. Hannah's pouring out of her heart signifies the dedication of the mind to God. Since the priest offers the blood of the life-force to God as a drink offering, his ministry typifies the soul in its love for God.

5. spéndomai in the NT. The NT twice uses spéndō in the passive, in both instances with reference to Paul's martyrdom (Phil. 2:17; 2 Tim. 4:6). In Phil. 2:17 a cultic act will conclude the apostle's life and work. Enemies may seem to triumph, but the apostle gives his death a sacral meaning. His primary sacrifice is the offering of the Gentiles as believers to God (Rom. 1:9; 15:16). The life of believers is also a cultic ministry (12:1). Paul fulfils his priestly ministry, however, when he is poured out as a libation, possibly, although not necessarily, as a secondary offering alongside the main one (Phil. 2:17). The same thought occurs in the solemn parting words of 2 Tim. 4:6ff., where Paul expresses his readiness to shed his blood as the drink offering is poured out at the foot of the altar. A vivid passion vocabulary thus develops which stresses the dignity and significance of Christian death in cultic terms. [O. MICHEL, VII, 528-36]

spérma [seed], speírō [to sow, scatter], sporá [sowing, procreation], spóros [sowing, seed], spórimos [sown]

A. The Word Group in the Greek World.

1. spérma. From the time of Homer this word means "seed," whether of plants or animals. In a transferred sense it then means "core" or "basis." In connection with human seed, it comes into poetic use for "scion," "child," "offspring," and along the same lines for "tribe" or "race."

*2. speírō. This word means "to sow." In addition to the literal use for sowing seed or fields, we find a figurative use for sowing ideas. Other meanings are "to disseminate,‘’ "to disperse," and "to generate," "to beget."

*3. sporá. This word first means "sowing," then "seed," also "generation," "progeny,‘’ and "child."

*4. spóros. This word means "sowing" and poetically "scion" or "child."

*5. spórimos. This adjective means "sown," "to be sown," or "adapted to be sown." The noun tá spórima occurs for "fields of grain." [S. SCHULZ, VII, 536-38]

B. The OT.

1. LXX Data.

a. spérma for "seed," "sowing," or "yield" occurs 217 times in the OT, often in a physical or economic sense. Figuratively the term denotes the organic and purposeful structure of the national body as the "seed" of Abraham. A negative use is for the vitality of corruption, as in Is. 57:3-4. A strong dynamic engenders the wider sense as in Gen. 3:15, and cf. the seed of tears in Ps. 126:5, which presents human destiny in a simple figure of speech. The use of spérma for "posterity" in Gen. 7:3; 9:9, etc. is to the same effect.

b. spóros is far less common than spérma.

c. Even rarer are sporá and spórimos.

d. The verbs speírō and diaspeírein occur frequently for the people's dispersion.

2. Masoretic Data. In the original text the root zr' dominates the picture in the various nuances found for spérma. (For details see TDNT, VII, 539-40.)

3. The Seed and Related Motifs in Sayings about God's Work. In its spiritual use the group communicates the vital force of phenomena by associating them with the biological seed as the basis of organic development. The seed conveys the actuality and seminal force of cultural and sociological entities. While the thrust may be negative (cf. Jer. 4:3), in general the seed motif expresses blessing. Organic force is divine force. As Is. 28:23ff. shows, agricultural work itself depends on God's help (cf. Gen. 8:22). As God has planted trees etc. (Is. 41:19-20; Ps. 104:16), so he has planted his people as a vine (Ps. 80:8ff.; cf. Jer. 2:21; 11:17; Am. 9:15). In general, however, seed sayings simply express the sequence of generations. Only Mal. 2:15 refers to "God's seed," the issue here, of course, being that of a holy seed unadulterated by mixed marriages. Cf. Ezr. 9:2, which perhaps underlies the LXX text of Is. 1:9, the verse which Paul quotes in Rom. 9:29. [G. QUELL, VII, 538-42]

C. Judaism.

1. spérma.

a. Philo. Philo favors the term spérma in both the literal and the transferred sense. Vegetable, animal, or human seed is meant when the reference is literal. Figuratively souls arise from divine seed, and we read of the seed of virtue or vice, of thought, of peace, or of hope. Such expressions are related to the Stoic idea of the spermatic lógos; the idea of divine seed may also owe something to contacts with Hellenistic mystery wisdom.

b. Qumran. The idea of seed is rare at Qumran. We find references to "sowing," '"fruit," and "progeny."

c. The Rabbis. Here again the chief meanings are "seed," "plant," or "offspring."

2. speírō.

a. Philo is fond of this word, which he uses for sowing in both the literal and the transferred sense, e.g., sowing seed or sowing virtue, understanding, noble deeds, etc.

b. In the rabbis the term has such senses as "to sow," "to scatter seed," "to void seed" (the male), and "to fructify."

3. sporá. In Philo this word means "sowing," "seed," "generation," or, transferred, the "seed" of virtue or teaching.

4. spóros. In Philo this word means "seed" or "semen" (also "seed" of virtue).

5. spórimos. This word does not occur in Philo.

D. The NT.

1. spérma.

a. The Synoptists. In the literal sense spérma occurs in certain parables and their interpretation for the "seed" of plants (Mt. 13:24, 27, 37-38, 32). The meaning is "offspring" in Mk. 12:19ff. In Lk. 1:55 God has kept his promises to Abraham and his descendants (cf. Acts 3:25; 7:5-6; 13:23).

b. The Johannine Tradition. Christ is David's descendant in Jn. 7:42. The Jews are Abraham's seed in 8:37 (cf. Rev. 12:17 with reference to Christian martyrs). God's seed, i.e., the Spirit, is in believers in 1 Jn. 3:9.

c. Paul. In Paul we read of the seed of plants in 1 Cor. 15:38 and of seed in the sower's hand in 2 Cor. 9:10. Elsewhere the reference is to the seed of Abraham (Rom. 4: 13ff.; 9:7), i.e., the Jews, Christ (Gal. 3:16), or the church (Rom. 9:8). Paul also speaks of David's seed in Rom. 1:3 and Isaac's seed in Rom. 9:7.

d. The Pastorals. 2 Tim. 2:8 refers to the descendants of David.

e. Hebrews. Heb. 2:16 refers to Abraham's seed, 11:18 to Isaac's, and 11:11 to human seed in general (unusual in the NT).

2. speírō. This word means "to sow" in Mt. 13:3-4, 18-19, 24, 31. It is also literal in Jn. 4:36-37. A transferred sense occurs in Mk. 4:13 (the word) and Mt. 13:19. Paul, too, uses speírō in a transferred sense, especially in 1 Cor. 15, where the term is theologically important because it shows how there may be ongoing somatic life through death and resurrection. In 2 Cor. 9:6 speírō refers to Christian liberality, and in Gal. 6:7-8 sowing and reaping relate to decision face to face with the gospel; different sowings bring different eschatological harvests. Jms. 3:18 speaks similarly of sowing a harvest of righteousness.

3. sporá. This word occurs in the NT only in 1 Pet. 1:23, where it denotes the living and abiding word by which believers are born again.

4. spóros. This word, which is not common in the NT, denotes "seed" in Mk. 4:26-27 and 2 Cor. 9:10. It is equated with the word in Lk. 8:11 and with the seed of liberality (for which Paul is appealing) in 2 Cor. 9:10.

5. spórimos. The neuter plural occurs for "fields of grain" in Mk. 2:23 and parallels.

E. Apostolic Fathers.

1. spérma. The sense "seed" occurs in 1 Clem. 24.5 and "progeny" in 10.4ff. (cf. also "family" in Hermas Visions 2.2.2). The angel promises eternal "offspring" to the righteous in Hermas Similitudes 9.24.4.

2. speírō. This word occurs in the literal sense in 1 Clem. 24.5 and in a transferred sense (sowing bad teaching) in Ignatius Ephesians 9.1.

3. spóros. This word occurs in the literal sense for sowing seed in 1 Clem. 24.4. [S. SCHULZ, VII, 543-47] splánchnon [compassion], splanchnízomai [to have compassion], eúsplanchnos [tender-hearted], polýsplanchnos [compassionate], ásplanchnos [merciless]

A. Greek Usage.

1. The Noun. Used mainly in the plural, the noun denotes the "inward parts" of a sacrifice, then the "sacrifice" itself, then the "inward parts" of the body, and finally the "womb" or "loins" (also in a derived sense "'children"). In transferred usage the term denotes "impulsive passions" (anger, desire, etc.), then the "seat of feelings or sensibilities." There is, however, no developed transferred use, and in pre-Christian Greek the term does not denote pity or compassion.

2. The Verb. The verb means a. “to eat the inner parts” (of an offering) and b. “to use entrails in divination.”

3. The Compounds. ásplanchnos occurs in the sense of “cowardly” (“with no guts”) and eusplanchnía in the sense of “boldness.” Cf. also thrasýsplanchnos for “fearless”, and kakósplanchnos for “spiritless.”

B. Later Jewish Writings.

1. The LXX. The noun and verb are rare in the LXX and seldom have Hebrew equivalents. The verb is used in the sacrificial sense in 2 Macc. 6:8. The noun (plural) means “seat of feelings” in 2 Macc. 9:5-6 (cf. Prov. 26:22; Sir. 30:7). The LXX uses the middle of the verb for “to be merciful” in Prov. 17:5, while the noun denotes natural feelings in 4 Macc. 14:13.

2. Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs.

a. splánchna occurs in these writings for “the center of feelings” or for “noble feelings” (cf. splánchna eléous for “loving mercy” in Test. Zeb. 7.3).

b. Once the verb denotes mere emotion but usually it refers to the inner disposition that leads to mercy.

c. eúsplanchnos and eusplanchnía occur for the human virtue and disposition of “pity” in Test. Sim. 4.4; Benj. 4. 1.

d. The originally rather crude term splanchnía can thus be applied to God himself (cf. Test. Zeb. 8.2). It characterizes the divine nature relative to God’s eschatological acts (Zeb. 9.7). In the Testaments of the Twelve splánchna, splanchnízomai, and eúsplanchnos replace the LXX oiktirmoí, oiktírō, and oiktírmōn and offer new renderings for Heb. raḥam etc.

3. Philo and Josephus. Philo mostly uses splánchna in a physiological sense, and the same is true of Josephus, in whom the references are often rather bloodthirsty.

C. The NT.

1. splanchnízomai in the Synoptics.

a. The verb occurs in the NT only in the Synoptics. In three parables it denotes human attitudes. Thus in Mt. 18:27 the lord has pity on the servant, in Lk. 15:20 the father has compassion on the prodigal, and in Lk. 10:33 the Samaritan has compassion on the man who has fallen among thieves. In all these instances the term reflects the totality of the divine mercy to which human compassion is a proper response.

b. Elsewhere in the Synoptics the verb has messianic significance, for it is only Jesus who shows compassion, as in Mk. 1:42; 6:34; 8:2; 9:22; Mt. 14:14; 20:34. In each case what we have is not so much the description of a human emotion as a messianic characterization. Cf. also Lk. 7:13.

2. splánchna in Paul. Only the noun occurs in Paul, and he uses it not merely to express natural emotions but as a very forceful term to signify an expression of the total personality at the deepest level. Introduced in very personal passages, it is parallel to kardía in 2 Cor. 6:11-12, and to pneúma in 2 Cor. 7:13ff. (Titus’ deep love for the Corinthians). Twice in Philemon (vv. 7, 20) Paul refers to the refreshing of the splánchna, and in v. 12 he says that in Onesimus he is as it were coming in person with a claim for Philemon’s love. In Phil. 2:1 splánchna kaí oiktirmoí seems to be summing up the three preceding phrases. In context, then, splánchna denotes Christian affection and oiktirmoí Christian sympathy. Both are essential elements in all Christian dealings. A unique phrase occurs in Phil. 1:8; the reference is to the love or affection which, gripping and moving the whole personality, is possible only in Christ; the genitive “of Christ” denotes the author.

3. The Rest of the NT. Apart from Acts 1:18 (“entrails”), NT usage develops under the influence of Paul or later Judaism. Col. 3:12 refers to a Christian virtue, Lk. 1:78 has God’s eschatological mercy in view, and Jms. 5:11 also stands in an eschatological context. In 1 Jn. 3:17 believers are not to close their hearts (the center of compassionate action) to the needy, and cf. the hortatory use of eúsplanchnos in Eph. 4:32; 1 Pet. 3:8.

D. The Apostolic Fathers and Early Christian Writings.

1. Only Ignatius Philadelphians 10.1 plainly reflects Pauline usage. In 1 Clem. 2.1 splánchna denotes the seat of religious conviction. God’s mercy in eschatological salvation is the point in 2 Clem. 1.7, and the divine compassion in 1 Clem. 23.1.

2. The eschatological element in Testaments of the Twelve is adopted in Hermas; cf. especially the connection with the summons to repentance (Similitudes 8.11.1; 9.14.3).

3. splánchna and eusplanchnía are divine predicates in Acts of Thomas and Acts of John. The messianic use recurs, but in the latter the apostle has pity in the same way as Jesus in a usage that differs markedly from that of the NT. [H. KÖSTER, VII, 548-59]

→ éleos, oiktírō

spoudázō [to make haste, be zealous], spoudḗ [haste, zeal], spoudaíos [speedy, zealous]

A. Classical and Hellenlstic Greek.

1. From spoudḗ (“haste”), spoudázō means “to make haste” or transitively “to hurry something on,” then “to treat seriously or respectfully.”

2. spoudaíos means “speedy,” “diligent,” “proficient,” “important,” “alert,” and in a moral sense “noble,” “worthy,” “good,” “upright.”

3. spoudḗ, from the original sense of “haste,” takes on such meanings as “work,” “effort,” “zeal,” “seriousness,” “readiness,” “dedication.”

B. The LXX and Later Judaism.

1. The LXX and Hexapla. The LXX uses spoudázō mostly for forms of bhl in the sense “to hasten,” sometimes (cf. also spoudḗ) with the sense of terrified flight. The same constriction of meaning may be seen in the other renderings.

2. Josephus.

a. spoudázō in Josephus denotes assiduous interest or engagement.

b. Josephus uses spoudaíos for “zealous” or “conscientious.”

c. spoudḗ has for Josephus the meaning “concern,” “piety,” “attentiveness,” “liking,” also “zeal,” “effort,” “involvement,” “dedication,” “seriousness,” “desire,” as well as “haste.”

3. Philo. Philo uses spoudaíos for what is morally “good” or “upright.” spoudḗ has in the main an ethical thrust, and the phrase spoudḗs áxios denotes what is “worthwhile,” “essential,” or “important.”

C. The NT.

1. spoudázō means “to make haste” in 2 Tim. 4:9, 21; Tit. 3:12. It then denotes zealous effort in Gal. 2:10 or 1 Th. 2:17. In Eph. 4:3 Christians must exert themselves to maintain the unity that Christ has achieved for them. In 2 Tim. 2:15 they should do all they can to present themselves as approved. In Heb. 4:11 they must act in such a way as not to be shut out from the rest that God has prepared for them. In 2 Pet. 1:10 they are to secure their calling by their conduct, and in 3:14 they must be zealous to be found without spot or blemish. At issue in all these references is an actualizing of salvation, a fulfilling of what has been opened up by grace.

2. The adjective spoudaíos bears no philosophical coloring. 2 Cor. 8:17 (cf. v. 22) testifies to Titus' God-given zeal in the matter of the collection. The adverb denotes intensive asking in Lk. 7:4 and seeking in 2 Tim. 1:17 (cf. also Tit. 3:13), and Paul uses it in the phrase "as quickly as possible" in Phil. 2:28.

3. In the NT spoudḗ first means "haste" (cf. Mk. 6:25; Lk. 1:39). It then means "zeal" or "commitment" in Rom. 8:12; 12:11. It takes on the sense of "zealous concern" in 2 Cor. 7:11; Paul has written sharply in order to provoke this. The Corinthians excel not only in faith, but also in earnestness, i.e., a zeal to perform (2 Cor. 8:7). Zeal (cf. that of Titus in 8:16) is a gift of God. In Heb. 6:11 the readers must show ongoing earnestness in realizing the full assurance of hope. This is part of being a Christian, for believers know who they are and where they are going, and will not lose what they have been given. The use is similar, but with a bigger moral stress, in 2 Pet. 1:5. The zeal here relates to the whole Christian ethos unfolded in vv. 6-10. It relates to the basic orientation of those whose mind is set on the good.

D. The Early Church.

1. spoudázō means "to make haste" in, e.g., Ignatius Ephesians 1.2; Mart. Pol. 13.2, and "to strive" in Barn. 1.5. But it mostly denotes striving after true Christian conduct (2 Clem. 10.2; Ignatius Ephesians 10.2), with the Lord as example, and in Ignatius an ecclesiastical emphasis (Ephesians 5.3).

2. spoudaíos takes on the sense of concern about knowledge or right conduct in, e.g., Hermas Visions 3.1.2 or Ignatius Polycarp 3.2.

3. spoudḗ is used only adverbially ("in haste" or "with zeal") or with the accusative and infinitive to express attention to something (Mart. Pol. 7.2). [G. HARDER, VII, 559-68]

stásis [standing, taking a stand]

A. Outside the Bible.

1.a. This word first means "standing," "standing firm or still," "firmness," also "standing" as distinct from sitting.

b. It then means "position," "situation," or "state."

2. Another sense is "taking a stand," especially "rebelling." Along these lines it denotes civil strife, dissension, political unrest, inner strife in the soul, disagreement between groups, or domestic strife.

B. The LXX. In the LXX stásis denotes "what is set up," i.e., a boundary stone, statute, or treaty. It also occurs for the "standing still" of the sun in Josh. 10:13, for "place of rest" in Dt. 28:65, and for "location" in 1 Chr. 28:2. The only instance of stásis as (personal) "discord" is in Prov. 17:14.

C. The NT.

1. In Heb. 9:8 the term denotes the continued existence of the old skēnḗ.

2. In Mk. 15:7 the meaning is "insurrection" (cf. Lk. 23:19, 25). Acts 19:40 refers to a "commotion" which threatens political security. "Dissension" in the church is the point in Acts 15:2 and a theological "clash" is the issue in 23:7. The reference in 24:5, however, is to more than religious squabbling; Paul is accused of causing "unrest" that threatens the peace between Jews and Romans.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. Only 1 Clement has stásis, which he construes as "revolt" as well as "discord." He takes the term from the political sphere. Christianity seeks peace for itself and for all people. The restoration of peace in Corinth is the goal of the epistle. [G. DELLING, VII, 568-71] staurós [cross], stauróō [to crucify], anastauróō [to crucify] staurós.

A. The Cross and Crucifixion in the NT World.

I. The Meaning of the Word.

1. staurós is an upright "stake" such as is used in fences or palisades.

2. The staurós is an instrument of torture for serious offenses. It may be a vertical pointed stake, an upright with a cross-beam above it, or a post with an intersecting beam of equal length.

II. The Penalty of Crucifixion.

1. The Persians seem to have invented this form of execution. Alexander the Great and his successors use it, and then the Romans, although not officially for citizens. Josephus mentions mass crucifixions of rebels in Judea.

2. The condemned person carries the cross-beam to the place of execution, is fastened to it with ropes or nails, and is then hoisted on the stake, which is already erected. About the middle of the post a wooden block supports the suspended body. The height of the cross varies. A tablet hung around the victim states the cause of execution, and this is then affixed to the cross. Scourging often precedes crucifixion and the victim is exposed to mockery. Crucifixion takes place publicly, and the body may be left to rot on the cross. The death is extremely slow and agonizing. Constantine ends this form of punishment.

3. Jewish law does not impose crucifixion. Persons stoned are hanged on trees to show that they die accursed by God. Judaism applies this principle to those who are crucified.

B. staurós in the NT.

I. The Cross of Jesus. The Synoptics and John tell the story of the crucifixion in narratives that have a kerygmatic and cultic quality. In the background is the thought that Jesus dies as the sacrificial lamb of the new covenant. The events follow current custom. Jewish touches are the stupefying drink in Mk. 15:23 and the taking down of the body of Jesus on the eve of the sabbath (Jn. 19:31). The cross is a post with cross-beam, and Jesus is nailed to it. John ascribes theological significance to the lifting up of Jesus on the cross (3:14; 8:28).

II. The Theology of the Cross.

1. Paul shows the saving significance of the cross. In it, as the lowest stage of humiliation, Jesus completes his obedience and thus does the work of redemption (Phil. 2:8). Human wisdom, which cannot grasp this, robs the cross of its essential content (1 Cor. 1:17). The word of the cross is folly to the lost but the power of God to believers. As the revelation of God's wisdom, it is true wisdom to the perfect (2:6-7). Christians who spurn the cross by their manner of life are its enemies (Phil. 3:18). Judaizers are trying to avoid persecution for the cross by advocating circumcision (Gal. 6:12). Paul's own sufferings relate to his preaching of the cross, for enforced circumcision and the cross are mutually exclusive. The cross is decisive in salvation history. Abolishing all self-glorying, it is Paul's own glory (Gal. 6:14).

2. The cross is the means of atonement in Col. 1:20 and Eph. 2:16. It is the ground of cosmic reconciliation (Col. 1:20). The blood of Jesus has all-embracing expiatory power. As a sign of his pardoning grace, God has affixed the writ of accusation to the cross (Col. 2:14). By the cross God has brought Jews and Gentiles together in a new humanity and reconciled them to God (Eph. 2:16).

3. Hebrews uses staurós only in 12:2, which says that Jesus chose the cross either "instead of" heavenly bliss or "for the sake of" it. The former is perhaps the more natural sense; Jesus renounced the joy that was set before him in order to tread the way of obedience and suffering.

III. The Figurative Use.

1. Jesus demands that his disciples take up their cross and follow him. The saying occurs five times in different contexts (Mk. 8:34 [par. Mt. 16:24; Lk. 9:23]; Mt. 10:38; Lk. 14:27).

2. There is no parallel for the saying among the rabbis. It may be a popular expression arising among the Zealots. Or perhaps Jesus sees in his death a pattern for his followers, who must be ready to suffer and even die for his sake. The saying about the yoke in Mt. 11:29 is possibly connected with the saying about the cross. Carrying the cross to the place of execution suggests an ongoing process. The mark of the cross serves as a confession of Jesus and a seal of belonging to him. In any case, the connection with the denial of self shows that the reference is to a life of dedication which might involve suffering and finally the surrender of life itself.

IV. The Later Use.

1. In Ignatius the cross lifts up believers as living stones in the building of God's temple (Ephesians 9.1). It is a trunk which with living force puts forth branches (Trallians 1 1.2). Christians are nailed to it (Smyrneans 1.1). Barnabas proves that the crucifixion is necessary from Gen. 14:14; Num. 19:6; Ps. 1:3 (cf. 8.1; 9.8; 11.1). In Polycarp the cross testifies to the true corporeality of Christ (7.1). A double cross occurs in Gnostic speculations about the cross, the cross of Golgotha, and a cross of light.

2. In the papyri we find little distinctively Christian use. Once staurós means "hardship." In Byzantine times the cross is common in letters. Three crosses serve as marks for the illiterate. The cross also figures as a sign of prayer.

stauróō.

A. Outside the NT.

1. The meaning of stauróō is "to put up posts," "to protect by a stockade." The sense "to crucify" is rare.

2. The LXX uses stauróō for "to hang on the gallows" (Esth. 7:9). Josephus uses the term in, e.g., Antiquities 2.77; 17.295.

B. The NT.

1. In Mt. 20:19 Jesus says that the Son of Man will be crucified, and in Mt. 23:34 he says that God sends prophets, wise men, and scribes, some of whom the Pharisees crucify. Peter in Acts 2:36 and 4:10 reproaches the people and the Sanhedrin for crucifying Jesus. In 1 Cor. 2:8 Paul says that in shortsighted wisdom the rulers of this world have brought Jesus to the cross, whereby their own power is broken. 2 Cor. 13:4 claims that, whereas Jesus is crucified in weakness, he lives by the power of God. Rev. 11:8 refers to the Lord's crucifixion in the great city which is allegorically called Sodom and Egypt.

2. Theologically significant is the statement in 1 Cor. 1:23 that Paul preaches the crucified Christ, in whom God's power and wisdom are revealed. In form and content his message will proclaim only Christ crucified (2:2). There is no room for factions, for Christ alone was crucified for believers (1:13).

3. In Gal. 3:1 Paul refers to the public portrayal of Christ as the crucified. His focus is on Christ himself, not just the cross. Because of his crucifixion with Christ, he is dead to the law (2:19). By the cross he is crucified to the world and the world to him (6:14). The cross negates the world. It means a renunciation of sin, whose seat is the sárx (5:24). Snatched from sin's dominion by God's act, believers say a radical No to sin and walk in newness of life (cf. Rom. 6:4).

C. The Early Church. In early Christian writings stauróō is common in the sense "to crucify." Ignatius Romans 7.2 echoes Paul. Trallians 9.1 affirms the reality of the crucifixion. Justin uses the term in

par. paragraph

Dialogue 85.2; Apology 61. 13. It also occurs in the famous “Quo vadis?” passage in the Martyrdom of Peter 6.

anastauróō. This verb means “to fence around,” “to enclose,” but then also “to impale,” “to crucify.” It occurs in the NT only in Heb. 6:6. Apostates personally align themselves with those who crucify Jesus, and thus crucify him afresh. [J. SCHNEIDER, VII, 572-84]

stégō [to cover]

A. Linguistic Aspects. This verb comes from a stem meaning “to cover,” “to conceal.” It is a rare term but persists in both prose and common speech. Its basic meaning is “to keep covered,” but this gives it such senses as “to protect,” “to ward off,” “to hold back,” “to resist,” “to support.” It can also mean “to keep secret,” “to keep silent,” “to keep a confidence.”

B. The Use in Paul. In the NT only Paul uses stégō. In 1 Th. 3:1, 5, with no object, it means “to endure.” He can no longer bear to leave the Thessalonians alone, and so, unable to come himself, he sends Timothy. In 1 Cor. 9:12 the point is that Paul will put up with anything (i.e., not claiming his rights) rather than obstruct the gospel. Various renderings are suggested for 1 Cor. 13:7. In view of the earlier “bear” the sense “to endure” raises problems, since it seems to be repetitive. “To excuse”, is hardly possible, and the middle would be required for the sense “restrains itself.” The meaning, then, is perhaps that love “covers” all things. In full self-giving to others, the love that is rooted in God’s love keeps silent about unfavorable matters. [W. KASCH, VII, 585-87]

stéllō [to send, avoid], diastéllō [to differentiate, order], diastolḗ [distinction], epistéllō [to send a message], epistolḗ [letter], katastéllō [to restore order], katastolē [ordered conduct], systéllō [to shorten], hypostéllō [to draw back], hypostolḗ [reserve] stéllō.

1. This word means “to put,” “to leave,” “to place,” “to draw up,” and then “to send,” “to prepare,” “to set out,” “to travel.” In Plato it usually means “to get ready.” In general, it is fairly uncommon.

2. The LXX uses only the middle form, and the term causes difficulties in such texts as Mal. 2:5 and Prov. 31:25.

3. Josephus uses the word mainly for “to send,” but the sense of moving is also present, e.g., the moving away of a storm in Antiquities 9.213 and the allaying of distress in 5.280.

4. The two NT instances both have the middle. In 2 Th. 3:6 Paul admonishes the church in Christ’s name to “hold aloof” from those who live in idleness. Formal excommunication does not seem to be at issue. In 2 Cor. 8:20 Paul explains why he is arranging for others to share responsibility with him for the collection; he is either seeking to “avoid” having any blame attach to him, or, more likely, “taking steps” to see that this does not happen.

1. This word means “to divide,” “to differentiate,” “to dissect,” “to subdivide,” “to define,” “to give precise instructions,” “to order.”

2. The LXX uses the term some 50 times for no less than 22 roots. When the middle occurs, mostly with God as subject, the reference is to definitive directions.

3.a. In the NT five of eight instances are in Mark. Jesus is the subject in these cases, and the term expresses the categorical nature of his prohibitions in 5:43; 7:36 (twice); 9:9, and of his warning in 8:15. The term points to the hidden majesty and power of Jesus in the light of its future manifestation. Matthew has the word only in 16:20, where it is significant in view of the preceding confession of Peter in 16:16.

b. In Acts 15:24 the point is that those who have unsettled the churches by rigorous demands have received no precise instructions from the church's leaders in Jerusalem.

c. In Heb. 12:20 (passive) the reference is to God's strict order at Sinai.

diastolḗ.

1. This uncommon noun takes its meaning from the verb and has such senses as "separation," "division," "incision" (in medicine), "precise exposition," "order," and "punctuation mark" (in grammar)

2. There is no one specific sense in the LXX.

3. In the NT Rom. 3:22 and 10:12 are closely related. The divine event in Christ has ended the "distinction" between Jew and Gentile established by Israel's election. The Jew is equally sinful (3:22), and the Gentile is called to the same faith (10:12). God has set up his all-embracing rule in Christ. In the only other instance in 1 Cor. 14:7 the term has no theological significance; it simply denotes the distinction between musical notes.

1. The verb epistéllō means "to transmit a message," and the noun epistolḗ denotes "what is transmitted," usually a "letter."

2. In the NT the few instances of the verb (Acts 15:20; 21:25; Heb. 13:22) suggest the authoritative and almost official nature of the early Christian epistle. The NT epistles bear this character. They speak a definitive word about individuals, humanity, and the Christ event as God's eschatological act. They show that the world cannot escape this word. They thus correspond to prophecy in the OT. 2 Cor. 3:1ff. seems to reflect Paul's conviction that all his epistles are ultimately Christ's. The use in this passage is, of course, figurative. Paul does not need human authorization in the form of letters of recommendation, for the church itself is an epistle that Christ has written through him. The Spirit has written this epistle on the heart. The use of the metaphor shows plainly that with Christ the true apostle has a necessary place in God's work of revelation and reconciliation.

1. This verb means "to put in its right place," "to arrange," "to restore order," "to pacify," while the noun means "propriety," "ordered conduct," "action with a view to such conduct," and then "clothing" (as a visible expression of decorum).

2. In the NT the verb occurs only in Acts 19:35-36, where the clerk calms the excited mob at Ephesus. The authority expressed by katastéllō differs from that expressed by the use of katéseisen when Paul as a witness to Christ brings the crowd to order at Jerusalem in Acts 21:27ff. The noun occurs in the advice to women believers in 1 Tim. 2:9, where Timothy is told to exhort them to adopt either a seemly demeanor or seemly apparel. The context of worship perhaps supports the former rendering, but the use of stolē for "garment" in the Apologists favors the latter.

1. This word means "to draw together," "to shorten," and figuratively "to humble." 2. The LXX uses the word for "to abase," "to confound," "to overwhelm" (militarily), and "to press closely" (geographically).

3.a. In the NT Paul says in 1 Cor. 7:29 that the time remaining for us is short. The point may be that by Christ's coming God has shortened the time of apocalyptic expectation, or perhaps Paul is simply adapting a popular saying to the imminent expectation of his generation.

b. In Acts 5:6 the young men either "wrap up" the dead Ananias or "catch him up" and "remove" him. The probability is that they wrap him up in his clothes unless they first cover him with a shroud.

hypostéllō.

1. This word means “to draw aside or back,” “to retreat,” “to withdraw,” “to hold back,” “to keep away from,” “to keep silence,” “to conceal.”

2. In the LXX the term means “to hide” in Job 13:18, “to shrink from” in Dt. 1:17, and “to hold back” in Hag. 1:10. The sense “to subordinate” occurs in Philo.

3.a. In the NT Paul says in Gal. 2:11-12 that when certain people come from James to Antioch, Peter, who has been eating with the Gentiles, “draws back,” or even perhaps “hides.”

b. In Acts 20:18ff. Paul stresses to the Ephesians elders (vv. 20, 27) that he has not shrunk or held back from declaring all God’s truth to them.

c. Heb. 10:37-38 has the verb in a christological quotation of Hab. 2:4. Believers are committed to confession; there can thus be no confidence or reward if they are guilty of shrinking back or concealment.

hypostolḗ. This rare word has such senses as “abstinence,” “reserve,” or “secrecy.” The only NT instance is in Heb. 10:39 (cf. v. 37), where, in tension with pístis, it denotes “lack of steadfastness” or “unreliability” (cf. 2:1). [K. H. RENGSTORF, VII, 588-99]

stenázō [to groan, sigh], stenagmós [groaning, sighing], systenázō [to sigh or groan together]

A. The Group outside the NT.

1. stenázō means “to sigh,” “to groan,” stenagmós means “sigh” or “sighing,” and systenázō, which is very rare, means “to sigh or groan with.”

2. The group finds no fixed original in the LXX. It is used for sighing or groaning in childbirth (Jer. 4:31) or mortal conflict (Ezek. 26:15), for the dead (Jdt. 14:16), for suffering (Job), at judgment (Ezekiel), at eschatological events (Is. 24:7), and as a sign of penitence (Is. 30:15). God hears it (Ex. 2:24).

3. Philo often uses stenázō with dakryō and klaíō. He explains that the sighing of the Israelites in bondage (Ex. 2:23) is that of the soul. Conscience causes the soul to sigh at its former misdeeds.

4. Josephus uses the term relative to the fall of Jerusalem (Jewish War 6.272).

5. In magic, sighing occurs in, e.g., the conjuring up of dreams.

6. stenagmós may be used for the sighs of love.

B. The Group in the NT.

1. In the NT sighing takes place by reason of a state of oppression which causes suffering and from which there is the desire to be free. Thus in 2 Cor. 5:2 existence in the body is a burden, for it is a sign that redemption is not yet complete. Only when we put on the heavenly dwelling will our sighing or groaning cease.

2. In Rom. 8:22ff. there is a triple sighing of creation, Christians, and the Spirit. Through the fall, creation is subject to bondage and hence it sighs or groans until God’s children are manifested. Christians also groan as they await the transformation of the earthly body. The Spirit sighs in his intercession for us, which cannot be expressed or grasped in human words, but which God understands. The reference here is not to the Spirit’s work in us, e.g., in prayer or tongues, but to intercession on our behalf in the divine sphere where human words are totally inadequate (cf. 2 Cor. 12:4).

3. Elsewhere Heb. 13:17 points out that pastoral work is of value when it is done with joy and not with sighs, Jms. 5:9 tells believers so to act that there will be no reason for sighing at one another, and Mk. 7:34 refers to the prayer-sigh of Jesus when he opens the ears of the deaf man (cf. Jn. 11:41-42). This sigh of Jesus is not part of a magical technique but is a preparatory prayer; the healing itself is by the word. Acts 7:33-34 quotes Ex. 3:7-8 LXX.

C. The Apostolic Fathers. The terms are rare in these works. Hermas Visions 3.9.6 warns the rich so to act that those who suffer want do not sigh. Mart. Pol. 2.2 says that the martyrs do not sigh or groan in their suffering. 1 Clem. 15.6 quotes Ps. 12:5. Later burial inscriptions express the wish that the dead may be far from sighing (cf. Rev. 21:4; Is. 35:10). [J. SCHNEIDER, VII, 600-603]

stenós [narrow], stenochōría [narrow place, affliction], stenochōréō [to confine]

A. Secular Usage. The word stenós means "narrow," "thin," "poor," the noun stenochōría denotes a "narrow place," and the verb stenochōréō means "to confine," "to compress." The ideas of a narrow door and a little trodden way occur in philosophy, e.g., in the difficult ascent to true culture.

B. The Greek OT.

1. The group is none too common in the LXX but we find it in references to a narrow pass or passage, a narrow entry, etc. The Hebrew reference to scanty nourishment in Is. 30:20 is given a figurative sense, i.e., it becomes the bread of affliction. In Jer. 30:7 the LXX construes the Hebrew "time of anxiety" as a chrónos stenós, i.e., a time of oppression.

2. The noun, which is rare and has no fixed original, occurs with reference to threats of punishment.

3. The verb, which occurs five times, relates to external straits or oppression. In Is. 28:20 the LXX drops the Hebrew idea of the narrow couch and uses stenochōroúmenoi in a transferred sense.

C. The NT.

1. In the NT the word stenós occurs in Mt. 7:13-14 and Lk. 13:24 in the figure of the narrow gate or door. In Luke the saying answers the question about the small number of the saved, and it thus has a special urgency; one must strive to enter by the narrow door. In Matthew we find the contrast of a narrow gate and way and a broad gate and way. Many people ignore the warning because they will not accept the authority of Jesus and pass through the narrow gate and tread the narrow way. How narrow the gate is may be seen from the saying in Mk. 10:25. There is no mention of special hazards on the narrow way but the term stenós, with its OT associations, suggests that it is also a hard way as distinct from the broad and easy way that so many prefer.

2. In Paul the noun stenochōría occurs four times and the verb stenochōréō three times. In Rom. 2:8-9 the noun denotes God's judgment as in the OT; the reference is to severe affliction both in this world and the next. In Rom. 8:35 believers are not exempt from afflictions, but these cannot separate them from God. In 2 Cor. 4:8 and 6:4, in a passion piety oriented to Christ, Paul makes the point that he is afflicted but not crushed. In 6:3ff. endurance is the master concept. In the three series of three expressions that follow, stenochōría comes in the first. In 2 Cor. 12:10, after a reference to his revelations and then to the thorn in the flesh, stenochōría is again at the heart of Paul's passion piety as he speaks of the insults, hardships, persecutions, and calamities that he suffers gladly for Christ's sake. In 2 Cor. 6:12 Paul rejects the charge of narrowness that the Corinthians bring against him. His mouth is open to them and his heart is wide. He thus hopes to overcome their own narrowness of heart, so that they will be equally open to him. [G. BERTRAM, VII, 604-08]

stereós [firm], stereóō [to make firm], steréōma [firmament]

A. Greek Usage. The word stereós means "stiff," "tight," "rigid," "hard," "firm," "true," "obstinate." The verb stereóō means "to make stiff, firm, strong, or hard." The noun steréōma means "what is made firm," "solid body," "basis," "foundation."

B. LXX Use. The word steréōma is chosen for the firmament in the creation story; it denotes the solid vault of heaven (cf. Gen. 1; Ezek. 1; 10:1; Ps. 19:2). The verb can then be used for God's establishing of this solid vault (Ps. 33:6). The idea of a celestial refuge occurs in Ps. 18:1. The adjective does not share this cosmological development but remains within the framework of ordinary usage. God visits his people with hard chastisement in Jer. 30:14. Himself firm or constant, he confirms the righteous. He is the rock who summons the people to correction (Hab. 1:12).

C. The Jewish Gnostic View of the World. Later Judaism postulates several firmaments where the prince of this world dwells, through which the Redeemer passes on descending and ascending, whose powers fall down before him, and by way of which disciples or Gnostics also ascend in his train.

D. NT Usage.

*1. stereós. In Heb. 5:12, 14 we have the metaphor of "solid" food. Revelation is the food of all believers, but in addition to the first principles (6:1) there is the solid food of a knowledge of Christ's cross and exaltation (12:2). Over against Gnostics who change the hope of the resurrection by spiritualizing, 2 Tim. 2:19 refers to the "firm" foundation of faith. This foundation lies in God, who is stereós in himself, who is constant and who makes constant, who gives faithfulness to the community and its members, who holds them fast to their crucified and risen Lord. In 1 Pet. 5:9 believers are to be steadfast in their faith, resisting the devil. The stress here is on faith; the word stereós strengthens the exhortation to resist. The term is always positive in the NT.

*2. stereóō. In Acts 3:7, 16 the fact that the feet of the lame man become firm hints at a new creation by the author of life (v. 15). Acts 16:5 refers to the inner and outer growth of the churches (cf. 2:41).

*3. steréōma. Paul in Col. 2:5 shows concern for the order and firmness of the faith of the Colossians. As the term táxis suggests a military division drawn up in ranks, so steréōma hints perhaps at a castle or bulwark (cf. 1:23; 2:7). Again faith gives the terms their content. Believers are under assault, but they can stand fast in the stronghold of their faith. Grounded in Christ, they are enabled by faith to stand firm in their conflict with the world. [G. BERTRAM, VII, 609-14][18]

stéphanos [crown], stephanóō [to crown]

A. The Crown (Wreath) in the Ancient World.

I. Meaning. Connected with stéphō, "to encircle," stéphanos means "crown" and stephanóō "to crown." The crown, as a wreath placed around the head, is a sign of life and fertility, and perhaps also a symbol of light. It has a place in the cultus and supposedly wards off evil. The closed crown is used in magic. The crown expresses joy and honor, but also sorrow. It acknowledges excellence.

II. Nature. The simplest crown consists of a bent twig or of two twigs tied together. Wreaths of grass, leaves, or flowers also occur. The Dionysus cult uses ivy, oak, and acanthus, Neptune and Pan wear wreaths of fig leaves, and Zeus of laurel. Soldiers wear crowns at triumphs, and victors wear laurel or olive wreaths. The myrtle signifies love. Roman magistrates wear gold crowns, and Etruscan crowns, also used at Rome, are of precious stones and golden oak leaves.

III. Use.

1. The Cultus. In cultic acts priests wear various forms of crowns. Aeneas crowns his brow with twigs when he first treads Roman soil and prays. Crowns are placed on sacrifices and altars, and are even offered in sacrifice. Images are crowned when dedicated to cultic use and on the feasts of the gods. The crown expresses reverence; Empedocles takes it as a mark of veneration when crowned.

2. Oracles. Crowns evoke true dreams. The person who delivers the oracle wears a crown. When Creon comes back crowned after consulting the oracle he is hailed as a messenger of joy. Roman frescoes depict crowned prophetesses.

3. Processions and Feasts. Crowning takes place in relation to prayer-processions. On the New Year feast at Rome houses are adorned with crowns or wreaths. Animals are also crowned or garlanded at various feasts.

4. A Sign of Salvation and Protection. Various examples show that crowns are viewed as signs of protection. Thus Tiberius wears a laurel wreath during thunderstorms. Wreaths are put at the entrances to houses. Crowns also serve as a means of power and protection in the invocation of gods or demons in magic.

5. The Mysteries. Mystagogues bear myrtle branches in the Eleusinian mysteries, and neophytes in the Isis mysteries. A crown is handed to the mystagogue in the dedication ceremonies of Mithras.

6. Political Life. Cultic and political life are closely related, hence it is natural that those who hold national office should be crowned. When politicians give orations in Athens they wear wreaths as a sign of immunity. The Roman emperor, his family, the priests, and state officials all wear crowns in processions.

7. The Games. Held in honor of the gods, sporting festivals culminate when the victors, who struggle hard to win, are crowned with wreaths of laurel, olive, or ivy. The herald calls their names, and the names of their fathers and towns, and then hands over the wreaths. The ceremony ends in their homes, which also bear wreaths. In the final rites they offer their wreaths to the deity.

8. The Army. The Spartans put on crowns before doing battle, perhaps in connection with sacrifice and as a sign of protection. In the Roman army the general wears a crown to purify the troops before battle. The goddess of victory is depicted with a crown, and there are crowns for the victors, whether of grass, oak leaves, or laurel. An ancient Roman custom is to offer prisoners for sale with crowns on; this possibly derives from a Germanic practice of sacrificing prisoners.

9. Private Life.

a. A Sign of Joy and Respect. Various examples illustrate the use of the crown or wreath as a mark of joy or respect.

b. Weddings. It is natural that there should be crownings at weddings. Thus we have depictions of brides with crowns, and the guests at the wedding feast also wear crowns.

c. Symposia. Wreaths adorn the participants at banquets and the ensuing symposia, which are held in honor of various gods. The wreaths express festal joy but also serve to cool the head during drinking. Wreaths are also placed on the bowls and vessels and on the walls of the rooms where the feasts are held.

10. The Cult of the Dead. A common custom is to put wreaths on the dead, on the bier, and on the grave. Permanent wreaths are carved on gravestones and funds are set up for regular adornment with wreaths. The wreaths honor the dead but also protect them against demons. Plato hands down an idea that in Hades there will be a symposium for the righteous at which they will be adorned with crowns. The mysteries promise initiates that in the hereafter they will be adorned with crowns and wi11 enjoy the company of the blessed.

B. The OT.

1. Occurrence. In the LXX stéphanos and stephanóō are used for the Hebrew verb ‘tr, which has the basic sense “to surround,” and its derivative (cf. Ps. 5:12; 1 Sam. 23:26). The use, however, is slight compared to what we find outside the OT, for Israel stands under the prohibition of images and therefore of their emblems as well. The silence of the OT confirms the cultic-magical origin of the use of crowns and is a mark of Israel's distinctiveness.

---

OT Old Testament

2. Use. In 2 Sam. 12:30 David takes the golden stéphanos from the king of Rabbah and puts it on his own head. Esth. 8:15 refers to the crown and mantle that are given to Mordecai. God gives the king a crown in Ps. 21:3 but threatens the proud crown of Ephraim in Is. 23:1, 3. God's servant receives a royal crown in Is. 22:18, 21, and Zech. 6:11 directs that a crown be prepared for Joshua. Various references to crowns may be found in the apocryphal books (cf. 1 Macc. 10:20; 13:37; Sir. 40:4; 45:12). For a reference to the wedding crown, see Cant. 3:11.

3. Figurative Use. God crowns the year with goodness in Ps. 65:11, crowns man with glory and honor in Ps. 8:5, and crowns with protective care in Ps. 103:4. He is himself his people's crown in Is. 28:5, and Israel is his crown in Is. 62:3. The parallelism of Job 19:9 equates crown and glory (cf. Lam. 5:16; Ezek. 21:26-27). A virtuous woman is her husband's crown in Prov. 12:4, gray hair is a crown in 16:31, and grandchildren are a crown in 17:6. Children bear discipline as a crown in 1:9, and wisdom delivers a crown of glory in 4:9. In Wis. 5:16 the righteous receive from God the royal crown of glory and diadem of beauty.

C. Judaism.

1. Use of the Crown. Josephus mentions the victor's crown, and Herod at his death is adorned with a diadem and golden crown. In the Year of Jubilee slaves in Israel are said to wear crowns on their heads as a mark of joy.

2. Figurative Use. The fear of God hands a crown to the Maccabean martyrs, and God is said to give the crown of righteousness to those who act justly and hate evil. The crown of glory is a halo around the head. When Levi is clothed as high priest, a crown is set on his head along with the diadem of priesthood.

3. Apocalyptic. In the Ascension of Isaiah the righteous receive crowns with the appearance of the Messiah (9:9ff.). Crowns are reserved for believers (9:24ff.). Qumran also expects the sons of truth to be led to crowns of glory and robes of splendor. In the rabbis, too, crowns, usually connected with light or glory, serve as eschatological rewards or honors for the righteous.

4. Rabbinic Theology. Rabbinic theology speaks of the three crowns of the law, the priesthood, and the monarchy. The first may be won by all who study the law. One saying rates the crown of a good name above all three. A crown of glory awaits the righteous who endure.

5. Philo. Philo is critical of the games but applies the metaphor of competitors to those who seek and achieve knowledge and are therefore crowned. The victor's crown is the vision of God as insight into the cosmic order. It comes with the victory of the mind over sensual desires.

D. The NT.

1. The Figurative Use in Paul. Like Philo, Paul adopts the metaphor of the games (1 Cor. 9:24ff.; Gal. 2:2; 5:7; Phil. 2:16; 3:12ff.). God grants an imperishable crown as an eschatological gift to those who train hard and are thus victorious. In 2 Tim. 4:8 the reference is to Paul's own life. As he finishes the course, the Lord, the righteous Judge, will finally give him the crown of righteousness that is laid up for him. All who base their lives on the Lord's appearing will similarly receive crowns. Like athletes, they must follow the rules (2:5), conforming their lives to that of Christ (v. 8). In another sense, the church is Paul's crown with which he comes before the Lord (Phil. 4:1; 1 Th. 2:19-20). All believers are saved by Christ, but their work

---

cf. confer, compare

NT New Testament

v. verse

is assessed and judged. Enduring work comes to expression in the church, which is thus Paul’s crown and joy and hope and glory. With this crown, he receives praise and glory from God, and it is thus a crown of rejoicing.

2. The Crown of Victory and Life. In Rev. 2:10 the suffering church of Smyrna has the promise of a crown of life (cf. Jms. 1:12; 2 Tim. 4:8). As the crown of victory, this crown has life as its content. It is close to, and perhaps made from, the tree of life in Rev. 2:7. Christ gives it to those who love him and are faithful to him (cf. 3:11). In 1 Pet. 5:4 the crown is an imperishable crown of life and light represented as a halo; the author promises it to pastors who serve in exemplary fashion.

3. The Crown a Symbol of Divine Honor. In Rev. 4:4ff. the elders bear golden crowns which they cast down before God’s throne. In 12:1 the woman bears a crown of 12 stars; the dragon with seven diadems seeks to destroy her. The locusts of 9:7 carry what look like crowns, and the beast of 13:1 bears ten diadems as a sign of his power. But the Son of Man wears a golden crown in 14:14 and many diadems in 19:12; he is King of kings and Lord of lords (19:16).

4. The Crown of Thorns. The diadems of Rev. 19:12 are the counterpart of the crown of thorns in Mk. 15:17; Mt. 27:29; Jn. 19:2, 5. This crown, made of a prickly weed, is a mocking imitation of the crown worn by Roman vassals and is designed to throw scorn on Jesus as well as to cause pain by scratching. It bears no relation to any specific Roman festival but is connected with the condemnation of Jesus for his messianic claim. For John the one who is crowned with thorns in apparent defeat is the true victor (16:33; 19:30; 20:28). As Heb. 2:9 puts it, he is now crowned with glory and honor because of the suffering of death.

E. The Early Church.

1. The Martyr’s Crown. The martyr especially bears the crown of victory in the early church (cf. Mart. Pol. 17. 1). The word coronari can even mean “to become a martyr.” As Hermas Similitudes 8.3.6 says, those who fought with the devil and defeated him are crowned, having suffered for God’s law.

2. The Crown in Gnosticism. In Gnostic symbolism, Jesus crowns disciples in the threefold baptism. The Lord is called a crown, and there is reference also to the crown of truth; the two concepts are plainly related. Sacrificial crowning is spiritualized; the crown of sacrifice plucked from the tree of life is worn at the sacrificial banquet.

3. Early Christian Art. In early Christian art two women crown the apostles Peter and Paul, Christ hands Vitalis a golden crown, the martyrs carry crowns in their hands and offer them to Christ, and Christ wears a halo, or a halo with a cross.

4. The Crown of Thorns in Early Christian Art. Art depicts the crowning of Jesus by a soldier, but the crown is the imperial laurel wreath and symbolizes his triumph. The theme of the passion as a victory is a common one. The crucified Lord is the glorified Lord who is the believer’s crown. Crowns mark the building from which he comes bearing his cross.

5. The Wedding Crown. The wedding crown comes into the church after Constantine and is taken as a sign of victory over lusts.

6. Rejection of the Non-Christian Use of Crowns. Tertullian especially contests the use of crowns in his work De corona. In his view it is unnatural to wear flowers on the head. The custom is pagan and has no warrant in the Bible. Only God may crown us, the crown being an eschatological gift to believers. Cyprian takes a similar view, and Clement of Alexandria, while comparing the Christian life to a contest, argues against the use of crowns from reason and the repudiation of idolatry.

7. Later Use of Crowns. Constantine helps to make the crown more important by combining the cross, the monogram of Christ, and the disc. Crosses with crowns around them are set on imperial vessels. We find depictions of a crowned Lamb, a cross of glory, and Christ receiving crowns. [W. GRUNDMANN, VII, 615-36]

stḗkō [to stand (firm)], hístēmi [to stand]

stḗkō. This verb is a Hellenistic construct from the perfect of hístēmi and forms a substitute for it. It is rare in the LXX but occurs for "to stand still" in Ex. 14:13 and "to stand" in Judg. 16:26 and 1 Kgs. 8:11. In the NT we find it in Mk. 3:31 (Jesus' relatives standing outside), Jn. 1:26 (John's witness to one standing among them), Rev. 12:4 (the dragon standing before the woman), and Mk. 11:25 (standing before God in prayer). But the main use is in Paul, mostly in the imperative. Believers are to stand firm in 1 Cor. 16:13; they do so in faith on the basis of God's promises. Standing in faith is standing in the Lord (Phil. 4:1), for faith looks to the Lord, and he enables it to stand. If believers stand fast, this brings comfort to the apostle (1 Th. 3:7-8). The conditional clause here carries a concealed exhortation. Standing in the Lord gives sustaining power and creates fellowship, i.e., standing in one spirit (Phil. 1:27). Since the Lord grants freedom from sin and legalism, those who trust in him must stand fast in their freedom (Gal. 5:1). 2 Th. 2:15 links these various ideas with its summons to stand firm and hold fast to the traditions that Paul has taught. Finally, of course, believers stand or fall to their own master, i.e., to Christ (Rom. 14:4). For Paul stēkō suggests that in faith we achieve a standing that is grounded in God, not in the world, and that confers fellowship and freedom. Outside the NT the term does not occur in the apostolic fathers but we find it in apocryphal Acts.

A. Greek and Hellenistic Usage.

1. In its use for "to stand" this verb forms the opposite of sitting, reclining, or falling, also of moving.

2. The present hístēmi means "to stop," "to set up," "to appoint or institute," "to stir up or lift up," and "to place on a scale," "to weigh."

3. The middle means "to stand still," "to remain standing," "to come before," "to stand up," "to arise," and "to begin."

4. The perfect and pluperfect forms mean "to stand" and "to be."

5. The late future and aorist passive share the general meaning.

B. Theological Aspects in the OT.

1. Usage. The LXX usage corresponds to the Greek. hístēmi transitive means "to stop," "to appoint," or "to weigh" (Gen. 43:9; 1 Sam. 10:19; 1 Kgs. 21:39). hístamai intransitive means "to stand still or erect," "to get up," "to endure" (Gen. 29:35; 1 Sam. 13:34). The perfect and pluperfect mean "to stand" (Gen. 24:13). The passive occurs in, e.g., Job 18:15.

2. With reference to the covenant or word or command of God, the term carries the sense that God has ordained it or established it or given it validity. God establishes the covenant with Noah for all generations (Gen. 9:11-12). He makes a similar covenant with Abraham (17:19) and reminds Moses of this covenant (Ex. 6:4), on which the covenant with Israel rests (Lev. 26:9). The people respond by establishing the covenant themselves as they let it shape their lives (2 Kgs. 23:3). The fact that God confirms the covenant by an oath indicates his self-commitment to it (Gen. 26:3; Jer. 11:5). The words of the covenant are thus inviolable (Dt. 28:69). God will establish his word (1 Kgs. 2:4). This is the psalmist's prayer (Ps. 119:38). God's people establish God's word and statutes by keeping them (2 Kgs. 23:24). God's work, whether in creation or covenant, is grounded in his counsel, which always stands (Is. 46:10), and in fulfilment of which God does not stand still.

3.a. The covenant is the place where God is with his people (cf. Ex. 17:6; 24:10; Ezek. 3:23; Ps. 82:1).

i.e. id est, that is

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

b. Believers also stand before God in the covenant (Gen. 18:22; Dt. 5:5; 1 Kgs. 19:11; Job 37:14). All worship is a coming before God (1 Chr. 23:30; 2 Chr. 29:11). Those who do evil cannot rightly come before God (Jer. 7:10) but sinners may be set before God for judgment (Num. 5:16).

c. The whole congregation comes before God in the sanctuary, and the heavenly hosts stand before him (2 Chr. 18:18).

4. God gives people their standing in deliverance and freedom (2 Sam. 22:34; Pss. 16:12; 30:7). Their wisdom remains (Eccl. 2:9).

C. Judaism.

1. OT concepts continue, e.g., in Sir. 44:20-21. The question of abiding values may be seen in the admonitions of Sir. 37:13; 40:12.

2.a. Taking up the question of what abides, Philo perceives the relativity of movement and standing still; thus the senses deceive us when it seems that the sun or moon stands still, and people may be shaken in convictions in which they think they are stable.

b. God alone stands, and God establishes goodness and gives standing to the righteous.

3. Qumran deals with the same question and argues that those who measure up to God's demands will stand forever, and those who cling to God will stand firm against the scorn of enemies. Yet this is possible only as God's Spirit grants it. Standing takes place as God raises and sets up. The place of standing is before God as God grants mercy and forgives sins. The covenant makes possible a standing that is already present in this life but endures to eternity. The righteous overcome slipping and falling, receive an eternal standing, and may also win standing for others by helping them when they stumble. Standing is by entry into the community in which the covenant with Israel is renewed. Whereas Philo seeks standing through knowledge, Qumran receives it as a gift of grace that rests on the abiding counsel of God.

D. The NT.

I. General Usage.

1. Statistically there are 152 instances of hístēmi (with histánō), of which 26 are in Luke, 35 in Acts, 16 in Paul, 21 in Matthew, 9 in Mark, 18 in John, and 21 in Revelation. In the general sense of "to set up" or "cause to come," we find hístēmi with persons (Mt. 4:5. Acts 5:27. Jn. 8:3. Acts 6:13. Mk. 9:36) and also with objects (Rom 3:31. Mt. 26:15. Acts 7:60, where the idea might be that of weighing, but more likely is that of charging or holding against).

2. In the general sense of "to stand," "to stand still," or "to approach," we find hístamai with persons (Mt. 20:32; Lk. 6:17; 17:12; 7:38; Acts 10:30; 26:16; Rev. 11:11; 18:17; Jms. 3:2) and also with objects (Lk. 8:44; Acts 8:38).

3. For "stand" we find héstēka, hestēkein in Jn. 7:37; Lk. 23:10; Mt. 27:47; Acts 5:25. The place of standing may be expressed adverbially (Mt. 12:46-47; Lk. 13:25; 18:13; Rev. 18:10) or prepositionally (Lk. 1:11; Mt. 20:3; Rev. 7:9; Acts 5:23; 7:33; Mt. 13:2; Lk. 5:1; Jn. 20:11).

4. Passive Forms. The star is halted in Mt. 2:9, Jesus is set before the governor in Mt. 27:11 (cf. Mk. 13:9), the two on the way to Emmaus stand still (Lk. 24:17), the Pharisee stands self-confidently (Lk. 18:11), and words are confirmed (Mt. 18:17).

II. Theological Aspects of NT Usage.

1. To be able to place someone or something expresses power. God presents his people without blemish (Jude 24). He fixes the time of judgment (Acts 17:31). He has appointed Christ as Judge (Acts 17:31). He places in judgment (Mt. 25:33). He can also cause to stand (Rom. 14:4). Even though people fall, or others judge them, their master can make them stand. They should strive to do so (Lk. 21:36). Standing is oriented to God's act in Christ. Jesus is set on a pinnacle of the temple but he withstands temptation (Mt. 4:5, 11). The church has the authority to put forward an apostolic candidate (Acts 1:23) and to appoint the Seven (6:6)!

2. Paul speaks of the establishing of the law (Rom. 3:31). Seeking faith, the gospel validates the law in its function of convicting of sin and hence of opening the door to forgiveness. As regards the sacrificial cultus, the coming of Jesus invalidates the former covenant but brings into force the new covenant (Heb. 10:9) whereby we may live before God on the ground of Christ's sacrifice.

3. Jesus comes before his disciples as the risen Lord (Jn. 20:19). He stands at the door and waits for it to be opened (Rev. 3:20). Stephen sees him standing at God's right hand (Acts 7:55). This might simply denote his being there, but it might also denote either standing in reverence before the Father, standing to intercede for Stephen, standing to judge his opponents, or standing to welcome Stephen. In the light of 6:15 the last suggestion commends itself.

4. In 2 Tim. 2:19 the divine foundation, on which the church rests, stands firm. In contrast a divided city, house, or kingdom cannot last (Mt. 12:25-26). The church is the pillar and ground of truth (1 Tim. 3:15). Gentile Christians stand fast only through faith (Rom. 11:20). In matters of marriage the main thing is to be firmly established in the heart (1 Cor. 7:36ff.), which is possible through standing in faith; then all decisions are free and secure. Standing firm in faith results in joy (2 Cor. 1:24). It is a standing in the gospel (1 Cor. 15:1). Christ has given us access to the grace in which we stand (Rom. 5:2). We are to stand fast in it (1 Pet. 5:12). We must be on guard against falling (1 Cor. 10:12). Prayer helps us to stand (Col. 4:12). So does all of God's armor (Eph. 6:11). When we withstand, we may stand in the evil day (v. 13). In Acts 26 Paul stands on trial for the hope of the resurrection (v. 6). He once withstood the fulfilment of this hope (v. 9), but Christ appeared and caused him to stand on his feet (v. 16). He thus stands there as a witness to God's fulfilment in Christ of all that the prophets and Moses said would come to pass (v. 22). [W. GRUNDMANN, VII, 636-53]

stērízō [to support, establish], epistērízō [to support, rest on], stērigmós [steadfastness], astḗriktos [unstable, weak]

A. The Group in Greek.

1. The main sense of the verb stērízō is "to support." In figurative use it means "to confirm," politically "to pacify," linguistically "to speak out loud," cosmologically "to fix or secure," anatomically "to gain hold" (an illness), and medically "to strengthen" (of medicines).

2. epistērízō means "to support" and in the middle "to rest on."

3. stērigmós means "steadfastness," "firmness," "standing still," "sustaining."

4. astḗriktos means "unsupported," "weak," but also "agile," "lively," "tossing" (a ship).

B. The Group in the OT.

1. stērízō finds varied use in the LXX for "to support," "to fix the eyes on," "to plan," and "to strengthen." epistērízō means "to rest on," "to be grounded in," or "to be directed to." stērigmós does not occur.

2. There is no set Hebrew original for the group, but smk is a common equivalent.

C. Judaism. The Hebrew term becomes a technical one for ordination in later Judaism, and at Qumran it plays a role of some importance for confirming or inward strengthening, especially by God's power.

D. The Group in the NT.

1. stērízō means "to fix," "to establish" in Lk. 16:26, and in Lk. 9:51 it denotes the steadfast resolve of Jesus as he sets his face toward Jerusalem. The transferred use is common (cf. Rom. 16:25; 1 Th. 3:13; Lk. 22:32; Rom. 1:11). The strengthening is by God, the Lord, the truth, or others. It may be accomplished, besought, or commanded. It presupposes an assault that threatens faith or zeal. Its aim is impregnability of faith in spite of afflictions. God strengthens the Thessalonians so that they may be blameless at the parousia (1 Th. 3:13). Moral confirmation is the point in 2 Th. 3:3, and preservation from spiritual death in Rev. 3:2. The imparting of a spiritual gift is the means in Rom. 1:11.

2. The compound epistērízō in Acts 14:22 and 15:32, 41 adds nothing new.

3. stērigmós occurs only in 2 Pet. 3:17, where it denotes perseverance or steadfastness in the truth or in sound teaching (cf. 1:12).

4. astḗriktos in 2 Pet. 2:14; 3:16 means "unstable." False teachers entice unstable souls, and those who are unstable in their views twist the difficult passages in Paul's epistles.

F. The Apostolic Fathers. The word stērízō occurs in these works for the establishing of heaven (1 Clem. 33.3), the confirming of what is falling (2 Clem. 2.6), and the strengthening of Christians (1 Clem. 13.3). The Lord's commandment (1 Clem. 13.3) and the Spirit of Christ (Ignatius Philadelphians, Preface) are the means of strengthening, as is God's almighty will (1 Clem. 8.5). Obedience is the effect (1 Clem. 13.3). [G. HARDER, VII, 653-57]

stígma [mark, brand]

From stízō "to prick" stígma means "prick," "point," "mark."

A. The Graeco-Roman World.

1. Owners' marks are branded on cattle. stígmata are usually letters burned on the right thigh.

2. People who are branded, e.g., criminals, prisoners of war, slaves, or deserters, are usually regarded as dishonored and are a butt of scorn in comedy. Caligula even has some citizens branded and sent to prison camps. Various devices are tried to remove the brands but without much success. Tattooed signs are placed on army recruits, usually on the hand.

B. The Near East.

1. Cattle are branded in Babylon as a mark of ownership, and rebellious concubines or sons may also be marked as slaves in Babylon.

2. A mark may also denote membership in a tribe or allegiance to a cultic deity. The signs are placed on the knee, wrist, or neck and take various forms. Those bearing the marks of a god are dedicated to service but can also claim protection.

C. The OT.

1. The marking of slaves occurs in Ex. 21:6 with the voluntary acceptance of service.

2. Sacral marking occurs in Is. 44:5 has a model of the city graven on his hands. The feasts serve as signs and marks (Ex. 13:9ff.). The headplate of the high priest represents a kind of mark (cf. Ex. 28:36), but Lev. 19:28 forbids the marking of the flesh (disobeyed at times; cf. Jer. 16:6).

3. The mark of Cain seems to be a tattooed sign. It does not brand Cain as a murderer but sets him under divine protection (cf. the mark of Ezek. 9:4).

D. Later Judaism.

1. Ps. Sol. 2:6 refers to Pompey's branding of Jewish prisoners. Slaves still bear marks but also carry labels.

2. In 3 Macc. 2:29-30 Ptolemy IV Philopator tries to force pagan brands on Alexandrian Jews. Philo complains that some apostate Jews accept brands; he views the mark of Cain as a symbol of the lasting evil of folly. The rabbis reject tattooing (in contrast to signs that can be erased); they relate it to idolatry. Circumcision is the mark of the covenant people as distinct from pagan stígmata.

3. Later Judaism often refers to Ezek. 9:4. Unlike the mark of destruction, it is a sign of protection in affliction, especially that of the end-time. The signs of the cross on some tombs of the NT period probably reflect the influence of Ezek. 9:4. The rabbis do not construe the mark of Cain as a tattooed sign.

E. The NT. In the NT stígma occurs only in Gal. 6:17. Paul perhaps views the marks of Jesus here as protective-a new eschatological sign, which denotes the freedom of grace, as compared to circumcision, which denotes bondage under the law. The marks can hardly be tattooed signs but are almost certainly the scars he has acquired in Christian service (cf. 2 Cor. 4:10; Col. 1:24; Phil. 3:21). These are palpable proof that he suffers with the Lord (Rom. 8:17). Rev. 7:2-3 offers an eschatological exposition of Ezek. 9:4. In 3:12; 14:1; 22:4 the name of God or Christ is the protective sign, but this is not humanly inscribed (unlike the mark of the beast, 13:16-17), for it comes from heaven.

F. Church History.

1. Gnosticism refers to the saving name of the Redeemer as a sign. Normally the use is figurative but some groups seal initiates with a hot iron on the lobe of the right ear—the baptism with fire.

2. The fathers often refer to the marks of slaves to bring out the meaning of Christian appropriation to the Lord in baptism.

3. Later some Christians have the cross or Christ's name tattooed on their wrists or arms, and we also read of the letters IHS being incised on the breast.

4. From the Middle Ages on, various people distinguished for piety and weakened by sickness or abstinence (cf. St. Francis of Assisi) have visibly borne the marks of the nails or spear or the marks of the crown of thorns, the scourging, and the cross-bearing. [O. BETZ, VII, 657-64]

stílbō [to shine, glisten]

1. The Greek Sphere. The original use of stílbō in Homer has to do with the "shining" or "gleaming" of oil. It then relates generally to the glitter of gold, the shining of light or water, or the shining of human beauty.

2. OT Use. In the OT the LXX uses the term for the gleaming reflections of various metals (cf. Dan. 10:6; Ezek. 21:15, 20). A common use is for the lightning of the forked sword (Ezek. 21:33). A transferred use occurs in Ps. 7:12.

3. The NT. The only NT use is in Mk. 9:3 for the "glistening" of the clothes of Jesus at the transfiguration. The addition "intensely white" clarifies the term (cf. Mt. 17:2). White is the color of light, life, heaven, priesthood, and victory.

4. The Apostolic Fathers. Hermas Similitudes 9.2.2 uses the word to express supernatural radiance. [G. FITZER, VII, 665-66] stoichéō [to be in a series, be in step with], systoichéō [to be in a series, correspond], stoicheíon [elements, elemental substances] stoichéō.

1. Outside the NT. This verb means "to belong to a series," "to be in rank," or, transferred, "to be in agreement," "to come to an agreement," "to remain in agreement."

2. The NT. In the NT the word is often taken to have the sense "to walk" (perhaps on the basis of "to be in step with"), but in all the instances it can have the usual sense. Thus in Acts 21:24 the point is to be in the ranks of those who keep the law, in Phil. 3:16 Paul wants his readers to remain in the same thing, in Gal. 6:16 agreement with the rule is at issue, in Rom. 4:12 keeping step is in view, and in Gal. 5:25 the Christian life is one of harmony with the Spirit.

3. The Early Church. The saying in Mart. Pol. 22.1 stresses the importance of harmony with the word of Christ, and Clement of Alexandria Stromateis 3.66.1 echoes Gal. 6:16.

systoichéō. Giving emphasis to the simple form, this compound means “to be in a series with,” “to be in the same ranks.” Gal. 4:25 presupposes two antithetical series of concepts: two women, two covenants, Mt. Sinai, and the two Jerusalems. Having equated Hagar with Mt. Sinai, Paul then says that she is in the same series with (i.e., corresponds to) the earthly Jerusalem.

stoicheíon.

A. Outside the NT.

1. A first meaning of stoicheíon is the “length of a shadow” in calculating time.

2. Another use is for a syllable, i.e., a sound as part of a word, then a basic word. Vowels have special importance, and letters understood as sounds play a special role in some circles.

3. Cosmologically the stoicheía are the four elements, Plato’s original constituents of the world, the four elements of Stoicism in distinction from the eternal and imperishable archaí, the elements which form a basis of brotherhood in Alexandrian Judaism. The use of religious terms tends to divinize the elements, so that in early Christian works (cf. Aristides or Clement of Alexandria) their autonomy is resisted and stress is laid on their creation and their subservience to the lógos.

4. Other uses of the word are for the notes of music, for the number one in mathematics, for what is primary, e.g., in education, for first principles, e.g., in geometry or logic, and for the factors which are basic phenomena in dreams.

5. In philosophy, Gnostic speculation, and astrology the stars take on importance as stoicheía, whether as visible gods, as creatures that influence earthly events, as features on the heavenly journey, or as bodies that declare the will of the gods.

6. The use of stoicheíon alongside daímōn and pneúma shows that the idea of “stellar spirits” is present.

B. The NT.

1. In Gal. 4:3; Col. 2:8, 20 we find the phrase stoicheía toú kosmoú (and cf. Gal. 4:9). Outside the NT the term would denote the four elements or the basic materials of the world of which the whole cosmos, and humanity within it, is composed. Only the context can yield any other sense.

2. Gal. 4:3ff,, however, seems to number the law among the stoicheía, and 4:8-9 seems to include false gods. These references rule out such senses as the cosmic elements, the stars, stellar spirits, or simply spiritual forces. Building on thoughts of his age, Paul is using the term in a new way, describing the stoicheía as weak and beggarly. In a transferred sense, the stoicheía are the things on which pre-Christian existence rests, especially in pre-Christian religion. These things are impotent; they bring bondage instead of freedom.

3. In Col. 2:6ff. the stoicheía toú kosmoú are parallel to the parádosis tón anthrṓpōn (v. 8). Religious ordinances (2:20) are inadequate as a basis of human existence. It is a delusion for Christians to think that such things can sustain them. By dying and rising again with Christ they are freed from this delusion and the bondage it entails.

4. In 2 Pet. 3:10, 12 the reference has to be to the elements (or just possibly the stars). The use of terms and the idea of a final conflagration strongly support “elements” as the true rendering. As v. 12 points out, both the higher and lower elements will be destroyed, including the earth and all its works.

5. The meaning in Heb.5:12 is obviously “rudiments” or “first principles,” with a slightly derogatory nuance in context. [G. DELLING, VII, 666-87]

stolḗ [robe]

1. The Greek World. This word first means “equipping,” then “fitting out,” and then specifically “dress,” either male or female. The stolē becomes the long and flowing upper garment, and sometimes the special robe of priests and hierophants. Rarely stolē can mean the act of dressing. Paul’s concept of vesting with Christ or the new humanity probably reflects the religious use of robes and religious ceremonies of robing.

2. The LXX. stolē occurs 98 times in the LXX, mostly for “clothing.” All kinds of clothing may be denoted, especially the upper garment, but clothing can also have a particular significance (cf. Gen. 41:14, 42). Donning royal garments symbolizes kingship (2 Chr. 18:9). Clothing, then, shows what a person or a person’s position is. Wisdom offers a robe of glory (Sir. 6:29, 31) that expresses the heavenly life. God will finally clothe the elect with good things (En. 62:15-16). The priestly robe is a holy one (Ex. 28:2) which goes along with the priesthood (40:13; Num. 20:26). Sprinkling with the blood of the altar sanctifies the priests and their robes (Ex. 29:21). Here again the idea is present that clothing expresses a given status.

3. The NT. In the NT stolē denotes only the upper garment. The robe that the father puts on the returning prodigal marks his restored status as one who was dead and is alive again (Lk. 15:22). Jesus in Mk. 12:38 warns against scribes who go about in long, flowing robes, thus claiming special status and expecting special honor. The white robe of Mk. 16:5 denotes the heavenly being of the messenger and the eschatological revelation contained in the message. The robes of Rev. 6:11 and 7:9 also have an eschatological color. The washing has a passive sense. The wearers have not washed them themselves by martyrdom but they have been washed by Christ (cf. the receiving of the robe of glory in 3:4-5). Entry into the new aeon is a robing with new garments (cf. also 1 Cor. 15:53-54; 2 Cor. 5:3). The garment expresses being, and investing with it expresses the gift of new being. [U. WILCKENS, VII, 687-91]

stóma [mouth]

A. Secular Greek. This word has such varied meanings as the human mouth or face, the animal maw or jaws, the speaker, the speech or word, the opening, entry, or front.

B. Data from Religious History. In Egypt and the Near East the mouth of deity emits the word or breath of life. Phrases like “the word of thy mouth” or “as goes forth from thy mouth” are common. The divine word effects what it says. The gods come forth from the mouth of the primal god, either by utterance or by generation in which the mouth is the organ. The idea of the efficacious word of deity may be extended to the human mouth in expression of the intent of the heart. The mouth of demons goes forth from those who are demonized, and wicked mouths bring harm to people. Charms from the mouth, however, can also pacify the angry person. Cleansing the mouths of newly dedicated idols or of priests and penitents bears witness to the power of the mouth. The mouth of the priest, when used by the deity, has the same force as that of the deity, which it now becomes.

C. The OT.

1. The Hebrew term has much the same sense as stóma but is used more clearly and consistently for “word,” “command,” etc. Various expressions may be noted, e.g., “with one voice” or a “loud voice.” Several descriptions also occur, e.g., flattering in Prov. 26:28. Figurative use may be discerned in Ps. 22:21 and Job 36:16, and also when God says he will take from Bel's mouth what he has swallowed in Jer. 51:44. The simple meaning "entry" occurs in Gen. 4:11.

Heb. Hebrew

2. When the reference is to God's mouth, the mouth as the organ of speech is always in view except in Ps. 18:8 and Job 37:2. Poetic style and parallelism determine this use at times, but elsewhere the purpose is perhaps to avoid direct reference to God. Only in Ps. 33:6 does the creative word proceed from God's mouth. Miracles and judgments are uttered in Ps. 105:5 (cf. 1 Chr. 16:12).

3. A common use is for a word or command of God which may be transgressed or resisted (cf. Num. 14:41; 20:24). Fulfilment as well as word is denoted in Is. 11:4.

4. God may also use the human mouth as his own, especially in the case of the prophets (Jer. 15:19). He cleanses or sanctifies the mouth thus used (Is. 6:7; Jer. 1:9). His word is in this mouth and goes forth from it (1 Kgs. 17:24). It is also in the mouth of succeeding generations (Is. 59:21). The law from the priest's mouth is God's word (Mal. 2:7). Even Necho's mouth may be God's (2 Chr. 35:22).

5. Through the mouth the relation to God is effected and proved (Dt. 32:1). The righteous pray that God's word should not depart from their mouth (Ps. 119:43). God's praise is in the mouth of his people (Ps. 8:2). The mouth should speak as the heart thinks (Is. 29:13). The wicked set their mouths against heaven (Ps. 73:9), but the devout seek the rival cleanness of their mouths (Ezek. 4:14), and ask God to keep guard over them (Ps. 141:3).

D. Judaism.

1. The LXX. The literal stórma occurs in the LXX for the Hebrew term, but we also find rhēma when the sense is word or command.

2. The Targums. The Targums disregard the different meanings of the Hebrew and always take it in the sense of saying or word.

3. Rabbinic Texts. The rabbis see no need to interpret the expression "mouth of God." A negative significance attaches to the mouths of idols.

4. Philo. For Philo the mouth of God is a symbol of his word.

5. Qumran. The Qumran literature follows OT usage.

E. The NT. The term stóma is none too common in the NT. It denotes the human mouth or animal maw, the give-and-take of dialogue (2 Jn. 12), the mouth as the organ of speech, and in a transferred sense word or speech.

1. Jesus adopts the OT reference to God's mouth in quoting Dt. 8:3. In the Hebrew the point is that the word from God's mouth grants manna, but in the LXX, which uses rhēma, the stress is on the word that confers eternal life.

2. The only mention of the mouth of Jesus in the ordinary sense is in Jn. 19:29. The phrase of Luke in 4:22; 11:54; 22:71 evokes the idea of the majesty of his mouth and of the truth of what it utters (cf. Mt. 5:2). 1 Pet. 2:22 refers Is. 59:3 to Jesus' mouth, and Mt. 13:34-35 refers Ps. 78:2 to it. In Acts 22:14 Paul receives from the mouth of the Just One his election as an apostle. This is the mouth of the risen Lord (cf. Rev. 1:16; 2:16; 19:15, 21). The sword that goes forth from his mouth reminds us of Is. 11:4 (cf. 2 Th. 2:8; Rev. 3:16). Judgment also proceeds from the mouths of the witnesses in Rev. 11:5 and the jaws of the horses in 9:17ff. The dragon sends out water from the mouth to drown the woman (12:15), the beast has a mouth that utters blasphemy (13:5), and foul spirits like frogs hop out of the mouths of the dragon, the beasts, and the false prophets (16:13).

3. God, or the Holy Spirit, speaks through the mouths of the prophets in Lk. 1:70; Acts 1:14; 4:25; the reference is to OT Scripture. God also speaks through the mouths of NT prophets (Rev. 10:8ff.) and apostles (Acts 15:7). The attack of enemies is directed at the apostle's mouth in Acts 23:2.

4. In the mouths of believers the confession of faith in Christ is a saving one (Rom. 10:8ff. quoting Dt. 30:14). The church is to glorify God with one mouth (Rom. 15:6). Every mouth will finally confess Christ (Phil. 2:11).

5. The mouth is to be kept pure (Eph. 4:29). It is unnatural that the same mouth should praise God and curse others (Jms. 3: 10ff.). No lie is in the mouths of the perfected in heaven (Rev. 14:5). Inner purity comes to expression in what the mouth speaks (Col. 3:9ff.). Not what enters the mouth, but what issues from the heart causes defilement. The mouths of the wicked are full of curses and bitterness (Rom. 3:14). Those who honor God with their lips when their hearts are far from him are condemned (Mk. 7:6; cf. 1 Jn. 3:18). [K. WEISS, VII, 692-701]

strateúomai [to serve in the army], strateía [military service], stratiá [army], strateúma [army division], stratiṓtēs [soldier], systratiṓtēs [fellow soldier], stratēgós [military leader], stratópedon [camp], stratologéō [to enlist for military service]

A. The Group in Greek.

1. From the basic stratós, denoting a camp or army, the first derivative is strateúō, "to undertake a campaign," "to serve in the army."

2. We then find strateía, meaning "campaign" or "military service."

3. Also found is stratiá for "army" or superterrestrial "host."

4. strateúma is mostly used for an "army division."

5. The individual on military service is a strateuómenos, but stratiṓtēs also comes into use. This word can take on adverse connotations when it comes to denote first the professional and then the mercenary, especially among those who favor a citizen army. At the same time professionals prove their worth, and the term is often used in a good sense, as is systratiṓtēs for "comrade-in-arms."

6. The stratēgós is the "military leader," who may also have high political importance in antiquity. The noun stratēgía means "leading the army," "tactics," "the office of general," and "generalship."

7. The stratópedon is the site of the stratós, i.e., the "camp" or "campsite."

8. The term stratologéō means "to enlist for military service."

B. The Group in the OT.

1. The simple strateúō occurs in the OT only three times for a Hebrew term (Is. 29:7; Judg. 19:8; 2 Sam. 15:28). It is used in a transferred sense for martyrdom in 4 Macc. 9:24.

2. stratiá or strateía occurs 22 times for a Hebrew term that denotes cultic as well as military service, so that it carries some sense of the holy war in which the army represents the totality of the people as the people of the one God.

3. stratópedon occurs in Jer. 34:1 for military might and in 2-4 Maccabees for camp or army.

4. stratēgós is the most common word of the group in the LXX but often means "governor" rather than "general." The prefix archi- is sometimes added to yield archistrátēgos (cf. Gen. 21:22).

5. The important noun stratiōtēs occurs only once in translation (2 Sam. 23:8) as a variant for the more original traumatías. The warrior of ancient Israel is machētḗs or polemistḗs, but 2-4 Maccabees use stratiṓtēs more freely, with a reference to Jewish soldiers in 4 Macc. 3:7, 12. In general, the LXX appreciates the distinction between the group and Hebrew ideas and thus makes sparing use of it except where there is no Hebrew control (as in 2-4 Maccabees).

C. The Group in Judaism.

1. Josephus. Having no objections, Josephus uses all the terms that occur in the NT.

2. Philo. Philo, too, uses terms from the group but avoids stratiṓtēs, which suggests the Roman legionary. In a military sense he uses the terms more commonly in a transferred sense in theological or psychological statements (e.g., God as leader of the invincible host, the war against desires, or the host of the stars).

3. Qumran. How far the military organization of Qumran is determined by the Greek ethos is hard to say; one might equally think of a use or a shunning of the group in Greek translations of the Scrolls.

D. The Group in the NT.

1. The Apocalyptic Reference. In the stratópedon of Titus at the siege of Jerusalem (Lk. 21:20) believers see a fulfilment of Jesus‘ prediction of wars and rumors of wars prior to the end (Mk. 13:7). They must be ready to suffer but need not participate. The demonic strateúmata will destroy a third of the race in Rev. 9:15, but the divine also sees the heavenly stráteuma in 19:19 (cf. vv. 14ff.). No earthly stráteuma need help this victorious host. What is demanded of believers, as the witnesses of Heb. 11:33ff. testify, is faith, not warlike achievement.

2. The Ordinary Reference. Believers come into contact with Roman soldiers, but do not see in them potential enemies at the human level. Pagan thinking clearly dominates military practice, but all people resist God and not just soldiers (Rev. 13:16-17). Indeed, Christians can learn from the brave and unconditional obedience of soldiers even though their allegiance is an evil one (Mt. 8:5ff.). At the passion soldiers carry out the execution of Jesus but a centurion also confesses him (Mk. 15:39), and if the soldiers divide the clothes and thrust in the spear, their guilt is not thereby stressed. The military watch at the tomb is ready to take a bribe in Mt. 28:12.

3. Lucan Narrative. Only Luke uses stratēgós, stratópedon, and stratiá, which in Lk. 2:13 is the superterrestrial host in a positive sense, in Acts 7:42 in a negative sense. The strateuómenoi who seek the Baptist’s advice may be either Jewish or Roman, the stratiōtai of Acts 27:31-32, 42 at first favor Paul and then want to kill him, their centurion overrules Paul and then protects him, the stratiōtai in Acts 12:4, 6, 18; 21:32, 35 behave correctly, the military guards at the freeing of Peter seem to forfeit their lives, the chiliarch sends a considerable stráteuma (Acts 23:23ff.) to escort Paul to Caesarea, and the devout centurion Cornelius, who plays such a pivotal role in Acts 10, has a stratiōtēs eusebēs in his company (v. 7). In general Luke expects soldiers to be just as open to the gospel as others, but he senses a distance between legionaries and believers and thus refrains from using the group in a transferred sense for the Christian life.

4. Paul. Paul takes a different course. In 1 Cor. 9:7 strateúomai offers a parallel to his own work; the strateuómenos may be mentioned with the vine-dresser or shepherd. In 2 Cor. 10:2ff. Paul does not merely walk but wars, although not in worldly fashion. He has in view a siege which aims to destroy arguments and take thoughts captive. Epaphroditus is a systratiṓtēs in Phil. 2:25 and Archippus in Phlm. 2; the term

---

seems to be a somewhat more complimentary one than synergós but bears only a general sense. Except in 1 Cor. 9:7 the group is not really at home in the vocabulary of Paul.

5. The Pastorals. The transferred use of the group for Christian conduct is more common in these letters. Leaders are exhorted to strateúesthai in 1 Tim. 1:18-19 and 2 Tim. 2:3ff. Life, especially the Christian life, is a strateía, a good one controlled by faith and a good conscience in the case of believers (1 Tim. 1:18-19). Timothy is to offer an example. In 2 Tim. 2:3ff. the three comparisons recall 1 Cor. 9:7. Selfdenying concentration is the theme. The stratiṓtēs exemplifies this plainly. Figuratively, then, Christ's servants bear the same name as his executioners, but the need for "understanding" (v. 7) brings out the difference and the figurative sense is obvious.

6. The Catholic Epistles. In 1 Pet. 2:11 the destructive nature of warfare comes to the fore; carnal passions wage war against the soul, and if believers do not withstand them they cannot lead the Gentiles among whom they live to conversion and praise of God. Jms. 4:1 also has the destructive aspect in view, this time in relation to the strateúesthai of inner disagreement that leads to wars and fightings as inner tension produces outer conflict.

7. A Comparison. To compare the epistles with Luke's narrative is difficult, since the epistles say nothing about actual relations with soldiers. If, however, soldiers here are only the terrible people they are for many Jews, the figurative use of the group makes little sense. There is thus a certain harmony between what we find in Luke and what we find in the epistles.

E. The Apostolic Fathers. The group is none too common at first. stratiá bears a literal sense in 1 Clem. 51.5 and Ignatius Romans 5.1. In 1 Clem. 37.3 Christians obey the Lord as strateuómenoi obey the basileús and they obey ecclesiastical authorities as soldiers obey their officers. Ignatius Polycarp 6.2 echoes 2 Tim. 2:4, but avoids stratiṓtēs. The phrase stratiṓtēs theoú occurs in Mart. Pol. 4.6 (and cf. 2).

1. This word means "to twist, turn, bend, or steer. "Education is a turning of the soul to the good, and the moral walk has inner turnings.

2. In the LXX stréphō occurs 37 times with a Hebrew original (cf. the changing of Saul in 1 Sam. 10:6, of cursing into blessing in Ps. 30:11, inner conversion in Lam. 1:10, conversion of the people back to God in 1 Kgs. 18:37).

3. In Josephus Antiquities 6.153 God does not change his mind. Philo uses strophē for cosmic processes and changes in human destiny.

LXX Septuagint

cf. confer, compare

4. In the NT strapheís is a formula in Luke to introduce sayings of the Lord (cf. 7:9). The word occurs in such sayings three times in Matthew (5:39; 7:6; 18:3). Acts 7:39 (cf. Num. 14:3) refers to the inner turning to Egypt and 7:42 to God's turning from Israel. In Acts 13:46 the apostles turn from Israel to the Gentiles. Water is changed into blood in Rev. 11:6 (cf. Ex. 7:17, 19).

5. There is an occasional use in the early church (cf. the changing of formless matter in Justin Apology 59.1, or the change to matter in Athenagoras Supplication 22.6).

anastréphō, anastrophḗ, katastréphō, katastrophḗ.

1. In secular Greek anastréphō has such meanings as "to convert," "to bring or come back," "to be occupied with," "to act," "to walk."

2. There is a varied use in the LXX for "to convert," "to come home or back," and "to change."

3. In the NT the word means "to return" in Acts 5:22. It is a variant for anatrépō in Jn. 2:15 (overturning the tables). God will return and fulfil the promise to David in Acts 15:16. Conduct is the issue in 2 Cor. 1:12; Eph. 2:3; 4:22; 1 Pet. 1:18; 2 Pet. 2:7, 18; 1 Tim. 3:15; 1 Tim. 4:12. Fear of God shapes the Christian walk (1 Pet. 3:2). The holiness that God demands embraces the whole Christian walk (1:15), including suffering (cf. Heb. 10:33; 13:7). For an eschatological orientation cf. 2 Pet. 3:11.

4. anastréphō is the only common compound in the apostolic fathers. It is used both negatively and positively for conduct. Holiness and righteousness of walk are required (1 Clem. 63.3; Did. 3.9). Justin Apology 10.2 refers to the walk with God.

1. This verb means "to twist," "to dislocate," "to confuse." Inner defects lead to confusion of action. Moral corruption is sometimes denoted. Human nature, which is originally good, is twisted by bad teaching, example, etc.

2. The compound occurs 36 times in the OT with no fixed original. Human nature is warped (Dt. 32:5), ways are crooked (Prov. 8:13), Moses and Aaron, and also Elijah, are accused of confusing the people (Ex. 5:4; 1 Kgs. 18:17-18), right is perverted (Mic. 3:9), and those whom God has smitten with confusion cannot make ordinances (Eccl. 7:13; Hebrew text different).

3. The OT controls NT usage. Jesus refers to a perverse as well as a faithless generation in Mt. 17:17; this judgment extends to the whole unbelieving world. Phil. 2:15 quotes the saying in Dt. 32:5 about a crooked and perverse generation. The accusation against Jesus in Lk. 23:2 is the political one that he perverts the people. Paul tells Elymas in Acts 13:10 that he perverts the right ways of God. Acts 20:30 refers to those who speak crooked things (cf. Ezek. 14:5); apostasy is at issue.

4. In the early church the verb is used as in the NT in 1 Clem. 46.3, 9; 47.5. The simile of the potter who can fix a warped vessel so long as it is not yet fired occurs in 2 Clem. 8.2. "To twist the lips (in scorn)" is a phrase in Justin Dialogue 101.3 (based on Ps. 22:7).

1. Secular Greek. This verb means "to turn aside or away from," "to turn back," "to twist words," and, in the middle, "to reject."

2. The OT. The word occurs some 500 times in the OT. Most of the instances are spatial (returning, going home, also repaying). The return from exile has some theological significance, as does turning to Egypt. God can threaten to return Israel to Egypt as a penalty (Dt. 28:68). This will mean apostasy to other gods (Num. 32:15). God's turning aside and the people's falling away coincide (Dt. 31:17). The demand to turn aside from sin initiates renewal (1 Kgs. 8:35). Prayer is made to God not to turn away nor to let the people turn away, but he is also asked to turn aside from his people's sins or to turn aside other peoples. Often his wrath either turns or does not turn to people, and he turns back deeds upon themselves. The verb may also denote inner conversion, especially in Jeremiah (cf. 30:21). In Ezek. 18:21, 24 it is used for both apostasy and conversion in close proximity.

3. Philo and Josephus.

a. Philo rejects as anthropopathic many references to God's turning, but his usage is along OT lines.

b. Josephus warns against turning providence into its opposite by sin, and he says that the Essenes reject joy as sin.

4. The NT. In Mt. 26:52 Jesus orders the disciple to put back the sword into its sheath. Mt. 5:42 refers to lending without return. Lk. 23:14 echoes 23:2. Acts 3:26 says that the work of the Servant is to turn people from sin. The preaching of the kingdom may be resisted, but when it is followed there is divine renewal. Rom. 11:26 quotes Is. 59:20 LXX to the same effect: the Deliverer will turn aside ungodliness from Jacob. This version seems to be a better one than the Hebrew text, which promises the Redeemer to those who turn from sin, for liberation from sin is the decisive act of eschatological salvation. Rejection of the gospel is the point in 2 Tim. 4:4 and Tit. 1:14. The writer is himself repudiated in 2 Tim. 1:15, and there is a warning against rejecting Christ in Heb. 12:25 (cf. 3:1ff.).

5. Early Christianity. The compound is fairly common in early writings but mostly in OT quotations. Justin Dialogue 133.5 gives an anthropocentric turn to the theocentric saying in Is. 5:25. Rejection of the needy is a vice in 2 Clem. 15.1; Did. 4.8.

1. Secular Greek. The verb has such varied meanings as "to convert," "to change," "to turn to or against," "to wander," "to walk," "to turn to a matter," "to pay regard to," "to note." The noun means "attention," "returning," "repentance," "conversion," "change of mind."

2. The OT. The compound verb occurs some 579 times in the LXX for various forms of turning (to, from, back, etc.), and religiously for apostasy or conversion. In Is. 6:10 the LXX introduces the idea of conversion for healing. In Jer. 2:27 an apostate people turns its back on God. It turns to the wicked acts of its fathers in 11:10. God is asked to turn again to his people in Ps. 90:13 etc., or to convert his people in Ps. 80:3 etc. National piety becomes individual piety, and this in turn makes a more general application possible (Jer. 18:8; 30:21) as a messianic work of eschatological restoration.

3. Judaism.

a. In the Apocrypha and pseudepigrapha the term is less prominent; it tends to be supplanted by metanoéō.

b. Philo allegorizes the turning of Lot's wife or the turning of Moses to God as turning from or to knowledge. He also equates the word with moral improvement or turning to righteousness. The turning of the spirit to itself reflects Hellenistic modes of thought.

c. Only rarely in Josephus does the compound have a religious or ethical sense.

4. The NT.

a. In Jn. 21:20 the verb implies turning aside from Jesus. Spatial movement is the point in Acts 9:40. Concern for the churches finds expression in the returning of Acts 15:36. Physical movement is described in Acts 16:18 but with the suggestion of giving attention to.

b. A transferred sense occurs in Lk. 17:4, i.e., an inner change and consequent renewing of relationship. Falling back into the old servitude is the point in 2 Pet. 2:21 (cf. Gal. 4:9).

c. Is. 6:9-10 is quoted in Mk. 4:12; Mt. 13:15; Jn. 12:40; Acts 28:27. Matthew and Mark explain why Jesus speaks in parables, i.e., so that those who do not truly hear will not understand or turn. In Jn. 12:40 God brings about the hardening that prevents conversion, but Jesus manifests his glory by bringing salvation. In Acts 28:27 the gospel goes to the Gentiles because of the guilty obduracy of Israel.

d. Lk. 1:16-17 refers to the leading back of many in Israel to God. In Lk. 22:32 Jesus prays for Peter, so that after his fall he will turn again and strengthen the brethren. The revelation of the risen Lord brings about the change. Jms. 5:19-20 uses the verb for the restoration of erring brethren. In Acts 3:19 and 26:18ff. it is used with metanoéō. In the former the point may be that they should repent and turn to the fact that sin is forgiven, but in the latter turning from and turning to are at issue. Turning from idols is meant in Acts 14:15, and Paul aims at repentance and turning to God in Acts 26:20. Acts 9:35 refers to the converted of Lydda in the Plain of Sharon. To believe and to be converted go together in Acts 11:21 (cf. 15:3, 7, 19). The Thessalonians turn to God from idols in 1 Th. 1:9, and cf. 2 Cor. 3:16, where Paul construes Ex. 34:34 in terms of conversion. In 1 Pet. 2:25 the OT form of expression refers to the bringing of lost sheep to the true Shepherd, i.e., Christ.

5. Early Christianity. Various meanings may be found in early writings, e.g., turning aside, turning back, restoring, and converting.

metastréphō. This uncommon verb means "to turn," "to change." In the NT it occurs in Acts 2:20 for the turning of the sun into darkness (quoting Joel 2:31). The only other use is in Gal. 1:7, where Paul's opponents turn the gospel into its opposite.

[G. BERTRAM, VII, 714-29]

strouthíon [sparrow]

1. This diminutive means "sparrow." The poets do not distinguish the sparrow from other small birds, but economically the sparrow is a threat to crops and is regarded as good to eat.

2. The OT equivalent simply means "bird" with no specific reference to the sparrow.

3. Josephus Jewish War 5.467 refers to a pool called Strouthíon in Jerusalem.

4. The only NT use is in Mt. 10:29ff. and Lk. 12:6-7, which argue that since God cares for a bird that fetches so little when sold, he will care much more for the disciples even though their lives might seem to be just as paltry by human estimation, and are just as exposed to mortal threat. [O. BAUERNFEIND, VII, 730-32]

stýlos [pillar]

A. The Pillar in Antiquity. stýlos means "pillar," either in a supporting function or standing free. In a transferred sense it may denote a reliable person.

B. The OT. The stýlos is primarily architectural in the LXX (cf. the tabernacle and temple). The pillar of cloud or fire denotes God's directing presence (Ex. 13:21-22), and Jeremiah as an iron pillar is to be a guiding sign (1:18). The stýlos is a platform in 2 Kgs. 11:14. Cosmologically stýlos suggests the comparison of the universe to a house (Job 9:6 etc.). Wisdom also builds a house (Prov. 9:1). Originally the seven planets are its seven pillars; created by wisdom, they control the world.

C. Rabbinic Statements. Among the rabbis we often find the transferred use, e.g., for Abraham, the righteous, or teachers of the law.

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

D. The NT. When Paul refers to the "pillars" of the church in Gal. 2:9 the transferred use is apparent but behind the metaphor lies the idea of the church as a building (1 Cor. 3: 10ff.; Eph. 2:21; Rev. 3:12). A certain irony emerges in Paul's statement that the three are "reputed" to be pillars, and the agreement of vv. 9-10 shows that they are pillars only of the Jerusalem church and that Paul's apostolate to the Gentiles is no less basic. The thought of the heavenly building is also present in Rev. 3:12. Tried and proved believers are irreversibly integrated into God's kingdom and fitted as pillars into the heavenly building; they belong to the city of God. In 1 Tim. 3:15 the use is slightly different. The cultic community is the house of God and as such it is the pillar and ground of truth. The description in Rev. 10:1 reproduces a familiar feature in OT theophanies (cf. Ex. 13:21-22). [U. WILCKENS, VII, 732-36] syngenḗs [related to], syngéneia [relative, relation]

1. The Group in Greek.

a. The adjective refers to a person of common origin, i.e., belonging to the same family, race, tribe, or people. It can then mean "related" in disposition, "corresponding," "analogous," or "similar."

b. The noun means "relationship" by descent or disposition, then more broadly "analogy" (e.g., between deity and humanity, or ideas and the senses, or the stars and human destiny), whether in philosophy or popular belief.

2. The LXX.

a. The LXX uses the noun some 44 times for "relations," i.e., "relatives."

b. The adjective occurs mostly in the Apocrypha either in the sense of "relative" or as a court title (Persian or Ptolemaic).

3. Judaism.

a. Philo has the noun some 80 times for "relatives," sometimes allegorically. The OT prevents him from developing an unrestricted analogy between deity and humanity. His use of the adjective is similar ("related," "belonging," "corresponding"). Only in a relative sense is humanity syngenēs to God.

b. There is little of note in Josephus. syngéneia is rare and mostly means "relationship." syngenḗs is very common and usually denotes the "relative" in the narrower sense.

4. The NT. The idea of a relationship between deity and humanity, which is alien to the OT and restricted in Philo, appears in the NT only in the pagan quotation in Acts 17:28, and the syngenḗs group has no connections of this kind anywhere in the NT. syngéneia means "relatives" in Lk. 1:61; Acts 7:3, 14, and cf. syngenḗs in Lk. 1:58; 2:44 and syngenís in 1:36. Mk. 6:4 mentions the "kin" of the prophet as well as his country and house. In Lk. 14:12 one is not to invite "kinsfolk" (along with friends, brothers, or rich neighbors). Lk. 21:16 mentions "relatives" and friends as well as parents and brethren. Cornelius summons "kinsfolk" and close friends to listen to Peter in Acts 10:24. "Related" is the sense in Jn. 18:26. Pau1 uses syngenḗs only in Romans. In 9:3 the addition shows that he has fellow Jews in mind. With no addition (16:7, 11, 21) he perhaps means Jewish Christians, for it is unlikely that he has so many relatives in the list or that he is thinking of the tribe of Benjamin, and the use of "my" indicates a smaller group than Christians in general. Another possibility is that he is singling out believers who are especially close to him and thus using syngenḗs in much the same sense as phílos, especially since all the names do not support the idea that those mentioned are Jewish.

5. The Apostolic Fathers. 1 Clem. 10:2-3 uses syngéneia and Ignatius Ephesians 1.1 has tó syngenikón érgon for conduct becoming the community. [W. MICHAELIS, VII, 736-42]

synkalýptō [to conceal, hide]

1. synkalýptō means "to conceal fully," or, in the middle, "to hide oneself."

2. It occurs in the LXX for concealing shame (Gen. 9:23), faults (Prov. 26:26), or the soul (Ps. 69:10 [variant reading]), or for "disguising oneself" (1 Sam. 28:8).

3. The only instance in the NT is in the saying of Jesus in Lk. 12:2 (cf. Mt. 10:26). The hidden hypocrisy of the Pharisees will be made so manifest that the disciples need not fear those who can kill only the body. In the Lucan setting the apocalyptic association with the unveiling of the reality of this aeon comes out more strongly than in Matthew. [W. KASCH, VII, 743]

synkleíō [to close, enclose]

1. synkleíō has such senses as "to close up together," "to close," "to enclose," "to imprison," "to envelop," "to drive into a corner," "to compel," "to press," "to run out," "to form a circle."

2. In the LXX it represents various Hebrew words and is used for the surrounding desert, enclosed cities, delivering up prisoners etc., hemming in, harassing, and periphrastically "hewing down."

3. The Hebrew verb sgr, one of the originals, occurs in the Dead Sea Scrolls for delivering up, closing (e.g., the jaws of lions or the gates of hell), closing in (i.e., punishing) offenders, and closing the door (i.e., excommunicating).

4. In later Judaism other verbs carry such varied senses as ruling, stopping, enclosing, shutting in, wrapping around, and shaping.

5. In the NT the fish are enclosed in the net in Lk. 5:6. In Gal. 3:22-23 Paul says that Scripture shuts up all under sin so that the promise might be given to those who have faith in Christ. Prior to faith there is custody under the law (v. 23). A teleology of history comes to light here. Scripture manifests shutting up under sin, and the law effects this. The eschatological dimension emerges in Rom. 11:32: God has shut up all under disobedience so as to have mercy on all. The figure of the prison is in the background, with the law as its keeper. But protective custody might be the point in view of the positive purpose. God by the law protects the race against self-destruction until faith is revealed (cf. Gal. 3:24). It is unlikely that Paul has in mind the Gnostic conception of the earthly world as a prison from which the redeemer rescues souls by his descent.

6. In Gnostic thinking the earth is the domain of evil and the descent of the redeemer has the force of a descent into the underworld to open the closed gates of the prison. The idea of the enclosing of the soul in matter occurs in Gnostic works; the female soul is enclosed in matter in which moisture and cold predominate in the composition of the elements. Mandaean works refer to a surrounding ring, an enclosing wall, covered radiance, etc. [O. MICHEL, VII, 744-47] syzētéō [to discuss, debate], syzḗtēsis [dispute, debate], syzētētḗs [disputant, debater]

v. verse

syzētéō.

1. This word means “to examine with,” “to dispute,” “to strive.”

2. In the NT it means “to discuss” in Mk. 9:10; Lk. 24:15 and “to dispute” in Mk. 8:11; 9:14, 16; 12:28; Lk. 22:23; Acts 6:9; 9:29.

3. In the apostolic fathers “to discuss” occurs in Barn. 4.10, “to dispute” in Ignatius Smyrneans 7.1, and “to ponder” in Hermas Similitudes 6. 1. 1.

syzḗtēsis.

1. This noun means “common investigation,” “dispute,” “debate.”

2. It occurs in the NT for “dispute” or “strife” in Acts 15:2, 7; 28:29.

syzētētḗs. This word, meaning “one who investigates or disputes with,” occurs only in 1 Cor. 1:20. Having extolled the “folly” of the preaching of the cross which invalidates this world’s wisdom, Paul asks ironically where is the scribe and where is the “disputer” or “debater” of this age. [J. SCHNEIDER, VII, 747-48]

sýzygos [companion, partner]

1. This uncommon word means “spanned together in a common yoke.” It comes into use for the “companion” or “partner,” especially where there is a pair or couple, as in marriage.

2. The term does not occur in the LXX.

3. The only NT instance is in Phil. 4:3. Here it could be a proper name, but this is unlikely. Nor does Paul mean his “spouse,” since he does not seem to be married during his years of apostleship, and the term gnḗsios means “tested” rather than “lawful.” He is probably referring to some person with whom he has a particularly close relationship, e.g., Silas. After the NT the sense of “belonging to a pair” is determinative, as in Gnostic works which refer to earth as the sýzygos of heaven, or in fathers who relate the Holy Spirit and the Sun of Righteousness, or doing and willing. When the disciples are listed in pairs, Eusebius notes that Matthew puts himself after his sýzygos Thomas (Demonstration of “the Gospel 3.5.84-85). [G. DELLING, VII, 748-50]

sykḗ, sýkon, ólynthos.

1. Linguistic Factors. The sykḗ is the “fig tree,” and sýkon is the “fig.” The LXX distinguishes between the early fig and the (unripe) late fig (ólynthos), and also has sýkōn for the “fig orchard.” In the NT sykḗ occurs 12 times in the Synoptists (also in Jn. 1:48, 50; Jms. 3:12; Rev. 6:13), sýkon occurs three times in the Synoptists (also in Jms. 3:12), and ólynthos occurs only in Rev. 6:13.

2. The Fig Tree in Palestine.

a. Antiquity. The fig tree is an ancient and important tree in Palestine and claims special dignity in Judg. 9:7ff. To sit under one’s vine and fig tree is to enjoy peace. Figurative use occurs in, e.g., Is. 28:4; Jer. 8:13; Hos. 9:10; Mic. 7:1; Prov. 27:18. The fig tree is the only tree mentioned in Eden (Gen. 3:7).

b. Today. The fig tree is still common in Palestine. Casting its leaves in autumn, it seems very bare, but its big leaves offer shade in summer. The early fruits form in March and are ripe in May. The late figs ripen on the new shoots and are the main crop (August to October).

3.a. The fig tree is of no special importance in Jn. 1:48, 50, where the point of the story is not that Nathanael is under this tree but that Jesus has an inner knowledge of Nathanael that is demonstrated by mentioning a fact that is readily checked, namely, his being under the fig tree.

b. The figure in Mt. 7:16 and Lk. 6:44 combines grapes and figs (as in the OT) in contrast to thorns and thistles. In context it illustrates the saying about the bad tree that cannot bear good fruit with a reference first to words (Lk. 6:45) but mainly to acts (6:46ff.; Mt. 7:21ff.). The saying, which has the character of proverbial wisdom, forms a general rule but carries a sharp edge against opponents whose words and acts betray their evil disposition.

c. Jms. 3:12 recalls Mt. 7:16 but is directed against sins of the tongue. That the same mouth should bless and curse is just as unnatural as that one tree should bear the fruits of another. The comparison is not exact, for the tree does not carry two different fruits, some good and some bad. The point, however, is that the use of the tongue for both good and ill is contrary to nature.

d. In the parable of the unfruitful fig tree in Lk. 13:6ff. Jesus teaches that his summons to repentance offers a final period of grace before judgment strikes.

e. The cursing of the fig tree in Mk. 11:12ff. and Mt. 21:18ff. is the only miracle of judgment in the Synoptists and symbolizes the cursing of unfruitful Israel. In its setting it raises the question whether one might expect to find edible figs (possibly early unripe figs or late figs from the previous season) at the time of the Passover. To deal with this problem various theories have arisen, e.g., that the story is misplaced, or that it is a legend explaining a prominent withered fig tree, or that it rests on a misunderstood saying.

f. The parable of the fig tree in Mk. 13:28-29; Mt. 24:32-33; Lk. 21:29ff. is related to the apocalyptic signs of the end, i.e., future signs of future events. A theory advanced by some scholars is that originally it refers to signs of the kingdom in the works of Jesus (cf. Lk. 12:54ff.), but its present context is plain.

g. Rev. 6:13 compares the stars that plunge from heaven to the ólynthoi that the storm shakes from the fig tree (cf. Is. 34:4).

1. In Palestine we also find two other trees that are only distantly related to the fig tree, a. the “sycomore fig,” a strong-growing tree, planted mainly for wood, whose fruits resemble figs but are of less value, and b. the “mulberry,” i.e., the black mulberry whose berries produce a juice used as a dye. The LXX incorrectly uses sykáminos for a. but correctly has tó móron for the fruit of the mulberry. The correct term for a. is sykomoréa.

2. In Lk. 19:4 sykomoréa is obviously the “sycomore fig.” sykáminos in 17:6, however, might be the “mulberry,” but in the light of LXX usage it could also be the “sycomore fig,” which is especially firm and deeply rooted.

sykophantéō. This word first has the sense “to denounce” and then “to cheat” or “to extort.” In Lk. 3:14 and 19:8 it means “to oppress” or “to extort.” Its derivation (sýkon and phaínō) is clear but materially obscure. [C.-H. HUNZINGER, VII, 751-59]

syllambánō [to gather, seize, conceive]

1. This word means “to bring together,” “to gather,” “to enclose,” “to seize,” “to snatch,” “to arrest,” and in a transferred sense “to acquire” (e.g., a language), “to conceive” (ideas), “to help,” “to take up the cause of someone.”

2. The term occurs in the LXX for different words in the senses “to seize,” “to trap,” “to capture,” and also “to conceive.”

3.a. In the NT we find the sense “to catch in a net” in Lk. 5:9 and “to take or arrest” in Mk. 14:48 and Acts 23:27.

b. The sense “to conceive” occurs in Lk. 1:24, 31, 36. The use in Jms. 1:15 makes the point that sin results from human desire (not from God) and that its result is self-destruction. The image of desire as a harlot (v. 14) is unlikely, since the desire is one’s own. In contrast is the new life that God wills to give through his word (v. 18). Philo has the same metaphor but with delusion as a result, not the evil deed. In Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs the fructifying power of evil finally produces sin, but in Jms. 1:15 the desire and the deed are our own. There is an intentional paradox, for birth usually brings life, but this pregnancy issues in death (cf. Gen. 3; Rom. 5:12; 6:21, 23; 7).

c. The sense “to help” (middle) occurs in Lk. 5:7, and in Phil. 4:3 the anonymous yokefellow is asked to help the two women (to concord).

4. In early writings we find the sense “to arrest” in 1 Clem. 12.2 and “to help” in 2 Clem. 17.2. [G. Delling, VII, 759-62]

syllypéomai* → lýpē; symbasileúō → *basileús symbibázō [to hold together, instruct]

A. Outside the Bible. This word means “to bring together,” “to reconcile,” and in philosophy “to compare,” “to infer,” “to show,” and finally “to expound.”

B. The LXX. In the LXX the term bears only the special sense “to teach, to instruct” (in something). The stress is on authoritative direction rather than logical deduction. Teachers include God in Ex. 4:12, his angel in Judg. 13:8, Moses in Ex. 18:16, Aaron in Lev. 10:11, fathers in Dt. 4:9. Subjects are divine orders in Ex. 4, the commandments in Ex. 18, the Sinai revelation in Dt. 4:9-10.

C. The NT.

1. In the NT the term means “to hold together,” “to unify” in Col. 2:2, 19; Eph. 4:16. The body is held together by the head, from whom it derives its life. Self-seeking piety severs this conjunction with the head. The church’s unity in love and knowledge of salvation in Christ are inseparable.

2.a. In Acts 9:22 the meaning is “to prove”; Paul’s spiritual proof that Jesus is the Messiah confounds the Jews in Damascus. Scriptural authority and the continuity of God’s saving work are presupposed. For similar terms cf. Acts 17:2-3. A vision leads to the conclusion and decision in Acts 16:10-11.

b. The sense “to instruct” occurs in Acts 19:33; some of the crowd “inform” Alexander. 1 Cor. 2:16 is based on Is. 40:13. To be able to instruct God one must have his mind. The radical difference for believers is that they now have the mind of Christ. By the Spirit they may know the mystery of God’s saving work in Christ. [G. Delling, VII, 763-66]

Greek renderings of the OT have metá and the genitive for the important statement: "the Lord is with you," but Paul prefers sýn with the dative for Christians' being "with Christ." A number of words with sýn bring out the significance of this truth, showing how believers are caught up into the Christ event. This use of sýn must be studied along with metá and the genitive.

A. The Use of sýn and metá with the Genitive.

1. Classical Greek and Koine. The use fluctuates over the years. Strictly, metá means "among," "between," and first occurs with the dative, accusative, and more rarely the genitive. sýn means "together," and with the dative is the most common word for "with" in Homer. Yet metá with the genitive may also mean "with" and tends to supplant sýn in the time that follows, especially in philosophers, historians, and orators (as distinct from poets). The Koine eliminates the original distinction and sýn again becomes more common. With the fading of the dative, however, sýn again goes into eclipse, and modern Greek knows only me (tá).

2. The LXX. The LXX usually has metá and the genitive. sýn is more common only in later works. There is no distinction of meaning, and compounds of which sýn is a part are surprisingly used with metá and the genitive (Gen. 14:24; 18:16, 23).

3. The NT. The NT use is similar to that of the Koine, and we even find sýn with the genitive. metá with the genitive (364 times) is more common than sýn with the dative (127 times). The metá passages are mostly historical, whereas the sýn references occur mostly in Luke and Paul. The position of sýn is much stronger if one counts the compounds. Paul uses metá more than sýn (69 times to 37, but cf. 59 compounds with sýn), but sýn has greater theological significance.

4. The Apostolic Fathers. The Didache, Barnabas, 1 and 2 Clement, and Hermas use only metá relative to both persons and things, but Ignatius, Polycarp, and the Martyrdom of Polycarp use metá only relative to things, and make more common use of sýn. Ignatius and Hermas also employ various compounds with sýn, nouns and adjectives as well as verbs.

B. The Range of Meaning of sýn and metá.

I. sýn.

1. From the basic meaning of "with" in a personal sense, sýn first comes to express being or acting together and sharing a common task or destiny.

2. This being or acting together carries the sense of supporting or helping one another, i.e., taking the side of one another.

3. As regards things, the reference is to the things one uses or with which one is equipped, or to the accompanying circumstances of an event or action.

II. metá with the Genitive.

1. Basically metá with the genitive means “among,” “amidst.” Where fellowship with others is at issue, the plural usually follows, for one is “among” many people. Being among animals may also be expressed (Gen. 6:18ff.), and the LXX uses the term for being in a common grave (47:30) or for the union of the living and the dead (Ex. 13:19).

2. metá may also denote standing by someone, helping someone.

3. To express the means of accompanying circumstances of help, metá has the sense “by means of,” “with,” or “in connection with.”

4. Often an adjectival or adverbial rendering is possible when we find metá and the genitive with things, e.g., “strongly armed” for “with armor,” or “angrily” for “with anger.”

C. sýn and metá in Statements about the Being Together of God and Humans.

I. The Greek World.

1. The phrase sýn theṓ or sýn theoís is a common one in the Greek world. It first denotes divine favor. The deities are fickle; fortune smiles only when they are present and do not withdraw. Divine help thus comes to expression in the phrase. Those who fight arrogantly in their own strength, trying to win apart from the gods, will be shattered.

2. Divine help has inward as well as outward effects. Thus Nestor hopes that with divine help (sýn daímoni) the words of Patroclus will touch the heart of Achilles, and sýn theṓ occurs in formulas denoting the divine inspiration of speech.

3. From poetry and prose the phrase sýn theṓ passes into popular speech. We thus find it on many papyri.

II. The Bible.

1. God’s promise.

a. In the OT God gives the promise that he will be with certain people, evoking the response of faith. Examples of this (as distinct from the Greek “with God”) are numerous in the historical books (cf. Abraham in Gen. 17:4, Isaac in 26:3, Jacob in 28:15, Moses in Ex. 3:12, Joshua in Josh. 1:5, 9). The promise is unconditional in Jeremiah’s call (1:8, 17, 19). It extends to the whole people in Am. 5:14, but the people may forfeit it through sin. On the basis of it the people may be fearless even in face of superior foes (Dt. 20:1, 4). Josh. 7:12 demands purification if God is to stay with his people. Renewal of the promise takes place at the return from exile (Is. 41:10).

b. In the NT Mary receives the same promise in Lk. 1:28; it denotes her gracious election. Paul hears a similar promise from the Lord when in danger at Corinth (Acts 18:9-10). Matthew applies Is. 7:14 to Jesus in 1:23; he is Immanuel (meth’ hēmṓn ho theós) for in him God’s promise becomes a personal reality in history to fulfil the covenant and take away sin (1:21). After the resurrection the risen Lord will be with his disciples to the end of the age (28:20). Between Mt. 1 and Mt. 28 stands Mt. 18:20, where the Lord promises his presence to those who gather in his name (en mésō autón has here the force of meth’ hymṓn). John presents the Son in unity with the Father (10:30). The unity of his words and acts with the Father’s is that of the Father’s fellowship with him (met’ emoú, 8:29; 16:32). To the disciples he sends the Spirit of truth, who will be with them forever (meth’ hymṓn, 14:16). Rev. 21:3 depicts the consummation of the promise.

2. The Response of Faith.

a. In the OT Jacob makes a response of faith in Gen. 28:20 and Jeremiah in Jer. 20:11. The people responds in Ps. 46:7, 11. Moses depends on God’s promise to be with the people (Ex. 33:15-16).

Deuteronomy confesses the divine presence (1:30), and cf. David (1 Chr. 22:18) and Solomon (1 Kgs. 8:27).

b. An example of response in the NT occurs in Stephen's speech (Acts 7:9-10). Paul acknowledges God's gracious presence and assistance in his own life (1 Cor. 1:10). This personal confession underlies the apostolic salutation in Paul's (and other) epistles. This occurs in various forms (2 Th. 3:16; 2 Tim. 4:22; Rom. 15:33, etc.), but always with metá and the genitive. From these formulas develop the liturgical greeting and response: "The Lord be with you." "And with thy spirit." Behind this salutation lies awareness of the gift of the Spirit in whom the Lord himself is present with the community.

3. Other Attestations.

a. The OT often says that God is with people (Ishmael, Joshua, Judah, Solomon, judges, and kings), and that others note his presence (e.g., Abraham, Isaac, Israel, Joshua, etc.).

b. The NT adopts the same phrase in narration and evaluation (cf. the Baptist in Lk. 1:66, or the evaluation of Jesus by Nicodemus in Jn. 3:2 or Peter in Acts 10:38; cf. also the self-confession of Jesus in Jn. 8:29).

4. The Statement "We with God." This statement seldom occurs. We find it with "the Lord with you" in 2 Chr. 15:2; God is with those who are with him, i.e., who seek him (cf. Ps. 78:8, 37; 1 Kgs. 11:4 for the opposite). In Ps. 73:23 the psalmist hopes for God's constant support and translation to glory: "I am continually with thee." Ps. 16:11 expresses the same hope that earthly fellowship with God will continue in an eternal fellowship. The LXX construes along similar lines the expression of cultic fellowship in, e.g., Pss. 140:13 and 139:18.

III. Hermas. The Shepherd of Hermas modifies the promise under the impact of ideas of angels and spirit. To strengthen Hermas against bad temper or the devil the power of the Lord (Mandates 5.2.1) or the angel of righteousness is with him (6.2.3), and he has the promise of presence and help in his ministry to others (12.3.3). In Similitudes 9, in connection with the building of the tower, holy spirits are with Hermas. Fashioning after the likeness of God's Son is at issue as in the case of Paul's sýn Christṓ.

D. sýn Christṓ in Paul.

1. Paul's sýn Christṓ is linguistically comparable with Gk. sýn theó and sýn theoís, but materially it is oriented to eternal eschatological being with Christ and denotes personal coming to Christ and being with him.

a. The LXX understanding of cultic fellowship as eternal fellowship forms a starting point (with some parallels in philosophical and popular ideas of communion with the gods after death).

b. Later Judaism also speaks of eternal fellowship with God.

c. Paul's use of sýn makes it plain that the meaning is "together with." Thus Col. 2:5 shows that there may be presence in spirit despite bodily absence. Phil. 2:22 brings out the inner nature of the fellowship with Timothy. In Gal. 3:9 the blessing of believers with Abraham is the point.

2. Paul coins the phrase sýn Christṓ and uses it 12 times. In 1 Th. 4:13-5:11 the "with him" of v. 14 means that deceased believers share his life and glory. The "ever with the Lord" of v. 17 denotes enduring fellowship. In 5:10 living "with him" rests on his dying "for us." Salvation through him (v. 9) comes to fulfilment in fellowship with him.

3. Elsewhere the phrase occurs in Phil. 1:23; 2 Cor. 4:14; 13:4; Rom. 6:8; 8:32. Closest to 1 Thessalonians is 2 Cor. 4:14, which refers to resurrection with Christ and hence to being brought into his presence with other believers. With his own death (Phil. 1:23) Paul attains to "being with Christ." This personal fellowship rules out any concern about the intermediate state. The parallel between Christ's way and that of the church controls 2 Cor. 13:4. As Christ died in weakness but rose in power, so Paul is weak but knows God's power in his ministry, which has, then, an eschatological dimension. This parallelism of destiny finds further development in Romans. In 6:8 dying with Christ rests on his vicarious death and takes effect in renunciation of sin. Posited with it is life with Christ. Christ's vicarious work is again the basis in Rom. 5:12ff. in which the parallelism is seen from the standpoint of Christ as the second Adam. The climax comes in 8:32. Christ's offering for all effects a "with him" that means sharing his victory, dominion, and glory, so that the universe is given to the Christian with him.

4. Four instances in Colossians are along the same lines as Philippians and 2 Corinthians. In baptism those who were dead in sin are made alive with Christ (2:13). Being dead without Christ means being under the dominion of alien forces to which believers die with Christ (2:20). The new life, then, is a resurrection life with Christ (3:3). Having their life in and with Christ, believers will be manifested with him in glory (3:4).

E. Compounds Which Develop the Meaning of sýn Christṓ.

1. Meaning of the Terms.

a. The term synapothnḗskō is used for "to die together with" (cf. Mk. 14:31; 2 Cor. 7:3).

b. systauróō has the sense "to crucify with" (passive Mt. 27:44; Rom. 6:6; Gal. 2:19).

c. syntháptō means "to bury with" (Rom. 6:4).

d. sýmphytos carries the sense of "being planted [i.e., united] with" (Rom. 6:5).

e. synegeírō means "to help to get up," "to raise up" (Eph. 2:6; Col. 2:12).

f. syzáō denotes "living with" (Rom. 6:8; 2 Tim. 2:11).

g. syzōopoiéō means "to make alive with" (Col. 2:13).

h. sympáschō has the sense of "suffering with" (1 Cor. 12:26; Rom. 8:17).

i. syndoxázō means "glorifying with" (Rom. 8:17).

j. synklēronómos means "co-heir."

k. sýmmorphos denotes similarity of form (Rom. 8:29).

l. symmorphízō means "conferring the same form" (Phil. 3:10).

m. symbasileúō denotes the sharing of rule (1 Cor. 4:8; 2 Tim. 2:12).

n. synkathízō means "setting with another" (Eph. 2:6).

2. Eschatological Statements in Paul.

a. By way of justification the goal of sýn Christṓ is conformity to Christ's image (cf. Gen. 1:26-27; 2 Cor. 4:4, 6). The term prōtótokos insures Christ's uniqueness. Christ is God's image, and by new creation believers are conformed to him. God's purpose in creation thus attains its goal in glorification. Phil. 3:21 shows that this involves transformation. Subject now to death, believers acquire in their corporeality the form of Christ's glorious body. In virtue of union with him, this is effected by his power (Phil. 3:10) by way of an earthly existence that manifests his death and passion (2 Cor. 4:14-15) and thus involves a fellowship of destiny.

b. Baptism is decisively significant in this regard. Like Adam, Christ represents humanity (Rom. 5:12ff.). "Christ for us" underlies "we with Christ." As incorporation into Adam is by the first birth, so incorporation into Christ is by the second birth, denoted by baptism (Rom. 6:1ff.). Baptism acknowledges the dominion that Christ gained by death and resurrection. By vicarious death Christ blots out sin, and baptism means unity with the crucified and risen Christ and hence reconciliation to God. Those who are thus united with him are dead to sin. Previously dead in sin, they are now crucified with Christ, who has borne the curse of the law (Gal. 3:13), and they thus respond by self-appropriation to Christ (Gal. 2:20; Rom. 6:6). As they are now dead to sin, they no longer serve it, for they are alive to God through Christ (Rom. 6:6, 12ff.). Already the new life with Christ finds an expression (2 Cor. 4:7ff.) that will come to consummation in eternal being with Christ (Phil. 3:21). Sharing Christ's resurrection means already the ruling of the present life for God.

n. note

c. Control by the Spirit (Rom. 8:4ff.) carries with it sharing with Christ the name and status of son (8:14ff.). This in turn means a common inheritance in the common kingdom of God (8:17). Joint inheritance and joint glorification are two aspects of the same eschatological process in which suffering and glory, death and resurrection, are woven together in Christ in such a way that "with Christ" embraces the totality of the Christian life both now and in eternity.

3. Colossians and Ephesians.

a. Col. 2:12ff. reflects Rom. 6:4. In faith those who were dead outside Christ are made alive with him through forgiveness of sin and liberation from cosmic forces. The new and victorious resurrection life is now hidden with Christ in God but will be manifested with him, so that life here and now is a transition to the life which in changed form will finally come forth from the hiddenness of God at the parousia.

b. In Eph. 2:1ff. the merciful God in his grace has given new life to believers with Christ. This present reality has an eschatological dimension, for believers are already set in heavenly places to show forth the riches of divine grace.

4. The Hymn in 2 Tim. 2:11-12. Building on the hope of salvation in Christ, the "sure saying" of 2 Tim. 2:11-12 refers to a future living and reigning with Christ along with the dying with him that baptism denotes and resistance to sin expresses. Polycarp recalls this saying in Ephesians 5.2 (cf. also Ignatius Smyrneans 4.2).

F. sýn and metá in Other Christ Sayings in the NT.

1. sýn and metá describe discipleship. In Lk. 15:11-12 the father reminds the elder son that fellowship with him is what matters (v. 31). Jesus calls the 12 to be with him (Mk. 3:14) right up to the passion (Mt. 26:38) so that they might learn from him and share his ministry. Peter is accused of being with him in Mt. 26:69 and parallels; he has sworn that he will suffer and die with him (26:35). The disciples are with Jesus on his journeys (Lk. 22:14), and the cured demoniac wants to go with him (Mk. 5:18). Peter and John are seen to have been with Jesus in Acts 4:13. Jesus promises the dying thief that he will be with him in paradise (Lk. 23:43). metá has a special nuance in John (cf. 6:3; 14:9; 11:16; 15:27). The disciples' being with Jesus is the subject of Jesus' prayer in 17:24. Purification by Jesus is its presupposition in 13:8. 1 John refers to fellowship with the Father and with Christ (1:3). Preaching the word of life establishes fellowship with others (1:6-7). Those who do not recognize this do not continue in the fellowship (2:19).

2. Paul uses metá when speaking about the mutual fellowship of believers (Rom. 12:15, 18; 1 Cor. 16:11-12). Christians are not to go to law with one another (1 Cor. 6:6-7) and are to have no fellowship with idols (2 Cor. 6:15-16). In mixed marriages partners must decide about living with one another (1 Cor. 7:12).

3. Revelation has some statements with metá that are close to Paul's sýn Christṓ (3:4, 21; 14:1; 17:14; 20:4, 6).

4. sýn and metá are important in connection with meals, for these create fellowship. Jesus eats with sinners (Mt. 9:10-11). Judas is guilty of a shocking breach of table fellowship (Mk. 14:18). Jesus desires table fellowship (Lk. 22:15) and looks ahead to its eternal restoration (Mt. 26:29). The two who go to Emmaus ask Jesus to stay with them (Lk. 24:29-30). The church finds in the supper a meal of fellowship with the risen Lord that anticipates the final banquet (cf. Rev. 3:20).

5. metá is significant in sayings about the second coming and judgment. It relates to the coming in Mk. 8:38; 2 Th. 1:7; Rev. 1:7. This coming is a reckoning with servants in Mt. 18:23. At the judgment various groups arise with others (Mt. 12:41-42). As regards those who die in the Lord, their works follow along with them (Rev. 14:13).

6. Mk. 1:13 says that at the temptation Jesus was with the wild beasts, and angels ministered to him. The animals obviously do not molest him.

7. Mk. 8:27-9:29 develops the thought in the sýn sayings of Rom. 8:17. Acts points to the parallels between Christ's death and Stephen's (Lk. 22:69; 23:34, 46; Acts 7:56, 59, 60); at the end of the story Christ receives Stephen, who has been made like him in death and passion. The NT use of sýn and metá shows plainly that salvation means participation in Christ's destiny, conformity to his likeness, and a being with him in which God binds himself to Christ and hence to all who are his. [W. GRUNDMANN, VII, 766-97]

synagōgḗ [assembly, gathering place, congregation, synagogue], episynagōgḗ [assembly, meeting], archisynágōgos [ruler of the synagogue], aposynágōgos [expelled from the synagogue, excommunicated] synagōgḗ.

A. Secular Greek.

1. The General Meaning. The basic sense of synagōgḗ is that of bringing together or assembling (cf. a gathering of people, a collection of books or letters, the ingathering of harvest, the mustering of troops, the knitting of brows, the drawing in of a sail, and in logic the deduction or demonstration).

2. Societies. Relative to societies, the term usually denotes the periodic meeting. Only rarely is synagōgḗ the place of meeting. Often a festal assembly (cultic or otherwise) is denoted, e.g., a feast or even a picnic. Unlike ekklēsía (the assembly of free citizens), synagōgḗ is not a constitutional term. Conversely ekklēsía plays no part in guild life.

B. The LXX.

1. Occurrence. synagōgḗ occurs some 200 times in the LXX. It usually translates either*ʿ ēḏâ* or qāhāl. The former is the term for the national, legal, and cultic community of Israel, preferred in Exodus and Leviticus, used exclusively in Numbers, but replaced by qāhāl (which has essentially the same meaning) in Deuteronomy, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles.

2. ekklēsía and synagōgḗ. Like the Hebrew terms, these two words have essentially the same sense. Individual translators seem to prefer either the one or the other. If synagōgḗ is mostly found in the Pentateuch, this is perhaps because the translators find here the charter of their synagogal communities. They almost always use it for ʿēḏâ .

3. Gathering. The term synagōgḗ may have such normal senses as the collecting of taxes, the ingathering of harvest, the heaping up of stones, the gathering of a crowd, the mustering of troops, the swarming of bees, and a great number of people.

4. Assembly. When "assembly" is the point, there is little difference from the secular use. At times the stress may be on assembling for common action, but this is not always the case.

5. The Whole Congregation. synagōgḗ is often a term for the congregation, i.e., the whole people of Israel, sometimes with pása or Israēl. The people is not as such a religious entity, but often the reference is to the people as it assembles for legal or cultic purposes. The synagōgḗ is thus the cultic community engaged in sacred acts or the legal community engaged in judgment. The term bears a strong historical character as the desert community, the community that sees God's wonders and inherits the promises, yet also the eschatological community that is to be gathered from the dispersion.

6. The Individual Congregation. In the Apocrypha the term comes to be used for the local congregation, and the plural is now used for Israel as a whole.

7. The House of Meeting. The LXX never uses synagōgḗ for an actual place of meeting, i.e., a building (cf. parembolḗ rather than synagōgḗ in Num. 17:11).

C. Judaism.

I. Usage.

1. Greek-Speaking Judaism.

a. LXX usage continues in Greek-speaking Judaism either in the secular sense or for the Jewish community, although here with the local congregation in view. Other terms are at first still used for the building.

b. NT Judaism uses synagōgḗ for the building, a usage that must have developed in the dispersion. Philo has only one instance of this sense, Josephus has four, and there are also some examples on inscriptions (of uncertain date). Often it is hard to differentiate between the congregation and its place of meeting, since the two go by the same name.

2. Equivalents. The rabbis do not use the OT ' ēḏâ or qāhāl for synagōgḗ but other Aramaic or Hebrew terms. (For details see TDNT, VII, 808-09.)

3. Qumran. In the Qumran writings 'ēḏâ comes into prominence again to denote, not the whole community, but the community as the elect remnant.

II. The Jewish Synagogue.

1. Origin. The origin, date, and development of the synagogue are all obscure. It probably arises during the exile or under Ezra due to isolation from the temple and the establishment of the law as the exclusive norm of national life. Testimony to a synagogue outside Israel comes from Egypt in 247-221 B.C. Josephus refers to a synagogue at Antioch under Antiochus Epiphanes, and remains of a synagogue at Delos seem to go back to the first century B.C., to which the oldest inscription in Palestine also belongs.

2. Spread. As the Jews spread into many lands, so synagogues are attested for some 150 places throughout the Roman world and into Babylonia and Mesopotamia. Every significant community in Palestine has a synagogue, and larger cities have more than one. Swollen figures say that there are 480 in Jerusalem alone just before its fall. The great number involves strong decentralization.

3. Founding. To found and support a synagogue is a task for the congregation, which may be the same as the community in Palestine. With the ark and Scripture, the synagogue belongs to the town, and all Jews may have to contribute to it. Names of donors are inscribed on parts that they have endowed. Sometimes endowments may be very large.

4. Architecture.

a. No binding rules exist for architectural style. Theoretically synagogues should be built on the high point of a town, but they are also built over tombs, outside cities, next to other houses, alongside water, and next to Gentile lands in Gentile cities.

b. Mostly synagogues are built with the entrance facing Jerusalem (as prayer is made to Jerusalem). The ark with the law is at the entrance so that the people may face it too. Later it is put in a niche beside the entrance.

c. Details are available for architectural styles in the second century A.D. (especially in Galilee), but nothing is known about the style in NT days. The older Galilean buildings have three naves made by double rows of pillars, galleries (with access from outside) over the side naves, windows at the front and along the side walls, stone seats in ranks along the side walls (sometimes also the back), and a floor of flagged stone. Simpler structures abroad seem to be houses or to have developed out of houses, and this may be true in Palestine in NT days, for in Mk. 6:3; Lk. 13:10ff.; Acts 16:13 the women do not seem to sit in galleries, as they probably do in the basilica-type synagogues.

5. Furnishings. All synagogues need scrolls of the OT, which are kept in the special ark. Being sacred, Scripture must be rescued if danger threatens and hidden when no longer usable. A podium with a reading desk is also needed. Other articles include lamps, trumpets, seats, and vessels for washing. Paintings are found in the form of mosaics or murals.

6. Purpose and Significance.

a. Teaching the Law. The main purpose of a synagogue is to teach and propagate the law. The traditions, which show how the law applies in practice, must also be transmitted.

b. Relation to the temple. In NT days there is no rivalry between temple and synagogue. After the fall of Jerusalem the synagogue replaces the temple. The adoption of the candelabra and of many liturgical practices from the temple makes this plain. A ministry of the word develops instead of the priestly cultus, the synagogues free worship from geographical bondage to one place, and the laity finds a more important role than in the temple. God is just as present in the synagogue as in the temple, and the synagogue is thus a holy place.

c. Place of Prayer. As the place of the divine presence, the synagogue is the ordained place where the people ought to pray and where an answer is promised.

d. School. In view of the central position of the law, synagogues are also places of teaching and learning. They either serve as schools or contain schoolrooms where children may receive instruction in addition to that given by their parents. Schools may at times be adjacent to the synagogues but they are usually associated. Rabbis, too, study in the synagogues, which Philo calls places where virtues are taught.

e. Council House and Place of Assembly. Synagogues serve as places of assembly for communal discussions and meetings to settle public affairs, make announcements, swear oaths, administer punishments, and execute manumissions.

f. Hospice. As well as offering provision for the poor, synagogues are hospices to put up visiting Jews, especially in Jerusalem during the great feasts.

g. Aedes sacrae. Some synagogues are dedicated to civil rulers, and shields, pillars, wreaths, and inscriptions are set up in them in honor of the emperors and to show loyalty to them. In return synagogues have privileges corresponding to aedes sacrae. In times of tension this does not always protect them from disrespect and even desecration. Jews regard their synagogues with pride and commitment. Devout Jews visit them daily, rabbis delight to study and teach in them, and attendance is high on sabbaths and feast days. In view of its OT background the term synagōgḗ takes on great significance, and the synagogue helps Judaism to survive the disaster of A.D. 70.

D. The NT.

I. Assembly. The term synagōgḗ has the sense of "assembly" in the NT only in Acts 13:43 and possibly Jms. 2:2 (a Christian assembly).

II. Congregation. In Acts 9:2 the synagōgaí are congregations of the dispersion under the jurisdiction of Jerusalem. Embracing both sexes, they are the sphere in which Christians first appear (18:26; 19:8-9; 22:19). In Rev. 2:9 and 3:9 pseudo-Jews are called a synagogue of Satan; perhaps those who persecute the church are in view. The phrase does not give a negative accent to the synagogue as such. The antithesis is between the synagogue of Satan and the synagogue or ekklēsía of God. If the NT prefers ekklēsía for the church, this is perhaps because it helps to make a distinction, because synagogue now means primarily the local congregation, because synagogue is more closely tied to the building, and because it focuses on the law rather than on Christ. Furthermore, Gentile circles might well associate synagōgḗ with cultic societies and thus be led into a misunderstanding of the church.

III. The Synagogue in the NT.

1. Relation to Jewish Statements.

a. In the NT the term synagōgḗ denotes mainly the building with perhaps an implication of the congregation as well. The NT bears witness to synagogues in Capernaum, Nazareth, Jerusalem, Damascus, Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth, Ephesus, Philippi, and Salamis, and also to various synagogues in Galilee and Judea. The synagogue is an ancient institution (Acts 15:21) and a place of reading, teaching, preaching, prayer, and almsgiving. proseuchḗ occurs only in Acts 16:13.

b. Further points are that Gentiles might build synagogues (Lk. 7:5), that there are seats in them, that healings take place in them, and that sentences are read and scourgings administered in them.

2. The Attitude of Jesus to the Synagogue.

a. Jesus often teaches and preaches in synagogues. Even if the geography is loose and the references come in redactional passages, there is no reason to doubt the truth of this. Jesus also eats with sinners, uses an authoritative "I say to you," and proclaims the message of the kingdom. Yet he confronts the people with his teaching in the synagogues (Mk. 1:21ff.; Lk. 4:15; Mt. 9:35). If his healings are mostly outside, he also heals in the synagogues (cf. Mk. 1:21ff.); it is in the synagogue that the first battle between demonic forces and the Holy One of God takes place (Mk. 1:23ff.).

b. Jesus attacks the misuse of the synagogue by the scribes and Pharisees; cf. their ambition and desire for recognition (Mk. 12:39). He does not censure prayer in the synagogue or temple as such, but only prayer that is hypocritically offered for the sake of effect (Mk. 6:5).

c. Attacks on the synagogue as such occur in Mk. 13:9; Mt. 10:17; 23:34; Lk. 12:11; 21:12, where the future persecution of those who confess Christ is in view. The sharpest antithesis is in Mt. 23:34. Discipleship means punishment in the synagogue, but also the opportunity of confession (Lk. 12:11) and witness (Mk. 13:9). The synagogue is treated with some reserve in John (cf. the reduced prominence of the term, the use of aposynágōgos, and the polemical edge in Jn. 18:20; Jesus has taught publicly in synagogues and the temple where Jews come together).

3. The Synagogue in Primitive Christian Mission. The synagogue is a most important factor in the missionary work in Acts. Paul, who formerly persecutes in the synagogues (Acts 22:19; 26:11), preaches first in the synagogues (Acts 9:19 etc.). By way of them, and the proselytes and God-fearing Gentiles in them, he gathers the churches. Theologically this denotes continuity between Israel and the church in salvation history. Paul gives precedence to Israel, but when rejected he goes to the Gentiles. He does not restrict his work to the synagogues (Acts 14:6ff.), and very quickly the infant church becomes independent of the synagogue either by expulsion or separation (Acts 19:9). In his synagogue preaching Paul's main aim is to show from the OT that Jesus is the Christ (Acts 9:20; 18:5), thus evoking a response either of faith or of rejection and blasphemy (14:1-2; 19:9). There is no suggestion in Acts that he preaches freedom from the law.

IV. Acts 6:9 and Jms. 2:2. Debate continues as to whether the synagōgḗ of Acts 6:9 is a building or a congregation. A rabbinic reference to the sale of "the synagogue of the Alexandrians" supports the former view, but the context favors the latter; conflict is caused by the members. Another dispute is whether Acts

6:9 refers to one synagogue or many. Since there are many synagogues in Jerusalem (cf. Acts 24:12) organized along territorial or social lines, two (or possibly five) synagogues seem to be at issue in Acts 6:9. Jms. 2:2 is the one instance where synagṓgḗ is used in a Christian sense, either for the place of meeting or the meeting itself (but not the community; cf. 5:14). The references to coming in and to seating suggest the building, but the place and the meeting merge into one another, and meeting is the more common sense in the apostolic fathers (cf. the Vulgate rendering conventus).

E. The Early Church.

1. The secular sense of gathering or collection persists (cf. 1 Clem. 20.6 and Clement of Alexandria Stromateis 6.2.1 [collection of books]).

2. In the early church the synagōgḗ is mostly the Jewish building and the use is polemical. Thus in Justin Dialogue 16.4 the synagogue is the place where Jews curse Christians and in Jerome Commentary on Isaiah 8.21 it is the place where they blaspheme Christ. For Tertullian, then, synagogues are the founts of persecution (Scorpiace 10.10). Christians who attend them come under threat of judgment or excommunication (Apostolic Constitutions 2.61.1-2; 8.47.65). Chrysosotom goes to extremes in calling synagogues robber caves and comparing them to theaters (Against the Jews 1.3ff.). The sad result is that from the fourth century on, Christians attack and destroy synagogues, secure legislation to prevent their repair or rebuilding, and even carry through at times the forcible conversion of synagogues into churches.

3. A new usage in the early church is that synagōgḗ denotes Judaism as a whole in antithesis to the church. Here again the intention is mostly polemical. Jerome has the series “law and gospel, synagogue and church, Jewish and Christian people, Gehenna and kingdom of heaven” (Commentary on Jeremiah 5.2), and Augustine equates ecclesia with the calling together of men and synagōgḗ with the rounding up of cattle (Expositions of the Psalms 81.1).

4. Yet we still find synagōgḗ used for Christian meetings and places of meeting, and even for the church as a whole (cf. Ignatius Polycarp 4.2; Irenaeus Against Heresies 4.31.1-2 where the two synagogues are the church and the true Judaism of the OT).

1. This word, which is rare in secular Greek, has much the same sense as the simple form, i.e., gathering or collecting.

2. The LXX gives the term an eschatological note in 2 Macc. 2:7-8, where it refers to the final gathering of dispersed Israel (cf. also the verb in 1:27).

3. The eschatological orientation persists in the two NT references. Thus in 2 Th. 2:1 episynagōgḗ and parousía introduce the eschatological teaching that follows. The object of the epí is the returning Lord; it is to meet him that his people is assembled. The sense is harder to fix in Heb. 10:25. The meaning seems to be either the assembled congregation or the assembling, but the cultic character is plain. The point is not leaving the community, but failing to attend its gatherings, which are so necessary in view of the approaching day. The specific reason for the warning is not given. Believers might have been taking part in other gatherings or failing to attend due to pride, fear of persecution, or flagging zeal.

1. This term occurs in connection with pagan cults and guilds. The function of the archisynágōgos (who is an official of the god on one inscription) is that of the president (also at times the founder as well) who convenes and leads the assembly.

2. The term has more importance in the Jewish synagogue than the pagan society or guild. The rights of ownership and administration are vested in the congregation, which is the same as the community in Palestine. In purely Jewish communities a board of seven handles synagogue affairs; in mixed communities, or where there is more than one synagogue, a board of three. The officers of the synagogue are the servant and the president. Presidents are highly regarded and are often members of the board. They preside at worship, and see to the erection and care of the building. They are elected for a term and may be reelected. The office often remains in the same family. Normally each synagogue has only one president; the reference in Acts 13:15 is perhaps to members of the board.

3. The term occurs in the NT only in Mark (5:22, 35, 36, 38) and Luke (Lk. 8:49; 13:14; Acts 13:15; 18:8, 17). The ruler is also the árchōn in Lk. 8:41 (cf. v. 49), but cf. Acts 14:2. Named rulers are Jairus, Crispus, and Sosthenes (perhaps the Sosthenes of 1 Cor. 1:1) (Mk. 5:22; Acts 18:8, 17). The duties of rulers are the same as in outside records. Thus the ruler protests in Lk. 13:14, and the rulers ask Paul and Barnabas for a word of exhortation in Acts 13:15.

4. There are only isolated references in the early church. Justin Dialogue 137.2 complains that synagogue rulers teach Jews to mock Christ, and Epiphanius Heresies 30.18.2 says that Jewish Christians also have synagogue rulers.

1. This term occurs only in John. There are various degrees of discipline in the synagogue, although the distinctions are doubtful in NT times. For various offenses, e.g., opposing teachers, witnessing against Jews in Gentile courts, or spurning the law, a 30-day suspension is imposed which restricts dealings with others and demands certain penitential observances. A sharper suspension, imposed by the court, further restricts contact, but since it is designed to correct and convert, it does not mean permanent exclusion. aposynágōgos, however, is complete excommunication, i.e., not just barring of entry to the building or meeting, nor merely exclusion from the local community, but expulsion from the national fellowship. This alone corresponds to Christ's claim and the radical nature of the decision involved. At issue is the fundamental cleavage that issues in anathematizing. As the rabbis put it, heretics are worse than Gentiles. They are shut off from all saving benefits, and true Jews are to have no dealings with them. Jewish Christians fall in this category. The Johannine passage anticipates the relations at the end of the first century A.D. when anathematizing of this type is documented. Qumran, too, imposes irrevocable excommunication as well as temporary suspension, not for errors in belief, but for transgressions of the law and breaches of discipline.

2. In the NT, aposynágōgos occurs in Jn. 9:22; 12:42; 16:2. In 9:22 the parents of the blind man are swayed by the threat of excommunication. In 12:42 the fear of expulsion causes many rulers to be secret believers instead of confessors. In 16:2 Jesus warns the disciples that the time will come when they will be put out of the synagogues and even persecuted to death. No mere suspension is in view but total anathematizing and expulsion. [W. SCHRAGE, VII, 798-852] synathléō* → athléō; synaichmálōtos → aichmálōtos; synakolouthéō → akolouthéō; synanákeimai → *keímai

synanameígnymi [mixing together, intermingling]

1. Like the simple form, this compound means "mixing together"; the passive denotes various forms of human "intermingling."

2. In the OT it refers especially to the intermingling with other peoples by which national purity is forfeited (Hos. 7:8); the same is true in Philo.

3. In the NT the only three instances are in 1 Cor. 5:9, 11 and 2 Th. 3:14. In all three it refers to dealings with believers whose conduct compromises the community. The aim in 1 Cor. 5 (cf. vv. 6ff.) is the avoidance of pollution, while restoration by shaming is the goal in 2 Th. 3:14. The term is not a technical one for association only within the community, and it occurs only in prohibitions. 1 Cor. 5:11 gives precision by adding that believers are not to eat with such people, probably with a eucharistic reference. What the "noting" of 2 Th. 3:14 signifies is not wholly clear, but the breaking off of relations does not rule out fraternal warnings. [H. GREEVEN, VII, 852-55]

synarmologéō [to fit together]

1. This compound has the sense of "joining" or "fitting together."

2. It occurs in the NT in Eph. 2:21, where the church is compared to a temple which has Christ as the cornerstone in whom the structure is joined together. It also occurs in Eph. 4:16. Here the church is a body, and all its parts, with their different ministries and tasks, are mutually joined and knit together, and thus achieve growth in love, as they derive their life from Christ. [C. MAURER, VII, 855-56]

sýndesmos [bond]

A. Secular Usage. The sýndesmos is the "middle thing" that serves as a "link," "joint," "loop," or "bond," and in grammar "conjunction." Special meanings are "chain," "cable," or "halter." In Plato the term takes on special significance as the mediation or union that overcomes cosmic dualism. Figuratively for Aristotle it refers to "children" as the bond between father and mother. In rhetoric it may be a "connecting word," and physiologically it is the "joint" or "muscle."

B. The Jewish-Greek Sphere.

1. The term has no special nuance in the LXX but is simply used for "connection," "joint," "yoke," or "bond."

2. In the Epistle of Aristeas 85 it is an architectural feature and in 285 an indissoluble bond.

3. Philo uses the word when allegorizing the four parts of the incense offering as the four elements of water, earth, fire, and air. It is also for him a grammatical term.

C. The NT. The general sense of "bond" occurs in a figurative sense in Acts 8:23: Simon Magus is in the bond of iniquity. The tendon or muscle (figuratively with sinew) is the point in Col. 2:19. Eph. 4:3ff. refers to the "bond" of peace, and Col. 3:14 to love as the "bond" of perfectness. Here the sýndesmos brings harmony, as in Plato, but soteriologically rather than cosmologically. No link is documented between either Plato and Gnostic sýndesmnos teaching or the latter and Ephesians and Colossians. Ephesians and Colossians define mediation as peace, and within the community of faith they find unity in the one God, the one Spirit, and the one faith.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. Barn. 3.3ff. uses the word in a quotation from Is. 58:6ff., and Ignatius Trallians 3.1 compares presbyters to the council of God and the band of apostles. [G. FITZER, VII, 856-59]

synédrion [council, Sanhedrin]

A. Classical and Hellenistic Greek.

1. Secular Greek. This term means "place of assembly," then "session," "council," "governing body."

2. Jewish-Hellenistic Literature.

a. In the LXX the word means "assembly" (cf. Prov. 22:10; 26:26; Ps. 26:4).

b. Philo uses the term in both a literal and a transferred sense (place of rest for the mind or soul).

c. Josephus uses the term for "assembly," "council," "governing body," especially the supreme Jewish council in Jerusalem.

B. The Jewish Sanhedrin.

1. History. Priests and elders govern the postexilic community. Priestly nobles and heads of clans become an aristocratic senate in Jerusalem with the high priest as president. The Hasmoneans curtail the rights of this body. The Pharisees achieve a place in it in 76-67 B.C. The term synédrion first appears for it under the Roman governor Gabinius, who sets up five synédria. The Jerusalem council regains control of the whole land under Caesar, and synédrion comes to be used specifically for the Jerusalem senate. Herod packs the body with supporters, but under the procurators it regains some influence until the disaster of the Jewish war. Later the newly constituted synédrion at Jabneh consists only of rabbis and has no political functions.

2. Composition. The Sanhedrin seems to have had 71 members (based on Num. 11:16). The high priest as leader of the people presides. The Sadducean chief priests form a solid faction. Alongside them are the elders, drawn from influential lay families, who are also Sadducean in persuasion. The scribes form a third group whose influence steadily grows so that their agreement is needed in important matters. Both Josephus and the NT usually put the chief priests first when enumerating members. With them we find either scribes, elders, scribes and elders, or Pharisees. Only rarely are the chief priests not mentioned (cf. Mt. 26:57), and at times they may even represent the whole body (Mk. 14:10; Mt. 26:59).

3. Powers. As the supreme council the Sanhedrin governs all secular and religious matters and has the power to try capital cases and impose sentence. Herod takes over de facto control. After A.D. 6 the Sanhedrin has authority only in Judea, and the Roman procurator (based in Caesarea) has governing power. He allows the Sanhedrin to deal only with religious matters and restricts its right to impose the capital sentence to pagan violations of the temple precincts. Yet the Sanhedrin does impose the death penalty in a few other cases, including James the Lord's brother. The Sanhedrin reclaims the right to pass capital sentences on the outbreak of the Jewish war, and the Zealots make gruesome use of this power during their reign of terror.

4. Sanhedrins outside Jerusalem. Little courts patterned on the Sanhedrin have local jurisdiction in Palestine and the dispersion. These courts meet twice a week and claim the right to pass death penalties, although frequent use is discouraged, and in fact the Romans do not permit it. The Essene fellowship exercises its own jurisdiction, and Qumran, too, has its own penal code.

C. The NT.

1. The Gospels.

a. Sayings of Jesus. In Mt. 10:17 Jesus warns his disciples to expect persecution from the sanhedrins, in this case the local courts, to whom they are at first subject. In Mt. 5:21-22 those who insult others must answer to the Sanhedrin, here the supreme court in Jerusalem. The insulting word is just as bad as the deed of murder that falls under the Sanhedrin's condemnation.

b. Jesus before the Sanhedrin. The Jerusalem Sanhedrin resolves to arrest and execute Jesus when a favorable opportunity comes (Mk. 14:1-2; Jn. 11:47ff.). After the arrest Jesus appears before the hastily summoned chief priests, elders, and scribes (Mk. 14:53), and when the false witnesses fail to make their point, the high priest puts the question which leads to his condemnation for blasphemy (Mk. 14:61ff.). It may be noted that the proceedings at many points do not conform to later rules (cf. the time and place of meeting and the definition of blasphemy), but the Sadducees are not necessarily bound by Pharisaic rulings that are in any case later than the time of Jesus. The only serious problem arises out of the long-standing prohibition of legal proceedings on sabbaths and feast days and the related days of preparation. What probably takes place is that the members of the Sanhedrin, united in hostility to Jesus, hold a brief hearing and then hand Jesus over to Pilate for trial and execution by the Romans as a revolutionary. A prior interrogation also takes place in the house of Annas (Jn. 18:12ff.), but the decisive proceedings are before Pilate, who under pressure cooperates with the Jewish court to secure the elimination of Jesus.

2. Acts. In Acts the synédrion is the supreme council in Jerusalem whose Sadducean members persecute believers, while the Pharisees are more favorable (cf. 5:17, 34ff.). The Sanhedrin first dismisses Peter and John with a warning (4:5ff.) and then lets them go with a beating and a command to be silent (5:17ff.). The trial of Stephen, however, ends with a riot and stoning (6:8-8:1). When Paul has to answer to the Sanhedrin in 23:1ff., he causes dissension and gains the support of the Pharisees. The Romans protect Paul from any further appearance before the Sanhedrin (23:26ff.). Since he is a Roman citizen, the Sanhedrin must accuse him before the procurator.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. Only Ignatius uses synédrion, and in each of the three instances in his epistles it simply means "council" (Magnesians 6.1; Trallians 3.1; Philadelphians 8.1). [E. LOHSE, VII, 860-71]

synergós [fellow worker, helper], synergéō [to work with, help]

A. The Group in Greek. The word synergós means "fellow worker" or "helper," synergéō means "to work with," and the more common synergázomai refers to the sharing of work or cooperation.

B. The Group in Judaism.

1. The verb and noun occur only four times in the LXX, three of which are in 1 and 2 Maccabees.

2. Philo refers to the cooperation of reason, but also to that of companions, or of all parts of the soul, in sin. The plastic arts help to seduce to idolatry. The human mind does not understand the working together of cosmic forces, and no one can cooperate with God in imparting true knowledge or in the work of creating and preserving the world. Yet Philo seems to suggest that subordinate powers help in the creation of our physical side and its vices.

3. Josephus uses the formula "with God's help," and he says that God was helpful to Jehoshaphat because he was just and pious.

4. A similar synergistic saying occurs in Test. Iss. 3:7-8.

5. There are no real originals in the OT nor do we find much help at Qumran, although here, too, there are synergistic passages.

C. The Group in the NT.

1. In the NT the noun occurs 13 times (always plural), 12 times in Paul and once in 3 Jn. 8. Paul uses it to describe pupils and companions who aid him in his work, adding "in Christ" in Rom. 16:3, 9. He honors his fellow workers by using the term and strengthens their authority. Where he includes himself (2 Cor. 1:24 and cf. Col. 4:11), his point is that they are all God's helpers and are thus workers in God's kingdom. In 1 Cor. 3:9 synergoí corresponds to diákonoi in 3:5 (cf. 1 Th. 3:2). The verb synergéō occurs five times, three in Paul and once each in Jms. 2:22 and Mk. 16:20. In 1 Cor. 16:16 it refers to work on behalf of the church. By preaching the gospel his helpers share with Paul the burden of his ministry of reconciliation. Along the lines of Is. 43:24 they thus share ground they can claim obedience but as helpers of the church's joy, not as lords. Rom. 8:28 might seem to be synergistic if taken as the expression of an optimistic philosophy whereby those who love God have the supreme good and hence can suffer no real hurt. In context, however, election is the dominant theme. Human love is the gift and reflection of God's prior love. God, then, is the true subject in v. 28; he helps for good in all things, or turns all things to good, for the called who love him.

2. Jms. 2:22 seems to be refuting misunderstandings of Paul. Faith works together with works; it achieves visibility and hence fulfilment in them.

3. In 3 Jn. 8 the readers, by receiving and aiding itinerant missionaries, become partners in the common ministry by proclaiming the truth.

4. In Mk. 16:20 the absolute genitives describe the Lord's working with the apostles by confirming their message with signs. The verse expresses faith in the Lord's enduring presence and bears witness to the interrelation of word and sign.

D. The Group in Early Christianity. In Hermas Similitudes 5.6.6 the sárx is the handmaiden of the spirit cooperating in the work of redemption. In Acts of Thomas 24 God's grace works with the apostle's labor. Justin Dialogue 142.2 speaks of God's permission and cooperation, and Apology 9.4 refers to fatal cooperation in idolatry. [G. BERTRAM, VII, 871-76]

synérchomai → érchomai; sýnesis, synetós → syníēmi synéchō [to hold together, enclose, oppress], synochḗ [holding together, prison, affliction] synéchō.

1. Greek Usage.

a. This word means first "to hold together," e.g., law upholding the state, or deity the cosmos, or virtues the world.

b. Then we find the meaning "to enclose" or "to lock up," e.g., an army behind walls, or a prisoner, and once for holding one's breath.

c. Another sense is "to oppress," "to overpower," "to rule," e.g., of afflictions, illnesses, emotions, or impulses.

2. The LXX.

a. The term occurs 48 times in the LXX, usually in the three main Greek senses. b. The main Hebrew equivalent is ʿṣr, which is mostly rendered synéchō, but which normally occurs only in 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, and 1 and 2 Chronicles. Usually synéchō as a translation means "to enclose," but the Hebrew is rich in nuances which the Greek captures only when restraint is in view.

c. The sense "to hold together" is rare.

d. synéchō also represents other Hebrew originals in various senses of enclosing or shutting (up).

e. The meaning "to oppress" occurs only in Job and Wisdom, and once each in Jeremiah and 4 Maccabees, either with no Hebrew original or in very free renderings.

3. Later Jewish Literature.

a. In Testaments of the Twelve synéchō mostly means "to oppress."

b. Philo often uses the verb for "to hold together" in physiological or cosmological references. Thus he says that invisible forces hold the world together—a view that reflects Stoic influence.

4. The NT.

a. Common only in Luke and Acts (nine times), synéchō has for Luke the meaning "to close" in Acts 7:57, "to hold prisoner" in Lk. 22:63, and "to surround," "to hem in" in Lk. 8:45 and 19:43.

b. Sickness is said to "oppress" in Lk. 4:38 (cf. Mt. 4:24). A transferred sense ("to be gripped [by fear]") occurs in Lk. 8:37. The meaning "to be claimed or controlled" occurs in Acts 18:5. The love of Christ "controls" or "dominates" Paul in 2 Cor. 5:14, so that he has to live for Christ and not for self. In Phil. 1:23 the thought is perhaps that Paul is governed by two things and hence hemmed in. Lk. 12:50 has caused much debate. The reference to death suggests the translation: "How troubled or pressed I am!" but the saying about fire in v. 49 suggests: "How I am totally governed by this!" The saying expresses Jesus' movement to vicarious death. Like the fire that he has come to kindle, this is the beginning of the new aeon; hence its total claim on him.

5. The Apostolic Fathers. Under Hellenistic influence synéchō means "to hold together" in 1 Clem. 20.5. In Diog. 6.7, as the soul is enclosed in the body yet holds it together, so it is with Christians in the world. In Romans 6.3 Ignatius asks for understanding of what dominates or constrains him in Paul's sense.

1. Greek Usage. The noun synochḗ has such meanings as "holding together," "oppression," and "prison." We find it for the "press" of battle and astrologically for cosmic misfortunes (eclipses etc.) and hence for the resultant "anxiety" or "despair."

2. The LXX. The word is rare in the LXX, and in Jer. 52:5 and Mic. 4:14 it means "affliction." This is the main sense in later renderings of the Psalms, although once these use the term for "prison."

3. The NT. In the NT there are two instances. In 2 Cor. 2:4 Paul is clearly speaking about the "affliction" suffered through hostility at Corinth. In Lk. 21:25 the reference seems to be to the "anxiety" caused by stellar signs that forebode disaster, although believers, of course, need not be afraid, since they know that these signs indicate the closeness of their redemption.

4. The only instance in the apostolic fathers is in Did. 1.5, where the word means "prison" in a free quotation of Mt. 5:25-26. [H. KÖSTER, VII, 877-87]

syntháptō* → *sýn - metá

syníēmi [to understand], sýnesis [understanding], synetós [understanding], asýnetos [not understanding]

A. The Group in Secular Greek.

1. The verb syníēmi means "to bring together," "to come to agreement," "to perceive," "to understand."

2. The noun sýnesis means "union," "confluence," then "comprehension," "understanding," "discernment," and finally "self-awareness."

3. The adjective synetós means "understanding" or "understandable." asýnetos for "not understanding" has at times a moral tinge.

B. The Group in the OT. The LXX makes much use of the group, especially in Wisdom writings. The use is similar to that in the Greek world except that understanding is native only to God and hence is a gift for which one must pray (1 Kgs. 3:9; Ps. 119:34). Practical judgment rather than theoretical understanding is the main concern, its organ is the heart (Is. 6:9-10), and its objects are God's works (Ps. 28:5), fear (Prov. 2:5), righteousness (2:9), will (Ps. 111:10), and wisdom (Prov. 2:1 ff.). Earlier the appeal for understanding is motivated by a reference to God's will, later by a reference to the law.

C. The Group in Judaism.

1. Qumran. The Qumran sect seeks understanding in its candidates, but again this comes from God, to whom alone it is native. The sect experiences election in its insight into God's acts in history, into predestination, and into the eschatological sequence. Since understanding God's judgments is a condition of salvation, the law is an essential theme. The Spirit has an important role in imparting knowledge, but so, too, does the teacher of righteousness.

2. Rabbinic Writings. The situation is similar in the rabbis but with a slight shift to more stress on perception and reason.

D. The Group in the NT.

1. Forms of the Verb. With the traditional forms of -iēmi we also find the conjugation in -ō with some vacillation in the manuscripts.

2. Theological Significance. The group is not theologically significant and does not occur in the Johannine material (including Revelation). The OT governs the sense (cf. the many OT quotations in which the group occurs).

3. The Synoptists.

a. In Mt. 11:25 and Lk. 10:21 synetós is parallel to sophós in a saying that expresses the contingent and paradoxical nature of revelation. In Mk. 7:14 the verb simply denotes understanding. In Mk. 12:33 (cf. v. 30) there is perhaps a slight Hellenistic nuance.

b. In Mk. 4:12 and parallels the term comes in a free rendering of Is. 6:9-10, whose point is that failure to understand is God's purpose. In the version in Mt. 13:10ff. syníēmi achieves great prominence (occurring also in v. 19 and v. 23). If the emphasis is now on human incapacity rather than divine purpose, the point remains that understanding is a divine gift and hardening a divine ineluctability.

4. Paul. Paul uses the group in OT quotations and allusions but only a few times independently. The noun occurs in 1 Cor. 1:19, though here sophía is the main term. In Rom. 1:21 the organ of understanding is the heart, and lack of understanding is total darkness with moral implications (cf. the "base mind" of 1:28). 2 Cor. 10:12-13 comes with a shorter and a longer (probably more authentic) reading; only the longer includes the group, but the point of the passage does not depend on its presence. If Colossians and Ephesians are Pauline, one should add sýnesis in Col. 2:2 (cf. also Eph. 5:7 and 2 Tim. 2:7, where the Lord gives sýnesis). In Col. 2:2 the heart is the organ and the divine mystery (defined christologically here, but ecclesiologically in Eph. 3:4) is the object.

E. The Group in the Early Church. The noun has a Stoicizing aspect in 1 Clem. 33.3. Hermas likes the word sýnesis and personifies it. Justin and Clement of Alexandria often use the group, but sýnesis never achieves the importance of lógos or sophía. [H. CONZELMANN, VII, 888-96] synístēmi [to put together], synistánō [to be composed of]

1. synístēmi has the sense of putting together with the nuances a. "to be composed of," b. "to exist," "to be," c. "to associate," d. "to commend," and e. "to display."

2. In Lk. 9:32 Peter and John see the two men standing with Jesus on the Mount. In 2 Pet. 3:5 the reference is to water in the composition of the earth. Significant theologically is the statement in Col. 1:17 that Christ is before all things and all things consist or have their existence in him. Paul uses the transitive syníēmi mostly for "to commend" (cf. Rom. 16:1; 2 Cor. 3:1). His own commendation is his public proclamation of the truth (2 Cor. 4:2) in which he spends himself as the servant of Christ and hence has no self-concern. He will not compare himself with those who commend themselves (2 Cor. 10:12), for it is those whom the Lord commends that are accepted (v. 18). The idea of "presenting" may be seen in 2 Cor. 3:1ff., as well as in Rom. 3:5, where our wickedness serves to show God's truth. Similarly, in Rom. 5:8 God shows and commends his love in Christ's vicarious death. In 2 Cor. 6:4 there is more of the sense "to prove" (cf. 7:11), and this is plainly the meaning in Gal. 2:18, where the proof rests on patent facts. For Paul, acts are determinative in both divine or human judgment. This makes of God's saving act in Christ a miracle that governs his whole understanding of the gospel. [W. KASCH, VII, 896-98]

sýnoida [to be aware, share knowledge], syneídēsis [consciousness, conscience]

A. Secular Greek.

1. sýnoida emautṓ.

a. sýnoida is first of all knowing something with someone.

b. sýnoida emautṓ combines in one the person who knows and the person who shares the knowledge.

c. In philosophy evaluation enters in when people, reflecting on themselves, achieve awareness of their own ignorance in a conflict of knowledge (cf. Socrates, who as the wisest of men realizes his own ignorance).

d. When reflection extends to deeds, conscience arises in the moral sense. The process is still rational, but the matter assessed is now moral. Usually the verdict is negative. The matter assessed is either not given or indicated neutrally. At times it may be stated that there is no awareness of evil, or a positive assertion (rather than self-evaluation) occurs.

e. Thus sýnoida emautṓ comes to be linked with a bad conscience, although self-awareness as such remains a rational process and neither philosophically nor ethically does the conscience have much to do with deity.

2. syneidós, syneídēsis, sýnesis.

a. The first two of these terms occur sporadically and with no fixed sense from the fifth to the third century B.C. Often it is debatable whether a moral awareness of bad deeds is at issue, and there is no clear indication that conscience comes from God or is divine.

b. By the first century B.C. syneidós and syneídēsis frequently denote conscience and almost always in the sense of a bad conscience. sýneidos is especially common in Plutarch, who vividly depicts the conscience that shares our knowledge, uncomfortably reminds us of our offenses, and evokes the torments of hell until it is set aside by amendment.

c. The two nouns, which outstrip sýnesis, mean much the same thing, although syneídēsis can still mean self-consciousness in a nonmoral sense, thus reminding us that the terms relate only secondarily to the phenomenon of the bad conscience.

3. The Problem of Conscience.

a. In conscience two egos are in juxtaposition in the same person, knowing and evaluating the same things from different angles, and controlled by two opposing forces, i.e., that of order on the one hand, that of disorder on the other. Conflict begins with the knowledge of past disorder, so that conscience relates more to evaluation of the past than to preparation for the future. Where the stress is ontological, knowledge predominates in self-reflection, but where it is ethical, moral conscience is to the fore. The two strands are historically and materially related.

b. The idea of the Furies reflects moral conscience in ancient Greece, but in the fifth century B.C. humanity becomes its own measure and the moral sense emerges, as seen especially in Euripides.

c. Socratic reflection has to do with knowledge; it points the way to victory over ignorance by awareness of it, but on the basis of sharing in the divine Logos. The Socratic daimónion relates to approaching decisions rather than past acts, and hence is not the same as conscience.

d. Stoics seek harmony with their own nature and hence have no conscience in the morally bad sense. Epictetus, however, once equates syneidós with the epítropos, the divinely appointed overseer of individuals in their moral and intellectual decisions; he thus extends the reach of conscience to the sphere of positive guidance.

cf. confer, compare

i.e. id est, that is

e. In Hellenistic philosophy exercises in meditation, designed to promote self-development, include self-examinations which bring the moral conscience into the area of practical deliberation, although not under the terms syneidós, syneídēsis, or conscientia.

f. Gnosticism solves the problem of conscience by dualistically separating the two egos, putting one in the world of light, the other in that of darkness, and thus opening the door to asceticism, but also libertinism.

g. The secular history of the group is thus complex. Understanding the polarity of the person forms the starting point. This yields the idea of self-consciousness but then in its moral application the sense of the (usually bad) conscience. Since conscience is readily apprehended, popular usage adopts it, but in Greek thinking conscience always includes the idea of self-consciousness. Hence no uniform usage or concept develops.

B. Latin. Cicero and Seneca frequently use the terms conscius and conscientia. The idea is that of knowing with others, and when this is a knowing with the self, self-consciousness is the point. If a reference to past deeds arises, the Romans with their strict attachment to duty find it easier to think of a neutral or good conscience. The self-consciousness may act as a witness but is more likely an applauding or dissatisfied spectator. Seneca combines the Stoic watcher with conscience and thus prepares the ground for the elevation of conscience to a norm.

C. The OT.

I. The Hebrew Text.

1. Oddly the OT has no word for conscience. The covenant relation to God governs the people. Knowledge of self comes from God by his word (Ps. 139). This word, which makes responsible action possible, is very close (Dt. 30:14). Good and evil are known by it. Denial of God is folly (Ps. 14:1). Listening to God is self-reflection, and conscience is a willing adherence in the harmony of the I with the divine will.

2. Inner Discord. The OT recognizes inner discord (Gen. 42:21; 1 Sam. 24:5; 25:31). It does so on the divine plane of judgment and forgiveness. God's word is decisive in the inner controversy. It condemns but also liberates by pardon and renewal (Ps. 51), by personal and not just cultic cleansing.

II. The LXX.

1. sýnoida emautṓ occurs once in the LXX, and syneídēsis three times. The former is a free rendering in Job 27:6. syneídēsis is a mistranslation in Eccl. 10:20, and it simply means "knowledge" in the variant reading in Sir. 42:18. A morally bad conscience is at issue in Wis. 17:10. Garbed in legal concepts, it acts as prosecutor and judge.

2. The Hebrew idea of the "clean heart" leads to the development of the notion of a good conscience. This idea plays a bigger role in the LXX than in the MT.

D. Judaism.

1. The Rabbis and Qumran. The rabbis and Qumran have no word for conscience. We find the ideas of the good or bad heart and the good or evil impulse, but beyond the antitheses human unity remains.

2. The Pseudepigrapha. These writings follow the LXX line and make no new contribution. The heart accuses of sin, but there may also be purity of heart.

OT Old Testament

LXX Septuagint

MT Masoretic Text

3. Josephus. For Josephus the verb has an intellectual thrust. Conscience may be bad or good. It is, with God, a witness whom one must fear. As regards syneídēsis, it may simply mean "consciousness" or "knowledge," but sometimes it carries the sense of "conscience." With God himself and the law, conscience is for Josephus a witness for resurrection after death.

4. Philo.

a. Usage. Philo uses the middle voice of the verb in the moral sense. synédēsis refers to knowledge of one's acts. The word for conscience is syneidós. Unless qualified as pure, this is always a bad conscience.

b. The Task of Conscience. Conscience accuses, threatens, and judges. Yet it also corrects and advises conversion, being placated when heeded.

c. The Theological Context. Conscience is a divinely used spur to conversion from sin. Better to be punished than expelled; the penal function of conscience is positive, for it aims at salvation by the gracious God.

d. The Guiding Function of Conscience. Twice Philo refers to conscience as a guide, but only in connection with the noús and the divine Logos.

e. The Position of Philo. Philo uses popular ideas, learns from philosophy, but is decisively influenced by the OT in his use of elénchō, not merely for shaming, censuring, or examining in the Greek sense, but for admonishing and condemning, and in his ascribing to conscience this judicial function, with God behind it as the true accuser and judge. As God works through conscience, its accusatory task is sterner but it is also set in a positive context. Whether Philo is original in this understanding one cannot say, but clearly he combines two types of moral life and thought, that of Hellenism and that of the OT.

E. The NT.

1. General. sýnoida occurs for the guilty knowledge of a second person in Acts 5:2 and with the reflexive pronoun in 1 Cor. 4:4. syneidós does not occur but we find syneídēsis 31 times, mostly in Paul, although not in the sense of the good or bad conscience.

2. Paul.

a. Eight of the Pauline passages occur in relation to idol meats (1 Cor. 8:7ff.; 10:25ff.). Paul is perhaps adopting here a slogan current in the church in Corinth. The conscience is for him a "self-awareness" that is threatened by the disjunction of willing and knowing or of judgment and action. It is not a detached power of evaluation but the self in its own will and action. In Christ encounter with the one true and gracious God both liberates and commits the conscience in this sense. The liberation is for the weak, who, not yet free from idols, do not enjoy the full freedom of acknowledging their own acknowledgment by the one true God. Commitment is for the strong, who, because Christ died for the weak, should acknowledge weakness and therefore accept the weak. The weak, then, must refrain from anxious questioning and the strong from causing offense. In Rom. 13:5 the formula "for the sake of conscience" could mean (a) to avoid the bad conscience that might ensue, (b) out of duty, or (c) because of the link between the state and God's will. As distinct from 1 Cor. 10, Rom. 13 is urging positive obedience, not under pressure, but in a unity of act and self-awareness. Hence, in the light of v. 6, explanation (c) is to be preferred. Believers are to estimate the state solely as God's servant. 1 Pet. 2:19 is to the same effect.

b. In other passages conscience has a judicial role. In 1 Cor. 4:4 Paul fears no human judgment, only the divine judgment which accepts and liberates him. Hence he glories in the witness of his conscience (2

NT New Testament

v. verse

Cor. 1:12; cf. 1 Jn. 3:19ff.). Because the verdict rests on God's word, the apostle is open to evaluation by the conscience of others (4:2). Conscience has the significance of an oath in Rom. 9:1, but only as governed and confirmed by the Spirit. In Rom. 2:15 the Gentile conscience indicates human responsibility. Conscience has here a judicial function, although it may defend as well as accuse. In general the accusatory role of conscience is weaker in Paul because the law acts as an incomparably sharper accuser, and even the law is set aside by the God who pardons and renews in Christ.

c. For Paul conscience is the central self-consciousness of the knowing and acting person. Various ideas combine in a complex reference to being, act, and knowledge. What holds them together is the new truth that, acknowledged by God in Christ, we can see inner conflicts more sharply yet also set them under the promise of healing.

2. Other Works.

a. The Pastorals. These letters add to syneídēsis such words as "good" or "clear." The clear conscience denotes the total standing of the believer. The gospel aims at a good conscience (1 Tim. 1:5-6). Timothy is to hold a good conscience (1:18-19). A corrupt conscience involves discrepancy between confession and action. The connection with faith shows that the good conscience has to do with the new creation which embraces all life, not just with a blameless conscience in a moralistic sense.

b. Hebrews. In Heb. 10:2, 22 the renewing denoted by baptism has no moral or cultic limitation but embraces the whole person in relationship with God.

c. The good conscience is again a formula for the Christian life in 1 Pet. 3:16, 21. 3:21 perhaps embodies a baptismal formula.

d. A new development in these works is the proclamation of a good conscience as the norm in the sense of inner healing and a new existence by God's act in Christ.

F. The Apostolic Fathers. syneídēsis is a common term in these works, usually with a qualifying attribute, and with a stronger moralizing thrust (cf. 1 Clem. 1.3; 41. 1; Ignatius Trallians 7.2; Did. 4:14; Barn. 19.12; Hermas Mandates 3.4. [C. MAURER, VII, 898-919]

synoikodoméō → oíkos; syntéleia, synteléō → télos

syntríbō [to crush, shatter], sýntrimma [destruction, ruin]

A. The Group in the Greek World.

1. Derivation. Of obscure etymology, tríbos, from tríbō, means a "trodden way," then "intercourse," "circulation."

2. Meaning.

a. Strict Use. syntríbō means "to rub together," "to grind," "to crush," "to smash," "to break," "to destroy."

b. Looser Use. Various things, e.g., fear, anxiety, remorse, disappointment, are said to wear people down or shatter them.

B. The Group in the OT.

1. Hebrew Originals.

a. The Root šbr This root occurs some 145 times in the basic sense "to break." In the LXX syntríbō corresponds 134 times. The terms overlap, although the Hebrew really means "to break in pieces," the Greek "to crush."

b. Other Roots. More than 30 other roots occur. (For details see TDNT, VII, 921.)

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

c. Other Renderings of šbr. Other terms for šbr include apollýō in Is. 14:25, erēmóō in 24:10, thlíbō in Lev. 26:26, and leptýnō in 2 Chr. 23:17.

2. Important LXX Sayings. Sayings that are important in the NT are Ex. 12:10 (cf. Ps. 34:20); Ps. 46:9 (cf. Hos. 2:20); Is. 57:15; Is. 53:5 A; 66:2 Θ.

C. The Group in the NT.

1. OT Quotations and Expressions. In Mt. 12:20 Jesus has not come to break the bruised reed but to gather sinners to himself; the wretched and oppressed are recipients of the promise. In Lk. 4:18 Jesus applies Is. 61:1 to himself, but probably without the phrase about binding up the brokenhearted, although this aptly describes his work. Only Jn. 19:36 finds significance in the fact that the legs of Jesus are not broken on the cross; this denotes his righteousness (Ps. 34:20) and his correspondence to the Passover lamb. Rom. 3:16 uses Is. 59:7 to describe human sinfulness; sýntrimma is both sin and its punishment. The image of smashing Satan in Rom. 16:20 (cf. Gen. 3:15; Ps. 91:13) suggests both present victory over the powers of darkness and the imminent eschatological destruction of Satan. The present triumph is perhaps over the false teachers of v. 17, who are serving Satan. Rev. 2:27 uses the imagery of Ps. 2:9 (cf. Dan. 7:27) to describe the power over the nations that the risen Christ gives to those who overcome and keep his works.

2. Other Passages. Mk. 14:3 refers to the breaking of the vessel at the anointing, Mk. 4:5 says that the spirit gives the demoniac the power to break fetters, and in Lk. 9:39 the spirit shatters the boy. In the last two instances Jesus manifests his power over destructive demonic forces. [G. BERTRAM, VII, 919-25]

synypokrínomai* → hypokrínomai; sýssēmon → sēmeíon; sýssōmos → sṓma; systauróō → sýn - metá; systéllō → stéllō; systenázō → stenázō; systoichéō → stoichéō; systratiṓtēs → *strateúomai spházō [to slaughter, kill], sphagḗ [slaughter, killing] spházō.

A. Secular Usage.

1. Ritual Slaying.

a. Meat Offerings to the Olympian Gods. The word spházō means “to slay,” “to slaughter,” “to kill,” “to murder.” Strictly it refers to the slaying of animals, especially in sacrifice. Ritual slaying takes place after prayer. Experts do it only when the animals are large or those making the offering are of high rank. Inclination of the head supposedly denotes consent. The ox is struck from behind, the neck is then bent back, the throat is slit, and the blood pours out. Boars may first be stupefied. In the case of smaller animals slaying is by cutting the throat with the neck bent back.

b. sphágia. When sacrifices remove curses, or serve as expiation, or the gods or heroes claim the whole animal, the flesh is not eaten and we have sphágia. Shedding the blood is now the main point. The neck is deeply cut and the blood is directed to where the special numen reigns. Human beings may be offered as sphágia in especially dangerous crises in Greece and Rome.

2. Secular Slaying.

a. Animals. Most slaughtering has ritual connections in antiquity. Domestic slaughtering includes simple ceremonies and the dedicating of parts to the gods. Yet a purely secular use of spházō does occur. Indeed, the term is used for the wolf’s slaying of its prey.

b. Humans. The term spházō serves as a gruesome one for killing, e.g., murder of kin, massacres in war, crimes of passion, and suicide.

B. LXX Usage.

1. Ritual Slaying.

a. Animal Sacrifices. In the LXX spházō occurs some 84 times, mostly for ṭbḥ and sḥṭ. It is not a technical term but plays an important role relative to animal offerings. A simple form of (illegitimate) offering occurs in 1 Sam. 14:32ff. In early times meat is eaten only in connection with sacrifice. The blood and various parts are set aside for God; atoning power lies in the blood (Lev. 17:11). The head of the house or a servant does the slaying at home; either individuals or cultic personnel may do it in the sanctuaries. The blood ritual at first demands that the beast be slaughtered over the altar so that the blood may flow on it. When centralizing is achieved, the slaughtering is at the entrance to the sanctuary (Lev. 17:3-4). Animals used in purification and not offered to God are slain outside the camp.

b. Human Sacrifices.

(a) To God. In Gen. 22:10 Abraham lifts the knife to slay Isaac, and in 1 Sam. 15:33 Samuel slays the “dedicated” Agag.

(b) To Idols. Accusations of slaughtering children to idols occur in Ezek. 16: 17ff.; 23:39; Is. 57:5.

2. Secular Slaying.

a. Animals. At first slaughtering is connected with communal offerings, but Dt. 12 allows secular slaughtering, although not the eating of blood.

b. Humans. As in secular Greek, spházō in the LXX can denote the violent killing of others, e.g., the slaughter of the priests of Baal in 1 Kgs. 18:40 or the butchering of the righteous in Ps. 37:14.

C. Philo and Josephus.

1. Philo.

a. Philo rarely uses spházō, but does have it at times for ritual and secular slaying, including murder.

b. Josephus. Josephus uses spházō (also sphắttō) for ritual slaying and also very commonly for human killing in such senses as hewing down, massacring, and butchering, e.g., defenseless populations. Especially abhorrent is human slaughter in the temple.

D. Rabbinic Writings.

1. The rabbis sometimes use the term “to slay” with no ritual reference, e.g., the butchering of rustled cattle.

2. They also lay down strict rules for correct slaughtering either cultic or noncultic. The main point is that the throat should be slit with a single stroke.

E. The NT.

1. spházō, which in the NT occurs only in Johannine works, is a strong term for fratricide (Cain’s murder of Abel) in 1 Jn. 3:12.

2. In Rev. 5:6, 9, 12; 13:8 Jesus is the “slaughtered Lamb.” With a probable reference to the Passover, this term, in figurative paradox, denotes the extreme nature of the offering and its victorious effect. The blood serves as a ransom in 5:9. In 13:3 the beast with its mortal blow is set in contrast. Historically the assassination of Nero might be in view. In Rev. 6:9 the death of martyrs for the sake of the word is compared to the slaughtering of sacrifices. As the blood flows down the altar, so their souls (which the blood represents) are under the altar. The same mode of speech influences Rev. 18:24, and cf. also the horseman of 6:4, who takes away peace that men should slay one another.

1. This word means ritual or secular slaying or slaughtering, the slaying of deer in the hunt, and human slaying. It can also refer to slits or wounds, and in anatomy to the throat.

2. The term occurs 23 times in the LXX for slaying or slaughtering. The image of sheep for slaughter plays a special role (cf. Ps. 44:22; Zech. 11:4, 7, which is directed against those who pitilessly hand over the elect people; Jer. 11:19, where the stress is on the unsuspecting nature of the prophet; Is. 53:7, which states that the servant does not resist or complain; Jer. 12:3, which has the destruction of the wicked in mind).

3. Philo uses sphagḗ cultically, militarily, and ethically. He says that nourishment is given to a certain man as to cattle fattening for slaughter. Josephus has an occasional ritual reference but mostly uses the term for human killing, e.g., killing in battle, political murder, and suicide.

4. The Targum on Is. 53 takes the servant messianically but refers the image of the lamb led to the slaughter to Messiah's judgment on the Gentiles. Ps. 44:22 has great martyrological significance and is also connected with circumcision.

5. Rom. 8:36 uses Ps. 44:22 to describe the situation of the church under external assault. The paradox that the elect community suffers demonstrates rather than negates God's love. In Acts 8:32-33 the eunuch reads Is. 53:7-8 and Philip applies the passage to Jesus. Jms. 5:5 either accuses the rich of feeding on (or for) the day when the poor are slaughtered or warns them that they are feeding on the judgment day when they themselves will be slaughtered.

6. 1 Clem. 16.1ff. quotes the whole of Is. 53:1ff. as an example for the church. Barn. 5.2 quotes Is. 53:5, 7 with reference to salvation by the sprinkling of Christ's blood. Barn. 18.1ff. allegorizes Num. 19: The heifer is Jesus; those who sacrifice it are those who led him to the slaughter. [O. MICHEL, VII, 925-38]

sphragís [seal], sphragízō [to seal], katasphragízō [to seal up]

A. Seal in the Nonbiblical World.

1. Composition. Using seals, which identify things by a sign, figure, letter, or word, is an ancient custom. The term can denote either the instrument that makes the mark or the impression made. Roll seals or seal cylinders are the oldest form. Cultic or mythical figures are cut in the sheath, and the cylinder is rolled on damp clay. Scarabs or rings with scarabs replace cylinders in Egypt. We then find knobs, cones, and cube seals. Christian seals use symbols like the dove, the fish, and the ship. Seals are usually rolled or impressed on damp loam or clay, which is then dried off or baked. In the case of documents, a little clay is placed on them, and the seal is impressed on the clay.

2. Legal Significance. The seal serves as a legal protection and guarantee. It is thus placed on property, on wills, etc. Laws prohibit the misuse of seals, which owners often break just before death. Seals serve as proof of identity. They also protect houses, graves, etc. against violation. Both testator and witnesses seal wills. In Roman law all six witnesses must break their own seals to open the will, and in South Babylonia beneficiaries signify or seal when the inheritance is divided. Seals also serve as accreditation, e.g., of weights and measures. The seal plays an important public role in government. All authorities have seals. The king's seal confers authorization. In both private and public life holding a seal expresses an element of power.

3. Religious Meaning. From early times seals bear the images of deities. They thus have magical significance, conferring divine protection. The sealing of sacrifices has both cultic and legal significance. Later a stamp duty is paid for sealing. Seals are also placed on chapels when not in use to denote their inviolability. The marking of followers of Dionysus with the ivy leaf is called sphragízein.

4. Metaphorical Use. Plato compares the impressions of memory to those made by seals. Aristotle compares the well-articulated sounds of clear voices to sharp impressions made by well-cut seals. In the Orphic Hymn 34.26 the creator's seal is said to be stamped on all creation.

B. Seal in the OT.

1. Meaning.

a. The Hebrew equivalent (ḥtm) occurs 13 times. sphragís also occurs in Ex. 35:22 for "bracelet."

b. The verb ḥtm is the main original of the Greek verbs.

2. Composition. The roll seal comes to Israel from Babylon and the scarab from Egypt. Various figures along with ancient Hebraic characters occur on the seals. Conic and cube seals are also found in excavation. Seal graving is part of the craft of stone cutting.

3. Use and Significance.

a. Although royal seals have not been found in Israel, 1 Kgs. 21:8 mentions their use, and ministers' seals are known. The royal seal would be put on temple doors (cf. the sealing of the lions' den in Dan. 6:18). Joseph has Pharaoh's ring in Gen. 41:42 (cf. Esth. 3:10).

b. Seals make documents legally valid (cf. bills of sale, marriage contracts, the covenant of Neh. 10:1, the book of Is. 29:11).

c. The verb sphragízō can also mean engraving stone or metal (cf. Ex. 28:21; 36:21).

d. Since the contents of sealed vessels etc. are inaccessible, the term sphragízō takes on the sense "to close" (Sir. 22:27; 42:6) and then "to conceal" (Dan. 8:26).

e. Mixed in the seal are the various motifs of authorization, power, legal validity, inviolability, and closure. The OT thus finds for sealing a rich transferred use (cf. Sir. 17:22; Cant. 8:6; Jer. 22:24; Hag. 2:23).

C. Seal in Judaism.

1. Philo develops the figurative use. The powers around God give form as the seal produces many copies. God's word is the original seal. The incorporeal world is the world of ideas or seals. The verb in Philo can mean "to keep under lock and key," but it can also have the sense "to determine" or "to guarantee," and at times the weaker sense "to confirm."

2. Josephus often refers to the seal in an official sense for authorization. The seal denotes authority or offers protection.

3. Judaism often calls circumcision a seal as a mark impressed in the flesh. As a seal it denotes identity and ownership but also suggests power and protection.

D. Seal in the NT.

1. The NT apart from Revelation.

a. The Literal Sense. The group occurs 32 times in the NT, 22 times in Revelation. Only seldom is the reference literal. The tomb of Jesus is sealed in Mt. 27:66, obviously to secure it, though whose seal is used we are not informed. In Rom. 15:28 Paul speaks of handing over the collection under seal, though here the term probably denotes trustworthy transmission (cf. 2 Cor. 8:20-21) rather than literal sealing of the bag.

b. The Transferred Sense. 2 Tim. 2:19 uses sphragís in the sense of "inscription." The word of promise and admonition suggests trustworthiness. In 1 Cor. 9:2 the church itself serves to confirm or validate Paul's apostleship. The meaning "to confirm" occurs in Jn. 3:33: Those who receive the witness confirm that God is true. The same thought occurs in Jn. 6:27: The Father confirms his appointment of the Son to give the food of eternal life. In Rom. 4:11 Paul describes circumcision as a seal, not so much of belonging to God as of restoration to fellowship with God by faith. Circumcision does not replace justification but follows and confirms it; it denotes membership in God's justified people. In 2 Cor. 1:22 the sealing of the Spirit refers to God's making believers his inviolable possession. In Eph. 1:13-14 and 4:30 the Spirit is a pledge of the inheritance and hence the seal by which believers are marked and appointed for redemption. There is no specific reference to baptism, and the main idea is that of the marking of those who belong to God.

2. Revelation.

a. Sealing. In Rev. 22:10 the divine is not to seal his prophecy, i.e., keep it secret. In 20:3 the angel seals the abyss for a thousand years. In 10:4 sealing carries the sense of keeping closed or concealing.

b. The Book with Seven Seals. This book reminds us of Roman law with the seal of the testator and six witnesses. The sealed book is a double document. The one NT instance of katasphragízō occurs in connection with its sealing in 5:1. Only the Lamb can undo this seal. One seal is broken after the other in 6:1ff., and eschatological events move forward with the breaking of the seals.

c. The Sealed. The second angel in 7:2 and 9:4 has God's seal, and he restrains the four angels of destruction until he seals God's servants (7:3), 12,000 from each tribe (7:4ff.). This sealing marks off the people as God's possession and protects them through the terrible events of the end-time. The seal is a sign with distinctive theological significance. It serves both as a literary image and as a mode of speech among believers. The reality takes shape in the figure.

E. Seal in the Postapostolic Age.

1. "Seal" is rare in the apostolic fathers. 1 Clem. 43 (cf. Num. 17:16ff.) uses the word literally. 2 Clem. 7.6 seems to have the Holy Spirit in view. In Barn. 9.6 circumcision is the seal as a secret sign pointing to Christ. In various "seal" passages in Hermas baptism is called a sphragís (Similitudes 8.2-3; 9.16.3ff.). This seal, of course, is invisible; hence the motif of eschatological concealment perhaps plays some part. The idea of baptism as a seal then becomes a common one.

2.a. The seal is an important concept in Gnostic writings. Baptism is a seal, with which the eucharist is associated. The baptismal seal follows instruction and grants partial revelations.

b. The Odes of Solomon refers to the sealing of the abyss (24:7) and the sealing of the faces of God's people (8:15). God's plan of salvation is a sealed letter (cf. Acts of Thomas 111). The seal protects Gnostics as they traverse the various zones or aeons.

c. Mandaean works refer to a sealed letter, to baptismal sealing as a protection against demons, and to the seal as a mark whereby to distinguish initiates. [G. FITZER, VII, 939-53] schḗma [bearing, form], metaschēmatízō [to change, transform] schḗma.

A. Usage outside the NT.

1. General. The term schḗma denotes the outward structure or form that may be known by the senses. The verb schématízō refers to decency in human conduct and can easily bear a special reference to clothing.

2. Specific. Specifically schḗma has such senses as "bearing," "appearance," "look," "features" (plural), "figure" (transferred in dancing), "constitution," "military formation," "manner of life," "dress," "form" (in rhetoric, grammar, geometry, or astronomy), "sketch," "form of a syllogism," "constellation," in a weak sense "state," "condition," or "manner," and occasionally "semblance," "pretext."

3. The LXX. The only LXX instance is in Is. 3:17 for the proud "bearing" of the noble but degenerate women of Jerusalem.

4. Philo makes rich use of the term with the primary sense of what may be known from outside, e.g., forms, artistic or mathematical figures, forms of speech, also human bearing, disposition, posture, or position. He also uses the word for "distinctive character." Thus at the Passover every house takes on the schḗma of a sanctuary.

5. Josephus, too, makes varied use of the term, e.g., for attitude, clothing, outward demeanor, or form.
6. Another use is for “size,” e.g., of Jerusalem in Epistle of Aristeas 105.
7. The term occurs as a loanword in rabbinic works.

B. Usage in the NT. The only instances in the NT are in Phil. 2:7 and 1 Cor. 7:31. The point in Phil. 2:7 is that up to the cross Jesus was in the humanity demonstrated by his earthly form. What is meant is his mode of manifestation, i.e., his whole nature and manner as a man. The outward “bearing” that he assumes corresponds to the inner reality. In 1 Cor. 7:31 Paul advises believers to possess material things as though not possessing them, for the distinctive form of this world is perishing.

metaschēmatízō.

A. The Greek World and Judaism.

1. This word means “to transform, “to alter,” “to change the appearance.”
2. The only LXX instance is in 4 Macc. 9:22 for the transforming of martyrs at death.
3. Philo uses the verb for “to change into a new form.” Josephus has it for changing clothing or disguising as well as transforming.

B. The NT. Paul uses the verb in Phil. 3:21. Believers have the Spirit as an earnest of the consummation, but when Christ comes he will transfigure their present bodies of humiliation into bodies of glory. In 2 Cor. 11:13ff. the verb occurs three times in the middle. Paul’s opponents transform themselves into apostles, but since Satan transforms himself into an angel of light, it is no surprise that his servants disguise themselves as servants of righteousness. In 1 Cor. 4:6 the use is literary. Paul does not mean that he is putting things in a figure of speech but that he is expressing the matter in another form, i.e., showing what the attitude of believers should be from the example of Apollos and himself.

C. The Early Church. In Hermas Visions 5.1 schḗma means “garb,” but there is no other instance of either noun or verb in early writings. [J. Schneider, VII, 954-58]

schízō [to split, divide], schísma [split, division] schízō.

1. Secular Greek.

a. This word means literally “to split,” “to rend,” “to cleave,” “to separate” (milk).
b. Less strongly it means “to divide.”
c. Rarely it refers figuratively to the division of opinion.

2. The LXX.

a. schízō occurs eleven times, mostly for bqʻ (normally rendered rhḗgnymi).
b. The strong meaning “to rend,” “to split,” “to tear apart,” predominates (cf. Ex. 14:21; Is. 48:21).
c. Compounds include anaschízō (ripping up the pregnant, Am. 1:13), diaschízō (Wis. 18:23), and kataschízō (tearing up the books of the law, 1 Macc. 1:56).
d. schízō does not denote division of opinion, but anaschízō is used for separating oneself from the ungodly of the people (Num. 16:21).

3. Later Judaism.

a. The verbs translated by schízō have little theological significance, but the OT verb ḥlq is important for differentiating and also for differing in opinion.
b. Philo seldom uses schízō, and when he does it has the weaker sense “to divide.” In Josephus the term has its harsher ring: Ahijah rends his mantle as God will rend the kingdom (Antiquities 8.207).

4. The NT.

a. In the NT schízō occurs nine times in the Gospels for “to split” or “to rend.” Thus in Mk. 2:21 the patch tears away from the old cloth; the new thing that Jesus brings demands a new form of life.

b. In Mk. 15:38 the temple veil is rent on the death of Jesus. Probably this is the inner curtain and the tearing represents the end of the old cultus and new access to God by Jesus‘ death (Heb. 6:19-20; 9:8; 10:19-20).

c. In Mk. 1:10 heaven is torn open at the baptism of Jesus—a motif in eschatological revelation (cf. Is. 64:1).

d. In Jn. 19:24 the soldiers do not divide Jesus’ robe, and in Jn. 21:11 the net does not break (cf. Lk. 5:6).

e. In Acts 14:4 and 23:7 (the only two instances outside the Gospels) the reference is to the division of opinion caused by Paul’s preaching.

5. The Early Church.

a. An early saying refers to the presence of Christ at the cleaving of wood. In the Gospel of Thomas 77 this suggests pan-Christism, but in its original form the point seems to be that Christ is present with isolated manual workers.

b. In Ignatius Philadelphians 3.3 separation from the bishop is parallel to the Gnostic denial of the suffering of the incarnate Lord.

1. Secular Greek. This rare term means “what is split,” “rift,” “rent,” “cleft.”

2. The LXX. hē schismḗ occurs in the LXX in Jon. 2:6 and Is. 2:19, 21 (“clefts”).

3. Later Judaism. As with the verb ḥlq, the rabbis develop the idea of differences of opinion or controversies (mostly in a bad sense).

4. The NT.

a. In Mk. 2:21 the adding of the patch makes the rent worse.

b. In Jn. 7:43; 9:16; 10:29 the origin, deeds, and words of Jesus cause division among his listeners.

c. The schísmata in 1 Cor. 1-4 seem not to be due to doctrinal differences but to attachments to different leaders. They can be overcome only by unity in the body of Christ and mutual subjection and concern. In 1 Cor. 12:25 discord in the human body symbolizes discord in Christ’s body.

5. The Apostolic Fathers. In 1 Clem. 2.6; Hermas Similitudes 8.9.4 schísmata are grouped with debates and rivalries. Love knows no schísmata (1 Clem. 49.5). Believers are to avoid them (Did. 4.3). Mountain clefts symbolize contentious people (Hermas Similitudes 9.1.7); cf. also splits on branches and cracks in stones (Similitudes 8.1.9-10; 9.6.4). [C. MAURER, VII, 959-64]

sṓzō [to save], sōtēría [salvation], sōtḗr [savior], sōtḗrios [saving] sṓzō, sōtēría.

A. The Greek World.

1. Saving. These terms first refer to salvation (human or divine) from serious peril. Curing from illness is another sense. Horses may save in battle, or night may save an army from destruction, good counsel may save ships, etc. Cities, castles, ships, etc. may be saved as well as people. At times protection may be the meaning, and sōtḗria can have the sense of a “safe return.”

2. Keeping. The meaning at times may be that of keeping alive, e.g., pardoning, protecting, keeping from want, keeping a fire going. Other uses are for keeping wine, goods, and even beards, as well as preserving memory.

3. Benefiting. The idea of rescuing from peril disappears when the idea is that of keeping in good health, or benefiting, or when the noun means “well-being,” i.e., of a city, country, family, etc.

4. Preserving the Inner Being. A special nuance is when the terms refer to preserving the inner being or nature. In philosophy inner health may be the point or the preservation of one’s humanity.

5. Religious Usage. All the nuances occur in religious usage. Thus the gods rescue from the perils of life. Philosophy discusses the preservation of all things from perishing. A demand arises for the preservation of life beyond death. In the Gnostic sphere gnósis supposedly saves from death as it is imparted by revelation. In the mysteries initiates share in the salvation of a mythical divine being from death and thereby attain to a blissful life in the hereafter. A special Syrian belief mentioned in Origen Against Celsus 7.9 is that there is salvation from eternal punishment by worship of a divine envoy and faith in him. [W. FOERSTER, VII, 965-69]

B. The OT.

1. Statistics and Equivalents.

a. In the canon sṓzō (“to keep,” “to save”) occurs some three-fifths of the time for yšʿ (“to save,” “to help,” “to free”). anasṓzō mostly occurs for nouns derived from plṭ. diasṓzō is used especially for mlṭ (“to save,” “to achieve safety,” “to escape”). sōtēría (“salvation,” “preservation,” “protection”) is used mostly for derivatives of ysʿ .

b. As sṓzō and sōtēría occur mostly for the stem ysʿ, so this stem is mostly rendered by sṓzō and sōtēría. The compounds, however, occur for other Hebrew terms, although sṓzō as well as diasṓzō commonly renders mlṭ.

c. No basic shift of meaning takes place when sṓzō etc. are used for different Hebrew verbs. Yet the LXX often translates freely (e.g., saving for converting in Is. 10:22; cf. also Zeph. 3:17; Job 20:24; Prov. 10:25; 11:31). Slight shifts might also take place when nouns are translated, as when those who escape become those who are saved (with a more passive emphasis). (For details see TDNT, VII, 970-73.)

2. The Stem ysʿ in the OT.

a. Meaning. This verb first means “to be roomy.” Bringing into a more spacious place confers the idea of deliverance. A stronger being brings deliverance to the weak or oppressed by superior intervention. Personal relationships are stressed as there is rescue from situations brought about by the hostile intent of others. The nouns comprehend a totality that includes both the deliverance and the ensuing state of salvation.

b. Human Deliverance, Help, and Salvation. The weak need legal or military help (cf. Job 26:2. 5:4; 1 Sam. 11:3). They should cry for help (Judg. 10:12ff.). Those who are strong should be asked to give protection or to secure justice (Is. 37:35; Hos. 13:10). Such a request implies or brings about dependence. The help may come through war (Hos. 1:7) or through legal action (Job 13:16). Military heroes or judges bring deliverance. So do protecting powers. Rulers have the task of helping to justice (2 Sam. 14:4).

c. Limits of Human Deliverance. All salvation that is not divinely validated is limited. Idols and astrologers cannot save (Is. 45:20; 47:13). God, not an angel, rescues from Egypt, brings into the land, and wins victories over enemies (Is. 63:8-9; Ps. 44:3-4; Judg. 7:2, 7). The people must wait on God for salvation (Is. 30:15). It is a sin to reject the God who saves and to seek a king (1 Sam. 10:18-19) or to avenge oneself (25:26ff.). Human intervention is legitimate only if God works in and through it, as in the case of the judges (Judg. 2:18). The God who saves by many or by few (1 Sam. 14:6) must give assurance to a Gideon before he will come forward to help and save (Judg. 6:14ff.).

d. Divine Deliverance, Help, and Salvation. God also helps and saves directly as the one best equipped to intervene or protect or preserve. He is the true hero and king (Pss. 80:2; 44:3-4). Israel conquers through him (Dt. 33:29). He saves and helps her (1 Sam. 11:13). If she is faithful, he promises aid (Num. 10:19). He is the hero who brings victory (Zeph. 3:17). In the Psalms God's help is thus invoked against public or personal foes. He is asked to save against legal attacks, against injustice and violence, against sickness and imprisonment, and against external attacks. There are also references to comprehensive deliverance or salvation. God has established and preserved the people, and its members may thus hope for his help (Ps. 106:4). By forgiveness the garment of salvation replaces their filthy raiment of sin (Is. 61:10; Zech. 3:4-5). They can thus raise the cup of salvation (Ps. 116:13). To the humble who know their littleness, call on God with contrite hearts, and follow his will (Pss. 24:5; 34:6; 119:155), God grants his general help and salvation. Although he denies help to sinners, salvation may at times be from merited judgment. He rescues the oppressed even though they, too, are sinful (Ezek. 34:22), and he frees Israel from all her sins (Ezek. 36:29). Repentance is a prerequisite (Jer. 4:14). The liberation from exile is a form of salvation (Is. 45:17). God alone can effect this (43:11). This redemption points ahead to the final redemption when the age of eschatological salvation dawns (cf. Is. 43:1ff.; 60:16; 63:9). The Hebrew stem covers both the deliverance itself and the salvation that it brings. The eschatological deliverance includes rescue from attacking nations (Zech. 12:7) and the gathering of the dispersed (Is. 43:5ff.). The end-time community will draw on the wells of salvation (Is. 12:3), and all the world can share its salvation (45:22). The messianic ruler, as God's representative, will help Israel so that it may dwell in safety (Jer. 23:6), and he will himself be divinely preserved in the wild eschatological attack of the nations (Zech. 9:9).

3. Other Stems in the OT.

a. Nouns of the Stem plṭ. Nouns of this stem may denote either the act or the result of escaping, e.g., fugitives or refugees. Usually escape from violent danger is at issue, e.g., death in battle (Judg. 12:5). Religiously God's judgment is a mortal danger that none can escape (Am. 9:1). If a saved remnant lives on, it is only as an object lesson to the exiles (Ezek. 14:12ff.). By God's will and work some do escape divine punishment (Is. 4:2; Ezek. 6:8-9; Neh. 1:2). Even some Gentiles may escape the final judgment in eschatological salvation (Is. 45:20ff.; 66:19).

b. The Verb mlṭ. This verb, too, denotes escape from mortal threat and the finding of safety (cf. Judg. 3:29; 1 Sam. 19:10, etc.). David has to protect his life against Saul (1 Sam. 19:11). Escape from invasion (Is. 20:6), or from punishment (Ezek. 17:15), or from custody (2 Sam. 4:6), or from affliction (Job 19:12) may also be meant. Those who trust in God are saved (Ps. 22:5). God saves the innocent (Job 22:30). Escape does not come by trust in horses (Ps. 33:17), in other nations (Is. 20:6), in riches (Job 20:20), or in one's own understanding (Prov. 28:26), but in God (Job 22:30). Transgressors cannot escape (1 Kgs. 19:17; Am. 2:14-15). When God spares the condemned to usher in the eschatological age of salvation, prisoners again escape the oppressor (Is. 49:24-25). In the last time those who call on God's name (Joel 2:32), or whose names are written in the book of life (Dan. 12:1), will be saved. [G. FOHRER, VII, 970-80]

C. sṓzō and sōtēría in Later Judaism.

1. OT Apocrypha. Where there is no Hebrew original, the terms still refer mostly to human or divine deliverance with a personal reference. Human deliverance is comparatively uncommon; usually what is meant is the deliverance of the righteous by God. The decisive point is not the content of deliverance but the fact that it comes from God. The resurrection brings final salvation when the righteous are delivered from the afflictions and persecutions of earthly life.

2. Qumran. In general the Hebrew terms refer in these works to God's help and deliverance. These are seen in Israel's history and are expected in the conflict of the children of light against the children of darkness. They also apply in the individual struggles of the righteous both past and present. In the last time the divine community is the main object of help, i.e., of definitive salvation. The stress is not on the various emergencies but on the positive fact of God's intervention. Deliverance may be from oppression by the wicked or from temptation, but not from sin and guilt. What counts, however, is the divine help, whether in Israel's past, the community's present, or the final battle.

3. Ethiopian Enoch. In the parts of this work preserved in Greek the terms are mostly eschatological with a reference to God's final salvation in freedom from sin and fulfilment of the OT promises. The content of salvation includes final liberation from persecution and deliverance in the judgment; the opposite is perdition. To be righteous and to repent are ways to eternal salvation.

4. The Testaments of the Twelve. In these writings there are two circles of thought. The one relates to individuals and their temporal and eternal salvation, the other to the community (and sometimes the Gentiles) in the end time. In the first circle individuals attain salvation by prayer and piety along with God's help, while in the other God alone brings salvation for Israel (and the Gentiles).

5. The Psalms of Solomon and 4 Esdras.

a. In the Psalms of Solomon the usage is similar to that in the Testaments of the Twelve. sṓzō denotes God's intervention in the life of the righteous. In Ps. 10:8 sōtēría denotes salvation for Israel.

b. 4 Esdras refers to God's help in Israel's history and to divine preservation in affliction. Salvation includes the end of evil, but since the decision in the judgment is by works, the final destiny is one of preservation in life rather than salvation.

6. Josephus. Josephus uses the group for rescue from death, capture, or destruction. Another common meaning is blessing. Preservation and protection are other senses. God saves Israel and her members from life's perils, needs, and afflictions. Eschatological salvation might be meant in the claim of a Zealot prophet in Jewish War 6.285.

7. Rabbinic Works and Hebrew Enoch.

a. In rabbinic works we find both human and divine intervention to help and save. The thought of the deliverance from Egypt leads on to that of eschatological redemption, which also means freedom from the bondage of the nations.

b. The usage in Hebrew Enoch is similar.

8. Philo. For Philo the group has much the same range as in secular Greek. The reference may be to deliverance, preservation, health, or well-being. Religiously God saves from life's dangers and distresses. The lógos or reason saves the soul, but the true sōtēr is God; to break free from the passions and to attain to a measure of virtue also helps. God aids in securing liberation from the passions. The content of sōtēría is not maintaining one's humanity but acquiring a share in divine forces.

D. The NT.

I. The Saving of Physical Life. As regards physical life, the group in the NT refers only to salvation from acute danger, as in Acts 27:20ff.; Mt. 8:25; 14:30; Mk. 15:30; Jn. 12:27; Heb. 5:7; 11:7; Acts 7:25. In some instances the reference of sṓzō is to the healing of the sick (cf. Acts 4:9; 14:9; Jn. 11:12 [ambiguous]; Jms. 5:15).

II. The Theological Sense.

1. The Synoptics.

a. In the healings of Jesus sṓzō occurs 16 times and diasṓzo twice. Often faith is said to have saved, and the reference is always to the whole person. Clearly, then, the salvation extends to more than the physical sphere. Hence Jesus can tell the sinful woman of Lk. 7:50 that her faith has saved her (cf. also Mt. 8:25).

b. More strictly religious is the use in Lk. 1:68ff., which follows an OT model. In 1:77 the Baptist will give knowledge of salvation in the remission of sins. The explanation of the name of Jesus in Mt. 1:21 makes a similar link. Elsewhere the group is not common in the Synoptists. Mk. 8:35 and parallels refer to the saving and losing of life with an eschatological reference. In Mk. 10:26 being saved is equivalent to entering the kingdom or entering or inheriting life. Mk. 13:13 and parallels speak of deliverance from messianic tribulation. Lk. 13:23 equates salvation with entering the kingdom. In Lk. 19:10 saving and finding take place in the present (cf. 19:9-10). sōtēría, then, has both a present reference as finding and a future reference as entering the kingdom.

2. Paul. Paul limits the group to the relationship with God; he uses rhýomai for rescue from other perils. What is saved is the whole person or the pneúma. Unlike justification or remission or reconciliation, salvation is a future term (1 Cor. 3:15; 5:5; Rom. 13:11; 1 Th. 5:8ff.); it thus has a comprehensive sense. The goal of Paul's work is salvation (Rom. 10:1). Some people may save others (Rom. 11:14; 1 Cor. 9:22). Perishing is the opposite of being saved (1 Cor. 8:11; cf. 1:18). Salvation is salvation from judgment (Rom. 5:9; 1 Cor. 3:15). But positively it is endowment with divine glory that comes with the redemption of the body (Rom. 8:24; Phil, 3:20-21) and conforming to the image of the Son (Rom. 8:29). Righteousness is a parallel concept (Gal. 5:5). Salvation may be future but it also extends into the present (1 Cor. 15:2; 2 Cor. 6:2). Thus in Rom. 8:24 the content is eschatological but the aorist shows that sōtēría has come already with the receiving of the gospel.

3. Ephesians and Colossians. In Ephesians the group occurs only in 1:13; 2:5, 8. In 1:13 the reference is to the message of salvation, or the message that saves. In 2:5, 8 the perfect tense is used ("you have been saved") but the consummation has still to come (vv. 6-7).

4. The Pastorals. In 2 Tim. 4:18 salvation is "for the kingdom" rather than entry into it, and in 2:10 it is distinguished from eternal glory. The order in 1 Tim. 2:4 and 2 Tim. 1:9 is surprising; it shows that salvation does not have so strong an eschatological reference (cf. the connection with washing and renewing in Tit. 3:5). Yet the eschatological dimension is clear in 1 Tim. 2:15; 4:16; 2 Tim. 3:15.

5. The Catholic Episties, Hebrews, and Acts.

a. In 1 Peter believers are kept for salvation, will achieve it, and are to grow into it (1:5, 9; 2:2). It is the gift of eternal glory. The prophets inquired about it (1:10). The verb occurs only in the quotation in 4:18 and in 3:21, where, with a reference to the last judgment, it encloses both a present and a future.

b. In Hebrews the focus is again on the future (cf. 1:14; 10:25). Yet salvation is also present (7:25, where it is immaterial whether eis tó pantelés means "wholly" or "forever"). The theological expansion is especially plain in 2:3. The Lord brings salvation by declaring it, but this is a "great salvation" that awaits final consummation. 6:9 offers a cautious formulation; it refers to coming salvation but also embraces the state of the readers that leads to it.

c. James uses only the verb, and except in 5:5 it always denotes final deliverance in the judgment (cf. 4:12).

d. In Acts sṓzō and sōtēría occur 19 times. In 2:21, 40 and 15:1, 11 future salvation is at issue but elsewhere the terms are general ones for Christian salvation. This salvation includes forgiveness (3:19; 5:31; 22:16) but is oriented to the future. An interesting phrase is hoi sōzómenoi in 2:47.

e. Jude 5 refers to the exodus, but in v. 3 and v. 23 salvation in the judgment is the issue, the basis being laid for this here and now.

f. The only instance in 2 Peter is in 3:15, which finds salvation in the divine forbearance that allows space for zealous efforts to be found without spot or blemish.

---

vv. verses

6. The Johannine Writings.

a. In John the only example of sōtēría is in the saying in 4:22. The verb occurs in 3:17; 5:34; 10:9; 12:47. The cosmos is to be saved in 3:17; 12:47, the Jews in 5:34, the disciples in 10:9. The idea is that of attaining to life or giving it.

b. Only the noun occurs in Revelation (7:10; 12:10; 19:1). The sōtēría is God's, and it carries the OT nuance of victory. The overcomers confess that salvation belongs to God (7:10), a loud voice proclaims that God's salvation has come (12:10), and after the fall of Babylon the voice of the heavenly multitude cries that salvation belongs to God (19:1).

E. The Apostolic Fathers. In 1 Clement sṓzō means physical well-being or preservation, but a reference to eternal salvation may also be found. The latter sense is most common in 2 Clement. The object is the psychḗ only in Barn. 19. 10 and Hermas Similitudes 6.1.1; elsewhere it is the person in general. Christ is often the subject, but conduct in 1 Clem. 21.8. We seldom read from what there is salvation; hence the idea of deliverance is less strong. Salvation often carries a present reference, but the thought of coming salvation is also found, especially in Hermas, for whom baptism brings remission but no final certainty.

F. Gnosticism.

1. The basic view of Gnosticism is that a divine particle is trapped in the world of passion and fate. Only a divine intervention can free it. But the term sṓzō is seldom used for this act.

2. The Valentinians use sṓzō and sōtēría more frequently. They call the Gnostics sōzómenoi and employ both verb and noun to describe the blessed state of pneumatics and psychics. The latter need saving in the stricter sense of not merely fashioning but transposing from bondage to freedom.

3. The Coptic Gnostics have two equivalents for sṓzō or sōtēría, the one denoting deliverance, the other having the more positive sense of salvation.

4. The Acts of Thomas stresses the dynamic aspect of salvation in relation to the remission of sins and the efficacy of the sacraments.

5. Saving plays a big part in the colorful Mandaean writings. Common ideas are liberation, redemption, deliverance, healing, and blessing. A special relationship is that between death and redemption. Redemption comes with individual death and the end of the world.

G. The Relation between NT sōtēría and Later Judaism, the Greek World, and Gnosticism. NT sōtēría does not refer to physical health, political liberation, or release from demonic powers. It has to do strictly with the relationship with God, and hence it can be achieved neither by reason nor by contrition. The problem is that of sin, not of the imprisonment of a divine particle in the material world, as in Gnosticism. A call brings salvation, but not the call that awakens the bemused divine self. Nor do sacramental acts bring salvation by initiation into the story of a mythical god, as in the mysteries. The work of Jesus of Nazareth brings salvation from judgment by the forgiveness of sins. All are under judgment, none can escape it unaided, and salvation comes through the word of the cross which is God's power to salvation for all who believe. Only God can save, but hearers can accept or reject the offer and have thus to work out their salvation (Phil. 3:12-13). Salvation is not just future, as in Pharisaic Judaism, nor an enhancement of the present, as at Qumran, nor so strongly present, as in Gnosticism. It is present, for with Christ the new aeon has come and believers are drawn into it as they die and rise again with him. Yet their hope is set on future salvation when their transformation comes, creation is freed, and God's rule over every power is manifested. Negatively salvation is deliverance from wrath, and positively it is the attainment of glory. Either way the message of Christ crucified and risen fixes the content.

A. The Greek World.

1. Range of Meaning. This word covers the range of sṓzō and sōtēría but almost always with a personal reference. The sōtḗr is either divine or human, and people, not objects, are saved. Salvation involves a dependence (however momentary) of the saved on the savior.

2. Divine Saviors. The gods are sōtḗres as they deliver from perils or sicknesses or as they serve as protectors or preservers, e.g., of cities.

3. Human Saviors.

a. The Helper, Saver of Life, Physician. Two points calling for notice are the superiority of saviors to the saved and the lack of any clear distinction between the divine and human worlds in the Greek sphere. Human saviors are those who extend help or protection, those who save the lives of others, and physicians who bring healing.

b. Philosophers. Philosophers often bear the title sōtḗres as those who bring help or liberation.

c. Statesmen. Statesmen and rulers are called sōtḗres, at first with reference to specific actions, and with suggestions of divinization. In the Roman world the term becomes more common but still relates to specific deeds, does not necessarily imply deification, and may extend to subordinates of the one ultimately responsible, as in the case of Pompey and his legate.

d. The Hellenistic Ruler Cult. Under the Ptolemies and Seleucids sōtḗr becomes one of the official royal titles. sṓzō is the special task of the ruler, and in Egypt it links up with the idea that the ruler is the son of deity. The title is so highly esteemed in Egypt that it is applied to government officials as well.

e. Emperor Worship. During the empire sōtḗr becomes more common and the thought of the golden age comes to be associated with it. Yet sōtḗr is not part of the official style of the emperors and is not a technical term for the world savior. In his many travels Hadrian often receives the title of sōtḗr of a particular city (or even individual) to whom he shows favors. The reference in such cases is still to specific acts. Latin equivalents such as conservator or salvator seldom occur on coins. The use of sōtḗr, then, is much the same as in Greece but with extension due to the greater range of Roman rule.

f. The Golden Age. Since the age of Augustus brings a measure of order, peace, security, and prosperity, the emperor is sōtḗr insofar as the term has no specific content, and the regime suggests thoughts of the golden age, causing people to look beyond the emperor to providence or the gods. [W. FOERSTER, VII, 980-1012]

B. The OT. The LXX always has sōtḗr for the stem yšʿ. It is not a technical term for the judges (cf. only Judg. 3:9, 15), since the LXX emphasizes that it is God who delivers Israel. The LXX seldom uses the term for the kings (cf. 2 Kgs. 13:5), but elsewhere it applies to human helpers or to God as helper. On 16 occasions it is used for Hebrew terms for “help” or “liberation” or “deliverance” where the reference is to God. Only in Zech. 9:9 and Is. 49:6 is there approximation to its use for the Messiah. [G. FOHRER, VII, 1012-13]

C. Later Judaism.

1. The apocryphal works use sōtḗr only for God as Israel’s Savior, e.g., when David fights Goliath (1 Macc. 4:30) or when God saves the Egyptian Jews (3 Macc. 6:29ff.). In Sir. 51:1 God is the Savior from all kinds of dangers.

2. In the Dead Sea Scrolls, Ethiopian Enoch, Jubilees, Slavonic Enoch, Syrian Baruch, and 4 Esdras there is nothing equivalent to sōtḗr. The Testaments of the Twelve uses sōtḗr (Test. Jos. 1:16). In Ps. Sol. 8:33 God is sōtḗr as he protects the righteous, and in 17:3 as the helper of Israel who raises up the King-Messiah. Nowhere is the Messiah sōtḗr.

3. Josephus uses sōtḗr for human deliverers but not for God. The reference is always to specific deeds after the Greek pattern.

4. Among the rabbis the equivalent may be used for God or the Messiah, but there is no evidence that Redeemer or Savior is a current messianic title in NT days.

5. The Sibylline Oracles do not call the inaugurator of the golden age sōtḗr but use the term for God in his deliverance of the righteous, his preservation of all things, and his salvation from the pains of hell (2.27-28; 1.152; 2.344-45).

6. Philo calls God sōtḗr as the Savior of his people, the Preserver of the race, the Upholder of the cosmos, and especially the Helper of the soul.

D. The NT.

1. Occurrence. The NT uses sōtḗr for God in Lk. 1:47 (cf. Jude 25) and six times in the Pastorals. It also uses sōtḗr in Lk. 2:11; Acts 5:31; 13:23; Phil. 3:20; Eph. 5:23; Jn. 4:42; 1 Jn. 4:14, four times in the Pastorals, and five in 2 Peter. The general restraint and the more common use in the Pastorals need explanation.

2. The NT apart from the Pastorals and 2 Peter

a. In Lk. 2:10-11 the angel specifically addresses the Jewish people and does not use the article. A connection with Lk. 1:69ff. is palpable.

b. Acts 5:31 and 13:23 are directed at Jews and God-fearers. The reference is to messianic hopes but with forgiveness as the content, not political liberation.

c. In Eph. 5:23 the autós shows that the author is making a new point. As a model for husbands (vv. 28-29) Christ is sōtḗr by sacrificing himself and thus purifying the church so that at the consummation he may display it for himself in glory. The action is a present one but with an eschatological dimension.

d. In Jn. 4:42 the Samaritans represent the world. This verse and 1 Jn. 4:14 are to be seen in relation to Jn. 3:17, which links the verb sṓzō and kósmos. Christ is Savior of Gentiles as well as Jews.

3. The Pastorals and 2 Peter

a. Six of the ten instances of sōtḗr in the Pastorals are in Titus, three in 1 Timothy, and one in 2 Timothy. Six refer to God and four to Christ. Except in 1 Tim. 4:10 it is a title. The general thesis, in opposition to those who contend for a restricted salvation, is that God is the Savior of all, not merely as the Benefactor, but as the Savior whom Christians know and trust. In 1 Tim. 4:10 the meaning might be the broader one of Benefactor (in view of v. 8), but the addition "especially of those who believe" (cf. also 2:3-4) supports the more distinctive sense. When Christ is sōtḗr, all the passages apart from Tit. 1:4 offer elucidations: Grace has appeared (2 Tim. 1:10), the appearance of his glory is awaited (Tit. 2:13), the Spirit has been poured forth (3:6-7), he is the incarnate Lord who has abolished death and brought life and immortality to light (2 Tim. 1:10). The phrase "Jesus Christ our Savior" emerges clearly in Tit. 2:13; 3:6 in opposition to some counterposition.

b. In 2 Peter sōtḗr applies only to Jesus (1:1, 11; 2:20; 3:2, 18). It alternates with kýrios for no obvious reason. Perhaps a taste for solemn statements accounts for its frequent use.

E. The Apostolic Fathers. If sōtḗr is a common title in the Pastorals and 2 Peter, it is rare in the apostolic fathers. Not found at all in the Didache, Barnabas, or Hermas, it occurs only once in 1 Clement (God), once each in Polycarp, Martyrdom of Polycarp, Diognetus, and 2 Clement, and four times in Ignatius. Mostly there is a strong sense of its material content, but it is not a designation as kýrios is, and not even by way of antithesis does it have any contact with sōtḗr as part of the style of imperial Rome.

F. Gnosticism.

1. Apart from Christian influence sōtḗr does not seem to belong to Gnosticism. Of the heads of Gnostic schools only Menander calls himself sōtḗr.

2. In Christian Gnosticism the term is plain in Coptic sources. Usually Jesus is the Savior. In reply to disciples' questions, we sometimes read: "The (perfect) sōtḗr says." In Apocryphal John Christ is sōtḗr as he who gives John a revelation of the heavenly world.

3. In Greek sources the term is none too common. The accounts of Basilides in Irenaeus and Hippolytus contain it four times.

4. In the Acts of Thomas sōtḗr seldom occurs in narrative, but it is common in prayers and preaching, usually with a dependent genitive, e.g., of a11, of the whole creation, of souls (164.12; 114.9-10; 159.17).

5. Valentinianism likes to call Jesus sōtḗr rather than kýrios or even Jesus. Only in this branch of Gnosticism does sōtḗr have a firmly established place. The Gnostics mostly follow Christian terminology, and where they use sōtḗr they give it a less personal reference. Jesus is sōtḗr as the Redeemer who bears a redeeming summons. When the concept goes beyond this, as in Acts of Thomas, a sacramentalism is present that is close to that of the mysteries.

G. The Primitive Christian Use. In primitive Christianity sṓzō and sōtēría are important terms for salvation. Since Jesus brings this, it is no surprise that he is called sōtḗr, the content of the term being fixed by sṓzō and sōtēría. Restraint in the use of sōtḗr may well be due to the risk of confusion with the Jewish hope of a national liberator or with the pagan concept of a political benefactor. The apostolic fathers maintain this restraint. If the Pastorals break it, they relate the term strictly to God, using a Greek term to counter false teachings which belong to the Greek context. Not the title sōtḗr, but the content of the sōtēría that Jesus brings, raises up Jesus as sōtḗr into the divine sphere.

1. In Greek this word has all the range of sṓzō. It may be used of the hero, the horse, the sun's rays, water (for fish), reason, etc. in such senses as saving, beneficent, sustaining, beneficial. The noun tá sōtēría means "thanksgiving." As a singular noun, sōtḗrion denotes "means of deliverance." [W. FOERSTER, VII, 1013-22]

2. The LXX uses sōtḗrion for "what is beneficial," "deliverance," "festive time," and especially "salvation offering" (Ex. 20ff.; 1-2 Chronicles) in a rendering of Hebrew terms that are sometimes translated "peace offering" and that may carry the sense of the "concluding sacrifice." [G. FOHRER, VII, 1022-23]

3. In Judaism tó sōtḗrion denotes the "salvation offering," the "feast of deliverance," or the "means of deliverance" (cf. Sir. 35:1; 3 Macc. 6:30; Is. 33:20). In the pseudepigrapha "salvation offering" or “salvation” is the meaning. Josephus does not use tó sōtḗrion (toú theoú), nor does Philo, in the sense of salvation, but we find the adjective sōtḗrios.

4. The NT uses the adjective independently in Tit. 2:11 (“bringing salvation”), and in quotations or allusions in Lk. 2:30 (Is. 40:5; cf. Lk. 3:6; Acts 28:28) and Eph. 6:17 (Is. 59:17), where God’s salvation seems to be in view, but the LXX leads to the choice of toú sōtēríou rather than tēs sōtḗrias.

5. In the apostolic fathers tó sōtḗrion (theoú) occurs only in quotations (1 Clem. 15.6; 18.12; 35.12). 1 Clem. 36.1 relates God’s salvation to Christ’s in a way that clearly reflects LXX influence. [W. FOERSTER, VII, 1023-24]

sṓma [body], sōmatikós [bodily], sýssōmos [belonging to the same body]

A. The Greek World.

1. Up to Plato. Of contested derivation, sṓma first occurs in Homer for a dead human or animal body. Use for a living body is attested clearly only from Hesiod. By the fifth century B.C. the term denotes the “trunk” or the whole “body.” The body may at times be viewed impersonally, but it can also denote the person. In its limitation, the body is the physical existence that ends with death. As such it is distinct from the soul, without which it has no value. Physical existence is often felt to be an alien affliction, the sḗma (tomb) of the soul, the fetter that fate has ordained for humanity. Transmigration associates body and soul more closely, but ecstasy makes possible alienation from the body. The body also calls for censure as the seat of erotic desire. In art the idea of external form is linked to the body; the sṓma encounters the eye as a whole defined by its form. Philosophy calls the elements sṓmata. Democritus distinguishes the sṓma from empty space, while Melissus says that real being has no sṓma. In another definition breadth, length, and depth characterize sṓma; it must always be “in” a specific place (tôpos).

2. Plato to Aristotle. Plato refers sṓma to the human body but also (plural) to the materials used by artists and to the elements. As an integrated totality, the sṓma may be the person. As the visible part, it is the object of desire, distinct from the soul, which controls and guides it, and which alone, along with the body, constitutes the living being. The body needs the care of gymnastic instructors and physicians. Unlike the soul, it is mortal. Physical desire leads the soul down. The sṓma is a sḗma which traps the soul. At death the soul achieves liberation and purification. Yet physical beauty may be a spur to ascent to the idea, and the soul, located in the head, holds the body upright. Body and cosmos stand in relationship. The cosmos is a body that is controlled by the divine soul. Xenophon takes up many of the same though. The sṓma is the person, although often as an object of desire. The soul is the guiding force, just as divine reason governs the cosmos. Isocrates extends the body-soul relationship to the state, of which the constitution is the soul. The sense of person continues in later usage, especially in enumeration. Comedy takes up the idea of the ascent of the soul at death. The soul plays the part of helmsman, a good body with a poor soul being comparable to a ship with a poor helmsman. The idea of sṓma as substance is also present. Aristotle uses sṓma for the trunk or body. In his view the body exists before the soul but the soul is superior. Desire is good but should be restrained, for it is not the supreme good. The soul is a sṓma made up of the finest particles, and sṓma, even apart from soul, is substance, so that logical argument may be called the sṓma of credibility in speech. Bodies are limited. The elements are bodies, and the universe is a body with reason as its soul (cf. also the state). Mathematical bodies are secondary abstractions.

3. Fourth and Third Centuries. In the later fourth century sṓma means the physically present person, with some stress on corporeality. Epicurus uses sárx for sṓma in view of his materialistic view of the soul; he thus distinguishes soul from flesh but not from body, and rates the body highly. Stoicism views the soul, located in the heart or head, as the guiding principle. It associates the body, not with extension but with activity and suffering. Sharing these with the body, the soul is in some sense corporeal. To explain the presence of two bodies in the same place, a doctrine of permeation develops. Mental sickness demonstrates the permeation. Yet while the soul is sṓma, sṓma is still the body as distinct from the soul, and Stoicism maintains the unconditional superiority of the soul over the body. The term sṓma may also be used for groups of people, with some distinction later between the limited and the unlimited number. Among other groups regarded as bodies (e.g., an army or chorus) is the assembly (ekklēsía). Smaller bodies can make up the larger body. The cosmos is a larger body but also a living entity and as such the perfect sóma. God has created it, and he governs it through the world soul. Middle Stoicism stresses the teleology of the body but also refers at times to the useless and corruptible flesh. In ordinary use sṓma may mean a slave or may be used in enumeration. sōmatopoiéō denotes the organizing of a people's unity, and sōmatoeidḗs the unity of history. Astronomers speak of the body of a constellation, grammarians use sṓma and prágma for the concrete and abstract meanings of words, and scientists regard the body as a compressed molecule that then extends again.

4. From 100 B.C. to A.D. 100. Later Stoicism uses sṓma for the human body and for the divine body of heaven. Independent bodies are distinguished from integrated bodies. Latin adopts the word to denote a literary collection. Body and soul suffer together in view of their interpenetration. One may cheerfully leave the prison or fetter of the body at death. Here below we are tied to the body as to an alien corpse or beast of burden. Yet the body bears witness to the wisdom of providence. The cosmos rates as the body of deity. Zeus, the head and center, conceals all things in himself and then causes them to issue forth. All things are in his vast body. Parts of the cosmos rank as members of the body. The supreme God is the world soul and in Stoicism is identical with fate or necessity, although the cosmos may also be presented as a living entity that is governed by divine reason. Human beings are members of the great body that embraces all things. They are also members of the state, a smaller body that reflects the great body. Being composed of many parts, the state resembles a human body, which in Rome has the emperor as its soul or head. Human beings are made up of soul and body, and in true marriage there is unity of the two. Leaders form bodies of supporters, Alexandria as a large city has the rest of Egypt as its body, and the body of the Nile (i.e., its main mass) flows straight. Plutarch uses sṓma for the trunk, the body, the person as an object of desire, and the human ego. The elements are sṓmata. sṓma is three-dimensional, limited, and spatial. Yet the term can be positive as the visible embodiment of the idea, and body and soul together define humanity. The soul is free in contrast to the evil lusts of the body and should rule over the body. At death the soul parts from the body and achieves true freedom. Some souls are more immersed in the body than others. The idea of totality is still present, e.g., in regard to the body of music as distinct from individual sounds. Some bodies consist of independent parts, others of integrated parts. The cosmos is a perfect body with imperfect members. Plutarch also compares the state to a body.

5. The Post-NT Period. In this period the sṓma may still be the corpse, the trunk, or the whole body. Ulcers can be called sṓmata, and water, snow, and hail are sṓmata. Persons as objects, e.g., slaves, are sṓmata. Time may be understood as sṓma, but the Stoic view that souls and the gods, too, are sṓmata comes under attack. Human beings consist of body and soul, but the body is the lower part that defiles the soul. Even in the body, however, the soul is free. It slips out of the body at death and may even leave it in ecstasy, delirium, dreams, or trances. A phalanx forms a sṓma, and the vine as a body loses something when the branches exude sap. Intellectually the body represents a united whole. The cosmos is a body, ruled by divine reason, and both ingenerate and indestructible. Identification of the cosmos with God continues. The state also forms a body, but only later do we find the term with the genitive of the name of a people, and the use of sōmátion for an association is later still. [E. SCHWEIZER, VII, 1024-44]

B. The OT.

l. Hebrew Equivalents. Various words are rendered by sṓma in the LXX, including bāśār and šəʾēr, which normally mean "flesh," and gəwiyyâ and gəšēm (often corpse or carcass). (For details see TNDT, VII, 1044-45.)

2. The LXX Translation. For the various terms the LXX normally uses sárx or sṓma, but also at times nekrós etc. (For details see TDNT VII, 1045.) [F. BAUMGÄRTEL, VII, 1044-45]

3. LXX Works with Hebrew Originals. There is no fixed LXX rendering for the Hebrew terms. Thus for bāśār sṓma replaces sárx about one out of seven times, especially when human totality is in view as an object of suffering (Job 7:5). One can make cuttings in the body as in the flesh (Lev. 19:28; 21:5). The sex organ is perhaps meant in Lev. 6:3. For other Hebrew terms the sṓma may be the corpse. sṓma also denotes the person as an object or with reference to sickness, corruptibility, healing, and resurrection. At times the LXX deviates from the Hebrew (cf. Job 6:4; 33:17, 24). In Prov. 25:20, perhaps through a slip, the sṓma is the seat of passion that troubles the heart.

4. Works Not in the Hebrew Canon.

a. sṓma is used for a healthy or sick body in Sir. 30:14ff., a cursed body in 51:2, a branded body in 3 Macc. 2:29, a corpse in Sir. 38:16. 2 Macc. 7:7 refers to the torment of the body and the torturing of its members. A good name survives the body (Sir. 41:11). A woman's body is the object of desire (Sir. 7:24), and passion burns in the body (23:17).

b. Body and soul constitute the whole person either to make up a third entity or with the soul as the true ego. The righteous hazard both in martyrdom. Both body and pneúma come under oppression (4 Macc. 11:11). At times only the body is passive, whereas the soul voluntarily accepts pain. Hence persecutors can attack the body but not the soul, which is God's true gift (4 Macc. 10:4; 13:13).

c. sṓma and psychḗ are parallel in Wis. 1:4 but complementary in 8:20. sophía is distinct from both, and so is logismós in 4 Macc. 1:20ff., although sṓma alone is its opposite in 1:35. The logismós can and must overcome the sṓma when it is subjected to bodily pain (4 Macc. 3:18; 6:7; 10:19-20).

5. The term sṓma offers a concept that is not yet developed in Hebrew and hence the translators use it with some hesitation. In the LXX it never refers to an inorganic body, nor to reality as distinct from words, nor to a macro- or microcosmic organism, nor to a city or people. Unlike sárx, it does not have the intrinsic character of creatureliness or sin or earthliness. It can denote the person as object (e.g., in enumeration), and it also suggests the human totality with a sense of corporeality, e.g., in pain, sickness, sexuality, death, or resurrection. sṓma does not occur in relation to sacrifice or to activity but in relation to God, to others, or to various forces. The person does not stand aloof from the sṓma. Soul and body together describe corruptible humanity over against wisdom or reason, but anthropological dualism arises only when soul or reason is set in juxtaposition to the body, e.g., when the body is abandoned to death but the true I survives.

C. Judaism.

I. Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha.

a. sṓma denotes a human or animal body, often a corpse. It is also a numerical unit. As a living body it is subject to pain, sickness, death, and self-mortification, but is also an object of care. Its beauty is extolled but it is open to temptation. One commits adultery with it, and yet it is a temple of the Spirit. Distinction is made between body and head or members, and the idea of the body as a microcosm occurs, with the head as heavenly director.

b. Body and soul belong together. God’s people are holy in both, and the patriarchs go up to heaven with both. Both may perish at God’s glance. Yet death also separates them—the soul going to heaven, the body to earth. At times we find a trinity of spirit, soul, and body. The soul leaves the body in a trance. The body is like a garment. A new mode of being begins with the new body.

c. Only late instances of the corporate use occur, e.g., the cosmos as a body, the cosmic body of Adam, and the idea of the assuming of Adam’s body by the Christ or its taking up to heaven at the resurrection.

2. Philo.

a. Philo uses sṓma for the human or animal body or corpse. He sees in the sṓma a totality in which the parts work harmoniously, although usually in a figure of speech for the cosmos or society. Physical union may also be denoted by sṓma, but this is less important than spiritual union, just as more harm is done to the soul than to the body in adultery.

b. The body has relative importance inasmuch as with the soul it constitutes the person. It must be pure and healthy. The sabbath and fasting serve both body and soul. The body is the soul’s house, temple, or brother. Yet the soul remains young when the body ages. The divine logismós is a third thing alongside soul and body in the form of noús or pneúma. Only in virtue of noús are people in God’s image. Those who live only by body and soul are not authentically human. True humanity lies in noncorporeal noús. Only those who withdraw from body to noús are capable of vision. Yet the idea is present that the soul itself is really noncorporeal and has come into the body as into an alien land. Thus the sṓma offers the soul the possibility of choice between alliance with the body or with virtue, which is the true marriage. The body is a tomb or prison, and the soul is bound to it, as a kind of corpse-bearer, during earthly life. Yet ascetics will live for the soul, not the body, and at death the soul will leave the body and return to unity from the duality of soul and body.

c. diánoia serves as the head of the soul. The cosmos is a large-scale body that contains all other bodies as members. As the soul dwells in the body and noús in the soul, so heaven dwells in earth and God in heaven. The world soul rules the cosmos. The lógos, with God as father and wisdom as mother, puts on the cosmos as a garment and holds it together. There is a noētós kósmos corresponding to God’s thoughts or plan. On the one hand, then, God encompasses all things; on the other the world soul permeates the body and holds it together. Philo also uses body as a metaphor for a city or people.

d. Finally we find in Philo the use of sṓma for inorganic bodies. Such bodies are objects with shadows. Yet bodies may also be mere wording as distinct from ideas. Over against bodies are incorporeal ideas. These may be present even prior to the bodies they represent; this explains prophecy. God himself is the incorporeal location of incorporeal ideas, a tópos not filled by a sṓma.

e. Philo's view of sóma is under strong Greek influence, e.g., in the use for an inorganic body, which is quite alien to the LXX, or in the more emphatic relating of sóma to the individual, not to the world or to God. The latter emphasis leads to such ideas as that of the body as a prison for the soul, which is the only essential content, or the notion of a third and transcendent element over against both body and soul which dwells within us but is not as such a human faculty or possibility.

3. Josephus. Josephus uses sṓma for the strong or weak human body which needs care and exercise, for the corpse, for the slave, and for the whole body as distinct from the sárx. Comparisons of a phalanx or country to a body bring out the unity; Jerusalem as capital is like the head of a body, and alienated parties, when reconciled, become a single body. Body and soul are friends in Josephus; hence suicide is especially heinous. If the soul is purified by righteousness, the body may be sanctified by washing. Yet Josephus can also call the soul a divine deposit in the body which leaves the body at death and gains a new body in heaven. Using the body as its instrument, the soul can do a great deal even while chained to it. Yet as the soul returns to God in sleep, so it should seek to be loosed from the body. The body, then, tends to be seen as the abode of the soul, which alone constitutes the true ego.

D. The NT.

I. Books apart from Paul.

1. In these works there are only 51 instances as compared to 91 in Paul, in whom the word acquires its true content. A first meaning is the traditional one of corpse (e.g., the body of Jesus in Mk. 15:43 etc., of an animal in Lk. 17:37, of Moses in Jude 9). A dead sṓma can be raised again (Mt. 27:52). Jn. 2:21 relates the temple to the dead and resurrected body of Jesus.

2. The body experiences sickness, healing, etc. (Mk. 5:29) and needs food and clothing (Jms. 2:16). A technical formula occurs in Heb. 10:22.

3. The body is contrasted with the members in Mt. 5:29-30. Yet we have our true life in it as the I from which members may be severed for the good of the whole. If persecutors can kill only the body and not the soul, body and soul together may be cast into hell (Mt. 10:28).

4. Heb. 10:5ff. and 1 Pet. 2:24 refer to the body of Jesus that dies and rises again. A new point is that Jesus offers up his body in sacrifice, not because it counts for little compared to the immortal soul, but in service for others and to accomplish their salvation. This use perhaps rests on the eucharistic saying "This is my body" (Mk. 14:22 and par.). In this context sṓma (rather than sárx) goes with blood, possibly with the person of Jesus in view, and with a reference to the sṓma as that which suffers. Thus the meaning is that Jesus gives himself to his people as the one who dies for them and who concludes the covenant by his death. If a stress later falls on the body as such, body and blood originally denote the whole person of Jesus—body as the I in its totality, blood as the I that suffers death.

5. somatikós occurs only in Lk. 3:22 and 1 Tim. 4:8 with an emphasis on corporeality.

II. Paul.

1. Apart from the Concept of the Body of Christ.

---

par. paragraph

a. Generally Accepted Epistles.

(a) Being outside the Body. Paul does not use sṓma for corpse or slave or as a complementary term for psychḗ in which the latter is the true ego. Even when he refers to being outside the body (2 Cor. 12:1ff.), he does so only under compulsion and with no intrinsic interest.

(b) Resurrection of the Body: Texts. The future life is bodily in 1 Cor. 15:35ff., but with a new corporeality and not just a new form. In 2 Cor. 5:1ff. we are tested and proved in or by the body but then are at home with the Lord in a new house that comes from God. In Phil. 3:21 the body of glory will replace the body of humiliation in union with Christ. In Rom. 8:11 God will raise up our mortal bodies (cf. 1 Cor. 6:14). Rom. 6:12 shows that we shall share in the resurrection, and 8:11 refers to redemption of the body, not from it.

(c) Resurrection of the Body: Theology. In 1 Cor. 15:35ff. life after death depends on the resurrection but as God's act, not as an ongoing of some part of the I. The same is true in 2 Cor. 5:1ff. and Rom. 6:12; 8:11 (also 1 Cor. 6:14). Awareness of the resurrection of the body implies responsibility regarding present life in the body. In Phil. 3:21 the term sṓma enables Paul to define as strongly as possible our association with Christ. As participation in Christ's resurrection, the resurrection is a blessing of salvation. The judgment involved in 1 Cor. 3:12ff. is one which condemns or praises the works of those raised up to life.

(d) The Body in Sex Life. The sṓma is the organ of generation which engages in sex (1 Cor. 7:4) and may be defiled thereby (Rom. 1:24). In sex the body belongs to another (1 Cor. 6:16) but may also be possessed by fornication (6:13). The use of sṓma rather than sárx here shows that the totality of the person is meant.

(e) The Corinthian Spiritualizers. The term sṓma occurs 56 times in 1 and 2 Corinthians in opposition to a group that stresses the spirit. The sṓma is the present body (1 Cor. 5:3), which may be hurt or scarred (cf. Gal. 6:17), which must be kept undefiled (1 Cor. 7:34), and which should manifest the life and dying of Jesus (2 Cor. 4:10). The apostle buffets it so as to set it in Christ's service (1 Cor. 9:27).

(f) Indicative and Imperative. In Rom. 12:1 sṓma appears where imperatives replace indicatives; it is the place of logikē latreía. The same is true in Rom. 6:12ff. Christ is magnified in Paul's body in Phil. 1:20. We praise God in the body, the temple of the Spirit (1 Cor. 6:12ff.), which belongs either to God or to sin. In 1 Cor. 6:19 the body is God's because he has bought it back as well as made it. It had become the body of sin or of death (Rom. 6:6; 7:24), and could even be equated with sin (8:13), but in believers it is now a member of Christ and set in his service. Denoting the whole person, sṓma may be rendered "personality" or "individuality," but such terms miss the relationship to God, sin, and others that is implicit for Paul. The imperatives maintain the totality in which thought, feeling, experience, and action can no longer be sundered.

b. Colossians and Ephesians. In Colossians the body of Christ is predominant. The term sṓma is neutral in 2:23, and "of sin" is added in 1:22 and 2:11. 2:17 contrasts the body of Christ with the shadow, and hence has the reality in view.

2. The Body of Christ.

a. Generally Accepted Epistles.

(a) Given for Us. In Rom. 7:4 (cf. Col. 1:22) the body of Christ is that which is offered up for us on the cross.

(b) Eucharistic Texts. This is also the point in 1 Cor. 11:24 with a stress on the act rather than the substance. The crucified body is present at the eucharist in the blessings that flow therefrom (10:16) and in the claim to lordship that it raises (11:27ff.). The reference to the Lord's body and blood in 11:27 echoes

10:16-17 but has the sense of 8:12: A sin against other believers for whom Christ died is a sin against Christ. Since sṓma refers to the whole sacrificial act, the sṓma is not just past. The Lord's exalted body is his crucified body in its ongoing operation.

(c) The Community as the Body of Christ: Figurative Sayings. The community is the body in 1 Cor. 12:27. This fact rules out feelings of inferiority or superiority, since each member needs the others, and all belong together. In Rom. 12:5 the community is a body in Christ. It must live out what it is already in and by him, i.e., by incorporation into the history determined by him.

(d) The Community as the Body of Christ: Stricter Sayings. In 1 Cor. 10:16 fellowship at the Supper is fellowship with Christ; the many are one body. In 6:15 believers are one spirit with Christ as members of Christ; this is what rules out bodily union with others in fornication. In 12:12-13 various renderings are possible but "so Christ" makes sense only if the one body is Christ's (cf. vv. 13, 27). The comparison in Jn. 15:1 offers a parallel. The community achieves unity in the crucified and risen body of Christ.

(e) The Unity of Patriarch and People as a Model. Paul sees in Christ the eschatological Adam (Rom. 5:12ff.; 1 Cor. 15:21-22, 45). Later Judaism links the destiny of the race and eschatological expectation in Adam. Christ as the eschatological Adam is a universalistic variation on this theme. God's deed in Christ is determinative for all who believe in him. This rather than consubstantiality bridges time. All the community's life is shaped by this act. The crucified body in its ongoing work is the risen body, and by integration into this body the community is Christ's body.

(f) Associations of sṓma. The term sṓma suggests a true bodily, though not physical, union. Not used in soteriological passages, sṓma does not denote a fellowship that is more real than justification. It stresses that the unity manifests itself in common life and relationships. We meet others in our corporeality. But since Christ's body is given for us, the term also carries for Paul the thought of the body in which we serve others, or Christ serves them in us.

(g) The Body of Christ and the People of God. At root these two concepts are one; there is merely a shift of categories. Yet the shift of categories is important. The idea of God's people stresses historical development. That of Christ's body stresses the present character of God's saving act, the present union with the risen Lord, and the equality of the ministry of the members. Neither term is conceivable in Paul without the other.

b. Colossians.

(a) Cosmic Understanding. This aspect occurs only in v. 18 in what is perhaps a quotation from a Christian hymn that seeks to allay the cosmic anxieties of the readers. In the hymn Christ replaces wisdom in vv. 15-18, but it is as the head of his body, the church, that he reconciled all things in heaven and on earth (vv. 18-20).

(b) Correction. In v. 22 it is made plain that Christ's body is the crucified body, and in v. 24 this soteriological reference is given an ecclesiological orientation; the body embraces the church rather than the universe (cf. 1:18; 3:15). Cosmic reconciliation comes about through the universal preaching of the gospel (1:6) and the resultant unveiling of the eschatological mystery (1:26). Christ as head is here the controlling member (cf. the LXX and Philo). He has disarmed all opposing forces at the cross (2:10, 14-15), and he so rules the church as his body that it is summoned to obedience and service. In this way the power of growth flows from him to the church and thence to the world. As head, he is also distinct from the body; it must hold fast to him (2:19). The fullness that dwells in Christ is that of God, not of the cosmos (2:19). The sōmatikṓs in this statement denotes the corporeality in which God encounters us in our world, i.e., the real humanity of Jesus, not a humanity that is a mere cloak for deity.

c. Ephesians.

(a) In Ephesians, as in Colossians, the crucifixion is the decisive saving event (2:14). sṓma is thus the crucified body in 2:16. It is in the one body that the one new man is created. Unity in the body means unity with others.

(b) The sṓma, then, is the church in which original aliens and enemies are now united with Israel (2:12ff.; cf. 1:23; 4:4, 12, 15-16; 5:23, 30).

(c) As Christ's body the church is the fullness of him who fills all in all (1:23)—the cosmic dimension. Growth through the preaching of the gospel brings to manifestation what already is (cf. 2:17). The church even bears the message to demonic powers (3:10). Its growth is that of a temple or building as God's dwelling. It permeates the cosmos in the new sense of a penetration that seizes control.

(d) Christ as head stands in contrast with the church but as the one from whom it derives its life and growth (4:16).

(e) In 5:23ff. the concept of the sacred marriage is present but with Christ as the eschatological Adam. The idea of the church as his body parallels the idea of the woman as the man's body (5:28). Gen. 2:24 provides not only the command that underlies the exhortation but also the saving fact on which it rests, the christologically understood indicative that demands the ethical imperative. That Christ is the savior shows that what is at issue is not just traditional superordination but a relation in which life comes to the body from the head.

d. sýssōmos. This word, found only in Christian writings, is so unusual that in Eph. 3:6 it catches up 2:16 in an intentional emphasis on the relation to Christ's body.

e. Distinctives. The new problem is that of an alien cosmos. Since the solution does not lie merely in creation—mediation, the universal church comes to the fore rather than the local church with its questions of mutual service. Christ is one with the church but also its head. His body now is the church moving out into the world with the gospel as the answer to cosmic anxiety. In this way Christ permeates the cosmos. This is the eschatological event which discloses the hitherto concealed mystery and fulfils God's plan of salvation.

III. Survey of the Historical Development. An interesting linguistic development comes to a head in Colossians and Ephesians. Hebrew has no special term for body, and Greek-speaking Jews must choose between sárx and sṓma. Paul adopts sṓma as a term for our creatureliness, for the place where we live, believe, and serve. For Paul, however, sṓma also means relationship with God and others rather than self-contained individuality. If the community as Christ's body is a self-contained unit, it is so only in mutual service as the body of the crucified Lord. As it grows in the world, in and by it Christ himself penetrates the cosmos. The NT, then, reconstructs the sṓma concept by putting it in the service of him who gave his body for the world and who in his body, the church, is still seeking the world.

F. The Post-NT Period.

1. The Apostolic Fathers.

a. sṓma means "corpse" in, e.g., Ignatius Romans 4.2; Mart. Pol. 17, "living (but weak) body" in Hermas Visions 3.11.4, "perishing body" in Hermas Visions 3.9.3. It forms a whole in Ignatius Romans 5.3. To be without it is demonic (Ignatius Smyrneans 2.1). In Mart. Pol. 19.2 the soul is the primary object of Christ's saving work, though there is no disparagement of the body. The soul permeates the whole body in Diog. 6.1ff.; so Christians should permeate society.

b. Pol. 8.1 quotes 1 Pet. 2:24 with reference to the crucified body. Ignatius Smyrneans 3.2 presupposes bodily resurrection. 1 Clem. 37.5 applies the metaphor of the body to believers as members (cf. Pol. 11:4; Ignatius Smyrneans 11.2). Yet there are few references to the body of Christ even if it is seen as natural that believers have a common body in the church and that the union of Jews and Gentiles is a decisive sign set up by Christ's resurrection. 2 Clem. 14.2ff. calls the living church Christ's sṓma; Christ is the pneúma and the church the sárx. In Ignatius Christ is the new man (Ephesians 20.1) and believers are his members (Trallians 11.2).

2. Apologists.

a. sṓma is the "animal body" in Justin Dialogue 31.3, the "corpse" in Aristides Apology 5.3, the (sick) "body" in Justin Dialogue 69.7, which alone ritual washings can affect (14.1). God will resurrect bodies (Justin Apology 18.6). God created them (Justin Dialogue 62.3), but noncorporeal beings come first (Athenagoras Supplication 36.2-3). Soul and body constitute humanity. Christ becomes body, lógos, and soul (Justin Apology 10.1). Both soul and body come into judgment (8.4). Christologically sṓma is less common than sárx but it is parallel to blood in the eucharistic sayings (66.3). Composed of the members, it denotes the church (Dialogue 42.3), the cosmos (Tatian Address to the Greeks 12.2), or God (Athenagoras Supplication 8.1).

c. Only Justin Dialogue 5.2 uses sṓma for an inorganic body.

3. Gnosticism.

a. In some Gnostic works the body is neutral. The noús may use it as an instrument of knowledge and Christ's resurrection body is perfect. Elsewhere the world is viewed as a corpse and there is a polemic against the bodily resurrection of Jesus. If Adam's body is suitably fashioned, only the pneúma enables him to move and makes him a living soul. True humanity, which is immortal, differs from the mortal body, which is its grave. In some systems what is perfect and immortal is separate from the mortal sṓma, which is made from the stoicheía and is subject to conflict. The Valentinians suppose that the demiurge creates bodies in which souls and heavenly lógoi dwell. Jesus has his body from the demiurge but his true essence from wisdom. Other views attribute the soul to the demiurge, the body to the earth, and the pneúma to wisdom. In such systems the body is doomed to destruction; baptism alters only the soul. A distinction is also made between noús and sṓma; authentic humanity is associated only with the noús, although not without the possibility of a new and immortal body. The Manichees, too, view the body negatively as the prison of the soul and the essence of desire. The idea of transmigration is a common one. The incarnation causes problems for Gnostics. They try to solve it by dividing up Christ, by attributing to him a psychic body, by denying the reality of the body, or by saying that he comes both with and without the body.

b. Body Embracing the Redeemed. The idea of the cosmic body occurs, but the use for the body of the redeemed is problematical prior to the Manichees. One passage might refer either to the incarnate body or to the resurrection body including the elect as a kind of garment. When Gnostics refer to a gigantic invisible Christ, they have his universal saving significance in view.

c. Summary. In Gnosticism as we know it thus far the idea of the body as a prison of the soul is common, but so is the tendency to view body and soul together as the earthly element in distinction from a divine factor (wisdom), which returns with the redeemer. Wisdom might then be equated with the OT lógos and combined with the idea of the supreme God who permeates and controls the cosmic body. It might also be loosely connected with the primal man. Where speculation on the primal man is important, the thought is that real man is trapped in matter, or in the body-soul. This constitutes the fall, which is repeated in the fall of the soul into the body. The real fault is not disobedience but forgetting the divine element. The revealer brings this element to light and thus opens the way to redemption by regeneration. The idea that the saved are a body occurs at most only in the very weakened form in which the divine wisdom that comes in the redeemer is linked to the particles of divine wisdom that humanity still bears. [E. SCHWEIZER, VII, 1045-94] sōreúō [to heap up], episōreúō [to heap on to]

A. The Greek World.

1. sōreúō, a rare word, means “to pile or heap up,” either “to pile one thing on another” or “to fill up.”

2. The compound episōreúō means “to heap on to.”

B. Hellenistic Judaism.

1. In the LXX sōreúō occurs only in Prov. 25:22 and Jdt. 15:11. ho sōrós is more common for a “heap” of stones, a “pile” of fruit, or a burial “mound.” In Prov. 25:22 the background may be the custom whereby the guilty carry glowing coals in a brazier on their heads. The idea is plainly that the wise repay evil with good. In Jdt. 15:11 Judith packs the loot in her chariot. The compound does not occur in the LXX, but Σ has it in Job 14:17 (storing up) and Cant. 2:4 (covering).

2. Philo does not use the group but Josephus uses sōreúō for the heaping up of bones (Antiquities 12.211) or of corpses (Jewish War 6.431).

C. The NT.

1. The simple form occurs in the NT only twice. Paul in Rom. 12:20 quotes Prov. 25:21-22. The context shows plainly that the idea is that of vanquishing hostility by love. In 2 Tim. 3:6 we have a transferred sense. False teachers ensnare women who are laden with sins and swayed by desires.

2. The compound occurs in the NT only in 2 Tim. 4:3 in a transferred sense. In the last days people will heap up teachers according to their own liking. The term stresses ironically the superficiality of their desire for knowledge.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. The compound occurs once in Barn. 4.6, which warns the readers not to add new sin by adopting a false view of the covenant. [F. LANG, VII, 1094-96]

sṓphrōn [of sound mind], sōphronéō [to be of sound mind], sōphronízō [to bring someone to his senses], sōphronismós [moderate, self-disciplined], sōphrosýnē [moderation, self-control] sṓphrōn, sōphronéō, sōphrosýnē.

A. The Group in Greek.

1. Etymology, Occurrence, and Meaning. sṓphrōn means first “of sound mind.” Etymology is of little help in translation. The term has such nuances as “rational” (intellectually sound), “rational” (without illusion), “rational” (purposeful), “moderate,” “prudent,” “modest,” “restrained,” and “disciplined.”

2. sōphrosýnē. The reference in this word is to a basic attitude that leads to certain modes of conduct. A link with aidṓs may be seen. Proper conduct rooted in aidṓs is marked by restraint or modesty as distinct from hýbris. With dikaiosýnē, sōphrosýnē is a leading civic virtue. It has central significance for an aristocratic manner of life. Plato adopts various definitions but the term is broader than all of them. Politically it is the agreement of the three classes as to who should rule and it thus represents restraint. Where it combines with power and reason, we have the best ingredients for a good constitution. For Aristotle it is the mean between license and stupidity. In Stoicism it is one of the cardinal virtues which by way of Hellenistic Judaism influence the early church. In popular lists of virtues it is a virtue of rulers, of professional people, and of women; it can become the equivalent of chastity.

B. The LXX and Hellenistic Judaism.

1. The group occurs in the LXX only in Greek works or those displaying Hellenistic influence. In Wis. 9:11 it is one of the cardinal virtues that are traced back to wisdom. In 4 Maccabees instruction in the law makes the cardinal virtues possible (cf. 2:16, 18; 3:17, 19).

2. The Testaments of the Twelve gives evidence of Stoic influence in a demand for sōphroneín that implies ascetic and dualistic tendencies (abstinence, chastity, etc.).

3. Josephus uses the group in the common sense.

4. For Philo sōphrosýnē is one of the classical virtues. It is the mean between frivolity and covetousness and battles against lasciviousness. With other virtues it has its origin in paradise. The brazen serpent is sōphrosýnē. Those who look on it see God; it thus makes possible the vision of God. With other virtues, it is not just a human attitude, but strictly a divine gift.

C. The NT and Apostolic Fathers.

1. In the NT the group occurs only 14 times (eight in the Pastorals). It is usually of little material significance. In Mk. 5:15, for example, a sign of the healing of the demoniac is that he is in his right mind, and in Acts 26:25 Paul answers the charge of mania by arguing that he speaks sober truth, or true and rational words.

2. Paul makes a play on words in Rom. 12:3 when he tells his readers to think of themselves with sober judgment according to the measure of faith (sōphroneín, not hyperphroneín). He expands the thought in 12:16. Christian sōphrosýnē is tapeinophrosýnē (Phil. 2:3). Paul avoids the term in lists of virtues (cf. 1 Th. 2:10), but in 2 Cor. 5:14 he contrasts the conduct of the pneumatics with sōphronéō; sober devotion to others corresponds to ecstasy before God.

3. 1 Pet. 4:7 warns the community not to give way to eschatological frenzy in face of the imminent end of things. To do so is to fall victim to the world. The required moderation is sustained by faith and issues in prayer and love (v. 8). More than the philosophical attitude is thus at issue.

4. The Pastorals use the group to describe Christian life in the world (cf. Tit. 2:12). It occurs in the list of virtues in Tit. 2:2. Faith manifests itself in a proper attitude to the world and its goods (1 Tim. 4:3ff.), i.e., one of moderation and content (1 Tim. 6:6ff.; cf. 2:15). Chastity and self-discipline are the point in Tit. 2:5. sōphrosýnē is an important requirement in officebearers (1 Tim. 3:2; Tit. 1:8). Respectability is not the concern, but an avoidance of ecstatic misunderstandings and dualistic tendencies, and the adoption of a proper relation to the world in the light of postponement of the parousia. The apostolic fathers follow a similar pattern.

D. The Early Church. The common equation of sōphrosýnē with chastity occurs in Justin Apology 14.2; Tatian Address to the Greeks 32.2. Justin also uses the group to show the rational character of faith in Apology 13.2ff. Prayer for rulers is prayer for their right understanding of Christianity in 17.3. Only a sṓphrōn logismós can keep Christians from error or apostasy.

1. This word means "to bring someone to reason or to duty," but it may also mean "to exhort," "to spur on."

2. Tit. 2:4 asks the older women to spur on the younger to worthy conduct.

3. The passive in Justin Apology 1.2 means "to be set right" in respect of a fault and in 2.2 it means "to attain to a morally suitable life."

sōphronismós.

1. This late word means literally "making understanding or wise," then "admonition," also "discretion," "moderation," "discipline."

2. In 2 Tim. 1:7 God has given a spirit of power, love, and sōphronismós, which in context denotes a regulated life. The term has a Hellenistic flavor, but it is here understood in terms of the Spirit. [U. LUCK, VII, 1097-1104] tapeinós [humble], tapeinóō [to humble], tapeínōsis [humility], tapeinóphrōn [humble], tapeinophrosýnē [humility]

A. The Greek and Hellenistic World.

1. Derivation and Meaning. Research has yielded no plain results. The basic sense seems to be "low."

2. tapeinós.

a. This word has such senses as "lowly," "mean," "insignificant," "weak," and "poor." It may be used of a city, country, state, or statesman, of a star, a river, goods, influence, etc. The condition may be intrinsic or due to the acts of others.

b. When used of the spiritual or moral state, the term means "lowly" or "servile," usually with the disparaging sense of obsequiousness or submissiveness. Although Socrates teaches that anyone can attain to a high and free disposition, Aristotle argues that whatever prevents the development of virtue makes the spirit tapeinós. Epictetus espouses worldly citizenship in spite of differences of status but tapeinós is still a negative term for him, denoting pettiness and baseness of disposition.

c. tapeinós can express a difficult situation or lowly status, e.g., that of the petitioner. The person who is tapeinós easily becomes a flatterer. When abasement is that of wickedness or immoderation, it can have positive meaning but it is not in itself a positive good. The Greeks resist prostration before rulers and the humiliation of children in view of their dislike of abasement.

d. Yet tapeinós can sometimes mean "modest" or "obedient" and in this sense be good, e.g., in subjects, soldiers, or children.

e. Oceanus demands that Prometheus be tapeinós relative to the gods. The idea is not that he should be humble but that he should adjust himself to them.

3. tapeinóō.

a. This verb means "to make small," "to humiliate," "to weaken."

b. It also takes on the senses "to oppress," "to exploit," "to break the spirit." The idea of self-belittling is abhorrent. Those who disparage themselves simply show how weak and poor they are. A positive sense occurs relative to humbling the self before the gods—a possible explanation of the custom of covering the head in sacrifice and prayer.

4. tapeínōsis. This word means "reduction," e.g., of a swelling, of people by fate (cf. also "depression" of mind).

5. tapeinóphrōn, tapeinophrosýnē.

a. The first of these two terms means "poor-spirited."

b. Epictetus uses the second term Dissertationes 3.24.56) in the sense of a "petty disposition" or "pusillanimity."

6. Meaning of the Derivatives. The derivatives confirm the meaning and the negative usage of tapeinós, although they also acquire the sense of obedient integration into a given order and even of subjection to deity.

B. The LXX.

1. Hebrew Originals. In the LXX tapeinós and derivatives are more common than in secular Greek. tapeinós occurs 67 times and tapeinóō 165 times for various Hebrew stems. The prominence of the verb shows that the main reference is to an action rather than a state, and the chief Hebrew originals confirm this. Thus the group ʿānâ has the basic sense of "stooping," "bowing down," and then "humbling oneself" (or "being humbled" by sickness, poverty, want, etc.). From this we get such senses as humility, modesty, subservience, compliance, and affliction.

*2. tapeinóō

a. This word means "to bow down," "to make low," "to humble."

b. Another sense is "to bend," "to oppress," "to harass," "to weaken," "to destroy," "to force" (also sexually).

c. tapeinóō emautón or the middle passive means "to abase oneself," "to cast oneself down." In fasting people humble themselves before God, but the OT never glorifies such self-abasement, stressing instead the humble attitude of the heart (cf. Prov. 25:7; Joel 2:12-13; Is. 58:5ff.).

d. God lays low the mighty and exalts the lowly (1 Sam. 2:7; Ezek. 21:31). This applies both to Israel and to her foes, and also to individuals. Is. 2:11 states the principle. The prophets direct it against Jerusalem and Zion (Is. 3:8). Ps. 75:8 says plainly that the Lord puts down one and lifts up another. Yet while sickness humbles and death brings down to the dust, God does not reject those who humble themselves before him (Pss. 44:25; 51:17). God may humble individuals so as to put them in a right relationship to himself (Ps. 116:6). Hence abasement can mean salvation (Ps. 119:71). The great need is to see God's purpose and find a relation of obedience to the commandment. God abases, but when the humbled repent, the affliction ceases (1 Kgs. 8:35-36).

a. This first means "low," "flat."

b. It then means "bowed down," "small," "base," "insignificant" in a negative sense. God chooses the insignificant for his plans (Judg. 6:15; 1 Sam. 18:23). The tapeinoí are those who keep God's statutes (Ps. 119:67). God leaves in Israel a humble and lowly people that seeks his name (Zeph. 3:12).

c. Another meaning is "oppressed," "held down," e.g., by foreign powers or by the wealthy. In this sense poverty and lowliness are related.

d. God, however, exalts those who are outwardly or inwardly oppressed (Pss. 18:27; 34:18). It is God's eternal nature to look on the lowly (Ps. 138:6). He does not despise their prayer (Ps. 102:17). The Messiah will establish right for the meek and pronounce sentence for the oppressed (Is. 11:4). The Lord has made Zion a refuge for the oppressed (Is. 14:32; cf. 25:4). Is. 49:13 speaks similarly. God's covenant of peace is forever with the lowly (54:10-11). He has regard to the humble and contrite in spirit (66:2).

*4. tapeínōsis. This word means "humble situation," "lowliness," "sorrow." The lowly or difficult situation might be that of Israel (Dt. 26:7) or of individuals (Gen. 16:11). Ps. 10:14 refers to the tapeínōsis brought on by enemies. In Ps. 90:3 it is the destiny of death whose cause is sin (Ps. 25:18). In it God's word leads to life (Ps. 119:153). One should handle with patience those who thus undergo oppression (Prov. 16:19). The Servant undergoes it in Is. 53:8. This is a reason for his exaltation (cf. vv. 7, 10ff.).

5. The Greek and Biblical Understanding. The Greek view of humanity exalts freedom and thus despises subjection. Hence it qualifies tapeinós negatively. The Bible sets humanity under God and thus extols obedient service. Hence it gives the tapeinós group a positive sense.

C. Judaism.

1. Qumran and Apocalyptic.

a. The Qumran sectaries call themselves the poor, thus stressing their dependence on God and also their election. Their rule demands humility toward one another as well as God. They are also to be humble before the mighty but with concealed hostility.

b. Some passages from the Testaments of the Twelve speak about the abasement that goes with conversion. tapeínōsis is the conversion of the heart accompanied by fasting. As subjection to God it must also be shown to priests and to others.

c. Apocalyptic displays a similar spirit. Those who humble themselves receive greater honor. The hearts of the rich convict them as sinners who tread down the lowly. There will finally be an eschatological humbling of the earth by plagues.

2. Rabbinic Writings. The rabbis attach great value to humility. If keeping the law leads to it, it is also needed to attain and retain knowledge of the law. If any become proud of this, God humbles them, but if they repent, he raises them up again. Humility means modesty in relation to others. Long-suffering goes with subjection of heart. The rabbis accuses Christians of pride, but Christians reverse the charge, claiming that rabbinic practice does not accord with theory.

3. Hellenistic Judaism.

a. The Epistle of Aristeas advises travelers to be humble on the twofold ground that God accepts the humble and others are usually gracious to them.

b. Philo uses the group in the Greek sense but also adopts biblical insights. Abasement is an essential transition into God's presence. Persuasion of human pettiness brings appreciation of the divine majesty.

c. Josephus uses the group negatively in the Greek senses of "baseness," "pettiness," "poor-spiritedness," and also in the sense of "abasement" or "humiliation."

D. The NT.

1. Occurrence of the Group in the NT. In the NT tapeinós occurs eight times, tapeinóō 14, tapeínōsis four, tapeinophrosýnē seven, and tapeinóphrōn once. In all there are 34 instances, 13 of which are in Pauline works, but none in the Johannine material, Mark, Hebrews, Jude, 2 Peter, or the Pastorals.

2. tapeinóō.

a. Lk. 3:5 extends the quotation from Is. 40:3ff.; we see from 1:48, 52 that the saying is taken figuratively.

b. Jesus states that those who exalt themselves will be abased and those who abase themselves will be exalted (Mt. 23:12; Lk. 14:11; 18:14). The form of the saying is Jewish, the OT supplies the content, and the rabbis offer parallels. The future passive conceals the name of God. The placing of the saying (e.g., in Lk. 14:11) shows that humility before God is at issue. In Lk. 18:14 the humility of the publican sets him in a right relation to God. Mt. 18:4 adds the special nuance that abasement before God means becoming a child before him. Jesus does not demand visible self-abasement (cf. Mt. 6:16ff.; Mk. 2:18-19) but a total trust in God that expects everything from him and nothing from self.

c. Paul in 2 Cor. 10:1 faces the accusation that he has a servile disposition because he refuses support from the church. In answer he argues that his self-abasement is for the church's exaltation (11:7). On his coming he fears fresh humiliation unless there be conversion (12:19ff.), not merely through contempt but through the threat to his reputation. In Phil. 4:12-13, however, he knows how to handle abasement as well as abundance through Christ's strengthening. In this regard he follows the Lord who humbled himself and was thus highly exalted (2:7, 9). The reference here is first to a free self-emptying of the divine likeness and then to free obedience even to the death of the cross. At once historical and eschatological, this act is the governing factor in the Christian life.

d. Jms. 4:10, quoting Prov. 3:34 LXX, calls for submission to God and adds the promise of exaltation by him. In context the demanded submission is that of penitence. 1 Pet. 5:5-6, influenced by the same OT verse, calls for the subjection which means putting one's whole trust in the grace of the God who cares for those who humble themselves before him.

3. tapeinós.

a. Close to Lk. 3:5 is 1:52, which refers to God's eschatological work.

b. 1 Pet. 5:5 and Jms. 4:6 quote Prov. 3:34 LXX. They both use ho theós to show that the reference is not to Christ. Jms. 1:9 says that the lowly may boast in their exaltation, and the rich in their humiliation, in a reversal of worldly values (cf. Mt. 5:3; 11:5; Lk. 4:18; Jms. 2:5).

c. Applied to Paul in 2 Cor. 10:1, tapeinós has the derogatory Greek sense, but Paul makes the OT point that God comforts the humble (7:6). In Rom. 12:16 Paul exhorts to association with the lowly (or possibly to the acceptance of lowly services).

d. In Mt. 11:20 Jesus says that he himself is meek and lowly, not of necessity, but in free dedication to God (in heart), and in service to others (cf. Lk. 22:27; Mt. 20:28) as he gives himself to sinners and the despised.

4. tapeínōsis.

a. Philip in Acts 8:32ff. applies Is. 53:7-8 to Christ and his people as they move through humiliation to exaltation (cf. Lk. 9:22ff.; 12:49-50).

b. In Lk. 1:48 the reference is either to "childlessness" if Elizabeth is meant or "lowliness" if Mary is meant. On the latter view the choice of the humble Mary to give birth to God's Son exemplifies God's eschatological action in history.

c. Paul calls the present body the body of humiliation in Phil. 3:21. The point at issue is its subjection to death, which will be remedied when the body is fashioned afresh after Christ's risen body of glory.

d. In Jms. 1:10 the humiliation of the rich is the subjection to death that brings their affluence to nothing. The eschatological inversion of all things is already at work in the church.

5. tapeinophrosýnē.

a. In Phil. 2:4 Paul asks for the humility which takes the form of unselfishness, i.e., concern for the welfare of others. Christ's own self-giving provides the model as God in Christ takes us seriously and acts on our behalf. Only by a similar refraining from self-assertion can members of the church maintain its unity. Paul offers a personal example in Acts 20:19.

b. In Col. 2:18, 23 the term is a concept in the Colossian heresy and it either means "fasting" or "mortification," or else it implies the "inferiority" that leads to the cult of angels. Either way it involves cultic practice, not disposition. In contrast the reference in Col. 3:12 is to the new conduct of Christians toward others. The same applies in Eph. 4:2 with an emphasis on unity.

c. 1 Pet. 5:5 enjoins humility as a readiness for mutual service in the place ordained by God. This stands at the heart of the new Christian life in which the members all live for one another and for God.

6. tapeinóphrōn. 1 Pet. 3:8 concludes the detailed directions with the demand that all be of a humble mind. For true Christian fellowship it is essential that there be a humble readiness for service to others (cf. 5:5).

E. The Apostolic Fathers.

1. tapeinós. This term denotes the poor or oppressed in 1 Clem. 59.4. Esther's humility saves the people in 55.6. Barn. 3.3 quotes Is. 58:6-7.

2. tapeinóō. God's abasing and exalting is the theme in 1 Clem. 59.3ff. Barn. 4.4 quotes Dan. 7:24 and 4.5 quotes Dan. 7:7-8.

3. tapeínōsis. 1 Clem. 53.2 refers this term to Moses on the mount.

4. tapeinophronéō. This term denotes self-humbling, renunciation of sin, subjection to Scripture, and in Hermas Similitudes 7.6 humble and persevering submission to fasting and affliction.

5. tapeinophrosýnē. This term expresses the disposition in humbling. A lowly mind should mark officebearers (1 Clem. 44.3) and is a presupposition of effectual prayer (Hermas Visions 3.10.6).

6. tapeinophrónēsis. In Hermas this new word comes into use for subjection to God's commandments (cf. Similitudes 8.7.6).

7. tapeinóphrōn. 1 Clement uses this word as a noun for the humility of the fathers. Other references are Barn. 19.3; Ignatius Ephesians 10.2; Hermas Mandates 11.8.

8. The Shift in Sense. With the relaxing of eschatological tension humility becomes a disposition that produces penitence rather than an eschatological expectation and a manner of life under Christ's control. Hermas even equates humility with penitence and fasting. Jewish Christian influence and fear of moral decay in society and the church help to explain this decisive change. [W. GRUNDMANN, VIII, 1-26] tássō [to order, determine], tágma [order, rank], anatássō [to arrange], apotássō [to depart], diatássō [to order, direct], diatagḗ [instruction, direction], epitagē [command], prostássō [to order, command], hypotássō [to subject], hypotagḗ [subjection], anypótaktos [not subject], átaktos [disordered], (atáktōs [disorderly]), ataktéō [to act disorderly] tássō.

1. This word means "to appoint," "to order," with such nuances as "to arrange," "to determine," "to set in place," "to establish," and middle "to fix for oneself."

2. LXX senses are "to appoint," "to prohibit," "to ordain," "to set," "to draw up," and middle "to command," "to make disposition," "to fix," "to turn one's gaze," "to set one's heart," and "to make."

3. In the NT we find "to determine" in Acts 15:2, "to appoint" in 28:23, and "to order" in Mt. 28:16. God orders or appoints (passive voice) in Acts 22:10. Christians are ordained to eternal life in Acts 13:48; conferring of status rather than foreordination is the point. In Rom. 13:1 secular powers are instituted by God and hence have an authorization that believers must respect. The term exousíai in this verse is a common one for those in office but can also have the more general sense of authorities or powers. It includes the Roman state but also municipal authorities, with an emphasis on the administration of justice. Ruling powers might promote the pagan cultus, and might also abuse their authority, but they have a divine commission for the task they discharge, and hence they must be respected, as must obligations to them.

LXX Septuagint

NT New Testament

4. In the apostolic fathers the verb occurs four times. The stars are ordained by God in 1 Clem. 20.2, the times of cultic practice are set in 1 Clem. 40.1-2, angels are posted on the way of light in Barn. 18.1, and Mart. Pol. 10.2 echoes Rom. 13:1.

1. This word usually means "what is fixed" or "ordered" and finds varied use for a set sum, a group, or a position or rank.

2. In the LXX it occurs in the sense of a "unit" (Num. 2:2ff.; 10:14ff.). It represents infantry in 1 Sam. 4:10, and camp is presupposed in 2 Sam. 23:13.

3. In the NT the only instance is in 1 Cor. 15:23, where the most likely meaning is "order," "position," "rank." Christ rises first, then his people at his coming, when they receive a new corporeality. Nothing is said about the rest.

4. In 1 Clem. 37.3; 41.1 we find the same phrase as in 1 Cor. 15:23. tágma means "group" in Hermas Similitudes 8.5.1ff., and Ignatius Romans 5.1 has stratiōtikón tágma for a detachment of soldiers.

anatássō. This rare verb means "to order fully," "to arrange." Lk. 1:1ff. refers to the orderly account of the things delivered by eyewitnesses. Putting down in writing necessarily confers order on what is at first oral tradition.

apotássō.

1. This term means "to delegate," "to assign," "to set aside," "to separate," "to part," "to leave," "to renounce."

2. In the LXX it means "to appoint," "to detach," "to separate."

3. The NT uses the middle "to part from" in Acts 18:18, 21; 2 Cor. 2:13, "to depart" in Mk. 6:46. Those who insist on parting from family before becoming disciples are not fit for the kingdom (Lk. 9:61-62). Jesus demands radical renunciation of possessions from intending disciples (Lk. 14:33).

4. In the apostolic fathers the word denotes full separation from wickedness (Hermas Mandates 6.2.9; 2 Clem. 6.4) or renunciation of life (Ignatius Philadelphians 11.1). In the Apologists Christians leave pagan wisdom (Tatian Address to the Greeks 1.3), idols (Justin Apology 49.5), and all things worldly (Dialogue 119.6).

1. This word means "to order," "to dispose," "to decide," "to establish," "to give directions."

2. The word is rare in the LXX, where it has such senses as "to order," "to arrange," "to allot," "to determine," "to measure," and "to command."

3. In the NT Jesus "directs" in Lk. 8:55, Paul arranges in Acts 20:13, Claudius orders in Acts 18.2, the officer gives instructions in Acts 23:31, the master commands in Lk. 17:9, God gives directions in Acts 7:44, Jesus instructs in Mt. 11:1, the Lord has commanded in 1 Cor. 9:14, and the apostle gives various directions in 1 Cor. 7:17; 11:34; 16:1. The sense is "to direct" in Tit. 1:5 and "to ordain" in Gal. 3:19, where the role of angels suggests that the law does not come directly from God, although God, of course, intends it.

4. In the apostolic fathers Ignatius uses the term relative to his own ordination (Ephesians 3.1; Trallians 3.3), 1 Clem. 43.1 says that Moses records what is ordained for him, and 1 Clem. 20.6 maintains that the sea does what God has appointed for it. In Diog. 7.2 heaven, earth, and sea are ordained by God.

diatag̓ḗ.

1. This word means "instruction."

2. The only LXX instance is in 2 Esdr. 4:11.

3. In the NT Stephen in Acts 7:53 says that the Jews received the law as directions from angels and hence as God's instructions. In Rom. 13:2 to resist authority is to be in conflict with God's ordinance or appointment. The reference is to persistent resistance or resistance in principle. Not every decree of government is necessarily a divine ordinance.

4. In the apostolic fathers the only instance is in 1 Clem. 20.3, where the heavenly bodies follow their courses by divine "direction."

epitagḗ.

1. This word means "ordinance," "disposition," "order," or "statute."

2. In the LXX it denotes the ordinances of God in Wis. 18:15 and of a ruler in 14:17.

3. In the NT the term occurs only in the Pauline writings and mostly in the phrase kat' epitagḗn, which means "by command" or "at the behest." In 1 Cor. 7:25 the Lord's command decides; in contrast Paul's counsel is not by command. In 2 Cor. 8:8 "not by command" stresses the voluntary nature of the offering that Paul is commending. In Rom. 16:26 the proclamation of the mystery is by God's command, and by God's command Paul is entrusted with the preaching of the word (cf. 1 Tim. 1:1). The authority of the pastoral word is the point in Tit. 2:15.

1. This word means "to order," "to command," "to impart an ethical direction or norm" (Stoicism).

2. In the LXX God commands in Lev. 10:1, Moses in Ex. 36:6, rulers in 2 Chr. 31:13.

3. In the NT Peter orders baptism in Acts 10:48, Moses ordained statutes in Mk. 1:44, the angel gives instructions in Mt. 1:24, God has commanded Peter's preaching in Acts 10:33, and God has taken order in Acts 17:26. In the latter verse the reference might be to seasons but is more probably to divisions of years or to epochs. In any case the divine determination testifies to God's providential care and historical supervision.

4. In the apostolic fathers the idea is again that of legitimate commanding, e.g., by the will of God in Ignatius Polycarp 8.1, and angel in Hermas Similitudes 7.1, God in 1 Clem. 20.11, and the church in 1 Clem. 54.2.

hypotássō.

A. The Greek World.

1. The active form of this verb means "to place under," "to affix," "to subordinate" (passive "to be subject").

2. The middle form means "to subject oneself," "to be subservient," "to submit voluntarily."

B. The LXX. The verb is not common in the LXX and stands for 13 Hebrew words in the usual senses "to place under," "to subordinate," "to subject," passive "to be subject," and middle "to subject oneself," "to submit," especially to God (Ps. 37:7).

C. The NT.

1. In the NT the term has a wide range of meaning centering on the idea of enforced or voluntary subordination. The active occurs in Rom. 8:20 to express the thought that creation is subjected to futility (cf. 5:12). The other active statements are christological. Quoting Ps. 8:6, 1 Cor. 15:25 says that Christ subjects all things (including death) to himself. Naturally this does not include God, for it is finally God who does the subjecting. Ps. 8:6 also underlies Phil. 3:21. Here Christ does the subjecting; he manifests his unlimited power by transforming the lowly body into the likeness of his glorious body. In Heb. 2:7-8 (cf.

---

cf. confer, compare

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

again Ps. 8:6) God subjects the world, not to angels, but to the Son, who is superior to the angels. The subjecting has begun but awaits consummation. Eph. 1:22 relates Ps. 8:6 to the enthronement that has already taken place, and with an ecclesiological reference. 1 Pet. 3:22 refers similarly to a subjection that Christ's ascension and session complete. The common use of the verb of Ps. 8:6 shows that this verse holds an important place in the primitive Christian confession.

2. a. The middle denotes enforced submission in Lk. 10:17, 20, but elsewhere voluntary submission is at issue. Thus in Rom. 8:7 the flesh resists submission to God's demand. Pious Judaism resists submission to God's saving work in Rom. 10:3. A play on the active occurs in 1 Cor. 15:28. In his only use of the absolute "the Son," Paul here shows that the Son achieves absolute power only to hand it back to God. All power rightly belongs to God, but to the very limit God has given to "the Son" the precedence that is his due.

b. The middle often occurs in exhortation (cf. submission to God in Jms. 4:7 and to salutary discipline in Heb. 12:9).

c. Lk. 2:51 stresses the subjection of the boy Jesus to his earthly parents. Like the subjection of wives to husbands (Col. 3:18; Eph. 5:21ff.; 1 Pet. 3:1; Tit. 2:5), this is according to a divinely willed order.

d. Also divinely willed is the submission to authorities in Rom. 13:1ff., which acknowledges their legitimacy on the basis of their divine commission to reward good and punish evil. Tit. 3:1 and 1 Pet. 2:13-14 echo this teaching, which possibly rests on the reply of Jesus in Mk. 12:17 and parallels. At issue, of course, is the attitude to government as such rather than specifically the Roman state. Christians do not submit to the state merely because it provides conditions for their life and mission. They and all people owe subjection because government is by divine ordination.

e. Slaves should be subject to their masters, not now because slavery is by divine ordination, but because it is a reality that Christians are in no position to set aside. Among themselves, they can and should set it aside as members of the one family of God (cf. 1 Pet. 2:18; 1 Tim. 6:1-2; Phlm. 16).

f. 1 Pet. 5:5 demands the subjection of the younger to the elder, but also a general humility corresponding to the mutual subjection of Eph. 5:21. As a witness to unbelievers, Christians should accept submission to all human institutions for the Lord's sake.

g. The general rule in NT exhortation is that there should be mutual readiness to renounce one's own will for others. Even when believers owe secular subjection, this takes on a new aspect and has a new basis with the common subjection to Christ. The demand for mutual subjection shows that Christian hypotássomai bears a material relation to Christian tapeinophrosýnē.

D. The Early Church. Among the apostolic fathers Ignatius asks for submission to the bishop (and to one another) (Magnesians 13.2 etc.). 1 Clem. 57.2 counsels submission to the divinely ordained authorities. The heavens submit to God in 1 Clem. 20.1 (cf. Diog. 7.2). God in love has subjected creation to us (Hermas Mandates 12.4.2). Slaves should submit to their masters in godly reverence and fear (Did. 4.10-11). Of the Apologists Justin makes most use of the term, e.g., for God subjecting the earth to us or for the subjecting of enemies or demons to Christ (Apology 40.7; Dialogue 30.3).

1. This word means "submission" or "subordination," as well as "slavery."

2. It occurs in the LXX only as a slip in Wis. 18:15A.

3. In the NT it occurs only in the Pauline corpus—for renunciation of initiative in 1 Tim. 2:11, for the submissiveness of children in 1 Tim. 3:4, for readiness to make the collection as a confession of faith in 2 Cor. 9:13, for submission in Gal. 2:5.

4. In the apostolic fathers the noun means unanimous submission to leaders in Ignatius Ephesians 2.2. This is based on the submission of members to the body in 1 Clem. 37.5.

anypótaktos.

1. This late term means “not subject,” “free,” “not subjecting oneself.”
2. In the NT it means “not subject” in Heb. 2:8 but “insubordinate” or “refractory” in Tit. 1:6; 1 Tim. 1:9.

átaktos (atáktōs), ataktéō.

1. átaktos means “disordered,” “disorderly,” “undisciplined,” “unbridled,” “without law or order.” ataktéō means “to set oneself outside the order,” “to evade obligations,” “to act without discipline, or irresponsibly.”
2. In the NT the adjective occurs in 1 Th. 5:14, the adverb in 2 Th. 3:6, 11, and the verb in 2 Th. 3:7. In 2 Th. 3:7 the reference is not just to laziness but to irresponsibility. Those who will not earn their living are outside the civil order, which embraces believers too. They are also outside the requirements of Christian teaching (v. 6). An undisciplined secular life stands in contradiction with the Christian profession. 1 Th. 5:4 is to the same effect.
3. In the apostolic fathers we find the adjective in Diog. 9.1, which deals with the disorder that God has permitted prior to the saving work of Christ. 1 Clem. 40.2 uses the adverb in showing that we must not perform cultic acts in a disorderly way. The Apologists use only the adjective (Athenagoras Supplication 25.3). [G. DELLING, VII, 27-48]

télos [end, goal], teléō [to carry out, complete], epiteléō [to carry out, complete], synteléo [to complete, fulfil], syntéleia [completion, fulfilment], pantelḗs [complete, full], téleios [complete, perfect], teleiótēs [completeness, perfection], teleióō [to complete, perfect], teleı́ōsis [completeness, perfection], teleiōtḗs [perfecter] télos.

A. The Greek World.

1. télos first means “achievement,” “fulfilment,” “execution,” “success,” then “power,” “official power,” and “office.”
2. Another meaning is “completion,” “perfection,” “final step,” “supreme stage,” “crown,” “goal,” “maturity,” “result,” “conclusion,” “end,” “cessation.” Adverbially the meaning is “finally,” “fully,” “totally,” “unceasingly.”
3. télos can also mean “obligation.”
4. Cultically it denotes an “offering” to the gods or a “celebration” of the “mysteries” or the “fulfilment” of sacrifices.
5. Finally a télos may be a “detachment” or “group.”

B. The LXX.

1. Used for various Hebrew terms, télos means “execution” in 1 Chr. 29:19.
2. It then has such senses as “goal” (Job 23:3), “result” (2 Macc. 5:7), “conclusion” (Eccl. 7:2), “end” (Dan. 9:27). eis télos can have such senses as “forever,” “completely,” “perfectly,” “to the limit,” diá télous denotes “continually,” and we find méchri télous for “constantly” or “in full measure.”

v. verse

3. télos may also mean “tax,” “toll,” or “tribute” (Num. 31:28).

4. In the headings of many Psalms eis tó télos seems to mean “for the cultus” and the reference is thus to an “act” in divine worship.

C. The End in Jewish Apocalyptic. télos has different senses in apocalyptic according to differing expectations. One use is for the “last time” either as the “latter days” or as a “last epoch” distinct from history in general. This last time will bring the fulfilment of the OT promises. Qumran has the expression “the end of the days.” In 4 Esdras the “end” is a culminating time, fixed by God, which embraces great distress, the coming of the Messiah, the judgment, transformation, and salvation. The “end” of this world stands in antithesis to the beginning of the next.

D. The NT.

1. To understand télos and teléō in the NT one must remember their dynamic character; they denote “fulfilment” (cf. Lk. 22:37).

2. a. Love is the “goal” of instruction in 1 Tim. 1:5, salvation is the “goal” of faith in Christ in 1 Pet. 1:9, and “aim” or “goal” seems to be the point in 1 Cor. 10:11.

b. In Mt. 26:58 “issue” or “result” is meant (cf. Jms. 5:11; Heb. 6:8). The eschatological “result” or “destiny” is at issue in Rom. 6:21-22 (cf. also Phil. 3:19; 2 Cor. 11:15; 1 Pet. 4:17).

c. The meaning “end” or “conclusion” is less likely than “fulfilment” in Lk. 22:37. In Rev. 21:6; 22:13 télos, with archḗ, denotes eternity and majesty. The eschatological end or conclusion is the point in 1 Cor. 15 and Mk. 13. Prepositional phrases have an adverbial character and carry such meanings as “to the end,” “fully,” “finally,” “wholly,” and “continually.”

d. The sense “cessation” occurs in Heb. 7:3; 2 Cor. 3:13; Lk. 1:33; Mk. 3:26; Rom. 7:4. The narrower context supports this meaning for Rom. 10:4, where the point is that the cross abolishes the possibility of attaining to righteousness by the law.

3. “Tax” or “tribute” is the meaning of télos in Mt. 17:25; Rom. 13:7.

4. The meanings “detachment” and “initiatory act” do not occur in the NT.

E. The Apostolic Fathers. In these works the usage is not very specific. We find such senses as “end” (Ignatius Ephesians 14.1), “result” (Rom. 6:21-22), “goal” (Rom. 1:1), “last time” (Hermas Visions 3.8.9). Adverbial uses are for “finally,” “always,” “without end,” “totally,” and “completely.”

teléō.

A. Outside the Bible.

1. a. This verb means “to carry out,” “to execute.”

b. As distinct from promising it means “to fulfil.”

c. “To carry out instructions” is another sense.

2. The word also means “to bring to an end.”

3. Another meaning is “to fulfil obligations.”

4. Cultically the word means “to carry out religious acts,” “to sacrifice,” “to instal” (as a priest), “to consecrate” (initiates). Philo uses teléō both for adopting the worship of false gods and for priestly consecration and initiation into the higher mysteries of knowledge (cf. initiation into the mysteries of government).

B. The LXX. In the LXX teléō has such various senses as “to carry through,” “to actualize,” “to complete,” “to conclude,” and religiously “to dedicate oneself” (but only to the service of a pagan god).

OT Old Testament

C. The NT.

1. a. In 2 Cor. 12:9 Christ's power "is truly efficacious" in weakness. Gal. 5:16 forbids "carrying out" a will that is opposed to the Spirit. In Lk. 12:50 the reference is to "accomplishing" the baptism of judgment. "Completed" is the point in Jn. 19:30. "Successfully finishing" is meant in 2 Tim. 4:7. God's wrath is "executed" in the plagues in Rev. 15:1, his plan is "fulfilled" in 10:7, and "ending" or "accomplishing" is the point in 15:8.

b. Divine sayings about the future are "put into effect" in Rev. 17:17 (cf. those about Christ's death in Lk. 22:37).

c. The parents of Jesus "carry out" the rites of purification in Lk. 2:39 (cf. the uncircumcised in Rom. 2:27). Love "fulfils" the royal law in Jms. 2:8ff. (cf. Lev. 19:18).

2. The disciples will not "finish" the list of Israel's cities before the parousia in Mt. 10:23. Jesus "finishes" sets of teaching in Mt. 7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1. A divinely appointed time "ends" in Rev. 20:3, 5, 7.

3. The meaning "to pay taxes" occurs in Mt. 17:24; Rom. 13:6.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. Apart from Barn. 7.3 ("fulfilled" type), the word occurs in these works only in Hermas for "to perform," "to carry out," "to complete."

epiteléō.

1. This stronger form of teléō has the similar senses "to carry out," "to fulfil," "to execute," "to pay," and "to celebrate."

2. In the LXX we find "to accomplish," "to carry through," "to fulfil," "to end," and "to celebrate" (a feast or a wedding).

3. a. In the NT the meaning "to perform," "to establish" occurs in Heb. 8:5, "to actualize" in 2 Cor. 7:1, "to carry out" or "accomplish" in 2 Cor. 8:11, and "to carry through" in Phil. 1:6.

b. The meaning "to finish" (in contrast to beginning) may be found in Gal. 3:3.

c. Heb. 9:6 refers to priestly functions.

4. "Accomplishing" sacrifices is the meaning in Diog. 3.5, "carrying out" orders (1 Clem. 37.2-3) or cultic acts (40.2-3) also occurs, and "fulfilling" an OT saying (Dt. 32:15) is meant in 1 Clem. 3.1.

synteléō.

1. Nonbiblical Usage. This word means "to fulfil obligations," "to contribute," "to do together," "to cooperate," "to carry out," "to execute," "to work," "to take place," "to end," "to finish," and "to perform" (sacrifices etc.).

2. The LXX. In the LXX we find the senses "to accomplish," "to carry out," "to complete," "to execute," "to end," "to finish," "to put an end to," "to cease," and "to celebrate."

3. The NT.

a. A first meaning is "to execute" with such nuances as "to practice" (Lk. 4:13), "to fulfil" (Heb. 8:8), and "to put into effect" (Rom. 9:28).

b. The meaning "to end" or "to come to an end" occurs in Lk. 4:2 and Acts 21:27.

4. The Apostolic Fathers. Hermas uses the verb for "to carry out" or "to finish," and Barnabas has it in quotations or with reference to a quotation (15.4; cf. Gen. 2:2).

syntéleia. Outside the Bible this word means "common accomplishment" (also "taxes"), "cooperation," "execution," "completion," "conclusion."

2. In the LXX it has such varied senses as "execution," "totality," "satiety," "fulfilment," "conclusion," "cessation," and "destruction."

3. In Daniel LXX it is a technical term for the eschatological "end" (cf. 11:35; 12:4), though it may also mean "end" in a more general sense (9:26). It is a technical apocalyptic term in the Testaments of the Twelve, sometimes with the thought of completion.

4. Qumran has a reference to the "end" of time.

5. The NT uses the term only in eschatological sayings. In Heb. 9:27 Christ's saving work is the event of the end time. The juxtaposition stresses its definitiveness and perfection. In Matthew the phrase "end of the age" (13:39; 24:3; 28:20) refers to eschatological events that have yet to take place, including the judgment (13:39-40, 49).

6. Of the apostolic fathers only Hermas uses syntéleia (the "end"). The Apologist Tatian uses it in the context of resurrection and judgment (Address to the Greeks 6.1; 17.1).

1. This word refers to full completion and hence has such senses as "full," "complete," "intact," or adverbially "completely," "altogether," "permanently."

2. In the LXX it occurs only in Maccabees for "complete," and as an adverb "totally," "wholly," "fully," or, negatively, "not at all."

3. The NT uses the term only in the adverbial phrase eis tó pantelḗs. This means either "fully" or "at all" in Lk. 13:11; the emphasis on being bound favors the latter. The totality of Christ's saving work in Heb. 7:25 means that he is able to save both "forever" and "altogether"; the term has both nuances.

4. The Apologists have eis tó pantelḗs for "absolutely" (Tatian Address to the Greeks 6.1) and pantelṓs for "generally" (Justin Epitome 10.8).

téleios.

A. Outside the Bible. This adjective means "whole," "unblemished," "full," "perfect," "actualized," "efficacious," "mature," "supreme," and perhaps "dedicated."

B. The Philosophical Concept of Perfection.

1. In philosophy téleios carries the sense of full humanity with an orientation to what is worthwhile and ethically good. In Plato this entails the attainment of insight by recollection and the resultant achievement of true being. Whereas the perfection of the cosmos is its completeness, the téleion in the ethical sphere is intrinsic goodness or the absolute good.

2. In Aristotle perfection is present with right ethical choice, i.e., with the choice for its own sake of the good in an absolute sense.

3. For Stoics that person alone is téleios who has all virtues, and that deed alone is téleios in which all virtues cooperate.

4. Philo comes under various influences. Academic vision is the perfect good, but divinely given wisdom is the perfect way to God. In the strict sense God himself is the perfect good and the giver of perfect goods. The law means that piety comes though perfect virtue, whose use is happiness, and whose fruitfulness depends on God. The pinnacle of most perfect felicity is God himself. To possess a wholly perfect nature is to be free from passion and desire. The perfect person regards only the ethically beautiful as good, standing between God and humanity, yet not wholly free from error as God is. Taking note of the law is the way to perfectness. The forefathers are perfect, and to the perfect Abraham (after the change of name) God gives the promise of Gen. 22:16-17. Moses is the perfect sage and the most perfect of the prophets; his perfect soul goes directly to God apart from any visible event.

C. The LXX and Dead Sea Scrolls.

1. In the LXX téleios has such meanings as "unblemished," "undivided" (cf. the obedient heart in 1 Kgs. 8:61; 11:4), "total" (cf. Jer. 13:19).

i.e. id est, that is

2. The equivalent terms in the Dead Sea Scrolls have the senses “without defect,” “unblemished,” “entire,” and “undivided.”

D. The NT.

1. The use in Matthew carries the LXX sense of “whole” or “undivided.” Thus the rich young ruler is not yet “undivided” in his obedience to God (19:20). God is undivided in his conduct toward us, and so must we be in our conduct toward him and others (5:48). Our total love should encompass even enemies.

2. The sense “whole” or “complete” also occurs in Jms. 1:4. Those are whole who do the whole work and whose steadfastness works itself out fully. This means looking into the “entire” law of liberty (1:25) and doing it. This law brings liberty with its observance. It finds fulfilment in love but also in self-control, for the whole person bridles the whole body, including the tongue (3:2ff.). What is “whole” and without fault comes from God (1:17). “Full” and “unlimited” love leaves no place for fear (1 Jn. 4:18). This love comes from God (v. 16) in the sending of the Son that removes fear of judgment (v. 10). The command to be “completely” sober in 1 Pet. 1:13 is ethically related and eschatologically grounded.

3. In the Pauline corpus “whole” seems to be the sense in 1 Cor. 13:10. The gifts do not give the full knowledge which is to come. Col. 4:12 refers to the solid position of those who are “complete” in God’s total will. Yet the idea of maturity is also present, as in 1:28, where Paul’s aim is to present believers “full-grown” under the direction and in the power of Christ’s cross and resurrection. téleios may thus be the opposite of nḗpios etc. (1 Cor. 14:20; cf. Phil. 3:15 and perhaps 1 Cor. 2:6, where the truly mature understand the message of the cross as the wisdom of God). In Rom. 12:2 knowledge of the entire or perfect will of God comes through the renewing of judgment by the Spirit.

4. Heb. 5:14 distinguishes between initial doctrines for nḗpioi and full fare for the mature (téleioi) who know God’s will and can differentiate good and evil. In 9:11 the heavenly sanctuary is “more perfect” than the provisional temple.

5. The NT never seems to use téleios for a gradual advance to Christian perfection or for a two-graded ideal of ethical perfection. It plainly means “whole” or “entire” in Matthew, Paul, and the Catholic Epistles, and it also has the sense of “mature” in some passages in Paul.

E. The Apostolic Fathers. Here, too, the term has the senses “total,” “complete,” “full,” “supreme,” and then “perfect” (cf. fasting in Hermas Similitudes 5.3.6, the church as a perfect temple in Barn. 4.11, Esther in 1 Clem. 55.6, and Christ the “perfect man” in Ignatius Smyrneans 4.2).

1. This uncommon term denotes a state of “completeness” and also means “completion.”

2. In the LXX it means “wholeness,” “integrity,” “completeness.”

3. a. In the NT Col. 3:14 calls love the bond of “completeness”; it either binds the other virtues into a whole, or gives unity and harmony to the church.

b. In Heb. 6:1 teleiótēs is the “highest stage” of Christian teaching.

4. In the apostolic fathers love has the quality of perfection in 1 Clem. 50.1, and reference is made to the perfection of Moses‘ love for the people in 1 Clem. 53.5.

teleióō.

1. Nonbiblical Usage. This word means “to make téleios in the passive, “to become téleios,” or, in such senses as “to complete,” “to carry out,” “to put into effect,” and, passive, “to be completed,” “to mature.”

2. The LXX. In the LXX we find the senses “to make perfect” (Ezek. 27:11), “to fill (the hands)” (Ex. 29:9, 29, 33, for “to consecrate”), “to complete” (2 Chr. 8:16), and “to conclude” (4 Macc. 7:15).

3. The NT.

a. The sense "to fulfil" occurs in Acts 20:24; Jn. 4:34 (where the aim of Jesus is to accomplish his Father's work); 17:4, etc.

b. In 1 John teleióō denotes the perfection or completeness of God's love, or of Christians in love (4:18). God's love is fully present in those who keep his word (2:5). This love manifests its completeness by removing fear of judgment (4:17). In Jn. 17:23 Jesus prays that his disciples may be wholly one as he is in them and God in him. Scripture comes to completeness or fulfilment in the cross (Jn. 19:28). Faith finds fulfilment in works (Jms. 2:22), as may be seen from the offering of Isaac as a confirmation of the verdict of Gen. 15:6.

c. In Hebrews teleióō tiná means enabling someone to stand before God (cf. the LXX), as in Heb. 7:19; 10:1, 14. Cultic terms here clarify the new order of salvation. The OT priests are inadequate because of their sinfulness and not merely their cultic defects. Jesus is qualified to come before God (5:8-9), not by cleansing, but by proving his obedience. His is an eternal qualification (7:28) which enables him, by his once-for-all high-priestly work, to qualify those whom he represents to come before God (10:14) in the heavenly sanctuary as those whose sins are expiated.

d. In Heb. 11-12 the use is slightly different. The fathers of faith were not made perfect (11:40) in the sense that they did not yet attain to the heavenly city. But through Christ's saving work they now share in the consummation (12:23). Paul says something to the same effect in Phil. 3:12 when he admits that he is not already perfect but still presses on. The thought of fulfilment is present in Lk. 13:32, and cf. the fulfilling of the days of the Passover in 2:43.

e. teléō and teleióō often have much the same meaning ("to carry through," "to complete"), but teleióō has a stronger suggestion of totality, teléō of goal or end.

4. The Apostolic Fathers. In these works teleióō has such senses as "to carry out" (1 Clem. 33.6), "to fulfil" (Hermas Visions 4.1.3), "to effect" (Ignatius Smyrneans 7.2), "to complete" (Did. 10.5), and, in the passive, "to become perfect" (Did. 16.2).

teleíōsis.

1. Outside the Bible. This word means "actualization," "completion," "conclusion," and "maturing."

2. The LXX. Here we find the senses "execution," "completion," "conclusion," and "maturity."

3. The NT.

a. Mary is blessed in Lk. 1:45 because she believes there will be an execution of God's word.

b. The OT priesthood in Heb. 7:11 does not confer qualification to stand before God. On the basis of LXX usage (cf. teleióō) the underlying thought is that of consecration or institution to the priesthood in the sense of cultic qualification. This thought is now given a spiritual application.

4. The Apostolic Fathers. The term does not occur in these works or in the Apologists.

teleiótēs.

1. This rare term denotes one who accomplishes teleioún. God is teleiótēs both in natural events and in the ministry of the Spirit. The word also applies to those who administer baptism inasmuch as they make the candidate téleios.

2. The context supplies the meaning in Heb. 12:2. Jesus gives faith its perfect basis by his high-priestly work and thus completes it. At the same time, he exercises complete faith as demonstrated by his passion. [G. DELLING, VIII, 49-87]

telṓnēs [tax collector]

A. Tax Farming in Antiquity.

I. Main Types.

1. Athens. The Greek cities farm out taxes in private agreements between the state and the tax farmers. Laws fix the duties and privileges of the tax farmers but do not specify the methods or demand an audit. The system provides ready cash for the government and reduces officialdom. The problems are that the tax farmers need to impose more taxes in order to make a profit and that they are inclined, if necessary, to resort to illegal practices. Tax farmers also band together to reduce their bids. The tax farmers might be either individuals or companies. Their contract is an annual one but is usually renewed. Backers guarantee the payment and must make good any deficiency. Only when a first instalment is paid may the tax farmers levy taxes, and there are penalties for tardy payment. Tax farming is a lucrative business; in case of war or plague the state might remit the debt if the collection falls short. Employees have the right to search for contraband goods and may lodge complaints against smugglers with the possibility of confiscating their goods.

2. Ptolemaic Egypt. Egypt under the Ptolemies adopts tax farming and regulates it by royal legislation. The main difference from Athens is that the state supervises the system in detail. Its officials can calculate the yield more accurately and they probably fix a minimum rate. No large first instalment must be paid, as in Athens, but guarantors are required, who have some share in the profits. The lessees collect the taxes through their agents, whose wages are fixed by law. The tax farmers receive a share of the sum collected and also take over any surplus, although they or their sponsors must also make good any deficit. Only royal officials can distrain goods in the case of those who fail to pay taxes. The main point of the system in Egypt is to guarantee a fixed sum for the state, not to relieve the state of the whole burden or to provide ready cash at the beginning of the fiscal year (as in Athens).

3. Rome. Rome develops tax farming for much the same reasons as Athens. With the growth of its possessions, however, a tax-farming class comes into being to handle the large financial transactions. Under Augustus reorganization becomes necessary, and this results in a restriction of the powers of tax-farming corporations. By the second century A.D. imperial officials begin to take over the collection of taxes.

II. Palestine.

1. Tax farming comes into Palestine from at least the time of Ptolemy II Philadelphus (308-246 B.C.). Later, taxes are paid to both Syria and Egypt and leading citizens see to their collection, paying a fixed sum and collecting as they are able.

b. When Pompey conquers Jerusalem in 63 B.C. he imposes a tribute for which the high priests seem to have been responsible. After 57 B.C. there are five taxing districts but a single corporation seems to have contracted with the towns, which pay lump sums that they then have to collect. Caesar reduces taxes in 47 B.C. and in 44 B.C. abolishes the system of farming out taxes to a corporation in Judea.

c. Augustus frees Herod from the tribute to Rome, thus enabling Herod to control his own finances. There are no details about tax collection, but Herod seems not to have used tax farming. Herod Antipas, however, renews the farming system. In NT times direct taxes are not farmed out under the Roman procurator in Judea but indirect taxes (customs etc.) are mostly farmed out, often on a smaller, individual basis.

d. Dues are collected at Gaza, Ascalon, Joppa, and Caesarea, and inland at Jerusalem, Jericho, and Capernaum. Roman officials collect arrears; tax farmers report smugglers and delinquents to them.

III. The Position of Tax Farmers.

1. In General.

a. Since no one pays taxes willingly, people dislike and fear tax farmers. Traders run into problems at toll and customs stations. On long journeys goods are often taxed several times as they pass through various districts.

b. Since tax farmers have to make a profit, they obviously charge more than is legally imposed. They must also protect themselves against fraud. Constant disputes arise, especially as the regulations are not widely known until Nero orders that they should be posted up at every customs house. Travelers must declare what they are carrying but are allowed to bring in personal articles free of duty. The collectors have the right of search and may confiscate dutiable goods not declared. In case of wrongful confiscation double restitution must be paid on timely objection unless a plea of misunderstanding prevails. Simple travelers, however, often do not know the rules or proper channels, and thus become a prey to avaricious tax farmers and their agents. This explains the low esteem in which the latter are held.

2. Judaism.

a. The rabbis, regarding tax collectors as people who try to gain money dishonestly, treat them as in a special way unclean.

b. Indeed, they classify them as thieves or robbers.

c. Whereas they view direct taxes as a sign of subjection, they regard indirect taxes, especially tolls, as a form of injustice and chicanery. They thus think that false protestations to tax collectors are legitimate, they deny tax collectors the right to appear as witnesses, and they group both them and their families as gamblers or usurers who, if they wish to "convert," should restore what they have taken illegally where the persons defrauded are known, and contribute the rest of their ill-gotten gains to the common good.

d. A few tax farmers, however, seem to have conducted their business honestly and hence to have earned the respect of their fellow citizens.

B. Jesus and Toll Collectors. telṓnēs occurs only in the Synoptics in Mt. 11:18-19 and parallels; 5:46-47; Mk. 2: 14ff. and parallels; 10:3; 18:17; 21:31-32; Lk. 3:12-13; 7:29; 15:1; 18:9ff.; 19:2. The noun telṓnion occurs only in Mt. 2:14 and parallels. The NT agrees with the rabbis in thinking that tax collectors alienate themselves from God and the people. "Publicans and sinners" are the opposite of the children of the kingdom (cf. Mt. 5:46-47). Tax collectors are notoriously wicked Israelites who may even be grouped with the Gentiles (cf. Mt. 18:15ff.). If the interest of the NT is in their conversion, as in Lk. 18:9ff. and 19:1f., it is as an example of God's miraculous power to bring even the most sinful back to himself. Yet the stress lies on the fact that Jesus seeks them (cf. Mt. 9:36; 10:6; 15:24; Lk. 19:10). Neither the Baptist nor Jesus denies them access to the eschatological community. There is special joy in heaven over the conversion of sinners like them (Mt. 18:13-14; Lk. 15:7, 10). Jesus excludes no specific groups (Mt. 13:24-25). He starts by recognizing all Israel (Lk. 19:9). The summons of the gospel is especially to toll collectors and sinners, and to table fellowship with them. Jesus, indeed, incurs criticism by associating with those whom the people as well as the Pharisees revile (Mt. 11:19). His acceptance of a telṓnēs as a disciple must have caused particular offense (Mk. 2:14), followed as it was by a feast attended by many toll collectors and sinners. He also lodges with a chief tax farmer in Jericho (Lk. 19:1ff.). If Zacchaeus promises restitution, Jesus assures him of salvation prior to this commitment. Similarly, he grants the assurance that the publican's prayer for forgiveness is heard by God (Lk. 18:14). He uses the conversion of toll collectors and sinners as a model and a warning (Lk. 15:1ff.; Mt. 20:13ff.). Whereas the Pharisee's prayer has become an extolling of self, that of the publican, which God hears and answers, is a humble plea for mercy. The public acceptance of toll collectors and sinners belongs in the main to the Galilean ministry but there are also striking instances in the later period (Mk. 14:3ff.; Lk. 19:1ff.). [O. MICHEL, VIII, 88-105]

témnō [to cut], apotomía [severity], apótomos [severe], apotómōs [severely], katatomḗ [cutting up, mutilation], orthotoméō [to cut a straight path, teach aright] témnō. This word, meaning "to cut," does not occur in the NT.

apotomía, apótomos, apotómōs.

1. apótomōs means “sharply cut,” and it then has the more common derived sense of “steep,” “inaccessible,” and the transferred sense of “sharp,” “keen,” “exact,” “careful,” “strict,” and even “severe” or “pitiless.”

2. apotomía occurs only from the Hellenistic period. It means “cutting off,” then “difficulty,” mostly “strictness” or “severity” (in a good sense as regards the law), and also “hardness” in carrying out a resolve.

B. The LXX and Judaism.

1. Only apótomos and apotómōs occur in the LXX, and these only in Wisdom. They relate to God’s severity in judgment on the wicked. God is like a Father to the righteous but has the severity of a sovereign toward sinners.

2. The noun apotomía occurs in Σ with reference to the “cruelty” of Nineveh (Nah. 3:1) and Babylon (Jer. 51:35).

3. Josephus uses apótomos for “steep” and also to describe the “harshness” of Herod. Philo uses apotomía for “crushing ferocity.” The verb apotémnō is also common in Josephus.

C. The NT.

1. The adverb apotómōs occurs in 2 Cor. 13:10. Paul wants to settle the matter quickly so that he will not have to exert his authority severely, i.e., with the force of judgment (as distinct from the sharp rebuke of Tit. 1:13 that aims at correction).

2. In the NT only Rom. 11:22 uses the noun apotomía. As in Wisdom, those who ignore God’s kindness come under the threat of his inexorable severity, i.e., in judgment.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. Pol. 6.1 advises presbyters not to use their judicial authority without clemency as though they were tyrants or in anticipation of God’s judicial severity.

katatomḗ.

A. Nonbiblical Greek. This word means “incision” or “sectional plane” and occurs mostly in the scientific or technical sphere. The verb katatémnō, however, is also used for the cutting up of meat, especially sacrificial meat, and can be used ironically for “to cut into strips,” i.e., “to kill” (cf. also “to chop up” with words in the charge against Socrates).

B. The LXX. The noun does not occur in the LXX, but katatémnō comes into use for the prohibited slitting of the skin, e.g., in mourning (Is. 15:2); cf. also the use for cultic incisions in A at Jer. 48:37 (Σ katatomḗ).

C. The NT. The only NT instance of katatomḗ is in Phil. 3:2. Opposing those who press circumcision on believers, Paul is not accusing them of causing “division” but making play on the term peritomḗ (circumcision). Their vaunted circumcision is in reality “dissection”—a “mutilation” that the law itself forbids. This ironic play on words, familiar in the diatribe, is perhaps suggested by the common ironic use of the verb katatémnō in the Greek world.

1. This word occurs in the Greek Bible only at Prov. 3:6; 11:5; 2 Tim. 2:15. Underlying it is the phrase témnō hodón, “to lay down a way,” “to open a way,” “to build a road.”

2. The phrase orthotoméō hodón has the same sense in Prov. 3:6 and 11:5 (plural). The ortho- lays stress on a straight path.

3. In later Jewish writings orthotoméō does not occur but other terms convey the idea of the right way, now more closely equated with the commandments.

4. The figurative idea of the way is very pale in the one NT instance of orthotoméō in 2 Tim. 2:15. As distinct from those who engage in useless theological chatter, Timothy is to do what is right relative to the word of truth. Other possible meanings, e.g., "to cut," "to handle," or "to deliver," do not fit the context or agree with the parallel expression in Gal. 2:14. The real meaning seems to be that Timothy should speak the word of truth in his conduct, i.e., follow it. When he does this, he need not be ashamed, for, unlike the false teachers, he will present the word legitimately, confirming it in his life. [H. KÖSTER, VIII, 106-12]

téras [omen, wonder]

A. Nonbiblical Usage.

1. General. The word téras is an ancient one denoting omens, e.g., in the form of natural phenomena or unusual manifestations.

2. Theological.

a. From earliest times téras has a theological reference. For Homer Zeus is the author of térata such as thunder, the rainbow, or meteorites.

b. Yet the link with Zeus seems to be a secondary harmonizing of awe-kindling phenomena with the Olympian gods.

c. In Homer the téras is only for human beings as in their search for the essence of things they experience their dependence on the gods and yet also their closeness to them. The mántis is needed to interpret the téras, but the téras itself may be given in answer to prayer.

3. Trend and Development.

a. Greek thought takes an original experience of the sinister, appropriates it as a means to explain the human situation, and integrates it into the cultus.

b. At a later stage Xenophon mentions dreams as a means of finding the divine will but avoids the term téras. When other authors use it, it is usually as a traditional term with no survival of the ancient connotations. In general it takes on negative content and therefore is no longer the right term to present the reality of a divine wonder.

4. sēmeía kaí térata. For this phrase see sēmeíon.

B. The OT and Greek Judaism.

1. The LXX.

a. téras occurs 46 times in the LXX. In 34 of the 38 instances where there is a Hebrew original, this is môpēṯ.

b. As regards the meaning of the Hebrew term, it is coordinated with the parallel 'ôt in 18 of 36 passages, and the two together relate to extraordinary phenomena or events together with the impression they make and the knowledge they mediate. The author of these extraordinary manifestations is God, and it is his historical power that they display as he makes decisions for the present that also determine the future. That the two Hebrew terms are not synonymous, but carry different accents, may be seen from a comparison of 2 Kgs. 20:1ff. and 2 Chr. 32:24, 31; the former stresses the sign and the latter the miracle. The revelatory aspect comes out in Ezek. 12:1ff. when the prophet himself becomes a sign for Israel (cf. Ps. 71:7). In Joel 2:30-31 the God who has made heaven and earth gives signs in them to usher in the last time. As Ps. 105:5 shows, it is of the essence of OT signs that in them God reaches the goal of establishing his righteousness.

c. The LXX use of téras is governed by the Hebrew. The term denotes something unusual whereby the God who is the Creator and the Lord of events adds a new element to his word of self-manifestation. The emphasis lies on God’s action, not on the marvelous aspect, and there is no conceptual abstraction. The translators observe the distinction from sēmeíon (cf. Ex. 4:17, 21). The point of téras is that it discloses the sovereign being of God in all its uniqueness. The term plays no essential role in works that are Greek in origin. In two of four instances in Wisdom it occurs in the combination sēmeía kaí térata (8:8; 10:16). In Wis. 17:14; 19:8, too, the wonderful acts that reveal God are at issue. téras does not occur in Maccabees, though God is teratopoiós in 2 Macc. 15:21; 3 Macc. 6:32. Greek Judaism perhaps dislikes téras (except when combined with sēmeíon) because of its pagan associations.

2. Nonbiblical Greek Judaism.

a. Philo. Philo seldom uses téras, although terástios is more common, and he also uses various derivatives. The connection with what is unusual and terrifying may be seen in his use. Yet the group does not have a negative accent, for God is the author of the térata done by Moses. A sēmeíon is not necessarily a miracle, but a téras is a sēmeíon when God stands behind it. The positive sense rests on the térata associated with the exodus. The téras is a means of revelation. By it Philo shows that Judaism enjoys supreme knowledge of God and the highest form of morality.

b. Josephus. Josephus adopts the traditional use of téras for the supernatural. térata aid in the knowledge of God, especially in his sovereignty over events. They are sometimes predictive signs indicating the future that God controls. Insight is needed for their correct evaluation and interpretation. Knowledge of Scripture serves best in this regard, for God’s térata stand in relation to the direction of the history initiated by the exodus.

c. The Pseudepigrapha. The term téras plays no significant part in these writings.

d. sēmeía kaí térata. In this phrase térata is the more important term, inasmuch as it expresses the conviction that the way and goal of God govern all that happens. For Josephus those who ignore signs of the destruction of city and temple refuse faith in God in so doing.

C. Postbiblical Judaism.

1. Qumran. The Dead Sea Scrolls refer only seldom to mighty acts as distinct from signs.

2. The Rabbis. The rabbis practically never use the equivalent Hebrew term.

D. The NT.

1. The Absence of téras Alone. The NT never uses téras alone. This is by intent, as may be seen in Acts 2:19, where the author adds an interpretative kaí sēmeía to the Hebrew and Greek of Joel 2:30 (cf. 2:22, 43; 6:8; 7:36). This is not because téras has become a more colorless term. It is because téras does not fit in so well with the aims of proclamation. For the mighty works of Jesus, dýmamis serves better to bring out an unambiguous christological interpretation. téras might suggest that God does the works and thus restrict the autonomy of Jesus. As regards the works of the apostles, the point is that in them the Spirit continues the work of Jesus, and hence dýnamis is better adapted to express the fact that the apostles do the works as the representatives of Jesus.

2. sēmeía kaí térata—térata kaí sēmeía. Acts uses both expressions (4:30; 5:12; 14:3; 15:12; 2:19, 22, 43; 6:8; 7:36). Perhaps in sēmeía kaí térata the stress is on God's giving a new and specific stamp to the present, whereas in térata kaí sēmeía the present stands under the sign of his advance and there is thus an invitation to turn to him, with dýnamis as the catchword. Paul, too, uses dýnamis in connection with sēmeía kaí térata in Rom. 15:19, 2 Cor. 12:12, and even 2 Th. 2:9, where he has the coming of antichrist in view.

E. The Early Church. The apostolic fathers have sēmeía kaí térata but never téras alone. This is also the case in the apocryphal Acts. The only instance of téras in the Apologists is in Athenagoras Supplication 20.2, where it is a term taken from ancient epic poetry. [K. H. RENGSTORF, VIII, 113-26]

téssares [four], tétartos [fourth], tetartaíos [fourth (day)], tesserákonta [40], tesserakontaetḗs [40 (years)] téssares, tétartos, tetartaíos.

A. Four in Antiquity.

1. Linguistic Problems. Differing forms of the term for "four" occur in the Greek dialects (Attic téttares, Ionic tésseres, Doric tétores). The NT perhaps gives evidence of a general intermingling of forms, tesser- being preferred on euphonic or rhythmic grounds.

2. The Greek Sphere.

a. On the basis of the four corners, etc., the number four becomes a term for totality. It is only occasionally a sacred number, but it often serves as a round number (cf. the four cardinal virtues, basic emotions, or types of sovereignty).

b. The number frequently has special significance, as in references to the fourth assault, the dangers of the fourth day, the four-day fever, the need for marriage after four years of sexual maturity, the birth of Heracles on the fourth day of the month (cf. also four-year contests).

c. Myths commonly contain the idea of the four ages of the world, and we also read of the four discoveries of Hermes, the four-cornered Hermes pillars, the four-eyed Proserpine, etc.

d. In the Platonic and Pythagorean tradition four is a symbol, but Aristotle stresses the numerical aspect. The four elements play an important role in Mithraism. For the Pythagoreans four is the basis of the decimal system inasmuch as the first four numbers add up to ten. Stress lies elsewhere on the four phases of the moon or the four seasons.

B. Four in the OT and Judaism.

1. The OT.

a. Four is a figure denoting totality in the OT (cf. the four quarters of heaven, the four rivers of paradise, also Dan. 11:4; Ezek. 7:2; Zech. 1:8ff.). Four is important in the theophany of Ezek. 1 (the four living creatures, four faces, and four wheels). There are four phenomena at Elijah's theophany in 1 Kgs. 19:11-12. Four is also important in apocalyptic (cf. Dan. 7:2-3, 6, 17; also 2:31ff.).

b. As a round number, four figures in Zech. 7:1; Judg. 14:15; 2 Kgs. 7:3, and cf. in relation to the ark and tabernacle Ex. 25:12, 26, 34; 26:2, 8, 32.

c. The series three-four, which also occurs in the Greek world, has the sense of a few. It is schematic in proverbs (Am. 1:3, 6, 9; Prov. 30:15, 18, 21, 24, 29).

2. Judaism.

a. In rabbinic works four is often a round number, e.g., four categories of penitence or of scholars, or four things for which there are rewards and punishments. The fourth day is the day of demons, and on the fourth day the soul finally leaves the tomb. Qumran has four waters of purification and divides the community fourfold. Eth. En. 22 divides the underworld into four.

b. Philo refers to the four elements. He attributes to Moses the holiness of the number four. Thus on the fourth day God made heaven and the stars. Philo also refers to four main emotions, and for him the most important secret of the number is the tetragrammaton, the divine name.

C. The NT.

l. General Use. The use is technical in Mk. 2:3 and Acts 10:11; 11:5. The four anchors of Acts 27:29 are for added safety. Four denotes a short space of time in Jn. 4:35; Acts 10:30. The fourth watch is the dawn in Mk. 6:48. The series of four in 2 Pet. 3:10 and Rev. 5:13 suggests completeness. The four parts of the field in Mk. 4:1ff. contain three that are similar and a fourth that is different. The four days in the tomb in Jn. 11:17 express the irreversibility of death. The fourfold division of Jesus' clothes (Jn. 19:23) corresponds to the number of soldiers in the watch. Fourfold restitution in Lk. 19:8 displays generosity.

2. Apocalyptic. Revelation uses the Ezekiel tradition in 4:6, 8; 5:6, 8, etc. The four faces become four animals (4:7), eyes replace the wheels, and the creatures now surround the throne. Rev. 6:1 ff. adopts the motif of the four horses, combining it with that of the first four seals (cf. the four destroying angels of 9:14-15). The heavenly city is foursquare (21:16). In Mk. 13:27 the elect are gathered from the four winds.

D. The Early Church. Motifs in the apostolic fathers include the gathering from the four quarters of the earth (Did. 10.5) and the four periods (Hermas Similitudes 9.4.3). Irenaeus associates the four Gospels with the four districts of the earth and the need for four pillars (Against Heresies 3.11.8). He also characterizes the Gospels as four beasts. Augustine later links the names of the four Evangelists with the beasts (On the Harmony of the Gospels 1.6).

tesserákonta, tesserakontaetḗs.

A. 40 in Antiquity.

a. In the Greek world 40 is a round number. 40 years are a long time, 40 days a shorter time.

b. 40 is also the time of maturity. One must be at least 40 to be appointed to certain posts.

c. 40 also denotes specific periods, e.g., the first movement of a child in the womb, the crisis in an illness, and the normal period of pregnancy (7 times 40 days). Pythagoras fasts for 40 days, and we also read of a period of rain for 40 days and of the 40-day period when the Pleiades are not visible.

B. The OT and Judaism.

a. In the OT 40 years are the period of a generation, i.e., when a whole generation is active (cf. the wilderness generation Ex. 16:35, Dt. 1:3, etc.). David reigns for 40 years in 2 Sam. 5:4-5 (cf. also Solomon in 1 Kgs. 11:42), and the period from the exodus to the temple consists of 480 years.

b. The number 40 also denotes maturity, e.g., the year of marriage or accession (Gen. 25:20; 2 Sam. 2:10). The span of human life consists of 120 years (Gen. 6:3).

c. 40 also serves as a typical round number (cf. the flood in Gen. 7:4, Moses on Sinai in Ex. 24:18, the taunting of Goliath in 1 Sam. 7:16, the time for repentance in Jon. 3:4, Elijah's journey in 1 Kgs. 19:8, the days of impurity in Lev. 12:4, the maximum number of stripes in Dt. 25:3).

2. 40 is a most important number, second only to seven, in later Judaism. 40 days are a typical period in popular medicine and agriculture as well as in relation to biblical incidents (the flood etc.). Reference is made to 40 days of fasting, and 40 years are significant as periods in office. Signs appear 40 years before the destruction of the temple. A rabbinic disciple achieves independence of judgment when reaching 40.

b. 40 also serves as a round number, e.g., in learning or in scourging.

c. In messianic contexts the interim messianic kingdom lasts 40 years. At Qumran 40 years elapse between the Teacher of Righteousness and the coming of the divine kingdom. Apocalyptic attaches 40 days of judgment to the 40-year messianic kingdom. The wilderness years become a messianic type.

C. The NT. 40 serves as a round number in Acts 4:22; 23:13, 21. When Paul is given 40 stripes save one (2 Cor. 11:24), this is the first written instance of the omission of the last stroke. Heb. 3:10, 17 and Acts 13:18 recall God's judging and guiding in the wilderness period. Acts 13:21 seems to ascribe 40 years to Saul. Acts 7:42 gives a negative turn to Am. 5:25. Acts 7:23 refers to the three 40-year periods in the life of Moses. Mk. 1:13 and parallels link the 40-day fast of Jesus to his baptism and thus find in it obedience to his messianic commission. The references to the animals and the angels define the desert as a place of eschatological paradisal peace. We also find Moses typology in Mt. 4:2 (cf. Lk. 4:2-3). The 40 days of appearances to the disciples are the period when the disclosures of the risen Lord elucidate and validate the gospel (Acts 1:3).

D. The Early Church. The apostolic fathers refer only to Moses on Sinai (1 Clem. 53.2). Tertullian mentions the teaching of the risen Lord (Apology 21.23). A 40-day fast develops prior to Easter on the model of that of Jesus. [H. BALZ, VIII, 127-39]

tēréō [to watch over, protect], tḗrēsis [watch, custody], paratēréō [to watch closely, guard], paratḗrēsis [watching, observance], diatēréō [to keep, store up], syntēréō [to keep in mind, protect] tēréō.

A. Outside the NT.

1. The basic meaning of this word is "to keep in view," "to note," "to watch over"; it takes on such nuances as "to rule," "to observe," "to ward off," "to guard," "to keep," and in a transferred sense "to see to" "to apply oneself to," "to defend oneself."

2. The word occurs 39 times in the LXX in such senses as "to aim at," "to keep watch," "to pay attention" "to watch over or for" "to keep," "to observe."

3. Philo seldom uses the term. It can mean "to watch over" in Test. Zeb. 4:3, and Josephus uses it for "to hold."

4. Rabbinic parallels denote obedience to the law.

B. The NT.

1. Literal Meaning. Used 60 times in the NT, tēréō may have here such literal senses as "to guard" (Acts 12:6; Mt. 27:36), "to keep" (Jn. 2:10; 1 Pet. 1:4), "to retain" (negatively in Jude 6), and "to protect" (1 Cor. 7:37).

2. Transferred Meaning.

a. The sense is "to protect" or "to preserve" in Jn. 17:11-12. So, too, Christ protects his church against temptation in Rev. 3:10. Paul's desire is that the spirits, souls, and bodies of believers may be kept (with an eschatological reference) in 1 Th. 5:23. The called will be kept for the reign of Christ in Jude 1. Christ grants protection against the devil and sin in 1 Jn. 5:18. Keeping aloof from the world is the point in 1 Tim. 5:22 and Jms. 1:27. In Jude 21 the genitive ("of God") expresses God's initiative, the verb our response.

b. With an impersonal object the idea is that of maintaining the essential Christian realities, e.g., faith in 2 Tim. 4:7, the unity of the Spirit in Eph. 4:3, one's garments (i.e., salvation) in Rev. 16:15.

c. A common thought is that of observing or keeping commandments etc.; cf. Mt. 19:17; Acts 15:5; Jn. 9:16 (the sabbath); Mt. 23:3 (scribal teaching); Jms. 2:10 (the royal law); Mt. 28:20 (Jesus' teaching); Jn. 14:15 (Jesus' commandments). The expressions used relative to Christians suggest the existence of a catechetical tradition. This goes back to the teaching of Jesus himself, so that keeping his commands is the same as keeping his word (Jn. 14:23-24). The disciples pass on this word of revelation with a summons to faith and obedience (Jn. 15:20), and keeping it means eternal life (8:51-52). Similar thoughts occur in 1 Jn. 2:3, 4; Rev. 12:17. The Christian life as a fulfilling of God's will is both a prerequisite of answers to prayer and a result of the Spirit's working (1 Jn. 3:22, 24). Love for God finds expression in love for others and keeping the commandments (1 Jn. 5:2-3).

1. In Greek this word means "attention," "vigilance," "watch," "observation," "preservation," "care," and "custody."

2. In the LXX it occurs only in the Apocrypha for "keeping" or "guarding."

3. In the NT the word means "custody" (or "prison") in Acts 4:3; 5:18 and "keeping" or "fulfilling" God's commandments in 1 Cor. 7:19 (cf. Gal. 5:6; Rom. 14:17).

paratēréō.

1. In Greek this word has such senses as "to observe," "to keep under observation," "to lurk," "to lie in wait," "to pay heed," "to note," "to be on the lookout," "to preserve," "to watch over," and "to keep."

2. In the LXX the verb means "to lurk" in Ps. 37:12 and "to keep in mind" in Ps. 130:3.

3. In other Jewish Greek works one finds the senses "to find by observation," "to wait for observantly," and "to observe" (cultic regulations).

4. In the NT parateréō means "to watch" (Jesus) in Mk. 3:2 and "to guard" (the gates) in Acts 9:24. Cultic observance is the point in Gal. 4:10. A relapse into observance of days entails a loss of freedom. Paul may be arguing here against compulsory keeping of the sabbath and OT feasts, but he may also be rejecting the idea of lucky or unlucky days and seasons, for the compound (in the middle) suggests anxious observance in one's own interest.

1. In Greek this means "watching," "lying in wait," "spying," "attention," "scrutiny," "scientific observation," "self-scrutiny," "self-discipline," "watching over," "keeping" (laws etc.), "observing" (usage), and "maintaining" (obedience).

2. The LXX does not use the term.

3. In the NT it occurs only in Lk. 17:20, where it might have either a temporal or a local reference (observing times or places). These are linked in apocalyptic. The statement that the kingdom is "among you" or "in your midst" suggests, not that the calculation of signs is contrasted with some future incursion of the kingdom, but that the kingdom has already come in Jesus. Some people, however, do not perceive it. Observation of signs cannot show whether the kingdom has come; as it is now at work, God's rule can be grasped only by faith. The messianic expectations of the opponents of Jesus, who are demanding signs, are wholly inadequate in the face of what Jesus effects with his coming among the people.

4. In Diog. 4.5 we find a polemic against the ritual "observance" of Judaism.

diatēréō. In the NT this word occurs in Lk. 2:51 for "keeping" or "storing up" in the memory. The sense in Acts 15:29 is "to keep oneself," i.e.. "to abstain." Diog. 8:10 says that God keeps his saving plan unchanged up to Christ's coming.

syntēréō. This word means "to keep" in the memory in Lk. 2:19, "to protect" in Mk. 6:20, "to be preserved" in Mt. 9:17. It means "to think of (and care for)" in Hermas Mandates 8.10. [H. RIESENFELD, VIII, 140-51]

títhēmi [to place, lay], athetéō [to set aside, annul], athétēsis [annulment], epitíthēmi [to lay on], epíthesis [laying on], metatíthēmi [to put in another place], metáthesis [change of place], paratíthēmi [to present], parathḗkē [deposit], (parakatathḗkē [deposit]), protíthēmi [to set before], próthesis [aspiration], prostíthēmi [to add to] títhēmi.

A. Secular Greek.

1. The Local Sense.

a. The primary local sense of this word is “to place,” “to lay.” We thus find it for laying foundations, laying down articles, putting in the hand or before the eyes, putting in one’s vote, and interring.

b. Special senses include paying taxes and depositing money.

c. In the military sphere we find several uses, e.g., for camping, siding with, or laying down shields in capitulation.

d. In the games the term denotes the displaying or presenting of prizes.

e. Sacrally it is used for donating gifts to the gods.

f. “To put” in the mind or heart (cf. “to have in mind”) is close to the transferred sense.

2. Transferred Sense.

a. In the transferred sense we find raising a house, conceiving a chi1d (putting under the girdle), or holding a wedding.

b. Laying down laws etc. is another use.

c. The gods establish ordinances and decrees.

d. Intellectual presupposing or positing offers another field of usage.

e. With a double accusative we find the idea of making someone something, i.e., appointing, marrying, adopting. Along similar lines is the use for making a mock of, or valuing as.

B. The LXX.

1. Occurrence. The LXX uses títhēmi some 560 times, 260 times for Heb. šym, which similarly combines the local and transferred elements.

2. Meaning. The OT has much the same meaning as secular Greek, e.g., setting down, erecting, placing, investing, putting on, bringing (gifts), also setting snares, hazarding one’s life, taking to heart, appointing, issuing (orders), representing as, or making.

3. In a quarter of the OT references God is the subject in his work of creating, saving, and judging. He sets the stars in the firmament (Gen. 1:17) and sets bounds for the sea (Job 38:10). He makes Abraham the father of many nations (Gen. 17:5-6). He sets his name in specific places (1 Kgs. 9:3). He sets the priest-king’s enemies under his feet (Ps. 110:1). He grants life and mercy (Job 10:12). He sets aside tears and sins (Ps. 56:8). He makes idol-manufacturers as nothing (Mic. 1:7). He sets up a wall for Jerusalem (Is. 26:1). Having set Israel in her place (1 Chr. 17:9), he will put her in her own land again (Ezek. 37:14).

C. The NT.

1. General.

a. The 101 instances are spread throughout the NT. Often we find the basic local sense, putting a light on a stand (Mk. 4:21), laying out the sick for healing (6:56), serving wine (Jn. 2:10), and laying on hands (Mk. 8:25).

b. Other senses include burying (Mk. 6:29).

c. Financially the term means investing money (Lk. 19:21-22) or setting it aside (1 Cor. 16:2).

d. Figuratively the term means “to set forth” (Mk. 4:30) or “to offer” (1 Cor. 9:18).

2. Peculiar to Luke are such expressions as “to bend the knees” (Lk. 22:41), “to take to heart” or “to intend” (Lk. 1:66; Acts 5:4), “to resolve” (Acts 19:21), and “to lay at the feet” (i.e., “put under the control”) (Acts 4:35).

Heb. Hebrew

3. Peculiar to John is the expression “to lay down one’s life” (10:11). This echoes a Greek expression for “risking one’s life” but with a reference to Is. 53:10 which makes the risk into an actual sacrifice (cf. Mk. 10:45).

4. a. Relative to God’s action, the NT often quotes Ps. 110:1. In 1 Cor. 15:25 the context shows that the enthronement of Christ and the subjugation of hostile powers take place in time. In Hebrews the exalted position of the Son (1:3) rests on the future subjection of his foes (10:13). Acts 2:33-34 and Mk. 18:19 connect the verse with the ascension (cf. also Col. 3:1). In Mk. 12:35ff. the function of the exalted Lord is denoted by the titles Son of David and Kyrios. Christ is no mere political liberator but the unique and all-embracing Lord.

b. Paul rarely uses títhēmi or its compounds. In Rom. 4:17 he quotes Gen. 17:5, where faith is in the God who raises up the promised posterity beyond the bounds of natural procreation. Abraham’s election is thus set against the background of the new creation. The same connection appears in 1 Th. 5:9. In Phil. 1:16 and 1 Th. 3:3 the verb denotes the point where divine decision and human existence converge. Divine ordination decides the existence of the members in Christ’s body (1 Cor. 12:18, 28). Rom. 9:33 calls Christ the appointed stone of stumbling at which the paths of Israel and the church cross. In 2 Cor. 5:19 the new creation rests on God’s reconciling act in Christ’s work and the commissioning of the apostles. Divine ordination gives the message its authority. Similarly in 1 Cor. 3:10-11 Paul lays the foundation, but so does God, so that the authorized apostle may be called God’s fellow worker (v. 9).

c. In 1 Tim. 1:12 Christ has put Paul in service. In 1 Tim. 2:7 Paul is appointed a herald. The offense of disobedience is ordained in 1 Pet. 2:8, and Sodom and Gomorrah are set as a warning in 2 Pet. 2:6. The Son is appointed heir of all things in Heb. 1:2, and the Servant is appointed a light to the nations in Acts 13:47. The Holy Spirit sets up leaders in Acts 20:28. The Father has fixed the eschatological hour in Acts 1:7.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. Hermas uses the term relative to the fitting and laying of stones in the tower (Visions 3.2.7 etc.). Special expressions are bowing the knees (Visions 1.1.3), paying heed (Mandates 12.4.5), and making mighty (Barn. 6:3). Divine ordination is found in OT quotations (1 Clem. 15.6 etc.). God has set in us the gift of doctrine (Barn. 9.9). He has ordained suffering for believers (Diog. 6.10) and punishment for apostates (1 Clem. 11.1).

1. In secular Greek athetéō means “to regard as nought,” “to set aside,” “to consider invalid,” passive “to be struck off,” “to break with.”

2. The LXX gives the term the sense of willful repudiation, e.g., “to disregard,” “to violate” (an oath), “to ignore,” “to rebel,” “to annul,” “to revoke,” and intransitively “to act unfaithfully or wickedly,” “to be apostate.”

3. a. The first NT sense is “to annul,” as in Gal. 3:15, where only the testator may annul his will while he is alive, or Gal. 2:21, where Paul does not annul God’s grace as Judaizers do by robbing it of its practical force.

b. Violation of God’s law or commandment is at issue in Heb. 10:28; Lk. 7:30; Mk. 7:9. Young widows break their first loyalty by remarrying (1 Tim. 5:12), and God brings to nothing the wisdom of the wise (1 Cor. 1:19).

c. The verb also means refusing or rejecting a person (cf. 1 Th. 4:8; Jn. 12:48; Jude 8). athétēsis is “abrogation” or “annulment” of the law in Heb. 7:18, of sin in 9:26.

4. The apostolic fathers use the verb for rejecting or despising God, Christ, or Christ’s witnesses.

For the anatíthēmi group → anatíthēmi; for diatíthēmi and diathḗkē → diatíthēmi.

1. In secular Greek the verb means “to lay down,” “to set on,” “to apply,” “to add on,” “to give,” “to take up.” The noun is used for putting up a statue, or putting on a cover, or for an assault.

2. a. The verb is common in the LXX in various senses, e.g., putting on plaster, imposing service or tribute, bringing fire, smearing blood, laying out the showbread, waving the wave offering, weaving a conspiracy, intending something. Especially common is the expression “to lay on hands,” e.g., for consecration to ministry (Num. 8:10), dedication of offerings (Ex. 29:10), imparting blessing or spiritual gifts (Num. 27:18; Gen. 48:17-18), cursing (Lev. 24:14), and once for healing (2 Cor. 5:11).

b. The noun occurs only five times for “conspiracy” in 2 Chr. 25:27, “assault” in 2 Macc. 4:41; 5:5; 14:15, and “wooing” in Ezek. 23:11.

3. a. In the NT the verb is used for laying the sheep on the shoulder in Lk. 15:5, placing on the crown of thorns in Mt. 27:29, putting the title on the cross in Mt. 27:37, laying on blows in Lk. 10:30, imposing a yoke in Acts 15:28, and giving a name in Mk. 3:16-17. In Rev. 22:18 God will “lay” a punishment on those who “add to” the words of the book (a play on the word).

b. In 20 of 40 instances “laying on of hands” is at issue (also epíthesis four times). On the one hand Jesus lays on hands to heal (Mk. 5:23 etc.); on the other he lays on hands to bless (Mt. 19:13). Laying on of hands is also connected with imparting the Spirit (Acts 8:17ff.), with ordination for a task (6:6), and with imparting gifts by ordination (1 Tim. 4:14).

4. There is nothing new in the apostolic fathers.

metatíthēmi, metáthesis.

1. In secular Greek the verb means “to bring to, or set in, another place,” “to alter,” and middle “to change over.” The noun means “change of place,” “alteration,” or “change of mind.”

2. The LXX uses the verb for removing boundaries, transplanting peoples, or translating from the earth, as well as for convincing or talking around. The noun denotes “transition” to Greek custom in 2 Macc. 11:24.

3. a. In the NT the verb means “to carry to” in Acts 7:16, “to take up” in Heb. 11:5 (Enoch), “to transform” in Jude 4, “to be done away” in Heb. 7:12, “to fall away” in Gal. 1:6.

b. The noun is used for Enoch’s “translation” in Heb. 11:5, the “alteration” of the law in 7:12, and the “metamorphosis” of shaken creation in 12:27.

4. The apostolic fathers use only the verb (cf. the local sense in Barn. 13:5, Enoch’s translation in 1 Clem. 9.3, and changing one’s mind in Mart. Pol. 11.1).

paratíthēmi, parathḗkē (parakatathḗkē)

1. Secular Greek.

a. This verb means “to set beside or before,” “to present.”

b. A technical meaning is “to deposit,” “to entrust,” in the legal sense of leaving an object in another’s keeping, with strict penalties for embezzlement. A transferred sense develops out of the technical use.

2. The LXX.

a. The term is used here mostly in the local sense “to serve” (food), “to set forth,” “to lay down,” “to furnish.”

b. The commercial sense “to entrust for safekeeping” occurs, e.g., in Lev. 5:23 (cf. Ex. 22:7ff. for regulations). In Ps. 31:5 the author puts himself under God’s protection.

3. Later Judaism. The rabbis supply rulings for goods on deposit. Josephus stresses the need for honesty. Philo speaks about entrusting knowledge and regards the self and all that it has as a trust from God.

4. The NT.

a. The verb occurs 19 times, usually in the literal sense of “laying” food before someone (Mk. 6:41), or “expounding” teaching (Acts 17:3). Jesus commends his spirit to the Father (Lk. 23:46), the persecuted should entrust their lives to a faithful Creator (1 Pet. 4:19), and Paul entrusts the elders to God's abiding faithfulness (Acts 14:23; 20:32).

b. The middle is a commercial term in Lk. 12:48. Along the same lines the faith is a trust in 1 Tim. 1:18 (cf. 2 Tim. 2:2). It is to be kept intact up to the parousia (1 Tim. 6:20). This is to be done with the help of the Spirit and as an act of faith and love (2 Tim. 1:3-4). In 2 Tim. 1:12 the meaning is more probably "what has been entrusted to me" than "what I have entrusted." Christ himself protects this right up to the last day. Not the teaching itself, but he who is its content, insures its continuity. One may thus repulse false teaching without absolutizing tradition.

5. The Apostolic Fathers. In these works there is nothing distinctive about the verb. The noun means entrusted deposit in Hermas Mandates 3.2; liars do not return it.

protíthēmi, próthesis.

1. Secular Greek.

a. This word means "to set before" (e.g., food, offerings).

b. It then means "to display, or make known, publicly."

c. Another sense is "to impose (middle "undertake") a task."

d. A final sense is "to prefer," "to put before."

2. The LXX. Here we find such senses as "to collect," "to set out" (the showbread), "to set before the eyes" (God), and "to undertake" (or "purpose").

3. The NT.

a. A reference to the showbread occurs in Mk. 2:26, and cf. also Heb. 9:2, which seems to refer to the bread laid out rather than the act of placing.

b. In Rom. 3:25 the reference might be to God's counsel, i.e., his ordaining of Christ as a means of expiation, but the context seems to demand execution rather than resolve, and hence it is better to think in terms of the public setting forth of Christ as a means of expiation.

c. The verb denotes human resolving in Rom. 1:13 and the noun in Acts 11:23. Paul's "aspiration" is what Timothy observes in 2 Tim. 3:10.

d. Paul gives próthesis a new sense when he uses it for the primal decision whereby God initiates his saving work through Christ. In Rom. 8:28 those who love God rest on the basic resolve wherein God's will to bring to final glory is coincident with his will to affirm the community. The content of próthesis is God's abiding faithfulness. The goal of foreknowledge and foreordination (vv. 29-30) is the community of the firstborn Son. God is the subject of calling and justification in time, so that on the real basis of the event in Christ Paul can speak already, in prophetic anticipation, of eschatological glorification. In Rom. 9:11 God's purpose in election stands throughout the stories of Esau and Jacob. It is not rigid but freely works out the Yes to Israel in human decisions and by human agents. In Eph. 1:19ff. God's final aim is according to the good pleasure established from the first in Christ. In God's resolve, which comes first both temporally and materially, lies the community's superiority to Gnostic sects. 2 Tim. 1:9 traces salvation and calling to God's eternal purpose and grace in Christ.

4. The Apostolic Fathers. These authors use the verb for undertaking in Hermas Mandates 12.3.5 and ordination in Diog. 9.2. próthesis means "serving" in 1 Clem. 45.7.

1. In secular Greek this means "to put to," "to add to," "to shut," middle "to attach oneself to," "to win," "to join" (cf. also "to win over").

---

vv. verses

2. In the LXX we find Hebraizing in many of the references (cf. Gen. 4:2; 25:1). Elsewhere the usage is similar to that of secular Greek.

3. a. There are some Hebraisms in the NT (cf. Lk. 19:11). “adding to” is the meaning in Mk. 4:24; Heb. 12:19; Lk. 3:20; Mk. 6:27; Mt. 6:33 (unless “give” is the sense here).

b. The idea of “adding” suggests that the law is simply an interlude in Gal. 3:19.

c. The adding of people (to the church) is the point in Acts 2:41, 47; they are added to the Lord in 5:14 and 11:24.

4. In the apostolic fathers we find such senses as “to continue” (Barn. 2.5), “to add” (19.11), “to increase” in sins (Hermas Visions 6.1.4) or in righteousness (Did. 11.2). [C. MAURER, VIII, 152-68] (

timḗ [honor], timáō [to honor]

A. Greek and Hellenistic Literature.

I. Meanings. In general timḗ means “worth,” “evaluation,” “honor,” then “price.” Specific meanings are “appraisal,” “assessment,” “honor,” “dignity,” “honorarium,” “honors.” Similarly timáō means “to value,” “to honor,” passive “to be deemed worthy of honor.” Religiously the honoring of the gods is worship. The Greeks also believe that certain people are honored by the gods, e.g., with wealth, power, etc. timaí may be used for offerings, feasts, etc. that honor the gods, or for donations to them. Financially the terms are used for fixing value, appraising, and taxing.

II. The Concept of Honor. timḗ has at first a strong material orientation to possessions, strength, or social influence. Later, moral conduct plays a bigger part. The fact that timḗ can also mean “price” upholds the material connection, but timḗ as honor increasingly becomes inner worth as distinct from outward esteem. For Aristotle there is no honor without virtue; only on the basis of virtue should outward honor be shown. No honor is enough for perfect virtue, and the person of inner worth is finally above outward honor. In Stoicism inner honor is what counts. The sage, enjoying inward freedom, can live without external honor and can thus be relaxed in relation to it.

B. Hellenistic Judaism.

I. The LXX.

1. Hebrew has no exact equivalent for the group but does require the honoring of parents (Ex. 20:12) and of the moral commandments (Gen. 38:23). The LXX uses timḗ for 12 Hebrew terms. A first sense is honor, e.g., the honor that must be brought to God, the honor that God gives us, the honor that comes through doing good, the honor that must be shown others. We then find the meaning “price” with such nuances as “payment,” “compensation,” “evaluation.” Other senses are “valuables” and “tax.” Finally the term denotes royal dignity or honorable conduct.

2. timáō renders six Hebrew terms in such senses as “to honor” (God, kings, parents, the elderly, the poor, loyal slaves, doctors, or the temple), “to appraise,” and “to honor with money,” i.e., “to reward.”

II. Philo. In Philo we find the honoring of God, of parents, the elderly, the sabbath, etc Philo also uses the term for “dignity,” “value,” “assessment,” “tax.” Very typical are combinations that relate inward and outward values.

III. Josephus. In Josephus, the noun (often plural) mostly has such meanings as “honor,” “honoring,” “veneration” (of God), “dignity” (of the high priest), “distinction,” “reward,” “recognition,” although we also find “price.” Special expressions are “to hold in honor,” “to come to honor,” and “to be highly honored.” The verb means “to honor,” “to venerate,” “to reward,” passive “to stand in honor.”

C. The NT.

I. timḗ.

1. Honor.

a. Rom. 12:10 exhorts Christians to prefer one another in honor, 1 Tim. 6:1 tells slaves to honor their masters lest God's name be defamed, 1 Pet. 3:7 summons men to honor their wives out of loving regard, 1 Th. 4:4 shows that the wife has a claim to honor as God's creation, and Rom. 13:7 asks believers not only to pay taxes to the state but also to give it the fear and respect that are its due.

b. "Recognition" is the sense in Jn. 4:44. The common combination with dóxa occurs in christological statements in 2 Pet. 1:17 (the transfiguration) and Heb. 2:7, 9; 3:3. In Heb. 2:7ff. Christ's passion is the presupposition of his crowning with glory and honor (Ps. 8:5ff.), i.e., his institution to high-priestly dignity. Moses has his own honor, but this is far inferior to that of the Son (3:3). In these references timḗ is one part of dóxa. Dignity of office is the point in Heb. 5:4. Christians also have timḗ according to 1 Pet. 2:7. They share Christ's honor as living stones built into the spiritual house. In 1 Pet. 1:7 those who prove their faith in affliction will have praise, glory, and honor when Christ comes. In 1 Cor. 12:23-24 believers who have no striking charisms have equal honor with the rest. In 2 Tim. 2:20-21 some vessels have noble uses, others ignoble; believers must cleanse themselves from error so as to be of noble use. This metaphor carries a suggestion of price or value as well as honor. In Rom. 9:21 the vessel that is made for honor is that to which the use for which it is destined brings honor. In Rom. 2:7, 10 glory, honor, and immortality are the reward at the judgment for doing good in fulfilment of God's will.

2. Honorarium. This is perhaps the meaning in 1 Tim. 5:17, unless "honor" be meant.

3. Col. 2:23. Paul in this difficult passage is adopting the slogans of his opponents. For them timḗ is perhaps a term denoting election and deification. If so, Paul rejects this kind of timḗ. Other possibilities for timḗ in this passage are "honor" or "value."

4. Liturgical Use. Doxological use occurs in 1 Tim. 1:17 and 6:16. Revelation offers more developed doxologies in 4:9, 11; 5:12-13 (to God and the Lamb); 7:12. The church's praise corresponds to these heavenly songs.

5. Value, Price. With dóxa, timḗ denotes earthly goods in Rev. 21:26. Believers hand over the "proceeds" of sales in Acts 4:34; 5:2-3. The "value" of the books burned at Ephesus is given in Acts 19:19. Acts 7:16 refers to the grave that Abraham bought for a "sum" of money. In 1 Cor. 6:20; 7:23 Christians have been bought with the "price" of Christ's blood.

II. timáō.

1. "To honor." Jesus presses the commandment to honor parents, criticizing the evasion of financial support in case of need (Mk. 7:10ff.). The honoring of widows in 1 Tim. 5:3 probably includes financial provision as well as respect. Children are to honor their parents in the Lord (Eph. 6:2), and believers are to honor all people, specifically rulers (1 Pet. 2:17). Paul receives many honors, or concretely gifts, after curing the father of Publius and others on Malta (Acts 28:10). Jesus claims the same honor as is paid to God in Jn. 5:23, for God has commissioned him as eschatological Judge. He himself honors the Father (8:49), and those who serve him will be honored by the Father (12:26), i.e., granted a share in his own glory.

2."To value." Mt. 27:8-9 sees in the purchase of the potter's field a fulfilment of Zech. 11:12-13. The quotation contains both timáō ("to assess the value") and timḗ ("the sum realized").

D. The Apostolic Fathers. Christians are summoned to honor their teachers (Did. 4.1) and officebearers (1 Clem. 21.6; Ignatius Smyrneans 9.1). The congregational office is held in honor (1 Clem.

44.6; cf. Did. 15.2). timḗ also denotes the divinely ordained position of the ruler (1 Clem. 61.1). Combination with dóxa occurs in 1 Clem. 64 and 65.2. [J. SCHNEIDER, VIII, 169-80]

tolmáō [to dare, presume], apotolmáō [to be bold], tolmētḗs [presumptuous], tolmērós [bold]

A. The Greek World.

1. From a root meaning "to lift," "to carry," tolmáō means first "to endure," "to suffer," then "to dare," "to venture," then "to be courageous," "to have the courage," and finally "to make bold," "to presume." In rhetoric we find the phrase "to venture to say."

2. The compound strengthens the sense.

B. The LXX. The term occurs only seven times in the LXX and only twice with Hebrew originals. It has the two meanings "to dare" and "to presume" (3 Macc. 3:21; 2 Macc. 4:2).

C. Philo and Josephus.

1. Philo occasionally uses the term for venturing hypotheses or statements.

2. Josephus makes considerable use of tolmáō and related terms for "to have the courage," "to dare," and "to venture." Positive motives behind ventures are courage and warlike passion; negative motives are conceit and wantonness.

D. The NT.

1. The Gospels, Acts, and Jude.

a. tolmáō means "to dare" when Joseph takes courage and goes to Pilate to ask for the body of Jesus (Mk. 15:43). He ventures a direct approach.

b. In the negative, no one dare ask Jesus any more questions in Mk. 12:34; they all recognize his supremacy. Faced with the risen Lord, the disciples, too, do not dare ask him who he is (Jn. 21:12). Moses did not dare look closely at the bush (Acts 7:32). Michael does not presume to pass judgment on the devil in Jude 9. In Acts 5:13 the other believers dare not join the apostles, who alone come under arrest (v. 18).

2. Paul.

a. Paul makes lavish use of tolmáō, first in the weak sense of "dare," as in Rom. 5:7.

b. "Dare" with the stronger sense of venturing confession or facing up to opponents occurs in Phil. 1:14 and 2 Cor. 10:2. "To dare" with the nuance "to presume" may be found in 2 Cor. 11:21, where Paul's courtesy to opponents carries with it an ironical suggestion of their presumption. Similar irony occurs in 10:12. Pau1 does not presume to class himself with those who commend themselves.

c. A final use in Paul is for "to be insolent." Believers should not insolently go to law against one another (1 Cor. 6:1), and Paul will not insolently speak about things that Christ has not done through him (Rom. 15:18). In Paul, as in the entire NT, tolmáō never denotes the venture of life or of faith. What makes a word or work a venture is danger or propriety. What prevents the venture is recognition of Christ's supremacy or reverence for God.

apotolmáō. This word occurs only in Rom. 10:20 to strengthen the formula.

tolmētḗs. This word relates only to false teachers, whom 2 Pet. 2:10 describes as presumptuous and self-willed (cf. Jude 9).

tolmēróteros. In saying that he has written rather boldly in Rom. 15:15, Paul is simply using an apologetic formula. Behind it lies the conviction that he has something special to say. [G. FITZER, VIII, 181-86]

tópos [place]

A. Greek Literature.

1. Simple Use. In common usage this word means a. "territory," "land," "area," "locality," b. "district," "town," "dwelling place," and c. "place" in a very general sense, as in such phrases as "in every place," "in the place in question," "in no place" (nowhere), "on the spot," and "out of place."

2. Special Meanings.

a. In cultic texts tópos sometimes means "sanctuary" (the holy place). Later a holy place may be a grave, e.g., of a martyr.

b. Another use is for "someone's place," e.g., a senator's seat, a place at school, one's place in the world. The phrase "in place of" develops out of this sense. So does the transferred sense of "opportunity" or "occasion" (cf. "room for flight," "occasion for tears").

c. In rhetoric, since everything has a place, a tópos is what recurs in the same situation (topic). Technically Aristotle first has a "basic element" in view. But the word may then denote various fields of Stoic dialectic.

d. Another meaning is the "place" in a writing.

3. Philosophical, Scientific, and Cosmological Usage. Aristotle starts from the idea of movement from one place to another. There is no empty place; the thought of place is always proper to certain things. When common to several things, it is still defined and not unlimited space. Geographically tópos means "position," "territory," or "zone." Cosmological speculation discusses the place in which the cosmos moves. The cosmos has four tópoi, namely, heaven, ether, air, and earth. Similarly there are three spheres, the upper one of humanity, the middle one of animals, and the lower one of plants. The soul, too, has three tópoi as well as three functions.

B. OT Usage.

1. General. The Hebrew original of tópos is māqôm, which is almost always translated tópos, although tópos also occurs frequently for other terms or where there is no original. The Greek and Hebrew largely correspond, but not wholly so.

2. Linguistic Peculiarities.

a. Basis. The idea of a "site" or "settlement" is intrinsic to the Hebrew, not that of space or locality.

b. Place Where. This explains the common use for "where," e.g., "the place where his tent was" in Gen. 13:14.

c. The Place. The Hebrew often adds the demonstrative to denote the place meant, often perhaps in the sense of "here" (cf. Dt. 1:31).

d. A close relation comes to expression in the use with a possessive pronoun (cf. Gen. 30:25).

3. Comparable Meanings.

The Hebrew may denote a. a "land" or "locality," but always in the singular (cf. Ex. 3:8).

b. Another meaning is "town" or "dwelling place" (cf. Gen. 18:24).

c. The term may also be used for various other places (cf. the campsite in Dt. 1:33, the narrow place in Num. 22:26).

4. The Promised Land. The Hebrew term does not come into technical use for the promised land but it may denote the place that God has appointed for his people (Ex. 23:20). Those who are abroad are away from both their people and their own place (2 Sam. 15:19).

5. Holy places.

a. In a cultic sense the term may denote original Canaanite shrines; some of these come into association with faith in God and the promise of the land (cf. Gen. 12:6ff.; 28:11ff.), and are thus appropriated theologically as well as historically.

b. Zion and the Temple. Although Jerusalem, too, must have been an original holy place, the OT gives it significance only as the city of David to which he brings the ark and where he plans the temple. It thus becomes the holy place that God has chosen according to Dt. 12:5, 11 etc. Since God has set his name, and tabernacles, there, the people must destroy all other holy places.

c. This Place. In prophetic warnings "this place" often means Jerusalem but at times the temple is perhaps in view (cf. Jer. 14:13ff.). If judgment falls on the people, land, and city, special significance attaches to the destruction of the temple.

d. Postexilic Usage. The cultic use is now governed by the idea of the sanctity of the place and its precincts. Only the LXX, however, develops the term into a technical one for the holy place. 1-4 Maccabees never call the land tópos and only rarely Jerusalem, but they often have "holy place" for the sacred precincts.

6. Places in Creation. Another sense, worked out in Wisdom writings, is that of the proper place (cf. Gen. 24:31; Num. 32:1). The place may be large or narrow, or may even cease to exist (1 Sam. 26:13; 2 Kgs. 6:1; Is. 5:8). The place of the wicked denies them when they perish (Job 8:18). Gog comes forth from his place (Ezek. 38:15), and God has his place in heaven (cf. Hos. 5:15) or the temple (1 Chr. 16:27). Humans have their place, but the time comes when it knows them no more (Ps. 103:16). Geographical features also have their place (Ps. 104:8). This may give reassurance (Job 38:12, 19), but it also suggests pointlessness (Eccl. 3:20). God alone knows the place of wisdom (Job 28:12, 20). Wrong may at times stand in the place of right (Eccl. 3:16). But tópos is also the opportunity or possibility of being that God has given. There is a place for repentance and also for mercy (Wis. 12:10; Sir. 16:14). God has provided a place—that of repentance and salvation—which is the basis of a life in faith.

C. Later Jewish Usage.

1. The Rabbis. A distinctive rabbinic use is as a term for God.

2. Philo. Philo takes tópos a. as a place that a body fills, b. as the divine lógos that God has filled with immaterial forces, and c. as God himself inasmuch as he comprehends all things, i.e., in a cosmic sense. God is a place of refuge for all things and provides a place for all creatures. Earthly movement is a change of place. Creatures all have their places, but human beings are at home in all spheres. The soul has left its heavenly place, and the wicked have no place to go. The righteous, however, prepare their souls as a place for God to dwell. Philo, then, spiritualizes the OT understanding with some help from the usage of Greek cosmology.

D. NT Usage.

1. tópos as a General Term for place.

a. Semitic influence may be seen in John in the use of tópos with hópou ("there where") (cf. 6:23; 10:40; 11:6). In Lk. 10:32 tópos links up the story topographically (cf. 19:5). Adverbial phrases are "everywhere" in 1 Cor. 1:2, "here and there" in Mk. 13:8, and "'to another place" in Acts 12:17.

b. To denote a place tópos is parallel to pólis in Acts 16:2 etc. In the plural a district is suggested (cf. Lk. 4:37). An adjective may describe the place; cf. érēmos tópos (Mk. 1:35) for "desert" or "waste place."

c. The name seldom accompanies tópos, but tópos and Golgotha always go together (Mk. 15:22; Jn. 19:17). Mk. 15:2 and Mt. 27:33 add that the name means the place of a skull, John gives the Greek translation first, and Lk. 23:33 has "the place which is called The Skull." Fixing the site exactly assumes importance in view of the need to establish the historical reality of the crucifixion.

2. Special Senses.

a. Temple. The use of tópos for the temple is rare in the NT. We find it in Mt. 24:15 and Jn. 4:20, and most likely in Jn. 11:48, although tópos could be the city here. In Acts one might mention 6:13 and 21:28, where Stephen and Paul are accused of attacking the holy place after the manner of OT prophets.

b. The Right Place. Luke uses tópos in this sense in 14:9 and Paul in 1 Cor. 14:16. In Acts 1:25 the vacated "place" rather than "office" is the meaning, and Judas goes to the "place" where he really belongs. The transferred sense of "opportunity" suggests itself in Rom. 15:28 and Acts 25:16. In Heb. 12:17 Esau's failure to find opportunity to repent shows that one cannot control repentance at will; the chance to repent comes only as God provides it. Similarly in Heb. 8:7 a divine act establishes the new covenant. Rom. 12:19 demands that we give divine wrath the opportunity to act, but Eph. 4:27 warns against giving place to the devil. In Rev. 6:14 tópos has a cosmic reach; every mountain and island will be moved from its place. In Rev. 2:5 the removal of the church's lampstand from its place signifies judgment. In Rev. 12:6 God prepares a place for the woman, who represents the church. She can flee to this place in time of persecution (v. 14). Judgment means that no place remains (cf. 12:8; 20:11) except the place of torment (cf. Lk. 16:28).

c. Place of Scripture. The use for an OT reference occurs only in Lk. 4:17.

E. Apostolic Fathers. The use in these works is much the same as in the NT but with some movement toward the sense of "position" or "office" (cf. 1 Clem. 40.51; 44.5. Ignatius Smyrneans 6.1; Ignatius Polycarp 1.2; Pol. 11.1), although only in isolated cases. [H. KÖSTER. VIII, 187-208]

trápeza [table, meal]

A. Usage.

1. General Use. This word means "table" and then in a transferred sense "meal," "food."

2. Dining Table. Tables develop out of stands of cloth, leather, wickerwork, or metal on which food is placed. The forms of tables vary according to the posture adopted for eating, e.g., crouching, sitting, or reclining. In Palestine crouching or sitting seems to have been the usual posture, but the rabbis make reclining obligatory for the Passover. One reclines on the left arm and eats chopped-up food with bread and fingers. In the NT only reclining is mentioned, but probably in the weak sense of "sitting down for a meal" in many instances. One cannot always assume that a table is present, although the term for "to recline" can include it even when trápeza is not mentioned.

3. Money-Changers' Table. Money changers regularly use tables for their coins and thus come to be called trapezítai ("table men").

4. Table for the Showbread. This is the only OT cultic table mentioned in the NT (Heb. 9:2). We read of such a table in 1 Sam. 21:7; 1 Kgs. 6:20; 1 Macc. 1:22. 1 Cor. 10:20 refers to a cultic table in the pagan sphere.

B. Theological Table Sayings.

1. Daily Bread. In Lk. 16:21 and Mk. 7:28 the table represents the supply of daily food; the poor seek nourishment from its superfluity. In Rom. 11:9 the table is a figure of nourishment. What should contribute to life becomes a snare; the law is probably meant (cf. 11:7; 9:31).

2. Table Fellowship. In Lk. 22:21 the expression shows that the traitor belongs to the innermost circle, i.e., those who have table fellowship. Lk. 22:28ff. connects sitting at table with sitting on thrones, i.e., participation in the kingdom (cf. Mt. 19:28). Behind this figure stand the ideas of the royal table and the eschatological banquet. In Acts 6:2 the common sacral meal of the community is at issue. The apostles should minister the word instead of having to see to meals. Meal is also the sense in Acts 16:33-34; the converted jailer sets food before Paul and Silas.

3. The Table of the Lord and the Table of Demons. The table of the Lord is the table or meal which the Lord provides and which lays claim to those who receive it. The table of demons is the sacrificial meal which similarly binds participants (cf. 1 Cor. 10:18), not to the gods, but to the demons that stand behind them. The phrase trápeza kyríou finds an OT basis in Mal. 1:7, 12, although Paul is not suggesting that the table is an altar or that the Supper has a sacrificial character. The common feature is not sacrifice but participation and commitment. The kýrios and demons offer different things and summon to different dominions; one cannot alternate between them (1 Cor. 10:21-22).

4. Congregational Worship. In the early church worship takes place in houses around everyday tables. Only when the sacramental meal is detached does a special table come into use. In the third century A.D. this table as the place of consecration is called an altar, but it is still an ordinary table. Later the eucharistic table is honored as a holy place, left continuously in one spot, and called either table or altar with appropriate preciser definitions. [L. GOPPELT, VIII, 209-15]

treís [three], trís [three], trítos [third]

A. Three in the Greek and Hellenistic Roman World. Divine triads are common in ancient cults, and threefold utterance or execution supposedly makes valid or definitive. Thus we find threefold oaths, invocations, prayers, etc. Some healing processes last three days. Aristotle thinks the number three is significant in nature. It embraces beginning, middle, and end. There are three dimensions, and time has three aspects. Philo thinks that the soul has three divisions. The right is the mean between two extremes.

B. Three in the OT and LXX. Three seldom has specific importance in the OT. The three sons of Noah are the ancestors of the whole race in Gen. 6:10. Balaam blesses Israel three times in Num. 24:10. The priestly blessing is threefold (Num. 6:24ff.), and we find a threefold crescendo of promise in Hos. 2:21-22 and of action in 1 Kgs. 18:34. Notable threes are David's heroes, the three righteous men of Ezek. 14:14, the three friends of Job, the three friends of Daniel, the three who visited Abraham, and cf. the three flocks of Gen. 29:2. Cultic threes are the three feasts (Ex. 23:14) and the three hours of prayer (Dan. 6:11). Three is a round number in the combination two-three (Job 33:29). Three days are important in Ex. 15:22; 2 Kgs. 2:17; Judg. 14:14; 2 Chr. 20:25; Esth. 4:16; Hos. 6:2; 2 Macc. 5:14. Only in the third generation can Edomites and Egyptians enter the Lord's community (Dt. 23:9). A three-member description of the Spirit's works occurs in Is. 11:2, and threefold utterance emphasizes validity in Is. 6:11.

C. Three in Jewish Literature. John Hyrcanus holds the threefold office of prophet, priest, and king. Three gifts are given for the sake of three persons, water for Miriam, the pillar of cloud for Aaron, and manna for Moses. We find three ranks, but also three nets of Belial and three offenses that God notes. A three-year cycle is worked out for the reading of the law.

D. Three in the NT.

1. a. Strict use occurs in 2 Cor. 11:25; 12:14; 13:1; Gal. 1:18; Mk. 9:5; Rev. 21:13. The third heaven of 2 Cor. 12:2 accords with current ideas. In Lk. 12:52-53 the two-and-three division arises out of the relationships in a Palestinian household. The number 153 in Jn. 21:11 seems to be a triangular number expressing totality.

b. Round numbers are common in Acts (months in 7:20; 19:8; 20:3; 28:11, days in 9:9; 25:1; 28:7, 12, 17).

2. The sayings about Christ's resurrection on the third day stand in obvious relation to Hos. 6:2 (cf. Mk. 8:31; 14:58; Mt. 27:63-64; Jn. 2:19-20; 1 Cor. 15:4), but the events of Easter (the empty tomb and the first appearances) give precision to the number.

3. Ideas of few or many may be connected with the number three. Three years are too long and exhaust the owner's patience in Lk. 13:7, but in Mt. 18:20 "two or three" tells us that the Lord will be present even with the smallest number that meet in his name. Paul limits the speakers in 1 Cor. 14:29, and God sets a term for the work of Jesus in Lk. 13:32.

4. In sayings based on Dt. 19:15 "two or three" stands in antithesis to one. In the three steps of Mt. 18:15ff. the one that starts the process is one of the two or three witnesses needed. Paul refers to the witness of threefold action in 2 Cor. 13:1. 1 Jn. 5:7-8 stresses the agreement of three testimonies. Heb. 10:28 rests on a combination of Dt. 17:6 and Num. 15:30. Lk. 10:36 distinguishes the conduct of the third traveler from that of the other two.

5. Threefold performance or occurrence denotes completeness and hence importance in Acts 10:16 urgency in Mt. 26:44, intensity in 2 Cor. 12:8, 1long-suffering and obstinacy in Lk. 20:12, definitiveness in Lk. 23:22, totality in Mk. 14:30, penetrating scrutiny in Jn. 21:17, and certainty in 20:19ff.

6. "These three" in 1 Cor. 13:13 is meant comprehensively. The same triad of faith, love, and hope occurs in 1 Th. 1:3 and Col. 1:4ff. Another fixed triad in Paul is God, Lord, and Spirit (1 Cor. 12:4ff.; Eph. 4:4ff.; 2 Cor. 13:13; cf. 2 Jn. 3; Jude 20-21). In context the three are the authors or agents of salvation; this shows that the statements arise out of the matter itself and not by way of speculation. One may compare Father, Son, and Holy Spirit in Mt. 28:19, God, the spirits, and Christ in Rev. 1:4-5, and God, Christ, and the angels in Rev. 3:5. The serpent, beast, and false prophet are an ungodly triad in Rev. 16:13.

7. Three plays a role in parables and stories (cf. the three gifts of Mt. 2:11, the three types of people in Lk. 14:18ff., the three forms of judgment in Mt. 5:22, the three temptations of Mt. 4:1ff., the threefold prediction of the passion in Mk. 8:31; 9:31; 10:33-34. (For a full list see TDNT, VIII, 223-25.)

E. The Apostolic Fathers. Did. 12.2 limits hospitality to two or three days. The herald declares three times that Polycarp has confessed Christ (Mart. Pol. 12.1). Trine immersion is the rule in Did. 7.3. (For various other triads cf. TDNT, VII, 225.) Father, Son, and Spirit occur in Did. 7.1, God, Christ, and Spirit in 1 Clem. 46.6, Father, Christ, and Holy Spirit in Ignatius Ephesians 9. 1, and Christ, Father, and Spirit in Ignatius Magnesians 13.1-2.   [G. DELLING, VIII, 216-25] tréchō [to run, hasten], drómos [course], pródromos [forerunner] tréchō.

A. The Greek World.

1. Literal Sense. Literally this word means "to run," "to rush on," "to run through."

2. Transferred Sense. A common transferred sense is "to hasten (on)."

3. The Stadium. Runners in the Olympic games rank high, and the term has a cultic nuance in this connection. Yet there is also criticism of runners. Plato contends for intellectual achievement, and the Cynics point out that many animals excel men in running. Yet critics like to depict themselves as the true contestants who deserve the crown, even though wreaths in fact are better adapted for goats, which can eat them.

B. The OT and Later Judaism.

1. The LXX. tréchō occurs in Job 41:14 for "to leap," in Gen. 18:7 for "to run," in 2 Kgs. 4:22 for "to ride." In addition to professional runners, there are those who run for everyday reasons, e.g., to bring good news or to save life (2 Sam. 18:19; Prov. 7:23). Elijah runs when the hand of God is on him (1 Kgs. 18:46). Prophets run even when God has not sent them (Jer. 23:21). This may be related to the spreading of the message or we may have the transferred sense of reading with ease. God's word runs swiftly (Ps. 147:15), God seems to run against Job like a warrior (Job 16:14), and sinners run as in battle against God (15:26). Running the way of God's commandments is an emphatic form of walking (Ps. 119:32). The seven martyrs in 4 Macc. 14:5 run the way of immortality by fearlessly hastening to death.

2. Qumran. Qumran relates Hab. 2:2 to the Teacher of Righteousness either in the sense of hastening to spread truth or in that of ready reading of the record. A readiness to run with those who seek righteousness comes to expression. By joining the runners one is lifted out of confusion.

3. Survey. Running means prompt obedience, and blessing attends it just as eschatological expectation promotes it. Apart from 4 Macc. 14:5 the texts are not dependent on Hellenistic usage. This verse shows how easy it is to combine the Hellenistic idea with others, but Philo and Josephus do not do this.

C. The NT.

1. Paul. The prayer of 2 Th. 3:1 rests on Ps. 147:15. Gal. 2:2 and Phil. 2:16 both refer to running in vain. In Gal. 2:2 Paul has his missionary work in mind, in Phil. 2:16 the reference is more personal but he still thinks of a commissioned running with which others associate. In 1 Cor. 9:24ff. and Phil. 3:12ff. running for a prize is the point. The stress is on preparation and effort, not on defeating rivals. The runner in the arena is thus a model only with qualifications. The use in Rom. 9:16 is unexpected. The statement stresses the normative action of God. Willing and running are not directly connected. The idea seems to be that things do not depend on exerting all the force of will in an effort to win salvation. They do not depend on such brilliant but superfluous achievements as those of runners in the arena.

2. Other Works. Forgiving love forces the father to run to meet the prodigal in Lk. 15:20. Why the person runs with the vinegar in Mk. 15:36 is not clear. Running under demonic possession occurs in Mk. 5:6 (cf. Rev. 9:9). The running to the tomb in Jn. 20:4 (cf. Mary in 20:2) has symbolical force, as does the difference in speed. A transferred sense may be found only in Heb. 12:1.

D. Post-NT Writings. Pol. 9.2 rests on Phil. 2:16. 2 Clem. 7.3 relates the language of the games to conduct. The sense is literal in Mart. Pol. 7.1. Ignatius uses the compound syntréchō (cf. Pol. 6.1, where the context does not support an allusion to the games).

1. This term means “course” with reference to horses, clouds, journeys, etc. Other senses are “way” and “corridor.”

2. In the LXX the use in Eccl. 9:11; 2 Sam. 18:27; Jer. 8:6 is much the same as elsewhere. The phrase in Jer. 23:10 (cf. v. 21) means running with authorization.

3. Philo refers to the drómos of nature, the tongue, deliberation, and the eyes of the psyché̄.

4. In the NT reference is made to a course of life that has ended (Acts 13:25) or that will shortly end (20:24; 2 Tim. 4:7). At issue is the content of this life, e.g., the Baptist’s work as a herald or Paul’s discharge of his commission. In 2 Tim. 4:7 keeping the faith gives a special slant to the athletic allusions.

5. 1 Clem. 6.2 combines faith and the drómos more closely by speaking of the course of faith which the martyred women have successfully run, thus winning the imperishable crown of victory. 1 Clem. 20.2 and Diog. 7.2 refer to the course of the cosmos. In Ignatius Polycarp 1.2 Polycarp is to prove himself as an athlete by adding to his course.

1. This word, meaning “running before,” is used of messengers and also in athletics and sailing (e.g., winds or ships).

2. It is used of early figs in Is. 28:4. Hornets are the forerunners of God’s host in Wis. 12:8.

3. In the one NT instance in Heb. 6:20 Christ is our forerunner. The idea is not so much that of an onrushing warrior or an advance ship as of the one who has run the same course and whose successful running makes that of believers possible. The term is part of the vocabulary of edification but fits in well with the priestly and sacral context (cf. 5:5-10; 7:1ff.). [O. BAUERNFEIND, VIII, 226-35]

trygṓn → peristerá

trṓgō [to gnaw, eat]

1. Usage.

a. This word means “to gnaw,” “to bite,” “to chew,” “to eat.” Later it often replaces esthíō.

b. The use in biblical Greek is in accord with this. In the NT the Synoptists prefer esthíō, but John generally trṓgō (cf. Ps. 41:10 and Jn. 13:18).

2. Theological Meaning in Jn. 6. The usage in Jn. 6:51ff. suggests that the change from éphagon in 6:52-53 to trṓgō in 6:54, 56ff. is merely grammatical alteration, but the change throws light on the intention of the section. From 6:51 onward eating is not just appropriating Jesus’ self-offering by faith but receiving it eucharistically. The section consists of proclamation summoning to faith, but the self-offering in word becomes self-offering in the eucharist, and believing hearing becomes believing eating. The uncurtailed incarnation of the Word demands eucharistic reception. Word and sacrament thus belong together. [L. GOPPELT, VIII, 236-37]

tyncháno [to obtain, happen], entyncháno [to run up against, to approach], hyperentyncháno [to intercede for], énteuxis [encounter, petition] tyncháno.

A. The Greek World.

1. In Homer the word tyncháno develops from the aorist étychon (future teúxomai). 2. The word mostly means “to hit” a target, then “to do the right thing,” “to obtain,” and intransitively “to happen.” Even when a hit is made, there is an element of good fortune as well as skill.

3. After Homer the accidental element gains in strength, as in the phrase “it so happened.”

B. The LXX.

1. tyncháno does not fit in easily with any Hebrew original. It occurs in Dt. 19:5 for the chance blow. In Job 17:1 (negative) the grave is the object, and in 7:2 the shadow. In Prov. 30:23 a despised woman finally becomes a wife.

2. tyncháno is more common in 2 and 3 Maccabees but has little theological significance.

3. In Is. 65:11 the noun týchē denotes a pagan deity. The only other instance of týchē is in Gen. 30:11. The translators avoid the noun because it stands in more direct antithesis to OT piety. It may stand in Gen. 30:11 because it expresses happiness rather than good luck.

C. Hellenistic Judaism.

1. Philo uses the verb in the phrases “as the matter stands” or “for example.” In Josephus it has such senses as “to get” or “to receive.”

2. Philo uses the noun quite freely, although he argues that when people speak of týchē they should really think of the divine lógos. Josephus finds týchē indispensable in his apologetic to the Romans.

D. The NT.

1. In 2 Tim. 2:10, Heb. 11:35, and Lk. 20:35, tyncháno in the sense “to achieve” or “to obtain” occurs in contexts which show that we cannot win salvation for ourselves. Heb. 8:6, referring to the ministry that Christ has obtained, is to the same effect. In Acts 19:11 and 28:2 the verb denotes unusual events; the reference in 19:11 is to the nature of the healings. In 1 Cor. 15:37, where Paul picks a random instance, the meaning of ei týchoi is “for example.” In 1 Cor. 14:10 the same phrase suggests an unknown number. The point of tychón in 1 Cor. 16:6 is “perhaps”; Paul does not yet know how his plans will work out.

2. The NT makes only sparing use of the verb and does not use the noun at all. This is important theologically; like that of the LXX, the NT message leaves no room for týchē.

E. The Apostolic Fathers. God is the object of tynchánō in Ignatius Ephesians 10. 1. The term signifies reaching port in Smyrneans 11.3. Vines suffer neglect in Hermas Mandates 10. 1.5. Intransitively tynchánō means eimí in Diog. 5.8, and ei týchoi means "perhaps" in 2.3.

entynchánō.

A. Outside the NT.

1. This compound means "to run up against," often in a bad sense (e.g., against missiles or crocodiles), but also a good sense (e.g., lighting on a book). In relation to visits it may have the connotation of complaint or intercession.

2. In the LXX (no Hebrew originals) we find the use for "complaint" and "petition."

3. In Jewish Hellenistic works we find the meaning "to encounter" and also such senses as "to approach," "to turn to" (God in prayer), "to raise a complaint," and "to have to do with."

B. The NT. "To approach with a complaint" is the meaning in Rom. 11:2 (cf. Acts 25:24), and "to intercede for" is the point of hyperentynchánō in Rom. 8:26-27. Christ is the subject in Rom. 8:34. As in Heb. 7:25, believers have in the Spirit or Christ a heavenly intercessor.

C. The Apostolic Fathers. The compound has little theological significance in these works. It refers to intercession in 1 Clem. 56. 1. "To approach" occurs positively in Mart. Pol. 17.2 and negatively in Hermas Mandates 10.2.5. "To read" is meant in Diog. 12.1.

1. This noun has such varied senses as "encounter," "dealings," "conversation," "conduct," and "petition."

2. It means "conversation" in 2 Macc. 4:8.

3. In 1 Tim. 2:1 "intercession" is the fairly obvious sense, while in 1 Tim. 4:4 it means "thanksgiving," perhaps in the sense of "grace" at meals.

4. Hermas uses the term for "prayer" either as petition or more broadly. In 2 Clem. 19.1 it has the force of "address" and in 1 Clem. 63.2 of "concern" (i.e., the letter's concern for peace and unity). [O. BAUERNFEIND, VIII, 238-45]

týpos [mark, type], antítypos [copy, antitype], typikós [typological], hypotýpōis [model, prototype]

A. Usage.

I. Nonbiblical.

1. týpos. Deriving from týptō, "to strike," týpos denotes "the impress" of a blow, and then "form" with such nuances as "mark," "mold," and "outline" or "figure."

2. antítypos. This word has the actual smiting in view and takes on such senses as "striking back," "sending back," then "resistant," "inimical," "antitypical," "corresponding," and "reproducing."

3. typikós. This rare adjective means "open to impressions" and "corresponding to type."

4. hypotýpōsis. This word means "model" or "sketch."

II. Judaism.

1. LXX. In the LXX týpos means "model" in Ex. 25:40, "idol" in Am. 5:26, "text" in 3 Macc. 3:30, and "example" in 4 Macc. 6:19.

2. Philo. Philo often uses the term in traditional ways.

III. The NT. In the NT we find týpos for “mark” in Jn. 20:25, “idol” in Acts 7:43, and “text” in 23:25. Paul has it for “example” but also in the new hermeneutical sense of (OT) “type” (cf. typikós in 1 Cor. 10:11 and antitypos in 1 Pet. 3:21). In Acts 7:44 and Heb. 8:5 we find the idea of the heavenly original (cf. Ex. 25:40) in contrast to the earthly copy (antítypos, Heb. 9:24).

B. Theological Significance in the NT.

1. The Scars in Jn. 20:25. Jn. 20:25 refers to the scars left by the nails (cf. 20:20) in connection with the resurrection appearances. These are marks of identity and serve to establish faith. Doubt demands touching, the Lord offers it, but the disciples do not in fact touch; they believe.

2. Example of the Obedience of Faith.

a. Paul is an example or model to the church in Phil. 3:17 and 2 Th. 3:9. The church is a model in 1 Th. 1:7. The thought here is not that of an ideal but of a model that makes an impress because God has molded it, and that is effective through faith. Word and deed bear witness to the life of faith that summons to faith and is grasped in faith. The more life is molded by the word, the more it becomes a týpos. It cannot be imitated, but is lived out in freedom by faith. Officebearers are to be examples in this way (by word and deed) in 1 Tim. 4:12 and 1 Pet. 5:3.

b. The term hypotýpōsis expresses the same thought in 1 Tim. 1:16 (Christ’s dealings with Paul) and 2 Tim. 1:13 (Paul’s own preaching).

3. Teaching as Mold and Norm in Rom. 6:17. The idea of a molded figure applies also in Rom. 6:17. God has handed over believers to a new power, to which he has made them obedient from the heart. The týpos didachḗs is not just an outline of teaching here, but an impress that molds their whole conduct, serving therefore as a norm or standard.

4. týpos as a Hermeneutical Term.

a. Events in the wilderness are týpoi in 1 Cor. 10:6 (cf. typikṓs in v. 11). The apostle has the events and not just the OT texts in mind. God caused these events both to happen and to be recorded because of their essential similarity to his end-time acts. The likeness is not just external, nor does it rule out difference in view of the eschatological nature of God’s present work. But Paul here stresses the basic likeness so as to relate baptism and the Lord’s Supper, which the Corinthians misunderstand, to the saving acts of the God who personally met Israel in salvation and judgment. The word týpoi might, of course, mean “examples,” but the context suggests that it has here the force of “advance presentations” intimating eschatological events. “Types,” then, is the best translation.

b. Rom. 5:14 demands the same rendering. In the havoc he wrought, Adam is for Paul a týpos through which God intimates the future Adam (Christ) in his work of salvation. Christ corresponds antithetically to Adam and also emulates him. The týpos here is the advance presentation, but with a suggestion of the hollow form which makes an opposite impression. The “shadow of what is to come” in Col. 2:17 stands in close analogy.

c. Other terms relating the OT and the NT are parabolḗ in Heb. 9:9 and allēgoroúmena in Gal. 4:24. But týpos proves more adequate and hence the church adopts it in this hermeneutical sense. 1 Pet. 3:21 uses antítypos in a similar sense when relating baptism to the flood; baptism is the counterpart.

d. In the apostolic fathers Barnabas and Hermas adopt týpos very naturally as a hermeneutical term. Justin defines it in this sense, and the Latin fathers render it by figura or typus.

e. The underlying thought of correspondence occurs in the OT in, e.g., Hos. 2:17; Jer. 16:14-15; Am. 9:11-12; Is. 11:1ff.; 11:6ff.; 51:3 with reference to the new exodus, the new Davidic kingdom, and the new creation. Cyclic ideas may be seen here, but more decisive are the belief that election reaches its goal in spite of judgment and the confidence that the renewal transcends what has gone before. The continuity of salvation history and its expected consummation control this approach. In apocalyptic and the rabbis the idea of recurrence (either of paradise or of the age of Moses) is stronger, yet the typology still relates to the end time. Jesus emphasizes transcending what precedes (Mt. 12:41-42; Mk. 14:24). By a divine self-offering that surpasses that of the OT the relation to God is definitively healed. Paul develops the typology along similar lines, relating OT phenomena to the situation of the church by explicit comparison or hidden allusion. Though tied to current thought-forms, this is the decisive interpretation of Jesus, the gospel, and the church. In the apostolic fathers typology is either unimportant or it suffers basic change. Thus 1 Clem. 12.7 sees Christ's blood in the scarlet thread. Baranabas proceeds similarly in 7.3ff.; 8.1ff. The new thing here is the focus on external form rather than essential feature. Distortion results as typology becomes, not a spiritual and kerygmatic approach as in Paul, but a hermeneutical device. Yet at its NT core typology is still theologically constitutive for understanding the gospel.

5. týpos as the Heavenly Original (Ex. 25:40).

a. In Ex. 25:40 the heavenly original of the tabernacle is called týpos. The underlying thought is that of an analogical relation between heaven and earth. 1 Chr. 28:11-12 transfers the idea to the horizontal plane; David gives Solomon a model. Philo finds a difference in worth between the two sanctuaries along the lines of the world of ideas and sensory phenomena.

b. Acts 7:44 quotes Ex. 25:40 to make the two points (a) that the tabernacle, unlike the temple, is divinely commanded, and (b) that above it is the týpos as the place of God's self-proffering in the age of salvation (cf. Mt. 26:61).

c. Heb. 8:5 also quotes Ex. 25:40 and relates it directly to Jesus' saving work. As the true High Priest he enters the heavenly holy of holies with his own blood. The earthly sanctuary, the antítypos, goes with the first covenant. The analogous ministry in the heavenly sanctuary is a metaphor from salvation history relating intercession to the enactment of eschatological salvation. In accompanying comparisons the law is a shadow of final expiation, and Israel's disobedience is an illustrative warning. The comparative (kreíttōn in 8:6 and meízōn in 9:11) expresses an absolute intensifying. Christ's work is new, but it achieves the intentions of what precedes, so that continuity is preserved. The typology of Hebrews overlaps and transcends the ancient cyclic and vertical analogies of the upper world and the lower with its emphasis on the word of revelation in salvation history. The fundamental conviction is that in spite of every setback God's work achieves its goal in new and yet corresponding demonstrations of grace.

d. 1 Clement views the OT records as analogies from which one may read off the lasting cosmic order. Barnabas (6:13) expresses the principles of once-for-all recurrence. For Ignatius (Magnesians 6.2) the church is the type of immortality. The Gnostics find in earthly phenomena symbols of the real events. For them, therefore, the earthly church is an antitype of the true church. [L. GOPPELT, VIII, 246-59]

týptō [to strike]

A. Relations and Usage.

I. Relations.

1. týptō is one of many NT words for “to strike.” The basic sense is “to stupefy with a blow.” It then means “to stamp on,” “to impress.” Later it takes on the more general sense “to strike.”

2. The most important OT equivalent in nkh, but this is mostly translated patássō in the LXX (344 times) and only 26 times týptō.

3. The rabbis have an equivalent for the reflexive “to strike oneself.”

II. Usage.

1. týptō occurs for striking with the hand, fist, or foot, or with a staff, rod, whip, or weapon. It may mean “to strike dead,” “to smite an enemy,” or “to smite a land with destruction.”

2. In a transferred sense it means “to stab” with grief, remorse, the pang of conscience, terror, etc.

3. “To smite oneself” occurs in training for the games and in expression of sorrow.

4. In a transferred sense “to strike oneself” means “to lament,” but for this the Attic prefers kōptomai.

B. NT Contexts.

I. The preaching of Jesus. Lk. 6:29 uses týptō in a simplified version of Mt. 5:39. In Lk. 12:45 the servant abuses his position by beating the menservants and even the maidservants. In Mt. 24:51 and parallels the punishment corresponds to the offense of v. 49 but with enhanced severity. The picture of the carousing and striking servant serves to warn those who have special responsibilities in the church against playing the lord in the period prior to the parousia (cf. 2 Cor. 4:5). In Lk. 18:9ff. the tax collector adopts a conventional practice, but the prayer of v. 13 shows that it is a spontaneous expression of conviction of sin and of the desire for grace, and that as such it is the only attitude that can stand before God.

II. The Passion Narrative. In the passion narrative Jesus is twice beaten (Lk. 22:63-64; Mk. 15:19) and the spectators also strike themselves (Lk. 23:48). In the mocking of the blindfolded Jesus in Lk. 22:64 rough handling is part of the game. Even in the wording a relation to Is. 50:6 LXX is plain. The events point the writers to the OT original for their phrasing and presentation. So does the patient acceptance of mockery and smiting by Jesus. Striking him on his thorn-crowned head, the soldiers mock Jesus as king (Mk. 15:18-19). In contrast, those who beat their breasts at the foot of the cross (Lk. 23:48) seem to be uttering an Amen to the confession of the centurion, not merely bewailing Jesus but offering a sign of penitence as in 18:13.

III. Acts. In their resistance to the gospel in Acts the Jews often resort to blows, as in the beating of Sosthenes in 18:17 (cf. the attack on Paul in 23:27ff.). In 23:2 Ananias has Paul struck on the mouth, and Paul in response tells him that God will smite him. God’s smiting in judgment takes various forms (Dt. 28:22) but it is usually depicted as a direct mortal blow (Gen. 8:21; Num. 33:4, etc.). Paul perhaps lived to see Ananias struck down in A.D. 66.

IV. Paul. The only NT instance of a transferred use of týptō is in 1 Cor. 8:12, where the strong inflict a blow on the conscience of the weak by causing them to act against conscience. The blow is not the typhlós [blind], typhlóō [to blind]

A. Greek Antiquity and Hellenism.

I. Meaning.

1. The adjective typhlós denotes human and animal blindness. It then refers to objects without light or access (cf. blind alleys) and also to what is invisible or concealed.

2. The verb typhlóō means “to make blind,” “to rob of sight,” passive “to go blind,” “to be blinded,” and less strictly “to render (or be) ineffectual.”

II. Literal Blindness.

1. Normally in antiquity blindness means full loss of sight. The blind, deaf, and lame are often mentioned together.

2. Causes of blindness are heredity, animal poison, wounds, accidents, exposure to bright light, etc. Psychological causes are sought in sorrow or tears. Excesses and affronting the gods might also cause blindness.

3. The barbaric custom of blinding others in jealousy, revenge, retribution, or punishment is another cause of blindness. Orestes tries to atone for his incest by self-blinding. Goddesses often inflict blindness as a penalty.

4. The blind walk unsteadily, stretch out their hands for support, use sticks for their feet, and are helped by others, especially relatives. Antigone is an example of devotion to the blind. Many of the blind are beggars, although a few of the more talented make their mark as musicians, seers, philosophers, even jurists or statesmen.

5. Blindness does not necessarily bring moral betterment and may even augment wickedness. It is thought to enhance mental perception, hence blind seers and sages. Inability to see the world’s beauty counts as a grievous blow of fate. Yet philosophers think one should not bewail it but accept it; the real evil is the failure to live the life of the sage with no wants.

6. Although cataracts may be removed and incipient blindness arrested, there are no natural cures for blindness in antiquity. Sight can be restored only by divine intervention. Vespasian and Hadrian are said to have cured blind people as divine agents, but normally the gods restore sight directly when penitence is expressed, some divine condition is met, or petition is made. Usually the return of sight is sudden, but the gods may also use or command medicine or magic as instruments. Aesculapius is of special importance in this area.

III. Comparisons and the Transferred Sense.

1. The unsteady walk of the blind offers a common point of comparison. So do the pain and unalterability of blindness. The thought of the blind leading the blind occurs frequently. A paradoxical proverb is that even the blind can see something that is plain.

2. Metaphorically other bodily members, or acts, or objects may be called blind. We also read of mental or moral blindness. Spiritual blindness can be set in juxtaposition with physical sight.

a. It is a terrible affliction for the mind or the soul to be blind. The whole person may be blind when the field of vision is restricted. Thus all of us are blind regarding the future. Wealth leads to intellectual and moral blindness; it is a poor optician. Lovers are also blind, and love of self blinds us to our faults. In philosophy ignorance is blindness, e.g., ignorance of who we are, why we are here, and what good and evil

are. Skeptics, whose wisdom is to know, see, and hear nothing, are blind. There may also be blindness to art, science, and beauty. In Gnosticism those who have not attained to saving knowledge are blind. Ignorance is dream, sleep, and blindness. Woes fall on those who grope around like the blind. The redeemer comes to bring sight to the blind, although full freedom comes only at death with freeing from the body.

b. What blinds can also be called blind, e.g., wealth, or the gods of wealth (Plutos), love (Eros), and war (Ares). Gnostic texts also refer to the blind god or blind evil powers, which are blind in their pride or ignorance.

B. The LXX.

I. Usage.

1. The adjective occurs some 21 times in the LXX, but mostly the word is used as a noun. We find both literal and transferred uses.

2. The verb occurs only three times in the LXX.

II. Literal Use. 1. Causes of blindness in the OT are heredity, striking, blinding, etc. Blindness, mentioned with deafness and lameness, is a severe handicap.

2. Laws protect the blind. If they cannot be priests (Lev. 21: 18ff.), they enjoy God's help and are thus to be treated humanely (Lev. 19:14; Dt. 27:18).

3. God as Creator is behind blindness (Ex. 4:11). He threatens it as a penalty for those who reject his word and break his commandments (Dt. 28:28-29). He can also open the eyes of the blind (Ps. 146:8).

III. Transferred Sense.

1. On the day of the Lord people will wander about like the blind, i.e., in anxiety and confusion (Zeph. 1:17). When justice is far off, they grope for the wall like the blind (Is. 59:9-10).

2. In the deliverance from exile God brings forth the blind who have eyes but do not see, i.e., who cannot interpret events (Is. 43:8). To be blind is to be without knowledge (42:19; 56:10).

3. Curing blindness is part of the message of salvation. The reference is partly literal (Is. 35:5) and partly figurative (29:18). The Servant has the task of opening blind eyes (42:7). God himself will be a guide to the blind on the way (42:16). The messenger of Is. 61:1ff. proclaims sight to the blind in the LXX version.

C. Judaism apart from Philo.

I. Usage. Various Hebrew and Aramaic words are used for those born blind or those who go blind in either one eye or both.

II. Literal Sense.

1. Judaism follows the OT closely in relation to blindness. Blindness is a severe affliction, although it may give enhanced spiritual light and greater powers of memory. Laws ameliorate the lot of the blind, protecting them from various ills, but the blind are often beggars.

2. The law frees the blind from various cultic duties and penalties, e.g., attending feasts and scourging. They must not go out with a stick on the sabbath, and others must help them to fulfil some obligations, e.g., purification. The blind may not be witnesses or judges, nor may they divorce their wives or accuse them out of jealousy.

3. Judaism views blindness as a divine punishment, especially for sins with the eye (cf. Samson). In the case of those born blind, the sin is their parents' or else they sin in the womb or God foresees future sin. But the defect also ranks as a wise provision to check the full development of evil impulses.

4. Blindness may also be traced back to demons, or to the tears of sorrowing angels (Isaac), or to seeing God's glory (Abraham). Jacob's blindness is a blessing when Esau marries foreign wives. Cures are not

i.e. id est, that is expected unless God intervenes. The messianic age will bring the end of blindness. As God gave the law to a people with no defects, so there will be no defects in the end time. In the eschatological restoration, the Messiah will heal the blind first.

III. Transferred Sense.

1. When Is. 35:5 is taken spiritually, the main hope is that of removing blindness to the law. Yet blindness may also denote ignorance and aberration. Sinners are blind. In the Damascus Document Israel is blind in the sense of being unable to find God without the Teacher of Righteousness.

2. Jewish literature contains few proverbs referring to the blind. When the blind are present, a person with one eye is said to see clearly. A doctor at a distance is called a blind eye.

D. Philo.

1. Philo mostly uses typhlós in a transferred sense for moral, philosophical, or spiritual blindness. Comparisons are common, e.g., the partial judge blundering along like the blind without stick or guide, or the wicked groping about at midday like the blind. The crowd follows blind riches or blind aísthēsis. To miss the allegorical sense of the OT is blindness. Ordinary people who choose the evil, ugly, or perishable are blind.

2. Philo makes little use of the verb. The blinded in soul perceive only sensory things and regard them as the source of all being.

E. The NT.

I. Usage.

1. typhlós occurs in the NT some 36 times in the literal and 12 in the transferred sense. Only Mark has it solely in the literal sense. The senses merge in Jn. 9. Paul uses the term only in the metaphor in Rom. 2:19.

2. typhlóō occurs three times in the NT in a transferred sense.

II. Literal Sense.

1. The NT mostly uses typhlós as a noun with reference to blindness in both eyes.

2. The NT sheds little light on the social, legal, or religious status of the blind. Interest centers on the cure at the physical level. The traditional cry of Mk. 10:47 brings the NT view into sharp focus. Begging is for many blind people the only means of livelihood (Mk. 10:46; Jn. 9:8). The association with the deaf and the lame is traditional. Lk. 14:13 enjoins kindness to the blind. Mt. 12:22 traces back blindness to demons. A curse causes temporary blindness in Acts 13:11; the verse presupposes miraculous healing.

3. The main NT references come in accounts of healing. Features of these accounts are the cry for mercy, the separation of the blind (Mk. 8:23), the use of spittle and washing (Jn. 9), the laying on of hands (Mk. 8:23), the suddenness or difficulty of the cure (Mk. 8:25), and confirmation of the result (10:52). The stress falls on faith and the healing power of the word. The pity of Jesus calls for notice in Mt. 20:34. In Mk. 8:17ff. the dramatic healing of the blind man answers the blindness of the disciples regarding the saying of Jesus in 8:14. With Jesus' other mighty works, the healings of the blind signify the dawn of the age of eschatological salvation in fulfilment of prophetic promise (Mt. 11:5; Lk. 4:18). In Lk. 7:19-20 John's disciples see the blind cured and can thus reassure the Baptist that Jesus is the expected Savior. In Jn. 9 the fact that the man is born blind stresses the greatness of the cure but also suggests that all of us are by nature blind to the light of revelation. The disciples echo a common view when they ask whether the blindness is due to some sin of the parents. When they ask about his own sin, they possibly have in mind some sin in the womb or God's foreseeing of future sin. Jesus points to a differently oriented divine prescience. If the cure shows that Christ is in truth the light of the world (9:5) who has come to bring sight

(9:39), it still evokes doubt and strife and rejection (vv. 8-9, 16, 18, 34). Christ makes the blind to see, but he also makes those who see blind (v. 39).

III. Transferred Sense.

1. The blind of Jn. 9:39ff. are those who cannot understand the signs of Jesus, or perceive his divine origin (v. 29), or be led by him out of darkness. Their fault is to think that they see when they are blind. God himself sends this blindness according to Jn. 12:40. In 1 Jn. 2:11 darkness is the force that brings blindness, but only through hatred of the brother and walking in darkness. This kind of blindness is sin.

2. In the saying about "blind leaders of the blind" the reference is to those who judge others without seeing their own sin (Lk. 6:37ff.), but also involved is blindness to God's will and the word of Jesus (Mt. 15:14). The blindness of the scribes and Pharisees is a refrain in the great attack of Mt. 23 (vv. 16, 17, 19, 24, 26). Their blind folly may be seen in their false exposition of the law, which fixes on details and misses essentials. Thinking they are guides of the blind, they are in truth blind guides.

3. In Rom. 2:19 Paul's more general charge against the Jews is that their failure to do what they say invalidates their claim to be a guide to the blind. In 2 Cor. 4:4 the god of this aeon has blinded the eyes of unbelievers so that they cannot see the light of the gospel. The decision regarding blinding comes with the preaching of the gospel.

4. In 2 Pet. 1:9 it is the unfruitful rather than the ignorant who are blind and shortsighted (cf. vv. 5-6). Rev. 3:17 complains that the Laodicean church thinks it is spiritually rich but is really blind. Only Christ (v. 18) can cure this blindness of self-deception and complacency.

F. The Apostolic Fathers. In these works typhlós occurs only in LXX quotations in Barn. 14.7, 9 (Is. 42:6-7; 61:1-2). [W. SCHRAGE, VIII, 270-94]

hýbris [arrogance], hybrízō [to treat with arrogance], enybrízō [to insult], hybristḗs [an arrogant person]

A. Greek Usage.

1. The original sense of this group, which is of obscure derivation, is that of invading the sphere of another, with an implication of arrogance. Conveyed is the idea of trespass with overweening force and the infliction of insult, injury, etc. There are warnings against hýbris, which is a common fault among the free, but which finally brings destruction to the self or others.

2. Tragedy deals with hýbris. It is the scornful right of the mighty. The gods visit it with retribution and hence it plays a big role in the Greek sense of sin. It breeds tyrants, plunges into excess, and entails violation of reverence for the holy. In human relations it means either scorn and contempt or, more actively, hurt and violence.

3. For the historians hýbris is an important factor in the course of events. In Herodotus the religious basis is plain; the Persian plan of conquest is in keeping with a fundamental attitude. In Thucydides affluence leads to hýbris and punishment follows. Xenophon finds in the decay of Sparta and Athens a judgment on hýbris.

4. In legal rhetoric hýbris denotes the violence of the rich or the violation of personal rights.

vv. verses

5. Socrates has no sense of arrogance. For Plato hýbris is the negative side of érōs and an essential force. In young people it leads to attacks on parents and public order. It hits the weakest most severely and results in injustice and destruction. If education brings victory over it, the victory can lead to fresh hýbris. hýbris is a power of fate that permeates all areas of life.

6. In Aristotle hýbris denotes sexual violation but also scorn, ill-will, arrogance, greed, and offense against the gods. A presumptuous disposition is a general human complaint which the law cannot punish. It raises a political problem; only prudence can achieve the peace that is the goal of politics, but periods of peace also produce transgression.

7. The usual senses continue in the later period, but while hýbris retains its emotional force, it often takes on much weaker meanings, and it never becomes a key concept in Greek thinking.

B. The OT.

1. The main Hebrew originals for hýbris belong to the g'h group denoting loftiness and then pride or arrogance, which are wrong inasmuch as they involve presumptuousness and defiance. God comes to overthrow pride (Am. 6:8). Pomp and careless ease lead to it (Ezek. 16:49-50). A fall ineluctably follows pride (Prov. 16:18). This applies to Israel (Hos. 5:5) no less than its enemies (Jer. 48:29-30). The arrogant encroach on the weak (Jn. 35:12). The righteous hold aloof from them (Prov. 16:19). Zeph. 3:11 promises their overthrow. Since the Greek terms correspond only to the negative side, they can be used only in appropriate passages.

2. Another root is zyd, which denotes bubbling or boiling, and which has the force of "impudence" or "insolence" when applied to foreign powers (Jer. 50:29ff.) or to Israel herself (Ezek. 7:10). The group is important in Proverbs for frivolous or contentious conduct (13:10). In Sir. 3:16 arrogance is sin and is thus aimed against God. For this root hýbris and related terms occur only six times, in spite of the similarity between the Greek and Hebrew words.

3. Since hýbris is so broad, it is hard to fix its limits either over against synonymous Greek words or in relation to Hebrew terms.

4. Other roots connected to hýbris denote kicking, despising, unruliness, etc.

5. Only a few instances occur in works available only in Greek. The references are to pride, arrogance, and violence, especially in the Gentiles. Opposing them, God is the one who hates hýbris (mísybris). (For OT details see TNDT, VIII, 299-302.)

C. Judaism.

1. Philo refers to persecutions of the Jews or attacks on them. hýbris occurs between men and women or among men or women. It includes infringements, excesses, and boasting, but also legally inflicted dishonoring. It permeates the Gentile world (cf. the games, festivals, and excessive taxation). Affluence breeds it, and the senses lead to it.

2. Josephus finds hýbris in OT history (e.g., Cain, Nimrod, and the people of Sodom). It includes disparagement, ignominy, ravishing, encroachment, violence, cruelty, provocation, and shaming. It characterizes those in power, poisons human relations, and explains the fall of Israel and Judah.

3. The Dead Sea Scrolls refer to arrogant people, scoffing priests, and wicked pride.

4. In eschatology hýbris is a mark of the kingdom of evil. For the rabbis pride is willful sin and involves denial of God and idolatry. Two aspects of pride are the wicked act of destruction and joy in it.

D. The NT.

1. The group occurs only infrequently in the NT. Paul in Acts 27:10, 21 uses the noun hýbris in the sense of "injury" or "loss." Among the sufferings of 2 Cor. 12:10 the hýbreis are "difficulties" that he meets with on his travels due to the terrain, the weather, and human hostility.

2. Paul uses the verb in 1 Th. 2:2 with reference to the sufferings and insults that he and Silas undergo at Philippi. The meaning of hybrízō here is "to suffer ignominious punishment." The general sense in Acts 14:5 is "to revile or maltreat." In Lk. 11:45 the scribe accuses Jesus of reproaching the leaders with insulting mockery. Rough handling is the point in Mt. 22:6. Jesus himself suffers the fate of the righteous by being shamefully treated according to Lk. 18:32.

3. hybristḗs occurs in the list of vices in Rom. 1:30 for despisers who disrupt relations with both God and their fellows. Paul himself was once a blasphemer, persecutor, and evildoer (1 Tim. 1:13; cf. 1 Cor. 15:9; Gal. 1:13; Acts 9:4-5).

4. Heb. 10:29 uses the compound enybrízō. As those who violate Moses' law incur severe punishment, how much more those who spurn God's Son, profane the covenant blood, and do despite to the Spirit of grace. The three statements correspond.

E. The Early Church. 2 Clem. 14.4 echoes Heb. 10:29, while 1 Clem. 59.3 shows the influence of the liturgical usage of Judaism. In Hermas Similitudes 6.3.4 the reference is to temporal punishment. The wicked rejection of Christ in Justin Dialogue 136.3 is directed against God. Pagans deride their own goods (Apology 4.9). Idolatry is mocking God (9.3). Apocryphal works refer to the charge of hýbris leveled against Christ. Later hýbris is a mark of the despotic ruler who is hostile to God. For Augustine it is the basic sin which causes the fall and from which other sins derive. [G. BERTRAM, VIII, 295-307]

hygiḗs [healthy, sound], hygiaínō [to be healthy, sound]

A. Secular Greek.

1. Meaning. The group has the sense of "healthy" and then more generally "rational," "intelligent," "reliable," and "whole." Health implies a proper balance of the whole and on some views is maintained by a balance of such forces as the moist, dry, cold, hot, bitter, and sweet.

2. Assessment of Health. Health is regarded as the normal state and is highly valued. In philosophy it ranks as one of the goods. Healing is an important craft. All excess damages health. There is a health of soul as well as body, but bodily and spiritual health belong together. Stoicism views bodily health as indifferent. Passion of every kind is sickness, and virtue results from health of soul. Magic associates health with life, but Gnosticism shows little interest in it.

B. The LXX.

1. hygiaínō occurs 41 times in the LXX. Health is a divine gift, a part of life, and denotes human well-being.

2. hygiḗs occurs ten times in the LXX and denotes healthy or safe (Is. 38:21; Josh. 10:21). The Hellenistic evaluation of health emerges in Sir. 30:14. Physicians and apothecaries work through divinely given means (38:1ff.).

C. Hellenistic Judaism.

1. Josephus mostly uses the group for rational thought and action.

2. Philo believes with the Stoics that if the soul is healthy sickness does little harm, and that the soul is healthy when healthy thoughts overpower passion. The soul's corruption is the basis of all vice. The pillar of the healthy soul is the noús.

D. The NT.

1. The NT does not especially value health. Yet Jesus as the victor over sin and suffering restores health by his word (Mk. 5:34; Mt. 12:13; Jn. 5:9; Lk. 5:31). Making the whole man healthy (Jn. 7:23), he liberates for a new life that embraces the body. He transmits the power to heal, or to make whole, to the apostles (Acts 4:10).

2. 3 Jn. 2 uses a Hellenistic epistolary greeting.

3. In 1 Tim. 1:10; 6:3; Tit. 2:8 we find the idea of "sound" teaching or words. The reference is to true teaching, not to teaching that makes whole. This teaching, validated by the apostles, is concerned, not with speculation, but with true, rational, and proper life in the world. Being "sound in faith" (Tit. 1:13) goes hand in hand with being temperate, serious, and sensible (2:2).

E. Apostolic Fathers. Prayer is made for the "health" of kings and rulers in 1 Clem. 61.1. The tree that represents the law in Hermas Similitudes 8. 1.3-4 is "sound." So are the stones used in building the church (Similitudes 9.8.3). Not keeping the seal of baptism "intact" is the point in Similitudes 8.6.3. But the group seldom occurs in these writings. [U. LUCK, VIII, 308-13]

hýdōr [water]

A. The World of Antiquity.

I. *Greek Usage. hýdōr is found from Homer in the sense of "water." Derivatives and compounds include "water jug," "to drink water," and "dropsical" (hydrōpikós).

II. Meaning.

1. The Flood. Water figures first in human experience as the flood that surrounds and threatens dry land. Many cosmogonies have the world arise out of the primal flood. Distinction is made between the upper and lower waters. The Greeks localize water in the seas but still distinguish between the water that comes from the depths of the earth and the water that falls as rain.

2. The Dispenser of Life. Water also has a life-giving role in human experience. The Greeks regard springs and rivers as divine, and the Egyptians hail the Nile as "the lord of the water that brings greenness." The idea of a "water of life" occurs in Babylonian myth, and Hellenism develops the legend of Alexander's campaign for the water of life that confers immortality.

3. Cleansing. A third use of water is for cleansing. In religion this results in rites of purification, e.g., for cultic qualification. If possible, running water should be used, and sometimes it is consecrated by special rites. Whether ritual cleansing is supposed to wash away sins is highly doubtful.

B. The OT and Jewish World.

I. Usage. The LXX uses hýdōr for a Hebrew term (mayim) that is partly singular and partly plural. In the Hebrew the term is sometimes added to define springs or channels that may or may not contain water. With place names water means that a body of water is close by (Josh. 11:5, 7; 16:1; Judg. 5:19). Water is a general term for what might be cloud, mist, rain, or dew; spring, stream, canal, pond, lake, or cistern; or simply drinking water.

II. Meaning.

1. Literal Use.

a. Drinking Water and Irrigation. Palestine is poor in water resources; there is no assurance of it for people or plants. Water is thus emphasized along with bread (Ex. 23:25; 1 Sam. 30:11-12). Great importance attaches to wells (Gen. 26:18-19), pitchers (24:14ff.), water pots (1 Sam. 26:11-12), conduits (2 Kgs. 18:17), and troughs (Gen. 30:38). Rain, dew, and watercourses provide for the watering of tillable land. The provision of water in the desert stresses its great importance (Num. 20:24; 27:14, etc.). In the promise of the land the assurance of water is decisive (Dt. 8:7). The prophecy of living streams depicts end-time Israel as an antitype of paradise (Ezek. 47:1ff.; Zech. 14:8). God can both send rain and dry up great rivers (1 Kgs. 18:41ff.; Is. 15:6). It is he who provides the necessities of life (Is. 55:1).

b. The Flood. The earth arises out of chaos as God divides the waters. At the flood the upper and lower waters engulf the earth. God keeps back the flood at the exodus but causes it to overwhelm the pursuing Egyptians. A parallel occurs with the crossing of the Jordan and again when Elijah parts the Jordan (2 Kgs. 2:8). These events declare God’s lordship over creation. In rabbinic Judaism the temple rock stops up the lower waters but allows them to flow across the earth. The water ceremonies at Tabernacles make the earth’s fertility possible. The paradisal rivers will flow from this place in the age of salvation.

c. Cleansing. Water is offered to guests to wash their feet (Gen. 18:4), and it is also used for washing clothes. Yet it is supremely important in ritual cleansing. Living water should be used for special purifications. Its application is by sprinkling, partial washing, or total washing, whether of the body or of clothes. The entrails of sacrifices should also be washed. Ordained for the holy people, the cleansing rites have symbolical and eschatological significance (cf. Ezek. 36:25; Zech. 13:1; Is. 4:4). Washing to cleanse from blood-guiltiness (Dt. 21:6) is partly ritual and partly figurative. The Pharisees and Essenes develop the OT rites of cleansing into all-embracing systems, e.g., cleansing before meals. From OT washings proselyte baptism arises. Ritual washings seem to have been common at Qumran in the form of bathing. Washing and inner conversion are demanded for total consecration. In a final cleansing God sprinkles the spirit of truth like cleansing water on the elect.

2. Transferred Usage.

a. As water quenches thirst and nourishes life, so God is the source of living water (Jer. 2:13), and desire for him is the true thirst (Ps. 42:1). His people is like a flock by the water or a tree by the brook (Pss. 23:2; 1:3). In the last time Israel will be like a watered garden (Is. 58:11). The Qumran community regards its members as trees of life hidden by lofty trees (the wicked). It also speaks of the water of life and the drink of knowledge. Rabbinic Judaism compares the word of the law or of scribes to water. Damascus describes false teaching as lying water.

b. As in the flood, water may symbolize oppression of the nation (Is. 8:6-7) or of individuals (2 Sam. 22:17). The breadth of water is compared to the knowledge of God (Hab. 2:14). Other images are the running off of water (the heart failing for fear), the spilling of water (death), and water bursting the dam (2 Sam. 5:20) and flooding the earth (Is. 30:28).

c. The figure of cleansing occurs mostly with verbs of washing rather than the term “water.”

C. The NT.

I. Water Literally and Metaphorically.

1. The Synoptic Tradition.

a. Flood. Jesus displays his divine authority over the flood (Mk. 4:35ff.) when the raging water threatens the disciples. He commands the storm as only God can do, and he summons the disciples to faith. When he walks on the water he does so as God coming to the aid of his people. Peter’s walking depicts faith’s walking over the flood of evil that engulfs unbelievers (Mk. 6:45ff.; Mt. 14:28ff.; cf. Jn. 21:7).

b. Drinking Water. A cup of cold water is a small gift (Mt. 10:42), but it carries a share in the kingdom (25:40). Those who refuse it will thirst in vain for a drop of water in the world to come (Lk. 16:21ff.).

c. Cleansing Water. The sinful woman displays her devotion by washing Jesus’ feet with her tears (Lk. 7:36ff.). Pilate washes his hands (Mt. 27:24-25) to shift guilt from himself to the people. Jesus calls for inner cleansing rather than the outer washing of the hands before meals (Mk. 7:2ff.), which as a human tradition evades the true demand of the law. He himself effects the eschatological cleansing of the heart.

2. The Johannine Writings.

a. The Flood in Revelation. The voice of the exalted and victorious Son is as “the sound of many waters” in Rev. 1:15 (cf. 14:2; 19:6). The harlot is enthroned on many waters in 17:1, the waters being the nations. The dragon spews out water in 12:15; depicted here is the church's flight into the wilderness and its deliverance from the flood of oppression.

b. Drinking Water in Revelation and John's Gospel. God smites the earth's drinking water in judgment in Rev. 8:10-11; 14:7; 16:4-5. The redeemed receive the water of life to drink. The Lamb leads them to fountains of the water of life (7:17), God gives drink to the thirsty from the fountain of the water of life (21:6), a river of water of life issues from the throne (22:1), and the thirsty are invited to take the water of life without cost (22:17). In this figurative usage the water represents true life in fellowship with God. In John's Gospel Jesus at the well offers the true water that quenches the thirst for life by giving life (Jn. 4:13-14). The gift that becomes a well of water is his word or Spirit or he himself (8:37; 7:39; 6:56). To drink is to believe (7:38). The living water of 4:10-11; 7:38 is not running water (the traditional sense) but the water that mediates life.

c. Healing and Cleansing Water in John's Gospel. Water has a curative effect in Jn. 5:7, but Jesus' healing as a demonstration of eschatological grace sets aside the natural rules. The washing in the pool in 9:6-7 does not effect the healing; the man regains his sight by coming to him whom God has sent. The symbolism of Jn. 2:1ff. is that Jesus is he who brings salvation. Using water for purification, Jesus replaces with his gift all that the law can offer. The foot-washing signifies what Jesus does for the disciples by his death. Rabbinic disciples have to wash the rabbis' feet, slaves those of their masters, and wives those of their husbands, but Jesus by this act shows that his work of salvation is a service of love that cleanses his people and pledges them to similar mutual service (13:6ff., 12ff.).

3. 2 Pet. 3:5-6. In the NT only 2 Pet. 3:5-6 refers to the cosmogonic significance of water. By God's word the earth is formed out of and by water, and it is then destroyed by water. The verse uses a Hellenistic idea but replaces emanation with creation by the word. The point of the passage is to draw a parallel between destruction by water and future destruction by fire.

II. Baptismal Water

1. The Saying of the Baptist. The saying in Mk. 1:8 and Mt. 3:11 describes the imminent eschatological event as the completion of what has already begun. The initial cleansing mediates forgiveness, the final cleansing will create the new life and abolish all that is against God.

2. Water Baptism and Spirit Baptism. Acts 1:5 applies the saying of the Baptist to the receiving of the Spirit (cf. 11:16). The promise of the Spirit marks off Christians from disciples of John (19:1ff.). The uncircumcised who receive the Spirit by hearing in faith cannot be denied water (10:47-48). Water here is the element, not a figurative term for baptism itself; it is not efficacious as such (cf. 2:38). God gives the Spirit through the human action but in orientation to faith and church growth (8:16-17; 11:17). In John the climax of John's baptism is the manifestation of Jesus as the bearer of the Spirit (1:26-27, 31, 33). 1 John links baptism with death; Christ has come through both water and blood (5:6), and is thus thrice attested by Spirit, water, and blood (5:7-8). Water is efficacious through the Spirit (Jn. 3:5; cf. flesh and blood and the Spirit in 6:53, 63). The blood and water of Jn. 19:34 also recall baptism. In Eph. 5:26 Christ cleanses through the washing as he is at work by the word, i.e., the invocation of his name. Heb. 10:22 associates washing and spiritual cleansing. Baptism replaces previous washings, and Christ's blood sprinkles the heart. It has inner, not outer significance (1 Pet. 3:21).

3. Water Symbolism. Christian baptism is compared to a cleansing bath (Eph. 5:26; Heb. 10:22), to the death-dealing and saving flood (1 Pet. 3:20-21), to the sea that divides the saved from the lost (1 Cor. 10:1-2), and to a death from which there is emergence to new life (Rom. 6; cf. 1 Pet. 1:3) in fellowship with God and his people.

D. The Early Church.

1. Water Symbolism. Hermas Similitudes 9.16.4ff. compares the church to a tower standing over the primal flood. Barn. 11 relates baptism to drinking water that mediates life. Tertullian On Baptism 3ff. calls water, as the first element, the seat of the Spirit. As living creatures come forth from it, so does new life in baptism.

2. Rules about Baptismal Water. As in proselyte baptism, so in John's the candidates probably stand in the water and the Baptist either immerses them or pours water over them. Did. 7.1ff. prescribes running water if possible and trine immersion or pouring. Tertullian thinks it makes no difference what water is used (On Baptism 4) in view of its sanctification for the purpose of baptism.

3. Sanctifying. From Ignatius Ephesians 18.2 one finds the idea of a sanctifying of the baptismal water. This supposedly empowers it for its special task. Invocation of the Spirit develops in the baptismal liturgy. Tertullian On Baptism 4 views the sanctifying as the descent of a heavenly substance but Apostolic Constitutions 7.43 prays only that the baptism that follows may have an effect corresponding to the promise.

4. Holy Water. In the fourth century A.D. the sanctifying of the baptismal water merges with a hallowing of the water of lustration, which originally is unconsecrated and largely symbolic. Apostolic Constitutions 8.29 offers a dedicatory prayer that seeks for the holy water effective power through Christ to preserve health, cure sickness, drive out demons, and ward off assaults. [L. GOPPELT, VIII, 314-33]

huiós [son], huiothesía [adoption]

A. huiós in Greek.

I. Classical Usage.

1. The word occurs in the two forms huiós and hyós.

2. From Homer huiós is a word for "son" alongside país. It embraces illegitimate sons and sons-in-law as well as physical sons.

3. The gods have both divine sons and sons by mortal women.

4. The possibility of an extended use occurs in phrases like "son of sorrow."

II. Hellenism.

1. huiós occurs in the style of Near Eastern and Egyptian rulers: "son of Helios or Zeus." Augustus styles himself Divi filius (theoú huiós).

2."Son of the city" etc. is an honorary title for leading citizens.

3. On papyri huiós may also denote one who is not a relative but close, e.g., a pupil.

4. Among the Stoics the idea of divine sonship is suggested by the doctrine of the unity of the human race.

5. a. A question arises whether the description of Jesus as the huiós toú theoú is linked with the Hellenistic idea of the theíos anḗr (divine man). Homer uses theíos to describe heroes, but this is a mark of epic style. In classical Greek theíos means "pious" or "extraordinary," but carries no sacral connotation.

b. We find the idea of divine charisma in some personages, but not with any clearcut concept of divine descent.

c. The son formula occurs relative to Simon Magus and other Gnostics, but we know these claims only from Christian polemic.

d. In pre-Christian times theíos anḗr is not a fixed expression, and theíos usually has predicative significance and does not necessarily imply strict divine sonship. The only mortals who are sons of gods are doctors as descendants of Aesculapius (a functional use), rulers, Gnostics in Christian polemic, and some philosophers. Usage does not support any firm association between divine sonship and theíos. [W. VON MARTITZ, VIII, 334-40]

B. Old Testament.

1. Linguistic Data. The Hebrew term for "son" is bēn, and the Aramaic, with a shift from n to r, is bar.

2. Physical Descendants and Relatives.

a. The primary meaning of bēn or bar is "son," but the terms may also denote other degrees of relationship, e.g., brother, grandson, or cousin. We also find a use for the offspring of animals, the shoots of trees, and sparks as the offshoots of fire.

b. Mostly the terms serve to denote personal status. By relating people to their fathers or ancestors they put them in the organic context of a family or tribe.

c. A genealogical sense leads to the desire for many sons (Dt. 28:4ff.; Ps. 127:3ff.). Jeremiah commands the exiles to have children as an expression of the divine promise of life (29:6). Sons insure the future and are the crown of the aged (Prov. 17:6; 23:24-25). The wicked have no sons or lose them (Num. 27:1ff.; 2 Chr. 21:17). David regards his many sons as a gift from God (1 Chr. 28:5).

d. The son is under his father's authority. The firstborn has privileges (Gen. 43:33; Dt. 21:17) but may forfeit them (Gen. 35:22; 25:29ff.); the father may prefer, or God elect, a younger son instead (cf. Gen. 37:3; 1 Sam. 16:12). Parents must bring up sons, instructing (Prov. 1:8: Dt. 6:9; Ex. 10:2) and chastising them (Prov. 13:1) as needed. Sons owe moral duties to their parents (Prov. 1:8, 4:1; 6:20, etc.). They have responsibility for the debts and offenses of their fathers (2 Kgs. 4:1; Josh. 7:24-25), but with some limitation (cf. Dt. 24:16). If God visits the sins of parents on their children (Ex. 20:5), this does not abrogate personal responsibility (Ezek. 18:1 ff.). Tensions may arise between fathers and sons (cf. Gen. 27; 34).

e. Certain sons like Isaac and Jacob have special significance as heirs of the divine promise. The sons of Hosea and Isaiah (Hos. 1; Is. 7:3; 8:1ff.) play a symbolical role (cf. also Is. 7: 10ff.).

f. Adoption confers equality with physical sons. The OT has legitimation rites that serve this purpose; cf. Gen. 30:3 and perhaps Ruth 4:16-17 (where Naomi recognizes the child of Boaz and Ruth as the rightful heir of her dead son).

3. Association.

a. In the plural bēn may carry the sense of "young men" or "children" (Prov. 7:7; Gen. 3:16). It may also be used for members of a group or for students etc. for whom the speaker is a father.

b. In Zech. 4:14 Joshua and Zerubbabel are "sons of oil," i.e., anointed ones; the term "sons" expresses their relationship to the anointing oil.

4. Relationship.

a. In a weaker sense bēn or bar expresses membership in a collective society.

b. This may be a people, country, or place.

c. It may also be a vocational guild or a class of people (e.g., resident aliens).

d. Another use is to denote the sharing of a quality (courage etc.) or fate (captivity).

e. Finally, the terms are used to express belonging to a time or age (cf. Jon. 4:10; Ex. 12:5; Lev. 12:6; Gen. 7:6).

5. Relationship to God.

a. The OT uses bēn or bar for beings that belong to the divine world but never with the term Yahweh (cf. Gen. 6:2, 4; Job 1:6; Dan. 3:25; Pss. 82:1; 89:5). The idea is that of a pantheon under the sovereignty of God. Yahweh is Judge in the heavenly council. The heavenly beings are totally subject to God and his will (Job 1:6ff.). There is no strict father-son relationship such as one finds in surrounding cults. If divine beings, including the gods of other nations, exist under the supreme God, they have no independent power and simply constitute a heavenly court.

b. In 2 Sam. 7:14; Pss. 2:7; 89:26-27 the king is called God's son, but this cannot be meant in a physical sense. God will play the role of a father to the Davidic dynasty (2 Sam. 7:14-15). He will give the Davidic king both legitimacy and a share in his kingly rule. Ps. 89 offers a poetic paraphrase of the divine legitimation of the Davidic dynasty. The killing of Judah has here the privilege of a firstborn. He does not claim deity but uses his divine legitimation as a ground on which to seek help. Ps. 2:7 recalls the divine legitimation by enthronement. God's declaration may well be part of the ritual. It takes the form of acknowledgment (as of the child of a concubine). The ruler is not a divine son by nature, nor does he enter the divine sphere by enthronement. He is recognized as a son by divine resolve and hence shares the divine authority and inheritance. A legal sonship replaces the physical sonship of Egyptian thinking.

c. More commonly Israel is God's son, his firstborn (Ex. 4:22), his dear child (Jer. 31:20), his favored one (3:19). The people are God's children (Dt. 14:1) whom the wife Israel (Hos. 2:4) or Jerusalem (Ezek. 16:20) has borne. They may thus call God "our Father" (Is. 63:16; 64:7; Mal. 2:10). Israel and the Israelites are equally God's son or sons, although only the righteous are so in Ps. 73:15 and the priests in Mal. 1:6. God acts toward Israel as both father and mother (Dt. 1:31; Is. 66:13). The relationship is not a natural one and may be dissolved. On the one side it stresses distance (cf. Mal. 1:6; Dt. 8:5). God has a legal claim to Israel, and it owes him duties in response for care. On the other side the relation stresses intimacy. God deals with Israel in kindness and love. It may thus appeal to his mercy (Is. 63:15-16). Even when it disappoints him by its sin, he still admonishes it to return to a loving Father (Jer. 3:14, 22) and promises that he will again receive its members as sons (Hos. 2:1). It is, of course, by God's free resolve and not by physical generation that Israel is God's son, and when it proves disobedient to God the term "son" becomes in the prophets an expression for sinful and guilty Israel (cf. Is. 1:2ff.; 30:1, 9).

d. Personal names with "father" or "brother" show that individuals may be seen in a father-son relation to God. There are no similar names with "son" in the OT, but perhaps the use of "shoot" in 1 Chr. 7:17. Ezr. 10:35 serves this purpose.

C. Judaism.

I. Hellenistic Judaism.

1. The LXX.

a. The LXX usually has huiós for bēn (bar), and less commonly téknon and paidíon. No solid conclusion can be drawn from the use of other terms than huiós in, e.g., Ex. 4:23 and Hos. 11:1. [G. FOHRER, VIII, 340-54]

b. Special phrases are "beloved son" in Gen. 22:2, and "sons of wisdom" (Sir. 4:11), of "captivity" (1 Esdr. 7:11ff.), of "Adam" (Sir. 40:1); of "the covenant" (Ps. Sol. 17:15), and of "aliens" (1 Macc. 3:45).

c. Wis. 9:7 and Ps. Sol. 17:27 adopt the OT phrase "sons of God" for Israel. The whole nation is God's son in Wis. 18:13, but not every Israelite is a son of God (Sir. 51:10). After death the righteous dwell among God's sons (Wis. 5:5).

d. In the LXX the king is God's son in Ps. 110:3, the angels are God's sons in Dt. 32:43, and Israel is the firstborn son in Ex. 4:22. In general, however, there is some hesitation about the use of the title "son of God."

2. Josephus. Josephus does not use "son of God," although he views God as the Father and Lord of Israel and the Creator of all people. He restates 2 Sam. 7:14 (Antiquities 7.93) in such a way as to rule out any mythical idea of divine sonship.

3. Philo. Philo accepts God as the Father of all; the cosmos is his "younger son." Individually only doers of good are God's sons. The sons of Israel should seek to be sons of the firstborn lógos. The wise are adoptive sons of God by a second birth. Nevertheless, the title "man of God" is more appropriate. Philo upholds the differentiation of God and man but comes near to divinizing Moses. The lógos is God's firstborn son as the force that creates and sustains the world and as the sinless mediator. Hellenistic Judaism uses "son of God" more freely than Palestinian Judaism. Yet it does not equate the son of God with the theíos anḗr either as a Hellenistic charismatic or as a biblical man of God through whom God works miracles. [E. SCHWEIZER, VIII, 354-57]

II. Palestinian Judaism.

1. Duties of the Son. Sons are circumcised on the eighth day, learn the law from their fathers, and assume responsibility in their thirteenth year. They must honor and respect their parents, merely inviting them to see any errors, and making expiation for them the first year after death. Since sons learn from fathers, students view their teachers as fathers and owe them the same respect. Teachers are fathers for the world to come and not just for this world. The rabbis set stages for the various periods of life. Thus the learning of Scripture comes at five years, practice at thirteen, marriage at eighteen, work at twenty, maturity at thirty, age at sixty, and old age at seventy. In the father's house study of Scripture and its legal exposition are the primary duty.

2. Relationship. As in the OT the term "son" often denotes relationship, e.g., to a city or society or to the covenant. Common phrases are "sons of the world" and "sons of the world to come." Qumran uses "sons of light and darkness," "sons of the truth, righteousness, and grace," and "sons of iniquity, guilt, and Belial."

3. Sons of God. Israel ranks as the son, the firstborn, or the only son of God, and Israelites are God's sons. Divine sonship is grounded in the law and demands its study and observance. The righteous in particular are God's sons; he protects them and punishes those who mistreat them.

4. The Messiah as God's Son. Postbiblical Judaism does not forget the promise of a royal anointed one called God's son, but treats the phrase "son of God" cautiously so as to avoid ideas of physical descent. "Son of God" is not a messianic title and references occur only in connection with promises such as that of Ps. 2:7 and 2 Sam. 7: 10ff. Qumran takes these messianically but offers no precise exposition. Reservations become stronger when Christians call Jesus "Son of God." Thus 2 Sam. 7:14 is no longer taken messianically and Ps. 2:7 is reduced to a mere comparison. The rabbis also stress God's uniqueness and deny that he can have a son.

[E. LOHSE, VIII, 357-62]

D. The NT.

I. huiós without Reference to God.

1. Jesus as the Son of Mary and Joseph. Jesus is Mary's son in Mt. 1:21ff.; Lk. 1:31. In the genealogies legal descent is at issue. In Mk. 6:3 "son of Mary" is probably used because Joseph is dead. The point in Mt. 13:55 is that the people do not sense the true mystery of the origin of Jesus. The son of Rev. 12:5 seems to be the son of the community.

2. Father and Son in Illustration of God's Care for Believers. God deals with believers as his sons in Mt. 7:9 and Heb. 12:5ff. Believers are sons of the king in Mt. 17:25-26 but may retain synagogal fellowship in this freedom.

3. High Estimation of the Son. Hostility of fathers and sons marks the horror of eschatological tribulation (Lk. 12:53). Serious discipleship means not loving sons or daughters more than Jesus (Mt. 10:37). Jesus shows his compassion by raising the widow's only son (Lk. 7:22). On some readings Lk. 14:5 puts the son before the ox to show the urgency of rescue even on the sabbath.

4. The Transferred Sense. In Jn. 19:26 Jesus makes the favorite disciple Mary's son.

5. Sons of Abraham and Israel. In Lk. 15:21ff. only the word of forgiveness makes the prodigal a true son. Being a son of Abraham is the essential thing in salvation in Lk. 19:9. God's election decides this (Gal. 3:7; 4:22ff.). Mt. 27:9, Lk. 1:16, and 2 Cor. 3:7ff. refer to pre-Christian Israel.

6. huiós for Student. Jesus calls students “sons” of the Pharisees in Mt. 12:27 (cf. Paul in Acts 23:6). Mark is Peter’s son in 1 Pet. 5:13.

7. Relationship. NT phrases are “sons of the kingdom” (Mt. 8:12), “of peace” (Lk. 10:6), “of light” (Lk. 16:8), “of the resurrection” (Lk. 20:36), “of this aeon” (Lk. 16:8), “of the wicked one” (Mt. 13:38), “of the devil” (Acts 13:10), “of disobedience” (Eph. 2:2), and “of perdition” (Jn. 17:12); cf. also “sons of the bride chamber” (Mk. 2:19) and “of thunder” (Mk. 3:17).

II. Jesus as the Son of God in the Tradition.

1. Jesus. Jesus seldom uses “Son of God” for himself, though scoffers accuse him of doing so in Mt. 27:43. He works out more by his life and teaching than the title as such can ever say. He distinguishes, however, between God as “my Father” and God as “your Father,” thus setting himself in a unique relationship to God.

2. The Davidic Son of God.

a. The Regency of the Exalted. In Rom. 1:3-4 Jesus is the son of David who after Easter is granted eternal dominion as messianic King of the community. In this verse “Son of God” denotes a function.

b. Resurrection as Son of God. In Acts 13:33 Jesus is raised as the Son. The resurrection is central here. It means victory over death and the beginning of the royal dominion of the Son with God’s unique act of intervention.

c. The Baptism of Jesus. The statement at the baptism comes in an eschatological setting and fulfils expectation of the Davidic Son of God. The good pleasure of God denotes election to the office of eschatological King, and Jesus’ ministry is thus understood as the regency promised to David’s house and executed by God’s commission.

d. Separation to the Kingdom. In Col. 1:12ff. the church is taken out of the world and set in the kingdom of God’s beloved Son. Remission of sins delivers believers from the power of darkness and sets them under the rule of the exalted Lord. The terminology resembles that of Qumran.

e. The Transfiguration. Here again one sees a link between the institution of Jesus as end-time King and his designation as Son of God.

f. Ps. 110. Mk. 12:35ff. relates the rule of the Son of David to the session at God’s right hand (cf. also Heb. 1:5ff.). Heb. 5:5-6 combines Ps. 2:7 with Ps. 110:4 in order to forge a link with the important high-priestly motif.

3. The Eschatological Role of the Son of God and the Absolute ho huiós.

a. The Link with Son of Man Christology. 1 Th. 1:10 presents the eschatological role of the Son of God in connection with Christ’s atoning death and resurrection. Paul is perhaps adapting here an original Son of Man saying. Rev. 2:18 describes the Son of God in the same way as the one like a son of man in 1:13ff. Here again, then, an original Son of Man saying is perhaps transferred to the exalted Son of God. Conversely Mk. 14:62 links the Son of Man with Ps. 110:1, and cf. the link between Ps. 8:6 and Ps. 110:1 in 1 Cor. 15:25ff.; Eph. 1:20ff.

b. 1 Cor. 15:28. ho huiós occurs in this verse in an apocalyptic context. The term safeguards against a Christology that forgets the consummation, avoids a unitarian concept of God, and yet steers clear of a doctrine of two Gods by giving the Son his place within the one divine glory.

c. Mk. 13:32. In this verse the parousia is again central and the Son is subordinate to the Father in his earthly work, for while he brings about the meeting of God and the world he does not know the time of the consummation. The title “Son” is not the primary point of the saying and perhaps relates to the title “Son of Man” (cf. Lk. 12:8; Mt. 13:41; Jn. 1:51 for references to the Son of Man and angels together).

d. Mt. 11:27. This verse associates the Son and the Father. The reference is not so much to mutual knowledge as to the election and acknowledgment of the Son, to whom the Father has given all power, and hence to the work of the Son for the acknowledgment of the Father in the world. The stress is on the unique mediatorial position of the Son in his function of representing God in the world.

e. Johannine Passages. The apocalyptic basis of the absolute ho huiós may be seen in Jn. 3:5 and 5:19ff. In the Son one sees the Father, so that faith in him is faith in the Father. Jn. 8:35-36 contrasts the transitory stay of the slave with the permanent residence of the son (cf. Heb. 3:5-6; Gal. 4:7; Rom. 8:15ff.).

4. The Sending of the Preexistent Son of God. In Gal. 4:4-5; Jn. 3:17; 1 Jn. 4:9 we find the phrase "God sent his Son," with a hína clause to express the saving mission of the Son. As such the term "send" does not have to mean preexistence (God also sent the prophets), but in Paul and John a developed Christology may be presupposed. As God sent wisdom or the Spirit, so he sends the preexistent Son whose closeness to God constitutes his significance as distinct from angels or prophets. The categories are such as we find in Hellenistic Judaism but with a new historical singularity and eschatological urgency. They are thus more temporal than spatial.

5. The Miraculously Born and Miracle-Working Son of God.

a. The Virgin Birth. Lk. 1:35 links the annunciation to huiós theoú. The saying explains the title in terms of the power of the Spirit while relating the divine Son to the stem of David. There are no true parallels for this usage.

b. The Miracle Worker. The demon addresses Jesus as "Son of the Most High God" in Mk. 5:7. The cries in 1:24 show that the root idea may be that of the OT charismatic (possibly associated with the theíos anḗr); expectation of a Messiah who drives out demons helps to complete the picture.

c. The Temptation. Satan's questions presuppose the manifestation of God's Son by mighty acts. Jesus himself, however, rejects a divine sonship that manifests itself along the lines suggested.

6. The Suffering Righteous as Son of God. In Mt. 27:43 the chief priests mock Jesus in the words of Ps. 22:8 for regarding himself as the Son of God along the lines of the suffering righteous of Wis. 2:18, i.e., the servant who trusts God and is exalted among his sons after suffering ignominious death. The general point here is that suffering and sonship are not incompatible.

III. Jesus' Divine Sonship in the NT Writers.

1. Mark. Mk. 1:11 adopts the title "Son of God" and thus presents the divine dimension of the work of Jesus. The demons know him as the Son in 1:24, God manifests his sonship to the three in 9:7, Jesus links the sonship and the passion in 12:1ff., he relates it to the coming exaltation in 14:61, and the centurion confesses it in 15:39. Mark, then, finds in the title the mystery of Jesus but only insofar as Jesus manifests himself as Son of God in the passion, death, and exaltation of the Son of Man.

2. Matthew. In Matthew the divine sonship lies hidden under his suffering as the righteous one (cf. 3:15, 17; 21:39; 27:40). Jesus is the Son as he fulfils Israel's destiny (2:15). Discipleship leads to confession of Jesus as God's Son (14:33; 16:16). 17:5 repeats 3:17 and thus strengthens the disciples and illustrates the promise. 11:27 presents the Son as the Revealer of all mysteries. Finally, 28:19 associates Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

3. Luke and Acts. The title "Son of God" characterizes Paul's preaching in Acts 9:20. The term Christ explains Son of God in Lk. 4:41. Lk. 22:69-70 connects divine sonship with session at God's right hand. In 23:47 Luke is perhaps preventing pagan misunderstanding by avoiding "Son of God." Luke omits Mk. 13:32. Lk. 1:32-33 takes up the tradition of a Davidic Son of God but relates it to Christ's rule over the church. In 1:35 conception by the Spirit underlies Jesus' description as the Son of God. Jesus is no mere man elevated to deity after the pagan model. His election reaches back to his birth and preexistence. While there is no biological or metaphysical concern, Luke finds it important to stress that the birth of Jesus rests on God's act and thus testifies to his unique election and sonship.

4. Paul.

a. Apocalyptic Passages. Paul in 1 Th. 1:10 plainly takes the Son of God concept from the apocalyptic Son of Man tradition. Final honor belongs to the Father but not apart from the unique dignity of the Son (1 Cor. 15:28; Phil. 2:11). Metaphysical equality is not Paul's concern.

b. The Sending of God's Son. Paul adopts and reconstructs the traditional pattern in Gal. 4:4-5; Rom. 8:3-4. In Galatians the sending of the Son is unique and is related strictly to the incarnation and the death for sinners. Romans stresses the judicial destruction of sin in the flesh of Jesus. The Son who is sent is connected with God's acts in Israel's history. He is the heir of Abraham who overcomes the curse of the law, vindicating it without entailing our eternal death.

c. The Suffering Son. Paul describes the sonship in Christ's suffering in Rom. 5:10; 8:32; Gal. 2:20. "Son" describes the bond of love between God and Jesus and hence the greatness of the sacrifice. The title relates, not so much to preexistence, but to the wonder of the saving act. It is grounded in Christ's passion rather than his exaltation and kingship.

d. Other References. In Rom. 1:3, 9 the Son is the content of the gospel and implies Christ's uniqueness. In Rom. 8:29 and Gal. 4:6 the root of the designation lies in the resurrection and related apocalyptic expectation.

5. John.

a. Eschatological Passages and the Absolute ho huiós. Jn. 3:35-36 brings out the love of the Father and the Son and the apocalyptic endowment of the Son with power; hence the demand for faith and obedience. In 5:19ff. the Father meets us in the Son. The greater works of resurrection relate to the present awakening to faith. 6:40 plainly has an eschatological background. The reference is to the enduring will of the Father by which we may have eternal life through the Son. In 1 Jn. 2:22ff. one cannot have the Father without the Son. It is thus fatal to lose the Son (2 Jn. 9). The absolute ho huiós occurs in the sending formula in 1 Jn. 4:14.

b. The Sending of God's Son. John presupposes preexistence but finds the uniqueness in the greatness of God's love (Jn. 3:16). The sending formula points ahead to the cross (vv. 14-15). The giving of the Son means eternal life (3:17; 1 Jn. 4:9). The claim to sonship, which involves sending to do the Father's works, brings on the death of Jesus (10:36ff.). By the sending come faith and deliverance from judgment. Salvation is being in the Son (1 Jn. 5:20), which is being in the truth and not in evil.

c. The Son as the Content of Confession. For John the Son whom God sends is also the King of Israel and the Christ (Jn. 1:49; 11:27). The formulation in 3:19 stresses his uniqueness. Like the Hellenistic charismatic, he performs miracles but his titles are different. 1 Jn. 4:15 and 5:5 repeat Jn. 20:31, though without the Christ title. Believing in God and believing in the Son are the same (1 Jn. 5:10). Eternal life is in the Son (5:11). The Son is the content of God's witness (5:9), and believers confess the Son (2:22-23); they have fellowship with the Father and with "his" Son (1:3).

d. Sonship in John. In John sonship presupposes an essential unity of Father and Son. This has its basis in their mutual love whereby the Father wills and gives, and the Son hears and obeys. Manifested in the acts of Jesus, it is grounded in the depths of the divine being and hence implies Christ's preexistence (cf. Jn. 8:56), although the emphasis does not lie here but on the unity of love.

6. Other Writings.

a. Hebrews refers to the exalting of the Son of David to eternal rule. The name Son implies a divine dignity even above that of angels (Heb. 1:5 quoting Ps. 110:1). The Son is also the High Priest in 4:14; 5:5; 7:28. In this way the passion and the sonship come together. The special position of Melchizedek serves to bring out Christ's uniqueness as Son and High Priest; it is dangerous to reject so great a Deliverer.

b. 2 Pet. 1:17, referring to Mk. 9:7, finds dignity and majesty in the title.

c. Revelation uses "Son of God" only in 2:18 on the basis of Ps. 2:7. As the Lord of earthly rulers the Son is close to Jewish models but only as the faithful witness who freed us from sins by his blood (1:5).

IV. Human Sons of God.

1. Apart from Paul. In the NT the sonship of Jesus is determinative. God is a common Father but not all are his sons; hints that they are so by creation occur only in Lk. 3:38 and Acts 17:28. In Mt. 5:45 the righteous are God's sons on the basis of God's fatherly love that makes obedience possible. But in Lk. 6:35 this finds actualization only eschatologically. In Lk. 20:36 the sons of the resurrection are beings in the heavenly sphere immune from death and corruption. Yet by liberation from the law, disciples of Jesus are already a company of free sons in Mt. 17:25-26. Eschatological life as a son means sharing Christ's apocalyptic lordship in Rev. 2:26-27. In Jn. 1:12 there is already a present sonship by the authority granted in the Logos, i.e., the incarnate Lord. Yet John reserves huiós for Christ and uses tékna for believers as those who are born of God. Heb. 2:10-11 shows that believers become sons only as the Son calls them his brethren.

2. Paul. In Rom. 9:26 (quoting Hos. 2:1) Paul finds the divine sonship of the eschaton fulfilled in the community. Those who are in Christ are heirs with him (Gal. 3:28-29). The Son has been sent to break the power of the law and to give life and sonship through his vicarious death (Gal. 4:5-6). In this sonship they cry "Abba, Father" (Rom. 8:15). They are no longer slaves, but free (Gal. 4:7). Yet their manifestation as sons comes only with the eschaton (Rom. 8:19). The spirit of sonship is the Spirit of the Son (Gal. 4:6). Christ is God's image, and believers are fashioned in his likeness (Rom. 8:29) by a new creation that begins already yet awaits its full consummation. [E. SCHWEIZER, VIII 363-92]

E. Early Christian Literature.

1. Survey.

a. 1 Clement never uses huiós theoú but it is presupposed in 36.4-5.

b. The Didache uses the baptismal formula in 7.1, 3 and cf. 16.4.

c. Ignatius uses huiós theoú several times (cf. Ephesians 4.2; 20.2; Magnesians 8.2). It is plainly a current title (cf. also Pol. 12.2 and Mart. Pol. 17.3).

d. In Barnabas the title has a solid place but is not especially significant (cf. 5.9; 7.2; 12.10).

e. huiós theoú is common in Hermas (especially Similitudes 9) but in different connections and often with imprecise content.

f. The apocryphal gospels are familiar with the title but it is hard to date and interpret the references.

g. The Coptic Gospel of Thomas has the term only indirectly ("Son of the living One"); the Father here is primal light and the Son is the Revealer.

h. The Gospel of Peter uses the phrase in a naive way and on the basis of the canonical Gospels.

i. With Justin and Irenaeus theological reflection begins.

2. Meaning. In 1 Clement ideas of preexistence and subordination seem to be determinative. For Ignatius Christ's sonship is central and involves true deity, although with an antidocetic stress on his coming in the flesh. In Barnabas Christ is the preexistent Son who was active in creation and who took flesh for our salvation. In Hermas the title is an inalienable if obscure constituent of the faith. Justin finds Logos more significant. The Logos, begotten as Son with no loss to the Father, is also God. In this way Justin maintains the deity of the Son without imperiling monotheism. Irenaeus, too, identifies Son and Logos but with a primary emphasis on the incarnation and hence on the Very Man and Very God in a Word-flesh Christology. [W. SCHNEEMELCHER, VIII, 392-97] huiothesía.

1. The Greek World.

a. Legal Presuppositions. This late word means "adoption as a child." In ancient Greece adoption is often informal but public. It is a way of meeting the absence of heirs, available only for citizens of legitimate descent, and carrying no change of name for those adopted. When associated with a will, adoption usually includes the duty of providing for the adopting parents.

b. Religious Presuppositions. In Greek there are no instances of a transferred use, but in myth Heracles is adopted by Hera in a mock birth to confer legitimacy on him after his apotheosis.

2. Judaism. The LXX does not use the term, but Philo has it for the relation of the wise to God.

3. The NT. In the NT only Paul uses the term. His aim is to show that the sonship of believers is not a natural one but is conferred by divine act. The term might refer either to the act or to the result. In Rom. 9:4, relating to Israel, adoption is associated with the covenant and the promises. It means freeing from the law in Gal. 4:5. In Rom. 8:15 freedom comes with the spirit of "sonship" in virtue of Christ's all-transforming act. Eph. 1:5 traces it back to God's foreordination and thus leaves no room for boasting. In Rom. 8:23 the adoption is future; this teaches us that we always need God, but also that his purpose does not change. [E. SCHWEIZER, VIII, 397-99]

ho huiós toú anthrṓpou [the Son of Man]

A. The Linguistic Problem.

1. This NT expression is an Aramaism in which there stands behind ánthrōpos a general concept that is then individualized.

2. In Hebrew the indeterminate form occurs 93 times in Ezekiel as God's address to the prophet and also another 14 times, always in a poetic or lofty context as a term for man.

3. The Hebrew term does not occur in rabbinic Hebrew.

4. The Aramaic is found from the eighth century for "someone," and it then has the general sense of "man" or the individual sense of "somebody." The various expressions for man or son of man are common in the Aramaic of the time of Jesus in both collective and individual senses.

5. The NT ho huiós toú anthrṓpou is the literal rendering of an ambivalent Aramaic expression. In apocalyptic contexts this can bear a messianic sense but only approximates a title. Except in Jn. 5:27, however, the Gospels use the Greek in a messianic sense as distinct from the simple ánthrōpos. This may well be an interpretation in passages like Mk. 2:10; Mt. 8:20; 11:19; 12:32, although conversely the Aramaic might have had a messianic sense in Mt. 9:8 ("to men"; cf. v. 6). Deliberate interpretation is possibly present in 1 Tim. 2:5; Heb. 2:6; 1 Cor. 15:21; Rom. 5:15. The Aramaic can have a typical as well as a messianic sense—another possibility in Mk. 2:10. Mt. 8:20; 11:19; 12:32. Other sayings, however, permit only a reference to Jesus, and more than the meaning "I" is obviously at issue, as the church perceives when it fixes a messianic interpretation with its ho huiós toú anthrṓpou.

B. The Historical Problem.

I. Impossibility of an Israelite Genealogy.

1. General. The "Son of Man" attracts the attributes of God (Dan. 7:13; 4 Esdr. 13:3ff.); this is possible only if he is a heavenly being and not just an earthly Messiah. The author of Daniel seems to have taken over his imagery from outside and not inherited or invented it. An alien tradition seems also to be present in 4 Esdras and Ethiopian Enoch.

2. OT Concepts.

a. Ezekiel. In Ezekiel the term "son of man" applies to the prophet. Similarities to Jesus lie in his humanity and his solidarity with the people. Yet in the case of Ezekiel suffering is no essential part of his creaturely lowliness, and he does not in any strict sense represent or embody the people.

b. Ps. 80. In Ps. 80:15, 17 Israel is a man at God's right hand, a son of man whom God has made strong for himself. But the collective sense is by no means certain, and we may have here a prayer for the strengthening of a king to bring salvation to the people.

c. Personification of Israel. Personification of Israel takes place, but only on the basis of given concepts, and with no implication of the transcendence or judicial work of the Son of Man.

3. Results. One has thus to seek a non-Israelite background for the concept, although the figure will not derive from this, nor will one will be able to explain its significance in either Jewish apocalyptic or the NT in the light of it.

II. Non-Israelite Background.

1. Untenable Hypotheses.

a. Iran. One cannot explain the apocalyptic Son of Man as a Judaized form of Gayomart of Iran.

b. Babylonia. Only if the Son of Man was originally a second Adam can one associate him with the Babylonian Adapa, who has no eschatological, judicial, or redemptive function.

c. Egypt. Nor is there much support for the view that the Ancient of Days is the Egyptian sun-god and the Son of Man his successor.

d. Judaism. Rabbinic speculations about a glorified Adam are protological even if they manifest a soteriological concern, and this Adam is heavenly only in the sense of cosmic, not as the one who comes from heaven. Philo’s heavenly man has a macrocosmic character and cosmological function as distinct from the eschatological and judicial character and function of the Son of Man. Wisdom speculation links up with the idea of the Son of Man inasmuch as wisdom manifests the Son or the Son has wisdom, but there is no equation of the two.

e. Gnosticism. Gnostic derivation usually presupposes common kinship with other sources, although more precise theories try to trace a development of the Gnostic ánthrōpos (the heavenly or primal man) by way of Judaism. Intellectually the Gnostic primal man originates in the microcosm-macrocosm idea which relates cosmic and human structure. Gnosticism then spiritualizes primal man as a universal plḗrōma, or as a central hypostasis within this plḗrōma, or as both. As a hypostasis he is the chief and best part of the macrocosm and microcosm, or of the cosmic and human soul, as the heavenly man in the cosmos and the inner man in the outer man. In Gnostic systems the two best parts become detached, and an earthly prophet representing or incarnating the cosmic soul comes to men in order to achieve reconciliation. This involves a mythological or at least a docetic view of the prophet and an understanding of redemption in the categories of a revelation of the identity of the inner soul and of its reuniting with the cosmic soul. Fundamentally this view of the Gnostic ánthrōpos bears no relation to the apocalyptic Son of Man. The personification may be due to common hypostatic thinking, but the Jewish Son of Man plays an eschatological role, has a judicial function, redeems by acquitting, does not stand in natural union with the cosmos, is announced by prophetic and apocalyptic writers, and has no mission of descent and reascent. Arguments relating John more closely to Gnosticism appeal to preexistence, descent, and reascent in John, but John shows no acquaintance with Gnostic cosmology or anthropology, e.g., the idea of a collective soul plunged into darkness. The parallelism of ánthrōpos and wisdom or word in Jewish tradition explains the ideas of preexistence, descent, and reascent in John, and if the Gnostic redeemer is also judge this may well be due to Christian influence.

2. A Possible Hypothesis (Canaan). Another possible hypothesis is that Canaan (cf. Ras Shamra) provides the background for the Son of Man in Daniel (cf. the fourth beast and the chaos dragon, the Son of Man and Baal, the Ancient of Days and El). The details, however, do not correspond, and OT monotheism modifies the adopted nexus of motifs. Thus God embraces in himself the predicates of various Canaanite deities.

3. Bearing on Interpretation. The discussion warns us against overstressing the human form of the Son of Man. Jewish apocalyptic has developed its own figure and not just taken over a heavenly macroanthropos or archetypal primal man. This Jewish figure bears a messianic reference and hence Son of Man can become a title. Different groups ascribe to the figure different functions, and heterogeneous traditions and related speculations affect the presentation.

III. Jewish Apocalyptic.

1. Dan. 7.

a. The Vision. Within the general vision Dan. 7:9ff. offers a little apocalypse in which the Ancient of Days sits on the throne, and the one like the Son of Man is brought to him, and is given eternal dominion. The happening is in the heavenly world and the coming with the clouds denotes the superhuman majesty of the one like the Son of Man. The "like" shows that there is no exact equation with earthly humanity. The coming after the beasts represents the coming, not of archetypal man, but of the eschaton itself after the rule of the beast-powers. Earthly empires yield to the eschatological dominion of the one like the Son of Man. He symbolizes this dominion rather than any specific group or kingdom. In this way he suggests messianic ideas.

b. The Interpretation. In the interpretation the one like the Son of Man is the representative of God's entourage who in the end time exercises power in place of earthly rulers. The saints of the Most High are Jews who remain loyal to the ancient traditions. Hence the one like the Son of Man represents the true Israel that will replace the empires. He has a saving eschatological function.

2. Ethiopian Enoch.

a. Usage and Interpretation. In Ethiopian Enoch the Son of Man figures only in 37-71. Again the term "man" describes the appearance of the heavenly being and is not as such a messianic title. The alternation of three forms of expression makes this plain. In all three the heavenly one in human form ejects and destroys earthly rulers because of their revolt against God. He is preexistent and will be manifested by God to the saints. His word will be mighty before the Lord of spirits. Looking like a man, he is with the Head of Days, reveals what is hidden, avenges the righteous, and is the light of the nations and hope of the afflicted. Chosen by the Lord of spirits, he appears before him, the Spirit is poured out upon him, righteousness rules in his days, and he sits on the throne of glory. The descriptions insure the messianic significance of the figure with their combination of salvation and judgment, but they do not make Son of Man a messianic title. He is not a personification of Israel, does not mediate creation, is not God's image nor a prototype of humanity, and while associated with the Servant of Is. 53 undergoes no passion.

b. The Exaltation of Enoch. The third similitude includes an exaltation of Enoch as the Son of Man. This implies neither incarnation nor provisional mystical identity but simply the institution of Enoch into the office and function of the eschatological Son of Man. The idea perhaps originates with a group which makes Enoch its hero and whose head takes the name of Enoch. Taking over existing Son of Man eschatology, it assumes that its master is the future Son of Man and ruler and judge of the world.

3. The Sixth Vision of 4 Esdras. In 4 Esdras we find a Son of Man eschatology, a messianic eschatology, and a third eschatology in which God himself brings the end. The Son of Man in the sixth vision is preexistent, comes from Zion at a time of strife, destroys and punishes the nations, and protects and gathers Israel. Associated with the Son of Man are Enoch, Moses, and Elijah, and the Son of Man emerges as the national leader of Israel, although not without messianic features of lowliness conferred by the title of servant.

4. Synoptic Data. Allusions to Dan. 7 occur on the lips of Jesus. The tradition in Ethiopian Enoch has little influence, and the political Son of Man of 4 Esdras, which may not predate the NT, bears no relation to Son of Man Christology. Jewish apocalyptic, then, does little to shape the concept of the Son of Man in the NT. This concept forms a fourth source of thinking in this area along with those mentioned in 1-3. It derives from the application of the term Son of Man to Jesus himself, whether by Jesus or by his community.

5. Son of Man Expectation and Jewish Messianology. Son of Man eschatology stands in tension with expectations of a kingly, priestly, or exalted Messiah, or of the return of figures like Elijah and Moses, or of salvation apart from any specific savior. Only individual groups expect a transcendent Son of Man. Yet Judaism in general identifies the Son of Man of Dan. 7:13-14, or the Son of the clouds, as the glorious and powerful Messiah who has still to come, but who has not come in Christ either crucified or coming again (cf. Trypho in Justin Dialogue 32.1).

C. The Son of Man in the NT.

I. Synoptic Gospels.

1. Jesus' Preaching.

a. (a) Jesus calls himself "man" three times, and first in Mk. 2:1ff., where he meets the objection that God alone can forgive sins.

(b) He is "man" again in Mt. 11:18-19, where a comparison and contrast with the Baptist is the point, and the evidence supports an original Son of Man in Aramaic.

(c) "Man" also seems to be the thrust in Mt. 8:20 and parallels. Expositions of this saying include a contrast with animals, a stress on humanity as compared with the Son of God, and a reference to the concealment of the Son of Man. Yet discipleship and the homelessness that it demands, seem to be the main issue. Those who follow Jesus must be prepared for the fact that although even animals have dens a "man such as he" has nowhere to lay his head.

b. (a) Eight sayings of Jesus yield a self-contained apocalyptic picture, the first of which is found in Mt. 24:27 and parallels. Here the Son of Man will shine like lightning so that none can miss him. The saying plainly replaces a political Messiah with a bringer of eschatological salvation.

(b) Mt. 24:37 and parallels express the element of suddenness or surprise. The comparison with Noah suggests that the Son of Man has the office of judgment. The need, then, is to be prepared for his coming, as is confirmed by Lk. 21:34ff.

(c) Lk. 18:8 goes hand in hand with 18:6. Will the Son of Man, at his coming, find that people have responded to his message in faith and are petitioning God as the widow did the unjust judge? Lk. 17:24 carries the same message as an intimation, and Lk. 21:36 as a demand.

(d) Before the council in Lk. 22:69 Jesus says that the Son of Man sits in judgment at the right hand of power (with some allusion to Ps. 110:1). The saying is a veiled confession and refers to majesty rather than exaltation.

(e) Mt. 10:23 limits the disciples' mission to Israel. The point may be either that the disciples must make haste or that the last hour is hastening on. But the saying may also be a promise that persecution will end. It fits in with other sayings that expect the coming, whether to earth or in heaven. Various explanations have been advanced for the sign, e.g., a phenomenon of light, the Son of Man himself, or the banner around which his people will rally.

(f) These dominical sayings form a basis for later messianological statements and offer a fourth tradition independent of Dan. 7 etc. It is unlikely that charismatics in Jewish Christian circles formulate them, since statements directly in Jesus' name are unknown, the charismatic period and that of the independence of the Palestinian churches end too quickly, and after Easter the resurrection comes to the fore as the dawn of the new age.

c. There are four group parallels to Son of Man statements. In the first one may place Lk. 22:27, in the second Mk. 3:28-29, in the third Mt. 10:32-33, and in the fourth Mk. 9:9, 31, etc. With these sayings Jesus' proclamation of the Son of Man achieves completeness. He is not just a preacher of repentance, a second Amos or Baptist. By his passion he confers forgiveness of sins and achieves a perfecting whereby those who confess him may share his glory.

d. Whether Jesus thinks of himself directly as the apocalyptic Son of Man is hard to say for certain in view of the Palestinian refusal to make explicit identifications. In Jesus' prophetic preaching he can easily relate his work and God's rule, for prophetic preaching sets up such a relation in regard to present and future, or present person and future event. Direct identification, however, destroys the dynamic element in the relation and robs the preaching of its prophetic character. Jesus brings the eschatological future into the present in statements about his perfecting, in his proclamation of God's kingdom, and in his intimation of the Son of Man. These parallels may not be equated expressly but they are not mutually exclusive. Jesus' eschatological role begins with his preaching of the kingdom. In this role he is associated with the Son of Man and is thus neither a rabbi nor a community member reflecting on the group leader, even if it is difficult to equate him directly with the Son of Man or the day of the Son of Man with God's rule. Since the Son of Man sayings are primarily addressed to the disciples, they come at first in less public preaching. But the apocalyptic Son of Man symbolizes Jesus' assurance of perfecting while perhaps carrying an ambivalent messianic and nonmessianic meaning. The association with the passion does not have to imply a link between the Son of Man and the Servant of the Lord but may develop out of a unique extension of the sufferings of various individuals in Israel on behalf of the people as a whole.

2. The Oral Tradition.

a. First Stage. (a) In the light of Easter and the prospect of Christ's return the original Son of Man sayings are related to the return and bear a clear messianic sense relative to the earthly ministry.

(b) Mt. 10:32-33 assumes fuller significance as confession of Jesus is seen to be decisive for future pardon or condemnation.

(c) According to the saying about speaking against the Son of Man and blaspheming the Spirit, it is also perceived that with Jesus comes an offer of forgiveness but that rejection of this offer leaves no further room for remission.

(d) A "for my sake" appropriately supplements the last beatitude in Mt. 5:11.

b. Second Stage. (a) The title Son of Man finds a place in prophetic (Mk. 9:31; 8:31; 10:33; 9:9) and situational (Mk. 14:41; 14:21; Lk. 22:48) intimations of the passion. If Jesus himself perhaps put the statements in the first person, the correct basis of the title is that it is he who brings together the concept of the Son of Man and his own perfecting through violent death and passion (cf. Mt. 23:37ff.; also Mk. 2:19-20; 10:38; Lk. 12:49-50). Messianic majesty and lowliness meet in Jesus to produce the gospel of the suffering Son of Man. The simple passion prediction in Mk. 9:31 stresses the divine action. Mk. 8:31 ff. emphasizes the necessary fulfilment of Scripture. A more detailed prediction of the sufferings comes in Mk. 10:33-34. Mk. 9:9 relates the transfiguration to the glory of the resurrection and the resultant disclosure of the messiahship. Mk. 14:41 develops a basic theological saying; the betrayal is the time of the handing over to sinners of him whom God has appointed for the work of perfecting. In Mk. 14:21 the betrayal is again the issue. The term Son of Man adds weight to an emphatic I (cf. the "me" and "with me" of v. 18). The "going" is that of the Son of Man who is destined to die as he is now to be delivered up to his enemies. The saying in Lk. 22:48 does not supplement the story of the arrest but is an expression, not of reproach, blame, or warning, but of sorrow on the part of Jesus. Here again Son of Man is equivalent to a "me," as in Lk. 22:21.

(b) The title Son of Man also finds a place in eschatological and "I" sayings of Jesus. The Son of Man confesses every confessor (Lk. 12:8) and denies every denier (Mk. 8:38) at the judgment. It is thus that he judges. In Mt. 19:28 the Son of Man sits on his glorious throne of judgment and rewards those who leave all for his sake; this is to take place in the new world. In Mk. 10:45 the second half elucidates the first and the term Son of Man corresponds to the "I" of Lk. 22:27. Jesus as Son of Man offers an example of service as the principle of discipleship. Lk. 6:22 has "for the Son of Man's sake" rather than "for my sake" (Mt. 5:11) in the last beatitude.

c. Third Stage. (a) An important saying is that about the sign of Jonah in Lk. 11:30. The basic point is that the generation seeks a sign, that it will be given no sign, but that the sign of Jonah will be given it. When the parousia of the risen Jesus grants the sign of messianic accreditation, which may be perceived directly, it will be too late to accept this as a validation of his preaching.

(b) Mk. 13:26 cites Dan. 7:13, thereby relating the intimation of the end to Son of Man prediction and supporting it with a biblical reference.

(c) Lk. 17:22 has the sufferings of the disciples as its theme. The day of the Son of Man is not visible in such a way that one can adjust one's conduct to it. Since the kingdom comes suddenly, one should be ready even though not knowing when the hour will strike.

(d) In Mt. 24:43-44 the coming of the Son of Man is like that of a burglar for which a prudent householder should be prepared. Cf. 1 Th. 5:2, 4 and 2 Pet. 3:10 for the same comparison to a thief, although the Son of Man is not now himself the thief.

(e) The story in Mk. 2:23ff. concludes with the saying that the Son of Man is lord of the sabbath. Not just human need, but the authority of Jesus as Son of Man decides the proper attitude to the sabbath, which is "made for man," not "man for the sabbath" (v. 27).

(f) In Lk. 12:10 rejection of Jesus in his earthly life is not so serious as rejection of the Spirit of the exalted Lord subsequent to the resurrection.

(g) Mt. 12:32 paraphrases the same saying.

(h) Lk. 19:10 at the end of the story of Zacchaeus reminds us of Mk. 2:17 and Mt. 15:24 ("I" sayings).

3. Literary Tradition.

a. Mark and the Lucan Source. (a) Mk. 14:62 carries an allusion to Dan. 7:13 (cf. Mk. 13:26). Here is a full confession of messiahship which focuses on its proclamation and hence on disclosure of Jesus' majesty to the whole world. Earlier proclamations of majesty occur in the forgiving of sins and the assuming of authority over the sabbath (Mk. 2:10, 28). The sayings in 8:31 etc. establish the theology of the suffering Son of Man wherein the suffering necessarily precedes his resurrection and the manifestation of his glory (cf. 9:9, 12). The execution of the Baptist (Elijah) does not render the passion of the Son of Man superfluous (cf. vv. 11-12). In Mk. 10:45 it is as the Son of Man that Jesus gives his life as a ransom for many. The saying brings out the depth of the service that Jesus renders and makes it paradigmatic for the self-humbling which he demands of the disciples. The betrayal saying in Mk. 14:21 sets in juxtaposition "that man" and "the Son of Man" and in so doing adds weight to the threat and stresses the dignity of the Son of Man. After 14:41 the passion itself is depicted and there is no further need for the title. In Mk. 8:38 the coming of the Son of Man is clearly the return of Jesus to the earth (cf. the coming of the kingdom in power in 9:1). The main interest of Mark, however, is in the suffering Son of Man, as the treatment and the order both show. Since the suffering of Jesus is also his perfecting, no alternative of lowliness and glory arises.

(b) The Lucan source includes six sayings in which Son of Man is a present self-designation on the part of Jesus. All are addressed to a mixed audience. Ten sayings about the coming Son of Man are addressed to the disciples (apart from 22:69 to the Sanhedrin). The saying about Jonah in 11:30 is addressed to the crowds.

b. Luke. Luke does not use the Son of Man title independently but is faithful to Mark and his special source.

c. Matthew. In Matthew we find Son of Man sayings from Mark, from the logia, and from a special source, whether in unaltered form or with variations. The Son of Man, equated with Jesus, preaches on earth, suffers vicariously, is exalted as Lord of the church, will come again as final Judge, and rules over the new aeon in the kingdom of God.

II. The Later Apocalyptic Tradition.

1. Acts 7:56. Stephen here cries out that he sees the Son of Man standing at God's right hand. The references to heaven, to God's glory, and to Jesus in v. 55 introduce the saying. The standing is unusual. Is it in order to welcome Stephen, to bear witness to him, to minister to God, or to come forth in judgment or salvation as God does (cf. Ass. Mos. 10:3; Is. 14:22; Ps. 3:7)? Another possibility is simply that "standing (upright)" denotes "living."

2. Rev. 1:13; 14:14. These two visions introduce Christ with descriptions based on Dan. 7:13. The coming one is the Lord who is already present, and in keeping with the integration of messianic statements Son of Man sayings are transferred to the Son of God.

3. Heb. 2:6. Hebrews refers various OT sayings to Christ (Pss. 2:7; 104:4, etc.). Stress falls on the ruling power of Christ in an apocalyptic use of Ps. 8. Here the majesty of man, which is limited by God's power, becomes the majesty of the Son of Man who is paradoxically lowly.

III. John.

1. The Son of Man sayings in John reproduce and reinterpret the apocalyptic sense. In 5:17ff. v. 27 takes up Dan. 7:13. In context the judgment is the reaching of a judicial decision through the present preaching of Jesus. In 9:35 the confession of Jesus as Son of Man implies added dignity as compared to his recognition as a prophet (v. 17) authorized by God (v. 33); the title is a messianic one. In 6:27 the Son of Man/Revealer gives the bread of life, and again, as we see from v. 53 with its solemn introduction, he does so as the suffering Son of Man by giving himself. Significant here is the implication that Jesus is not just a heavenly being but a real man with a real body whom God has commissioned (v. 27).

2. The other Son of Man sayings all refer to the descent and the exaltation of Jesus. In 3:13ff. the lifting up refers to the cross, so that we have a counterpart to the passion sayings (cf. 12:32-33). The combining of Son of Man and exaltation is a declaration of faith for which apocalyptic prepares the ground and which the ascension confirms by relating exaltation to ascent into the transcendent world. 8:28 and 12:34 testify to the same connection between the Son of Man and lifting up. The secondary sense of crucified is present in 8:28. Jesus is already Son of Man, but his judicial function comes into effect only with his exaltation. In 12:34 the opponents fail to grasp the point that the Son of Man must be lifted up as Jesus says. The ascension into heaven causes similar problems for the disciples in 6:62. The ascent presupposes preexistence and the identification of the earthly Jesus as the Son of Man of apocalyptic tradition. Glorification is the theme in 12:23 and 13:31-32. In 12:31 glorifying by enthronement accompanies a form of passion prediction. In 13:31-32 exaltation again comes by death and passion, and the meaning of Son of Man is assimilated to the more general concept of Son. The first Son of Man saying in 1:51 catches up many of the previous nuances. The anticipation of future revelation is here a transposition into proleptic epiphany (cf. Mk. 1:10-11). The basis lies in Jacob's vision (Gen. 28:12), and the verse testifies to the fellowship of both the heavenly and earthly Son of Man with the Father, to the ministry of angels to the Son of Man in heaven and on earth, to the judicial mandate of the Son of Man in the eschaton, and to his present and future epiphany.

3. Possibly in John the Son of Man bears some analogy to the Logos of the prologue. If so, then it is necessary to say that the Word became flesh, paradoxical though it may sound, for to say that the Word became man would be tautological, and simply to say that the Word came down would be too vague. The incarnation of the Logos and the earthly walk of the Son of Man express a new fact by which our redemption or rejection is decided.

IV. Reformulation.

1. Christ as the Second Adam.

a. 1 Cor. 15:21, 27-28, 45ff. In 1 Cor. 15 and Rom. 5 Christ might be an eschatological primal man, but more likely we have a christological interpretation of Adam. 1 Cor. 15:27 offers a christological reading of Ps. 8. The man by whom resurrection comes stands in contrast with the man by whom death comes (v. 21). Christ is the pneumatic-heavenly man, Adam the psychical-earthly man. The equation of Christ with the pneumatic-heavenly man is due to his life-giving function, his exaltation, and his heavenly nature as an apocalyptic figure. Although ontically second, Adam is chronologically first; Christ as Son of Man is the Coming One.

b. Rom. 5:12ff. In Rom. 5:12ff. Christ in contrast to Adam is the "one man Jesus Christ" in v. 15 and "one man" in vv. 17ff. The Christology in this passage does not rest on Son of Man messianology, but the term “man” can have prototypical significance. Christ as the prototype of a new humanity becomes the antitype of Adam. He is thus more of an eschatological and prototypical Son of Man than an apocalyptic Son of Man. Only incidentally does the term “man” suggest the latter.

2. Christ as Eikṓn and Sṓma. Christ is the eikṓn of God in 2 Cor. 4:4; Col. 1:15, and as such he is preexistent in the same way as the Logos. He is also the mediator of creation. As cosmic Anthropos, he fills the universe, is set above it as head, and in his eschatological function redeems it.

D. The Early Church.

I. Jewish Christianity. According to Hegesippus in Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 2.23.3ff., James, the Lord’s brother, describes Christ in terms of an eschatological and soteriological Son of Man. In the Pseudo-Clementines the true Prophet of Judaism comes to rest on or in Jesus as Son of Man. This title describes only his majesty as the earthly Jesus, Christ being the title for his eschatological function.

II. Christian Gnosticism.

1. Sources. In Gnostic and semi-Gnostic texts Son of Man sometimes occurs for the macrocosmic primal man who acts in creation and redemption in a varied fusion of Christology with anthrṓpos-aeon speculation.

2. General. Since the term “Son of Man” is taken genealogically, the redemptive function of the Son of Man results in ascribing a soteriological role to his progenitor, the upper Anthropos.

III. Debates about Christ’s Human Nature. In christological discussion the title “son of Man” comes to denote Christ’s humanity as distinct from his deity (cf. Ignatius Ephesians 20.2; Justin Dialogue 100.3). Irenaeus argues that the Son of God becomes the Son of Man for our salvation (Against Heresies 3. 10.2 etc.). In Tertullian Against Marcion 4.10 the “man” of whom Jesus is the son is the virgin. Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 1.2.26 relates Dan. 7:13 to the Logos who was with God and who is Son of Man in virtue of the incarnation. Chrysostom Homily on John 27.1 (on 3:13) states that Jesus calls his whole self the Son of Man in terms of its lowlier essence. Augustine Sermon 121.5 (on Jn. 1:10ff.) offers the common formulation that the Son of God became the Son of Man so that we sons of men might become the sons of God. [C. COLPE, VIII, 400-477]

huiós Dauíd [son of David]

A. David and the Son of David in Judaism.

1. King David. In Judaism David receives God’s grace and promise as one of the righteous of Israel. He is renowned as a musician and warrior and also as one who always gives glory to God. A model ruler and an example of virtuous conduct, he finds forgiveness for his sins, although as a man of blood he is not allowed to build the temple. The rabbis extol him for his study of the law and his leading of Israel. They excuse his taking the showbread on the ground of mortal peril. They suggest that he either did not really sin with Bathsheba or did so only by divine foreordination. They ascribe all the psalms to him, endow him with great intercessory power, and refer to the manifestation of monotheism in his day by which many proselytes are added to Israel.

2. The Messiah of David’s Lineage. Judaism links the promise of 2 Sam. 7:12ff. to the hope of an anointed ruler who will free the people and bring it renown. The title Son of David (Ps. Sol. 17:21) comes into common use. The expected ruler, not identified with the Hasmoneans, will throw off alien dominion, purge the city, subdue the Gentiles, and establish righteousness. Sometimes he is simply called David. Messianic expectation varies, for some circles await a preexistent Deliverer or even God himself and others expect a messianic high priest. The dominant view, however, is that a Messiah of the lineage of David will, by God’s commission, execute deliverance for the people after the pattern of the historical David.

B. The NT.

I. King David.

1. David as God's Servant. David, son of Jesse and father of Solomon, is one of the righteous of Israel and a servant of God (Lk. 1:69; Acts 4:25). Belonging to Bethlehem, he is a witness of faith (Heb. 11:32) who sings God's praise and as God's voice predicts future salvation (Heb. 4:7; Mk. 12:36-37).

2. David as a Prophet of Christ. In the Psalms David makes it plain that the promises refer to the Christ (cf. Mk. 12:36; Acts 2:27ff.). The promises made to him find their fulfilment in Jesus (Acts 13:34ff.).

3. David as a Type of Christ. As God's servant and Israel's king David is a type as well as a prophet of the Messiah. The coming kingdom is that of "our father David" (Mk. 11:10). God honors the promise made to David by giving Israel a Savior who is of David's seed (Acts 13:23).

II. Christ of David's Lineage.

1. The Davidic Sonship. That Christ is indeed of David's seed forms part of the Christian confession in Rom. 1:3-4 and 2 Tim. 2:8. Implied is not only his Davidic descent but also the messianic nature of his mission in fulfilment of OT promise. His dignity as risen Lord, of course, far transcends the glory of his Davidic lineage.

2. Christ as David's Son and Lord. The problem of Mk. 12:35ff.—how Christ can be David's Son and also David's Lord—implies no repudiation of Davidic descent. Christ is David's son as the earthly Jesus and David's Lord as the risen Christ (cf. Rom. 1:3-4). The "Son of David" refers to the earthly ministry, "Lord" (cf. Ps. 110:1) to the exaltation.

3. Son of David in the Gospels.

a. In Mk. 10:47-48 the blind man, by addressing Jesus as Son of David, expresses hope for messianic deliverance.

b. Lk. 1:32 states that God will give Jesus the throne of his father David, 1:69 says that God has raised up a horn of salvation in the house of his servant David, 1:27 mentions the Davidic lineage of Joseph, 2:1ff. places the birth of Jesus in the city of David, and 3:31 lists David in the genealogy of Jesus.

c. Mt. 1:1 calls Jesus the son of David, 1:17 gives David a prominent role in the genealogy, 9:27 and 15:22 use the title Son of David in stories of healing, 12:23 has the crowd asking whether Jesus can be the Son of David, 21:9, 15 contain the greeting "Hosanna to the Son of David," and 22:41ff. shows that he who is the Son of David in his earthly work is also the Lord, the Son of God, to whom all power is given (28:18).

d. In Jn. 7:41-42 doubters question the messiahship of Jesus on the ground that he is from Galilee, whereas the Christ descends from David and comes from Bethlehem.

4. The Davidic Sonship in Revelation. In Rev. 5:5; 22:16 Christ is the "root of David," and in 3:7 he holds the "key of David." As the awaited messianic ruler, he has the key to the messianic banquet. God's promise of salvation finds fulfilment in the crucified, risen, and ascended Christ.

C. The Postapostolic Age.

1. David. Most of the references to David in early Christian writings call him the singer of Israel and the prophet of Christ; there is little interest in the events of his life except occasionally by way of example (cf. Justin Dialogue 141.4).

2. Son of David. The early church uses "Son of David" as a christological title but with reference to Christ's Davidic descent (cf. Ignatius Ephesians 20.2), which is by way of his mother (18.2; Justin Dialogue 45.4). Jesus belongs to the house of David both on his mother's side and also on that of his foster father Joseph. [E. LOHSE, VIII, 478-88]

hýmnos [song of praise, hymn], hymnéō [to sing praise], psállō [to play, sing praise], psalmós [playing, song of praise, psalm]

A. The Greek Sphere.

I. Usage.

1. Homer and Pindar use hýmnos in the sense of “song.” The reference in later use may be to either text or melody. Mostly religious songs come to be denoted.

2. hymnéō means first “to sing a song” of praise, then “to praise the gods in choral song,” then more generally “to praise,” with “to affirm” and “to recite” as other possible senses.

3. psállō first seems to mean “to touch,” then it takes on the sense “to pluck” (a string), and finally it means “to play” (an instrument).

4. psalmós means “plucking,” then “playing” (a stringed instrument).

II. Greek Hymns. Tragedies contain hymns to the gods sung by the choruses, and inscriptions record cultic songs. Various references occur to choirs, and some hymns are shared by soloists and choirs. Hymns often follow a similar structure: invocation, praise of the birth and acts of the deity, and prayer for his or her coming. Hymns to alien deities sometimes contain self-revelation in I-sayings. The term hýmnos may also denote more general praise of a deity in rhythmic prose.

B. The OT and Judaism.

I. Word Groups.

1. *hýmnos o*ccurs several times in the LXX for different Hebrew words (cf. Pss. 40:3; 119:171; 53 and 54 [titles]; 72:20; Is. 42:10); it means “song of praise.”

2. Most LXX instances of hymnéō are in Dan. 3 (36 times).

3. psállō occurs some 50 times for “to play a stringed instrument” (mostly in Psalms, 1 Samuel, and 2 Kings). The idea of a song of praise is often suggested (Pss. 9:11; 30:4; with “to the name,” 7:17; 9:2; with “to thee,” Ps. 57:9).

4. psalmós occurs over 50 times in psalm titles and also for “taunting song” in Lam. 3:14, “playing on a stringed instrument” in Lam. 5:14, “stringed instrument” in Ps. 81:2, and “song accompanied by a stringed instrument” in Ps. 95:2; cf. also the instrument in Ps. 71:22 (“lyre”).

II. The Songs of the OT and Judaism.

1. Ps. 136, an example of an OT psalm, begins with a call for praise, recounts God’s acts in creation and the exodus, and then closes with a fresh summons to praise. The refrain in each verse is probably sung by a second choir or by the congregation. It recurs in Ps. 118:1ff. In Ps. 148 creation is central; all God’s works are summoned to praise him. The structure of Dan. 3:59ff. is similar. The song in 1 Chr. 16:8ff. extols God’s acts for his people.

2. The singing of psalms is connected with sacrifices as well as prayer (cf. 2 Macc. 1:30; 1 Macc. 4:54). Psalms are set for each day. e.g., Ps. 24 for Sunday.

3. Josephus calls the psalms hýmnoi, Ex. 15 is for him an ōdḗ, Dt. 32 a poíēsis. The Levites sing hýmnoi to God, and ōdḗ or hýmnos is used for David’s compositions.

4. 4 Macc. 18:15 states that the father in the diaspora teaches the psalms to his sons, and in Test. Job 14 there is reference to accompaniments on the kithára.

5. Philo often uses hýmnos for the OT Psalms, and he says expressly that they are sung. Temple worship includes hymns, prayers, and offerings. The best thing one can “conceive” is a hymn to the Father of all. Two choirs may sing antiphonally or together, and Philo also mentions a leader. When individuals sing either new or older songs, the rest join in the refrains.

6. Judaism composes many songs in the second and first centuries B.C., as we now see from Qumran. The coins of the Bar Cochba revolt depict stringed instruments. Depictions of Tabernacles refer to stringed instruments and to the singing of the Levites and of persons of outstanding piety.

C. The NT.

I. The Word Group.

1. hýmnos occurs only in Col. 3:16 and Eph. 5:19. Christ's word lives in the church's songs to God, which extol from the heart his saving work (Col. 3:16). In Eph. 5:19 praise is addressed to the Lord with God's saving work again as the theme. Emphasis is given in v. 19 by the verbs "singing and making melody" (cf. Ps. 27:6). psállontes does not now denote literally playing on a stringed instrument, and the psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs hardly refer to different kinds of texts. In 1 Cor. 14:26 psalmós is a Christian song which the individual sings at worship.

2. In Heb. 2:12 hymnéō is used for Christ's praise of God, but in Acts 16:25 it perhaps refers to a song, and singing recitation of the second part of the Hallel (Ps. 114ff.) is the meaning in Mk. 14:26; Mt. 26:30.

3. Rom. 15:9 interprets the psállō of Ps. 18:49 by doxázō in biblical support of Gentile praise of God's mercy. Jms. 5:13 uses psállō for grateful praise of Christ.

4. Acts 13:13 uses psalmós for the OT Psalms, and cf. Lk. 24:44; 20:42; Acts 1:20. The Psalms are authoritative in Acts 13:33 (cf. Lk. 20:42). For other uses of psalmós see 1 Cor. 14:26; Col. 3:16; Eph. 5:19.

II. The Songs of Primitive Christianity. Attempts have been made to distinguish Christian hymns in the NT but these are hypothetical in the absence of clearly discernible laws. The Magnificat and Benedictus are in Jewish style. Eph. 5:14 and 1 Tim. 3:16 are in fixed form but are not necessarily fragments of songs. Phil. 2:6ff. seems to be a pre-Pauline song, and Col. 1:15ff. may be a hymn that the author has taken over and augmented. Elements of songs are perhaps worked over in 1 Pet. 2:21ff., and the songlike portions of Revelation (11:17-18; 15:3-4) show what form Christian hymns might take. Yet the mere presence of lofty speech or integrated structure does not have to denote a hymn.

D. The Early Church.

1. The Word Group in the Apologists. Justin Apology 13.2 uses hýmnos, and hymnéō occurs in OT quotations (cf. Dialogue 106.1). Only Justin Dialogue uses psállō and psalmós, the latter almost always for OT Psalms. In the apostolic fathers only the quotation in Barn. 6:16 contains psállō, and the hymnéō group does not occur.

2. Early Songs. Ignatius Romans 2.2 presupposes a common song of the church, and Ignatius supposedly introduces antiphonal singing to Antioch. Acts of John 94-95 preserves a Gnostic hymn, and cf. Acts of Thomas 6-7. Clement of Alexandria Paedagogus 3.101.3 contains the first Christian hymn in Greek versification. The first Christian song with notes is in Papyrus Oxyrhynchus XV. 1786 (3rd cent. A.D.). There is opposition to nonbiblical hymns, but they develop in the East in the form of biblical odes, which are included in Greek MSS of the Bible from the fifth century A.D.

hypágō [to go away]

[19]Kittel, G., Friedrich, G., & Bromiley, G. W. (1995, c1985). Theological dictionary of the New Testament. Translation of: Theologisches Worterbuch zum Neuen Testament. (1195). Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans.

1. This word means “to lead under,” “to lead from under,” “to lead,” “to lead astray,” in the middle “to subdue,” “to put oneself at the disposal,” and in the perfect passive “to devote oneself.” Intransitively it means “to withdraw,” “to go away,” “to journey to,” “to go to,” and it is common in the imperative for “go away,” “be off.”

2. The term is rare in the LXX. The transitive occurs only in Ex. 14:21, and in the passive in 4 Macc. 4:13; the intransitive may be found only in Jer. 36:19 and Tobit.

3. a. The NT uses only the intransitive, and hypágō does not occur in Paul, Hebrews, or Acts, or in the Catholic Epistles except in Jms. 2:16 and 1 Jn. 2:11. In the Synoptics it never occurs in all three at the same place, Matthew and Luke alone never have it in common, and Mark and Luke only in Mk. 11:2 and parallel.

b. The Synoptics mostly use it in imperatives, e.g., 17 times in Matthew and 12 in Mark. Other imperatives follow seven times in Matthew and four in Mark. The prior imperative gives point and weight to the command. When hýpage precedes the answer to a request, it shows that the cure depends on Jesus’ word and calls for trust in this word. In the last temptation Jesus signals his victory by ordering Satan to depart (Mt. 4:9ff.). In Mk. 8:33, however, the command puts Peter in his proper place. In Mk. 14:21 the hypágō denotes the going up of the Son of Man to his death.

c. The word is common in John, but with a second imperative only in 4:16; 9:7. Mostly the reference is to the going or going away of Jesus (cf. 7:33; 8:14, 21-22, etc.). Misunderstanding arises in 7:33-34. Even the disciples do not see at first that the going is to God (13:33; 14:4-5). The puzzle is solved in 16:27ff. Like many words in John, hypágō has a multiple sense; death as well as ascension is in view. hypágō corresponds to the coming of Jesus; if we know whence Jesus comes, we also know whither he goes. The going shows that he has fulfilled his divine commission. His future coming also corresponds to his going (14:28).

4. The verb plays no special role in early Christian writings. Did. 1.4 carries an allusion to Mt. 5:41. Hermas uses it with another imperative in Visions 3.1.7. Justin Dialogue 76.5 is based on Mt. 25:41. In Clement of Alexandria the aim of the law is to “lead” us to righteousness (Stromateis 3.46.1), and we may be “led” to faith (4.73.5), “brought” to tears (Paedagogus 2.56.3), or “seduced” to wickedness (Stromateis 2.83.3). hypér [over, for, in the place of]

A. With Genitive.

1. Over, Beyond. The local sense of “over” or “beyond” is common in classical Greek, but it yields to the widespread transferred use in the Hellenistic age.

LXX Septuagint

NT New Testament

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

cf. confer, compare

2. a. With the sense of protection the closest meaning to the spatial sense is “for,” “on behalf or in defense of.” Cf. in the NT Mk. 9:40; Phil. 1:7; 1 Cor. 4:6.

b. After terms of dedication the meaning is “for.” Thus the high priest is appointed and offers for the people in Heb. 5:1; 9:7. Aquila and Priscilla are ready to hazard their lives for Paul in Rom. 16:4 (cf. 9:3; 2 Cor. 12:15; Eph. 3:1). Christ’s death is for others in Rom. 5:8; 1 Th. 5:10; 2 Cor. 5:15; 1 Pet. 3:18, etc. Paul develops the saving significance of Christ’s death with the help of typology in Gal. 3:13 and 2 Cor. 5:21. Jesus in his death vicariously takes the curse for us, and thus secures our liberation from the law. In this context hypér has the sense of “in our favor” but also “in our place or stead.” God has made the sinless one the sin-bearer, and hence his reconciling death brings it about that believers share the righteousness of God. Typical combinations are with the verb (para)dídomi, as in Rom. 8:32. One might also quote the combinations in Heb. 2:9; 6:20; 1 Pet. 2:21; Jn. 11:50ff.; 18:14. The words of institution at the Last Supper perhaps underlie these formulations (cf. 1 Cor. 11:24; Lk. 22:19; Mk. 14:24). With the symbolism of the action, the hypér saying interprets Christ’s death as the saving act which is to benefit God’s people and through them all humanity. Behind this interpretation one may discern Is. 53:11-12 and the sacrificial concepts of the OT. The negative fact of death becomes a positive event with fruitful results for others. Hence the eucharistic sayings take catechetical, typological, and theological form (cf. Eph. 5:2; 1 Cor. 5:7; Jn. 11:50). Christians, too, accept suffering and death on behalf of others (2 Cor. 12:15) in a parallel between Christology and discipleship (1 Jn. 3:16). The death of Christ is also “for (the expiation of) sins” (1 Cor. 15:3; Gal. 1:4; cf. Is. 53:5). There is alternation with perí in this regard (cf. Heb. 5:1). Heb. 9:7 combines the ideas of offering for a person (the high priest for himself) and for the errors of the people.

3. In Place Of. Often “on behalf of” carries an implication of “in place of,” “in the name of.” It is hard to avoid this sense in 1 Cor. 15:29, and this is the obvious meaning in Phlm. 13. In 2 Cor. 5:14-15 Paul plays on the double sense of hypér. Christ’s death is first “in our place,” but it is then “on our behalf” or “for our sake” at the end of v. 15. The representative sense occurs in 2 Cor. 5:20. Christ himself issues the call through his authorized apostle.

4. With Reference To. The weaker sense “with reference to,” “as concerns,” “for the sake of,” occurs in various expressions (cf. Eph. 6:19-20; Rom. 1:5; 15:8). With a genitive of person and verbs of asking or praying, the meaning is simply “for,” e.g., Mt. 5:44; Rom. 8:27. “About” or “with reference to” occurs with persons in, e.g., Jn. 1:30, and also with abstract concepts (cf. 2 Th. 2:1) (“concerning the coming of Christ”).

5. On Account Of. When Christians suffer hardship because of their faith, hypér is used as in Phil. 1:29; 2 Th. 1:5; Acts 9:16. A similar use is in expressions of praise and thanksgiving (cf. 1 Cor. 10:30; Eph. 5:20; Rom. 15:9), and also to specify the reason for prayer, as in 2 Cor. 12:8.

B. With Accusative.

1. In the NT the spatial sense occurs in the transferred sense of “more than,” “above measure,” or “over” (cf. Eph. 1:22; 1 Cor. 10:13; 4:6; 2 Cor. 12:6).

2. After comparatives hypér simply means “than” (cf. Heb. 4:12; Lk. 16:8; 2 Cor. 12:13; Lk. 6:40; Phil. 2:9; Phlm. 16; Eph. 3:20; Mt. 10:37; Gal. 1:14).

OT Old Testament

v. verse

C. As Adverb. The NT rarely makes adverbial use of prepositions, but there is one instance with hypér in 2 Cor. 11:23: "I am (a servant of Christ) in greater measure," i.e., a "better one" (hypér egṓ). [H. RIESENFELD, VIII, 507-16]

hyperauxánō [to grow abundantly], auxánō [to grow]

1. The rare word hyperauxánō means "to grow to the limit," or in the middle passive, "to attain great power," "to achieve the highest position." auxánō means "to bring to growth," "to promote," "to raise one's position," or intransitive "to grow," "to rise in repute or power," "to increase."

2. The LXX does not use the compound but has the simple form for "to become fruitful," "to make fruitful," "to make great," "to grow."

3. The NT uses the compound only in 2 Th. 1:3. The idea of growth in creation stands behind the use of the simple form. The language of the parables (cf. Mk. 4:3ff.) underlies its figurative employment in, e.g., Col. 1:6ff.; 2 Cor. 9:10; 1 Cor. 3:6-7, which stresses the fact that God alone can produce decisive growth. Natural human growth plays a part in 1 Pet. 2:2; Col. 2:19 (the church derives its growing life from its Head); Eph. 4:15-16 (the growing is "to" Christ as well as "from" Christ). In Eph. 4:16 the metaphor of physical growth merges into that of the growing building in which God dwells in, with, and by the Spirit.

The figurative background is less evident when Paul speaks about the growth of faith (2 Cor. 10:15); in 2 Th. 1:3 he gives thanks because this growth is so abundant (hyperauxánei). Increase of influence or authority is the point in Jn. 3:30.

4. The compound does not occur in the apostolic fathers, but 1 Clem. 33.6 quotes Gen. 1:28, Hermas Visions 1.1.6 says that God multiplies creatures for the church's sake, and Did. 16.4 speaks about the increase of wickedness (cf. Mt. 23:12). [G. DELLING, VIII, 517-19]

hyperbaínō → parabaínō

hyperbállō [to go beyond, surpass], hyperballóntōs [exceedingly, immeasurably], hyperbolḗ [excess, beyond measure]

1. This verb, having an original sense of "to throw beyond," means "to go beyond," "to stand out," "to excel," or, censoriously, "to transgress the proper measure." The noun means "excess" or "supreme stage or measure."

2. The LXX uses the group only in Greek writings (cf. the verb in Sir. 25:11; 2 Macc. 4:24, and the noun, adverbially, in 4 Macc. 3:18). Philo uses the participle for "going beyond," "surpassing," and the noun for "supreme measure."

3. In the NT the group occurs only in the Pauline corpus. In Eph. 3:19 Christ's love surpasses comprehension, in Eph. 2:7 "immeasurable" tops another word of fullness, and in Eph. 1:19 the word outbids mégethos. Combination with dýnamis occurs in 2 Cor. 4:15, and with cháris in 9:14. The glory of the new order is all-surpassing or beyond comparison in 2 Cor. 3:10; the term also occurs in connection with Paul's suffering in 11:23. The noun is often found in the phrase for "exceedingly" or "beyond measure," e.g., Rom. 7:13. A double use stresses the lack of comparison between present affliction and eternal glory in 2 Cor. 4:17. The mode of life described in 1 Cor. 13:1ff. far surpasses a life controlled by the charisms (1 Cor. 12:31). In Gal. 1:13 Paul uses the expression to describe the intensity of his former persecuting activity. In ministry supreme power belongs to God alone (2 Cor. 4:7). In 2 Cor. 12:7 Paul is restrained lest he be too elated by the abundance of revelations granted to him.

4. The apostolic fathers use only the participle of the verb (cf. 1 Clem. 19.2; Diog. 9.2; Ignatius Ephesians 19.2 [“superabounding”]). The noun denotes the high measure of goodness achieved in love of enemies (2 Clem. 13.4). [G. DELLING, VIII, 520-22]

hyperéchō [to surpass, exceed], hyperochḗ [power, prominence]

1. This verb means “to hold over,” “to tower,” “to surpass,” “to amount to more,” “to stand out.” The noun denotes “position” or “power.”

2. The LXX uses the verb only for “to surpass” (cf. Ex. 26:13) or intransitively for “to take precedence” (Gen. 25:23; 39:9).

3. In the NT the verb has only a transferred sense. God’s salvation “exceeds” what we can grasp or think (Phil. 4:7). Paul’s knowledge of Christ as Lord is supreme (2:8). He does not preach in lofty words of wisdom (1 Cor. 2:1). In humility believers reckon that others excel themselves (Phil. 2:3). In 1 Pet. 2:13 the king is the supreme ruler. The authorities are those who are supreme in Rom. 13:1. The church prays for those in a position of rule in 1 Tim. 2:2.

4. In the apostolic fathers Hermas Similitudes 9.6.1 uses the verb literally, and Similitudes 9.28.3-4 in a transferred sense. “Taking precedence” is the point in Barn. 13.2. The noun occurs only adverbially in the phrase kath’ hyperokēn (cf. 1 Clem. 57.2). In the Apologists we find “to excel” in Athenagoras Supplication 23.1 and “surplus” in 6.1. [G. DELLING, VIII, 523-24]

hyperḗphanos [arrogant, proud], hyperēphanía [arrogance, pride]

A. Secular Usage. hyperḗphanos means “outstanding,” “distinguished,” but both the adjective and the associated noun may also be used censoriously to denote arrogance or boasting.

B. The Greek OT. In the Greek OT the words occur mostly in Psalms and the Wisdom literature. God is against pride in Prov. 3:34. The righteous prays that God will destroy the proud in Ps. 94:2. Maccabees characterizes Gentiles and foreign rulers as “insolent” (1 Macc. 1:21; 2 Macc. 9:4, etc.). The enemies of the righteous are arrogant (Ps. 17:10 etc.). Prov. 13:10 warns against the evil result of an arrogant attitude.

C. Hellenistic Judaism. Hellenistic Judaism adopts the OT development of the concept. Arrogance derives from a spirit of error or from Satan. It is a mark of the great peoples of history. God himself punishes it. Josephus refers to the arrogance of Nero in Jewish War 3.1. Self-control guards against pride (Epistle of Aristeas 211), and a recognition of human equality protects kings against it (263).

D. The NT. The NT, which makes a sparing use of the terms, follows OT usage. Paul puts hyperḗphanos in the list of pagan vices in Rom. 1:30. The three terms “insolent,” “arrogant,” and “boastful” go together. “Boastful” precedes “arrogant” in 2 Tim. 3:2; the two terms describe different aspects of pride. In Mk. 7:22 “arrogance” comes between “blasphemy” and “folly.” It contrasts with proper submission to God and involves a haughty disdain for others. In Lk. 1:51 God scatters the proud in their imaginings, topples the mighty, and exalts the lowly. 1 Pet. 5:5 enjoins humility to others. The arrogant, thinking they need no forgiveness, run up against God’s opposition, but grace is given to the humble.

E. Early Church Usage. Christ is an example of humility in 1 Clem. 16.2 and insolence is rejected in 30.1. Christians must resist arrogance, for it is contrary to love (49.5). It is one of the sins on the way to death (Did. 2.6; cf. Barn. 20.1). Similar warnings against it appear in Hermas Mandates 6.2.5 and Ignatius Ephesians 5.3. Tatian Address to the Greeks 3.1 calls Heraclitus “arrogant.” [G. BERTRAM, VIII, 525-29]

hypērétēs [assistant, servant], hypēretéō [to assist, serve]

A. Nonbiblical Usage.

l. Classical Greek and Hellenism. The term hypērétēs first occurs with reference to Hermes, the messenger of the gods. It denotes one who does the will of Zeus and has his authority behind him. Further instances reinforce the sense of one who serves a higher will. This higher will need not be that of the gods; we thus find the term in the military, medical, commercial, or legal sphere, e.g., for medical assistants, or for those who carry out judicial sentences. In religions cultic assistants are described by the term, and in personal relations hypērétēs denotes one who unselfishly helps to secure something for a friend. Service that accepts subordination is always at issue, but a measure of power may also be involved in the discharge of the imposed mission or function. The hypērétēs differs from a doúlos, however, for the hypērétēs is free and may claim a due reward for the service rendered. As distinct from diákonos or therápōn, hypērétēs carries the emphasis of learning what is to be done from the superior, and doing it with no prejudice to personal dignity or worth.

2. The Linguistic Problem. Traditionally the group has been related to erétēs ("rower") and explained as "underrower." But historically there are not two levels of rowers, and while rowers have a superior it is not rowing that makes a person hypērétēs, but acting under direction. It is possible, then, that hypērétēs is of different linguistic origin, or, if not, that the original root suggests steering rather than rowing. Thus in a boat with a crew of two the hypērétēs would take orders from the helmsman. Hence the term would contain the idea of the one who must follow orders, but as a free person, not as a slave.

B. Hellenistic Judaism.

1. The LXX, Apocrypha, and Pseudepigrapha.

a. The group plays little role in the Greek Bible. In Prov. 14:35 we have a reference to the hypērétēs who is to carry out orders in the proper way, in Dan. 3:46 Θ "servants of the king" execute royal commands, and in Job 1:3 hypēresía is used for Job's servants. A fuller use occurs only in the Greek Wisdom of Solomon.

b. The pseudepigrapha offer many examples of the group, and these are in accord with nonbiblical usage, whether in the military, legal, cultic, or even the demonic sphere (the assistants of Beliar in Testaments of the Twelve).

2. Philo. Philo gives the terms a personal reference, with God, rulers, ordinary people, or even bodily organs as controlling subjects. The stress is again on compliance with lawful instructions. When Joseph styles himself hypērétēs and diákonos for his family, hypērétēs refers to his function as God's assistant, and diákonos to the service he renders the family (On Joseph 241).

3. Josephus. In Josephus the usage is governed by the idea of helping someone. Moses, Levites, etc. are God's assistants, and we also read of royal officials, of agents, and of members of a bodyguard. Jacob helps his mother when she prepares the meal that will win him the birthright. A doúlos can act as hypērétēs, but intrinsically the hypērétēs can accept or refuse the commission. The functional character of the activity distinguishes the hypērétēs from the diákonos or therápōn.

4. Palestinian Judaism. Since the OT offers no models, it is hard to find exact equivalents in Palestinian Judaism. Temple assistants (probably Levites) play something of the role of the hypērétēs, but the Hebrew stem may suggest a directive rather than supporting role. The root sms is perhaps closer with its implication of assistance in specific situations and its interest in the correct functioning of certain relations and obligations.

C. The NT.

1. Usage.

a. The group is comparatively rare in the NT, and hypēresía does not occur at all. Luke-Acts and John have the most examples with nine each.

b. hypērétēs, as in classical and Hellenistic Greek, has the general sense of “assistant carrying out the will of another.”

c. Thus in Mt. 6:25-26 the hypērétēs is the servant of the court who executes its sentence, and who in so doing carries a warning of eschatological judgment unless there is timely conversion. Lk. 12:58 uses práktōr instead because the offender is a debtor who cannot pay. In Lk. 4:16ff. a liturgical assistant receives back from Jesus the scroll of Isaiah from which he has just read. Various authorities have assistants or officers in Mt. 26:58. Jn. 7:32; 18:12; Acts 5:22. The officers of the Sanhedrin seem to differ from Levites serving as temple police (Jn. 7:30; 8:20; Acts 4:3) even though a similar function may come within their more general duties. In Acts 13:36; 20:34; 24:23 the verb carries the sense of helping others to carry out their wishes and meet their needs. Passages like Phil. 2:25; 4:18 (Epaphroditus as leitourgōs tḗs chreías mou) show what is meant.

2. Difficult Passages.

a. Acts 13:5. John Mark as the hypērétēs of Barnabas and Paul meets their needs and carries out their wishes in the discharge of their apostolic mission.

b. Jn. 18:36. The meaning here may be that Jesus is not the kind of king who has hypḗrétḗs that will fight, or that he has hypērétai but in a kingdom that permits no fighting. The disciples can be hypērétai as well as friends; as friends they are close to their king, but as hypērétai they work with him to achieve his goals. The term for “fight,” of course, need not involve bloody conflict; the verse may refer to the passivity of the disciples by divine counsel, although in the context of vv. 33ff. the statement seems strongly to suggest that Jesus aims at no political crown.

c. 1 Cor. 4:1. Paul and Apollos are executive organs of Christ. Their work finds its basis in God’s plan as this is manifested in Christ. That they are servants (and stewards) protects them against criticism and even self-criticism. Epictetus calls the Cynic both hyperétēs and oikonómos, but Paul in his association of the terms probably follows Lk. 12:42.

d. Acts 26:16. As Christ’s servant, Paul is also his witness; the second term defines the first more closely. The stress is on the task that the Lord has laid on him. The mention of obedience in v. 19 brings out the controlling role of hypērétēs in v. 16.

e. Lk. 1:2. The ministers of the word in Lk. 1:2 are those who assist the writer in his task; they are obviously the same as the eyewitnesses. The use of the term shows that they are not propagandists for their own views. It also establishes continuity between the preaching of Jesus and the written history.

vv. verses

D. The Early Church. The apostolic fathers add nothing new in their use of either noun or verb. The hypērétēs is the serving official (Diog. 7.2), and the verb may denote the ministry of a deacon (Ignatius Philadelphians 11.1). In Justin Apology 1.14.1 the noun (used with doúlos) has the sense of the free servant receiving and carrying out orders. [K. H. RENGSTORF, VIII, 530-44]

hýpnos [sleep], aphypnóō [to fall asleep], enýpnion [dream], enypniázomai [to dream], éxypnos [awake], exypnízō [to wake up]

A. The Greeks.

1. Origin, Meaning, and Use of the Stem hypn-. Deriving from a basic supnos, this word means "sleep," and the phrase en hýpnō ("during sleep") produces enýpnion as a term for "dream." agrypneō means "to sleep in the open," then "to watch."

2. Sleep as a Natural Process. Natural sleep is described as sweet, kindly, etc. It rules over all, is taken as a gift, overpowers people, especially when tired with wine, and is enjoyed. Phrases are "at the time of the first sleep" and "shortly after going to sleep." Dreams during sleep are a locus of revelation. A special mixture of wine induces sleep.

3. The Scientific View. At first sleep is explained as a relaxing of energy, as a loss of warmth, or as a withdrawing of blood, and hence as a transitional stage to death. Later observation refutes the last theory. Light or heavy sleep during sickness determines the severity of the sickness. Too much sleep is bad. Aristotle perceives a basic phenomenon of animal life in the alternation of waking and sleep.

4. Disparagement of Sleep. Disparagement of sleep appears early. Sleep is a metaphor for the conduct of fools. In it the noús loses contact with the world and the individual is shut up in the self. Sleep impairs thought and signifies weakness. Sleepers are as good as dead. We should cut down on sleep. It robs us of half of life on the Stoic view, and it belongs to the material world.

5. Sleep and Death. Philosophy stresses the nearness of sleep to death, although only rarely is sleep a euphemism for death prior to the Hellenistic period. Later we often read of the sleep of death. This sleep is sweet. It means end and dissolution, but the belief is also present that it brings redemption from the body, enabling the true self to mount up to heaven.

6. The God Hypnos. There is a god Hypnos as well as a god Thanatos, although often with a link between them, e.g., as twins. This god can put even Zeus to sleep. Sailors invoke him, and he imparts revelations in sleep. He is a rival of Hermes, who brings sleep but is not sleep personified.

B. The LXX and Judaism.

1. The group occurs fairly frequently in the LXX, mainly for the root yšn. The Hebrew differentiates the dream more sharply from sleep than does the Greek. hýpnos is a euphemism for coitus in Wis. 4:6. Revelatory sleep occurs in Gen. 28: 10ff.; 1 Kgs. 3:5. Dreams may carry a divine message (Gen. 20:3; 40:9, etc.), but they may also be equated with false prophecy (Jer. 23:25). The stem is linked to sloth in Prov. 6:4 and to sin in Judg. 16:14. It depicts eschatological destruction in Is. 29:7-8 (and cf. the sleep of death in Jer. 51:39). The fool is in large measure a sleeper (Sir. 22:9).

2. The spirit of sleep in Test. Reub. 3:1, 7 may be the spirit of creation or possibly the spirit of death or error. The idea of the eschatological sleep of death occurs in Eth. En. 49:3. The state between death and the eschaton is sleep, and resurrection is a waking from sleep. Sleep is also a figure for the time of this aeon. Dreams convey revelation during sleep.

3. Philo finds in sleep a natural process, but it also characterizes those who are far from knowledge. One must repel it as an enemy; faith resembles waking out of a deep sleep. Philo never uses sleep for death, but the two are close.

4. Josephus refers to natural sleep. He accepts the dream revelations of the OT. The soul parts from the body in sleep. Sleep is a prototype of death.

C. The NT.

1. The stem hypn- refers to the natural process or state of sleep in Mt. 1:24; Lk. 8:23 (Jesus asleep in the boat); Acts 16:27 (the jailor is jolted awake out of sleep).

2. The NT finds no great place for dreams, so that enýpnion and enypniázomai occur only in Acts 2:17 (quoting Joel 2:28) and Jude 8 (which briefly denounces opponents as dreamers, i.e., not as visionaries, but as blind to the truth).

3. In Lk. 9:32 the disciples on the Mount of Transfiguration are heavy with sleep. This phrase stresses the contrast between Jesus and the disciples, explains their confusion after the experience, and anticipates what happens in Gethsemane. The sleep motif is prominent in Acts 20:9ff. Rom. 13:11-12 uses awaking from sleep as a metaphor for casting off bondage to the old aeon (cf. the parallels in Judaism and Hellenism). As in 1 Th. 5:4ff., the call is not merely to watch but to renounce attachment to the world. The command to watch (with agrypnéō) occurs in Mk. 13:33; Lk. 21:36; Eph. 6:18. In 2 Cor. 6:5; 11:27 Paul's watchings are his unremitting labors.

4. The sleep of death figures in Jn. 11:11ff. The illness of Lazarus will not lead to death (v. 4). Implied in v. 11 is the deeper background of actual death which is only an apparent reality face to face with Jesus. When the disciples fail to understand (v. 12), distinction is made between the sleep of death and "the rest which is sleep" (v. 13). The verses proclaim the basic impotence of death in the light of the resurrection.

D. The Early Church and Gnosticism. The noun does not occur in the apostolic fathers, and the verb only in 1 Clem. 26:2 (quoting Ps. 3:3: the sleep of death). The images of sleep and awaking occur relative to the resurrection. Among compounds we find agrypnía (watchful care) in Barn. 21.7. Apocryphal works refer to Jesus' steering of the boat during sleep, to drunkenness with sleep, and to the sleep of death. In Gnosticism sleep is ignorance and oblivion. It symbolizes bondage to the world. To sleep is to be in the sphere of death. More generally we also find the idea that in view of the resurrection death is merely sleep during the time up to the resurrection.

hypódikos [accountable]

1. Secular Greek. This word means "guilty," "culpable," "accountable," "subject to trial."

2. Judaism.

a. The term does not occur in the LXX; we are accountable to God, not to díkē.

b. Philo uses the word for accountability in various connections.

c. Josephus also has it in the sense of "subject to punishment."

d. It is hard to find any exact rabbinic equivalent but we do find the ideas of financial accountability and penal liability.

3. The NT. In the NT the term occurs only in Rom. 3:19, where it applies to accused persons who cannot refute the charges leveled against them. Since Jews no less than Gentiles are in this position, all fall under God's condemnation apart from the new right that God establishes for them in Christ.

4. The early Christian writers do not use the word. [C. MAURER, VIII, 557-58]

hypokrínomai [to play the hypocrite], synypokrínomai [to join in playing the hypocrite], hypókrisis [hypocrisy], hypokritḗs [hypocrite], anypókritos [without hypocrisy]

A. Classical and Hellenistic Greek.

a. The verb hypokrínomai first means "to explain," also, rarely, "to answer."

b. hypókrisis can mean "answer," but hypokritḗs means "actor," probably as one who interprets a poet, depicting by his whole conduct the role assigned.

2. Recitation and Acting. Declamation is essential in acting; hence elocution is an important part of rhetoric. For Aristotle, it is the doctrine of linguistic expression. The art of speaking is a specialized skill both on the stage and in the marketplace. Demosthenes achieves success when he takes lessons from an actor. hypókrisis embraces the delivery of a speech, including mime and gesture.

3. Transferred Meaning. Human life comes to be compared to the stage, and conduct to the task of the actor (cf. Plato, and especially the Stoics). The noble person can play any part assigned with no loss of inner stability. Negatively, the stage is a sham world and actors are deceivers. Hence hypókrisis takes on the sense of "pretense" or "pretext." But additions are needed to show whether the group has a positive, negative, or neutral sense. Only under Christian influence does the negative sense prevail in the Byzantine period.

B. Dispersion Judaism.

1. The LXX. Already in the LXX the terms take on a negative sense (cf. 2 Macc. 5:25; 6:21; 4 Macc. 6:12ff.). Fear of God and hypocrisy are opposites in Sir. 1:28ff. The righteous who sin are hypocrites (Ps. 12:2). hypókrisis has the character of sin (Job 34:30). The hypokritḗs and the sinner are equated.

2. Philo and Josephus.

a. In Philo, too, the sense is mostly negative. hypókrisis as concealment of the truth or dissembling is a worse evil than death.

b. For Josephus hypokrínomai is more a matter of strategy. As one may see from the story of Joseph, this may be for a good end (Antiquities 2.160). But hypókrisis also means false appearance, and the hypokritḗs is a "hypocrite" (Jewish War 2.586-87).

3. The Historical Problem. Since Judaism uses the group almost exclusively in a bad sense, not so much for hypocrisy as for the deception that characterizes evil as apostasy against God, a question arises how this identification comes about. The answer possibly lies in Testaments of the Twelve, which opposes truth and deception: wickedness is deception, and deceit is satanic and ungodly. Qumran sees a similar antithesis between truth and falsehood. The idea, then, is that the bad person, who ought to be good, is in disguise when acting wickedly. This dissembling is deception, and as such opposition to God's truth.

C. The NT.

1. The Synoptic Tradition. As in the LXX, the group has a bad sense in the Synoptists. Jesus calls his opponents hypokritaí because they cannot discern "this time" (Lk. 12:54ff.), i.e., because they are in self-contradiction in their evaluations. A similar self-contradiction arises regarding what is permissible on the sabbath (13:15-16), or regarding their own faults and those of others (Mt. 7:3ff.), or regarding the outward and inward worship of God (Mk. 7:8). The jarring contradiction between precept and practice gives rise to the charge in Mt. 23:13ff. A pious appearance and a distortion of proportion conceal the failure to do God's will. In contrast, the disciples must achieve a greater righteousness (Mt. 5:20), showing a concern for integrity rather than status (6:2ff.). Sham will result in ruin (6:2ff.; 24:51). It comes to expression in the attempt to entrap Jesus while supposedly raising serious questions (cf. Mk. 12:15).

2. Paul. Paul uses the group in Gal. 2:13. When Peter changes his practice on the arrival of envoys from Jerusalem, he is not just trying to deceive the envoys, nor acting in contradiction with himself; he is falling away from the truth of the gospel, which, with the doctrine of justification by faith, implies equality of Jew and Gentile.

3. The Pastorals. In 1 Tim. 4:2 the term conveys the sense of evildoer or apostate. The sayings of the false teachers are deceitful, for they contradict the truth of God (cf. 6:5; 2 Tim. 3:8). This is hypókrisis.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. Hermas uses hypokritaí for false teachers in Similitudes 8.6.5. Did. 8.1 calls the Jews hypokritaí. hypókrisis is apostasy from God. But it is also dissembling (cf. Pol. 6.3; Hermas Visions 3.6.1). As a summary term for any kind of pretense or deception, hypókrisis occurs in lists of vices (Did. 2.6; Barn. 20.1; Hermas Mandates 8.3).

1. This word occurs first in the LXX in Wis. 5:18; 18:15. Describing God's eschatological salvation, it denotes unfeigned simplicity.

2. In the NT the term becomes a fixed attribute of agápē (cf. Rom. 12:9; 2 Cor. 6:6-7). In the latter passage, the idea in context seems to be that the unfeigned simplicity of God should also mark the neighborly love of believers. Where this is not so, there is not just an assumed love but a wicked failure to correspond to God's own attitude, and hence a conflict with the truth of God. In 1 Pet. 1:22 sincere love is from the heart; it rests on new birth of the word of God. 1 Tim. 1:5 teaches similarly that the goal is a love that issues from a pure heart and sincere faith. Those who hold office must be models, and Timothy himself has had a sincere faith from childhood (2 Tim. 1:5). Such faith is both inwardly sincere and outwardly orthodox. Jms. 3:17 opposes to the demonic wisdom of false teachers the pure wisdom that is marked by no insincerity. In contrast, heresy is also immoral; it is "hypocrisy."

3. In 2 Clem. 12.2-3 the author understands the supposed dominical saying that "two are one" as a structural description of the virtue of truthfulness. [U. WILCKENS, VIII, 559-71]

hypóstasis [being, essence, reality]

A. Greek Usage.

1. Preliminary. Formed as a verbal noun from hyphístēmi, hypóstasis reflects some of the meanings of the intransitive and middle hyphístamai, namely, "support," "concealment," "deposit or sediment," "existence or reality," and, technically, "lease." The use is mostly specialized in the early period. The philosophical use grows out of an earlier scientific use, and the later range of meaning hardly goes beyond the scientific and philosophical senses.

2. Medical and Scientific Use. In medicine hypóstasis rarely means "support," e.g., a hip as a support for the body. More common is the use for "sediment," e.g., for urine. The word can also denote fluid or solid excrement. More generally anything that settles is hypóstasis (cf. curds, or the slimy bottom of stagnant water, or the deposit of moist air, or any kind of residue).

3. Philosophical Use.

a. Stoicism. Stoicism first brings the term into philosophy to denote what has come into being or attained reality. In contrast to ousía, which is eternal being as such, hypóstasis is real being as this is manifested in individual phenomena. Because being is primal matter, its coming into existence may be viewed as a physical process, and thus hypóstasis offers itself as a suitable term for the resultant reality. The distinction from ousía, however, is only a theoretical and not a practical one. ousía exists in its actualization, hypóstasis is ousía in its actuality. hypóstasis is not the real, concrete phenomenon as such but the reality behind it.

b. Peripatus. Dependence on Stoicism is evident in the Peripatetic use. There is reality only in individual things; these have essence and reality in themselves.

c. Middle Platonism. References here are few, but in Albinus hypóstasis denotes the actualization of the ground of being relative to the intelligible world.

d. Neo-Platonism. Neo-Platonic development has no significance for biblical usage but is important later. hypóstasis now bears no relation to matter. As a term for the actuality derived from the one, it is synonymous with ousía. While deriving from ultimate being, it also has ultimate being. This understanding lies behind the use in the later doctrine of the Trinity.

4. General Usage. Denoting the reality behind appearance, hypóstasis can have such general senses as "plan," "purpose," "concern," or "basic conception." The fundamental reality of time, which is the "instant," is also its hypóstasis. In other contexts the term simply means "presence" or "existence."

5. Special Meanings.

a. Astrology. In this sphere hypóstasis means the reality of life present in the constellations at the hour of birth.

b. Papyri. In the papyri hypóstasis finds a special use for "lease" or "aggregate of deeds of ownership," and consequently "possession" on the basis of such deeds.

B. Judaism.

1. The LXX. The noun occurs some 20 times in the LXX for 12 Hebrew terms, and the verb hyphístēmi occurs somewhat more often in the sense "to endure." The meaning of hypóstasis seems to be "movable property" in Dt. 11:6, "immovable property" in Job 22:20, "basis of power" in Ezek. 26:11, "reality" that gives a firm guarantee in Ruth 1:12; Ps. 39:7, "life plan" in Ps. 139:15, "plan" in Jer. 23:22, and "counsel" in Ezek. 19:5; Dt. 1:12. LXX usage thus conforms to Greek. hypóstasis is the underlying reality behind things, often as a plan or purpose, or as that which, enclosed in God, endures.

2. Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha. The term is rare in these works; it occurs in such senses as "basis," "power," "plan," or "purpose."

3. Philo and Josephus.

a. Philo uses both noun and verb in theological and philosophical contexts. The verb denotes real existing, and Philo has the noun in the expression "intelligible reality," which stands in contrast to what may be known by sensory perception or the seeing of figures. Elsewhere hypóstasis means "real existence."

b. The noun is rare in Josephus. He uses it for distinctive reality in Against Apion 1.1, and for the invisible reality that lies behind the endurance of the martyrs in Antiquities 18.24.

C. The NT.

1. Paul. Two of the five NT instances of hypóstasis are in Paul. In 2 Cor. 9:2ff. Paul does not want his boasting about the collection at Corinth to be found empty. But his concern in v. 4 is not so much that his boasting might be exposed as that his "plan" or "project" might be frustrated by Achaia's unreadiness. The same sense is plain in 2 Cor. 11:17, where, in a foolish comparison, he speaks of a "purpose" of boasting that is forced upon him. The rendering “confidence” or “assurance” gives rise to many difficulties and has little outside support.

2. Hebrews. The other three instances of hypóstasis are all in Hebrews. The usage is simplest in 1:3, where the term is parallel to dóxa and relates to God’s essence. “Transcendent reality” is perhaps closest to what is meant. Christ as Son reflects God’s glory and bears the impress of this reality. In 11:1 the rendering “assurance” has gained much support since Melanchthon commended it to Luther, but this introduces an untenable subjective element. The parallel term élenchos is an objective one that denotes “demonstration” rather than “conviction,” i.e., the proof of things one cannot see. Similarly, hypóstasis is the “reality” of the things hoped for, which have a transcendent quality. The terms define the character of transcendent future things, and the verse boldly equates faith with the reality and demonstration of these things. Only the work of Jesus and faith as participation in this work are not subject to the corruptibility of what is shadowy and prototypical. The statement in 3:14 is along similar lines. The reference is not a subjective one to our first confidence but an objective one to the basic reality on which the faith of believers rests since Christ is the very presence of the reality of God which they now share. Clinging to the first reality as it comes with the preaching of salvation in Christ does, of course, mean having confidence to the end in the reality of God, but hypóstasis itself denotes, not the confidence, but the divine reality that contrasts with everything shadowy and prototypical and that is paradoxically present in Jesus and possessed by the community in faith.

D. Further Christian Usage. After the NT hypóstasis occurs again only with Tatian, who uses it for God’s absolute reality as this is manifested in the cosmos, for the reality which lies behind existence and which is visible only to God, for the reality of demons or the elements, or for the realities of nature permeating the elements. In Gnostic texts hypóstasis is the hidden spiritual reality of pneumatics which suffers no damage even in the midst of the material world. In another text hypóstasis is the reality of earthly existence which the redeemed use until they enter eternal life. From the usage in Tatian and the Gnostics no straight line can be drawn to the later theological usage, which must be related to contemporary philosophical development. [H. KÖSTER, VIII, 572-89]

hypostéllō, hypostolḗ* → stéllō; hypotagḗ, hypotássō → tássō; hypotýpōsis → *týpos hypōpiázō [to strike on the face, treat roughly]

1. This verb means “to strike on the face” with resultant disfigurement, then figuratively “to defame,” “to castigate” (with words).

2. The LXX has only the noun hypṓpion for “blow in the face,” “contusion.”

3. In the NT the sense might be literal in Lk. 18:5, but a transferred meaning is much more likely: either “lest she finally expose me in a public scene,” or “lest she wear me out completely by her persistent coming.” In 1 Cor. 9:26-27 Paul is using athletic metaphors for his work. He does not box as one who beats the air but pommels and subdues his body. The expression is figurative. He is not subjecting himself to ascetic exercises but subjecting his body to the demands of ministry (cf. Rom. 8:13), gaining strength from the hardships to which this exposes him and which God overrules for good (2 Cor. 12:7ff.). [K. WEISS, VIII, 590-91]

hýsteros [later, last], hýsteron [later, finally], hysteréō [to come too late, lack], aphysteréō [to withhold], hystérēma [need, want], hystérēsis [need, want]

A. Secular Greek.

1. hýsteros has the basic sense of "what is behind or after" (cf. ex hystérou for "later" and hoi hýsteroi for "descendants"). In a transferred sense the term may also denote what is of lesser worth. It also finds a use in logic and astrology.

2. hýsteron has such senses as "secondly," "after," "later," "too late," and "finally."

3. hysteréō means "to come after or too late," and it then takes on such senses as "to be wanting," "to be behind," and, in the active, "to lack."

4. The nouns hystérēma and hystérēsis, which are very rare, have the meanings "want," "need," "what is missing."

B. The LXX.

1. hýsteros (14 times) and hýsteron (15) always have the sense of "after," "later," but the idea of deficiency is predominant in the case of hysteréō (cf. Eccl. 6:2; 9:8; Cant. 7:3; Ps. 23:1; Sir. 51:24). The thought of coming too late and hence not attaining occurs in Sir. 11:11-12. The meaning of hysteréō in Job 36:17 is "to remain far off," i.e., "to avoid."

2. hystérēma (six times) always means "lack" (cf. Judg. 18:10; Eccl. 1:15), "want," or "need" (Ps. 34:10).

C. The NT.

1. hýsteros, hýsteron.

a. The adjective means "the last-named" in Mt. 21:31, and the reference is to the "last" times in 1 Tim. 4:1, i.e., the future prophetic times when error, debate, and apostasy will plague the church (cf. 2 Tim. 3:1; 2 Pet. 3:3; Jude 18 with 2 Pet. 2:1; 1 Jn. 2:18 with 4:1).

b. The adverb has a comparative sense in Mt. 21:30, 32 ("afterward"). The thrust is eschatological in Heb. 12:11: The present time is that of the exercise of faith, the eschatological future will bring salvation as its fruit. In Jn. 13:36 the probable reference is not to a future martyrdom of Peter, as Peter supposes (v. 37), but to the radical abrogation of earthly discipleship with the death of Jesus, and hence to presence with the exalted Lord (cf. 14:1 ff.). The superlative occurs mostly in Matthew (cf. 4:2; 21:37; 22:27; 26:60), but Mark has it in 16:14.

2. hysteréō.

a. The basic sense "to come too late," "to fail to attain," which occurs twice in Heb. 4:1, contains an eschatological warning not to miss attainment of the promise through lack of faith. 12:15 warns against failing to attain to God's grace by not maintaining peace and pursuing sanctification (v. 14). Paul sums up the discussion in Rom. 1:18-3:20 by saying that all of us fall short of God's glory (v. 23) and are thus dependent on the justifying grace which through Christ's work makes good the loss and achieves our glorification (cf. 5:2; 8:17-18, 29-30; 9:23; 1 Th. 2:12).

b. With reference to circumstances, hysteréō means "to lack." Jesus tells the rich young ruler what is the one thing he lacks for entry into life (Mk. 10:21). In Mt. 19:20 the ruler himself asks what he still lacks, i.e., in the sense of something that needs to be added rather than in that of absolute lack. The point in Jn. 2:3 is probably that the wine is finished rather than that there is a lack of it.

c. The most common sense in the NT is "to be in want." This is the prodigal's plight in Lk. 15:14. Jesus asks the returning disciples whether they were ever in want in Lk. 22:35. Paul thanks God that the Corinthians lack no spiritual gift in 1 Cor. 1:7; this emphasis is in material contrast with the theological ambitions of the Corinthian pneumatics in 4:8. As regards idol meats, believers suffer no lack if they do not eat; hence the strong should not harry or offend the weak by their freedom. Paul knows how to have enough and how to be in want (Phil. 4:12). He is ready to suffer want in Corinth rather than be a burden to the church (2 Cor. 11:9). Heb. 11:37 describes the plight of the fathers as they await the eschatological fulfilment of the divine promise in Christ.

d. The meaning “to come after, behind” occurs in 2 Cor. 11:5; 12:11: Paul is not behind other apostles. In 1 Cor. 12:24 God has given greater honor to the inferior part (i.e., that which comes behind) so that there should be no discord, but all the members should care for one another.

3. aphysteréō. This verb occurs in the NT only in Jms. 5:4 for “to withhold.”

4. hystérēma, hystérēsis. In Mk. 12:44 Jesus lauds the poor widow for giving out of her “want,” i.e., her poverty. In 2 Cor. 8:14 Paul encourages the collection so that Gentile abundance should supply the “want” or poverty of the Jerusalem saints and thus lead to thanksgiving (9:12-13). Paul’s “needs” in 2 Cor. 11:9 are supplied by the Macedonian church (cf. 1 Cor. 16:17; Phil. 2:30). Paul’s joy when his “needs” are met is not because of the needs but because of the sharing and the love that it expresses (Phil. 4:10ff.). He himself hopes to supply the teaching that the faith of the Thessalonians needs by coming to them (1 Th. 3:10). By his sufferings he enters into the sufferings of Christ, who is now exalted above earthly suffering as the Head of the church (Col. 1:24).

D. Early Writings.

1. Early Church Writings.

a. The adverb has a temporal sense in Papias (Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 3.39.15).

b. The verb means “to lack something” in Diog. 5.13; Ignatius Ephesians 5.2, and “to be in want,” “to be poor” in Did. 11.12; Barn. 10.3.

c. hystérēma means “what is lacking” in 1 Clem. 38.2 and “lack” in Hermas Visions 3.2.2; Similitudes 6.3.4. Clement of Alexandria Fragment 46 excludes all hystereín from the future kingdom, and for a christological statement cf. Stromateis 8.9.29.5.

2. Gnosticism. The terms hysteréō and hystérēma are important in Christian Gnosticism as denoting what is of lesser worth outside the original divine plḗrōma. Thus lower wisdom is an inferior power. As hystérēma is a result of ignorance, the attainment of gnṓsis remedies it. Gnostics flee the place of hystérēma and strive back up to the one (cf. Irenaeus Against Heresies 1.11.2; 16.2; 18.4; 21.4). [U. WILCKENS, VIII, 592-601] hýpsos [height], hypsóō [to lift up, exalt], hyperypsóō [to raise to the highest position], hýpsōma [height], hýpsistos [highest] hýpsos.

A. Nonbiblical Greek. hýpsos has reference to the dimension of height. It can be a “high place,” a “summit”; it also means “height,” “highness” (in a title), and it has such senses as “sublimity,” “climax,” “nobility.”

B. The Greek OT. The use of the term is manifold in the LXX, whether to express height, to denote a high place or position, exaltation by God, human pride, or the loftiness of heaven or of God.

C. Judaism.

1. The idea of rapture on high occurs in Slav. En. 3, and the height of the third heaven comes to expression in Test. Levi 2:8. Josephus Antiquities 8.126 speaks of the infinite height and greatness of bliss.

2. Philo refers to the highest stage in the knowledge of God, to sublimity of style (e.g., Moses), and to the difference between true and false hýpsos.

D. The NT. Rev. 21:6 gives the height of the heavenly city. Eph. 4:8-9 refers to the ascension of Christ. Christ comes from above and returns triumphantly to his home on high (cf. Ps. 68:18). In Lk. 1:78; 24:49 "on high" is almost a term for God (cf. also Acts 1:8). In Jms. 1:9 the sense is that of exaltation in rank. The poor, in contrast to the rich, are lifted up on high by God.

E. Early Christianity. The usage here is similar to that of the Bible (cf. 1 Clem. 36:2; Ignatius Ephesians 9.1; Barn. 20.1; Did. 5.1; Diog. 7.2).

hypsóō, hyperypsóō.

A. Nonbiblical Greek. The late and rare hypsóō means "to lift up," "to exalt," in both literal and transferred senses.

B. The Greek OT. The word is common in the LXX with reference to the exaltation of God, joyful exaltation by God, the exaltation which on the presupposition of abasement means glorification (cf. Is. 52:13), and arbitrary and arrogant self-exaltation (Hos. 13:6).

C. Judaism. Ps. Sol. 1:5 bewails the exaltation (i.e., arrogance) of sinners, Test. Jos. 1:7 develops the theme of abasement and exaltation, Qumran refers to the exaltation of resurrection, of a remnant in the community, of Michael over heavenly beings, and of Israel over the nations.

D. The NT.

1. The OT motif of exalting the humble and abasing the proud occurs in Mt. 23:12; Lk. 14:11; 18:14. True exaltation is God's work (Lk. 1:52; Jms. 4:10; 1 Pet. 5:6). Being made worthy to receive the gospel and Christ's glory is the church's exaltation (2 Cor. 11:7). Exaltation is blessing (Mt. 11:23) and has an eschatological reference (Phil. 2:5ff.).

2. Phil. 2:9 speaks about Christ's exaltation. His obedience to death is humiliation; in resurrection he is raised to the highest position (hyperypsóō). For all its ethical implications, the statement is soteriological and eschatological. Paul preaches Christ crucified as the Lord of glory (1 Cor. 2:2) who speaks to him on high and sets him in the same tension of abasement and exaltation (2 Cor. 12:1ff.).

3. In Heb. 1:3 Christ, having suffered, is at the right hand of the majesty on high, exalted above the heavens.

4. In Acts 2:33 the risen Christ is set at God's right hand in the place of rule. This is the presupposition of the outpouring of the Spirit. In 5:31 the exalted Savior grants repentance and forgiveness of sins to Israel.

5. In Jn. 3:14; 8:28; 12:32, 34 Jesus is exalted both on the cross and up to heaven. Those who believe in the exalted Son of Man have life (3:14-15). Death is the presupposition of parting from the earthly sphere and transfiguration. But hypsóō also denotes the form of death. Those who lift Jesus up on the cross exalt him as Ruler and Judge. His exaltation makes the discipleship of the cross constitutive for believers. Jesus' exalting is also his perfecting (19:30). He does not set up an earthly kingdom, but by his resurrection and ascension is exalted to his heavenly home.

6. The exaltation of Jesus embraces resurrection, reception, ascent, enthronement, and royal dominion. It is the climax of his earthly abasement and the presupposition of his coming in glory. It is not so much a change of place as institution to power and glory both on earth and in heaven. The transfiguration anticipates this future glory and the empty tomb points to it. Exaltation is a basic concept in all Christology, especially as the resurrection forms a corrective to any docetic evaporation.

E. Early Christianity. The apostolic fathers sometimes use hypsóō for human arrogance (Did. 3.9). We find it in OT quotations only in Justin. In Acts of Thomas elevation is a presupposition of the vision of Christ. Inscriptions follow John in giving "to exalt" the sense of "to glorify."

1. The Nonbiblical Sphere. This rare and late word means “eminence,” “high place,” and in astrology “culmination.”

2. The LXX and Hellenistic Judaism. LXX uses are for “arrogance,” “lifting up,” and the “high places.” Philo says that the Decalogue is fashioned in the height of heaven.

3. The NT. The only NT instances are in Rom. 8:39 and 2 Cor. 10:5. In Rom. 8:39 Paul asserts that the “height” of creation cannot separate us from the love of Christ, who has pierced this sphere and subjected it to himself. In 2 Cor. 10:5 Paul uses the image of a “fortress with high towers” for the attitude which proudly resists the true knowledge of God but which the apostle overcomes with the gospel.

4. Early Christianity. Acts of John 23 echoes Paul’s usage in Rom. 8:39.

A. Nonbiblical Greek. This word means “highest,” “loftiest.” It is used for the highest peaks, but also for Zeus as the most high god, or for Mithra as the most high.

B. ‘elyôn in Semitic Usage. Possibly on a Canaanite (Jebusite?) basis, the OT designates God the Most High (cf. Gen. 14:19ff.; 2 Sam. 24:17). With a focus on Zion, the name expresses eschatological hopes. As a title of majesty, it refers to God as the one who dwells on high, always in poetry except in Gen. 14. Qumran refers to knowledge of the Most High and calls its members the saints of the Most High.

C. hýpsistos in the LXX. hýpsistos is mostly a term for God in the LXX; it serves as the equivalent for the divine title ‘elyôn, and also for other Hebrew terms whose point is that God is the Lord on high. In Sirach hýpsistos is the most common term for God after Kýrios. It is used only for Israel’s God and as a proper name. In a phrase like theós hýpsistos it is a noun in apposition.

D. hýpsistos in Judaism. Most High becomes a favorite term for God in Hellenistic Judaism. It brings together the OT title for God and the Greek concept of the chief god. Whereas in the OT the Most High denotes the one God on high, hýpsistos in Hellenistic Judaism becomes an apologetic term for the supreme God, although not in a syncretistic sense.

E. The NT.

1. The formula “in the highest” occurs in Lk. 2:14 (the Christmas story) and in Mt. 21:9; Mk. 11:10; Lk. 19:38 (the story of the triumphal entry). In the entry story we have an invocation of God, and in Lk. 2:14 the parallelism counterbalances glory for God on high with salvation for humanity on earth.

2. hýpsistos is used nine times in the NT as a term for God. In Lk. 1:32, 35 Mary’s child will be called the Son of the Most High, and in 1:76 the forerunner is the prophet of the Most High. A demon calls Jesus the Son of the Most High in Mk. 5:7; Lk. 8:28, and the girl greets Paul as a servant of God the Most High in Acts 16:17. Most High is a term for God in Lk. 6:35, and the name stresses the divine transcendence in Acts 7:48. The description in Heb. 7:1 simply repeats Gen. 14:18. In general, hýpsistos as a divine name is on the margin of the NT tradition whether as an expression of sublimity, a term of transcendence, or a traditional title.

F. Early Christianity. Apart from liturgical use under OT influence, hýpsistos finds little place in the early church (for examples cf. 1 Clem. 29:2; Ignatius Romans, Introduction; Justin Apology 33.5). Apocryphal Acts ascribe the title to the exalted Lord (cf. Acts of Thomas 48). Christ is the Kýrios and hýpsistos of the community. [G. BERTRAM, VIII, 602-20] phaínō [to shine, appear], phanerós [visible, evident], phaneróō [to reveal, show], phanérōsis [revelation, appearance], phantázō [to appear], phántasma [ghost], emphanízō [to show, appear], epiphaínō [to show, appear], epiphanēs [visible, magnificent], epipháneia [appearance] phaínō.

1. This word means "to manifest, "to show," intransitively "to shine," "to light up," "to become visible," "to appear." In philosophy the reference of the word is to sense perception.

2. In the NT the active occurs only intransitively, e.g., the shining of the sun (Rev. 1:6), of the sun and moon (21:23), of a lamp (Jn. 5:35), or of the day or night (Rev. 8:12). A figurative use may be seen in Jn. 1:5. phaínomai is more common for "to shine," "to light up" (cf. the star in Mt. 2:7, stars in Phil. 2:15, lightning in Mt. 24:23, the lamp in Rev. 18:23), or for "to appear," "to be manifest" (Jms. 4:14), "to occur" (Mt. 9:33), "to show oneself" (Mt. 13:26; Rom. 7:13). The subjects comprise eschatological manifestation (Mt. 24:30), dream phenomena (Mt. 1:20), and the appearances of the risen Lord (Mk. 16:9). An impersonal sense is "to strike" or "look" (Mk. 14:64), and cf. "to look as though" in Mt. 23:27-28 and "to give the appearance" in Mt. 6:16. A distinction between the visible and the invisible may be seen in Heb. 11:3.

1. This adjective means "visible," "manifest," "outstanding," "public."

2. In the NT Rom. 2:28 has in view what is "visible" outwardly. What is "evident" is the point in Rom 1.19; Gal. 5:19. 1 Tim. 4:15. 1 Jn. 3:10 carries the nuance of what is "made manifest" (cf. Mk. 4:22; Lk. 8:17; Mk. 6:14), eschatologically so in 1 Cor 3:13. The adverb phanerṓs means "publicly" in Mk. 1:45; Jn. 7:10, and "plainly" in Acts 10:3.

phaneróō.

A. Outside the NT. This rare verb means "to make visible," or in the passive "to become visible."

B. The NT.

1. Common in the NT, phaneróō refers to the disclosure of the hidden meaning of parables in the proverbial saying in Mk. 4:22.

2. In Paul phaneróō is a synonym of apokalýptō (Rom. 1:17 and 3:21). Except in 1 Cor. 4:5 and Rom. 1:19 ("to make visible") the point is revelation in the gospel. Rom. 3:21 refers to the once-for-all revelation of justification in Christ. In 2 Corinthians phaneróō is perhaps a term of Paul's opponents that he adopts. He uses it for God's revelation in his preaching (2 Cor. 2:14) and life (4:10-11). Although eschatologically qualified, this is definitive.

3. Revelation takes place in proclamation in Col. 1:25-26. Light categories occur in Eph. 5:13-14, and concealment is the opposite in Col. 3:3-4. The bearers of revelation mediate salvation (cf. also 2 Tim. 1:10; Tit. 1:2-3). Past revelation in Christ is at issue in 1 Pet. 3:16 (cf. 1 Pet. 1:18ff.).

4. phaneróō is common in John (gnōrízō is synonymous). Jesus "discloses before all eyes" (Jn. 7:4-5) God's reality, name, and works. All Jesus' work is revelation. Indirectly God's reality is also revealed in the witness of the Baptist (1:31). The appearances of the risen Lord are at issue in 21:1, 14. Jesus reveals God's love in 1 Jn. 4:9. The goal is life (1:2; 4:9). Revelation is the content of the word of life, which includes proclamation. Future revelation is the reference in 2:28 and 3:2.

5. The two instances in Rev. 3:18 have no theological significance (cf. also the use in the hymn in 15:4).

C. The Apostolic Fathers. For Ignatius revelation breaks the eternal silence and is fulfilled in Christ (Ephesians 19.1-2). The heavenly ekklēsía is revealed in Christ's flesh (5.31-32). God through Christ has revealed the truth and heavenly life according to 2 Clem. 20.5. Barn. 5.6, 9 refers to revelation in the flesh (cf. 6.7, 9, 14). The OT revelation prophesies it (2.4). In Hermas phaneróō denotes the revelation of a vision and the appearance of the shepherd (Visions 3.1.2; Similitudes 2.1). Diog. 8.11 speaks of the revelation of divine mercy in Christ after the exposing of human sin (9.2).

1. This word means "revelation," "appearance."

2. In 1 Cor. 12:7 it is the revelation imparted by the Spirit and consisting of the charisms listed in vv. 8ff. It entails acts in which the Spirit manifests himself. In the only other NT instance in 2 Cor. 4:2 Paul describes true proclamation as a manifestation of the truth in contrast to the falsification of God's word by his opponents.

1. In the middle or passive, the verb often means "to appear" with reference to unusual phenomena. This is the sense in Heb. 12:21 ("the sight").

2. The noun, meaning "phenomenon," is often used for dream appearances or apparitions. It means "ghost" in Mk. 6:49.

emphanízō.

1. This word means "to make visible," "to demonstrate," "to set forth," "to declare," and in the active and middle "to appear."

2. In the NT it means "to show" in Acts 23:22 and Heb. 11:14. The appearing of the dead is at issue in Mt. 27:53. A twofold sense is apparent in Jn. 14:21ff. where Judas has a resurrection, appearance in mind but Jesus is speaking about his self-revelation in believers when he and the Father come to reside in them. Heb. 9:24 is perhaps using a cultic or legal expression when it refers to the exalted Christ appearing before God for us.

epiphaínō, epiphanḗs, epipháneia.

A. Classical and Hellenistic Greek.

1. The verb means "to show," "to show oneself," "to appear," the adjective means "visible," "magnificent," and the noun means "appearance" in various senses (e.g., a geometrical "surface," the "appearance" of an enemy, the "front" of an army, or the "renown" of famous people). The group has religious significance with reference to the intervention of the gods to bring divine help. The word thus comes to denote "divine assistance." The Ptolemies adopt the title theós epiphanḗs.

2. In the LXX we find the verb for "to shine" in Dt. 33:2 and for God's appearing in Gen. 35:7. The adjective means "splendid" in Esth. 5:1. The most common use of the group is for mighty demonstrations of aid (cf. 2 Sam. 7:23; 2 Macc. 2:21; 1 Chr. 17:21; 2 Macc. 15:34; 3 Macc. 2:19).

3. Josephus uses epipháneia for "fame" but mostly for "helpful intervention." The verb means "to appear" and the adjective "magnificent." Philo uses the noun for "appearance," "renown," "splendor," and "geometrical surface," the adjective for "splendid," "distinguished," and the verb for "to appear."

B. The NT.

1. In the NT epiphaínō in the intransitive means "to show oneself," "to appear" (the stars in Acts 27:20). God intervenes to help in the metaphor of Lk. 1:79. The grace of God has appeared to salvation in the Christ event (Tit. 2:11; cf. 3:4).

2. The adjective characterizes the day of the Lord in Acts 2:20 ("manifest").

3. The noun is a religious term in the NT. It refers to Christ's future eschatological appearing in 2 Th. 2:8; 1 Tim. 6:14; 2 Tim. 4:1; Tit. 2:13, and to Jesus' earthly appearing as an eschatological manifestation of grace in 2 Tim. 1:9-10 (cf. also perhaps 4:8). [R. BULTMANN and D. LÜHRMANN, IX, 1-10]

Pharisaíos [Pharisee]

A. Phariseeism in Judaism.

I. Usage. A common term in the NT and Josephus, usually in the plural, Pharisaíos transcribes an Aramaic word denoting "separated." The Hebrew equivalent, whose root can have both positive and negative nuances, is very rare and does not cover all aspects of Pharisaism. Contemporaries (but not the Pharisees themselves) seem to use it in a derogatory sense for "sectaries."

II. Pharisaism to the Fall of the Jerusalem Hierarchy.

1. The Origin. The beginnings of Pharisaism are obscure but seem to reach back into the second century B.C.

Possible precursors are a. the Chasidim. The sources, which are sparse, suggest that this group originates under Antiochus Epiphanes (cf. 1 Macc. 2:42). It forms an opposition movement prior to the Maccabean revolt. Its first target is the Jerusalem establishment that is departing from the law. Its main aim seems to be to champion and observe the law within the hierarchy. It thus thinks of itself as the true Israel.

An origin might also be sought b. in the Perushim, whose concern is separation by the law, primarily priestly separation by the sacral law with a view to the cultic validity of priestly acts, but then by extension the sanctification of the people by the everyday application of the law. The Pharisees, of course, are concerned about inner and not merely outer separation, but a priestly movement with holiness as its goal may well have contributed to Pharisaism, particularly in the case of Pharisaic priests. The decisive factor, however, is the ideal of everyday sanctification by the law, as may be seen in the lay dominance that belongs to the very structure of Pharisaism and the denial of any prominence to priests as such.

2. The Pharisaic Societies. Although we have no real data for the B.C. period, it seems that the Pharisees form societies which are oriented to sanctification and distinguished from the rest of Judaism by specific rules. Only on the basis of some such organization can the Pharisees resist the Hasmoneans, and rabbinic references confirm a corporate existence according to rule.

In this regard we find a. the term Chabura, a general term for "union" which suggests the formation of Pharisaic societies.

We also find b. the term Chaberim for members who accept the society statutes.

A third term c. is Chaberuth for the obligations that members accept. These might vary over the years and in different groups but they always include the payment of tithes and the everyday application of sacral law, although with distinction between those who accept only tithing and those who accept full sanctification after a prior course of instruction and the satisfactory passing of a test. The societies are small groups who regard themselves as the true Israel in distinction from the masses who reject the ideal of actualizing sacral law in everyday life, no matter what may be their culture or status. Political, economic, and social factors, however, rule out the sharp restriction of everyday dealings with the masses which is the Pharisaic ideal.

3. Pharisaic Wisdom and Learning.

a. The Chakamim. Pharisaism provides fruitful soil for learning. In postexilic times secular wisdom makes a significant agreement with Israel's faith. It leads believers to see in the law an order of life as well as a plan of salvation. The teachers of wisdom, the chakamim, are aristocrats of the spirit ranking immediately after the priestly and social aristocracy. In the democratic Pharisaic societies they quickly assume positions of leadership. Here they develop, not the doctrine of God, but the themes of anthropology, soteriology, and eschatology which relate believers to both this world and the next. Under their guidance a new faith-world develops which forms the background of the NT. The tension which this development causes with the sacred text of the OT poses a necessary task for scholars which produces scribal learning.

b. The Soferim. This term covers a broad range from literate persons, elementary teachers, secretaries, and temple scribes to students and expositors of the law. When the fusion of law and wisdom takes place, the soferim become virtually identical with the chakamim with the special task of interpreting the law in the light of the new development. Naturally the soferim do not have to be Pharisees. They exist prior to the Pharisaic movement, and there are always non-Pharisaic scribes. Nevertheless, since the Pharisees are diligent students of the law who seek to apply it in everyday life, they inevitably have need of soferim to guide their thought and practice.

4. The Pharisees as a Party.

a. The Hasmoneans. Pharisaism is essentially a trend or movement, and it remains such in the diaspora. In Palestine, however, its concern for legitimacy entails its development as a party, probably as early as the reign of Hyrcanus I (134 B.C.). Opposing the Hasmoneans, the Pharisees seek to replace them with an Aaronite high-priestly family. To this end they even seem to have invoked the aid of the Seleucid Demetrius III Eukairus, but after a brief success they suffer severely at the hands of Jannai when the Syrians withdraw. Under Salome Alexandra (76-67 B.C.) they achieve power and brutally suppress their opponents; the rabbis depict this reign as one of great prosperity. The death of the queen breaks their hegemony, but they retain minority representation on the council. In the ensuing dynastic struggles the Pharisees now seek the end of the prince-priesthood as an invalid innovation. Rejecting the hierocracy, they can lead a religious life without political dependence. They can thus advise the surrender of Jerusalem to Herod I, and after Herod’s victory in 37 B.C. they not only survive but maintain the respect of the people (in contrast to Herod).

b. From Herod to the Destruction of the Temple. Herod accepts and even favors the Pharisees, taking care not to wound their religious scruples. In line with their anti-Hasmonean policy, they never champion nationalistic resistance movements aiming at eschatological salvation. They become enmeshed in various palace intrigues, however, and after Herod’s death and the banishment of Archelaus, when the Sadducees regain control, they no longer play a normative role. Yet their scribes remain popular as they legalize popular customs and beliefs, and the aristocracy does not attempt any forceful measures against them.

c. The Zealots. Different trends may be seen in Pharisaism, often sharply divided. Thus the Zealots emerge as a radical or particularist wing of Pharisaism under Judas the Galilean, who is distinguished by a love of freedom and an acknowledgment of God alone as Lord. The Zealots quickly attain a following, for they have a predominantly religious rather than political program, and Judas unites scribal learning with his ability as a leader. If on the one side he is the messianic heir-apparent, on the other he is a chakam who seeks the victory of the law and hence eternal freedom in the form of the rule of God. The older Pharisaism resists the Zealot movement but cannot prevent the intrusion of Zealot trains of thought and aspirations.

d. Zadokite Criticism. Qumran shows that Pharisaism is opposed by the older orthodoxy in respect of its detailed rulings and also of its whole interpretation of the law. What is contested is not the applying of the law to life but the placing of Pharisaic rulings as a fence around the law and the resultant according to oral tradition of equal validity with the law and consequent immunity from criticism. The ideal of Pharisaism is a detailed ordering of life which will protect believers against mortal sin and produce fellowship with God through every change and chance of life. The Damascus Document is a Zadokite work which attacks the idea of a fence around the law on the ground that it involves transgression of the law and imposes too heavy burdens on the people by way of false exposition. Similarly Qumran accuses Pharisaism of dissolving the law by scribal misdirection and evasion. An example of such an evasion is the arrangement whereby Hillel supposedly permits a loan to be required even in the year of remission, thereby adopting into sacral law a secular practice which virtually annuls the law.

III. The Victory of Pharisaism.

1. The Fall of the Hierocracy. Except under Salome Alexandra the Pharisees have the role of a minority up to A.D. 70. Their great period comes only with the fa11 of the hierocracy. When the capture of Jerusalem shatters the Sadducean ideal, Pharisaism provides the direction needed for reconstruction. Politically independent, it nurtures community life in the synagogue. The failure of the Zealots clears the way for more moderate leaders such as Jochanan ben Zakkai. Jabneh with its chakamim, which plays no part in the revolt, forms a center for reorganization.

2. The Reconstruction.

a. Religio-Social Change. The chakamim can now apply more fully their own concepts. They enjoy the support of the eastern diaspora. A new court is set up in which the scribes have final authority. The Jabneh academy supplies the leaders, so that power passes from an aristocracy to men of religious and intellectual quality who after a long period of preparation qualify for ordination as rabbis.

b. Inner Reorganization. In inner reorganization the first task is to give the community a uniform basis in religious law. A voice from heaven settles the old dispute between Hillel and Shammai in favor of the former. Excommunication falls on dissenting groups like the Sadducees and Essenes, and full separation from the Samaritans takes place. Pharisaic Hillelites ultimately prevail in Galilee and the dispersion. Steps are taken to suppress speculation, to fix the canon, and to standardize speech, writing, and liturgy. The chakamim had tried to fix the canon earlier, but they now achieve the threefold canon of law, prophets, and writings in debate with the Sadducees, Samaritans, and Jewish Christians. They also standardize the text and achieve a new and more literal translation into Greek. As regards law, they adopt and revise cultic law, make use of written as well as oral tradition, and establish the threefold principle of majority decision, local custom, and normative authority. Exegesis seeks to establish the unity of the written law and oral tradition; rules borrowed from Hellenistic hermeneutics aid in this task, although these conflict with the older and simpler rules illustrated in the expository work of Qumran. An eschatological element remains that anticipates the restoration of the temple and the dawn of the kingdom. The reconstruction is so thorough that it is hard today to gain even a general picture of Judaism prior to the fall of the hierocracy.

IV. Summary. Prior to A.D. 70 Judaism is a multiform phenomenon; after A.D. 70 we see the triumph of one movement with Pharisaism. This movement, previously a minority, acquires such force as to make its impress on worldwide Judaism as a whole. Only much later will opposition arise against it, and even this opposition cannot decisively alter the totality of the new rabbinic Judaism. [R. MEYER, IX, 11-35]

B. The NT.

I. The Synoptic Tradition.

1. The Historical Problem. The NT mentions the Pharisees some 98 or 101 times, mostly in the Synoptics. The Pharisees oppose the Baptist in Mt. 3:7ff. and are a contending party against Jesus in Mk. 10:1ff.; 12:13ff. Quite early they resolve on his death (Mk. 3:6). They incur in return the sharp criticism of Jesus (Mk. 7; Mt. 25). In some sense they represent Judaism as a whole in this regard. Yet the picture is not uniform, for Jesus has friendly relations with many Pharisees (cf. Lk. 7:36; 13:31ff.; Mk. 12:34). Furthermore, the Pharisees, who have little real power, play only a minor role in the actual passion story.

2. Other Parties. Other groups as well as the Pharisees oppose Jesus (cf. the references to the Pharisees and Sadducees in Mt. 16:6, to the leaven of the Pharisees and Herod in Mk. 8:15, and to the question of the Sadducees in Mt. 22:34).

b. We also find mention of the chief priests and elders along with the Pharisees (cf. Mk. 12:1ff.; Mt. 21:23, 45).

c. Frequently the scribes figure in the accounts, and while many scribes are Pharisees, the two groups are not identical (cf. Lk. 11:37ff., 45ff.; Mk. 7:5; Lk. 5:21). In exegetical questions the scribes probably play a leading role, and only incidentally are some of them Pharisees (cf. Mk. 12:35; Mt. 22:41).

d. Mark refers to the Herodians in 3:6; 12:13. These are perhaps political adherents of Herod Antipas, although little is known about them or about their connection with the Pharisees. Matthew and Luke omit the references in view of their lack of interest in the group or its lack of any further relevance.

3. Opposition to the Pharisaic Understanding.

a. The opposition of Jesus to the Pharisees is directed against their legal piety and the resultant practice of the law. Jesus accepts the law (Mt. 5:17) and even gives it a sharper interpretation (5:21ff.). Love of God and neighbor is his criterion, not the law itself or oral tradition. In proclaiming God's will Jesus implicitly sets himself above the law and opposes the oral tradition of Pharisaism (Mk. 7:8-9, 13). Emphasizing detailed rules means abrogating essential demands. Hence the legal practice of Pharisaism amounts to hypocrisy (Mt. 6:1ff.).

b. Rules whereby Pharisaism claims to be the true Israel arouse the particular opposition of Jesus, e.g., strict sabbatarianism (Mk. 2:23ff.), tithing (Lk. 18:12), fasting (Mk. 2: 18ff.), and purifyings (Mk. 7:1ff.). What Jesus seeks is inner, not outer purity (Mk. 7:15).

c. The separation of the Pharisees from the people is also a cause of conflict in view of Jesus' mingling with publicans and sinners. Since he himself enjoys table fellowship with the Pharisees (Lk. 7:36), he incurs heavy criticism on this point (Mk. 2:15ff.), but in return he opposes his saving mission to Pharisaic legalism. Indeed, in the parable of Lk. 18:9ff. he sets aside the subjectively honest concern of the Pharisees to fulfil the law in favor of those who expect nothing from their own works but everything from the divine mercy.

d. Mt. 5:18-19, of course, maintains the infallible validity of the law. The directions in Mt. 23:2-3 do not in themselves contest Pharisaic authority. The attack in Mt. 23:3, 23 is on Pharisaic practice rather than the Pharisaic ideal. The door is thus left open for Jewish Christians to achieve a true Pharisaic legitimacy while rejecting Pharisaic Judaism and even adopting elements from Zadokite criticism.

II. John's Gospel. In John, too, the Pharisees oppose the Baptist (1:19), collide with Jesus over observance of the sabbath (5:1ff.), and resolve to put Jesus to death (7:32). Yet "the Jews" as a whole are more prominent in John (i.e., the intellectual and religious leaders), the Pharisees are now in closer contact with the chief priests (7:32; 11:47), and little account is taken of the distinction between the scribes and Pharisees (cf. Jn. 9). The separation of the Pharisees from the people still plays a role (7:49), but there is no collective judgment on the Pharisees, and in Nicodemus Jn. 3:1-2 portrays a sympathetic Pharisee (cf. 12:42).

III. Acts and Paul.

1. In Acts the Pharisees play no special role in opposition either to Jesus (2:23) or to the infant church (4:1: the Sadducees and priests). Indeed, Gamaliel advocates a tolerant attitude to the church (5:34ff.), and for party reasons the Pharisees on the council defend Paul's innocence (23:6ff.).

2. Paul himself is brought up as a Pharisee (Acts 26:4-5) and studies under Gamaliel (22:3). He alludes to his zeal in striving to fulfil the Pharisaic ideal (Gal. 1:13-14; Phil. 3:5-6). For him, however, this Pharisaic past is of no importance (Phil. 3:7). He nowhere opposes Pharisaism as such. The theological conflict between Christ and legalism subsumes the historical conflict.

C. Early Christian Writings. The sharp rift between Judaism and Christianity means that the Pharisees tend to fade from the picture. The apostolic writings do not mention them. Other works follow the NT tradition. Justin uses the fixed phrase "Pharisees and scribes" (Dialogue 51.2; 76.7). Christian Gnostic texts also reflect hostility to the Pharisees. Irenaeus Against Heresies 4.12.1 claims that Jesus attacks only the Pharisaic law, not the law as such. Jewish Christianity (Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions 1.54.7), however, accepts the authority of the scribes and Pharisees but not their practice (cf. Mt. 23:2-3, 13). The Woes apply to hypocritical Pharisees, not to Pharisees as such (Pseudo-Clementine Homilies 11.29.1-2). Jewish Christians are finally the true Pharisees. [H. F. WEISS, IX, 35-48]

phátnē [manger]

A. Greek Usage. phátnē, meaning “manger” or “feeding trough,” occurs in the spheres of animal husbandry and veterinary science. The extended sense of “stall” is less common. In a transferred sense the word is used for the digestive organs, “trough” suggests a parasitic life, and we also find a use for the “hollow” of the mouth, the “cavity” in teeth, and the “star cluster.” The word has no specific religious significance.

B. The OT and Rabbinic Judaism.

1. The LXX uses the word for “feeding trough” in Is. 1:3; Job 39:9; Prov. 14:4. “Stall” is a possible sense in Is. 1:3 and Prov. 14:4, but it is likely only in 2 Chr. 32:38; stalls are uncommon in Palestine apart from the royal stables.

2. The rabbis use the Hebrew equivalent mostly for “manger” or “feeding trough.” Special rules apply for feeding on the sabbath, e.g., for the size of the trough. Since humans and animals live close together, the sense “stall” is less common. In exposition of Is. 1:3 knowing the master’s crib is not taken messianically but is related to knowing the law.

C. Historical Witness. Archaeology has discovered feeding troughs in Ahab’s stables at Megiddo. We also find pictures of mangers. In the Hellenistic period larger estates have cave-stalls, but on small farms there are feeding places in the main room, troughs outside, or annexed stalls. Cattle and sheep may also be sheltered in folds or caves.

D. The NT.

1. In the NT phátnē occurs only four times in Luke. In Lk. 13:15 Jesus refers to the practice, dictated by necessity, of loosing cattle from their stalls and leading them to water on the sabbath. If this is permissible for animals, surely the relief of human suffering is even more permissible.

2. The other three instances occur in Lk. 2:1 ff. in connection with the birth of Jesus (v. 7), the promise of the angels (v. 12), and the adoration of the shepherds (v. 16). The theme is clearly an important one, and the meaning is obviously “manger,” whether in a stall, in the open, or in a cave. The shepherd setting in the city of David proclaims the birth of the Davidic Messiah. The manger contrasts the lowly birth of the world’s Redeemer with the glory of Augustus as the present ruler of the world (2:1, 11, 14). It also prefigures the humility and suffering of the Son of God and Man who has nowhere to lay his head (Lk. 9:58).

E. The Early Church. The manger tradition combines with a cave tradition in the early church (cf. Origen Against Celsus 1.51). After Helena’s pilgrimage a church is built at the traditional site of the crib and cave (ca. A. D. 330). The late Pseudo Matthew places the birth in a cave, puts Mary in a stall, has her lay the child in a crib, and then describes the entry into Bethlehem. The ox and ass come into the story on the basis of Is. 1:3 and Hab. 3:2 LXX; they occur in depictions from the middle of the fourth century. [M. HENGEL, IX, 49-55]

ca. circa, about

1. Secular Literature. From a root meaning “to carry,” then “to bring forth,” phérō has the senses a. “to bring,” “to lead,” “to go,” b. “to bring forth,” “to express,” “to convey,” c. “to issue” (a complaint, accusation, etc.), d. “to bring” (gifts), “express” (thanks), or “show” (a favor), e. “to bear or bring forth,” f. “to bear or endure” (afflictions), and g. “to rule.”

2. The LXX. The LXX uses the term mostly for “to present,” e.g., offerings, at times in the sense “to sacrifice.” Other uses are for carrying burdens, bringing gifts, paying tribute, enduring sufferings, and bearing responsibility (Moses in Num. 11:14). “To blow” (the wind) is the sense in Is. 64:5.

3. Josephus. In Josephus the word means “to bring” and intransitively “to lead,” middle or passive “to be moved” (cf. also “to ride”).

4. The NT.

a. In the sense “to bring” the sick etc. are fetched to Jesus (Mk. 1:32; 2:3, etc.) or to Peter (Acts 5:6). Peter will be “led off” to martyrdom (Jn. 21:18). Intransitively the middle denotes the onrushing wind in Acts 2:2, and in the passive the ship is driven by the storm in 27:15, 17. Heb. 6:1 invites believers to “press on,” and 2 Pet. 1:21 says that the prophets were “impelled” by the Spirit.

b. The “bringing” of the gospel is the point in 2 Jn. 10, and in 2 Pet. 1:17-18 the voice “comes” to Jesus, while prophecy does not “come” by human will in 1:21.

c. The term is a legal one in Jn. 18:29 and Acts 25:18 (cf. 2 Pet. 2:11). In Heb. 9:16 proof of the death of the testator must be “adduced” to bring the diathḗkē into effect.

d. In 1 Pet. 1:13 grace is “offered” to believers at the parousia. The kings will “bring” their glory in Rev. 21:24 and offer it to God and the Lamb. Believers “bring” their possessions to the apostles to be used for the common good (Acts 4:34, 37; 5:2).

e. Lk. 23:26 refers to Simon’s “bearing” of the cross.

f. “Bearing fruit” is at issue in Mt. 7:18. Mk. 4:8. Jn. 15:2, 4. The fruit is that of discipleship or of the word. It is the fruit of Christ’s death in Jn. 12:24.

g. The sense of “enduring” occurs in Heb. 12:20 and 13:13. God “bears” with the objects of his wrath in Rom. 9:22; this toleration does not restrict his judgment but enables him to show his glory in mercy.

h. “To uphold” or “to rule” is the sense in Heb. 1:3, where the Son upholds by his word of power the universe that is created through him (v. 2).

5. The Apostolic Fathers. In these works we find the senses “to offer,” “to bear fruit,” “to bear suffering,” and “to be impelled” (cf. Barn. 2.5; Hermas Similitudes 2.3-4; 1 Clem. 45.5; Hermas Similitudes 6.5.7).

anaphérō.

1. Secular Literature. This compound has two main senses in accordance with the force of ana- as either “up” or “back.” To the first group belong such meanings as “to lift up,” “to bear.”

2. The LXX. In the LXX anaphérō is a technical term for “to offer,” “to sacrifice.” It is also used for bringing a matter before someone (Ex. 18:19). In the sense “to bear suffering or guilt” (i.e., for others, Is. 53:11-12), the word may have the force of “to do away,” “to expiate.”

3. The NT.

a. Jesus takes the disciples up the mountain in Mt. 17:1, and he himself is taken up (the ascension) in some versions of Lk. 24:51.

b. “To offer sacrifices” is the sense in Heb. 7:27; 13:15; Jms. 2:21; 1 Pet. 2:5. Christ’s once-for-all offering has abolished the Levitical sacrifices in Heb. 7:21. The offering of Isaac is a work of faith in Jms. 2:21. 1 Pet. 2:5 refers to the spiritual offering of the whole person to God. 1 Pet. 2:24 interprets Is. 53:12 LXX as Christ’s bearing of sin on the cross in his self-offering for sin (cf. Heb. 9:26, 28).

4. The Apostolic Fathers. The term is used in these works for “bringing” or “presenting” to God, e.g., prayers in Barn. 12.7, believers in Ignatius Ephesians 9.1.

diaphérō, tá diaphéronta, diáphoros* (adiáphoron)

1. Secular Literature.

a. In secular works diaphérō has such varied senses as “to transmit,” “to spread,” “to drive,” intransitively “to stand out,” “to fall behind,” impersonally “it matters,” “it is of interest or importance.”

b. tá diaphéronta means either “marks of difference” or “interests.”

c. diáphoros has the force of “different,” “varied,” “outstanding,” or, negatively, “unwelcome.”

d. Aristotle uses adiáphoron for the integrity of a substance in its external form or for the similarity of members of a species. For the Cynics and Stoics it is the middle sphere between virtue and vice, i.e., the ethically indifferent.

2. The LXX.

a. We find the verb in the LXX in the senses “to transmit,” “to scatter,” “to spread,” “to differentiate oneself,” and, in the passive, “to be divided, estranged.”

b. The adjective in Lev. 19:19 and Dt. 22:9 renders a Hebrew term signifying “of two kinds.”

c. Dan. 7:7 uses the adverb diaphórōs for “differently” in a bad sense.

3. Josephus. In Josephus the verb means “to be driven or scattered” or “to differentiate oneself,” and the adjective means “different.”

4. The NT.

a. In the NT the verb means “to carry through” in Mk. 11:16, “to drift” in Acts 27:27 “to be spread” in Acts 13:49, “to differ” in 1 Cor. 15:41, “to be better” in Mt. 6:26, and “to be of no account” in Gal. 2:6.

b. tá diaphéronta occurs in Rom. 2:18 and Phil. 1:10 with reference to what is essential either in fulfilling the law or in the Christian life.

c. In Rom. 12:6 the adjective means “different” rather than “superior” (cf. 1 Cor. 12). The term has a negative ring in Heb. 9:10: The ablutions are ineffectual for all their multiplicity.

5. The Apostolic Fathers. “To carry through” is the sense in Hermas Similitudes 9.4.1, and “to differ” in Diog. 3.5. 1 Clem. 36.2 quotes Heb. 1:4.

eisphérō.

1. This word means “to carry or bring in,” “to convey.”

2. The LXX uses it for bringing offerings into the sanctuary.

3. In the NT we brought nothing into the world (1 Tim. 6:7), the sick man is brought into the house (Lk. 5:17-18), disciples will be haled before the courts (Lk. 12:11), blood is brought into the sanctuary (Heb. 13:11), and we pray not to be brought into temptation, or not to cause it to happen (Mt. 6:13).

4. In Hermas Similitudes 8.6.5 the compound corresponds to the simple form in 2 Jn. 10.

prosphérō (→ thýō, proságō).

A. Secular Literature. This word has such senses as “to bring to,” “to set before” (middle “to take,” “to enjoy”), “to bring,” “to offer,” and (passive) “to encounter.”

B. Jewish Hellenistic Literature.

1. In the LXX prosphérō is mostly a sacrificial term for bringing offerings, for presenting at the altar, or for sacrificing.

2. Josephus uses the word both in the general sense “to bring” or “to serve” (food or drink) and in the sacrificial sense “to offer.”

3. Philo uses the term for “to bring” and (middle) “to take” (food and drink).

C. The NT.

1. In Mt. 4:24; 8:16, etc. the sick are brought to Jesus, in Lk. 23:14 Jesus is handed over to the Sanhedrin, and in Mk. 10:13 and parallels children are brought to Jesus.

2 Money is brought in Mt. 22:19, and vinegar handed to Jesus in Lk. 23:36.

3. Heb. 12:7 refers to God's dealings with his sons.

4.a. Cultically Jesus tells the cured leper to make the prescribed offering in Mk. 1:44, and in Mt. 5:23-24 he counsels reconciliation before making an offering. He thus makes the offering for cleansing a witness to his own mission and he gives the sacrificial system a norm in the commandment of love.

b. Paul follows the norm of Jesus in Acts 21:26 when he undertakes the offering and in so doing attempts reconciliation with his Jewish brethren. Stephen, however, echoes prophetic criticism of the cultus in Acts 7:42, and Jn. 16:2 makes the sharper criticism that killing Jesus' disciples will be regarded as offering God service.

c. Hebrews uses the sacrificial theology of the OT as witness to Christ. Jesus offers only once (10:12), offers himself (9:4; 10:10), by his sacrifice sanctifies once and for all (10:10), and ministers on the basis of a new and better covenant (8:6). Yet the old offerings prefigure his perfect offering (10:1) and he shares with Aaron a divinely instituted high-priestly ministry (5:1ff.), albeit of a different order. His unique offering makes all other offerings superfluous apart from that of praise (13:15), which, after the model of Abel and Abraham (11:4, 17), is made in faith.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. The apostolic fathers almost always use the term for "to sacrifice." They find in the OT offerings either examples (1 Clem. 10.7) or types (Barn. 7.3, 5). Did. 14 sees in the eucharist a fulfilment of Mal. 1:11 (cf. 1 Clem. 44.4). Diog. 3.3 has pagan sacrifices in view.

1. This word has various meanings, including "sacrifice" (as gift or act).

2. In the NT it denotes Levitical offerings in Heb. 10:5, Christ's sacrifice in Heb. 10:10, and the offering of pagans won for or by the gospel in Rom. 15:16.

3. In the apostolic fathers Barn. 2.4ff. rejects prosphoraí as superfluous but 1 Clem. 40.2ff. uses the OT order as a model and Mart. Pol. 14.1 compares the martyr to a choice offering.

symphérō, sýmphoros.

A. The Group in Greek.

I. Meaning.

1. symphérō. This word has such varied meanings as "to gather," "to bring," "to be of use, service, or advantage," "to assist," "to suit," "to agree," "to yield or turn to," "to unite," "to correspond," "to be like," "to be construed with" (in grammar), and, in the passive, "to happen."

2. sýmphoros. This word means "accompanying," "suiting," or "useful."

3. Synonyms. The ōpheléō group gives the idea of advantage more of the sense of help, but there is little difference of sense in the case of lysiteléō.

II. Philosophical Discussion.

1. The Pre-Socratics. The synonyms are interchangeable in the philosophical discussion of what is useful. Nothing clear-cut emerges in pre-Socratic fragments, but belligerence diverts attention from the useful, the sense of what is useful forges an alliance against animals, and hedonistic ideas of the useful may be discerned.

2. The Sophists. The Sophists teach the relative nature of the useful. The stronger find it in following natural law, the weaker in the curtailments imposed by the laws of the state.

3. Socrates. Opposing the Sophists, Socrates virtually equates the useful and the good. The useful bears a final reference to society, i.e., the pólis, and can be equated concretely with laws. It also applies in discussion of the afterlife.

4. Post-Socratic Philosophy.

a. Aristotle, too, equates the useful and the good.

b. Historians laud various deeds as useful for a given polis.

c. Stoicism is close to Socrates. Ultimately the useful is what promotes piety. Since individuals are world citizens, individual and general profit coincide. Failure to see this brings meaningless conflict. The good and the useful are identical, but only where there is free self-determination.

d. For Epicurus the useful is what serves the ethical goal of hēdonḗ; it is thus the criterion of striving toward this goal, e.g., by promoting fellowship.

B. The OT. In Is. 48:17 God's teaching is of profit, but in 1 Sam. 12:21; Is. 44:9-10 false gods are useless, as are lying speeches in Jer. 7:8, false prophets in 23:32, the magicians of Babylon in Is. 47:12, and unlawful possessions in Prov. 10:2. The wicked ask what good it is to pray to God in Job 21:15, Prov. 11:4 considers profit in the day of wrath, and Eliphaz accuses Job of unprofitable talk in Job 15:3 and thinks the wise are profitable only to themselves and not to God in 22:2-3.

C. Judaism.

1. The LXX uses symphéron and sýmphoron for various Hebrew terms denoting what is good, suitable, or profitable (cf. Dt. 23:7; Prov. 19:10; Esth. 3:8; 2 Macc. 4:5).

2. Philo's usage falls within the sphere of philosophy, especially Stoicism.

3. Josephus uses the group for "bringing together" and also for what is of use or advantage, always in a secular sense.

4. Qumran uses the corresponding root only in the rendering of Is. 48:17.

5. The Testaments of the Twelve calls profitable both the conduct of the righteous and what God gives them.

6. Rabbinic texts contain terms denoting profit, advantage, or success, e.g., in business, claims, or petitions. Discussion arises as to which of two courses or of two evils is better or more advantageous. The profit in view is the avoidance of judgment, as when it is said that it would have been better for the wicked to have been born blind. Better shame in this world than the loss of salvation in the next!

D. The NT.

I. Usage.

1. symphérō means "to bring together" only in Acts 19:19. It means "to profit" in 1 Cor. 6:12; 2 Cor. 8:10; Mt. 15:29; 19:10; Jn. 18:14, etc.

2. tó sýmphoron for "profit," "advantage" occurs in 1 Cor. 7:35; 10:33.

II. Meaning.

1. In Mt. 5:29-30 the loss of one member that incites to sin is better than the destruction of the whole person. In this case the profit is entrance into life. The same applies in Mt. 18:6, where drowning is better for the seducers of little ones than eternal perdition.

2. In Jn. 11:50ff. Caiaphas perceives profit in Christ's death, although without realizing that this profit is the gathering of God's scattered children, a process that reaches its goal only in the heavenly world (14:3; 17:24). In Jn. 16:7ff. Christ's departure profits the present life of believers through the sending of the Spirit.

3. Paul uses the group for what profits the spiritual life. Fornication as union with the body of a harlot is inimical to union with Christ, and hence does not profit (1 Cor. 6:12). As regards marriage, Paul seeks what is profitable both for individuals and for the church (1 Cor. 7:35). He himself seeks the advantage of others

(1 Cor. 10:33). He speaks hesitantly about visions because there is no good in boasting (2 Cor. 12:1). What edifies is profitable (1 Cor. 10:23; 12:7). The collection as a demonstration of love is of profit (2 Cor. 8:10). Paul preaches all the things that are profitable (Acts 20:20). Profit lies, not in promotion of the pólis or the cosmos, nor in what serves the national theocracy, but in what builds up the church, whose políteuma is in heaven (Phil. 3:20).

4. Heb. 12:10 describes present sufferings as a divine discipline that is for our good, whether in present perfecting or, as is more likely, in eternal participation in God's holiness.

E. The Apostolic Fathers. Ignatius finds profit in that which leads to eternal fellowship with Christ (Romans 5.3). Barnabas finds what is profitable in moral perfection (4.12) or in eternal life (4.10). Hermas commends as profitable the words of the old lady (Visions 1.3.3), a walk according to the commandments (Similitudes 6.1.3), and delight in good works (Similitudes 6.5.7), since these things serve the attainment of life. The profit of an upright life is at issue in Mandates 6.1.3ff.

phóros.

A. Outside the NT.

1. Literally this word means "carrying or bringing," then "tribute," "tax," "dues," "payment," and in the papyri "lease," "rent," or "hire."

2. Hebrew equivalents mean "gift," then "tribute," "tax."

3. The rabbis have various terms for levies, tributes, taxes, etc.

4. The LXX mostly uses phóros for "tribute" (2 Chr. 36:3) or "forced labor" (Judg. 1:29ff.).

5. Philo contrasts taxes for the priests with the phóroi paid to secular authorities. 6. Josephus uses phóros or phóroi for tribute paid to foreign rulers.

B. The NT.

1. In Rom. 13:6-7, Lk. 20:22, and Mk. 12:14 phóros means "tribute" paid to a foreign ruler. At issue is a land tax or poll tax as distinct from a toll or business tax (télē). The phóros poses for Jews the alternative of loyalty or treason to God as the only Lord. This is what confronts Jesus with a dilemma in Mk. 12:13ff. and parallels. The Pharisees support payment, the Zealots oppose it, but Jesus lifts the problem onto another plane. He abandons God's claim in the restricted sense but raises it again in an unrestricted sense, anchoring the answer in eschatological fulfilment of the kingdom, and leaving it to responsible individual decision to fill out today the content of giving to God the things that are his.

2. In Lk. 23:2 Jesus is accused of inciting the people not to pay the phóros, but Pilate's declaration of Jesus' innocence exposes the charge as false. The accusation shows that the point of the question in 20:20 is to entrap Jesus.

3. Although we know nothing of the detailed situation of the church in Rome when Paul wrote Rom. 13, we may assume that believers there have adopted a latently negative attitude to the state. Yet they pay taxes without demur (v. 6), and on this basis Paul exhorts to obedience, pointing out that rulers fulfil a divinely given function. The requirement in v. 7 should not be seen as the climax of the passage. It is repeated in a general form in v. 8; the essential Christian obligation is that of showing respect and displaying love. This obligation sets the duty to authorities within the larger duty to all people, and especially to fellow believers.

1. This word, expressing continuous action, means "to carry forward," or "to keep carrying" (e.g., water from the well, or food to animals). It is used particularly, however, for wearing clothes, carrying weapons, and habitual standing. In the absolute it means "to endure."

2. The term is rare in the LXX. Wisdom is carried on the tongue in Prov. 3:16, and destruction in the mouth in 16:26.

3. Josephus uses the word for wearing clothes and for what is customary.

4. In the NT the authorities bear the sword in Rom. 13:4, clothes are worn in Mt. 11:8, Jesus wears the crown of thorns and a purple robe in Jn. 19:5, and the bearing of the image of the earthly and heavenly man is the point in 1 Cor. 15:49.

5. In 1 Clem. 5.6 Paul carries fetters, and in Hermas Similitudes 9.13ff. there is reference to bearing the name or power of the Son of God, or of the names and garments of virgins and their spirits (representing Christian virtues).

1. This word has such senses as "freight," "lading," "burden," "goods," and a child in the womb. "Burdening" with cares, sickness, etc. is another sense.

2. The OT equivalent šḥd has such senses as "bearing," "burden," "tribute," "toll," or "trouble."

3. The LXX uses phortíon for "burden" (Is. 46:1), "burden of sin" (Ps. 38:4), the "burden" one person is for another (Job 7:20), and "load" (of wood) (Judg. 9:48-49).

4. The rabbis use the Hebrew in various ways for "bearing," "business," "occupation," "burden," "obligation," or "duty."

5. In the NT ship's "cargo" is the meaning in Acts 27:10. In Mt. 23:4 Jesus chides the scribes and Pharisees for imposing overheavy burdens with their interpretation of the law, which leads people away from God by substituting ritualistic requirements for the real concerns of justice, mercy, and faith, i.e., a right relationship to others and to God. In contrast, Jesus himself promises rest to those who accept his light phortíon (Mt. 11:28ff.), i.e., the discipleship which means fellowship with himself and unity with the will of God. In Gal. 6:5 Paul probably has in view much the same thing as in 2 Cor. 10:12ff. and 1 Cor. 3:10ff., where he speaks about the task or work that is entrusted to each and that each must accomplish in the power of God. The same thought is present in Rom. 14:12. The negative image of the load or burden is appropriate in view of accountability in the judgment.

1. This word means "to load on a ship," then "to ship," and in a transferred sense "to burden (oneself) with."

2. The LXX has the word in Ezek. 16:33 for "to present with," i.e., to load with gifts.

3. In the NT Jesus in Lk. 11:46 accuses the lawyers of loading the people with burdens, i.e., with legal demands. In Mt. 11:28 he invites the heavy-laden to come to himself for rest. Liberation from burdens of all kinds is part of his eschatological message, but release from the burdens of scribal piety is especially in view. Mt. 12 offers illustrations of liberation from various troubles in spite of legalistic Pharisaic opposition. [K. WEISS, IX, 56-87]

phthánō [to precede, arrive at], prophthánō [to come before, do before]

l. Secular Greek. This common verb means "to come, do, or be first," "to overtake." The comparative element fades out to yield the sense "to reach." The compound is a stronger form.

2. Hellenistic Judaism.

a. The LXX uses phthánō for a Hebrew term meaning "to show oneself ready," "to do quickly," "to accomplish." In the absolute the word means "to attain," "to reach," "to come to." prophthánō means "to come before" (Ps. 17:13) or "to meet" (Job 30:27).

b. In Philo we find the weaker sense "to attain to" or "to come before." "To come before" is the usual sense in Josephus.

3. The NT.

a. The original sense occurs in the NT only in 1 Th. 4: 15 ("to precede"). The compound follows ancient usage in Mt. 17:25.

b. The meaning "to arrive at" occurs in 1 Th. 2:16; Rom. 9:31; Phil. 3:16; 2 Cor. 10:14. Paul has reached the Corinthians with the gospel, we are to hold fast what we have attained, Israel has not attained what it sought, and as the Jews oppose the gospel God's wrath has come upon them at last (or totally). In Mt. 12:28 Jesus' expelling of demons by the Spirit means that God's kingdom has come; it is present in his person.

4. Apostolic Fathers. 2 Clem. 8:2 uses the compound in the sense "to do before." [G. FITZER, IX, 88-92]

phtheírō [to destroy, corrupt], phthorá [destruction, corruption], phthartós [perishable], áphthartos [imperishable], aphtharsía [imperishability], aphthoría [soundness], diaphtheírō [to destroy, corrupt], diaphthorá [destruction, corruption], kataphtheírō [to destroy, corrupt]

A. The Greek World.

I. General Usage.

1. phtheírō means "to destroy," middle and passive "to perish." It is often used for "to kill" ("to be killed"), but may also mean "to languish" (e.g., in prison). Economic ruin may also be in view. In curses the meaning may be "be damned" or more weakly "be off." Another sense is "to spoil" (e.g., milk). The loss of food or of animals may sometimes be denoted.

2. phthorá means "destruction," "death," "shipwreck," etc.

3. A moral sense is "to lead astray," "to ruin," "to seduce," "to corrupt," "to bribe."

4. In various combinations diaphtheírō means "to frustrate" or "to weaken."

II. Philosophical Usage.

1. Older philosophy. Greek philosophy opposes perishing to becoming. The cosmos abides, the parts are subject to corruption. Or else the elements abide, while forms are perishable. The concern is to find what is permanent in the flux of nature.

2. Aristotle. For Aristotle the corruptible and incorruptible condition one another. ousía as such has no share in becoming or perishing, but ousíai do, and archaí (principles or elements) are preceded by prior archaí. Distinctions arise in the concepts of perishing and change. In nature phthorá (death) comes through lack of heat or of blood, and áphthartos in this connection means "long-lived." Ethically phtheírō is the opposite of sṓzō ("to uphold").

3. Later Hellenistic Period. The antonyms phthartón-áphtharton increasingly acquire a religious rather than a natural or ontological sense in a contrast of the divine world and the earthly. What is immutable does not lie in the cosmos, in its principles, or elements, or abiding relations, but in what transcends it, although Plutarch can still call the atoms or the all incorruptible.

B. The OT and Judaism.

I. The OT. In the LXX phtheírō is the rendering of Heb. šḥt, which carries the various senses of corruption, e.g., decay, destruction, depravity, or disfigurement (Jer. 13:7; 48:18; Ex. 32:7; Is. 52:14). Other equivalents mean “to dry out” (Judg. 16:7), “to fade” (Is. 24:4), and “to leave empty” (Is. 32:6).

II. Palestinian Judaism.

1. Qumran. The Qumran scrolls use such phrases as the snares, waves, arrows, or gates of destruction. The destruction of a land may be meant but also eternal destruction, and, of course, moral corruption.

2. Talmudic and Midrashic Writings. In these works we find various words meaning “to ruin,” “to mar,” “to destroy,” “to take by force,” “to wrong,” “to injure,” “to wound,” or, in the case of the nouns, “pit,” “moral ruin,” “injury,” “damage,” “destruction,” “mutilation,” and “destruction.”

III. Hellenistic Judaism.

1. The Greek OT. For the Hebrew terms the LXX uses the phtheírō group with reference to killing, to blemishes in offerings, to destruction, to the pit, to moral corruption, to overthrow, to laying waste, and to fading or sinking down exhausted.

2. Josephus. In Josephus the group signifies “to kill,” “to drive off,” “to perish,” or, as a noun, “bloodshed,” “massacre,” “destruction,” “harm,” “annihilating defeat.” In the moral field the term denotes “seduction,” “bribery,” or “moral corruption” in general.

3. Philo. In Philo we find references to corruptibility as well as to killing or destruction. The cosmos falls victim to corruption, but the eternal is incorruptible. Only God can guarantee our preservation. The world of becoming and perishing stands in antithesis to the inner incorruptible world of God’s making. When the soul has the vision of what is incorruptible it finds release from temporal and inauthentic things. Virtues enjoy immortality, the life of virtue and wisdom is immortal, the good is immortal, and Abraham enjoys immortality after death. Philo also uses the group for moral corruption.

4. Other Works. In the Testaments of the Twelve we fill the normal use for “destruction” or “moral corruption.” Humans are mortal (2 Macc. 7:16), as are life’s goods (Test. Benj. 6:2) and idols (Wis. 14:8), but God’s Spirit is immortal (Wis. 12:1), and so is the light shed by the law (18:4). To keep the commandments is an assurance of immortality (6:18-19), and the victory of martyrs is immortality (4 Macc. 17:12).

C. The NT.

1. Real Sense. Rev. 11:18 uses diaphtheírō for destruction by God’s judgment (cf. phtheírō in 1 Cor. 3:17). The destruction of ships is the point in Rev. 8:9 and of clothes in Lk. 12:33. To ruin economically is perhaps Paul’s ironical point in 2 Cor. 7:2. In the metaphor in 1 Cor. 3:17 he has in mind the destruction of the temple, not inner corruption. Foods are destined for destruction in Col. 2:22, and as irrational animals are born to be destroyed in 2 Pet. 2:12, so false teachers will perish in the judgment (rather than in their conduct). “Decay” is the sense in the quotation from Ps. 16 in Acts 2:27, 31; 13:34ff.

2. Moral and Religious Sense. 1 Cor. 15:33 quotes Menander, and in 2 Cor. 11:3 the allusion to Eve shows that the thoughts of the Corinthians are subject to perversion. A corrupt mind is the point in 1 Tim. 6:5; 2 Tim. 3:8, and the “old man” is corrupt or degenerate in Eph. 4:22. Rev. 11:18 refers to those who corrupt or seduce the human race (cf. the harlot of 19:2). In Tit. 2:7 what is in view is not impregnability against false teaching, nor doctrine safeguarded by the truth, but the character of Titus as one who is not, and cannot be, corrupted.

3. Ideal Sense. The group often has human corruptibility in view. The outward man experiences the process of dying in 2 Cor. 4:16. Humanity is mortal (Rom. 1:23), its goals are mortal (1 Cor. 9:25), and it needs a new mode of being (1 Cor. 15:53) which is made possible, not by corruptible means, but by the indestructible blood of Christ (1 Pet. 1:18). Over against perishable seed stands the imperishable word of God by which believers are born anew (1 Pet. 1:23). What is corruptible is subject to futility (Rom. 8:20-21); in contrast stands freedom from decay and the glorious liberty of God's children. But corruptibility also corresponds to the sárx, and not just to flesh and blood. In distinction from "life," it thus means "eternal destruction" (Gal. 1:8). Moral failure means corruption but also falling under the spell of corruptibility (2 Pet. 1:4; 2:19). The dead will rise incorruptible (1 Cor. 15:52). God is immortal (1 Tim. 1:17), and so is the Christian inheritance (1 Pet. 1:4). A quiet spirit is an imperishable jewel (1 Pet. 3:4). In Eph. 6:24 incorruptibility and grace characterize the new life if aphtharsía goes with cháris, but if it goes with Christ or those who love him it denotes the new mode of being, and if it has a general reference it simply means "in eternity." With "life" aphtharsía marks the future eternal life that Christ has brought into a corruptible world (2 Tim. 1:10). As an eschatological blessing it will be manifested with the parousia (1 Cor. 15:42, 50, 53-54). It is to be sought here (Rom. 2:7) but remains hidden until Christ comes.

D. The Early Church. The antithesis of the corruptible-incorruptible plays a bigger part in the early church under growing Hellenistic influence. Diog. 2.4-5 opposes the designation of corruptible things as gods, and 9.2 says that Christ alone is incorruptible. The natural heart is corruptible in Barn. 16.7. tá phthartá are perishable goods, and phthorá is corruptibility (Ignatius Romans 7.3). Christ, the true temple, and the agápē are imperishable (Diog. 9.2; Barn. 16.9; Ignatius Romans 7.3). So is the crown of victory (Mart. Pol. 17.1). Christ leads to immortality (2 Clem. 20.5), which comes already through the gospel (Ignatius Ephesians 17.1; Philadelphians 9.2; Mart. Pol. 14.2). [G. HARDER, IX, 93-106]

philágathos* → agathós; philadelphia, philádelphos → *adelphós

philanthrōpía [hospitality], philanthrṓpōs [benevolently, kindly]

A. The Greek World.

1. Occurrence and Meaning. Found from the fifth century B.C., this group at first denotes friendly relations, especially of the gods or rulers etc. to those under them, then more generally, and with such nuances as "hospitality," "clemency," "usefulness," and "tip" or "present."

2. The Greek-Hellenistic World. Primarily deities are philánthrōpoi, then rulers and outstanding people. philanthrōpía is a virtue in popular ethics and later in philosophical ethics. Human philanthrōpía imitates that of the gods and is demanded of rulers. Julian regards it as the typical quality of the Hellenes and Romans and requires it of officials and pagan priests. It takes the form of clemency in punishment and aid in distress.

B. The LXX and Hellenistic Judaism.

1. In the LXX the word occurs in apocryphal works with the same senses as in the Greek and Hellenistic tradition (cf. 2 Macc. 9:27; Wis. 12:19).

2. The Epistle of Aristeas argues that rulers can practice it only in obedience to God (208).

3. Josephus calls the generous conduct of the Romans philanthrōpía (Antiquities 12.124). He also refers to God's philanthrōpía (16.42).

4. Philo integrates the virtue into his thinking (On Virtues 51). The friend of God must also be aphilanthrōpos (On the Decalogue 110). philanthrōpía embraces enemies, slaves, animals, and even plants, as well as compatriots. It determines God's own actions in creation and in Israel's history (On the Creation of the World 81; On the Life of Moses 1. 198).

C. The NT. The group is marginal in the NT. The centurion acts philanthrōpōs when he lets Paul visit friends in Sidon (Acts 27:3), and the inhabitants of Malta show philanthrōpía (aid or hospitality) after the shipwreck (28:2). God's philanthrōpía comes to expression in the Christ event (Tit. 3:4), i.e., in regeneration and renewal by the Spirit through Christ. God is no remote and alien God but has condescended to us and placed our life under the concrete obedience that issues in right conduct to others (vv. 1ff.).

D. The Early Church. The early writers also hesitate to make much use of the group. Justin Dialogue 47 refers to the philanthrōpía of God (cf. Diog. 9.2). Acts of Thomas 170 calls Christ philánthrōpos. Clement of Alexandria and Origen begin to use the group more freely both for the work of God or Christ and for Christian conduct.

philéō [to love, kiss], kataphiléō [to kiss], phílēma [kiss], philos [friend], phílē [female friend], philía [friendship, love] philéō, kataphiléō, phílēma.

A. Common Greek Usage.

1. With personal Object.

a. The stem phil- is of uncertain etymology but carries the sense of "related." Hence philéō means "to treat somebody as one of one's own people." It is used for the love of spouses, of parents and children, of employers and servants, of friends, and of gods and those favored by them.

b. With reference to gods and friends it often has the concrete sense "to help," "to care for," "to entertain."

c. It can also denote sexual love.

d. It often approximates agapáō in meaning and use but is more common than agapáō in secular Greek (not in the LXX or NT) and has more of the sense "to love" in distinction from "to like," although the verbs are often interchangeable and in the NT agapáō is the warmer and deeper term.

2. With Neuter Object. With a neuter object the sense of philéō is "to like," "to value."

3. With Infinitive. Common phrases are "to like doing" and "to be accustomed to doing."

4. philéō ("To Kiss"), kataphiléō, phílēma.

a. Usage. Unlike agapáō, philéō can be used for acts of affection, e.g., fondling and especially kissing. Increasingly kataphiléō is used when the meaning is "to kiss," and from Aeschylus to the NT the noun for "kiss" is always phílēma.

b. The Kiss in Antiquity.

LXX Septuagint

NT New Testament

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

(a) The animistic idea of conveying the soul perhaps underlies kissing on the mouth or nose. But the aim of knowing and enjoying the related person by scent may also play a role.

(b) Kisses are for relatives, rulers, and those one loves. The primary intent is not erotic. Respect as well as affection is shown by the kiss. To kiss the ruler is a privilege; the ruler's kiss is a supreme honor. Later we find the erotic kiss, including the widespread homosexual kiss.

(c) Kisses are on the mouth, hands, and feet, also on the cheeks, forehead, eyes, and shoulders. As a mark of respect the kiss is usually on the hands or feet. The kiss on the mouth becomes prominent only with the erotic kiss.

(d) Occasions of kissing are greeting, parting, reconciling, making contracts, etc. The kiss signals entry into a fraternity. In the mysteries the initiate kisses the mystagogue. Kissing is common in the games; there is even a kissing contest, and kisses are sometimes given as prizes.

(e) With pleasure in kissing we find warnings against excess and against the danger of demonic infection or cultic defilement.

(f) Cultic kisses are important (cf. the kissing of images, divine kissing as a means of healing, kissing substitutes, e.g., the earth in front of idols rather than the idols, blowing kisses to stellar deities or as a hasty sign of reverence when passing shrines or tombs).

B. The LXX.

I. Usage.

1. In the LXX philéō, which is less common than agapáō, is mostly used for ’hb. In meaning it is very similar to agapáō. "To like" with a neuter object occurs six times (e.g., Gen. 27:4; Hos. 3:1; Prov. 21:17), and "to like to do" once (Is. 56:10). With a personal object philéō can sometimes mean "to prefer" (Gen. 37:4) and is used five times for sensual love (cf. Tob. 6:15; Lam. 1:2).

2. For "to kiss" philéō and kataphiléō are used for nšq. The noun phílēma occurs for the kiss of the beloved in Cant. 1:2 and the treacherous kiss of the enemy in Prov. 27:6.

II. The Kiss in the OT and Judaism.

1. The transmission of soul-breath by kissing seems to be the point in Gen. 2:7; 2 Kgs. 4:34 (cf. also the kiss at the consecration of the king in 1 Sam. 10:1).

2. Relatives kiss in Gen. 31:28; 50:1; 2 Sam. 14:33; Gen. 33:4; 29:11; Ex. 18:7, etc. The kiss of respect occurs in 2 Sam. 19:40.

3. The kiss on the lips becomes the true kiss (cf. Prov. 24:26), but the kiss of honor is a kiss on the hands or feet (although in the OT it is the nations, not Israel, that are to kiss the feet of the Lord, Ps. 2:11).

4. Kissing is common in salutations and at partings (Gen. 29:11; 31:28). It is also a sign of reconciliation (33:4), ratifies an adoption (48:10), and is given in blessing (27:26-27).

5. The kisses of harlots are rejected (Prov. 7:13), and so are erotic kisses in general; the praise of the erotic kiss in Cant. 1:2 is acceptable to the rabbis only when the work is allegorized.

6. The OT has nothing comparable to cultic kisses. In Judaism the kiss of God brings death (on the basis of a misunderstanding of Dt. 34:5). God's kiss is the easiest form of death among the 903 forms distinguished by the rabbis.

C. The NT.

I. "To Love."

---

cf. confer, compare

OT Old Testament

1. With Neuter Object and Infnitive. Like the LXX, the NT prefers agapáō to philéō. Only John makes a more theological use of philéō. philéō is never used for love of God, and neither it nor agapáō ever denotes erotic love. The use of philéō is mostly in stereotyped expressions. With a neuter object we find it only in Mt. 23:6-7, and an infinitive follows in 23:7. The passage serves to characterize the complacency and ambition of the scribes and Pharisees (cf. Lk. 20:46; 11:43).

2. With Personal Object.

a. The Synoptists. The only instance is in Mt. 10:37, where the meaning is "to prefer." Placing love for himself above love for relatives, Jesus claims the superabundance of love that is due to God (cf. Lk. 14:26).

b. John.

(a) In Jn. 15:19 the basic sense "to love what is one's own" is plain. The love of Jesus for his own (ídioi) corresponds to the world's love for its own, for what belongs to it (ídion). In Jn. 12:25 Jesus demands an uncompromising renunciation of self-love (cf. Lk. 17:33; Mt. 10:39; Mk. 8:35). Although love of self may serve as a criterion for love of neighbor (Mk. 12:31), denial of self is a presupposition of salvation. In the context of Jn. 12:24 it may take the form of forfeiture of life. In Jn. 11:3, 36 love of friends is the point, but Lazarus is specially chosen and he is called "our friend" rather than "my friend" (11:11).

(b) A special form of friendship is the love of Jesus for the beloved disciples. philéō denotes this love only in Jn. 20:2; agapáō is used in 13:23; 19:26; 21:7, 10. The idea of choice is evident here. Lying close to Jesus' breast at table expresses unique intimacy (13:25). This friend is the supreme disciple as Jesus is the supreme Son (cf. Jn. 1:18). Both are primary witnesses—the disciple to Jesus, Jesus to the Father (cf. 19:35; 21:7, 24). The beloved disciple is also the supreme brother, so that Jesus entrusts his mother to him (20:7). He takes precedence even over Peter in reaching the empty tomb (20:4) and then in believing (20:8). Jn. 21:24 identifies the beloved disciple as the author of chs. 1-20, and tradition has equated him with John the son of Zebedee (who is not mentioned by name in John), although other candidates are Lazarus (cf. 11:3), the rich young ruler (Mk. 10:21), the timid disciple of Mk. 14:51-52, Paul, or the so—called elder John. Some scholars have seen in the beloved disciple the ideal believer or witness, a projection of the author and his community into the history of Jesus, an embodiment of Gentile Christianity, or a representative of prophetic ministry over against Peter's pastoral ministry. But a specific disciple is clearly in view, although the circumlocutions prevent us from identifying him with any certainty. In the figure of the beloved disciple the gospel claims that its presentation is the abiding form of the gospel with Christ's own validation, especially in relation to the decisive events of the crucifixion and resurrection.

(c) In Jn. 16:27 the disciples meet Jesus' demand that they should love him by believing in him, and to their love for Jesus corresponds the reciprocal love of the Father for them. There is perhaps some distinction here from God's general love for the world in Jn. 3:16. Yet God's love of the disciples may also be expressed by agapáō (cf. 14:21, 23), just as philéō and agapáō may both denote the Father's love of the Son (5:20; 3:35, etc.). Only agapáō, however, is used for Jesus' love of the disciples (13:1), their love of one another (13:34), and Jesus' love of the Father (14:31). John nowhere refers to the disciples' love of the Father.

(d) Alternation between agapáō and philéō occurs in Jn. 21:15ff. Some exegetes think that Peter is grieved because Jesus uses philéō the third time (21:17), but the words are mostly synonymous in John, and Peter is more likely grieved because Jesus asks for a third time. Jesus demands that Peter love him "more than these" (v. 15) because he has for him a special commission, which is threefold like the threefold denial and the threefold affirmation of a special love. The exceptional love corresponds in some sense to the love of Jesus for the beloved disciple and underlies Peter's twofold discipleship in his pastoral office and his death.

c. The Rest of the NT.

(a) In 1 Cor. 16:22 Paul seems to be using a fixed liturgical formula connected with the eucharist. Grace is only for those who confess their love for the Lord by word and deed, i.e., in a total orientation of faith to him. An epistolary formula occurs in Tit. 3:15 but with a Christian significance imparted by "in the faith" and a certain exclusiveness suggested by the "us." Love for the apostle is the bond that unites the churches in a special way.

(b) In Rev. 3:19 the exalted Lord uses an OT phrase (Prov. 3:12 LXX): His chastening love (cf. 1 Cor. 11:32) is no other than God's own love. The background is not so much that of the friend of God who finds fulfilment of fellowship in the common meal but that of the parental love that manifests itself to the erring child in correction that leads to repentance. Another current formula may well be present in Rev. 22:15, where we have a concluding phrase that characterizes the prior concepts in an absolute antithesis to the love of God (cf. the parallel ideas in Jn. 3:19; 1 Jn. 2:15; Jms. 4:4).

II. The Kiss in the NT.

1. Manner and Occasion. The NT does not mention the erotic kiss, nor the kiss between close relatives except in Lk. 15:20, but we find the greeting kiss in Lk. 7:45; 15:20; perhaps 22:47, the parting kiss in Acts 20:37, and the kiss of honor in Lk. 7:38, 45; perhaps 22:47-48. The kiss is a mark of penitence in Lk. 7:44ff., of reconciliation in Lk. 15:20, and of gratitude in Acts 20:37, and we find a liturgical kiss in 1 Th. 5:26; 1 Cor. 16:20; 2 Cor. 13:12; Rom. 16:16. Before the eucharist the kiss confirms and actualizes the unity of the church as the eschatological family of God; it also points ahead to the eschatological consummation, to the future fellowship of the perfected.

2. The Kiss of Judas. In Mk. 14:44-45 the kiss of Judas is obviously a sign of recognition. Whether it is actually given is left an open question in Lk. 22:47-48. Betrayal by one of the Twelve with a kiss is a fulfilment of prophecy in Jn. 13:18; 17:12 (cf. Mk. 14:18). The kiss is perhaps a kiss of greeting or a kiss of brotherhood; but it is perhaps also a kiss of feigned love and respect, open to severe condemnation as a misuse of the sign of affection.

D. The Post-NT Period.

I. The Early Church.

1. In spite of ascetic tendencies the kiss is still common in the early church between relatives and married couples, and Hermas Similitudes 9.11.4 finds a special use for the erotic kiss (cf. also 9.15.2).

2.a. More important is the cultic kiss. Justin mentions the eucharistic kiss in Apology 65.2. Tertullian attaches great significance to the kiss of peace as a sign of reconciliation (De oratione 18). For Cyril of Jerusalem and Chrysostom it is a sign of the unity of the body. In the west it comes immediately before communion and it is called either the kiss of peace or simply the peace. Yet objections to the kiss arise early, especially pagan suspicion and the danger of erotic perversion (Athenagoras Supplication 32). Hence Clement of Alexandria in Paedagogus 3.81.2ff. demands a mystical kiss in which the mouth remains closed. From the third century the sexes are separated for the kiss (Apostolic Constitutions 2.57. 17), and then the clergy and laity (8.11.9).

b. The liturgical kiss occurs twice in baptism, first as the kiss of the bishop pronouncing the reconciliation and acceptance of the candidates, then as the kiss whereby the newly baptized grant their new brothers and sisters a share in the imparted grace and power of peace.

c. Many liturgies include the kiss of peace in the consecration of a bishop, a priest, or a monk.

d. We also read of the kiss at the burial of the dead.

e. The kiss occurs, too, in the honoring of martyrs. Believers kiss them in prison, especially kissing their wounds or their chains, and they kiss one another before execution. We also read of the kissing of their graves, their relics, and the thresholds of their churches.

f. Among substitute kisses we find the kissing of doorposts and altars. Kissing altars is important since they point to Christ. Cf. also the kissing of icons, the cup, and the book of the gospel. In the west we find the kissing tablet which the priest hands communicants to kiss.

II. Gnosticism. In Gnosticism the kiss is a favorite symbol for union with the redeemer and the reception of immortal life thereby. The sacrament of the bridal chamber is the supreme sacrament and the mutual kiss is the means of mystical conception. Important kisses are Jesus’ kissing of Mary Magdalene, his kissing of his heavenly twin, and the kiss on Mani’s entry into the realm of light.

phílos, philē, philia.

A. Nonbiblical Antiquity.

I. Meaning of the Words.

1. phílos.

a. This word means “friend,” “loved one,” “lover,” “client.”

b. hetaíros is a more or less interchangeable term.

c. Another related term is ídios.

d. The syngenēs may also be identical with the phílos, since relatives and friends form the closest living circle. The two words may also be related in a transferred sense. Popular usage prefers to link phílos with individual degrees of close relationship, parents and brethren.

e. The common idea of friends of the king brings a close connection to sýmboulos (“counselor”).

f. phílos is close to sýmmachos for nations in alliance.

g. Since the whole phil- group can denote hospitality, we often find phílos with xénos, the “stranger.”

2. phílē. This word means “dearest,” “beloved,” sometimes with an erotic nuance, but also at times for a female friend. phílē is a proper name which is used for Aphrodite, for hetaerae, and also for honorable women. Finally, we find phílē as a political title.

3. philía.

a. This word means “love” or “friendship” with the same broad range of meaning as phílos. The strongest ties of philía are love of parents, brothers and sisters, or spouse.

b. The term also denotes erotic love, both heterosexual and homosexual.

c. Friendship is commonly the sense, with such nuances as a “pleasant relationship” and “hospitality.”

d. In politics the word means “alliance.”

e. In a transferred sense it means “harmony” as a principle of unity.

f. Philía becomes a proper name, e.g., for Isis.

g. Special meanings are friendship with animals (either positive or negative), the kiss as a sign of loving fellowship, and philía as a formal address or title.

II. Friendship in Antiquity.

1. Antiquity writes a great deal about friendship both in special works and in sections of larger works.

2. There are various proverbs about friendship. The motif of koinōnía is common, the idea of “one soul” is attributed to Aristotle, and the friend counts as one’s other self.

3. We find groups of friends, but personal friendship is the heart of the matter for the Greeks. Hence the pair is the true ideal (cf. Achilles and Patroclus, or Orestes and Pylades). Partly historical and partly fictional accounts of pairs of friends are passed down, usually with one of the pair more active or older than the other. The supreme duty of the friend is that of self-sacrifice for the other even to the point of death.

B. The OT and Judaism.

I. Usage.

1. phílos. In the OT phílos renders various Hebrew terms but only in 70 out of some 180 cases is there an original. Meanings range from “personal friend” by way of “friend of the family” and “best man” to “client” or “political supporter,” as well as “friend of the king.” Related terms are adelphós, hetaíros, plēsíon, sýmboulos, and sýmmachos.

b. Philo’s usage is much the same.

2. philía. Having Hebrew equivalents only in Proverbs (5:19; 10:12; 7:18; 15:17; 17:9; 27:5), this term may denote either erotic love (Prov. 5:19; 7:18) or political friendship (1 Macc. 8:1; 2 Macc. 4:11). From philia, philiázō is a word that the LXX also uses in the senses “to be, act as, or become a friend.”

II. Friendship in the OT and Judaism.

1. The paucity of Hebrew originals for the group shows that the Greek view of friendship is an alien one in the OT world.

2. Yet the story of David and Jonathan ranks with the great accounts of friendship in antiquity. A pact seals the friendship (1 Sam. 8:3-4), Jonathan hands over his cloak and weapons, the pact applies to their children (2 Sam. 21:7), the two love one another as their own life (1 Sam. 18:1), and the story ends with a lament that is a song in praise of friendship (2 Sam. 1:26). Yet the Hebrew has no true term for the relationship, and even the LXX does not use philía.

3. Many friendship sayings occur in Proverbs and Sirach. Most of these take the form of warnings (cf. Sir. 6:8ff.). Many people protest friendship, but true friends are few. Only those who fear God are capable of friendship and will have true friends (Sir. 6:16-17). Political friendships occur (cf. 2 Chr. 19:2; 20:37), and there is reference to a friend of the king in 1 Chr. 27:33 (cf. 1 Kgs. 4:5). In a transferred sense we read of friendship with wisdom (Wis. 8:18).

4. The rabbis apply the concept to the relation between teachers and students of the law. koinōnía is a mark of Qumran (cf. the extolling of friendship among the Essenes in Josephus Jewish War 2.119), but although the community achieves a high degree of communal life (the sharing of lodging, food, knowledge, talents, and work), the strict ranking seems to militate against true friendship.

5. Philo speaks about friendship with God. The patriarchs are examples, but all the righteous may be called God’s friends. Philo also finds a pair of human friends in Moses and Joshua, and he believes that human friendship is pleasing to God. God, the refuge of friendship, does not despise its rights (Every Good Man Is Free 44).

C. The NT.

1. Usage. phílos occurs 28 times in the NT, phílē and philía once each. The main use is in the Lucan and Johannine writings. phílos occurs in Mt. 11:19; Jms. 2:23; 4:4, and the one instance of philía is in Jms. 4:4.

2.a. Of the 18 instances of phílos, 17 are in Luke (also the one instance of phílē). Jesus, however, is never phílos except in the taunt of 7:34. Mostly the use is the common one found in secular circles. People who are close are in view in Lk. 14:12; 15:6. "Boon-companion" is the point in 7:34. "Personal friend" is meant in Lk. 11:5, 8; 23:12, "guest" in Lk. 11:6, and one of a circle in 7:6; Acts 10:24.

b. The rule of Lk. 14:12 conflicts with the conventions of antiquity by rejecting the principle of reciprocity (cf. Mt. 5:46-47). Jesus breaks down the wall of an exclusiveness of fellowship and love. In Lk. 14:12 friendship and table fellowship are correlative (cf. 15:6, 9, 29). The fact that Jesus eats with publicans and sinners is the basis of the charge that he is their boon-companion (7:34). In fact, he loves sinners and is loved by them, as the washing of his feet, the kiss, and the anointing show (7:37ff.). Hospitality expresses the relation between friendship and table fellowship, as in Lk. 11:5ff. where phítos has almost the sense of "good neighbor" in vv. 5, 8 and of "guest" in v. 6. The friend as neighbor and host must be available for a friend.

c. Joy stands closely related to friendship (cf. Lk. 15:6, 9, 29). Yet friends must be ready, too, for service, concern, and self-sacrifice (11:5ff.). Friends may expect help from one another even when it is inconvenient. Again, friends want to share great experiences (Acts 10:24). Asiarchs, who are Paul's friends, intervene to save him at Ephesus (Acts 19:31). Only here and in Acts 27:3 do we hear of Paul's friends; he himself never uses phílos, but prefers adelphós or téknon. The friends of Paul in 27:3 are not his hosts or personal friends but Christians who care for him. The term "friends" for believers is not peculiar to Luke but occurs in John too (cf. 11:11; 15:13ff.). It seems to be a term used by the first disciples, who as the friends of Jesus and of one another are also the new friends of God and members of his family. If the term drops out of usage, it comes to expression in the life of the primitive church as depicted in Acts 2:44ff.

d. In the final tribulation friends will turn into enemies in an eschatological version of the common experience of the unreliability of friends.

e. Jesus calls his disciples friends in Lk. 12:4. This could be court style but more likely belongs to the imagery of the family of God. Here is not a friendship of equals but that of the Master and his pupils as he teaches them concerning their future tasks and destiny (cf. Jn. 14:26).

f. Certain parables suggest that God is a friend; cf. Lk. 11:5ff.; 14:11 (God as the host at the eschatological banquet); 16:9 (we are to win God as a friend; cf. vv. 5-7); Mt. 11:19 and parallels (Jesus' love for sinners as an enacted parable expressing the message that God is the friend of sinners).

3. Johannine Writings. John uses phílos for "best man" in 3:29 to express the close relationship yet also the subordination of the Baptist to Jesus. The link with joy comes out here and with table fellowship in 12:1ff. (cf. Lk. 10:38ff.). Lazarus is "our friend" in Jn. 11:11. The disciples are friends of Jesus by his free choice (15:13ff.). He remains the Lord, but his commands are commands of love (vv. 14ff.) which he himself fulfils (v. 10). The disciples must show a similar love even to the point of self-offering in death (v. 13). In this regard a rule of friendship serves the NT thought of vicariousness in first a soteriological and then a hortatory sense. 3 John closes with the mutual salutations of friends (v. 15), i.e., fellow believers who are friends by relationship to Jesus. phílos is a political term in Jn. 19:12. Association with the court title is present, but the charge expresses a judgment on Pilate's relation to the emperor rather than his stripping of the title.

4. James. In Jms. 4:4 to seek the friendship of the world is to become an enemy of God. Abraham is the friend of God in 2:23. The OT rather than Greek or Egyptian usage underlies the description. The link with Gen. 15:6 relates "friend of God" to "just by faith," the passive "is called" implies that it is God who gives the title, and the aorist suggests a specific event in Abraham's life. If the works as an expression of faith have a bearing on the title, the emphasis is on the fact that Abraham is one who is loved and chosen by God, and therefore called his friend.

D. The Post-NT Period.

I. The Early Church.

1. Although the group is little used in this period, we find it in NT quotations even where the NT uses agapáō (cf. Did. 1.3; Ignatius Polycarp 2.1; 2 Clem. 6.5). The Gospel of Peter 2.3 presents Joseph of Arimathea as a friend of Pilate as well as Jesus.

2. Abraham is commonly referred to as the friend of God (cf. 1 Clem. 10.1; 17.2; Pseudo-Clementine Homilies 18.13). Moses, too, is God's friend, and those with whom God is well pleased are his children and friends (Aphrahat in Homilies 17.3). True Gnostics, martyrs, and ascetics also receive the title of God's friends (Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Augustine).

3. Apocryphal writings take up the idea that disciples are friends of Jesus (cf. Martyrdom of Peter 10; Acts of John 113).

4. Pagan friendships pose special dangers according to Hermas Mandates 10.1.4. Christians forge new friendships with one another based on their union with Christ (cf. Paulinus of Nola and St. Felix).

5. Hermas Similitudes 5.2.6ff. depicts the heavenly original of a circle of friends with God as ruler at the center. The friends are the archangels to whom creation is committed and who will perfect the church (Similitudes 5.4. 1).

II. Gnosticism. Conversations between the redeemer and the redeemed reflect a special vocabulary of friendship, as in Manichean hymns. At issue is the reciprocity of love in mystical union. [G. STÄHLIN, IX, 113-71]

philosophía [philosophy], philósophos [philosopher]

A. Usage outside the Bible.

1. To Sophism. These words are late constructs. The philo- denotes willing intercourse with people, zealous handling of affairs, or active striving toward a goal. The question of the basis of all things arises in the sixth century B.C., and varied experience and observation are linked to the acquiring of knowledge. The Sophists use philosophéō for methodical research and reflection in ethics. The philósophos is one who, unable to reach true knowledge, achieves practical insight by external study. Since the presentation of things is important, rhetoric forms a good part of philosophía. It attempts to show the truth of things by etymology or logic.

2. Plato and Aristotle.

a. In showing by way of transmigration that humanity is part of the immutable being of ideas, Plato uses the philosoph- group to denote a basic possibility of life. Change comes in dialogical encounter with the philósophos, who is capable of instruction, and is therefore a reorientation. The Platonic school thus takes on the character of a living fellowship. Fundamental is the link between striving for truth and educational and political action.

b. Aristotle uses philosophéō for systematic efforts to understand the world, especially by sensory perception. The aim is to reduce phenomena to principles and hence to achieve knowledge of eternal and unmoved being. philosophía is both knowledge as a whole and the individual discipline. The science devoted to the unmoved mover is the prṓtē philosophía. Physics, dealing with sensory phenomena, is the deutéra philosophía. Aristotle has no comprehensive system that assigns a place to each branch of learning, but he lays a foundation that enables Hellenistic metaphysics both to seek a concept for the unity of the world and to bring all reality within the range of its investigations.

3. The Hellenistic Period.

a. Various schools develop with sharp debates between their representatives, who form the educated class in the state and a special group in politics. With the older Academicians and Peripatetics, Epicurus heads one important school. He makes sensory perception the measure of knowledge. His system banishes superstition and produces a hedonistic ethics. Passionless hēdonē is achieved in a school united in philía. Excessive emotion that might bring about disorders is to be avoided. Although deity is spiritualized, the Epicureans still find a place for the cultus.

b. Zeno establishes Stoicism in Athens ca. 301 B.C. The action of a principle on matter explains becoming. Logic, physics, and ethics are the main fields of inquiry. The goal is progress in right conduct. The term philósophos is not a common one; it is used for those who work in the three areas of philosophy, or for the ideal Stoic sage.

c. Poseidonius gives philosophy the task of probing the basic causes of things. Individual disciplines describe reality, and philosophy utilizes their results to work out the principles or nexus of being. If philosophy is viewed as a living creature, physics is the flesh and blood, logic the sinews, and ethics the soul. Life in the cosmos shares in the divine spirit. This is especially true of human rationality. Union with the divine gives rise to primal religion. As the union dissolves, acquired religions develop, though these owe their force to primal religion. The poet, artist, lawgiver, and philosopher are all interpreters of immortal nature, but the philosopher is the best.

d. With the rise of the empire Rome becomes the center of philosophical debate. Seneca does not agree that arts and crafts are products of philosophy. As Stoic concentration on lifestyle intensifies, philosophy is viewed increasingly as the right way of living. It is a message of salvation for the soul with moral perfection as the goal. In polytheism one may see an expression of the operation of the universal lógos in natural forces. Demons are manifestations of cosmic life, and the daimónion plays a role in personal destiny. As Stoics and Epicureans both seek liberation from stress by education in the art of living, but in different ways, they become bitter rivals.

e. Middle Platonism is eclectic. The goal of philosophy is to achieve likeness to God, which stands related to moral action. Philosophy is also defined as a practicing of death.

4. The Group in Relation to Eastern Wisdom and Religion. Alexander’s campaigns introduce the Greeks to eastern wisdom, which reminds them of Greek philosophy. The Druids and Chaldeans are also seen to relate their lives to wisdom, and the Jews are philósophoí for Clearchus. The Hermetic writings contain a fusion of Greek philosophy with wisdom or mythology which links salvation to knowledge. Tme philosophy is contemplation and piety with an orientation to knowledge of God. Alchemy also uses the

ca. circa, about

group. The philosopher, having insight into the secrets of nature, can bring about transmutations. As an expert in such processes, he shapes his life in a manner suited to his exalted position.

B. Hellenistic Judaism.

1. The LXX. In the LXX the group occurs only in Daniel and 4 Maccabees. The magicians and enchanters of Dan. 1:20 are sóphoi kaí philósophoi. 4 Maccabees links the martyr principle to the Stoic teaching that reason is the mistress of impulse. The Jewish religion teaches three cardinal virtues, and the death of Eleazar demonstrates its philosophical authenticity (5:23-24; 7:9-10).

2. The Epistle of Aristeas. This work stresses the recognition of Jewish wisdom by representatives of Hellenistic learning (200-201). The Jewish envoys reflect philosophical insights with practical living as the main concern (207). Only those who know God can achieve this (256). The law deserves a place in the library at Alexandria inasmuch as it meets Hellenistic criteria (30-31).

3. Philo compares and relates philosophical knowledge and biblical wisdom. Philosophical exegesis elucidates the biblical tradition, which in turn corrects what philosophy teaches. General culture is a prerequisite of virtue, but it is subject to wisdom, and to glorify God is the goal of wisdom. Knowledge begins with sensory perception and leads by contemplation of the cosmos to worship of the Creator. Wisdom forms the link between the Hellenistic tradition and the biblical tradition. Only revelation can bring us to the final stage of knowledge. By revelation Moses stands on the pinnacle of philosophy.

4. Josephus. Josephus makes no great use of the group. He quotes philosophers, applies the terms to barbarian sages, regards the Greeks as pupils of the Jews, and finds Jewish superiority in the general possibility of faith in God in Israel. At times he uses the group for Jewish instruction and he also describes as philosophical schools the religio-political groupings of the Jewish people, comparing the Essenes to the Pythagoreans and the Pharisees to the Stoics.

C. Rabbinic Judaism. The rabbis describe as philosophers the representatives of the philosophical schools, accomplished orators, and royal advisers. They also adopt certain insights and comparisons from popular Greek philosophy. But they are conscious of Jewish superiority and reject motifs that are alien to their own system of instruction. Thus in various debates a representative philosopher challenges Israel’s faith with a polemical question or thesis, but is repulsed with a wisdom-like answer. Tradition and succession are built up in rabbinism as in the Greek schools.

D. The NT.

1. On the basis of the LXX various concepts pass with the Greek language into the NT. Thus we find the thought-forms of physics in Jn. 1:1 ff., and expressions from philosophical anthropology and ethics in Rom. 1:20, 28; 1 Cor. 11:13ff.; Jms. 3:3ff. Yet the NT uses such concepts or expressions only as they contribute to the presentation, elucidation, or establishment of the gospel. The central theme of God’s eschatological action in fulfilment of his goal for Israel and the world is neither related to philosophy nor dependent on it. Indeed, it calls the goal of philosophy in question and contradicts it with Semitic concepts that are an irrevocable part of its message.

2. The only NT instance of philosophía is in Col. 2:8. What Paul has in view here is not philosophy in general but the teaching of a syncretistic religious group that claims special insight into God, Christ, astral powers, and creation, that imposes a set of rules on its members, and that bases the authority of its message on its age or esoteric nature. The group itself probably argues that its teaching is philosophía; hence Paul’s use of the term and his equation of it with “empty deceit.” For Paul himself the gospel is not philosophía but a distinctive form of sophía.

3. Acts 17:18 records an encounter between Paul and the Epicureans and Stoics. The wording suggests that the former respond with disparagement, the latter with interest. spermológos has the sense of “pseudo-philosopher” and carries the implication that the philosophical schools are the mediators of true instruction.

The Stoics, however, seek universal fellowship and aim to honor all deities; they are thus more open to Paul as the preacher of a Near Eastern cult. The address in vv. 22ff. points out that veneration of the gods is incompatible with the nature and works of the one true God. It takes the form, not of a debate, but of a criticism of pagan worship and a call for repentance.

F. Gnosticism. The group plays no part in later Gnosticism. In Acts of Thomas 139 philosophía is a Christian virtue; as love of God's wisdom it stands in contrast to human wisdom.

F. Apologists. The Apologists use the group to assert their claim to truth. They contrast the wisdom of God with philosophical babbling (Theophilus To Autolycus 2.15). Philosophy is essential to understanding (Justin Dialogue 2.3). Governed by Christ the Logos, Christians are the true philosophers (Apology 46). Along these lines the group seems to offer an apt basis for mediating the gospel in educated circles.

[O. MICHEL, IX, 172-88]

phobéō [to fear, reverence], phobéomai [to be afraid], phóbos [fear], déos [fear, awe]

A. The Greeks.

1. Derivation, Meaning, and History of the Group. Basic to the group is the primary verb phébomai, "to flee." As an emotion develops from the action, being startled and running away suggest "fear." The older word for "fear" is déos. This is "apprehension," while phóbos is "fright" or "panic."

2. General Usage. In ordinary use the group has the nuances of "flight," "fright," "apprehension," "anxiety," and "awe."

3. The God Phóbos. In Greek superstition Phóbos is a powerful deity, the son of Ares, and a god of war. Sparta has a temple to Phóbos. He is depicted in a fear—inspiring form that actualizes the god of terror presented by Homer.

4. Evaluation of Fear

a. Ordinary Speech. Since fear brings oppression and anxiety, absence of fear is worth seeking, as proverbial sayings show. The characters in tragedy are filled with a dread of fate and the unknown future that is comparable to the terror of a helpless animal. Choral songs that suck the audience into the action express the fear. If Aristotle sees a purging here, the poets themselves are more concerned about the ineluctability of destiny. Fear is also an important motive in exhortation. It is an unavoidable basis of respect for both human and divine authorities. To repudiate fear is to promote anarchy. Epiphanies of divine power evoke a fear that calming self-declarations of deity then allay. Outstanding personages can evoke the same reaction. In ordinary use, then, fear may be rejected or it may be accepted as inescapable in the face of certain structures of dependence and force. The meaning covers anxiety and respect as well as fear or terror.

b. Philosophy. From its origins, philosophy discusses fear. The pre-Socratics sharply criticize emotional fear. Talk about fear of God is invented to frighten people. Aristotle differentiates this fear, which has physiological relations, from proper awe or reverence. As in Socrates and Plato, it is caused by a pity when we see it in others. The Stoics define fear psychologically as an irrational emotion that we should resist. A true relation to God as author and father frees us from emotional fear of God, fear of tyrants is nonsensical since we need fear only what we do to ourselves, and fear of death is childish. The Epicureans, too, condemn fear of the future and of death. Yet fear has some place in philosophy. Thus Plato teaches fear of wrongdoing, and he thinks fear of God is natural in education. Plutarch argues that fear of God and fear of death are unavoidable; even Epicurus has to admit that death usually means pain, and rejection of a true fear of God results in the false fear of superstition. In general, philosophy agrees in rejecting emotional fear, but when phóbos has the sense of awe or reverence it regards these as imperative and unavoidable reactions to the claim of authorities and especially of the gods. [H. BALZ, IX, 189-97]

B. The OT.

I. Occurrence and Equivalents.

1. In most cases in the OT phobéomai is used for the stem yr', "to be afraid," "to have in honor." In seven instances it is used for pḥd, "to quake." We also find it for various other terms, and it occurs without an original in apocryphal works.

2. phóbos is the equivalent noun for the same stems in the sense of "fear" or "quaking," and so, too, is phoberós (phoberṓs) for "feared" or "terrible" ("terribly").

3. déos occurs only in 2 Maccabees.

4. The two chief Hebrew stems are mostly rendered by the phob- group.

II. The Stem yr' in the OT.

1. Meaning.

a. Originally meaning "to tremble," the verb of the group means "to fear" or, more weakly, "to honor."

b. The noun has the sense of "fear" but mostly signifies "respect."

2. Human Fear Humans are the main subjects of fear in the OT (cf. Isaac in Gen. 26:7, David in 1 Sam. 21:13, the Aramaeans in 2 Sam. 10:19). The reasons for fear are war, death, enslavement, loss of a wife or child, disaster, or a place. Individuals like Goliath occasion fear, as do wild beasts, the desert, or the sea. The fearful are excluded from the army (Dt. 20:8); the death penalty is a deterrent (13:11). Trust in God brings freedom from fear, which is a promised eschatological blessing in Is. 54:14. Fear arises in the presence of those who stand in a special relation to God, like Moses in Ex. 34:30, Joshua in Josh. 4:14, or Samuel in 1 Sam. 12:18. Lev. 19:30 demands fear of the sanctuary.

3. Fear of God.

a. God can be a threat (Is. 8:12-13), for his acts are terrible (Dt. 4:34), and so is God himself (Ex. 15:11) or his day (Joel 2:11).

b. Fear of God takes the form of reverent and submissive recognition in trust and obedience. Hence those who fear God are reliable (Ex. 18:21). Fear of God results from hearing the law (Dt. 4:10). It is the same as serving God or treading his way (Dt. 6:13; 8:6). Fear of God is more than an attitude; it is observance of moral and cultic demands. It thus excludes fear of the punishment that overtakes those who do not fear God (Dt. 6:13ff.).

c. By hearkening to wisdom one comes to understand the fear of God (Prov. 2:5). This fear is integral to a purposeful life that is pleasing to God, and as such it is the beginning of wisdom (Prov. 1:7; Ps. 111:10). It has a moral orientation as the avoidance of evil (Ps. 34:11) or the hatred of sin (Prov. 23:17). It brings wealth, honor, and life (Prov. 22:4). It promotes confidence and is a refuge (14:26).

d. A special group in the Psalms consists of those who fear God, lauding his name (Ps. 22:22-23), hoping in him (147:11), and sacrificing in the temple (66:16). God looks on these people (33:18) and has pity on them (103:13). They are the righteous in the congregation (145:19; 115:11; cf. Mal. 3:16).

e. In Pss. 1:2; 19:7ff.; 119:33ff. the stress is on the fact that those who fear God faithfully observe the law.

4. The Formula "Fear Not." This formula occurs 75 times in the OT and is spoken in reassurance by God, by those commissioned by him, or simply by one person to another. It has a place in the oracle of salvation in Is. 41:10, 13-14, and counteracts terror in theophanies in Ex. 20:20; Dan. 10:19.

III. The Stem pḥd in the OT.

1. Linguistic Aspects.

a. The original sense of the verb of this stem is “to quake,” “to tremble.”

b. The noun denotes “trembling” or “fear,” and only rarely “respect” (2 Chr. 19:7, and perhaps Ps. 36:1).

2. Material Aspects.

a. Found mostly in later works, the stem has the sense of anxious uncertainty or disquiet (Dt. 28:65ff.). Calamitous situations cause panic (cf. the terrors of the night in Ps. 91:4 or fear of battle in Job 39:22).

b. The stem can also denote fear at God’s acts (Is. 19:16-17) or word (Jer. 36:16). God himself as well as his acts can evoke terror.

c. In Gen. 31:42, 53 “Fear of Isaac” is a divine name. The meaning seems to be that God is the object of Isaac’s reverence; “kinsman” is the sense of paḥaḏ here.

IV. The Apocrypha. The situation in the Apocrypha is much the same as in the OT. We find fear of war, disaster, supernatural events, and also fear of God in the religious, legal, or cultic sense. In the Epistle of Jeremiah and 4 Maccabees fear is the antithesis of obedience; Stoic influence may be seen in the way that 4 Maccabees contrasts fear of death with obedience, while the Epistle of Jeremiah tries to ward off apostasy by showing that idols are not gods and that therefore one need not fear them. [G. WANKE, IX, 197-205]

C. Palestinian and Hellenistic Judaism.

1. The Pseudepigrapha. The Testaments of the Twelve develops the theme of the fear of the Lord. This fear is seated in the heart, leads to love, means renouncing Satan and avoiding evil, and confers a wisdom that one can never lose. Other works state that fear of God produces respect for parents, is the beginning of all good things, and differs from the fear (e.g., of death) that perverts the heart.

b. More common in apocalyptic is fear at epiphanies. The righteous will die, but they need not fear sinners or enemies, for God comforts them by revealing future salvation. Sinners do not fear the Lord, but the last judgment will plunge them into terror. Even the righteous will be afraid in the divine judgment, but sevenfold joy awaits them.

2. Qumran. The righteous at Qumran are aware of being among those who fear God. There is terror at the judgment, and God is terrible in his acts. The children of the light have no reason to be afraid in battle.

3. Rabbinic Writings. Fear of God is basic for the righteous. It includes fear of sin and stands related to love of God, which is rated higher. Among Gentiles we find a group of God-fearers (sebómenoi) who venerate the God of Israel but do not accept circumcision (cf. phoboúmenoi in 2 Chr. 5:6 LXX).

4. Philo and Josephus.

a. Although Philo adopts the OT concept of the fear of God, he stresses the fact that God is an antidote to fear and finds in love rather than fear the main motive for the righteous. Fear, however, has a place in education.

b. Josephus uses the group for “fear” (in war, or of death or punishment), “anxiety,” and “reverence,” and uses déos in much the same way. He adopts Hellenistic terms (e.g., deisidaimonía) rather than the phob- group for fear of God.

D. The NT.

1. General Usage. The NT uses the group some 158 times (phobéomai 95 times, phóbos 47). The main examples are in the Gospels and Acts, although Paul makes common use of the noun. With an infinitive the verb means “to be afraid to...” and, with mē, “to be afraid that....” The fear may be that of individuals or of the whole people. Mostly the concepts are traditional. The NT opposes all hampering anxiety but relates fear of God to faith as total trust.

2. The Epiphany of the Kingdom and Fear.

a. The incomprehensible nature of Jesus' mighty acts arouses fear in the spectators and in those affected, e.g., at the stilling of the storm in Mk. 4:41, the curing of the demoniac in 5:15, the raising of the young man at Nain in Lk. 7:16. In the infancy stories fear comes on those to whom the angel appears (1:12) or who experience a divine miracle (1:65). Fear plays an important role at the transfiguration, whether at entry into the cloud (Lk. 9:34), at hearing the voice (Mt. 17:6), or at the whole incident as a divine epiphany (Mk. 9:6). This fear differs from dread at visions (Rev. 11:11) or the terror of the wicked at the eschaton (Lk. 21:26). It is like the fear of the church in its experiences of salvation (Acts 2:43; 5:5; 19:17). It rules out ordinary fear but arouses fear of him who can cast into hell (Lk. 12:4-5).

b. News of the resurrection causes fear and astonishment (Mk. 16:8). This reaction might be the real climax of Mark, but fear and silence hardly seem to be fitting as the final word of the gospel, for surely the postresurrection life does not stand under the sign of fear. What the women fear is not the resurrection itself but the empty tomb and the strange message of the angel. Mt. 28:8 adds the element of joy to the fear, and Lk. 24:22 refers only to astonishment and joy.

c. The summons "Fear not" occurs in the Gospels too. Jairus is not to be anxious in Mk. 5:36, the disciples receive reassurance in 6:50, the three at the transfiguration are enabled to look up in Mt. 17:7, the women's fear gives way to proclamation and faith in 28:10, those whom the angels visit in the infancy stories are told not to fear in Lk. 1:13, 30. 2:10, and Peter and Paul (in a vision) are told the same thing by the Lord in a context of discipleship and service (Lk. 5:10; Acts 18:9).

3. The Fear of God in Formulas. Luke likes the formula "to fear God" (cf. 1:50; 18:2; 23:40). Acts uses phoboúmenos (oi) five times (10:2; 22, 35; 13:16, 26; seboúmenos[oi] six times) for Gentile adherents to the Jewish faith. These "God-fearers" form the starting point for the Gentile mission in Acts 10 (and cf. Paul's practice in ch. 13).

4. Faith and Fear. Like Jesus, Paul shows that fear can be an essential part of faith even though faith rules out anxiety. Believers are to fear the divine judgment (Rom. 11:20). But they need not fear an uncertain state after death (2 Cor. 5:6ff.). Paul knows fear because of the human weakness of his preaching (1 Cor. 2:3-4; cf. 2 Cor. 7:15). The self-sacrifice of Christ makes possible only an attitude of humble acceptance of God's will (in fear and trembling; Phil. 2:12). There is no anxiety in this fear, for it is that of God's children (Rom. 8:15). They need fear neither suffering nor death (1 Pet. 3:14; Heb. 2:15), for Christ has freed them from the bondage of death and they know that God helps them in all things (Heb. 13:6). Nevertheless, they fear and reverence God as the holy God in both grace and wrath; they are to worship him with reverence and awe (metá eulabeías kaí déous) (Heb. 12:28).

5. Fear in Exhortation. Paul refers to fear of punishment by the authorities in Rom. 13:3. Recognition of their divine function, however, makes fear unnecessary (vv. 3ff.). The work of love comes to terms with the valid claims of the authorities and hence rules out fear. Those who are born of God, knowing that God will not punish them, no longer know any fear (1 Jn. 4:17-18). They have a confidence that means an open relationship to both God and others. Fear is a basis of action in Acts 9:31. With holiness and prayer, it characterizes those who are freed from their futile ways (1 Pet. 1:17). It liberates from human intimidation (3:6), although there must still be fear of defilement (Jude 23). Fear as respect still has a place in human relationships (1 Pet. 2:18; 3:2; Eph. 6:5; Col. 3:22) but only on the basis of fear of God (1 Pet. 2:17). All believers are finally to be subject to one another in the fear of Christ (Eph. 5:21). Precisely because reverence is due to Christ, the point of all these admonitions lies in the demand for a pure, patient, and gentle heart (Col. 3:22; Eph. 6:5; 1 Pet. 3:2, 4).

E. The Early Church and Gnosticism.

1. The Early Church. The group is a favorite one in the apostolic fathers. We increasingly find the fear of God in formulas (Barn. 10.10-11; Did. 4.9). Fear of God banishes other fears (2 Clem. 4.4) but not fear of judgment (Ignatius Ephesians 11.1) or fear of Satan's works (Hermas Mandates 7.3). After faith, fear is a decisive work (Hermas Mandates 8.89), a fruit of the Spirit (Barn. 11.11), that helps us resist evil (Hermas Mandates 12.2.4). Fear as respect plays a role in relationships, e.g., of children to parents (Pol. 4.2) or subjects to rulers (Barn. 19.5). Clement of Alexandria finds a logical place for fear in Stromateis 2.7.32.1ff. True fear is a response to God's commands (4.3.9.5ff.). phóbos checks licentiousness and déos frees us from bad impulses (2.8.39.1ff.). Tertullian relates fear to penitence (On Penitence 2.1-2; 5.3-4; 6.14ff.).

2. Gnosticism. The Hermetic writings contain a personification of Phóbos. In Christian Gnosticism Adam takes over the original fear of primal man. The corporeal elements arise from phóbos, and phóbos also passes into psychic things. We also read of a demon of fear that is nourished on matter and creates passion. Echoes of the biblical motif of fear of God also occur, yet the righteous who stand against wickedness need not tremble, for knowledge of redemption liberates them from fear. [H. BALZ, IX, 205-19]

phrḗn [mind, understanding], áphrōn [foolish], aphrosýnē [folly], phronéō [to think], phrónēma [thought], phrónēsis [thinking], phrónimos [thoughtful]

A. The Greek-Hellenistic World.

1. History and Oldest Sense. phrḗn, or plural phrénes, means "diaphragm," regarded as the seat of mental and spiritual activity, then "mind" or "understanding." The compounds reflect the intellecual focus, phronéō usually means "to think" or "to plan," and the nouns phrónēma and phrónēsis mean "thought," "thinking," or "reason."

2. From Homer to the Classical Period. Homer refers to the possibilities of a sound or sick development of the mind. Aeschylus uses phrḗn for the "disposition"; this may be arrogant or rational. aphrosýnē is a term for "youthful folly," while áphrōn means "out of one's mind." phronéō occurs for "to have understanding" but also "to intend," and we find phrónēsis for divine "counsel" and phrónēma for human "pride" or "arrogance."

3. phrónēsis and Cognates in Philosophy.

a. Plato uses phrḗn in the physical sense and also for the inner person. The soul has phrónēsis ("receptivity") prior to being in us. sophía differs from the more practical phrónēsis, but the two are also interchangeable. phrónēsis is the right state of the intellect and the source of virtue. Education is admonition in phrónēsis and truth. phrónēsis is the chief virtue. All culture is linked to it. It is a divine gift that should guide lawgivers and that directs the mind to immortality. phrónēma is the disposition, the intellectual and spiritual attitude, or self-confidence, which may produce arrogance if based on physical fitness alone.

b. Aristotle uses phrḗn only in quotations. phronéō as the ability to comprehend belongs only to the few. phrónēsis is God's gift; it is moral insight or knowledge leading to a virtuous life. As practical acumen it differs from theoretical wisdom.

c. In Stoicism the three other cardinal virtues proceed from phrónēsis or sophía. Since philosophy and virtue are one, phrónēsis is integral to philosophy.

d. In Neo-Platonism phrónēsis is an emanation ruled by noús. The rational soul is beautiful. Regard for noús is phrónēsis. phrónēsis is the intellectual activity of an individual soul related to a body. By a later tradition labor and training precede phrónēsis (cf. the discussion of phýsis, máthēsis, and virtue in Plato).

e. In popular usage we find the term on magical papyri, in Gnostic texts, and in a legal context (for "competence").

B. The OT.

1. Reason, Insight, and Cleverness. There is no single Hebrew original for the group. The LXX uses only the plural phrémes, which occurs seven times in Proverbs (phrónēsis in 9:16). phrónimos has a negative accent in Gen. 3:1 (cf. phrónēsis for presumptuous cleverness in Job 5:13). Wisdom in government is the point in Ezek. 28:4 (cf. 1 Kgs. 3; Wis. 7:7; also Is. 44:28 LXX). phronéō and phrónēsis occur in the negative with reference to idol worship in Is. 44:18-19.

2. Negative Expressioms. Vaunting human reason is folly (áphrōn, aphrosýnē). The áphrōn is the fool (who denies God) in the Psalms. In Proverbs áphrōn refers to the simple or inexperienced person. phrónimos occurs in Prov. 14:17, and aphrosýnē is used for "misdeed" in Judg. 20:6.

3. Theological and Ethical Significance. God's phrónēsis is unsearchable (Is. 40:28). By it he has set up the world. It is parallel to his power and wisdom. In us phrónēsis, which is from God, goes with sophía and aísthēsis ("understanding, wisdom, and knowledge"). The three constitute a unity as practical wisdom with a religious slant. phrónēsis is the principle of creation, and God gives us a share in it. In Sirach phrónēsis, with wisdom, is subordinate to the fear of God. Wisdom puts phrónēsis under sophía, but both are hypostases, and with wisdom phrónēsis is an architect of the universe. 4 Macc. 1:2 makes phrónēsis the chief virtue. 1 and 2 Maccabees use the group for perception, disposition, but also arrogance. In 4 Macc. 7:17 lack of understanding means lack of control of the impulses.

C. Judaism.

1. Qumran. The Hebrew terms behind phrónēsis occur in the Qumran writings for the divine insight or wisdom that God has also given to us. Those outside the community are fools or simpletons. Wisdom and folly do battle in the heart. Various terms are used for planning evil, for plotting, for aberration, for trickery, and for leading astray. The gifts of knowledge combine with humility and mercy to differentiate members of the community from outsiders. Knowledge is an outworking of salvation with an eschatological hope for the destruction of folly.

2. Hellenistic Judaism.

a. Pseudepigrapha. In older works the occurrence of the group is haphazard and rare. The Epistle of Aristeas 124 uses phrónēsis in an imprecise sense for "understanding." Test. Naph. 2:8 says that God has made the heart for understanding. The sin of Shechem is folly in Test. Levi 7:2-3. Sib. 5.366 echoes Gen. 3:1, and Greek En. 32:3 alludes to the tree of knowledge in Gen. 2:9, 17.

b. Philo. For Philo God has the fullness of phrónēsis. He dispenses it to the race. The river Phison represents phrónēsis. Humanity comprises both phrónēsis and its opposite aphrosýnē. As practical wisdom, phrónēsis is a virtuous mean. It is the eye of the soul and imperishable in the species. In education fear is needed against aphrosýnē, but unless one sees that God alone is wise our own phrónēsis is arrogance. aphrosýnē is poison, sickness, or drunkenness. God is the Lord of fools, admonishing or destroying them. Polytheism leads to atheism among the irrational.

c. Josephus. phrénes is for Josephus a parallel term to noús. The soul has lost its rational understanding. áphrōn and aphrosýnē denote youthful folly or lack of restraint. phronéō has to do with the disposition and occurs in expressions meaning “to lose heart,” “to plan on,” or “to think arrogantly.” phrónēsis, a divine gift, refers to right thinking oriented to God. It is practical wisdom. phrónēma means much the same but with more stress on action; it sometimes means “courage,” but it also denotes “arrogance.” phrónimos, meaning “rational,” “clever,” or ‘“prudent,” is rare.

d. Rabbinic Use. The area in rabbinic works that corresponds to the Greek group is controlled by the idea of wisdom or understanding with a moral reference.

D. The NT.

*1. phrénes. To prefer tongues, according to 1 Cor. 14:20, is to be childish. The Corinthians should use reason and press on to maturity.

2. áphrōn, aphrosýnē.

a. The Synoptists. In Lk. 11:40 Jesus challenges the Pharisees. In their concern for ritual purity and neglect of moral purity they are fools even though they think of themselves as correctors of the foolish (Rom. 2:20). Implied is the charge that they do not truly know God. In Lk. 12:20 the folly of the rich farmer is that he does not reckon with God and thus lulls himself into false security. Folly is one of the vices that issues from within in Mk. 7:21-22. The arrangement seems to be arbitrary, but aphrosýnē perhaps comes at the end as the chief or basic sin.

b. Paul. In Rom. 2:20 Paul is expressing the Jewish standpoint. He does not pronounce judgment in 1 Cor. 15:36, but makes a rhetorical appeal for understanding. Self-criticism comes to expression in 2 Cor. 11-12. To meet his opponents Paul sets himself on the plane of carnal boasting. Since the clever Corinthians have submitted to the claims of fools, Paul, speaking foolishly, will surpass them all (11:16ff.). He does so by boasting of his sufferings. Here, then, is no folly but truth (12:6). In Eph. 5:17 aphrosýnē is foolish or careless conduct on the part of believers. Its opposite is understanding God’s will; this will is that by good conduct they should silence the ignorance of foolish people (1 Pet. 2:15).

3. phronéō, phrónēma.

a. Mark, Matthew, and Acts. In Mk. 8:33 and parallels Jesus sharply rebukes Peter; he can grasp only human thoughts with a focus on earthly life. In Acts 28:22 the Jewish leaders want Paul to state his own views regarding the new “sect.”

b. Paul. In Phil. 3:19 Paul refers to those whose minds are set on earthly things (in contrast cf. vv. 14-15; Col. 3:1-2). Rom. 11:20 warns the church against arrogance. Believers are not to be wise in their own conceits (11:25; 12:17) but are to associate with the lowly. Rom. 12:3 counsels sober aspiration. We are not to aim so high that we miss the goal. Paul’s goal in Phil. 2:2 is a common mind, for which confession of Christ is the norm (2:5), in a fellowship that Christ himself has instituted (cf. 4:2). With this mind believers will reject any other message (Gal. 5:10). A like mind is also the theme in 2 Cor. 13:11 and Rom. 15:5. “Observance” is the meaning of phronéō in Rom. 14:6. We are not to observe rules but to make responsible judgments. Maturity means setting aside childish reasoning (1 Cor. 13:11). In Phil. 1:7; 4:10 phronéō hypér or epí carries the thought of “concern” in both thought and act.

4. phrónēsis. In Lk. 1:17, in a liturgical context, the forerunner's task is to bring back the disobedient to the manner of thought and conduct of the just. Eph. 1:8 also has a liturgical ring; God has graciously endowed us with wisdom and understanding whereby we know the mystery of his will.

5. phrónimos.

a. Matthew and Luke. In Mt. 7:24 the doer of the word is like a wise or prudent builder, although the motif of prudence is secondary here. In Mt. 25:1ff. wisdom is preparedness, for everything depends on encounter with the Lord. Cunning in the sense of cleverly resolute action in a hopeless situation is the point in Lk. 16:8. In these parables phrónimos applies to those who have grasped their eschatological position. Mt. 10:16 is perhaps a proverbial saying; it carries some allusion to Gen. 3:1.

b. Paul. Paul uses phrónimos along with phronéō in Rom. 11:25 and 12:20. He employs phrónimoi dialectically in 1 Cor. 4:10. In 1 Cor. 10:15 he presupposes a power of judgment, but in 14:20 this is the subject of an admonition, and the use is ironical in 2 Cor. 11:19.

E. The Apostolic Fathers and Apologists.

1. The disputes at Corinth in 1 Clement are between the wise and arrogant fools; the author (cf. also 2 Clement) counsels humility and concord. Ignatius Magnesians 3.1 demands an understanding attitude. Idolatry is folly in Diog. 3.3. In Hermas Mandates 3.4 phronéō relates to right thinking, but the author deplores the lack of understanding in himself and others (Visions 5.4; Similitudes 9.22.2-3). Baptism confers a common mind in a unity of faith and love (Similitudes 9.17.2).

2. Aristides Apology 8.1; 14.1 thinks that the wise among pagans are fools. Justin Dialogue 5.4-5 refers to the folly of souls (in opposition to Plato). Opposing false gods, Athenagoras (Supplication 22.5) quotes the equation of Athene and phrónēsis.

3. Gnosticism includes phrónēsis in its mythological constructions. It is part of a series that includes noús, lógos, etc., or cháris, sýnesis, etc. In opposition to Gnosticism the Epistle of the Apostles 43ff. puts knowledge and understanding among the foolish virgins; the five wise virgins are faith, love, grace, peace, and hope.

4. In official usage phrónēsis is a form of episcopal address (prudentia in Latin). [G. BERTRAM, IX, 220-35]

phylássō [to protect, watch], phylakḗ [watch, prison] phylássō.

A. Nonbiblical Greek.

1. Homer to Aristotle. From phýlax ("watchman"), the verb phylássō means "to protect," "to watch," "to guard," "to care for," "to note," "to observe," "to keep," in the middle "to be on guard," and intransitively "to be awake."

2. Hellenistic Usage. The term finds a use for guard duty, also for God's keeping, for keeping deposited goods, and in legal contracts.

B. The OT and Judaism.

1. The LXX.

a. phylássō occurs 471 times for šmr and 379 times for nṣr.

b. In the middle it can express the required attitude to the covenant (Ex. 19:5) and to cultic laws etc. In Judg. 2:22 etc. it means "keeping to" God's ways. We also find "keeping" knowledge, truth, righteousness, peace, etc. (Mal. 2:7; Is. 26:2-3).

c. The verb expresses God's attitude too; God observes, guards, protects, etc. (Job 13:27; 10:14). He cares for animals and men (Job 39:1; Jer. 5:24). He is the Guardian or Watcher (Pss. 12:7; 17:1, etc.). He watches over Israel (Ps. 121:4), keeps the city (127:1), and watches over aliens, the poor, the righteous, etc. (146:9; 97:10). He keeps his covenant (1 Kgs. 3:6) and maintains truth (Ps. 146:6). He spares the wicked for the evil day (Prov. 16:9). Yet he does not keep his wrath forever (Jer. 3:5).

2. Qumran. Qumran stresses the keeping of the law etc., maintaining faithfulness, and keeping oaths, but in the background is God who keeps his covenant and thus preserves the righteous.

3. Philo and Josephus.

a. Keeping in mind is the goal for Philo on the basis of Gen. 4:9 and Num. 8:26. b. Josephus repeats Dt. 22:5 in Antiquities 4.301. The Essenes call for observing rights and for keeping oneself from unholy gain. Keeping the law etc. is important for Josephus. His people must protect customs and maintain piety. Politically and militarily the verb is used for keeping treaties, as well as for protecting, besieging, occupying, and holding captive.

4. Apocrypha and pseudepigrapha. Here we find the familiar ideas of keeping truth, of preserving one's heritage, and of God's upholding (of the kingly power of Judah).

5. The Rabbinic Tradition. The rabbis both guard the law and observe it. The patriarchs are thought to have kept the whole law.

C. The NT.

1. The Gospels and Acts. In Mk. 10:20 and parallels the verb expresses the legal piety of the rich young ruler. Jesus in Lk. 11:28 blesses those who hear the word and keep it (cf. 8:21). Hearing and observing are christologically oriented in Jn. 12:47. Not to keep Christ's words means judgment (cf. doing the truth in 3:21; 1 Jn. 1:6). In Acts 7:53 Stephen accuses his hearers of not keeping the law. Paul is challenged to show himself to be living in observance of the law in Acts 21:24, and in 16:4 he delivers the rulings of the council so that they may be observed (in the preciser sense of "keeping from"; cf. 15:20). In Lk. 4:10 Satan tempts Jesus to claim the protection of Ps. 91:11. In Jn. 17:12 he himself keeps those whom the Father has given him. In Jn. 12:25 those who sacrifice their lives will keep them to eternal life.

2. The Epistles. In Rom. 2:26 Gentile observance of the statutes of the law reverses the relation between Jews and Gentiles in view of Jewish nonobservance. In Gal. 6:13 Paul's opponents are zealous for the law but do not keep it. The author of 1 Timothy asks for observance of his directions in 5:21 and for keeping of the faith in 6:20. Believers are to keep themselves from idols (1 Jn. 5:21). God will keep against evil (2 Th. 3:3) or keep from falling (Jude 24). Noah became a preacher of righteousness as God kept him (2 Pet. 3:5). The secular senses of guarding or holding captive occur in, e.g., Lk. 11:21; 8:29; Acts 12:4.

D. Early Christianity. We find the sense "to keep" in Justin Dialogue 46.1ff. True death is "reserved" for the wicked in Diog. 10.7, and Diog. 7.2 refers to the observance of cosmic order. "To guard oneself" is the point in Justin Apology 14.1. Did. 4.13 demands preservation of the church's tradition (cf. Barn. 19.1).

A. Outside the Bible.

1. phylakḗ means a. "watching" or "protection," b. "guard," "post," or "watch," c. "watchtower," "guardpost," d. "prison," e. "night watch," and f. "attention."

2. The planets are heavenly watchers or guardposts blocking access to heaven. They are inhabited by demons and serve as places of punishment. A rather different notion is that of heavenly guardians that help the soul in its ascent out of the prison of the body.

B. The LXX and Judaism.

1. In the LXX, where there is no single Hebrew original, we find the senses "watch," "watchtower," "maintenance," and "observance."

2. The astral idea of heavenly "guardhouses" is present in Bar. 3:34, and cf. the stars or starry spirits as "watchers" (Dan. 4:14).

3. The Epistle of Aristeas 125 calls wise and righteous persons the "protection" of the monarchy, and Philo refers to the "preservation" of laws, customs, or virtues, to the "prison" of the passions, and to the sacrifice of bodies for the "protection" of the law.

C. The NT.

1. Lk. 2:8 uses a cultic phrase in a secular way; the shepherds keep "watch" over their flock.

2. Where phylakḗ means "night watch" in comparisons, the sense is literal, but the reference is eschatological (cf. Mt. 24:43). Mk. 6:48 (the "fourth watch") perhaps carries an eschatological hint as well.

3. In all other NT instances phylakḗ means "prison" (cf. Lk. 23:19; Mk. 6:17; Acts 5:18ff.; 12:4ff.; 16:23ff.). Like the righteous of the OT, the disciples often suffer imprisonment. Peter is ready to accept it in Lk. 22:33, Jesus predicts it in 21:12, it is almost a formula for Paul in 2 Cor. 6:5; 11:23, and visiting those in prison is a duty in Mt. 25:36ff. A hint of eschatological punishment is present in Mt. 5:25; 18:30. phylakḗ is the place of departed spirits in 1 Pet. 3:19, Babylon is the prison of unclean spirits in Rev. 18:2, and Satan is temporarily released from his prison in Rev. 20:7. [G. BERTRAM, IX, 236-44]

phylḗ [tribe]

A. Secular Greek.

1. This word denotes a group bound together by common descent, and then the subdivision of a people, e.g., a tribe or family.

2. phylaí are subdivisions in the Ionic and Doric spheres, traditionally four in the Ionic sphere and three in the Doric. The original element of blood relationship disappears and the main distinctions are sacral, military, and administrative. The troops enrolled in the subdivisions can also be called phylaí. The phylaí are integrated into the city-states; the dḗmoi are smaller districts. tribus is the Latin equivalent.

3. In the Egyptian priesthood the phylaí are divisions or classes performing their ministry in turn.

B. The LXX.

1. In the LXX phylḗ, which renders three main Hebrew terms, becomes a fixed term in the tribal system. The family or clan is the dēmos, patría, or syngéneia. In some instances the phylḗ may be a group outside Israel (cf. Gen. 10:5; 36:40).

2.a. The tribes take on historical concreteness with the conquest. They are related by common descent and common leadership. Inwardly they consist of clans and families. The number 12 remains even though Manasseh emerges as a separate tribe and Simeon tends to merge into Judah. The electing God shapes their cultic and legal life.

b. The covenant at Shechem in Josh. 24 knits the tribes into an amphictyony and pledges them to loyalty to God and to certain cultic, legal, and military requirements. The holy war unites the tribes politically, and the annual swearing of the covenant oath keeps Canaanite cults in some subjection. Philistine pressure produces a more unified state that reduces tribal autonomy. David provides a cultic center at Jerusalem, and Solomon's new districts coincide only formally with the older tribal structure.

c. Trust in God's faithfulness nourishes the hope of a new future for the 12 tribes. Elijah at Carmel makes his altar of 12 stones (1 Kgs. 18:31). The Servant of Is. 49:6 will reestablish the tribes. Ezekiel names the gates of the new Jerusalem after the 12 tribes (48:30ff.). God sees all the tribes (Zech. 9:1), they are his possession (Is. 63:17), and he will restore them (Sir. 36:10).

C. Later Judaism.

1. In the pseudepigrapha the number 12 plays a role in the reference to 72 translators of the OT and also in the design of the Testaments of the Twelve. Prayers are offered for the regathering of Israel. Apocalyptists expect the Messiah to accomplish this.

2. Palestinian Judaism discusses the tribes in connection with cultic and jurisdictional matters. It expresses a hope for the return of the ten tribes.

3. Qumran refers to the future restoration of the 12 tribes.

4. Philo has little interest in the historical tribes, but he points out that Levi is the priestly tribe because of its zeal regarding the golden calf, and the number 12 is significant for him as a perfect number.

5. Josephus follows the historical records. He mentions vast numbers of the ten tribes settled by the Euphrates. He also uses phylḗ for Arab tribes.

D. The NT.

1. phylḗ occurs 31 times in the NT (21 times in Revelation). Four persons are said to belong to tribes: King Saul and Paul to Benjamin, Anna to Asher, and Jesus to Judah (Acts 13:21; Rom. 11:1; Lk. 2:36; Mt. 1:1; Rom. 1:3; Mk. 10:47-48; Rev. 5:5; Heb. 7:13-14).

2. At the judgment the disciples will play the role assigned to the elders, but they will judge the 12 tribes, not the Gentiles (Mt. 19:28). The gates of the new Jerusalem will bear the names of the 12 tribes (Rev. 21:12). In the end time God will preserve 12,000 of each tribe (7:4ff.). The precedence given to Judah and the omission of Dan suggest that the reference is to the new community of Jews and Gentiles. In Jms. 1:1 the Jewish dispersion might be meant, but since the author is a Christian and is dealing with misunderstandings of justification by faith, the tribes here are probably the new people of God in which OT expectations find their fulfilment and which is also a dispersion on the march to the final consummation.

3. In an eschatological context the Gentile peoples bewail the return of the Son of Man in Mt. 24:30; Rev. 1:7. The Gentile world from which the redeemed are sealed in Rev. 5:9 consists of phylaí as well as tongues, peoples, and nations. The overcomers of 7:9 are from the same world, the bodies of the two witnesses confront it in 11:9, it is delivered up to the beast in 13:7, but it also has the offer of the gospel in 14:6.

E. The Apostolic Fathers. NT themes find an echo in 1 Clem. 43.2 (the 12 tribes), Barn. 8.3 (the apostles), Hermas Similitudes 9.17 (the new people of God), and 2 Clem. 10. 1 (the nations, Gen. 12:3). [C. MAURER, IX, 245-50]

phýsis [nature], physikós [natural], physikṓs [naturally]

A. Greek Literature.

1. Etymology and Basic Sense.

a. From a root bhū, meaning “to become,” phýsis has the original sense of “form” or “nature,” but also “budding,” “growth,” or “development,” first in relation to plants, then animals and people.

b. In Homer and Pindar it denotes “external form.”

c. The sense “birth” or “origin” occurs in pre-Socratic philosophy, and from this we have phýsei for “physical descent.”

d. The later adjective physikós means “natural.”

2. Nature and Constitution.

a. The nature and qualities of people are often called phýsis, as is the “inner nature” or “manner” or “character” (cf. also the “true nature” in contrast to acts). In the absolute phýsis also means “creature” and among plants it has the sense of “kind” (cf. also “types” of animals or even political constitutions, and “features” of the soul).

b. The inner “constitution” of things is their phýsis. The phýsis of water or of a sickness or a person is its “proper nature.” A person’s “temperament” is also that person’s phýsis. Aristotle defines the phýsis of a thing as the end product of its development.

c. phýsis may often be used for what is human as distinct from what is nonhuman. Within humanity the nature of the male is distinguished from that of the female. The term also expresses the limitation and vulnerability of human existence. In contrast, that which transcends human weakness shares in the divine nature. Some deities are so by their true nature, others by human positing, e.g., by the divinizing of worthy rulers.

3. True Nature and Universal Nature.

a. Philosophy considers ontological questions from the twofold standpoint of the true nature of things and the origin of all being. The pre-Socratics examine the true nature of things—not personified universal nature, but true being in distinction from appearance.

b. Plato contests the validity of calling the material world phýsis, for, if phýsis is the primal origin of all things, then the soul is phýsis. In general, however, Plato avoids the term for higher stages of being. By phýsis he means primarily the “true being” or “idea” of a thing.

c. Aristotle tries to achieve a unified definition by discussing what is involved in the two main senses of origin and constitution. His analysis leads him to the two concepts of “essence” and “primal force.” The order of nature allows no operation of supernatural forces; anything against its normal operation is miracle. Nature is an autonomous force that allows no disorder, that adapts things to their ends, that has utility and beauty, and that constantly invents new things. The ideal form that is the origin and goal of movement is in indissoluble union with both divine essence and phenomenal nature.

d. In Hellenism we find an equation of phýsis as universal nature with deity (cf. both Stoicism and Epicureanism). The supreme God creates Phýsis by his word, and Phýsis plays a decisive role in creation. In the Gnostic sphere a distinction arises between two “natures,” that of heaven, sun, light, or day on the one side, that of earth, moon, darkness, and night on the other.

4. Nature and Ethics.

a. The antithesis of nature and law exerts a great influence on Greek thought. phýsis has to do with natural constitution, nómos with environment. The Sophists stress the utility of laws, although some younger Sophists reject nómos in the name of nature, which has an element of the necessary as distinct from what is arbitrary and conventional.

b. Among the pre-Socratics education combines with aptitude, but it is valued more highly than natural talent. Plato, however, does not build on phýsis, for what is right by nature may well be prejudicial to good education. Aristotle regards phýsis as the presupposition of ethical action but not its standard. Virtues do not arise by nature but as we act according to the understanding that is made possible by lógos.

c. phýsin échei can have the weaker sense “it is natural,” and we also find katá phýsin and pará phýsin (“according to” or “against nature”). These phrases occur in the ethical sphere, especially with a reference to sexual matters (e.g., pederasty).

5. Nature as a Cosmic and Vital Principle in Stoicism.

a. God, World, and Nature. Stoicism tries to overcome the antitheses of nature and reason. Nature is not just necessity but permeates the universe. It is both divine principle and primal matter. It is not opposed to téchnē but does all things artistically and purposefully.

b. Humanity as lógos and phýsis. The télos formula enables Stoicism to unite humanity with universal divine nature. Agreement with nature comes with appropriation of one's own lógos. We receive the lógos by nature, and it belongs to our nature that we can get what is good only by contributing to the general good.

c. katá and pará phýsin. For the Stoics katá phýsin summarizes the télos formula. Action katá phýsin aims at the full development of the self and perfect insight into nature. Health is katá phýsin at the primary level, while sound common sense tells us what is katá phýsin at the ethical level. The given order is often in fact the standard; thus it is pará phýsin ("against nature") to live with someone who is legally married to a third party.

d. The older Stoics do not use the phrase "natural law." Greek-speaking Stoics find it hard to combine the two terms phýsis and nómos. Cicero, however, uses lex maturae or naturalis, and Philo uses nómos physéōs. For the Greeks, phýsis is a final court. Since it can be known only rationally, it is open to discussion, along with its norms, but since it forms a causal nexus, it rules out human freedom except as free concurrence with nature (as in Stoicism) or as abandonment of the natural world (as in Gnosticism). Only the OT and NT belief in nature as God's creation can give significance to the concept of natural law (as in the Christian Apologists), for only in this context is there relationship with both the divine Creator and the divine Lawgiver as the ultimate critical authority.

B. Jewish Literature.

1. The LXX and Pseudepigrapha. There is no Hebrew original for phýsis and the term is rare. It occurs a few times in 3 and 4 Maccabees and Wisdom, and phýsis and physikós also occur in Testaments of the Twelve. In these works we find the usual senses "nature," "species," "aptitude," "universal nature" (contrasted with both law and reason in 4 Maccabees), and "physical nature." Wis. 13:1 says that the Gentiles are ignorant of God "by nature" (cf. in contrast Rom. 1:19ff.), and Test. Naph. 3:4-5 refers to the "natural order" that the "watchers" of Gen. 6:1ff. and the Sodomites pervert (cf. Rom. 1:18ff.).

2. Philo.

a. God and Universal Nature. A central concept for Philo, phýsis unites for him certain decisive elements in Greek thought and the OT. He describes nature as the creator and sustainer of all things, and hence furnishes it with divine predicates. As talent it is the basis of the learning to whose pinnacle God leads. It permeates the visible world and molds water and earth to produce the human form. Nature has given humanity the lógos which makes it social and civilized. It makes all people equal and free. As itself the world of visible things, it is distinct from God and its riches are inferior to those of wisdom. Visible nature consisting of matter contrasts with noetic nature, to which humanity, with its share of noús, belongs.

b. Nature and Law. The law of nature is the constitution of the cosmos when this is viewed as a city. This natural law is the OT law by which God made the world and cares for it. The true cosmopolitan acts according to the will of nature, i.e., the OT law (cf. Abraham). Individual laws are laws of nature; sexual aberrations violate natural law. Humanity has seven natural capacities (sexual potency, speech, and the five senses). The origin of evil lies in páthos, which is against nature.

3. Josephus. The word phýsis is common in Josephus. Topographically it denotes the setting or configuration of places. Other uses are for the "nature" of things, the "natural state," the "type," "true being," or "character." In the absolute, phýsis denotes "human nature" (usually in a bad sense). The divine nature differs from ours, which is also mortal. In some passages nature is an independent force; it makes certain areas beautiful, or commands paternal love in animals. Death is a law of nature, but so, too, is the desire to live. To deny burial is to violate the laws of nature. Sexual processes are according to nature, but not sexual lapses or physical deformity.

C. The NT.

1. General. The NT makes little use of phýsis. In this respect it makes the same theological decision as the OT, excluding natural theology.

2. Pauline Usage.

a. Paul uses katá and pará phýsin in Rom. 11:21, 24 in his comparison with the olive into which, contrary to their nature, branches of wild olive are grafted. The point here is that branches which do not belong to the tree by nature have no advantage over those that do. God can the more easily graft the latter back in again. In Rom. 2:27 the Gentiles are "by nature" the foreskin. Although unconverted, by their fulfilment of the law they will accuse Jews who have the law but do not fulfil it. The reference in Gal. 2:15 is to those who are Jews "by nature," i.e., by descent, but who realize that justification is now by faith.

b. Gal. 4:8 speaks about bondage to things that "by nature" are no gods. Paul probably refers to the elements here rather than specifically to the divinized natural forces of the Greeks. Acceptance of the law means a return to slavery under the cosmic elements. These elements are no gods; they have no essential divine qualities. In 1 Cor. 11:14 nature is personified as a teacher; it reminds us of what is seemly. There is no thought here of nature as a divine creator, and the example used is a common one in popular philosophy. In Rom. 1:18ff. Paul uses the common pará phýsin for perversions that are "against nature" and that are substituted for "natural" relations (with the usual sexual reference). In Rom. 2:1ff. Paul brings the Jews under the judgment that falls on the whole race. They have precedence only in judgment. Their superiority through possession of the law is challenged by the fact that Gentiles who do not have the law do it "by nature" (2:14) and are thus a law to themselves. Paul is not here appealing to nature as a court equal to God. Nor is he trying to show that the Gentiles have a share in the blessings of salvation. He is simply contesting the soteriological boasting of the Jews on the basis of possession of the law. The other side of the same coin in Eph. 2:3 is that Jewish Christians as well as Gentiles were by nature children of wrath, i.e., subject to the fall and divine judgment.

3. The Rest of the NT.

a. In a common comparison Jms. 3:7 uses phýsis twice, first for "kind" (of beasts), then for "human nature." 2 Pet. 1:4 presupposes the distinction between our weak mortal nature and the divine essence. The idea of participation in the divine nature possibly comes from Gnosticism but it is integrated here with future expectation.

b. 2 Pet. 2:12 uses physikós and the parallel Jude 10 has the adverb physikṓs. Jude 10 is arguing that the false teachers, who are probably claiming redemption from nature, are destroyed by things that they know only naturally and irrationally. 2 Pet. 2:12 carries a similar comparison. Those who claim to have knowledge are in fact like irrational animals, creatures of instinct.

D. Early Christian Writings.

1. Apostolic Fathers. In Barn. 10.7 phýsis has the sense of "gender," while Ignatius Ephesians 1:1 refers to the true "nature" of Christians (cf. also Trallians 1.1).

2. Apologists. In, Justin Apology 10.6 phýsis is "human nature." The power to distinguish good and evil is proper to our "nature" in Apology, Appendix 7.6. Justin Dialogue 45.3-4 equates the law with what is good "by nature," and in Apology, Appendix 2.4 Justin says that a dissolute life is "against nature." Paganism is absurd in its mythology, for there can be no single phýsis of the gods if they are in conflict (Aristides Apology 13.5-6).

3. Apocryphal Acts. Some of these works use phýsis frequently in such senses as the "natural world," "nature," "true essence" (e.g., of humanity or of individuals), and "proper nature" (cf. also the hidden nature of the devil).

4. Gnosticism. The Valentinians divide souls into those that are good and those that are evil "by nature." Pneumatics belong to the "divine nature"; the "nature" of the devil is not of the truth. The terms katá and pará phýsin also play a role. [H. KÖSTER, IX, 251-77]

phōnḗ [sound, speech, voice], phōnéō [to make a sound, speak], symphōnéō [to be in harmony with], sýmphōnos [harmonious], symphōnía [harmony], symphṓnēsis [agreement] phōnḗ.

A. The Greek World.

1. phōnḗ is the audible "sound" made by living creatures in the throat. It thus denotes the cry of the animal or song of the bird.

2. The main use, however, is for articulate human speech. phōnḗ is both the "voice" and the "sound" made by it. It is often a loud voice, but may denote any speaking or crying.

3. Greek has no special word for speech. phōnḗ, then, serves to denote the "faculty of speech" or the "speech" of a people.

4. A single statement or declaration can also be called phōnḗ (cf. also a message or a testamentary disposition).

5. phōnḗ is also the "voice" of deity either as organ or utterance. The divine voice of Zeus has numinous force. God shows himself through the voice. The shrine is the place where the divine voice goes forth. The Delphic Pythia mediates the divine voice. Socrates appeals to the divine voice as a directing force. The saying of a divine voice supposedly lies behind the legal order.

B. The OT.

1. phōnḗ is normally the rendering of Heb. qôl, which has the primary sense of "noise" (cf. the roar of water, swish of rain, rolling of an earthquake, sound of steps, trampling of horses, whistling of whips, noise of a camp, rustling of wings, crackling of fire, grinding of millstones, sound of horns, etc.).

2. qôl also denotes the sound made by animals, e.g., sheep, cattle, horses, lions, birds, turtledoves, or snakes.

3. qôl is especially the sound of the human voice in such senses as crying, lamenting, rejoicing, etc. One utters the voice, or lifts it up, or raises it, or speaks with a loud or high voice, or a lovely voice. The voice is individual and enables us to know the speaker. In dealings with God qôl may denote "petition" or "complaint," or it may take the form of praise, thanksgiving, etc., and it may may be loud or fervent.

Heb. Hebrew

4. In Ps. 19 day and night declare God's praise, although their voice is not heard. The cries of the seraphim cause the lintels to shake in Is. 6:3-4. The voice of the angel in Dan. 10:6 is like the noise of a crowd. A voice from heaven declares judgment in Dan. 4:28. The prophet hears a voice in Is. 40:3, 6. In general, however, there are few OT references to angelic voices.

5. God's self-revelation takes audible form; he is heard, though not seen. qôl refers to God in some 50 of 560 instances. God speaks to Moses. The thunder is his voice (cf. Ps. 29). His voice chases the primal waters (Ps. 104:7). It frightens Israel's foes (1 Sam. 7:10). The prophets refer to God's word, but not to his voice except in Is. 6:8; Ezek. 1:28-29. Their emphasis is on the message, not the sound. In Ex. 19:16ff. the sounds herald God's coming, but again the reference is not just to noise but to an intelligible voice. God causes his voice to be heard so as to instruct Israel (Dt. 4:36). By his qôl God declares his will for the people (5:25-26). 1 Kgs. 19 distinguishes the theophany and the voice. The people must hearken to God's voice, which comes as a summons in the form of the word, so that hearkening to the voice is keeping the law (Dt. 4:30; 8:20, etc.). This is the epitome of worship (Josh. 24:24) and obedience (Jer. 3:13), and it decides Israel's weal or woe (Dt. 8:20). Personified wisdom also actualizes God's voice (Prov. 1:20; 8:1; cf. Is. 18:23). The Servant of Is. 42:1ff. does not cry or lift up his voice.

C. Palestinian Judaism.

I. Apocalyptic Writings.

1. Noise and Sound. In these works qôl is used at times for the roaring of waters, the fuming of enemies, the noise of clouds, the sound of a host, or the sounding of horns.

2. Human Voice. qôl is more important as a human voice praising, sighing, laughing, or praying. Speech is a miracle of creation and the last time will bring miraculous phenomena of speech. Abel's soul lifts up its voice so that it is heard in heaven.

3. Angelic Voice. The angels praise God with one voice, heavenly voices laud human faithfulness, Michael speaks with God's voice, the voices of the heavenly hosts are raised in a cry of battle, the voice of one like the Son of Man causes foes to melt away, and the demons hearken to the voice of Mastema.

4. God's Voice. God's voice was heard in the past and is expected in the future. Angels control the voices of thunder. True Israelites hear God's voice. As Moses was its interpreter, so is the teacher of the Qumran sect. OT figures hear a voice from heaven whose author is God. God will speak to the high priest of the end time at his institution. A mighty voice will announce the last judgment.

II. Rabbinic Judaism.

1. Noise and Sound. qôl may be any noise or sound, e.g., that of a door opening, of children playing, etc. Three noises not heard are the sound of the sun, that of the city of Rome, and that of a departing soul.

2. Human Voice. qôl denotes the individual human voice in prayer, rejoicing, etc. A loud voice is unseemly in prayer, but the "Hear, O Israel" is to be recited out loud. qôl can also mean "rumor" or "report," and in a transferred sense we read of the voice of a scroll. Elijah will come before the Messiah and cause his voice to be heard in proclamation of God's glory.

3. Thunder. The voices of thunder come from God and serve as a universal declaration, e.g., on the death of a rabbi or the coming of the Messiah.

4. God's Voice at Sinai. Some rabbis think that God spoke directly to Israel at Sinai and not by a voice from heaven. Stress falls on the power and range of God's voice. The plural is taken by some to mean that the voice splits into 70 voices corresponding to the 70 languages of the earth, so that each people can hear it in its own tongue.

5. Heavenly Voice. After the second temple is destroyed there arises the idea that a voice from heaven replaces the prophets. The rabbis do not view this as a continuation of the older revelation, but apocalyptic and Josephus make less distinction; the belief in oracles has an impact. As distinct from the gift of the Spirit, the bath qôl sets up no lasting relationship with God. It can come to Gentiles too. It usually comes from heaven, and God is the speaker, often with accompanying phenomena such as thunder. Its task is to announce a judgment which is not in itself compelling or according to the common view. It may be a call to repentance, a cry of disaster, or an accusation. It often applies to individuals, either condemning the wicked or acknowledging the righteous. It plays a role in earlier periods when there is no prophecy. It can take the form of a chance human voice, e.g., a child reciting Scripture. To rabbis it may censure lack of interest or decide a difficult case. It often uses a text, applying the word to a specific situation or explaining a difficult OT saying.

D. Hellenistic Judaism.

1. The LXX. The LXX follows the OT use of qôl and almost always renders it by phō̂nḗ. The revelation of God is almost exclusively by the word; the LXX often translates passages that speak of seeing God in such a way that the element of vision drops out (cf. Ex. 24:9ff.; Job 19:25ff.). The plural phōnaí occurs in Ex. 9:24 (claps of thunder) but the singular phōnḗ in 20:18.

2. Aristobulus. Aristobulus guards against anthropomorphism by understanding God's voice as operation rather than spoken word (cf. creation as divine words). The Greeks follow Moses when speaking of God's voice relative to the cosmic structure.

3. Josephus. Josephus uses phōnḗ for "speech." For him the idea of God's voice expresses God's distance from us; the voice is not God himself (cf. Moses at the bush). The idea of the bath qôl occurs when Josephus refers to voices in the temple, e.g., before the outbreak of the Jewish war.

4. Philo. Philo uses phōnḗ for the audible "utterance" of living creatures. He reflects on the human voice. It serves to exalt the Creator and is an instrument of reason. The divine Spirit uses the human voice, which alone is articulate, as a medium. phōnḗ also means "language" for Philo. The race has one language prior to Babel. Philo stresses the miracle of the divine voice, which he differentiates from the thunder at Sinai. Strictly the process of revelation is inward, for God's voice is uniquely spiritual. It takes a visible form as light, but this depiction simply stresses its objectivity; the true speaking and receiving take a psychological and ethical form. The trumpet sound makes the law-giving at Sinai universal, but revelation applies only to Israel, which "sees being without voice and by the soul alone" (On the Giants 52; cf. On the Migration of Abraham 38).

E. The NT.

1. Noise and Sound. In the NT, under OT influence, phōnḗ often means "noise" or "sound," e.g., the rolling of wheels in Rev. 9:9, the grinding of millstones in 18:22, the noise of the crowd in 19:1, the rushing of the wind in Jn. 3:8, the melody of instruments in 1 Cor. 14:7, the sound of words in Lk. 1:44, the cry of grief in Mt. 2:18.

2. Human Voice. Rhoda knows Peter by his voice in Acts 12:14, the sheep know the shepherd's voice in Jn. 10:3-4, the best man rejoices at the bridegroom's voice in Jn. 3:29, Paul wants to use another tone of voice in Gal. 4:20, the Baptist is the voice in the wilderness in Mk. 1:3, and Rachel's voice laments in Mt. 2:18 etc. We find such expressions as raising the voice, crying, e.g., for mercy, and speaking haughtily (Rev. 13:5).

3. Loud Voice. The martyrs cry with a loud voice in Rev. 6:10, the angels praise God with a loud voice in 5:12, and voices are compared to lions (10:3), trumpets (1:10), waters (1:15), and thunder (Jn. 12:29-30). The loud cry of Jesus in Mk. 15:37 perhaps has the force of an epiphany (cf. also Mt. 27:50; Lk. 23:46). The shout of Acts 12:22 leads to God's judgment on Herod. Unclean spirits cry with a loud voice in Mk.

1:26; Acts 8:7. Paul heals with a loud voice in Acts 14:10, and Jesus raises Lazarus with a loud voice in Jn. 11:43 (cf. 5:28-29). A voice speaks to Paul on the Damascus road in Acts 9:4 (cf. v.7).

4. Cry, Word, Confession, Speech. phōnḗ may take the form of a "cry" (cf. Acts 19:34), a "word" (2 Pet. 1:17), a "confession" (Acts 24:21), or "speech" (2 Pet. 2:16).

5. God's Voice. The NT refers to God's speaking as the OT does. The seven thunders reply to the mighty angel in Rev. 10:3. The Son of Man utters a word of revelation in 1:10ff. The Sinai theophany finds an end-time parallel here. Acts 2 is also reminiscent of Sinai. The gospel of God's great acts in Christ now replaces the law. Jn. 5:37 resists any claim based on Dt. 4:12. Revelation reaches its climax with the coming of the Logos. Those who hear his voice move out of the sphere of death into that of eternal life (cf. 5:25, 28). To hear the shepherd's voice is to know and follow him (10:27). In this regard there are no national limits. All who are of the truth hear Jesus' voice (18:37). Yet it is possible to hear the voice, as to hear the sound of the wind, without knowing where it comes from or where it is going (3:8; cf. 8:14). Heb. 12:18ff. offers another comparison with Sinai. At the end God will shake heaven as well as earth. Everything created will be changed, but what cannot be shaken will remain. Heb. 1:1ff. finds in the word of the Son a climax to the word of the prophets (cf. also 2:2). Now that God has spoken through the Son, the great "today" has come in which God's voice sounds forth in the church's preaching, which ends with the sabbath of the eschaton.

6. The Heavenly Voice. Heavenly voices are common in Revelation (10:8; 11:12, etc.). They come from the sanctuary, throne, or altar, and are uttered by the beasts or the Son of Man in the form of commands, charges, or assertions. Acts enhances the sense of God's transcendence by references to the voice from heaven (7:31; 10:13ff.; 11:9). At Jesus' baptism a voice from heaven confirms his messiahship. God is the speaker, and the address is directly to Jesus (Mk. 1:11). At the transfiguration the voice from the cloud transfers authority to Jesus (Mk. 9:7). In 2 Pet. 1:16ff. this voice guarantees the truth of the apostolic message. In Jn. 12:20ff. a voice from heaven confirms the glorifying of God's name. This voice is for the sake of the people, not of Jesus himself (v. 30), but the people do not understand it (v. 29). Revelation does not come by a direct voice from heaven.

F. Gnosticism.

1. In Gnostic thinking the "call" plays a considerable role. First it is the human call for redemption, or the call of the oppressed.

2. Then in many forms we find the supraterrestrial call that brings redemption. Thus we have the voice of a dove, the heavenly voice, the voice of the redeemer, or the voice of the heavenly man. The voice comes from the upper kingdom, from on high, from concealment, or from outside. The voice is bright, sublime, wonderful, soft, or pure. The call may come through emissaries, helpers, the shepherd, the fisherman, etc. The heavenly messenger can bear the name Call. The first, great, or sacred call is Christ. A first duty is to hear the call in faith, then to pass it on. The call is an awakening out of sleep, and it insures the return of the soul to its heavenly home unless one turns aside from it in sin. The call, then, has much the same function as the OT law or as the Holy Spirit.

3. We also read of an opposing call of wicked forces which is rebellious or vain. The call can take form, e.g., in the planets or signs of the zodiac.

G. The Early Church. Ignatius uses the metaphor of a choir in Ephesians 4.2. He himself mediates God's voice in Philadelphians 7.1. Mart. Pol. 9.1 mentions a voice from heaven. Barn. 9.2 makes eternal life dependent on hearing the voice of the Son. In Justin phōnḗ is "spoken word" in Dialogue 131.2 and "speech" in Apology 31.1. The prophets proclaim God's phōnḗ in Dialogue 119.6. Christ calls out of the wicked world in 119.5. OT quotations are phōnaí in 21.1. Papias values the living voice, i.e., oral tradition (Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 3.39.4).

1. The Greek World. phōnéō denotes the producing of a sound or noise, usually by living creatures, and especially by people in such senses as “to speak,” “to sing,” “to address,” “to call to,” “to reply to,” “to invoke,” “to order (someone) to,” “to speak about something,” or “to tell something.”

2. Hellenistic Judaism.

a. phōnéō is rare in the LXX. We find it for the pealing of trumpets (Am. 3:6), the cries of animals (Is. 38:14), and various kinds of speaking (Ps. 115:5; Is. 8:19) or crying (4 Macc. 15:21).

b. Philo uses phōnéō for “to lift up the voice,” “to speak openly.” In a transferred sense it expresses for him the capturing of the senses by visible objects.

3. The NT.

a. phōnéō in the NT means loud speaking, calling, or crying, whether by humans, angels, or demons. In Lk. 8:54 it denotes the word of power which raises the dead. In Luke and John it may also have the force of “to summon” (cf. Lk. 16:2; Jn. 2:9). In Mk. 15:35 the onlookers think Jesus is calling for the eschatological deliverer, while in Mk. 10:49 a turning point comes for the blind man when Jesus calls him with a mighty eschatological summons (cf. Jn. 1:48; 11:28). Those whom the shepherd calls by name know that they are his (10:3). In Jn. 11:43 the calling of Lazarus from the tomb is equivalent to raising him from the dead (12:17). In Lk. 14:12 the meaning is “to invite,” and “to name” or “address as” is the point in Jn. 13:13.

b. The “crowing” of the cock is meant in Mk. 14:30; Mt. 26:34; Lk. 22:24. Since the cock crows between midnight and 3 a.m., the third watch is alektorophōnía, “the time of the crowing of the cock.”

4. The Apostolic Fathers. This word does not occur in these works.

symphōnéō, sýmphōnos, symphōnía, symphṓnēsis.

A. The Greek World.

1. symphōnéō.

a. This verb means “to agree or be in harmony with.” It is used for musical harmony, and also for the fitting together of stones in a building.

b. The word also has a more common transferred sense for the agreement of, e.g., texts or opinions.

c. A further sense is “to reach agreement,” “to come to terms,” in treaties and especially contracts. In a bad sense the term may also mean “to conspire.”

2. sýmphōnos.

a. This word means “harmonious,” “consonant,” mostly in a transferred sense, e.g., with reference to movements, statements, records, or partners.

b. tó sýmphōnon means “agreement,” “arrangement.”

c. The adverb symphṓnōs also occurs.

d. In a passive sense sýmphōnos means “arranged.”

3. symphōnía.

a. This word first denotes the “harmony” of sounds.

b. We then find it for a musical instrument or an orchestra.

c. In a transferred sense it is the “harmony” of thought and life, or the “agreement” of theory and facts, or inner “harmony” of the self, or the “harmony” of beautiful soul and body.

d. Commercially it has the sense of “contract.”

B. The OT and Judaism.

1. In the LXX symphōnéō is used for concerted planning, conspiring, agreeing, or corresponding. symphōnía occurs only in 4 Macc. 14:3 for the "concord" of the seven brothers.

2. In Dan. 3:5, 15 Θ we find the term for a musical instrument. In this sense Aramaic adopts it as a loanword, possibly for a double flute or a bagpipe.

3. Philo uses symphōnía for musical harmony.

4. Josephus uses the verb for the agreement of historical accounts, for the attempt to reach a common concept of God, and for the harmony of thought and life achieved by the Jewish people on the basis of the law.

5. Apocalyptic shows a concern for the harmonious order of the world. The law, which also shapes the social order, is what leads Judaism to this sense of harmony.

C. The NT.

1. In the NT symphōnéō means "to correspond," "to be at one," "to agree." In Lk. 5:36 the new cloth does not fit in with the old. In Acts 15:15, however, the words of Scripture agree with eschatological events on the mission field. The common content of prayer is at issue in Mt. 18:19; God's assent follows the disciples' agreement. Agreement in a wicked plan is what Peter has in mind in his charge against Sapphira in Acts 5:9. An oral agreement about wages is meant in the parable in Mt. 20:2, 13.

2. The phrase ek symphṓnou, which occurs in contracts, expresses in 1 Cor. 7:15 the consent of the two partners in accordance with v. 4.

3. The elder brother hears symphōnía in Lk. 15:25, i.e., "music," possibly that of the flute, although "song" and the "bagpipe" have also been suggested.

D. The Early Church.

1. Ignatius uses the group to depict the unity of the church in Ephesians 4.1-2.

2. Gnosticism uses symphōnéō and sýmphōnos to express the agreement of the heavenly aeons or the agreement of the Son of Man with Sophia. Lack of agreement, e.g., between Sophia and Spirit, brings disaster. [O. BETZ, IX, 278-309]

phṓs [light], phōtízō [to shine, make known], phōtismós [shining, illumination], phōteinós [light, clear], phōsphóros [bearing light, morning star], phōstḗr, [gleam], epiphaúskō [to shine forth], epiphṓskō [to shine forth]

A. The Group in Greek.

1. Usage.

a. phṓs, meaning "light," occurs from Homer, but the derivatives are late.

b. phōtízō means "to shine" or "to illumine," and in a transferred sense "to make known."

c. phōtismós means "shining"; it is rare.

d. phōstḗr, also rare, means "gleam."

e. phōsphóros means "bringing morning light," or as a noun "morning star."

f. phōteinós means "light" or in a transferred sense "clear."

g. epiphaúskō and epiphṓskō, both rare and late, mean "to shine forth."

2. Meaning. phṓs, used in both a literal and a transferred sense, has the meanings "daylight," "sunlight," "brightness," "shining," and "lamp." Light is both a medium and object of sight. It enables us to grasp and master the world; to see it is life. Light brings freedom, deliverance, and hope. It is thus an object of praise. It denotes what is publicly known. It accompanies divine manifestations. The light of knowledge brings illumination.

3. Light and Illumination in Philosophy.

a. The pre-Socratics treat light simply as a physical phenomenon, but Parmenides speaks of the way to truth as a way to light, i.e., to being, or to God.

b. Early dualism refers to primal chaos or night but does not develop the antithesis of light and darkness.

c. Light and darkness are among the ten antithetical principles for the Pythagoreans.

d. Plato develops a metaphysics of light. True being is light, there is an ascent to light, ideas are light, knowledge gives light to being, light and truth correspond. Illumination for Plato is ontological; in inquiry one understands oneself in the light of the disclosure of the object.

e. Aristotle compares the activity of the noús to light. If for Plato things are light, for Aristotle the noús illumines them.

4. Light in the Cultus. In the cult of the dead light drives out demons. New light is hailed in the mysteries. Light is at first epiphany rather than personal illumination. Later, interest focuses on the goal with the idea of a mystical ascent to light.

B. The Group in the OT.

1. Background. The primary reference in the Near Eastern world is to the light of day, but sun, light, salvation, and life soon come into association, and the predicates of light are also transferred to bearers other than the sun. In Iran we find spheres of brightness and darkness but no early development of the antithesis. Later, light and darkness play an important role; they dominate the Mandaean writings.

2. Usage. The group 'wr, used both literally and in a transferred sense, is the main one for light. From it we find the verb "to shine," "to cause to shine," and the noun "daylight" or "starlight," the "light" that characterizes natural and spiritual life. Of the 200 instances of the root, 137 are rendered by phṓs and cognates. Light is not so much an object of sight in the OT, nor does it have attributes. The transferred use presupposes movement in a space that may be a sphere of light or darkness, with both salvation and perdition as possibilities, but with an orientation to salvation.

3. General. Light is experienced brightness, the sphere of natural life. Earthly light neither derives from transcendent light nor is contrasted with it. Radiance surrounds God, but God's glory is not light. God is our light (Ps. 27:1), and he causes his light to shine (Job 37:3). But light denotes relation, not being. It is a term for true life or salvation (cf. Ps. 36:9). To see it is to live (Job 3:16). Salvation is to be in the light, and light and joy go together (Ps. 97:11). Theophany is the theme in Job 37:15, and creation in Is. 45:7. Praise (Ps. 104:2), prayer (43:3), and teaching (Prov. 4:18) are all related to it.

4. God. God is Lord of light and darkness (Am. 5:8). Light is his sphere (Ps. 104:2). He has created, but may also interrupt, the order of day and night (cf. Josh. 10:12-13). Light is God in action (Ps. 44:3). His face shines (4:6). He is manifested in the cloud that sends forth light (Job 37:15) or in the pillar of fire (Ps. 78:14). No darkness can hide from him (Ps. 139:11-12). He is resplendent (Is. 42:16ff.), and he brings what is hidden to light (Job 12:22).

5. The World. God has created the world. Is. 45:7 associates cosmology and soteriology by linking light and darkness with salvation and perdition. Gen. 1 refers to creation by the word and distinguishes light from light-bearers as God first creates light and then the sun, moon, and stars to carry it, and to establish the rhythm of day and night.

6. Eschatology. The expectation is that God’s coming day will be a day of light (though cf. Am. 5:18). The beginning may be dark, but then light will shine for Israel (Is. 30:26; Zech. 14:6-7). God will be its eternal light (Is. 60:1ff.).

7. Anthropology. Wisdom is compared to light (Eccl. 2:13). It excels folly as light does darkness (8:1). The law is light (Ps. 19:8). Light is already present (56:13), but is also coming (112:4). The wise are enlightened; the law is their light (119:105). They go in the light (Prov. 4:18), or with a light (Job 29:3). They pray for light (Ps. 4:6).

C. Judaism.

1. General. Judaism, like the OT, uses the terms in the fields of cosmology, eschatology, and ethics. Light is the brightness of the world, salvation, and wisdom. God causes his light to shine, or gives light, through wisdom or the law. Salvation is now more individual, and there is a sharper duality as the light of the law comes into contrast with the darkness of Adam. Jub. 2:2ff. depicts creation more spatially and statically. Slav. En. 25ff. attaches more importance to the stars and to the annual rather than the daily rhythm. The idea of primal light arises. Eschatologically the element of time becomes more important, and a transcendent world of light, of full and eternal brightness, stands over against the present world of darkness. The law, as light, also confronts darkness. Light and darkness thus become moral qualities.

2. Special Features. Note should be taken of the idea of wisdom as primal light (Wis. 7:29-30), the use of Greek philosophy in exposition of Gen. 1 (Aristobulus in Eusebius Preparation for the Gospel 13.12.9-10), and the development of a cosmological conversion idiom.

3. Qumran.

a. The dualism of eschatological decision dominates the Scrolls. There may be some Iranian influence here, but the cosmology is strongly monotheistic. Light and darkness are spheres but also paths. The children of light, who are marked by confession of sin, thanksgiving, and the doing of works of light, are at enmity with the children of darkness in an anticipation of the final conflict.

b. The Testaments of the Twelve is more Hellenistic. The light of the law or of knowledge or righteousness is to the fore. Being precedes works; one can do the works of light only when already in the light (Test. Naph. 2:10).

4. Rabbinic Literature. The rabbis use light for the law, for the age of salvation, for the Messiah, for God, for the righteous, for the temple, for the works of the righteous, and for the human soul.

D. Hellenism and Gnosticism.

1. General. Along classical lines, light is still what is grasped philosophically or speculatively, but in Hellenistic fashion it is now also the reality of saving power or the sphere of salvation. There is no consistent development. The world may be compared to light, the mysteries speak of illumination, and the idea of a transcendent world of brightness is present. As regards salvation, light is both a sphere and a substance (cf. the concept of the light-soul). Illumination is ascent and change. The main contrast is between divine light and earthly or human light. Darkness is the sphere one leaves behind in a movement to illumination. This is deification; it brings knowledge by translation into a transcendent substance.

2. Philo. Philo belongs to the illumination group. The antithesis for him is between heavenly and earthly light. The divine world, as light, is the presupposition of earthly light and also of the possibility of the vision of light in mystical ascent. God is the source of purest radiance, prior to every archetype. The lógos, a middle being, is also light. Intelligible light is its eikṓn. Transcendence receives added emphasis. The lógos is the enlightening power in conversion. One can reach light only through light. If divine light is too strong for human vision, the divine pneúma impels the human noús and makes new vision possible in self-transcendence. By the world of ideas the royal way leads to the vision of God. If deification threatens, Philo guards against this by insisting on revelation and on the linking of light to the law. Philo also uses the vocabulary of conversion; this is for him a transition from darkness to light.

3. Gnosticism. Two types may be distinguished. In the one darkness is an emanation from light by weakening or a fall; in the other preexistent darkness revolts against the world of light. Only in the latter, Iranian, type is there a stricter dualism. In the former, which is more common, the orientation is to light and redemption, as one sees in the liturgies. Darkness has importance only as the whence of redemption. In Gnosticism light is the formless space of the world. It is also the self of the redeemed. Illumination is the kindling of the spark of light imprisoned in darkness or matter. It is transformation in light, or deification. Redemption is the ascent of the redeemed to light. Light and life are identical; both are transcendent.

4. Corpus Hermeticum. Darkness is bracketed here by light; it comes from it alone. Light is both sphere and substance. Earthly light and divine light stand in antithesis. Light mediates between God and humanity. Light and life are a primal unity. In knowledge we find our origin in light and the way back to it. Illumination is the presupposition, and this means deification, anticipated already in ecstasy, and worked out to some degree in the asceticism which signifies regeneration from self-alienation. The redeemed are awakened by a call, but only the illuminated can be awakened.

5. The Mandaeans. Mandaean writings combine the two main types, so that the data are not uniform. The main points are that light is transcendent, that it is identical with deity, that it differs totally from earthly brightness, that it is the living power in creation, that even in the present dark house we live by it and it is our true being, that redemption comes through an envoy from the kingdom of light, that his revelation is illumination, that it brings a call to awakening, that this call imparts knowledge of present lostness but also of origin in light, that the redeemed are to clothe themselves with light, and that light is finally victorious.

6. Manicheeism. In this system the visible light of sun and moon is true light. Duality arises as two primal spheres confront one another in absolute antithesis. As in cosmology, so in psychology and ethics the conflict is absolute; there are no gradations of good and evil, and total separation is both necessary and possible. Although darkness actively resists light, the triumph of the latter is certain, for light is at one with itself, whereas darkness is inwardly divided. Soteriology takes both a mythical and an existential form. The point of the dualism is decision based on the prior derivation of the self from light. It is by preaching that separation or redemption takes place, and the elect actualize the separation in ethical action.

7. Odes of Solomon. In this work light is the place of the redeemed. There is a walk or ascent to it. It is also the essence of the redeemed, put on like a garment. It is transcendent and banishes darkness. As revelation, it goes hand in hand with knowledge, truth, and life. Radiance marks both redeemer and redeemed.

8. Christian Gnosticism. This movement contributes nothing new. It simply offers variations on old themes, sometimes in Gnostic versions of NT sayings. The dualism can be strong, but light is primary. Light is God and his world. God is in pure light. Light is indescribable, infinite, etc. Salvation is illumination in a transition from darkness to light. Knowledge is knowledge of the self as a being of light. Redemption is the release of the particle of light from the bonds of darkness.

E. The NT.

I. Occurrence. The noun phṓs is the most common term, phōtízō occurs 11 times, phōtismós in 2 Cor. 4:4, 6, phōteinós in Mk. 6:22 and parallels and 17:5, phōstḗr in Phil. 2:15; Rev. 21:11; phōsphóros in 2 Pet. 1:19, epihaúskō in Eph. 5:14, and epiohṓskō in Mt. 28:1; Lk. 23:54. Only phṓs is theologically significant.

II. Synoptic Gospels and Acts.

1. Literal. Sometimes we have a literal use, as at the epiphany in Mt. 17:5. Light from heaven shines in Acts 9:3; 22:6, 9, 11; 26:13. Fire in Mk. 14:54, a lamp in Lk. 8:16, and a torch in Acts 16:29 are bearers of light. God is the Father of lights (the stars) in Jms. 1:17. Mt. 6:23 has in view the source of light as a figure of inner light.

2. Figurative. Mt. 4:16 quotes Is. 8:23-24 with a reference to both the teaching and the person of Jesus. The OT describes persons as light in Is. 42:6; 49:6, and in the NT cf. Lk. 2:32; Acts 13:47. Jesus is the light of the world in Jn. 8:12; 12:35. In Mt. 5:14ff. both the disciples and their works serve as light; one cannot abstract the one from the other.

3. Transferred. Light signifies openness in Mt. 10:27 and parallels. What Jesus teaches privately, the disciples will declare openly. Christ proclaims light in Acts 26:23. Conversion means moving from darkness to light in Eph. 5:8; 1 Pet. 2:9. Believers are children of light in Lk. 16;8; Jn. 12:36; 1 Th. 5:5; Eph. 5:8. The context gives the sense in each case; in Lk. 16:8 the contrast is with the children of this aeon (not of darkness) (cf. Lk. 20:34).

III. The Pauline Corpus.

1. Paul. Paul follows Jewish usage in a mostly eschatological context. The last day will bring to light what is hidden (1 Cor. 4:5; cf. 2 Cor. 5:10). The Jewish view controls Rom. 2:19; Paul turns it against itself. The lord of darkness and angels of light are in conflict in 2 Cor. 11:14; the former uses the stratagem of appearing as one of the latter. Phil. 2:15 depicts eschatological life as an illumining that is already present (cf. 1 Th. 5:5). Rev. 13:12 bases the appeal on which should motivate a replacement of the works of darkness with the armor of light. In 2 Cor. 4:4ff. Paul relates creation and conversion. Conversion is an eschatological new creation. The link with knowledge and shining shows that a process or movement is in view. The exhortation is dualistic in 2 Cor. 6:14ff., which aims to show that believers can have no fellowship with the wicked.

2. Colossians and Ephesians. These epistles reflect current usage. Thus phṓs in Col. 1:12 is the transcendent sphere depicted as Christ’s kingdom. The style is that of conversion with an element of realized eschatology inasmuch as the deliverance is already effected (yet not to the exclusion of the transcendence of the sphere nor of upward movement to it, 3:1ff.). Eph. 5:8ff. adopts the style of eschatological light—exhortation within a schema of once (skótos) and now (phṓs). The terms sound Gnostic, but phṓs is a sphere, not a substance, the idea of new creation is present, “in the Lord” should be noted, and the basis is the Pauline relation between indicative and imperative. If illumination constitutes the transition, it is the capacity for active knowledge. Eph. 3:9 takes up the concept of a mystery that God now makes people see through preaching. The content of the mystery is the economy of salvation. Eph. 5:14, using the rare epihaúskō, quotes from an unknown source; if the saying has a Gnostic ring, Ephesians gives it an ethical thrust.

3. The Pastorals. In 2 Tim. 1:10 Christ has not merely shown the mystery but effectively manifested it (phōtízō).

IV. Johannine Writings.

1. The Gospel. Since the OT alone hardly seems adequate to explain the use of light and darkness by John, scholars have proposed various other historical backgrounds, e.g., Philo, Stoicism, Platonism, Gnosticism, and Qumran. As regards motifs, dualism is too simple to play an expository role, for there are different forms of dualism. John can use phṓs in the literal sense, e.g., for the light of the lamp in 5:35, or for brightness in 3:20-21. Vacillation between the literal and the figurative is present in 12:35-36, where the brightness of the day signifies the presence of revelation or of the Revealer. Illumination here makes movement possible, but it is restricted to the time of Jesus or of the church’s preaching. Revelation, then, is once-for-all and urgently demands decision. We must believe in the light so as to become its children (12:36). The equation of light with the Revealer rules out metaphysical and cosmological speculation. Knowledge of light is faith focused on him who is the light of the world (8:12). Whether the ego is subject or predicate, the statement is meant to be literal; Jesus is the true light, and the article denotes the exclusiveness of revelation. The same statement in 9:5 indicates the temporal nature of the revelation, and in 12:46 it formulates the goal. In distinction from Qumran the statement allows of no sphere of light independent of the Revealer. In Jn. 1:1ff. light comes into association with life and the Logos. The life was the light of men, and the Logos was the (true) light. The predicate of v. 4 becomes the subject of v. 5. The verb phaínō expresses the work of light and the verb phōtízō in v. 9 its effect. These verbs, unlike those of v. 4 and vv. 6ff., are in the present tense. The Logos came into history but the revelation endures. The word "true" bears an exclusive sense (v. 9). This light alone is really light. Notwithstanding Gnostic parallels, the meaning is nonmythological. This comes out in 3:19. The manifestation of light is judgment; it brings a cleavage between faith and unbelief. A prior human decision is taken in favor of evil. People hate the light. Revelation brings to light what they really are. When the light appears, those whose works are evil love the darkness, but those who do what is true come to the light.

2. 1 John. This work uses only the noun, and only in 1:5, 7 and 2:8ff. The main thesis is that God is light (1:5); light defines his nature. The statement has a hortatory aim. Fellowship with God is a walk in light, i.e., in truth and love. Part of this walk is confession of sins. In 2:8ff. this walk is possible because the true light now shines- true now in distinction from false. The dispelling of darkness means that love is now possible as the ontic ground of fellowship with God. phṓs defines both the conduct of believers (1:5ff.) and their relation to God (2:8ff.).

V. The Rest of the NT.

1. Hebrews. Hebrews uses phōtízō twice with reference to the beginning of the Christian life as illumination (6:4; 10:32). The word is not here a technical term for baptismal illumination.

2. James. Jms. 1:17-18 refers to God as the "Father of lights." The reference is probably to the stars, with an apocalyptic ring. In itself cosmological, the expression is linked with a soteriological saying.

3. 1 Peter. 1 Pet. 2:9 is an example of a conversion saying. The apocalyptic motif of the brightness of the end time finds a parallel in Rev. 18:1 (cf. 21:23; 22:5).

F. The Early Church.

1. Apostolic Fathers. The words for light play no great part in these works. Some OT quotations occur, as in 1 Clem. 16.12. OT usage continues in 1 Clem. 36.2. Light is linked with life and knowledge in 1 Clem. 59.2. Jesus is light in Diog. 9.6. Ignatius Romans addresses the community as enlightened. Barn. 18.1 contrasts the ways of light and darkness (cf. life and death in Did. 1ff.).

2. Baptism as phōtismós. Justin develops the technical use of phōtismós (illumination) for baptism (Apology 61.12; Dialogue 122.5). Baptism is phṓtisma in Clement of Alexandria Paedagogus 1.6.26.2. Clement offers a different explanation from that of Justin, who refers to the light that Christian teaching brings to the understanding. [H. CONZELMANN, IX, 310-58][20]

A. Secular Greek.

1. Usage.

a. As a phenomenon or feeling, "joy" is a culmination of being that raises no problems as such and that strains beyond itself.

b. chaírō means "to rejoice," "to be merry." chaíre serves as a morning greeting. It is above all a greeting to the gods and is a stereotyped ending to hymns. The verb is also an epistolary formula in greetings from sender to recipient.

c. chará means "rejoicing," "joy," "merriness."

2. Philosophy.

a. Philosophy reflects on joy. For Plato it is much the same as hēdonḗ.

b. hēdonḗ almost completely replaces it in Aristotle with little distinction.

c. For the Stoics chará is a special instance of hēdonḗ. Since the Stoics regard emotions as defective judgment of the lógos, they tend to view chará negatively. But they mitigate this verdict by classifying it as a "good mood" of the soul rather than an emotion (páthē).

3. Religious Connection. Hellenism uses chará for festal joy. It takes on an eschatological character in expectations of a world savior.

B. The OT. In the OT the experience and expression of joy are close, as the terms for joy (usually śmḥ) and its expression show. Joy expresses the whole person and aims at sharing, as in festal joy. God's work of salvation is a chief occasion (Pss. 5:11;, 9:2; 16:9, etc.). The law is an object in Ps. 119:14, the word of God in Jer. 15:16. Joy is a reward for faithfulness to the law in Is. 65:13-14. There is joy at weddings (Jer. 25:10) and at harvest (Is. 9:2). God himself rejoices (Is. 65:19), and thanksgiving demands joy (Dt. 16:13ff.). Feasts offer occasions for joy before God (Dt. 2:7). Hymnal jubilation expresses devotion to God (Joel 2:21). In accordance with its inner intention, OT joy culminates in eschatology (Pss. 14:7; 126:2; Is. 9:2; 12:6, etc.). High points in the prophets carry the call: chaíre (Zeph. 3:14ff.; Joel 2:21 ff.;, Zech. 9:9-10).

C. Judaism.

1. Qumran. At Qumran we find the OT motifs of joy in God, of God's own joy, and of eschatological joy. The elect can rejoice in spite of present suffering because they know that they are in God's hand.

2. Rabbinic Writings. Here, too, we find festal joy, which God gives and into which it is a duty to enter. Joy is joy before God. The meal is part of the joyful festival. A significant thought is that of perfect future joy.

3. Philo. The group is a significant one in Philo. He relates joy to religious "intoxication." Joy is a supreme "good mood." It is the opposite of fear. Isaac is its OT symbol. God is the giver of joy, and its objects are health, freedom, honor, the good, the beautiful, and worship. While joy is a "good mood" Philo does not view it in Stoic fashion as a self-achieved harmony of soul. Joy is native to God alone; we find it only in God. It comes with virtue and wisdom. But this is possible only on the presupposition that by way of the lógos God himself is the giver.

D. The NT.

OT Old Testament

NT New Testament

1. Usage. In the NT chaírō is the secular term and agalliáomai the religious term, but the two may be synonymous (cf. Rev. 19:7), and they are associated, e.g., in Mt. 5:12; 1 Pet. 4:13. The participle means "full of joy" in Lk. 19:6. Various constructions are used, e.g., accusative, dative, epí with dative, diá with accusative, en, hóti, and participle. The greeting with chaírein occurs only in Acts 15:23; 23:26; Jms. 1:1. The greeting chaíre (Mk. 15:18; Mt. 26:49; 27:29; Jn. 19:3) may mean "rejoice" rather than "greetings" in Lk. 1:28, where kecharitōménē ("favored one") gives it special significance. The meanings of both verb and noun are to be sought in the contexts in which they are used.

2. The Synoptics and 1 Peter. The group is common only in Luke, which refers to joy at finding what is lost (15:5ff.), at one's name being written in heaven (10:20), at the coming of the Savior (1:14), and at the acts of Jesus (13:17). The mood of the people is one of joy in 18:43, as is that of the disciples after the ascension in 24:52. There is joy at epiphany in Mt. 2:10. Even trials are an occasion of joy (Jms. 1:2). Suffering is a testing of faith (1 Pet. 1:6-7) with a christological basis (2:20ff.; 4:12ff.). One should not just rejoice "in" suffering but "at" suffering (Acts 5:41). Already in Mt. 5:11-12 Jesus forges a link between joy and persecution. The hope of future glory adds an eschatological dimension in 1 Pet. 4:12ff. Heb. 10:32ff. presents another version of the same tradition that one should suffer with joy for faith's sake and with the hope of imminent deliverance.

3. The Pauline Corpus.

a. For Paul chará is the joy of faith (Phil. 1:25) and a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5:22). God's kingdom is joy (Rom. 14:17). Joy and hope are related (Rom. 12:12). Its opposite is affliction (cf. Rom. 5:1 ff.). Joy actualizes freedom and takes shape in fellowship (12:15). Paul wants to come with joy (15:32). Joy is reciprocal (Phil. 2:28-29). Joy is in God (1 Th. 3:9) or in the Lord (Phil. 3:1). In the relation between Paul and the church, joy is eschatological; the church will be his joy (1 Th. 2:19). The mood of Philippians is one of joy (1:4). This is joy at the preaching of Christ (1:18). It is future joy experienced as joy in the present (4:1). As the joy of faith it includes a readiness for martyrdom (1:25). This joy maintains itself in face of affliction (2 Cor. 7:4ff.). Paul himself, like the Lord, is an example in this regard (1 Th. 1:6). Paul's apostolic authority works for the joy of the church (2 Cor. 1:24). He rejoices in his own weakness when it means the church's strength (13:9).

b. There is nothing new in later works. chaírō occurs in Col. 1:24; 2:5, and chará in Col. 1:11; 2 Tim. 1:4. The most important aspect is that of joy in suffering.

4. The Johannine Writings. Jn. 4:36 adopts the image of harvest joy and Jn. 3:29 that of wedding joy. The time of joy has come with Jesus. The Baptist's joy is fulfilled because its object is now present. In 8:56 chaírō is the anticipation, agalliáomai the fulfilment. "Perfect joy" is the climax (15:11; 16:24; 17:13; 1 Jn. 1:4; 2 Jn. 12). The disciples should rejoice at Jesus' death, for it means exaltation. Jesus does not censure the disciples' sorrow but shows how the resurrection turns it into chará (16:20ff.). The association with peace brings out the eschatological nature of joy (14:27). In 15:11 the joy is Jesus' joy in his people. If keeping the commandments is the occasion of joy, there is no legalism here. Love is not the way to attain eschatological life but the leading of this life. The world rejoices at the sorrow of the disciples, thinking it has triumphed by destroying Jesus, but this victory is only for the moment (16:20). By promise the church has already moved on from sorrow to joy. The world's hostility remains (15:18-19), but this very fact

---

cf. confer, compare

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

shows that joy cannot be lost. Its perfection rests on its lack of any perceptible ground from the world's standpoint. In practice, joy is the possibility of prayer, which brings its fulfilment (16:24).

E. The Apostolic Fathers. God rejoices in the good works of creation, and believers should also rejoice in good works (1 Clem. 33.7-8). Joy is a reward for excess works (Hermas Similitudes 5.3.3).

F. Gnosticism. Gnosticism refers to joy at the vision of God. Joy is now a constituent part of human nature. Joy is in the Lord, the saints rejoice from the heart, the gospel of truth is joy, there is for the Mandaeans a great day of joy, and the Manichees speak of an ascent into the aḗr of joy.

cháris, charízomai, charitóō, acháristos.

A. Secular Greek.

1. Usage.

a. cháris is what delights. It may be a state causing or accompanying joy. It is joyous being or "charm," the element of delight in the beautiful, the favor shown by fortune, i.e., what is pleasing in it. As a mood cháris means "sympathy" or "kindness," with a reference to the pleasure that is caused. In certain expressions the idea of "thanks" is brought out, and cháris with the genitive has the sense of "for the sake of," "out of consideration for." Aeschylus uses cháris for the "favor" of the gods, but cháris is not a central religious or philosophical term. In Plato it has the meanings "good pleasure," "goodwill," "favor," "pleasure," "what pleases," and "thanks." Stoicism stresses the disposition, but the aesthetic aspect persists even in ethics.

b. The verb charízomai means "to show pleasure" or "to show oneself to be pleasant," and in the passive, especially the perfect, "to be agreeable."

c. charitóō has not been found prior to Sir. 18:17.

d. acháristos means "without charm" or "ungrateful."

2. Hellenism.

a. In Hellenism cháris becomes a fixed term for the "favor" shown by rulers, with such nuances as "gracious disposition" or "gracious gift." cháris may also be ascribed to other dignitaries. Philosophy discusses the "grace" and "wrath" of the gods. The Epicureans deny these; the Stoics accept grace but not wrath. In recipients, cháris denotes "thanks."

b. In a second development Hellenism stresses the power in cháris. This power, which comes from the world above, appears in the divine man and expresses itself in magic. [H. CONZELMANN, IX, 359-76]

B. The OT.

1. ḥnn and Derivatives.

a. The LXX uses cháris especially for Heb. ḥēn, which seems to derive from the widespread verbal stem ḥnn, found in Ancient Babylon, Akkadian, and Assyrian, and also in Ugaritic, Aramaic, Syriac, and Arabic.

---

i.e. id est, that is

LXX Septuagint

Heb. Hebrew

b. The verbal stem denotes a gracious disposition that finds expression in a gracious action (cf. Gen. 33:5; Ps. 119:29). The construction with accusative of person brings out the thrust, namely, gracious address to another. We find an impersonal object only marginally, as in Ps. 102:14. What is in view is the process whereby one who has something turns graciously to another who is in need. Initially the term is not theological. It may be used for having pity on the poor (Prov. 14:31) or the defenseless (Dt. 7:2). More weakly it may simply denote friendly speech (Prov. 26:25).

c. Yet the main OT development relates to God, who is the subject in 41 of 56 instances; 26 in the Psalms, which call on God to hear prayer (4:1), to heal (6:2), to redeem (26:11), to set up (41:10), to pardon (51:1), and to strengthen (86:16) in the corresponding needs. Appeal is made in these prayers to the love of God or to his word or covenant. The Aaronic blessing (Num. 6:25) invokes the gracious will of God as God has pledged it in the covenant. Yet God's graciousness is a free gift (Ex. 33:19). Judgment is often mentioned alongside it, as in Am. 5:15, where graciousness to a remnant is all that may be hoped for. The liturgical formula "gracious and merciful," one of the rare adjectival predications of God, relates to the acts of God rather than specifically to his being.

d. One of the verbs derived from the stem carries the sense "to request" or "to beseech," directed either to people (Gen. 42:21; 2 Kgs. 1:13), or to God (Dt. 3:23; 1 Kgs. 8:33).

e. In the case of nouns, the reference again might be to requests directed to others (Jer. 37:20) or to God (Ps. 28:2), or it might be to "mercy," e.g., that of the conqueror for the conquered (Josh. 11:20) or that of God for his people (Ezr. 9:8).

f. In the case of ḥēn, in analogy to showing no favor in Jer. 16:13, one might expect the same thought in, e.g., Gen. 39:21; Ex. 3:21; Ps. 84:11; Prov. 3:34. In fact, however, hēn undergoes a different development; the reference is to the favor that God gives along with other favors, i.e., their "gracefulness" or "attractiveness" or "worth" which causes others to be favorably disposed. In the ḥēn that God gives there is thus reflected, not the relation between giver and recipient, but the relation between the recipient and a third person.

g. This relation emerges clearly in the very common phrase "to find grace in the eyes" of another, whether the other be another person or God. Thus Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord in Gen. 6:8 and Moses in Ex. 33:12, while Jacob seeks favor in Esau's eyes in Gen. 32:5 and Joseph finds favor in Potiphar's house in Gen. 39:4.

h. In.the Psalms ḥēn does not occur in the context of petition but refers to the "grace" that God gives in Ps. 84:11 and to "grace" on the lips of the bridegroom in Ps. 45:2. In Proverbs, where the term is more common, it has the same sense, although in Ecclesiastes the favor that comes to a person is meant (9:11; 10:12). In general, ḥēn thus becomes a term that qualifies the recipient, with a certain aesthetic accent in many cases (cf. Zech. 4:7). The meaning is closer to that of the verbal stem in Zech. 12:10, where mercy and supplication are poured out in place of an original hardness. But for the most part ḥēn fails to supply the noun corresponding to verbs of the stem. It thus opens the door to another term which the LXX usually renders éleos, the noun related to eleéō, its translation of ḥēn. This term is ḥesed̲.

2. ḥesed̲.

a. The term ḥesed̲ demands treatment here, partly because of the connection made by its translation as éleos, partly because of its later merging with ḥēn, and partly also because the later translators relate it to cháris. Debate continues as to the precise meaning of ḥesed̲. One school relates it to right or duty and sees a basic connection with the covenant. Another school finds in it simple kindliness both as will and act. The truth, perhaps, is that it expresses spontaneous goodness, or grace, in a specific relationship or in ongoing fellowship (cf. Gen. 19:19; 47:29; 1 Sam. 20:8; 2 Sam. 16:17). The primary sphere of ḥesed seems to be that of relationships among humans. It then comes into the vicinity of covenant statements either as the presupposition of a covenant or as its expression. Here the element of duty emerges; constancy and loyalty are native to it.

b. The word then acquires its distinctive OT sense in relation to God. In Ex. 20:5-6 God is jealous for his rights but shows covenant grace to thousands of those who love him and keep his commandments. Here grace is converted into act, and the "thousands" shows that it is incomparably stronger than wrath. Grace often occurs in the context of forgiveness (Ex. 30:7 etc.) and along with an express reference to the covenant (Dt. 7:9). Mercy accompanies it in Ex. 34:6 etc., and faithfulness in Dt. 7:9 etc. The Psalms develop the divine aspect with 127 of the 237 instances, only three of which refer to ḥesed among humans. Invoking it, the Psalms beseech God to hear (Ps. 119:149), to save (109:26), to redeem (44:26), to give life (119:88), and to forgive (25:7). Thanks are given for expressions of it (5:7; 106:45). Accounts are given of various instances (94:18; 21:7; 59:10, etc.). Parallels are salvation (13:5), mercy (25:6), righteousness (36:10), redemption (130:7), and faithfulness (36:5). Miracles are connected with it (107:8), and joy and praise arise at it (31:7; 138:2). The earth is full of it (33:5), it reaches to heaven (36:5), it endures forever (89:2), and if death seems to limit it (88:11), it is better than life itself (63:3). God sends it, it comes, it meets and follows us (57:3; 59:10; 85:10; 23:6), and we must remember, consider, and wait for it (106:7; 48:9; 33:18). Praise of it takes liturgical form (107; 136; 1 Chr. 16:34; Jer. 33:11). In its sphere, God's people show it to one another (Gen. 24:49; Ruth 1:8; 3:10).

c. Among the prophets, Hosea, Jeremiah, and Isaiah (40ff.), who speak most of the covenant, are rich in references to ḥesed. A new element here, however, is that of human ḥesed toward God (Hos. 4:1; 6:4). What is meant is Israel's covenant conduct, i.e., spontaneous love of God. Jeremiah refers to this in 2:2. It is possible only as God's own gracious gift (Hos. 2:19-20). Is. 55:3, appealing to the covenant of grace with David, stresses the character of ḥesed as salvation. In Is. 40:6, however, there is an approximation to the meaning of ḥēn, the reference being to the collapse of human glory (cf. Esth. 2:9, 17).

d. In general one may state that ḥesed plays the role of a substitute noun for the ḥnn group. The only difference is that it stresses free kindness within a specific relationship and does not necessarily express the movement of the stronger to the weaker or poorer. The social relationship controls the content, so that when it is oriented to a covenant, the particular understanding of the covenant fixes the sense.

e. The derived adjective occurs especially in the Psalms. Often here God is in view as the active giver of grace. With a human reference the use may be passive for the recipients of divine grace or active for those who themselves show faithfulness. A covenant context is apparent in Ps. 50:5. [W. ZIMMERLI, IX, 376-87]

C. Judaism.

1. Qumran and the Testaments of the Twelve.

a. ḥsd is dominant in the Qumran writings. Closely connected with mercy and righteousness, it is a basic term for God's dealings. The righteous rely on it, they extol God's fullness of it, and it proves itself in times of trouble.

b. The use in the Testaments of the Twelve is of little significance.

2. Rabbinic Writings. In the rabbis the verb ḥnn means "to be favorable," and the noun ḥsd signifies "favor" or "attractiveness." The central problem is the relation between grace and works. Grace arises where there are no works, and the stress falls on the freedom of the divine giving. Yet the concept of grace remains caught in the schema of the law, i.e., the principle of act and reward.

3. The LXX.

a. cháris translates ḥēn rather than ḥesed̲ and usually denotes "attractiveness" or "favor" with God or others. It is not a theological term.

b. charízomai occurs only in Sirach and Maccabees and means "to give."

4. Philo. Some development may be seen in Philo, for whom Hannah symbolizes cháris, and who views chárites as God's gifts and cháris as the power behind them. The content of cháris derives from the understanding of God as Creator and Preserver, always in an active sense. In one sense cháris is the human endowment at creation. In relation to salvation, Philo has no doctrine of merit but he also thinks that cháris is only for the righteous. He demands a struggle for virtue but also a confession that virtue is God's achievement and not ours. Recognition of sin and need forms the essential starting point. Over against this stands the greatness of grace. Those who are pious in the sense of self-renunciation are impelled by divine forces and may thus attain to virtue.

D. The NT. The noun cháris does not occur in Matthew, Mark, or 1 and 3 John, in John it occurs only in 1:14ff., and in 1 Thessalonians and Philemon only in salutations. charízomai is found only in Luke and Paul, and charitoō only in Lk. 1:28 and Eph. 1:6. The preposition chárin is not very common in the NT (in contrast to the Koine). The OT ḥēn offers little guidance, and ḥesed̲ points us to éleos rather than cháris.

1. Luke.

a. The secular sense may be seen in Acts 24:27; 25:3, 9, and more positively in Acts 2:47; 4:33.

b. OT influence may be seen in the religious use in Lk. 1:30; Acts 7:46; 7:10; Lk. 2:40, 52; 6:32ff.

c. cháris characterizes the good news in Lk. 4:22; Acts 14:3. It depicts the Spirit-filled man in Acts 6:8. Its overruling may be seen in the church's growth in Acts 11:23. There is commendation to divine grace in Acts 14:26; 15:40. Acts 15:11 has a Pauline ring but in a context of exhortation.

d. As regards charízomai, Barabbas is freed as a favor to the people in Acts 3:14, but Paul asks not to be handed over as a favor to them in 25:11 (cf. v. 16). God grants Paul the lives of those who travel with him in 27:24. Luke summarizes the work of Jesus in Lk. 7:21 (cf. 4:22), and Lk. 7:42-43 is also typically Lucan.

e. charitóō ("to show grace," "to bless") occurs in the NT only in connection with divine cháris (Lk. 1:28).

f. acháristos means "ungrateful" in Lk. 6:35. It derives its force from cháris in vv. 32ff.

2. Paul.

a. A central concept in Paul, cháris has a special place in his greetings (Rom. 1:7 etc.; 1 Th. 5:28 etc.). It echoes the familiar chaírein, but comes into association with peace in a liturgical formula that forms a constituent part of the letter.

b. Distinctively cháris in Paul expounds the structure of the salvation event. The basic thought is that of free giving. In view is not just a quality in God but its actualization at the cross (Gal. 2:21) and its proclamation in the gospel. We are saved by grace alone. It is shown to sinners (Rom. 3:23-24), and it is the totality of salvation (2 Cor. 6:1) that all believers have (1 Cor. 1:4). To the “grace alone” embodied in Christ corresponds the “faith alone” of believers (Rom. 3:24ff.) that rules out the law as a way of salvation (4:16). cháris and pístis together are in antithesis to nómos (law). Grace is the basis of justification and is also manifested in it (5:20-21). Hence grace is in some sense a state (5:2), although one is always called into it (Gal. 1:6), and it is always a gift on which one has no claim. Grace is sufficient (1 Cor. 1:29). One neither needs more nor will get more. It carries an element of assurance, but not of false security, thus leaving no place for boasting (1 Cor. 1:29; cf. Gal. 5:4).

c. The work of grace in overcoming sin displays its power (Rom. 5:20-21). It differs from sin structurally, for it comes, not as destiny, but as free election (11:5-6). It finds actualization in the church, e.g., in Paul’s collection (2 Cor. 8). Its goal is every good work (9:8), and in this regard it poses a demand (6:1), yet in such a way as to make compliance possible. To think that grace means libertinism is only pseudologic; Paul dismisses the mere suggestion in Rom. 6:1.

d. Paul’s apostolic office is a special grace in Rom. 1:23 etc. It is given to him (12:3), and its discharge is grace (2 Cor. 1:12), e.g., in visiting a church (v. 15).

e. The verb charízomai has for Paul the sense “to give.” The context gives it a soteriological nuance in Rom. 8:32, and the sense is close to that of the noun in 1 Cor. 2:12. Suffering is a gift in Phil. 1:28-29, and the institution of Jesus as kýrios rewards his obedience in Phil. 2:9.

3. Colossians, Ephesians, the Pastorals, Hebrews, I and 2 Peter, and James.

a. In Col. 1:6 cháris means the gospel. “Charm” is perhaps the sense in Col. 4:6. In Eph. 1:6-7 cháris is the divine “favor” shown in Christ. 2:5ff. is distinctively Pauline. So, too, is 3:2, 7-8. The combination with “given” in 4:7, 29 is stereotyped. The verb charízomai means “to forgive” in Col. 3:13 (cf. Eph. 4:32). Believers are to forgive one another on the basis of the Lord’s forgiveness (cf. also 2:13). charitóo means “to bless” in 1:6.

b. In the Pastorals “thanks” is the meaning of cháris in 1 Tim. 1:12 and the “grace” of office in 2 Tim. 2:1. 2 Tim. 1:9 contrasts grace and works in a context of epiphany (cf. Tit. 2:11). Terms like goodness and mercy are equivalents in Tit. 3:4ff. Again we have the contrast with works, but with a reference to grace in baptism (vv. 5ff.). cháris replaces hope in the triad in 1 Tim. 1:14.

c. Hebrews uses cháris and éleos in 4:16 (cf. 1 Tim. 1:2). Christ embodies grace, and one receives it at God’s throne (7:25). Christ suffers by the grace of God in 2:9. Christ’s death (or blood) comes into association with the covenant and grace in 10:29. The antithesis of grace and meats is part of the antithesis of the covenants in 13:9. One must not fall short of grace in 12:15.

d. In 1 Peter suffering is understood as grace (2:19-20). 2 Pet. 3:18 relates cháris to gnōsis. The precise sense of “giving more grace” in Jms. 4:6 is not clear.

4. John. The group is rare in Johannine works. cháris occurs in the greetings in 2 Jn. 3 and Rev. 1:4; 22:21. In Jn. 1:14, 16-17 grace denotes the result of the revelation of the Logos in antithesis to the law and in combination with truth and fullness, which help to give it its distinctive significance.

E. The Apostolic Fathers. The formulas in Barn. 21.9; Pol. 14.2, etc. adopt the NT salutation. Normal use for “thanks,” “favor,” and “reward” may be seen in, e.g., Did. 1.3. If cháris is the reading in Did. 10.6, salvation, or the Lord himself, is meant. Grace is the result of salvation in 1 Clement; the Christian state is the yoke of grace (16.17), and one may attain to grace by right conduct (20.2-3). Grace is a power at work in the church in Ignatius Smyrneans 9.2. It is salvation (Ephesians 11. 1), or God’s will (Romans 1.2), and a motif in the summons to unity (Ephesians 20.2). Ignatius trusts in God’s grace (Philadelphians 8. 1), and he views his martyrdom as grace (Romans 6.2). The verb charízomai denotes God's giving in the sacrament in Did. 10.3 (cf. charitóō in Hermas Similitudes 9.24.3).

F. Gnosticism. cháris is not a basic term in Gnosticism. It occurs as a power, sometimes hypostatized. It is also a gift, e.g., in the Marcosite eucharist. Coptic Gnosticism speculates about the grace of light that comes forth through the first mystery. From Christ as light cháris is one of four great lights, and elsewhere it is one of three aeons.

A. Usage. This rare and late verbal noun of charízomai denotes the result of cháris as an action, i.e., "proof of favor," "benefit," or "gift."

B. The LXX and Judaism. Ps. 31:21 Θ has chárisma for ḥeseḏ (LXX éleos), and the term occurs in Sir. 7:33 (Cod. S) and 38:30 (B) for "favor." Philo uses it in much the same sense as cháris (Allegorical Interpretation of Laws 3.78).

C. The NT.

1. General. Paul uses the word in Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, and the Pastorals. He relates it to cháris and pneúma in soteriological contexts. It occurs in the prefaces to Romans and 1 and 2 Corinthians, and takes shape as gifts in Rom. 12:6 and 1 Cor. 12:11. Linked to eucharistéō, it also has an eschatological orientation. The present is eschatologically determined by cháris as the age of the Spirit. The gift is present but its possession is provisional (1 Cor. 1:8). The whole gift of salvation is chárisma (2 Cor. 1:11; cf. Rom. 5:15-16). The sense is more formal in Rom. 6:23 and Rom. 1:11, where Paul has a spiritual gift to impart. An individualizing element emerges in 1 Cor. 7:7. The fact that all have their own gifts means that celibacy is not imposed as a law.

2. charísmata.

a. In 1 Cor. 12ff. and Rom. 12 the charísmata are operations of the Spirit at worship, notably tongues and prophecy. The Corinthians stress tongues, but Paul shows the ambivalence of ecstasy, makes confession of the kyrios the norm, argues that God gives individual gifts for the church's upbuilding, views these as future possession in provisional form, and finds a chárisma in everything that edifies. The two triads in vv. 4ff. do not mean that the gifts are the Spirit's, the services the Lord's, and the operations God's. We simply have three different descriptions of the work of the one Spirit (v. 11); these descriptions bring out the unity in multiplicity. The operations are supernatural but not magical; one can cultivate the gifts (12:31). Only to a certain degree can one define and distinguish the charísmata. The inclusion of acts of ministry forbids the distinction between charismatics and officebearers or between office/law on the one side and Spirit on the other. The Spirit himself posits law.

b. Ordination confers the chárisma of office in 1 Tim. 4:14; 2 Tim. 1:6. In 1 Pet. 4:10 any act of service in love is chárisma. Endowment with the Spirit is here virtually a quality.

D. The Early Church. Formalizing may be seen in Did. 1.5. 1 Clem. 38. 1 includes the gifts of the Creator. Justin argues that the gifts have passed from Judaism to Christianity (Dialogue 88. 1). Venaeus Against Heresies 5.6. 1 finds in them the divine power of the church.

eucharistéō, eucharistía, euchároistos.

A. Secular Greek.

1. Usage.

a. We first find euchớristos in the senses “pleasant” and “graceful.” eucharistéō means “to show a favor,” but this imposes a duty of gratitude and the meaning “to be thankful” or “to give thanks” develops. We also find the sense “to pray.”

b. eucharistía is common on inscriptions and means “gratitude” or “giving thanks.”

c. euchάristos has the senses “pleasant,” “grateful,” and “beneficent.”

2. Meaning.

a. The Greek world holds thanksgiving in high esteem. With the ordinary use we find a public use (gratitude to rulers) and a religious use (thanksgiving to the gods for blessings). Thanks are also a constituent part of letters.

b. Compounds in eu- are slow to appear and late. Epictetus speaks of tó euchάriston as a basic ethical attitude. He stresses the duty of giving thanks to God.

B. Judaism.

a. Hebrew has no equivalent term but thanks come to expression in the OT in the thank offering and the song of thanksgiving, both collective and individual. Except for euchάristos in Prov. 11:16, the group occurs only in apocryphal works, where it signifies thanks to others or to God (2 Macc. 12:31; 10:7). For epistolary style cf. 2 Macc. 1:10-11. 2 Macc. 1:11ff. offers a prototype for Paul’s salutations.

b. In Judaism thanks are given for food and drink and for good news. Thanksgiving will never cease.

c. In Philo the central theme is thanks to God as inward veneration. This is an obligation for gifts received. But it is not a human achievement and has no goal beyond itself.

C. The NT.

1. Gospels, Acts, and Revelation.

a. We find a secular use of the verb in Lk. 17:16 and of the noun in Acts 24:3.

b. The verb denotes thanksgiving in general in Jn. 11:41; Acts 28:15; Rev. 11:17 and grace at meals in Mk. 8:6; Jn. 6:11; Acts 27:35. eulogéō is a synonym (cf. Mk. 8:6 and 6:41).

c. Jewish practice explains the use at the Last Supper. Both terms occur in Mk. 14:22-23 and Mt. 26:26-27. Paul has eucharistéō at the blessing of the bread in 1 Cor. 11:24, and Luke has it in 22:17, 19. eulogéō is perhaps closer to the Jewish blessing, but the use in translation of Hebrew or Aramaic terms is random.

2. Paul.

a. Most prominent in Paul is the epistolary use. Paul makes the thanksgiving part of the content; it may even introduce the principal theme, although in the main the prefaces constitute sections of their own. The chief forms are the verb with two or three participles (1 Th. 1:2ff.; Phil. 1:3ff.; Phlm. 4ff.) or the verb with hóti (1 Cor. 1:4-5; Rom. 1:8).

b. Formal use also occurs in 1 Cor. 1:14 and Rom. 16:4, and for grace at meals cf. 1 Cor. 10:30. Thanks are due to the Creator in Rom. 1:21. One sees the liturgical setting in 1 Cor. 14:16-17. God’s act is the presupposition of the summons to eucharistía either in general exhortation (1 Th. 5:18) or in the special form of the collection (2 Cor. 9:11). The aim is the increase of God’s glory (v. 12). Christ is the mediator of thanksgiving but not the recipient in Rom. 1:8.

3. Colossians, Ephesians, and the Pastorals. Thanksgiving goes with joy and confession in Col. 1:12, although confession does not have here a technical sense. A christological basis may be seen in Col. 2:7, and we have general exhortation in 3:15. Prayer is the proper mode of eschatological vigilance in 4:2. The two streams of petition and thanksgiving figure in 1 Tim. 2:1. 1 Tim. 4:3 attacks the Gnostic demand for asceticism by pointing to grace at meals. This practice rests on belief in God the Creator. Thanksgiving expresses an attitude toward God and is the condition of enjoyment.

D. The Early Church.

a. Epistolary use occurs in, e.g., Ignatius Philadelphians 6.3; Ephesians 21. 1, and there is a call to prayer in Hermas Similitudes 7.5; 1 Clem. 28.2, 4.

b. The eucharistic use in Did. 9-10; Ignatius Ephesians 13.1; Justin Apology 1.65 is of special interest. In Did. 9. 1ff. it covers the prayer of thanksgiving, the elements, and the whole action (Did. 9. 1, 5). A technical use develops (cf. Ignatius Ephesians 13. 1). eucharistía comes to denote the sacrifice of eucharistía (cf. Justin Apology 1. 13. 1-2; Dialogue 117.2). [H. CONZELMANN, IX, 387-415]

cháragma [mark, stamp]

A. The Greek World.

1. This word denotes an engraved, etched, branded, or inscribed “mark” or “sign.” It can be used for an “inscription” or a “stamp,” e.g., the imperial stamp on decrees. The impress on coins gives it the more general sense of “money.”

2. The word does not occur in the LXX, though we find charássō, “to inscribe,” in Sir. 50:27.

3. In Rev. 13:11ff. the second beast demands cultic recognition of the image of the first. The mark which is required in vv. 16-17 probably indicates the religious totalitarianism of emperor worship. Marking is common in antiquity (cf. slaves, and the branding of devotees with the marks of deities). The number 666 may well be a cipher for Nero; we thus have a confrontation between the claim of the emperor with his mark and the claim of Christ with his seal (Rev. 7:1ff.). The angel threatens with eschatological judgment all who bear the cháragma of the beast (14:9, 11; cf. 16:2; 19:20). Those who do not bear it have the role of eschatological judges (20:4). A different sense is apparent in Acts 17:29, where “handiwork” is meant. What we make cannot resemble deity, but we ourselves are God’s offspring and are thus close to him (vv. 27-28). [U. WILCKENS, IX, 416-17]

charaktḗr [impress, image, characteristic feature]

A. The Greek World. This word has first the meaning “die” (in minting) and then such further senses as “image,” “impress,” “coinage,” “money,” “stamp,” “seal,” “sign,” “copy,” and “letter.” A special development is for the “typical feature(s)” of an individual or nation. This produces the idea of “moral character,” but other uses are for the “distinctiveness” of a language, the “style” of a writer, or a “type” of philosophy.

B. Judaism.

1. In the LXX charaktḗr denotes a “scar” in Lev. 13:28, the “likeness” impressed by parents on children in 4 Macc. 15:4, and the “characteristic features” of Hellenistic culture in 2 Macc. 4:10.

2. In Josephus we find the senses “feature,” “individuality,” and “letter.”

3. Philo uses the figure of the seal. The soul is like wax on which perceptions make both good and bad impressions. The image of God is not a physical impress (charaktēr) but extends only to the noús. Yet the soul has received a divine impress (charaktēr) whereby it may know God. In the process of imaging the prototype inserts itself into the image and hence eikṓn and charaktēr statements tend to merge. In self-impartation—God to lógos and lógos to us—the eikōn is like the die impressing its stamp on wax.

C. The NT. The only NT use is in Heb. 1:3. The two statements in this verse correspond to what is said in v. 2. Viewing Christ’s exaltation and preexistence, they hymn his eternal nature. As God’s glory and hypostasis are synonymous, Christ both reflects the glory and bears the impress of the nature. It is by the Son that God is represented and acts. The Son as God's image and impress both contains God's glory and discloses it. As Ruler of the cosmos, he sustains all things by his mighty word, by his humiliation and exaltation he has become for us the cause of eternal salvation, and by the way of discipleship God leads those who trust in him as his children in glory (2:10). The Son's character as image is the essential presupposition of all his saving work. Unlike Philo, with whom there is linguistic similarity, Hebrews does not work out the soteriological significance of the concepts merely in terms of the knowledge of God. It is the humiliated and exalted Christ who bears the very stamp of God's nature.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. 1 Clem. 33.4 expounds Gen. 1:26-27 in a way that makes the man made in God's image the impress of the image, which is itself the original. Ignatius Magnesians 5.2 uses the figure of the coins to differentiate those who belong to Christ from the children of the world. The "character" that believers receive through Christ is participation in his sufferings as the presupposition of participation in his life. In Ignatius Trallians, Introduction "after the manner" expresses a sense of difference from the apostles.

E. Gnosticism. In Gnostic works charaktḗr tends to be associated with corporeality, so that the original spheres are featureless. Nevertheless, the emanations of primal being may have their own charaktēres. The charaktēres give form to matter but fall into the hands of the demiurge. The firmament prevents further charaktēres from being dragged down from the upper world into darkness. [G. KELBER, IX, 418-23] cheír [hand], cheiragōgéō [to lead by the hand], cheiragōgós [one who leads by the hand], cheirógraphon [hand-written document], cheiropoíētos [made with human hands], acheiropoíētos [not made with human hands], cheirotonéō [to raise the hands, select] cheír.

A. Greek Usage.

1. The Human Hand.

a. Aristotle attaches great importance to the hand. It is the instrument of movement and action. It controls implements. Since it exerts the power of the arm, the arm may also be called the cheír. Various expressions such as "with the hand" or "to take (or have) in hand" describe acts performed by the hand. We take others by the hand or greet them with a handshake. The hand may also be raised in attack or defense (cf. the terms for hand-to-hand fighting).

b. The gods protect or intervene with the hand, and lay on their hands to bless, heal, or save. Wonder-workers mediate healing power by the laying on of hands.

2. Transferred Sense. Various uses develop, e.g., for the right side or the left, for power, for work as that which is done by the hands, for handwriting, and for a handful or troop.

B. The OT and Judaism.

1. The Human Hand. The usual Hebrew term for "hand" is yāḏ, although there are other words such as kap̱ for "palm." Since hands are used in work, what we make is the work of our hands (Dt. 28:12). The hand can stand for the person (Ex. 19:13). The stronger right hand imparts the richer blessing (Gen. 48:14). The right hand is the place of honor (Ps. 110:1). The hand gives and receives, and a handshake seals a bargain (2 Kgs. 10:15; Ex. 17:18). The hand on the mouth expresses silence (Job 21:5). Clapping the hands is a sign of joy (Ezek. 25:6). Hands are lifted up for prayer or oaths (Ps. 28:2; Ex. 6:8), stretched forth hands signify resolution (Num. 15:30), and filling the hands denotes investiture (Ex. 28:41).

b. The OT laws of ritual cleanness apply to the hands. Cleanness or uncleanness can be transferred by objects that touch them. Hence one must wash the hands after handling the Scriptures.

2. Transferred Sense. The Hebrew word can express direction, power, or an object (e.g., a socket or signpost) that projects the hand. One may send, order, or speak by the hand of someone, e.g., God by the hand of the prophets (1 Sam. 28:15; Ezek. 38:17).

3. God's Hand.

a. The OT often refers to God's hand in creation or history. Thus God lays his hand on people, stretches it out, and creates and redeems by it. He brings Israel out of Egypt with a strong hand. Both creation and redemption are extolled as the work of his hand. His hand comes into the lives of individuals (cf. 1 Kgs. 18:46). It seizes Jeremiah and Ezekiel for their prophetic tasks (Jer. 15:17; Ezek. 1:3).

b. Qumran follows the OT in speaking about God's hand. In particular the hand of God gives victory over enemies and it offers comfort in prayer.

c. Hellenistic Judaism, however, seldom refers to God's hand. Avoiding anthropomorphisms, it prefers to speak about God's power.

d. The rabbis, too, exercise great restraint in this area. At the Exodus, the idea that Israel goes out with lifted hand replaces the OT statement that it is taken out by God's hand.

4. Laying On of Hands.

a. In blessing, hands are laid on others to impart the blessing (Gen. 48:14). The laying on of hands may also transfer power (2 Kgs. 13:16). In the OT and the rabbis, however, we never read of the laying on of hands for healing.

b. The law orders that the hand be laid on the heads of various animals at offerings (Lev. 1:4; 8:22; 4:4). The high priest on the Day of Atonement puts his hand on the scapegoat and drives it into the desert (16:21). In the case of the offerings, the thought seems to be one of identification, in the case of the scapegoat it is one of transfer.

c. Laying on of hands institutes into office. In Joshua's case it transfers the needed power (Num. 27:21ff.). The rabbis work out a ceremony of once-for-all ordination by laying on of hands in the presence of witnesses. This ceremony adds another link to the chain of tradition extending back to Moses, and qualifies the new rabbi to deliver his own judgments.

C. The NT.

1. The Human Hand. Work is done with the hand in 1 Th. 4:11. The hand is an instrument of the will, e.g., for plucking ears of grain, or holding the plow. One gives the hand, beckons with it, stretches it out, carries things in it, etc. Rings are set on the hand (Lk. 15:22). The hand may wither (Mk. 3:1). A mark on the hand denotes ownership (Rev. 13:16). Hands can hang down (Heb. 12:12) or may be lifted in blessing (Lk. 24:50) or prayer (1 Tim. 2:8). God is not to be worshipped with human hands (Acts 17:25). Ritual washings are prescribed for the hands (Mk. 7:2). With the hand one dips in the common dish (Mt. 26:23). Paul writes a greeting with his own hand at the end of dictated letters (1 Cor. 16:21; 2 Th. 3:17; Col. 4:18).

2. Transferred Sense.

a. cheír often means power in the NT (cf. Mk. 9:31; Lk. 1:71; 2 Cor. 11:33; Jn. 3:35).

b. After a preposition cheír strengthens the preposition but loses its own sense. Thus diá cheirós means "through" (Mk. 6:2) and en cheirí "by" (Gal. 3:19).

3. God's Hand. The NT refers to God's hand only when adducing OT sayings or following OT usage (Lk. 23:46; Rom. 10:21). God's hand executed creation (Acts 7:50). It acts in history (Lk. 1:66; Acts 13:11). To fall into the hands of God is a fearful thing (Heb. 10:31).

4. Laying On of Hands.

a. As in the healings of antiquity, NT healing often involves the laying on of hands. Jairus asks Jesus to lay his hands on his daughter (Mk. 5:23). Jesus lays hands on the blind man in Mk. 9:27, and on the woman in Lk. 13:13. He takes Peter's mother-in-law by the hand in Mk. 1:31, touches the leper in 1:41, lays hands on the sick man in Lk. 14:4, and heals by laying on of hands in Mk. 6:5. The apostles continue this healing ministry (Mk. 16:18; Acts 3:7; 5:12, 15; 19:11; 28:8). If power is thus transferred by contact, there is no magical practice, for the decisive elements are the mighty word of Jesus and the faith that is put in him. The word is not tied to the means of transfer (cf. Mt. 8:8, 13; Jn. 4:50ff.).

b. Hands are imposed in blessing (cf. the children in Mt. 19:13). Laying on of hands serves as a visible sign of the imparting of the Spirit at baptism (Acts 8:17). Only with their acceptance by the apostles do Samaritan believers become full members of the one church (cf. also the disciples of the Baptist in 19:6).

c. Laying on of hands accompanies institution to office (cf. the ordination of the Seven in Acts 6:6 and the commissioning of Paul and Barnabas in 13:1ff.). The Spirit plays an important role in the selection, and prayer is an essential part of the installation. The divine chárisma is imparted to Timothy (1 Tim. 1:18; 4:14) with the laying on of hands, although the gift itself is God's (2 Tim. 1:6) and it is given by prophetic utterance (1 Tim. 4:14). The apostle seems to ordain along with presbyter assistants. There is no reference to a consecrating power placed in the hands of individuals. God's will and call govern the ordination by which authorization and equipment come. Timothy himself must assume responsibility for further ordinations. The warning in 1 Tim. 5:22 is directed against overhasty ordinations, unless the reception of penitent sinners is the issue.

D. The Apostolic Fathers.

1. Several passages refer to the human hand in the usual manner, e.g., Did. 4.6. 2. In a transferred sense cheír again means power (1 Clem. 55.5), and we find en cheirí for to have "in hand," and hypó cheíra for "on every occasion" (Hermas Visions 3.10.7).

3. In OT references, or passages modeled on the OT, God's hand is mentioned, e.g., creation as the work of his hand, or his hand intervening to save or punish.

4. Only Barn. 13.5 refers to the laying on of hands (Jacob blessing Ephraim in Gen. 48:14).

cheiragōgéō, cheiragōgós.

1. The verb cheiragōgéō means "to lead by the hand."

2. In the NT both verb and noun express the helplessness of the blind. Paul's companions lead him by the hand in Acts 9:8; 22:11, and the sorcerer in 13:11 has to look for people to lead him by the hand.

cheirógraphon.

1. A document is written in one's own hand as a proof of obligation, e.g., a note of indebtedness.

2. The meaning in Col. 2:14, then, is a "promissory note." God cancels the bond that lies to our charge. This bond is not a compact with the devil, as in some patristic exegesis. It is the debt that we have incurred with God. The forgiveness of sins (v. 13) through identification with Christ in his vicarious death and resurrection means that this note is cancelled; God has set it aside and nailed it to the cross.

1. These words mean "made (or not made) with human hands." The LXX describes idols as "made with hands" in Is. 46:6.

2. The NT contrasts what is made by human hands with God's work. Mk. 14:48 refers to a temple not made with hands. Acts 7:48 stresses that God does not dwell in temples made with hands. Heb. 9:11, 24 contrasts the heavenly sanctuary with the earthly temple. Eph. 2:11 shows that circumcision is not decisive, since it is done by human hands. Col. 2:11 refers to the circumcision that is made without hands, i.e., that of Christ, whereby his people are buried and raised again with him. The heavenly house of 2 Cor. 5:1 is not made with hands. After death, God will have ready for us the new dwelling with which we shall be clothed.

1. Raising the hand expresses agreement, and hence cheirotonéō first means "to vote for." Other meanings that develop are "to select" and "to nominate." cheirotonía in the LXX means "pointing with the finger" in Is. 58:9 (cf. Barn. 3.5).

2. 2 Cor. 8:19 uses the verb in the sense "to select." Paul refers to the person who has been "chosen" to accompany him in the matter of the collection. In Acts 14:23 Paul and Barnabas "nominate" the elders and then institute them into their work with prayer and fasting. [E. LOHSE, IX, 424-37]

→ brachíōn, dáktylos, dexiós

Cheroubín [cherubim]

1. The OT cherubim guard Eden (Gen. 3:24), are on the mount of God (Ezek. 28: 14ff.), carry God's throne chariot (10:1ff.), and serve as God's throne (1 Sam. 4:4). God rides on them (Ps. 18:10) and meets his people from between them (Ex. 25:22). They receive mention along with the ark (1 Sam. 4:4), and representations of them conceal its cover with their wings (Ex. 25: 18ff.). They stand facing one another at both ends of the mercy seat (Ex. 25:19).

2. Judaism regards them as a class of the heavenly host around God's throne. From the name the rabbis infer that they are like boys in shape, but Philo relates the name to knowledge and insight, and Josephus refers to winged creatures. Magical papyri use the name in efforts to achieve magical effects.

3. The only NT reference to the cherubim is in Heb. 9:5. This passage is describing the earthly sanctuary, and along with the ark of the covenant (v. 4) it mentions the cherubim of glory that stand over the mercy seat and overshadow it with out-spread wings. [E. LOHSE, IX, 438-39]

chḗra [widow]

A. Common Greek Usage. This word, meaning "widow," derives from a root meaning "forsaken," and it may thus refer to any woman living without a husband. Later we also find chḗros for "widower." The verbs chēróō and chēreúō mean "to make a widow" and "to become a widow," and we also find the derived noun chēreía, "widowhood."

B. The Widow outside the NT.

I. The Pagan World.

1. Women dread the fate of becoming widows. Widows must either return to their own family, take a subordinate position in their husbands' family, remarry, or seek death. Many cultures frown on their remarriage. Those who do remarry lose cultic privileges and other rights. When Augustus orders the remarriage of widows as a means of repopulation, the decree arouses much criticism. Judaism takes a more relaxed view, e.g., in the Levirate law. Having lost their normal protector, widows come under social and economic oppression. Orphans are grouped with them in this regard. We find many accusations against their exploitation, e.g., when they are sold for debt. Pericles praises war widows, however, and wealthy widows often control considerable power and property after the achievement of some feminine liberation in early Hellenism.

2. Appeals for the helping of widows and orphans are also common. The gods of the Near East (e.g., Amon-Re in Egypt) are concerned about their plight. An Athenian law makes some provision for them, but in the world of Greece and Rome the gods show less concern for widows or the poor. The military welfare fund for the sick, orphans, and parents does not include widows, and restrictions apply to their rights of inheritance.

II. The OT.

1. The LXX. The LXX uses chḗra mainly for "widow," although "woman without a husband" is the sense in, e.g., 2 Sam. 20:3. chēreía occurs in Is. 54:4, chēreúō in Jdt. 8:4, chḗreusis ("widow's weeds") in Gen. 38:14, 19.

2. The Widow in the OT. The fate of the widow is bewailed (Ex. 22:25). Widowhood may indeed be a divine penalty (Ex. 22:22ff.). Widows are associated with others who are disadvantaged, e.g., orphans, aliens, or day laborers. They suffer wrongs (Is. 10:2) or loss of rights (1:23). They are held in low esteem (54:4); cf. their special clothes (Gen. 38:14). Like harlots or divorceées, they may not marry the high priest (Lev. 21:14), or, in the program of Ezek. 44:22, any priest at all unless they are the widows of priests.

3. Benevolence to Widows in the OT. Some widows enjoy high regard (cf. Gen. 38), and the OT enjoins all the righteous to be kind to widows. God is their refuge, and he helps them to their rights (Ps. 146:9; Dt. 10:18). He threatens judgment on those who wrong them and promises blessing to those who assist them (Ex. 22:21ff.; Jer. 7:6). He witnesses in their favor (1 Kgs. 17:20). The supreme disaster is when he no longer pities them (Is. 9:16). Their vows are valid (Num. 30:10), they have a share of the tithe (Dt. 14:29), they may glean (24:19ff.), they participate in feasts (16:11), their clothes may not be taken as a pledge (24:17), and incidentally Levirate marriage grants them some protection (25:5ff.).

III. The Widow, in Judaism. Judaism takes up the same motifs as the OT. Widows suffer oppression, but God defends them, adopts them, hears their prayers, and judges on their behalf. Various laws assist them, e.g., the right to live in the house and on the estate of the late husband, the right to keep money in the temple, and the right to a share of tithes and war booty. For Philo the chḗra of God is, allegorically, the soul apart from God.

C. The NT

1. Mark. In Mk. 12:40 and parallels Jesus takes up the prophetic condemnation of injustices done to widows. Scribes who ostensibly are helping widows to their rights charge so highly that the widows lose their possessions. Jesus thus comes forward as their true advocate. In contrast to avaricious scribes and the ostentatious rich is the poor widow of Mk. 12:41ff. who shows her trusting devotion by giving her whole living, meager though this is.

2. Luke. The widow's conduct in Lk. 18:2ff. provides an illustration of persistent and confident prayer. The issue is a financial one, and the judge, not wishing to alienate her powerful adversary, defers the case. But the woman's pertinacity prevails. In Lk. 4:25-26 the example of one of the elect widows of the OT releases God's messengers from obligations to their own obdurate people. In Lk. 7:11ff. the stress is on the loss of the only remaining protector of the widow of Nain and hence on the messianic trait of Jesus' compassion for her. Early in Luke we find alongside the virgin Mary and Simeon the charismatic widow Anna (2:36ff.), who refrains for a whole lifetime from any remarriage, who engages in constant prayer and fasting, who is a prophetess, and who as a privileged witness of the infant Jesus serves as a model for the witness of women in the church (cf. Lk. 18:3ff.). The church itself makes provision for widows in Acts 6:1. Many Jews of the dispersion retire to Jerusalem and leave widows there. Since the Palestinian believers administer the common funds, they tend to neglect Hellenist widows as tension develops between the native group and the dispersion element; hence the intervention of the apostles and the appointment of the Seven. Tabitha is an example of a concern for widows that is either individual or perhaps collective if the church commissions her for the purpose (cf. Acts 9:36ff.). Mention of chḗrai along with the hágioi (v. 41) suggests that the chḗrai might already be viewed as a special class, and that the raising of Tabitha takes place in their favor (cf. Lk. 4:26; 7:11ff.).

3. Paul. Paul offers counsel to the unmarried and widows in 1 Cor. 7:8-9 (cf. 39-40). In his view they should remain unmarried unless their sexual drive, stronger in young widows (cf. 1 Tim. 5:6ff.), demands remarriage. Those who can remain unmarried have a special chárisma (7:7) like Paul himself, and a special blessing attaches to them for following this better course.

4. Pastorals.

a. The Widow in the Family Unit. An early order for widows may be found in 1 Tim. 5:3ff. This order does not accept widows for service in the church or for the church's care if they have tasks, or may be cared for, within the family. Expositors differ as to whether it is the widows who are to look after the children and grandchildren, or the children and grandchildren who are to look after the widows. Possibly both views are right and mutual obligations are at issue. Widows must not neglect their immediate duties, nor relatives their duties toward them, in favor of duties to the church and its care for widows.

b. Younger Widows. Younger widows, too, have immediate tasks, and easily fall victim to frivolity or sensuality. If they are entrusted with a widow's office in the church, and subsequently remarry, they will break their primary loyalty to Christ. In the discharge of their duties, they also run the risk of becoming idlers and gossips and thus of bringing disrepute on the church. It is better, then, that they should remarry (5:14) and thus assume duties that will leave them less chance of getting into mischief.

c. "True" Widows. Those who are "really" widows are to be honored and supported (vv. 3ff.). These are women who are truly on their own and have resolved not to remarry (v. 5). They trust in God alone, give themselves to prayer night and day (cf. 1 Th. 3:10), and undertake various tasks on behalf of the church (v. 10).

d. Ministry. "True" widows are selected for service in the church (v. 9). This is implied by the "enrollment" of vv. 9, 11. Qualifications for selection are that they have no family (v. 5), give proof of good works (v. 10), be at least 60 years old (v. 9), have had only one husband (v. 9), and have no desire to remarry (v. 11). Whether the reference to one husband refers to remarriage after the death of a first husband or to remarriage after divorce is debated. Jesus allows the former but not the latter (Mk. 12:24ff.; 10:12). Paul leaves the former open in principle (Rom. 7:2-3). Lk. 2:36-37 extols the widow who has married only once. The tasks of widows include prayer, duties corresponding to those of a wife, and probably the training of younger women as enjoined on the presbýtides in Tit. 2:3ff. Wealthy widows might also have had charge of house churches (cf. Lydia, Mary the mother of Mark, Chloe, and Nympha in Col. 4:15). Relatives are to provide for widows where possible. The church assumes responsibility where there is no one else to do so (1 Tim. 5:16).

5. James. Jms. 1:27 equates active concern for widows with pure service of God.

6. The Widow Figuratively. In Lk. 18:2ff. the widow is a figure of God's eschatological people, which may expect an answer to believing supplication for final vindication. In Rev. 18:7 the harlot Babylon—representing Rome—compares herself to a queen and not a widow. But there will soon be a reversal of roles. The oppressed widow will be a royal bride (21:2) and haughty Babylon will be a diseased widow. The imagery combines the two motifs of God's people as bride and the city as a woman. The two cities of Jerusalem and Babylon stand for the two human peoples— the people with God, the bride, and the people without God, the widow. The church, which replaces OT Israel, now resembles a woman without a husband, as did Israel during the exile. But at the parousia it will be the bride that meets the heavenly Bridegroom (22:17).

D. The Widow in the Early Church.

1. Biblical Allusions. In early writings we find many biblical quotations and allusions (1 Clem. 8.4; Justin Apology 44.3, etc.). Examples of true widowhood are given (cf. Apostolic Constitutions 3.7.6, 8). Barn. 20.2 associates widows and orphans, Pol. 6. 1 widows and the poor, and Ignatius Smyrneans 6.2 widows and the oppressed. Barn. 20.2 complains about the ill-treatment of widows. Hermas Mandates 8. 10 commends the helping of widows as a work of love that is pleasing to God. Generosity to widows expresses thanksgiving to God. The rich who have no compassion on widows and orphans suffer torments in hell.

2. Care for Widows. Church orders arrange care for widows and the sick. Churches like Rome and Antioch provide daily support for hundreds of widows. Homes are set up for them. The bishops keep lists, and gifts are made through the bishops (cf. Ignatius Polycarp 4. 1; Apostolic Constitutions 2.25.2). The presbyters and especially the deacons help (Hermas Similitudes 9.26.2). Wealthy lay members provide meals. At worship widows have special places alongside matrons. The deacons must not accept gifts from evildoers nor turn their ministry to self-enrichment. Older women receive preference over younger widows who might support themselves. Under Constantine laws provide tax concessions and legal aid for widows, and the care of widows and orphans shifts to the state.

3. Rules for Widows. Widows must not teach, gossip, or seek gain. They are to stay at home and pray. They must not drink too much wine nor laugh too much, and if they have property they should use it on behalf of the poor. Tertullian argues that they ought not to remarry but use their widowhood as an occasion for continence. They might enter into spiritual marriage with widowers to keep house for them. Normally younger widows are allowed to remarry once, but need must not be allowed to force them into it, and ascetic trends later lead to legislation against remarriage.

4. Widows as an Institution. An institution of widows develops, although whether they are ranked as ordained ministers is debatable. To be accepted widows must go through a time of testing, must have been married only once, must have led blameless lives and cared well for their families, and must be of a certain (variable) age. When appointed church widows, they take a vow not to remarry and are accountable to God for keeping it. In later orders there are to be only three church widows in a congregation. Some references group them with the bishops, presbyters, and deacons; others not. Ignatius Smyrneans 13. 1 mentions virgins who are called widows, perhaps because there are not enough real widows. Women deacons, or deaconesses, have some precedence over widows because they have functions of supervision and direction, but they are often selected from among virgins or widows. We thus read of widows who are deaconesses, although even later the two groups are not identical. The tasks of widows include prayer, caring for the sick, visiting prisoners, showing hospitality to traveling preachers, and teaching women catechumens and Christian girls. Because of their work in the church they are highly honored, have a special place at worship on the left behind the presbyters (as deacons are on the right behind the bishop), receive communion after the deacons and before subdeacons, etc. Yet by the end of the early period the order disappears. It perhaps finds a new form in the monastic orders for women, for nuns take up many of the duties that widows originally discharge.

chiliás [a thousand], chílioi [a thousand]

A. Greek Usage. The term chílioi (a "thousand") occurs from the time of Homer. In combinations it may precede or follow. With it collective words are often singular, e.g., "a thousand horse." chili- is a common prefix. The chiliétēs is the period of the soul's journey in Plato, and the chilíarchos is the leader of a thousand men. Multiples take the appropriate number in front, e.g., dischílioi for "2,000." The word chiliás denotes a "thousand," and the plural chiliádes may signify a large number beyond computation.

B. The OT and Judaism.

1. In the LXX chiliás for a "thousand" occurs over 250 times. It is common in lists of numbers (e.g., Num. 1:21). The plural often denotes vast numbers, e.g., in Ex. 20:6; Dan. 7:10. chílioi is less common.

2. Jewish apocalyptic often refers to the innumerable host of angels (Eth. En. 14:22; 40:1). The righteous will bring forth thousands of children (10:17) and vines will produce wine a thousandfold (10:19; cf. Syr. Bar. 29:5). The idea of a cosmic week results in the theory that the world will last 7,000 years and then the eighth millennium will initiate the new aeon (cf. Slav. En. 33:1). Another view is that the world will last 6,000 years—2,000 without the law, 2,000 with it, and 2,000 as the age of the Messiah. Some compute the age of the Messiah as one of a thousand years, however, while others think it will last for 7,000 years (Is. 62:5).

3. At Qumran the number 1,000 is important in the military organization of the community, with leaders for each group of a thousand. Those who keep the commandments have the promise of life for a thousand generations (Dan. 7:9).

4. Josephus follows the Greek world in his use of the terms.

C. The NT.

1. The NT often uses chílioi or chiliás in references to numbers, as in 2 Pet. 3:8 (Ps. 90:4) or Mk. 5:13. 3,000 are added to the church in Acts 2:41, and about 5,000 in 4:4. Jesus feeds 5,000 men in Mk. 6:44 and 4,000 in 8:9. Acts 21:38 says that 4,000 followed the Egyptian rebel leader into the desert. Paul in Rom. 11:4 refers to the 7,000 who do not bow the knee to Baal (1 Kgs. 19:18). 1 Cor. 10:8 points to the 23,000 who fall in the wilderness. Lk. 14:31 asks whether a king will with 10,000 men challenge one who has 20,000.

2. In Revelation numbers have mysterious significance. Rev. 5:11 refers to the thousands of thousands who praise God, and 7:4ff. to the 12 times 12,000 of the sealed, who, representing the 12 tribes, comprise the whole people of God. In 11:3 and 12:6 we read of 1,260 days (42 months or three and a half years). This half of seven years is the period of acutest affliction. In the earthquake that follows, 7,000 will be killed (11:13). The thousands who accompany the Lamb in 14:1, 3 will enjoy eschatological preservation, but the last judgment will be so terrible that blood will flow as high as a horse's bridle for 1,600 stadia. The new Jerusalem will be 12,000 stadia in length, breadth, and height (21:16).

3. In Rev. 20 the devil will be bound and the saints will reign with Christ for a thousand years (vv. 2, 6). Satan will then be loosed, a decisive battle will ensue, the last judgment comes, and the new world of God begins (vv. 7ff.; 21-22). The idea of a millennial kingdom fuses the hope of a restoration of the Davidic monarchy with expectation of an eschatological aeon. Revelation proclaims Jesus as both Messiah-King and Son of Man, and thus relates all eschatological hope to him. It adopts the number 1,000 for the intermediate reign in accordance with the schema of 6,000 years of world history, a sabbath of 1,000 years, and then the initiation of the new heaven and earth. The author holds out to the suffering witnesses of Jesus the consoling prospect that they will rise again for the millennium even prior to the general resurrection, the last judgment, and the new creation.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. The number 1,000 occurs in these works only in 1 Clement and Barnabas. 1 Clem. 34.6 adduces Dan. 7:10 (cf. also 1 Clem. 43.5), and Barn 15.4 refers to Ps 90:4 [E. LOHSE, IX, 466-71]

chliarós → zéō

choïkós [made of earth, earthy]

A. The Greek World. This is a new term that is possible only on the basis of Gen. 2:7 LXX. Primal heroes are earthborn (gēgenḗs), and human beings are formed from the earth (pēlós), but choïkós does not occur prior to Paul.

B. The OT.

1. Gen. 2:7 says that God made man of dust from the earth and blew into him the breath of life. Dust is the more common term (ʿāp̱ār). We are raised from dust (Job 8:19), are always dust (Gen. 3:19), will return to dust (Ps. 22:29), and without the Spirit are only dust (Ps. 104:29). Dust is thus a term for the dead (30:9), and the fact that we are dust shows our frailty (103:14). We are also earth (ʾ ḏāmá). Taken from it, we return to it (Gen. 3:19; Ps. 146:4) and sleep in the dust of the earth (Dan. 12:2). Another OT parallel is "clay" (ḥōmer, Job 33:6; Is. 64:7).

2. The LXX does not use choïkós but has instead such terms as pēlós, choús, chṓma, and gē. gēgeneís describes all people in Ps. 49:2, especially as mortal (Prov. 2:18) (but only Gentiles in Jer. 32:20).

C. Judaism.

1. Apocalyptic distinguishes the spheres of spirit and flesh as heavenly and earthly. Dwellers on earth can know only what is earthly, which is corruptible but will one day be changed. God created the dust, so that, sin is due to Adam's fall, not to his being made of dust.

2. Our being made of dust underscores our limitation and even our impurity in the Qumran texts. But God's Spirit has joined this dust. Although we shall return to dust, God has an eternal destiny for this dust. Of other terms, clay is more important than earth. As dust, we have fallen victim to sin, but God shows his power by lifting up the dead from the dust into the community. There is no anthropological antithesis of spirit and dust (or flesh) in the Qumran works.

3. a. Philo does not use choïkos, but we see the full range of its meaning in his use of choús. We are made of dust and are thus earthborn. The earthly is the fleshly. The children of earth give the earthbound noús a fleshly nature. Only the descending breath of God's deity makes the vision of God possible. The soul's foot is on the ground, its head reaches up to heaven. The soul may thus oppose God or fill itself with heavenly knowledge. In the latter case it stands opposed to dust or body. But the noús is our true being. It is equated with heaven, while the bodily is equated with earth. The soul of the wicked is concerned with earth. What is ungodly is earthly. The body is in exile in Egypt. The royal way leads up to heaven. Purified souls mount up from the earthly body, the rest sink back to earth.

b. In Gen. 2:7 Philo is primarily concerned with the inbreathed pneúma. This is the image of God's power and the substance of the psychḗ. As the soul of the soul, it is distinct from the fleshly soul. Only in the noús is man the image of God, or a copy of the higher lógos, the true image. The body of the man of Gen. 2:7 is choús, his psychḗ is pneúma. Yet he is more glorious in body and soul than all his progeny. In sum, the higher lógos is God's image, the human noús is its copy, and earthly man is a further copy.

c. We thus have two classes of people—those who live by logismós in virtue of the Spirit, and those who live by blood and carnal desire. The noús holds a middle position with possibilities of going either way. The dualism is an ethical one; it results from the equation of wisdom and the divine Spirit (pneúma). The first man of Gen. 1:26-27 is the idea of man, i.e., wisdom, lógos, or pneúma. The man of Gen. 2:7 is the earthly man who has become psychḗ.

4. In Judaism, then, dust denotes limitation and mortality. We must admit that we are dust, for this moves God to pity. The fact that we are God's work also stresses our fragility compared to God. For Philo the earthly man is of lesser worth than the heavenly man. Dust is what we must flee as evil.

D. The NT. 1 Cor. 15:47ff. calls the first man choïkós on the basis of Gen. 2:7. In contrast stands the second man from heaven, Christ. Each founds a race—the one race earthly, the other heavenly. The differences from Philo are that the second man is now the heavenly one, that there is a christological reference, and that the opposite of the earthly man comes as a gift. Paul lays no stress on the distinction between created and uncreated. What counts is an Adam/Christ theology related to a Son of Man Christology. The resurrection qualifies Christ as the heavenly man. As choïkós we differ from what the risen Christ already is, and what we will one day be through him. As in the rabbis, Paul brings the Spirit of Ezek. 37:14 into some juxtaposition with the Spirit of Gen. 2:7.

E. Gnosticism. Simon Magus equates the world-creating eikṓn with the Spirit. Many Gnostics differentiate image and similitude, although in different ways. What is choïkós is linked with the lower creation in contrast to the new creation. Valentinus has three classes: the choïkoí, psychikoí, and pneumatikoí. We also read of a fleshly aeon, an aeon of the soul, and the coming aeon. Some souls are cast back into bodies in judgment. Non-Christian Gnosticism does not use choïkós, but we find references to the material body, the distinction of psychḗ and noús, and some use of gēgeneís in connection with drunkenness and sleep. [E. SCHWEIZER, IX, 472-79] chrḗma [matter, money], chrēmatízō [to handle a matter, impart a revelation], chrēmatismós [money making, answer]

1. Related to chrḗ (“necessity”), chrḗma means “matter,” “affair,” “amount,” “sum” (of money), and in the plural “objects of value,” “wealth,” or “capital.”

2. In the LXX it occurs for various Hebrew terms in the senses “money,” “riches,” “booty.”

3. In the NT it means “sum of money” in Acts 4:37 and “wealth” or “possessions” in the plural in Mt. 19:22; Mk. 10:22-23. Simon Magus brings “money” in the hope of acquiring the divine gift (Acts 8:18), and Felix expects Paul to secure his release by giving him “money” (Acts 24:26). Not riches as such, but trust in them and their unworthy use come under NT criticism.

4. The only instance in the apostolic fathers is in Hermas Similitudes 2.5, which refers to the joint operation of the goods of the rich and the prayers of the poor.

chrēmatízō.

1. This word means “to handle a matter.” It has this sense in political and economic contexts. It may also mean “to be active or to appear as this or that,” e.g., as ruler.

2. In the LXX it corresponds to the Hebrew for “to speak” in Jer. 26:2, or “to declare a revelation” in 29:23; 30:2.

3. a. In the NT the verb denotes divine instruction by revelation. An order is implied in Mt. 2:12, 22; Acts 10:22. Moses is told how to make the tabernacle in Heb. 8:5. Noah receives instruction about unseen things, and accepts this as a warning, in Heb. 11:7. Simple impartation is the point in Lk. 2:26. Moses gives instruction (on earth) in Heb. 12:25, but the stress here lies on the greater instruction that comes with Jesus from heaven.

b. In Acts 11:26 the disciples appear for the first time as Christians (i.e., are called such), and in Rom. 7:3 the wife who lives with another while her husband is still alive is publicly reckoned an adulteress.

1. This word means “money making,” then official “answer” or “decree,” also divine “answer” or “direction.”

2. In the LXX it has the secular meaning "dispatch" and the religious meaning "oracle" (Is. 13:1). It is the name of a people in Gen. 25:14.

3. In the NT it occurs only in Rom. 11:4. The meaning is "answer." Elijah has been pleading with God against Israel (v. 2), and Paul asks: "But what is God's reply to him?", and he then quotes 1 Kgs. 19:18 to show that God has kept himself a remnant. Elijah is here a man of God receiving revelation.

4. 1 Clem. 17.5 calls God's utterance to Moses from the burning bush a chrēmatismós, i.e., a "divine instruction" imparting to Moses his task. [B. REICKE, IX, 480-82]

chrēstós [good, kind], chrēstótēs [goodness, kindness], chrēsteúomai [to be kind, loving], chrēstología ["friendly" speech] chrēstós.

A. Greek Usage.

1. This word has the basic sense of "excellent," "useful," "good of its kind." Nuances include "orderly," "healthy" (of food), "propitious" (offerings), "serious" (a wound or bite), "good" (experiences), and as noun "benefit" or "fortune."

2. When used of people the term means "worthy," "decent," "honest," morally "upright" or "good." The term may thus be used for a "good" character or disposition, or for someone who is "good" at a particular task. Other meanings are "kind," "gentle," "clement," "good-hearted," and even "simple." An ironical address is chrēsté, "my dear fellow."

3. We sometimes find Chrēstós as a proper name.

4. Only rarely does chrēstós describe the gods, for the term often arouses disdain and is thus thought to be incompatible with the majesty of deity.

B. The LXX and Judaism.

1. The LXX.

a. The LXX uses chrēstós for various Hebrew terms in the senses "excellent," "genuine," or "costly."

b. With reference to people it means "good," "serviceable," "kind," "benevolent." c. Since the OT more readily associates majesty and condescension, it commonly uses chrēstós for God (Ps. 106:1; Jer. 33:11) or his name (Ps. 52:9) or mercy (Ps. 69:16). One can hope and trust in the Lord who is good (34:8). God is good and upright (25:8; cf. Dt. 32:4). Yet the severity that God shows in the law is the presupposition of this goodness; his ordinances are good (119:41, cf. 65ff.).

2. Philo. Philo uses chrēstós in the senses "serviceable," "helpful," and "good." He relates it to the goodness of God that the righteous seek to follow. Rulers are "gracious," and "friendly" or "kind" is implied when God is called chrēstós.

3. Josephus. In Josephus the term means "morally good" but also has the nuances "kind," "gentle," "benevolent," "considerate," and "well disposed."

C. The NT.

1. Secular use occurs in the NT in the proverbial saying in Lk. 5:39 and in the quotation in 1 Cor. 15:33 ("good morals").

2. God is "kind" even to the ungrateful and selfish in Lk. 6:35; he seeks saves the lost (Lk. 15). The fullness of the divine kindness also lies behind the statement of Jesus that his yoke is "easy" in Mt. 11:30. In Rom. 2:4 Paul has tó chrēstón as a noun to describe the divine kindness which allows space for repentance, but which the impenitent disdain and hence store up wrath for themselves. What is meant is God's gracious restraint in face of his people's sins prior to Christ. chrēstótēs is used interchangeably in Rom. 2:4, and it occurs again in 11:22 with reference to God's gracious act in Christ. As Paul sees it, kindness constantly characterizes God, but this kindness finds particular expression and completion in his saving work in and through Christ. The continuity of God's kindness may also be seen in 1 Pet. 2:3, which applies Ps. 34:8 to Christ: "You have tasted the kindness of the Lord."

3. Eph. 4:32 takes up the saying of Christ in Lk. 6:35-36 and shows the implications of God's gracious action for the mutual relationships of believers.

D. Early Christian Literature.

1. 1 Clem. 14.3-4 demands mutual kindness with an appeal to Prov. 2:21. If God's work as Creator is here in view, Diog. 8.8 plainly refers to his saving work in Christ.

2. As the names Christ and Christian suggest, Christ is chrēstós and Christians are chrēstoí for Justin in Apology 4. 1. A Marcionite inscription substitutes Chrēstós for Christós. This is a rejection of the OT christós, but the referring of OT quotations to Christ (e.g., Ps. 34:8) suggests it.

chrēstótēs.

1. Secular Greek. This noun has such senses as a. "honesty," "respectability," "worthiness," and b. "kindness," "friendliness," "clemency." Negatively it denotes a false "pliability" or "softness" toward evil.

2. The LXX and Judaism.

a. The LXX uses the term for "piety" or "clemency" but also for God's "kindly disposition or action," or for the "benefits" he confers.

b. Psalms of Solomon often uses the word for the "goodness" of God and the plenitude of his gifts.

c. Philo puts it in the list of virtues, although negatively it can take the form of "indulgence." God's dealings are motivated by it; he prefers forgiveness to punishment.

d. Josephus uses the word for God's "grace" and "magnanimity," but mostly he refers it to outstanding human figures in such senses as "piety," "hospitality" (Abraham), and "benevolence" (David).

3. The NT.

a. The word is a human attribute in Rom. 3:12 (quoting Ps. 14:1).

b. In Rom. 2:4 and 11:22 it denotes God's gracious attitude to sinners either before Christ or in and through Christ. In Tit. 3:4ff. the fullness of salvation in Christ elucidates it. Eschatological consummation forms its content in Eph. 2:7. chrēstótēs, then, is an equivalent of chāris. It implies that God's work in Christ is appropriate to his nature. In this work he acts, and is manifested, as the one he is by nature.

c. Used in lists of virtues, the term has a richer sense than in parallel Stoic lists. The experience of the love of God that is manifested in Christ and shed abroad by the Spirit works itself out as chrēstótēs toward others. chrēstótēs is a fruit of the Spirit in Gal. 5:22, it is again associated with the Spirit in 2 Cor. 6:6, and it is based on the similar attitude of the Lord in Col. 3:12.

4. The Apostolic Fathers. Diog. 9. 1ff.; 10.4 relates God's chrēstótēs to his saving work in Christ and more generally to his fatherly acts as Creator, Sustainer, Redeemer, and Consummator. 1 Clem. 9. 1 asks for submission to the divine chrēstótēs, 2 Clem. 15.5 relates it to the promise of Is. 58:9, and in 19. 1 it is the goal of Christian striving. Ignatius Magnesians 10. 1 finds it specifically in the salvation effected by Christ's resurrection.

1. This word is first found in Ps. Sol. 9:6 for God's proofs of grace to those who call upon him.

2. Paul uses the verb in 1 Cor. 13:4 to describe the work of love as an actualizing of chrēstótēs.

3. 1 Clem. 13.2 derives kindly conduct to others from the divine goodness, which is a basis of the demand for it in 14.3.

chrēstología. This word occurs only in Rom. 16:18, where Paul shows that the "friendly speeches and fine words" by which the readers are wooed are simply a mask for deceitful purposes. [K. WEISS, IX, 483-92]

→ éleos, epieíkeia, makrothymía, philanthrōpía

chríō [to anoint], christós [Christ, Messiah, Anointed One], antíchristos [antichrist], chrísma [anointing], christianós [the Christian]

A. General Usage.

1. chríō, found in Homer and then in the tragic dramatists, means "to rub," "to stroke," or, with oils etc., "to smear," "to anoint." Use varies, so that we find the oiling of weapons, their smearing with poison, the rubbing of birds' wings with pitch, whitewashing or painting, and rubbing with a garment, as well as anointing after bathing, or the anointing of the sick or the dead.

2. christós means "smeared on," "anointed," and as a noun (tó christón) "ointment." It never relates to persons in the nonbiblical sphere.

3. chrísma (also chríma) means "what is rubbed on," i.e., "ointment," "whitewash."

Medically it denotes a "healing ointment." [W. GRUNDMANN, IX, 493-96]

B. The OT.

I. General Data. Anointing, the rubbing of the body with grease or oil, is meant to promote physical well-being. Legal anointing by pouring oil over the head supposedly confers strength or majesty. The Hittites anoint their kings, in Egypt the king anoints high officials, the vassal princes of Syria and Canaan are anointed, and priesthood is at times associated with anointing.

II. The Act of Anointing in the OT.

1. The Verb. The verb "to anoint" occurs some 69 times in various forms and expressions.

2. Royal Anointing.

a. Survey. The most common form of anointing in the OT is that of the king. Anointing is part of the ritual of enthronement and is the most distinctive individual act. Saul, David, and Solomon are all anointed, and among later kings we read of Joash, Jehoahaz, and Jehu (cf. also Hazael and the general reference in Judg. 9:7ff.). God does the anointing in Ps. 45:7.

b. Characteristics. The men of Judah anoint David (2 Sam. 2:7), then the elders of Israel representing the people (5:3). David authorizes the anointing of Solomon (1 Kgs. 1:34ff.), which Zadok (and Nathan) perform. Anointing is solidly attested only for Judah. By means of it the people give the king his authority. It is carried out by pouring oil on the head from a horn (1 Sam. 16:13) or other vessel (10:1). God himself may anoint or command the anointing (9:16; 10:1; 16:3). This fact denotes legitimacy in God's eyes. When the anointing refers to neighboring kings, the point is that God directs the destinies of other nations as well. Anointing by God implies authorization and a specific commission whereby the king now represents the people. Whether anointing is common in Northern Israel may be doubted. Even in Judah it seems to be unusual. Saul and David are the first kings, Absalom sets himself up as a rival king, Solomon has only a tenuous claim, the enthronement of Joash breaks the tyranny of Athaliah, and Jehoahaz becomes king in a threatening international situation. It is possible, then, that anointing takes place only in special circumstances.

3. Other Officebearers.

a. The High Priest. The OT does not tell us much about the anointing of the high priest. Its meaning is disputed; some view it as a rite of purification, others as a rite of empowering inasmuch as the high priest becomes the successor of the Davidic dynasty. In Zech. 4:14 we have both an authorized ruler and an authorized high priest. When these are called sons of oil, the element of holiness, i.e., of separation to God, is of great importance.

b. The Priests. The idea of dedication and purification lies behind the extension of anointing to all priests.

c. Prophets. In spite of 1 Kgs. 19:16 anointing of prophets is never the rule. In Is. 61:1 God himself anoints for a particular task, probably by conferring the Spirit.

d. Objects. Jacob consecrates a pillar by anointing in Gen. 28:18. We also read of the anointing of the altars (Ex. 29:36), the tabernacle (30:26), the ark (30:26), the laver (40:11), and all objects relating to the altar (40:10).

III. The Noun.

1. Occurrence. The noun "the anointed" occurs 38 times in the OT, always with reference to persons. Kings are "the anointed" some 30 times. The high priest is "the anointed" six times, and the fathers are so twice.

2. The king.

a. Survey. Saul is most commonly called "the Lord's anointed." Apart from Saul, only Davidic kings bear the title (except in Is. 45:1).

b. Saul. Since anointing is most common in Judah and for Davidic kings, it is surprising that Saul mostly frequently bears the title "the Lord's anointed." The divine anointing that confers divine authorization and protection is the theological principle behind the usage. Even though God's anointing is by means of Samuel (1 Sam. 9:16), it insures validity before God and hence the inviolability of the king's person.

c. David. The Davidic references confirm this (cf. 1 Sam. 16:1ff.). Anointing signifies divine election. With it the Spirit comes on David. The title thus denotes a special relationship with God. Ps. 89:20, 38 brings out the significance of the election of David for his successors. Ps. 132:10 prays that God for David's sake will not abandon his anointed. Nathan's promise to David in 2 Sam. 7:11, 16 lies behind these sayings.

d. The Davidic King. The title is used for David's successors as an appeal to God in times of trouble (cf. Ps. 89:38; Lam. 4:20; perhaps Hab. 3:13). Yet there is solid hope for the future (cf. Ps. 2). The anointed enjoys a majesty and supremacy which are not yet a full reality but which God will establish in the near future (cf. 1 Sam. 2:10; Pss. 84:9; 132:17). The anointed belongs to God and is thus under his protection (Ps. 2:2). Yet he also belongs to the people (Ps. 28:8). He thus occupies a mediating position like the priest or prophet. Passages that refer to God's anointed are not directly messianic or eschatological, but a messianic or eschatological understanding is implicit in many of them.

e. Cyrus as the Lord's Anointed. Is. 45:1 shows that the title may be used even where there is no rite of anointing and where a ruler of an alien faith and people is intended. The point here is that God gives Cyrus a definite mission that relates to Israel's redemption. In this regard he replaces the impotent Davidic dynasty. As salvation is expected from the kingly rule of the anointed, hope focuses on the Persian king who steps into the breach. The expression is a bold and isolated one.

f. The Fathers. Ps. 105:15 uses "anointed ones" for the fathers, probably to stress their inviolability under God's protection. The idea, perhaps, is that the fathers are initial kingly or prophetic (cf. Gen. 20:7) figures.

4. The High Priest. Although the term is used attributively in Lev. 4:3ff.; 6:15, it has the force of a title and plainly refers to the high priest. It is an indefinite noun in Dan. 9:25-26. At the end of the specified period, an anointed one will come, and after 62 weeks (years) an anointed one is removed. If there are immediate references here, it is hard to say what they are.

IV. Messianic Ideas in Israel.

1. Royal Psalms. The development of messianic ideas brings us into a debatable area. Possibly the royal psalms bear witness already to such development in Judah. One element in them is an oracle addressed to the king, perhaps by cultic prophets, and promising salvation and the manifestation of God's supremacy in universal rule. Since Judah does not in fact exercise rule of this kind, the statements offer a prolepsis of what ought to be and will finally come to pass.

2. Is. 9:5-6. The point here is the accession of a new Davidic ruler but with the eschatological implication (v. 6) of an indefinite reign of perfect salvation. The final Davidic king will be God's representative on earth.

3. Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Jer. 23:5-6 awaits the ideal of a wise and righteous ruler of David's line bearing the name "The Lord our righteousness." Ezek. 34:23-24 and 37:22ff. also look for the coming of a second David.

4. Postexilic period.

a. Haggai. With the return from exile the messianic hope is strong. Hag. 2:20ff. looks on Zerubbabel as a signet ring and hence as a guarantee of God's mighty and saving presence and an accreditation of his promise. Zerubbabel is a representative of God, the true ruler.

b. Zechariah. In the visions of two anointed ones, the high priest and ruler, the giving of a crown seems to relate Zerubbabel to the messianic king of the end time (4:1ff.; 6:9ff.). Close association between priest and king marks these passages. Zerubbabel himself does not fulfil messianic expectation, and v. 13 points to a future ruler who will be both priest and king.

c. Older Prophets. Some scholars regard as postexilic additions such passages as Is. 11:1, which contrasts the glory of the messianic shoot with the present impotence of David's house; Ezek. 17:22ff., which has the birth of the Messiah in view; and Mic. 5:1ff., which links the Messiah to Bethlehem. In Is. 11:1ff. the Spirit is closely related to the Messiah, endowing him with piety, wisdom, and righteousness, and making possible a reign of divine power, dignity, and greatness. Yet humility and peace also characterize the messianic ruler in Zech. 9:9-10. His dominion will be universal (Is. 11:1) and will mean the regaining of paradise (11:6ff.) and the ending of the final affliction (16:4-5). Jer. 33: 15ff. again associates the priesthood with the Davidic monarchy.

d. Difficult Passages. Passages like Am. 9:11-12; Hos. 3:5; Mic. 4:8; Is. 32:1; Jer. 30:9 are hard to interpret; they seem to imply the restoration of the Davidic dynasty.

5. Problems of Messianism. There is unquestionably a messianic movement, but it is hard to trace in detail. Problems include the relation of Josiah and Nehemiah to it, its extent, its connection with other trends, and its prominence at different periods.

[F. HESSE, IX, 496-509]

C. Messianic Ideas in Later Jndaism.

I. Linguistic Aspects. In later sources we find "the anointed" with the definite article, and also "my Messiah" and the "Messiah of righteousness." But Messiah without the article also occurs and is virtually a proper name. "The Lord's anointed" is used only for royal figures, but the OT prophets, and also (at Qumran) the eschatological high priest and prophet, are described as anointed.

II. The LXX. The LXX nearly always uses chríō for the normal Hebrew verb. Other words of the group are chrísis, chrísma (cf. Dan. 9:26), and christós. The LXX renderings of Num. 24:7 and 24:17 imply expectation of a messianic king. The LXX brings in the group in Am. 4:13; 2 Sam. 3:39; 2 Chr. 36:1. In its reading of Ezek. 43:3 its use of chríō changes God's leaving of the temple into his return to it. [A. S. VAN DER WOUDE, IX, 509-10]

III. Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha.

1. Sirach. Moses anoints Aaron in Sir. 45:15, Samuel anoints princes in 46:13, and cf. 48:8. There is no express eschatological reference, but stress falls on the eternal character of the high priesthood and monarchy (cf. 45: 15ff.).

2. Testaments of the Twelve. Test. Jud. 21:1ff. subjects the monarchy to the priesthood. Test. Reub. 6:8 seems to be saying that the priesthood of Levi will last until the end times when the high priest Christ will come. Test. Levi uses christós for priestly figures in 17:2-3. Test. Jud. 24:1 quotes Num. 24:17 and seems to be from a Christian source. Test. Levi 18 also betrays Christian influence with its reference to a new and ideal priest who is also a king and whose work transcends human ideas.

3. Psalms of Solomon. This work uses christós four times, always with additions. In 18:5 the anointed one acts on God's commission and in God's power. In 18:7 he bears the rod and is full of wisdom, righteousness, and power. In ch. 17 he is a king of David's house, will do God's will in Israel, and will establish universal rule.

4. Ethiopian Enoch. "Anointed one" occurs twice in the Similitudes (48:10; 52:4). "Son of Man" and "elect of God" seem to be parallel expressions. The Messiah is the ideal future ruler in an apocalyptic framework.

5. Syriac Baruch and 4 Esdras. These later works (1st cent. A.D.) use "the anointed" in the absolute for a royal figure of the end time. With the Messiah comes victory over the nations and the reign of peace and supernatural plenty. The messianic period finally merges into the time of general resurrection. In 4 Esdr. 7:28-29 the resurrection comes only after the death of the Messiah and seven days of primal silence. The "servant" of ch. 13 has many messianic features. An important term in these works is "revelation," which at times presupposes preexistence. The "servant" has preexistence with God in 4 Esdr. 7:28; 13:26, and the Messiah is kept with God in 12:32. Since the focus is on God's acts, the national redeemer and heavenly liberator are fundamentally the same.

6. Sibyllines. These works do not use "the anointed," but features of OT expectation may be seen (cf. 788ff. and Is. 11:6ff.).

7. Pseudo-Philo. This work refers to the anointing of Phinehas by God at Shiloh and to the anointing of David by Samuel. The people anoints Samuel in ch. 51.7, and there is reference to a royal figure in 5.6 (with an allusion to 1 Sam. 2:10).

8. Apocalypse of Abraham. The redeemer of ch. 31 is "my elect" and holds an essential place in God's future and final action. [M. DE JONGE, IX, 511-17]

IV. Qumran.

1. Two Messianic Figures. The Qumran community expects at the end of the days a messianic high priest of the house of Levi and a messianic king of the house of Judah, i.e., the Messiah of Aaron and the Messiah of Israel.

2. The Kingly Messiah. This Messiah is a shoot of David and a prince of the community, once perhaps called Messiah in the absolute.

3. The Eschatological High Priest. This Messiah is mentioned first, takes precedence in the council, has a dominant role in the eschatological war, and discharges a teaching function, giving new end-time directions.

4. The Two Messiahs. The two Messiahs, God's final instruments, are expected on the basis of God's eternal covenants with Phinehas and David. They embody the ideal future of legitimate priesthood and monarchy. The priestly interest of the community comes out in the superiority of the high priest, but a strong political interest also emerges in the hope of a theocratic order. The final orientation is to God's age of righteousness; hence both Messiahs are subject to God.

5. The Teacher of Righteousness. This figure, who founds or consolidates the community, is not himself messianic, nor does the community await his return in the end time. The community gives him high esteem and trust, but does not think of him as the Messiah or even as the prophet like Moses.

6. Precedence of the High Priest. The texts do not support the view that either earlier or later the community looks for only one Messiah. It follows the tradition reflected in Zech. 4:14; Sirach; Testaments of the Twelve. Its giving of precedence to the high priest is in keeping with priestly Zadok ideas. [A. S. VAN DER WOUDE, IX, 517-20]

V. Philo and Josephus.

1. Philo. In On Rewards and Punishments 95 Philo refers to a redeemer (on the basis of Num. 24:7 LXX), but mainly as a representative of the saints triumphing in God's strength.

2. Josephus. Josephus does not use the term "messiah" for those who lay claim to royal or prophetic office in the first century A.D. When he goes over to the Romans, he makes Vespasian the central figure in his biblically inspired expectation for the future. He is thus a strong opponent of other forms of messianism. [M. DE JONGE, IX, 520-21] VI. Rabbinic Writings.

1. Prayers. The Palestinian recension of the Eighteen Benedictions contains a petition for mercy on "the monarchy of the house of David, the Messiah of thy righteousness." The date is disputed, and the stress is on the dynasty rather than an individual figure. Elsewhere we find prayer for "the shoot of David thy servant," or for "the sprouting of a horn for David thy servant." We also find prayers (which may be later) for the kingdom of the Messiah and the redemption of the people. In their hope for an independent state, such prayers may well reflect popular expectation at the time of Jesus (cf. Acts 1:6).

2. The Mishnah. The only reference here is an incidental one, which may be an addition. This paucity of material is hard to explain; it can hardly be due to a polemic against Christianity or to the fading of messianic expectation, but probably reflects concentration on the law and opposition to the false hopes raised by the Zealots and apocalyptic groups.

3. Simon bar Koseba. Akiba hails Simon as the promised Messiah (on the basis of Num. 24:17) even though he is not of David's line. Some rabbis disagree, but many among both scholars and people follow Akiba's example. Although a high priest is mentioned, the prince now takes the lead. The incident shows that even into the second century A.D. messianic ideas are not fixed.

4. Justin's Dialogue. In this work Trypho the Jew refers to the general messianic hope of his people but criticizes the Christian exalting of Messiah to deity. Elijah will manifest the Messiah, who will come forth in glory, fulfil the law, and in spite of suffering vindicate himself as the Messiah (cf. 89.1; 48-49; 110.1; 67.2; 36.1).

5. Targums. These works set the messianic kingdom before the resurrection and last judgment. Of the house of David, the Messiah is hidden for a time, but God will initiate the new age by enabling him to defeat all enemies, to establish peace, to bring forgiveness to Israel, and to regather the dispersed people. As a prophet and teacher of the law, he observes it, makes the people hear it, and renews the covenant between God and the people. During his righteous rule the temple will be rebuilt and miracles, including resurrections, will occur.

6. Talmudic Literature and Midrashim. These works often mention the Messiah and his functions and qualities. They embody, in embellished form, the same traditions as the Targums. The Messiah's name is created before the world. A time of affliction precedes his coming. His age differs both from this aeon and from that of the resurrection and last judgment, although there is no unanimity on these points. At times the Messiah is David, but usually he is David's son. Conversion and obedience will prepare the way for his coming, although there will also be apostasy when he comes. The rabbis reject calculations of the time of his coming. Elijah will announce it. The nations will band together to resist him, but after a time he will defeat them, and his (ninth) empire will precede the tenth empire, the kingdom of God. The Messiah is both a righteous king and a teacher of the law. His reign is one of abundance and peace. The temple will be built again, but sin will cease, so that only thank offerings will be given. Only later does the idea of paradise regained find general acceptance. The Messiah is no divine figure, and his kingdom will end with the attack of Gog and Magog. God is the true author of his people's liberation and glorification.

7. The Messiah ben Joseph. A few references to this figure occur from the second century A.D. He is a military leader who gains victories, establishes peace for 40 years, is then killed (although his death has no expiatory significance), and thus makes way for the Messiah ben David, who finally conquers Israel's foes. The concept of the Messiah ben Joseph seems to go back to older ideas and shows how complex messianic expectation must have been at the time of Jesus. [A. S. VAN DER WOUDE, IX, 521-27]

D. The Christ Statements of the NT.

I. Occurrence of christós. Only the Lucan writings use the OT christós kyríou (or autoú). The absolute is common. Paul often uses christós without the article (cf. en or sýn Christṓ, or diá Christoú). With Jesus, the absolute produces the title ho Christós Iēsoús, which for Gentiles becomes the name Iēsoús Christós or Christós Iēsoús. With this, ho kýrios is also used. In all, christós occurs 529 times in the NT (379 times in Paul). There are only seven instances in Mark, 12 in Luke, 17 in Matthew, and 19 in John. Christianoí for "believers" derives from christós.

II. Synoptic Gospels and Acts.

a. In the mocking demand of Mk. 15:32, Christ and king of Israel are in apposition (cf. 15:26). Jesus is crucified as a messianic pretender, and the onlookers deride him as such. He confesses his messiahship in answer to the question of 14:61. Here ho christós is equated with the Son of the Blessed, and also with the Son of Man in Jesus' reply. It is as the Son of God that Jesus is the Messiah, and as such he is also the Son of Man.

b. In Mk. 8:27ff. Peter calls Jesus the Messiah, whereas the people simply regards him as a prophet. Jesus answers with his teaching about the Son of Man who must suffer many things. Peter's opposition rests on human ideas which cannot combine messiahship and suffering. But Jesus thinks the thoughts of God. His sense of his messiahship and messianic mission does not follow traditional patterns. He has a different understanding which he believes to be consonant with God's own thinking and purpose.

c. In Mk. 12:35 and parallels Jesus raises the question, not to affirm or reject his messiahship, but to pose the difficulty that arises when the Messiah's Davidic sonship is related to Ps. 110:1. The implied answer is that the decisive aspect is the divine thought and act.

d. Mk. 13:21-22 contains a warning against false claims to messiahship. The warning presupposes the messiahship of Jesus.

e. According to Mk. 9:41 the disciples hold a special position by belonging to the Messiah—christós is used without the article here, as also in some versions of Mk. 1:34 (cf. 1:24; 3:11; 5:7 for parallels).

2. Matthew.

a. In 16:20 Jesus tells his disciples to keep his messiahship secret; his acceptance of Peter's confession is plainly implied. In 24:5 the expansion brings assimilation to 24:23. The scoffers at the foot of the cross in 26:68 adopt the confession before the Sanhedrin in 26:64, and Pilate uses the Jewish title in 27:17, 22.

b. The statement in 1:16 shows that Jesus is the Messiah by Davidic descent and as the offshoot of Abraham, that he belongs to Israel, and that he comes as King at the end of the period that extends "to the Christ" (1:17). In v. 18 we then have a transition to his virgin birth and his ordination as Savior and Immanuel. The birth at Bethlehem completes the circle (2:1ff.). The works of 11:4ff. are "deeds of the Christ" (v. 2); with the Scriptures they bear witness to the hidden messiahship. In his attack on the scribes Jesus also claims that he as Christ is their one master. By his teaching and authority (7:28-29; 9:33) he exercises his messianic dominion.

3. Luke.

a. With the absolute ho christós (20:41; 22:67) Luke also uses "the Christ of God" (9:20). The "of God" shows by whom he is anointed and to whom he belongs. Before the high priest Jesus refuses to say whether he is the Christ but he affirms his divine sonship (22:67ff.). The title occurs in the accusation before Pilate (23:2), and the scoffers mock at his claim to be the Christ of God, the Chosen One (23:35). The impenitent thief joins in the mockery (v. 39).

b. In the infancy stories the angel proclaims Jesus as Savior, Christ, and Lord (2:11). The eternal King of 1:31ff. is the royal Messiah of David's house and also the Lord of Gentile believers. Simeon hails the infant Jesus as the Lord's Christ (2:26) who brings peace and salvation. The Messiah is also the Son of God in 1:32; 4:41. In 4:18 Jesus quotes Is. 61:1 to show that he is the Messiah as the recipient of the Spirit by whom he is conceived and who is given to him at his baptism.

c. In 24:26 Jesus explains to the two disciples why the Christ had to suffer. This is the Lord's own understanding. In prophetic action, the way through the cross to glory brings it to fulfilment. The crucifixion and resurrection give the picture of the Messiah its decisive shape.

4. Acts.

a. In Acts 4:27 the holy servant of God is said to be anointed by him. Peter tells Cornelius that God anointed Jesus (10:38). As Lord and Christ (2:36) Jesus is the one who is risen (v. 31) but who was also crucified (3:18). Conversion to this Christ brings remission of sins (3:19) and is the presupposition of the actualizing of eschatological salvation with his return. God has appointed Jesus as the Christ (3:20), and heaven must receive him until the time of consummation. The eschatological prophet is the royal Messiah all according to Scripture (vv. 22ff.). When the apostles preach and teach Jesus as the Christ they have the whole of his person and work in view (5:42; cf. 8:5, 12). Baptism into his name is the saving event of a transfer to his possession (2:38); Christians are those who call on the name of the Lord (2:21) and believe in the Lord Jesus Christ (11:17; cf. 16:31; 20:21). Preaching about the kingdom of God goes hand in hand with teaching about the Lord Jesus Christ (28:31). Jesus Christ is the content of the message; he is also the power of healing (4:10; 9:34).

b. Paul in 17:23 presents the new understanding of the Messiah with proofs from the OT. Jesus fully meets this understanding (v. 3).

c. The disciples come to be called Christianoí in Antioch (11:26). This word denotes adherents of Christ. Probably non-Christians use it first, assuming that Christós is a proper name, and treating his followers as a mystery fellowship. Paul by his preaching of Christ (11:26) perhaps helps to promote the usage, which rapidly spreads to other places.

5. Gospel Titles. Mk. 1:1 and Mt. 1:1 use the title Iēsoús Christós. Christós has here become a second name attached to the personal name Jesus.

6. The Messiah in the History of Jesus and the Synoptic Tradition. Jesus does not seem openly to claim messiahship even though he exercises eschatological authority as healer, prophet, and teacher. In Mark his concealed messiahship shapes his history, although the secret is more that of the Son of Man than of the Messiah. The reason for the secret is that the current understanding cannot express his authoritative work. Messiahship needs to be related to his history and reinterpreted accordingly. The Gospels repeat the restraint of Jesus, for what happens to him shows how people try to adapt him to their ideas and are disappointed when he treats Satan as his true foe, seeks to serve rather than to rule, and finds his victory in suffering and death. Yet even though Jesus forbids equation with the Messiah as currently expected, messiahship is still associated with him in the new form impressed upon it by his history, i.e., by his anointing with the Spirit, his special relation to God, and his authoritative lordship of service. For Christians, Jesus is no earthly Messiah on whom religious, national, and political hopes are set. He is Conqueror of the death which he suffers for his people. Having entered God's eternity, he frees them from their sin and will come again in glory. The concept of the Son of Man and the predicates of divine sonship fill out the picture. He is thus able to unite in one the characteristics of the messianic King, the messianic High Priest, and the Prophet like Moses, so that what Josephus finds in Hyrcanus comes to fulfilment in Jesus.

III. Paul's Epistles.

I. Usage.

a. Easter has related Israel's expectation to Jesus; God has accredited Jesus as the Messiah. The designation christós thus becomes a name; christós is Jesus.

b. Paul uses christós in the absolute, sometimes with and sometimes without the article, but with no difference of sense. Whether Paul says ho Christós or Christós, he has the uniqueness of Jesus in view. Christós without the article is more common.

c. Paul also uses both Christós Iēsoús and Iēsoús Christós; often the textual witness is equivocal. He tends to use the double form at significant points, e.g., in salutations, at the end of sections, and in vital statements. Christós serves as a second proper name but also confers the dignity of the title, especially when it comes first. Paul himself comes to see that the crucified Jesus is indeed the Messiah as the power of God (1 Cor. 1:24), but Gentiles tend to see Christós mainly as a second name, although not without some sense of its significance as a title. Paul himself avoids simply using the two titles kýrios and Christós together without adding the name of Jesus. For him the term Christós has especially the force of Savior. Jesus Christ means Jesus the Savior.

2. The Chief Epistles: The Christ and Christ.

a. A common formula in Paul is "the gospel of Christ" (Rom. 15:19; 1 Cor. 9:12), i.e., the good news whose content and source is Christ. This is also the gospel of his glory (2 Cor. 4:4), the witness of Christ (1 Cor. 1:6) or the gospel of God (Rom. 1:1). It leads on to such phrases as preaching Christ (Phil. 1: 15ff.). Paul takes over the gospel from the churches (1 Cor. 15:3ff.). Its content is Christ dead, risen, and exalted for us. Paul, who has first found in the cross an offense, speaks plainly of the crucifixion, since it is for us that Christ is accursed, and the cross is thus a declaration of the love of God (Rom. 5:5-6; 8:35). The resurrection is also linked with Christós. As the risen Lord, he guides eschatological events to their consummation. As the Lord of the living and the dead, who is the paschal lamb (1 Cor. 5:7) and purchase price of redemption (6:20), Christ confers freedom but also imposes responsibility (cf. Rom. 15:3). Freedom from the law means being under the law of Christ (1 Cor. 9:21), but not in such a way that additional demands negate his saving and liberating work (Gal. 5:lff.). Christ as the image of God (2 Cor. 4:4) fashions his people into his likeness (cf. Gal. 3:26-27). The glory of God shines in his face and brings the light of new creation (2 Cor. 4:6; 5:17ff.). The power in all this is that of Christ, so that one may gladly boast of one's own weakness (2 Cor. 12:9). The love of Christ controls those who belong to him (2 Cor. 5:14ff.). In this love one has a new knowledge of his reconciling work which amounts to a new creation (v. 17). This new creation is grounded in the reconciliation that God has effected through Christ (vv. 18ff.). God was in Christ, so that he is the mediator of salvation, God's representative to us. The apostles now beseech people on Christ's behalf to be reconciled to God. In so doing they suffer for him (Phil. 1:29). For Paul, Christ is thus the one who achieves victory through defeat. He finds all this presented in OT Scripture (1 Cor. 15:3ff.). Christ will come again as Judge (2 Cor. 5:10), but the focus is on his love (Gal. 2:20), or grace (1:6), or meekness and gentleness (2 Cor. 10:1), or steadfastness (2 Th. 3:5), or truth (2 Cor. 11:10)-qualities which the historical Jesus displays.

b. The people of Christ belongs to him by baptism as death and resurrection with him (Gal. 2:19-20). Their aim is to magnify him (Phil. 1:20). His thinking should control them (1 Cor. 2:16). Christ is in them (Rom. 8:10). They have his Spirit (8:9), who is the Spirit of God that raised Christ Jesus from the dead (8:11). This Spirit makes them God's children (8:17) and imitators of Christ (1 Cor. 11:1) in the renunciation of self-pleasing (Rom. 15:3) and the receiving of the weak (v. 7). His people are his body (1 Cor. 12:12). Christ is the body and they, being in him, are the members. As such they cannot belong to a harlot (6:15) or to Belial (2 Cor. 6:15). They partake of the body and blood of Christ in the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. 10:16). Christ is also the head (1 Cor. 11:3). In this sense, he is supreme, and his people are under obligation to him (2 Cor. 10:5). If slaves, they are his freedmen; if free, they are his slaves (1 Cor. 7:22). The churches of Christ (Rom. 16:16) are his bride (2 Cor. 11:2) or epistle (3:3). Paul by his work has a part in Christ's triumph as he spreads the fragrance of the knowledge of him in every place (2:14-15). The task of the apostles is to proclaim the good news of which he is the content (1 Cor. 1:17). False apostles pretend to be apostles of Christ (2 Cor. 11:13). Christ speaks through the true apostle (13:3). If the apostles are his glory (2 Cor. 8:23), they are also his slaves (Gal. 1:10). They are in Christ (12:1-2) and Christ's stewards (1 Cor. 4:1). Their work is Christ's (cf. Phil. 2:30). Those who serve Christ are acceptable to God (Rom. 14:18). Paul will give up everything to gain Christ (Phil. 3:8). Yet he is also ready to be cut off from Christ for Israel's sake (Rom. 9:3). In answer to a Christ party at Corinth, he shows that Christ died for all (1 Cor. 1:12-13). All enjoy freedom by allegiance to him (3:21ff.).

c. Paul often uses prepositions with "Christ" to express relationship to the field of force that his saving work establishes. Baptism brings us "into Christ" (cf. Rom. 16:5). We are then "with Christ" (Phil. 1:23). God does the work "through Christ" (cf. 2 Cor. 1:5); this gives us confidence in God (3:4). Being "in Christ" expresses the operation of salvation in the field of force that Christ sets up. Gal. 2:17 refers to the event and reception of salvation, 1 Cor. 4:15 to the work, Gal. 1:22 to the saved community, and 2 Cor. 12:2 to the members. In this field of force all events are spiritually caused and ordained by God through Christ.

3. The Chief Epistles: Jesus Christ and Christ Jesus.

a. The common "Christ Jesus" implies knowledge of Christ as the bringer of salvation who is called Jesus. It stands strongly related to ho Christós or Christós (cf. Gal. 3:27 and Rom. 6:3). Jesus Christ is the author of thanksgiving or of the fruit of righteousness (Rom. 1:8; Phil. 1:11). He has been appointed judge (Rom. 2:16). Paul's apostleship is from him (Gal. 1:1) in an act of divine grace (1:15). en Christṓ Iēsoú has the same force as en Christṓ (cf. Gal. 2:4, 17; 1 Cor. 1:4-5; Rom. 3:24; Phil. 3:14, etc.). Members of the church are sanctified in Christ Jesus (1 Cor. 1:2). Their boasting is in Christ Jesus (Phil. 1:26). Paul is the father of believers in Christ Jesus (1 Cor. 4:15).

b. Various formulations show the kinship of (ho) Christós and Christ Jesus or Jesus Christ, e.g., in relation to the cross (1 Cor. 1:7; Gal. 3:1), or the resurrection (Rom. 6:4; 8:11), or his grace (Gal. 1:6; Rom. 5:15), or revelation (Gal. 1:16, 12). Christ Jesus is common in statements about faith, for faith focuses on his saving work and yet he is also its author. Believers are Christ's but also belong to Christ Jesus (1 Cor. 15:23; Gal. 5:24). Jesus Christ, or Christ, is in them (2 Cor. 13:5; Rom. 8:10). Paul is an apostle of Christ Jesus but refers also to the apostles of Christ (1 Cor. 1:1; 2 Cor. 11:13). Plainly the Christ, Christ, Christ Jesus, and Jesus Christ all have the same force.

4. Lord Jesus Christ and the (Our) Lord Jesus Christ. Lord Jesus (1 Cor. 12:3) becomes Lord Jesus Christ in Phil. 2:6ff., where Christ bears in context the sense of messianic Savior. Paul preaches Christ Jesus the Lord (2 Cor. 4:5; cf. Rom. 14:7ff.). Divinely commissioned, Christ is our wisdom etc. (1 Cor. 1:30). His sonship and lordship embrace both earthly and eternal modes (Rom. 1:3-4). As there is one God, so there is one Lord, Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 8:6). Through him are all things, e.g., the grace and peace of the salutations (Rom. 1:7; Gal. 1:3, etc.). Those who have God as Father have Jesus Christ as Lord. The full "Lord Jesus Christ" is important in salutations and in statements like that in 1 Cor. 15:31 or in the baptismal formula of 1 Cor. 1:2. God is confessed as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ in Rom. 15:6. 1 Cor. 1 heaps up references to Christ Jesus etc. in order to point the church to its true basis and to show that its Christ and Lord is Jesus. 1 Th. 1:3 refers to the hope that is based on our Lord Jesus Christ, and 1 Th. 5:23 speaks about his parousia.

5. Christ's Significance. Paul relates Christ to Adam as well as David. Christ is the author of a new humanity (1 Cor. 15:47-48). As a servant of both circumcised and uncircumcised (Rom. 15:8, 18), he has universal and not just national significance.

6. chríō in 2 Cor.1:21-22. Paul uses chríō only of believers in the baptismal formula of 2 Cor. 1:21-22. The three aorists here refer to the act of God which accomplishes the establishing. The chríō perhaps embraces also the sealing and giving of the Spirit. Its sense is transferred; it denotes the appropriating to Christ that baptism signifies and seals, that the Spirit renders efficacious, and that God himself confirms.

7. Colossians and Ephesians. In debate with Gnostic ideas, Christós is a leading concept in these two epistles. Christ is a historical figure; his mystery is disclosed in his work and preached in the gospel. The mystery is "Christ in you, the hope of glory" (Col. 1:27). It is in faith, not ecstasy, that Christ is thus present. The mystery of Christ is also the mystery of the church (Eph. 5:32). All knowledge and wisdom are hidden in Christ (Col. 2:2-3). The fullness of the Godhead dwells in him (2:9). He is the Head of all dominion (2:10). Forgiveness through him brings full salvation (1:12ff.). The goal is complete human maturity in him (1:28). He grants access to God to both Jews and Gentiles (Eph. 2:18). The Gentiles who were far from him are now "in" him (2:12-13). Making peace, he is the Savior and Head of the community. He discharges his lordship over the church by serving it (5:22ff.) in a relation that provides a model for that of husbands and wives. The church is his body (Col. 1:24). The reality of God is present with him (2:17). His word is to dwell in his people richly and his peace is to rule in their hearts (3:15-16). God is his Father (1:3). His grace is with those who truly love him (Eph. 6:24). His love for them surpasses knowledge (3:19). His gifts bring his work to believers (4:7) by way of his ministers (4:11-12), by whom he initiates a process of growth to steadfast maturity in truth and love (4:13ff.). Faith works itself out in a life shaped by it (Col. 2:6), i.e., in mutual forgiveness (Eph. 4:32), service of Christ (3:24), and dying and rising with him (3:1ff.). The term "Christ" embraces the cross and resurrection; those who trust in him are taken up into this twofold event. The Father of our Lord Jesus Christ has conferred spiritual blessings on us in him (Eph. 1:3ff.). Christ is elect and beloved (1:6); his salvation means sonship and redemption. Salvation is foreordained in him (1:11). The power of God set forth in his resurrection grants to believers the assurance of protection and eschatological consummation. Prayer is made for his indwelling (3:17) and for knowledge of his love (3:19). Illumination comes through him (5:14). He comes from the Creator God, is one with him, reveals his purpose, and leads creation back to him (Col. 1:15ff.).

8. The Pastorals.

a. The Pastorals contain confessional sections that mostly use "Christ Jesus." In 1 Tim. 1:15 remission of sins is through his cross and resurrection. 1 Tim. 6:13 refers directly to the passion. In 2 Tim. 1:9-10 God granted us grace in Christ Jesus from eternity but has now manifested it. The abolition of death most likely carries a reference to his own death. Tit. 2:13 speaks about the blessed hope of his appearing, but again with a look at his atoning death (v. 14). 2 Tim. 4:6 refers to the pouring out of the regenerating and renewing Spirit through him.

b. Christ Jesus our Lord occurs in salutations (1 Tim. 1:2), and Paul is an apostle of Christ Jesus in 1 Tim. 1:1. Timothy is his servant in 1 Tim. 4:6, and his good soldier in 2 Tim. 2:3. Faith, love, and salvation are in him (1 Tim. 1:14; 2 Tim. 2:10), and so are grace and a godly life (2 Tim. 2:1; 3:12). Paul is a model appointed by him (1 Tim. 1:12), for in him Jesus Christ has displayed his patience (1:16). Christ occurs alone only in 1 Tim. 5:11. Elsewhere Christ is linked with Jesus, and God and Christ Jesus are so coordinated that God plainly acts in him and he himself acts on God's behalf.

IV. 1 Peter, Hebrews, James, Jude, and 2 Peter.

1. 1 Peter. Like Paul, 1 Peter uses Christós, ho Christós, and Iēsoús Christós. At the heart of the epistle stands the confession of 3:18ff. Christ brings salvation and access to God by his victorious cross, resurrection, and exaltation. His saving death brings remission, and his resurrection is the ground of regeneration (1:2-3). He manifests his invisible glory (1:7), and links promise and fulfilment (1:11). His passion and glorification serve as a model (2:21ff.; 3:18). A good walk and the acceptance of suffering sanctify Christ in the heart (3:15). Trust in him brings confidence in God (1:21), and new birth is by him as the Word of God (1:23). The author is an apostle of Jesus Christ (1:1) and a witness of the sufferings of Christ (5:1). His readers love Christ though they have not seen him (1:8). Peace is the author's wish for all who are in Christ (5:14).

2. Hebrews. In Hebrews Jesus Christ is the eternal Son and High Priest who as the pioneer of salvation brings many sons to glory (2:10). The term Christós occurs between 3:6 and 9:28 and Iēsoús Christós from 10:10 to 13:21, but with no discernible distinction. Heb. 1:8-9 relates Ps. 45:6-7 to Christ. God has appointed him (5:5). His people is under him (3:6). He has won this people for himself (9:11-12) through his blood (v. 14). His exaltation (v. 24) and his parousia (v. 28) are also vital elements in his work. The term Christós is still firmly related to his passion, his exaltation, and his church. The formula diá Christoú occurs (13:21), but not en Christṓ. A basic affirmation that sets the readers in solid fellowship with their teachers is that Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today, and forever (13:8).

3. James, Jude, and 2 Peter.

a. In James Iēsoús Christós occurs in 1:1 (the author is his servant) and in 2:1 (the reference is to faith in our Lord Jesus Christ in his glory).

b. Jude calls himself a servant of Jesus Christ (v. 1) and addresses those who are kept for him (v. 2). He refers to the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ (v. 17), but also to those who deny our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ (v. 4). Believers wait for the mercy of Christ (v. 21). The work closes with an ascription of praise to God through Jesus Christ our Lord (v. 25).

c. 2 Peter. The author is a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ (1:1), he greets those who stand in the righteousness of our Savior Jesus Christ (1:1), and he prays for the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ (1:8). This knowledge relates to his power and coming (1:16). The author has received a revelation from our Lord Jesus Christ (1:14). His wish for his readers is that they may enjoy an entrance into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ (1:11). For the most part Christós has here the force of a proper name.

V. The Johannine Writings.

1. The Gospel.

a. Jesus is the Revealer through whom believers receive life. The Messiah is one of the predicates that shed light on this fact (1:41ff.; 4:25).

b. The incarnate Logos is Jesus Christ (1:17). Contrasted with Moses, he brings grace and truth. Eternal life (17:3) is knowledge of the only true God and of Jesus Christ whom he has sent. In these passages the use of Christ characterizes Jesus as the Revealer who brings salvation.

c. The Baptist denies that he is the Messiah (1:20), and Andrew claims that he has found the Messiah in Jesus (1:41; cf. 1:45, 49). The Messiah here is the kingly Messiah, Son of God and Son of Man (cf. 1:51), who has a special endowment of the Spirit (1:33). The aim of the gospel is to lead to faith that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God (20:31), who acts in unity with the Father, who has come into the world to do so (cf.

11:27), and who by so doing gives life (5:21, 26). The Samaritan woman also sees in Jesus the Messiah (4:29), but she can do this only because Jesus reveals himself to her (4:25-26). Jewish leaders object to his connection with Nazareth and his open origin (7:26-27). In reply, Jesus points to his true origin with the Father (7:28-29). His coming from Galilee conceals his Davidic birth at Bethlehem (7:41-42). Only the power and content of his sayings show that he is truly the Christ. The final objection of his crucifixion remains (12:34). In his answer Jesus points to the limited duration of his earthly work (12:35-36). He also testifies to the eternal work of the glorified Lord (12:31-32; 14: 12ff.).

d. Since Jesus does not plainly disclose his messiahship, the people asks him for a direct answer (10:24). Jesus in reply refers to his word, which only faith receives (v. 25). He is the Messiah as the Shepherd who leads his people, whose voice they obey, who gives them life, whose power, grounded in his unity with God, is superior to death (12:31-32). He is the Messiah as God's Son (1:49; 11:27)—a reason for offense (5:18; 10:31 ff.). As Son of God and Messiah, he is the Revealer who in revealing grants life by way of his passion and exaltation.

2. The Epistles.

a. Christ. Divine sonship takes precedence here too (cf. 1 Jn. 1:3; 3:23; 5:5-6). Titular use of christós occurs in 1 Jn. 2:22; 5:1. Awareness of Christ as a predicate is a factor in the name combinations. As Son of God, Jesus is from the beginning (1 Jn. 1:1). He has come in history as a man (vv. 1ff.). The witnesses have fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ, and they pass on this fellowship (v. 3). Jesus Christ is an advocate for sinners (2:1). The requirement is faith in his name and mutual love (3:23; 2 Jn. 9). He is God, and hence his messianic work is God's own work (1 Jn. 1:7-8; 2:1; 3:8; 18ff.). From him and the Father come grace, mercy, and peace in truth and love (2 Jn. 3). Opponents, possibly Ebionites but more likely docetic Gnostics, deny that Jesus is the Christ (1 Jn. 2:22; cf. 5:5). In answer the author points to the one Jesus Christ who is Son of God (5:5-6). In 5:6 Jesus Christ is not just a double name; it firmly associates the historical Jesus and the heavenly Christ.

b. Antichrist. Those who confess the sonship and messiahship of Christ by the Spirit (1 Jn. 4:15; 2:22; 4:2) are born of God (5:1), but those who contest them are antichrists (2:22) controlled by the spirit of antichrist (4:2). In 2:18 and 4:3 antichrist is a coming apocalyptic figure, the opponent of Christ whose power increases prior to the end but who is finally judged and destroyed. This figure, however, is already at work in false teachers (antichrists) who come from within the community and whose appearance shows that the last hour is near (1 Jn. 2:18; cf. 4:3; 2 Jn. 7).

c. chrísma. The "anointing" of the Spirit enables believers to resist false teaching by imparting clarity of faith and judgment. chrísma here is not "anointing oil" but an instructive power that remains in the church and makes it independent of an official teaching office. The term reminds us of the Messiah's anointing by the Spirit and of the close relation between the Son and sons by way of reception of the Spirit.

3. Revelation.

a. John calls his work the revelation of Jesus Christ, bears witness to the testimony of Jesus Christ, and wishes grace and peace from Jesus Christ, who is the faithful witness (1:1ff.) by reason of his loving work for us in his death and resurrection. Only in this passage in Revelation do we find Iēsoús Christós. The usage plainly denotes an awareness of his significance as the bringer of salvation.

b. In four other verses ho christós is used as a title. In 11:15 and 12:10 Christ assumes dominion at the side of God. As intercessor, he replaces the accuser in 12:10. In 20:4, 6 those who overcome reign with Christ and are priests of God and of Christ in the millennial reign. In Revelation Christ is Ruler. He protects and cares for his people and has dominion over all other powers. He won this dominion by his death, and God has conferred it. It is a priestly rule which is now hidden but will be manifest in the millennium, which will be followed by the final aeon when God is all in all (21:1ff.; 22:1ff.).

E. The Early Church.

a. Christ and Jesus Christ. Ignatius mostly uses the full form Iēsoús Christós (Ephesians 14.2; Romans 4.1, etc. are exceptions). (Our) Lord Jesus Christ is rare. Ignatius makes good use of the en formula (Trallians 1.1 etc.) with Christ Jesus, Jesus Christ, the power, faith, etc. of Jesus Christ, and the love of God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. He links Christ firmly to his cross and resurrection (Ephesians 9.1 etc.) and also speaks about his love (Trallians 6.1). Ignatius coordinates Christ and God; Christ is our God (cf. Ephesians 8.2; Trallians 7.1, etc.), our Savior (Philadelphians 9.2), etc. In large measure Christós has lost its true sense in Ignatius, so that he has to find new ways to express who Jesus Christ is.

b. Confessional Formulas and Statements. Ignatius adopts various confessional formulas, as in Ephesians 7.2; 18.2; Magnesians 6.1. He also develops statements of his own based on earlier models (cf. Magnesians 8.2 and Romans 8.2).

c. Christ and the Church. Ignatius stresses the link between Christ and the church but with a more institutional body in view (Smyrneans 8.2). The church's relation to Christ parallels Christ's to the Father (Ephesians 5.1). Ignatius finds a close connection between Jesus Christ, the bishop's office, and the apostolic witness (Trallians 7.1).

d. Christianós and Christianismós. Ignatius often uses Christianós for a believer; one must be this in reality and not in name only (Magnesians 4). Christianismós also occurs for being a Christian, for the Christian lifestyle (Magnesians 10.3), or for discipleship (10.1). Ignatius also uses such other terms as christophóros, christónomos, and christomathía.

2. Polycarp and Martyrdom of Polycarp.

a. In Polycarp we find the full form "our Lord Jesus Christ," a link with Savior, and coordination with God.

b. The Martyrdom of Polycarp also uses the full form. Polycarp knows the significance of the Messiah as the bringer of salvation but has to explain the term to pagans. In 10.1 he calls himself Chrístianós, and his enemies call him the father of the Christians in 12.2 (cf. also the phrase in 3.2).

3. The Didache. This work mostly uses kýrios for Jesus. Iēsoús Chrístós occurs only in the formula in 9.4. We also find Christianós once in 12.4.

4. Barnabas. In this work Jesus is Christ on the basis of OT quotations (Ps. 110:1 in 12.10), but we find Christós with Jesus only in 2.6.

5. 1 Clement. This work shows awareness of the messianic significance of Jesus in 42.1-2. A confessional formula underlies 49.6 (cf. 2.1 with reference to the resurrection). A connection with the church may be seen in 44.3 etc. en Christṓ occurs in 1.2; 21.8, etc., and en Christṓ Iēsoú in 32.4; 38. 1, but en formulas usually include nouns that express Christian lifestyle and conduct.

6. 2 Clement. This work relates Christós to Savior on the basis of the passion. Those whose lives are shaped by Christ are the church, his body. In the union of flesh and spirit the church is the flesh and Christ the Spirit. The work does not use the full formula "our Lord Jesus Christ"; it does have the simple name Jesus and the designation kýrios.

7. Diognetus. This work does not use Christós, but Christianós is common as the author describes Christians as those who love though they are hated, who are the soul of the world, etc. (2.6; 6.1ff.). A new style is forged to describe who Jesus Christ is (7.4-5), but the term Son appears (9.2, 4; 10.2).

8. Summary. The survey shows that there is still some awareness that Christós denotes messiahship and is linked with the cross and resurrection as the salvation event. In many circles, however, Christós is now merely a name, and other words, especially sōtḗr, have to be used to bring out the content of the term, i.e., that Christ is the bringer of salvation. We thus find many notable attempts to express who Christ is for the early church. [W. GRUNDMANN, IX, 527-80]

chrónos [time, period of time]

A. The Greek World.

I. Lexical Data.

1. This word has first the general sense of "time" or "the course of time" or "the passage of time."

2. a. It then means a "section" of time.

b. A related sense is a "measure" or "span" of time, a "limited time."

3. A further meaning is a "point of time," a "date."

II. Time in Greek Philosophy.

1. Philosophy asks whether time is unending, whether the corruptibility of the universe means its finitude, whether the reality of time is bound up with the movement of the cosmos, whether it is a reality at all. Whereas for some thinkers time is what gives order to eternal flux, and time is infinite, for others (e.g., the Sophist Antiphon) it has no real significance. For the Eleatics, being is a connected whole in the now, and Zeno concludes that, since there is no real movement, time does not really exist.

2. For Plato time is the moving image of eternity. It arises and perishes with the heavens. True being does not belong to time. The original is eternal; only the copy was and is and is to come.

3. Aristotle stresses that the all is eternal. Time exists only in terms of movement or change, i.e., as earlier or later. The peripatetic Strato argues that to be in time is not to be encircled by it. Time measures duration; day and night are not part of it. Epicurus thinks that time simply accompanies days and nights.

4. Stoicism relates time to movement. Nothing happens without it. It is also infinite. Yet it does not truly exist. The present exists, but one side of it still belongs to the past, another belongs already to the future.

5. The Sceptics claim that the concept of time yields no objectively solid insight. Time is neither limited nor endless, created nor uncreated, divisible nor indivisible. The concept is unserviceable.

6. Philo regards the creation of time as important. God's existence is eternity, not time. Eternity is the original of time, which arises only with the cosmos. Time is an interval of cosmic movement. It comes into being through the cosmos, not vice versa. Days and months arise with the ordered courses of the sun and moon, and with these also comes number.

7. Plutarch agrees with Plato that only the eternal has true being and that time comes with the cosmos as something moved and hence as impermanent.

8. Plotinus also traces time to the rise of the world. The world soul makes itself temporal by creating the perceptible world. It subjects this world to time. Time is the life of the world soul in movement from one form to another. It will end when this activity ceases. Like the world soul, it is everywhere. The cosmos strives ceaselessly toward the real being of eternity. The courses of the heavenly bodies measure

e.g. exempli gratia, for example

i.e. id est, that is

time. By giving precedence to eternity, this line of thinking escapes the bondage to time that follows when time is viewed as unending and only the visible world is taken into account (Aristotle).

B. Time in Judaism.

I. The LXX.

1. Hebrew Terms. chrónos is not very common in the LXX. It is mostly used for the word "day" when this denotes a period of time, e.g., the "time" of a ruler's reign, a "lifetime," the "age" of someone. Another use is for "delay" in Dan. 2:16, and the sense of "time" occurs in Sir. 43:6 LXX. The meaning in Job 14:13 is a "set time." The LXX also uses it for the numbering of the reign in Dan. 5:26 (a free rendering).

2. Works with No Hebrew Text. Some contact with current ideas occurs in Hellenistic works. Solomon has knowledge of the times in Wis. 7:17ff., i.e., time's rise, extension, and cessation. Wisdomknows periods of time in advance, i.e., historical processes (8:8). 2 Macc. 1:22 refers to the passage of time, Wis. 2:4 to its course, Wis. 7:2 to a span, 2 Macc. 4:23 to all time, 2 Macc. 12:15 to an epoch, and Tob. 14:4 to a specific time.

II. Nonbiblical Judaism.

1. Testaments of the Twelve. In this work chrónos means a "period of time," a "certain time," a "point in time," or an "indefinite time."

2. Qumran.

a. The first meaning in the Scrolls is a "period of time." Each time has its own order. "This time" is the time of the separation of the community. The elect of the time are the sect.

b. A genitive is often added to characterize a period, e.g., the time of wrath, of transgression, of judgment, of devastation, of grace, of divine glory, or of salvation. We also find references to "all times" or "all eternal times." God sets times, e.g., for wickedness, or appoints times, e.g., for new creation.

c. Another use is for a "point of time." A particular event may fix the point, e.g., the time of harvest, or more generally of visitation, of penitence, or of judgment. The set time of God's intervention is contrasted with the times of darkness; today is God's time.

III. Time in Judaism. Jewish history fixes events in time and hence presupposes in some sense a linear view. Thus the OT coordinates successive events (1 Kgs. 6:1 etc.), and later works follow suit. Josephus dates the flood etc. from Adam, and he synchronizes his references with the number of years from the exodus, the migration of Abraham, and the flood (cf. Antiquities 1.82; 8.61). Jubilees connects its dating with the religious calendar. Qumran relates time to a yearly calendar. God has fixed the times for powers and events. In particular, Judaism perceives two aeons. Negative and positive epochs follow one another even within the one aeon. The relation between God and Israel is decisive in their assessment. Thus the ages of Moses, David, and Josiah are positive ones. Divine foreordination fixes their coming and duration. Hence the times are God's times. As Lord of history, God is also Lord of time (cf. Is. 41:2ff.; 45:1ff.; Ezr. 1:1-2). He is thus independent of it. Acting by thought and command, he does not need time (cf. Ps. 33:9). The six days of Gen. 1 indicate the orderliness of the world. Whether there is a true concept of eternity in references to numberless times may be debated.

C. The NT.

LXX Septuagint

OT Old Testament

cf. confer, compare

NT New Testament

I. Lexical Data. In the NT chrónos mostly means “span of time” (cf. Acts 1:21). This may be indefinite (1 Cor. 16:7). The absolute chrónon means “time” in Acts 19:22. “Span” seems to be the sense in Mt. 2:7, 16, and we find “set time” in Acts 1:7, “delay” in Rev. 2:21, “term” in Lk. 1:57, and “point of time” in Acts 1:6. The word is relatively more common in 1 Peter (four times) and Acts (17).

II. Specific Sayings. The NT makes no basic statements about time. Rev. 10:6 does not mean that time ends, but that judgment will be delayed no longer. Rev. 6:11 (“a little longer”) points to imminent eschatological expectation. Believers must wait in view of the delay (Mt. 25:5; 24:48). God has established the times (Acts 1:7); detailed information about them is not available. Yet Jesus has been manifested at the end of the times (1 Pet. 1:20; cf. Gal. 4:4: Time reaches its fullness with the Son’s coming). The last time of Jude 18 is the time immediately before the end. For believers it is “the rest of the time in the flesh” and must be lived in a different way from “the time that is past” (1 Pet. 4:2-3). It is a time of exile (1:17). In 2 Tim. 1:9-10 the gracious work of God that is actualized in Christ is already given to us “before eternal times.” The apostolic message manifests the hope of eternal life which God promised “ages ago” (Tit. 1:2-3). In Christ we have the revelation of the mystery which was not disclosed “in eternal times”; the implication here again is that it was conceived ages ago by God but only now made known (Rom. 16:25). Heb. 4:7 refers to the spacing of time within the OT revelation; David’s saying comes long after Num. 14:22-23.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. In these works we find such expressions as a “stretch of time,” a “short time,” a “length of time,” a “set time” (cf. Hermas Similitudes 5.5.3; 2 Clem. 19.3; Hermas Similitudes 7.2; Mart. Pol. 22.3; Did. 16.2). More generally we read of “every time” (Did. 14.3), of “earlier times” (Hermas Similitudes 9.20.4), or of “our times” (Mart. Pol. 16.2). The polloí chrónoi of 1 Clem. 44.3 embrace only a few decades, but those of 42.5 cover the period from Is. 60:17. The anagraphás tṓn chrónōn in 1 Clem. 25.5 are “chronicles” (of pagan priests).

pseúdos [lie, falsehood], pseúdomai [to lie], pseudḗs [false], pseúsma [lie, falsehood], pseústēs [liar], apseudḗs [true], ápseustos [truthful]

A. Secular Greek.

1. Usage. Of uncertain derivation, this group has the basic sense of “false” in various contexts. The active verb means “to deceive,” passive “to be deceived” or “to deceive oneself,” and intransitive “to lie.” The noun pseúdos means “what is untrue,” “deceit,” “falsehood.” The adjective pseudḗs means “deceiving,” “untrue,” the adverb “falsely.” apseudḗs means “true” and may be used either for those who do not deceive or for those who are not deceived. The pseústēs is the “liar,” and pseúsma means “untruth,” “deception,” or “lie.”

2. Meaning. In philosophical discussion lying is not just the opposite of truth. It carries the sense both of untruth as nonbeing and of untruth as error. Lying is ethically wrong in virtue of the divinely protected order of the world which links right and truth. The worst lie is perjury. Calumniation is also wrong because it deprives its victim of dignity and honor. The gods may deceive. Indeed, all superiors have a certain freedom to lie, and social or political lies are acceptable. So is deceit in art. In tragedy deceit and cunning bring about just punishment. Historians, however, contrast the truth of their accounts with the fictions of poets. They often give assurances of their reliability in their prefaces.

3. The Group in Philosophy. Two lines of investigation develop: a. into what is true or false in logic, and b. into what is true (or truthful) and false in ethics. Basic is the understanding of truth in equation with reality. For Aristotle perception is true, but thinking may be in error. Truthfulness is the point in ethics. Opinions may be true or false without being good or bad.

B. The OT.

1. Usage. The LXX uses the group for three main Hebrew equivalents meaning "to lie," "to deceive," "to feign," "to belie oneself," "to deny," and "to give false witness." pseúdomai is used for a verb meaning "to hide" in Job 6:10; 27:11.

2. Meaning. Legally perjury is the worst offense (Ex. 20:16), but slander is also a legal matter (Ps. 15:3). God, who protects what is right, hates lying (Prov. 6: 16ff.). Wisdom condemns lying on the ground that it is folly (Prov. 17:7), but it allows lies of necessity (cf. Gen. 12:13; Jer. 38:24ff.). Hos. 7:1ff. gives prophetic intensity to the attack on lying. Religiously we find unfaithfulness to God, apostasy to false gods, and false prophets. Idol worship denies God (Job 31:28). Idols are deceitful (Is. 44:20). False prophecy is particularly reprehensible because it appeals to God (Ezek. 13:6-7), although God himself may send a lying spirit (1 Kgs. 22:22-23). The age of salvation will end the deception of false prophecy (Zech. 13:2ff.). Ezek. 13:19 shows the inner relation between false prophecy and apostasy. Jeremiah works out criteria of differentiation (14:14-15; 20:6; 23:17ff.).

C. Judaism.

1. Qumran. Qumran relates truth and falsehood dualistically to two spheres, that of salvation and that of perdition. Eschatology combines with decision. The Testaments of the Twelve also has a concept of decision, but here it is more individualistic.

2. Rabbinic Works. These works obviously condemn lying, but contain nothing distinctive.

3. Philo. Philo often links pseudḗs with dóxa (opinion). Pagans have false notions about God, idols, etc. He places lying in lists of vices, but within the exposition of the law.

D. The NT.

1. Synoptic Gospels and Acts. The verb occurs in these works only in Mt. 5:11 and Acts 5:3-4, and the noun and adjective only in Acts 6:13. In Mt. 5:11 the verb is in the absolute. This beatitude alone is compound and in the second person. Acts 5:3-4 comes within the sphere of sacral law. The offense against the church is an offense against the Spirit and brings down the judgment of God.

2. Paul.

a. Paul uses pseúdomai negatively as a catchword in the solemn affirmation of Rom. 9:1. The parallel references to Christ, conscience, and the Holy Spirit give the protestation its force. In Rom. 1:25 humanity sins by exchanging the truth of God for a lie; it is through humanity itself that sin gains entry (5:12). When God's truth is manifested, all people are shown to be liars (3:4). To see the character of God's work as grace and irrevocable word is to perceive the self-evident absurdity of the objection of v. 3.

b. In Tit. 1:2 God never lies. Deceptive signs and wonders, however, accompany antichrist (2 Th. 2:9, 11). The group also occurs in the exhortation of Col. 3:9 and various admonitions in Eph. 4:25; 1 Tim. 1:9-10 (cf. Jms. 3:14).

3. John.

v. verse

a. Truth is a leading concept in John, but an antithesis comes only with Jn. 8:44-45, where falsehood has a personal representative, who again has children. Lying here is an active contesting of the truth, i.e., unbelief. On the one side we have God and Christ, on the other the father of lies and Christ's opponents. Murderer and liar go together (as do truth and life) in 14:6.

b. God is light, and hence we should do the truth in fellowship (1 Jn. 1:6; 2:4; 4:20). Lying denies the confession (2:21-22). The liar manifests antichrist. Confession includes admission of sin; refusing to admit it is the same as opposing God's truth and thus treating God as a liar (1:10; 5:10).

c. Revelation attacks those who falsely claim to be Jews (3:9) and also false prophets (2:2). The 144,000 do not lie (14:5), and lying receives emphasis as the last of the things excluded from the eschatological city (21:27; cf. 22:14-15).

E. The Early Church. Truthfulness is a divine gift and the attack on it is theft in Hermas Mandates 3.2. Antitheses bring out the nuances of unfaithfulness and hypocrisy. pseúdos is personified in Hermas Similitudes 9.15.3, and pseudḗs means "perjury", in Barn. 2.8. Falsehood is not prominent in Gnosticism, and although the Mandaeans heavily stress truth, they say little about lying. [H. CONZELMANN, IX, 594-603] psḗphos [pebble, vote], psēphízō [to calculate, reckon], sympsēphízō [to reckon], (katapsēphízomai [to resolve, condemn]), synkatapsēphízomai [to be chosen]

A. Normal Greek Usage.

1. psḗphos. This word means "little stone," "pebble," "dressed stone," or "stone" used in mosaics or board games. The plural, for "stones" used in counting, can denote "account." Other uses for small stones are in astrology, soothsaying, and especially voting. The latter use leads to the meaning "vote" or "voice," then "opinion," and in the legal sphere "voting" and "verdict."

2. psēphízō, sympsēphízō, (katapsēphízomai), synkatapsēphízomai.

a. psēphízō means "to count" or "calculate" with stones, in a transferred sense "to reach a verdict," and middle "to vote with a stone," "to vote," "to resolve."

b. sympsēphízō, an uncommon word, means "to reckon up," "to agree on."

c. katapsēphízomai means "to pronounce guilty" or "to resolve," middle "to be condemned."

B. The LXX and Hellenistic Judaism.

1. The LXX.

a. We find psḗphos in Lam. 3:16 for "little stone" and in Ex. 4:25 for the sharp stone used for cutting the foreskin. The plural in Sir. 18:10 is used for little stones in the sand. The sense of "voting stone" occurs in 4 Macc. 15:26.

b. psēphízō is a variant in 1 Kgs. 3:8; 8:5 for "counting." sympsēphízō occurs in Jer. 49:20 Cod. AQ for "counting" (sheep).

2. Josephus.

a. Josephus uses psḗphos for "resolve" or "vote."

b. psēphízomai in Josephus means "to resolve" or "to reckon."

c. katapsēphízomai has the meaning "to condemn."

3. Philo.

a. Philo uses psḗphos for “pronouncement” or “verdict.” Pronouncements may be just and legal or unjust and illegal.

b. psēphízomai has in Philo the sense “to decree” or “to resolve.”

c. katapsēohízomai means “to condemn.”

C. The NT and Apostolic Fathers.

1. Paul in Acts 26:10 says that he gave his “voice” against believers, i.e., condemned them.

2. The white stone of Rev. 2:17 may have been an amulet. It serves to ward off evil forces. The color denotes its new and distinctive character or category.

3. In Lk. 14:28 psēphízō means “to reckon.” As the builder should count the cost before starting, so disciples should consider their resources. They must also consider the cost of the required renunciation. “Reckon” is also the meaning of sympsēphízō in Acts 19:19 when those who had burned their books of magic valued them and found they came to a very high sum.

4. The number of the beast is counted in Rev. 13:18. Numerical value is ascribed to the letters, and the total is 666. One interpretation of this number is that it is the sum of the numbers 1 to 36, and that 36 is the sum of the numbers 1 to 8. In Gnosticism the number 8, the ogdoad, is identical to sophía, so that Gnostic wisdom might be the enemy. Others arrive at the emperor Domitian.

5. katapsēphízomai in Acts 1:26 seems to indicate that Matthias is officially given a place with the eleven.

6. sympsēphízō means “to reckon,” “to add up,” “to calculate” in Hermas Visions 3.1.4. [G. BRAUMANN, IX, 604-07]

psychḗ [life, soul], psychikós [natural, physical], anápsyxis [relief, refreshing], anapsýchō [to revive, refresh], dípsychos [double-minded], oligópsychos [of little spirit]

A. The Greek World.

1. Homer. In Homer sṓma is the dead body, words like mélea are used for the living organism, and psychḗ is the vital force that resides in the members and finds expression in the breath. Hazarded in battle, the psychḗ leaves a person at death, goes to the underworld, leads a shadowy existence there, and may appear in dreams. The real self becomes food for beasts or in a few cases goes to the gods. The psychḗ has nothing to do with mental or spiritual functions. Terms like nóos, kardía, or thymós are used to denote such functions. Bodily parts are their agents. But the nóos, which one bears in the breast or which a god has put there, becomes a permanent and integral part of the person. A varied psychological vocabulary develops, but there is no master concept of soul.

2. Older and Classical Usage. psychḗ becomes a master concept in the sixth century B.C. The idea of retribution helps to bring this about. The psychḗ in the underworld assures continuity between this world and the next. The psychḗ, then, is the epitome of the individual. The sṓma (body) comes to be seen as the sḗma (tomb) of the soul. Transmigration of the soul also finds supporters (Pythagoras). After 500 B.C. the psychḗ represents the essential core embracing thought, will, and emotion and not sharing the body’s dissolution. The soul is not limited by space. It has a self-expanding lógos. Communication between souls is possible. The soul's autonomy and higher worth are taken for granted. Moral instruction is a training of the soul for virtue. Medicine accepts the division of body and soul; the psychḗ is the self, or the seat of moral and spiritual qualities.

3. Plato.

a. Plato starts with the position of Socrates that we are to be judged by the state of the soul. But there may be conflict between resolve based on insight and spontaneous impulses that also originate in the soul.

b. Different parts of the soul have different ontological value. The aim is to insure for logistikón its due control over other parts. Moral struggle is a flight from the world of sense and an approximation to intelligible being.

c. In its dominant part the soul is preexistent and immortal; it belongs to transcendent being.

d. The state is a larger model of the soul. So, too, is the cosmos. As life means movement, movement is proper to the soul as it is to the living organism of the cosmos.

4. Post-Platonic Philosophy.

a. Constitution of the Soul. For the Peripatetics the immaterial soul is the principle of the form, life, and activity of the total organism. For the Epicureans and Stoics the soul is made of finer matter. The individual soul is a broken off part of the world soul and will be reunited with it at death.

b. Division of the Soul. Plato's trichotomy is the starting point of later views. A common division is into rational, irrational, and vegetative spheres. The power of thought has the highest worth; the understanding should control the alogical domain. For Middle Platonism the soul derives from noús but has powers that enable it to work on matter; the noús affects the psychḗ, and the psychḗ the sṓma. On this view the noús is the innermost core. Demons are psychaí without bodies, not purely noetic beings. Neo-Pythagoreans see two souls. They equate the logical soul with the noús, while the alogical soul is the garment that it puts on in its descent through the spheres. In sum, the psychḗ, in distinction from the noús, undergoes a certain devaluation, since it cannot denote pure spirituality. Medicine is interested in the organic relation of intellectual functions but differs as to the corporeality of the soul, arguing both for and against it from the fact that a corpse seems to be heavier than a living body.

5. Popular Ideas. In popular thinking the psychḗ is the impalpable essential core of a person, the agent of thought, will, and emotion, the quintessence of human life. The soul embraces the conscience. The book of dreams presupposes that souls can go abroad during sleep and that they go to bliss or punishment after death. Freedom is freedom of soul; astrology promises such freedom. In various expressions psychḗ can denote "life," e.g., to hazard one's psychḗ, and the phrase pása psychḗ means "everyone."

B. OT Anthropology.

1. nep̱eš

a. Breath. The Hebrew term which psychḗ renders is a fluid and dynamic one which it is hard both to define and to translate. The root means "to breathe" in a physical sense. Breathing is a decisive mark of the living creature; its cessation means the end of life. The root thus comes to denote "life" or "living creature." In a localization, the meaning may be "neck" or "throat." Departure of the breath is a metaphor for death. The alternation of breathing (cf. the use of the verb in Ex. 23:12; 31:17) corresponds to the fluid nature of the terms life and death in the OT. Life and death are two worlds that do not admit of sharp differentiation. Sickness and anxiety, which constrict the breath, are manifestations of the world of death.

b. Blood. Basic to both breath and blood is the idea of the living organism. Every form of life disappears when these leave the body. Gen. 9:4 finds the life in the blood, and Lev. 17:11 sees in blood the seat of the life (cf. also Dt. 12:23). There is no concept here of a blood-soul; the obvious thought is that of vital force.

c. Person. nep̱eš denotes the total person, what he or she is. Gen. 2:7 expresses this truth, although more in relation to the external aspect than to the modalities of life. What is meant is the person comprised in corporeal identity. Yet the total personality, the ego, is also involved. The noun can thus become a synonym of the personal pronoun (Gen. 27:25; Jer. 3:11).

d. Corpse and Tomb. The accent on the person leads to the use for a lifeless corpse (cf. Num. 6:6; 19:13; Lev. 19:28). The reference is to the dead person prior to final dissolution. Outside the Bible a use for "tomb" develops on the basis that the individual is in some sense present after death. In the Bible, however, the nep̱eš never exists independently of the individual, and the word is never used for an inhabitant of the underworld.

e. Will. The term expresses movement as well as form. The orientation may be to such elemental realities as hunger and thirst or to yearning for God. It embraces various parts of the organism, which can thus be used as synonyms for nep̱eš. It arises in relation to sex in Gen. 34:3, hatred in Ps. 27:12, pain and sorrow in 1 Sam. 1:10, the will in Gen. 23:8, and striving for God in Is. 26:9; Ps. 63:1, etc. The vocative in Ps. 42:5 etc. is a kind of question to the self, which rises to its full intensity before God, and relaxes when the goal is reached (Ps. 131:2).

2. Flesh and Body.

a. Flesh. The term "flesh" stands in some antithesis to nep̱eš and may also denote the whole person. It often has a very material sense for flesh that is eaten. "All flesh" is a phrase for all living things. Used later with blood, it denotes what is human as distinct from divine. It can denote the male organ (e.g., Ezek. 23:20; Ex. 28:42). But when used for the whole person it may also be synonymous with nep̱eš (Pss. 84:2; 119:120). In itself, however, it relates to human weakness and transitoriness (Gen. 6:3). Trust in the flesh is no help (Jer. 17:5). The flesh finally becomes the evil principle that opposes God, but this is never so in the OT, in which, as an organism that receives its life from the spirit, it may be connected with praise of God and longing for him. One should not corrupt the way of the flesh on earth (Gen. 6:12). Flesh becomes the antithesis of soul and spirit only in Wis. 8:19; 9:15.

b. Bones. Flesh undergoes total destruction at death. The bones endure longest, hence they receive special care (2 Kgs. 13:20), they are connected with the hope of rising again (Ezek. 37), they may be said to be joyful in God (Ps. 35:9-10), their breaking expresses the violence of an assault (Is. 38:7), and they can also denote true being or innermost substance (Ex. 24:10; Gen. 7:13; Ezek. 24:2).

3. Parts of the Body as the Seat of Life.

a. The Head. In the OT the totality may be concentrated in a part as life is seen in its manifestation or movement. Thus the head may be the focus, e.g., when hands are laid on it in blessing (Gen. 48:14), or punishment is called down on it (Josh. 2:19), or it is entrusted to someone (1 Sam. 28:2), or its white hairs go down to Sheol (Gen. 42:38), or it is the seat of knowledge (Dan. 2:28).

b. The Face. The face acts as a focus as it expresses various emotions or as its features denote envy (the eyes), arrogance (the forehead), pride (the neck), or anger (the nose).

c. The Hand. The hand (or palm or finger) is that which takes up a matter and executes it. It expresses the will and the means to carry it out. To give power is to "strengthen the hands" (Judg. 9:24).

d. The Foot. The foot also expresses strength (cf. standing on one's feet or planting the foot on an enemy's neck). But the foot may also slip or stumble or be caught in a net (Ps. 94:18; Job 12:5; 9:15).

e. Inner Organs. As emotions like grief and joy affect the liver, heart, etc., these inner organs come to be viewed as their seat (cf. Pss. 44:26; 64:6; 16:7; Gen. 35:11,; Job 31:20; Lam. 2:11).

4. The Heart. The heart holds a special place as the most common anthropological term (850 instances). Although localized exactly, it denotes the totality in its inner worth. Like breathing, it has an ebb and flow. But its cessation does not mean death (1 Sam. 25), since it has more than a physical sense. It is the point where impressions meet (1 Sam. 1:8; Ps. 13:2). It comes close to conscience (1 Sam. 25:31). It directs the ways of life as the place where God's statutes are written. The insane have no heart (cf. Gen. 31:20), and wine and harlotry take the heart away (Hos. 4:11). The heart differentiates humans from animals, whose hearts are purely physical (Dan. 4:13). It forms plans that produce action. By nature it is not pure (Ps. 101:4) but inclines to falsehood and pride (Pss. 12:2; 131:1). It may become fat or hard (Is. 6:10; Ezek. 11:19). God tests it (Ps. 17:3), knows it (Ps. 33:15), purifies it, and unites it with himself (1 Kgs. 8:61). A new creation begins in it (Lev. 26:41; Ezek. 11:19; 36:26).

5. The Spirit.

a. Origin of the Concept. Without rû(a)ḥ there is no life, and the source of life is outside us. The word means "wind" or "breath." Breath, being fleeting, can denote vanity (Job 16:3), but it is also life-giving (Gen. 8:1 etc.). As wind denotes the breath of God, it loses its physical aspect and signifies invisible power (cf. Is. 31:3).

b. Outworking in People. As divine power the Spirit comes on certain people and enables them to do mighty deeds (Judg. 13:25) or to prophesy (1 Sam. 10:6). The Messiah has the Spirit in special measure (Is. 11). There are also other spirits which God may use but which oppose him (1 Sam. 16:14). rû(a)ḥ is a condition of nep̱eš and regulates its force (cf. Judg. 15:19; 1 Kgs. 10:5).

c. Creative Activity. In Ps. 104:29; Num. 16:22; 27:16 the Spirit is the creative power of life. In us it may thus express intensity of feeling (cf. 1 Sam. 1:15; Hos. 4:12; Num. 5:14). The phrase "to awaken the spirit" expresses its stimulative role (Hag. 1:14).

d. Relation to nep̱eš and Heart. In spite of parallels, a distinction remains between "spirit" and both nep̱eš and heart, although spirit and heart are virtually identical in Ezek. 11:5 and Jer. 3:17. Later one may discern a tendency to psychologize "spirit" (cf. Dt. 2:30). Yet there is no separate anthropology, nor do we find the concept of becoming a spirit when the body decays.

e. Flesh and Spirit. The OT sets these in antithesis in, e.g., Gen. 6:1ff.; Is. 31:3, but only in the sense of human weakness and divine strength. In view of creation, the two are not irreconcilable except when flesh trusts in self instead of God (Jer. 17:5ff.). The eschatological age will erase all tensions, yet not by replacing flesh with spirit. Although spirit finds a religious use in, e.g., Pss. 31:5; 34:18, etc., heart is more common in such contexts. OT anthropology views people less according to their nature and more in their relation to God.

6. Relational Character of OT Anthropology.

a. In principle OT anthropology differs little from that of surrounding nations. It is God who gives it its distinctive coherence. The one God as Creator and also as Lord of history gives a unity of structure and thrust to what is said about his human creatures. Before the living God, the individual is a responsible person.

b. This person is always seen in a totality that finds expression, not in the antithetical concepts of body and soul, but in the complementary ones of body and life.

c. The OT never views the person as an abstraction but always as a historical individual or the member of a historical people. The name expresses the personal being and history.

d. Life is not just the movement from birth to death but stands under constant threat and finds a counterthrust in contact with the source of life. Life is breathing which is dependent on the divine breath and in which both the manner of breathing and the quality of the air breathed are important. When God ceases to breathe into a person, life stops.

e. Life depends, then, on the relation of the human image to the divine original and the task that this implies. We are truly alive only in the situation of choice in which we fulfil what we are. [E. JACOB, IX, 608-31]

C. Judaism.

I. Hellenistic Judaism.

1. LXX. In works with a Hebrew original psychḗ mostly translates nep̱eš either as: vital force or as seat of the mind or spirit (cf. Num. 35:11; Dt. 11:18). The idea of the soul as an essential core, however, is alien to the OT, which posits no antithesis of body and soul. In Is. 10:18 the expression "soul and body" denotes the total person with no thought of antithesis. Ps. 16:10 means that God will keep the author alive; only the LXX suggests that the soul will spend some time in the underworld, but that God will not leave it there. When the LXX uses psychḗ for living people, however, this fits in well with Hebrew usage (cf. Ex. 16:16).

2. Apocalyptic and Pseudepigraphical Works. These works attest to the conceptual differentiation of body and soul, as in Greek thought. The soul may denote the person, as in Hebrew, but it is also the inner person, the moral or spiritual self, which parts from the body and lives on at death, either with God or in hell or the underworld. The soul is the sphere of human responsibility. Magicians can steal souls, which can leave the body for a time. At the resurrection, however, body and soul will be reunited.

3. LXX (Greek Works).

a. Greek thought dominates Wisdom. Soul and body are in antithesis, the body is a burden, well-being of soul is all-important, the soul lives on after death. On the other hand, the soul is not divine. The whole person is in God's image, and the pneúma has to be imparted by God.

b. 4 Maccabees reproduces popular philosophical psychology. Platonic trichotomy appears in 3:2ff., in 14:6 the soul is the center of consciousness and feeling, and in 15:25 it is the organ of intellectual functions.

4. Aristeas and Josephus. The Epistle of Aristeas uses the expression "save the soul" for "save the life." Elsewhere it ascribes purity, as a matter of the mind, to the soul rather than the body. Josephus uses a differentiated psychological terminology.

5. Philo. Philo knows the division of the soul into various parts. The divine pneúma is for him the noús or logismós of the soul which cures it of the passions. Only the highest part of the human soul has union with God. Yet all its parts share in the rise of sin. Angels and demons are psychaí and the world has a psychḗ as a living organism governed by rational laws. [A. DIHLE, IX, 632-35]

II. Palestinian Judaism.

1. nep̱eš denotes the vital element, the breath, or the ego. In Qumran texts it is often equivalent to "life." It is not the soul as a distinct part, but the whole person living in responsibility. In many references it simply means the self.

2. The rabbis continue the OT use for "life" but also, under Hellenistic influence, see some antithesis between body and soul. The soul dwells like a guest in the body and gives strength to keep the law, receiving power from heaven for this purpose. In some statements the soul is preexistent. Yet the rabbis do not disparage the body or abandon personal unity. If the soul leaves the body at death, the two come together at the resurrection, and both are responsible before God. [E. LOHSE, IX, 635-37]

D. The NT.

I. The Gospels and Acts.

1. Natural and Physical Life.

a. General. In Acts 20:10 the psychḗ is the life, in 27:22 there will be no loss of life, in 27:10 no lives will be lost, and in Mt. 6:25 the life needs nourishment.

b. Giving of Life. When Jesus says that he gives his psychḗ as a ransom for many, what he means is the life bound up with flesh and blood, along with the individual ego (Mk. 10:45). Jn. 10:11ff. uses tithénai for giving the psychḗ; this word can mean "to risk" as well as "to give." The disciples can sacrifice their lives too, but only Jesus can take his life again. In Acts 15:26 paradídōmi suggests the hazarding of resources; it does not have to imply martyrdom. Rev. 12:11 refers to those who do not love their psychḗ unto death, and in Acts 20:24 Paul does not hold his life dear. In Lk. 14:26 psychḗ embraces everything that makes up the earthly life that one must hate for Jesus' sake.

c. Seeking, Killing, and Saving Life. In Mt. 2:20 the child's foes seek his life (psychḗ). In Lk. 12:20 God requires the life of the rich farmer. The decision in Mk. 3:4ff. is between saving life and taking it. The earthly life is taken so seriously that leaving it sick is tantamount to robbing it of all that makes it worthwhile. Life here is not just a formal concept but has content as the full life that God intends at creation. Yet this means finally a life that is lived in God's service, so that the degree of physical health is a subsidiary matter. Thus in Lk. 9:55-56 the Son of Man has come to protect physical life, but more than this is plainly in view, as may be seen in Lk. 19:10, where seeking and saving go hand in hand with the summons to faith. The call to faith is a call to the true life that God intends; salvation is salvation from anything that hinders this, whether it be sickness or unbelief.

2. The Whole Person. If psychḗ means "physical life," what is at issue is not the phenomenon as such, but the life manifested in individuals. Thus pása psychḗ means "everybody" in Acts 2:43, but with an individualizing thrust (3:23). Mt. 11:29 promises rest to the souls of all who come to Jesus. The expression rests on Jer. 6:16 and carries the implication of the human self that lives before God and must give account to him. Hence the rest is not that of liberation from the body. It is attained in acts of physical obedience to God, for the physical life that God gives cannot be separated from the life with God that takes shape in prayer, praise, and doing God's will.

3. The Place of Feeling.

a. The Influence of Others. Paul's enemies poison the psychaí of the Gentiles in Acts 14:2. The psychaí of the brethren in Antioch are unsettled in 15:24. The psychḗ can thus be swayed by others. Jesus holds the psychḗ of the people in suspense in Jn. 10:24; it might tilt either to faith or to unbelief. On the positive side, Paul and Barnabas strengthen the psychaí of the disciples in Acts 14:22.

b. Experiences of Joy, Sorrow, and Love. Active decision is at issue when God's psychḗ takes pleasure in his servant in Mt. 12:18. The psychḗ of Lk. 12:19 hopes to enjoy physical and psychological pleasures on the basis of a radical decision. In Lk. 1:46 the psychḗ is the subject of praise of God; the presence of pneúma shows that this is God's gift and work. The psychḗ may also be the locus of sorrow, as in Mk. 14:34 (cf. Ps. 42:5). Mk. 12:30 demands love with all the psychḗ; the word is close to strength of will in this context (cf. Mt. 22:37). Yet its omission in Mk. 12:33 shows that it is not supremely important or distinctive (cf. Acts 4:32). The sword of sorrow pierces the psychḗ in Lk. 2:35.

c. Heart. When the soul is said in OT fashion to praise and love God, the meaning is very close to that of heart. The question arises whether the praise and love of God are a response to the influence of God as other movements of the soul are responses to other influences.

4. True Life.

a. Jesus. In Mk. 8:35; Mt. 10:39; Lk. 17:33; Jn. 12:25 we have the saying that those who would save their psychḗ will lose it, and those who lose it will save it. The primary reference might be to physical life, but in the sense of the true and full life that the Creator intends, and therefore with a broader scope than that of life on earth. Since true life means the liberation of openness to God and neighbor, it differs from the stringent asceticism that the similar rabbinic saying commends.

b. Mark. In the context of Mk. 8:31ff. the saying stresses the fact that the giving of life is possible only by following him who gave his life for all. True life thus finds a new center, and it is more explicitly a life lived according to God's purpose and therefore in his presence. God will preserve this life even if the loss of physical life is entailed. Death is not a frontier that makes the truth of God untrue. Resurrection finally actualizes the receiving of life as a gift from God. Only orientation to Jesus and the gospel can lead to this.

c. Matthew. In Mt. 10:39 the verb "find" suggests that the psychḗ is not given already but that one attains to it only when ready to lose it.

d. Luke. Lk. 17:33 seems to be using LXX expressions, but the eschatological context makes it likely that the original sense of psychḗ here is "eternal life," which we lose if, like Lot's wife, we cannot detach ourselves from the present life.

e. John. Jn. 12:25 relates primarily to Jesus himself (cf. v. 24), but with a glance at the disciples too (v. 26). The contrasting of "in this world" with "for eternal life" shows that the reference is to both earthly and eternal life, but not in sharp distinction. There is no magical change, for the believer already has psychḗ. Nor is the psychḗ an immortal soul; it is the life which God gives, and which by our attitude to God takes on a mortal or eternal character. Life is kept for eternity only by its sacrifice and in constant living by God's gift.

f. Life That Survives Death. True life is life that is given by God and lived before him. It is the self lived in the body, yet not consisting of health or wealth, but as the gift of God that death cannot limit.

5. The Supreme Good. In Mk. 8:35-36 (cf. Ps. 49:7-8), the supreme good is the true life that is lived before God by following Jesus. To live life merely as a natural phenomenon is to miss it. psychḗ is physical life as that which expresses the self (cf. Lk. 9:25), but in the faithfulness of God it also applies beyond physical life (cf. v. 38). The coming of the Son of Man will show whether the orientation is to the cosmos or to God. The psychḗ is not a substance that survives death; it is life from God and in fellowship with God that comes to fulfilment through the judgment.

6. psychḗ in Contrast to the Body. Mt. 10:28 presents God as the one who can cast both body and psychḗ into Gehenna. The saying posits the unity of the two and negates the idea of the soul's immortality. Persecutors cannot affect the true life by putting an end to physical life, which is threatened already by sickness and other hazards. God alone controls the psychḗ, and for those who have true life with him he prepares a new body, just as he destroys both the body and psychḗ of those who do not have true life with him.

7. The psychḗ after Death in Luke.

a. Lk. 12:4-5; 9:25; Acts 2:31. These sayings omit the references to the psychḗ in Gehenna or Hades. The emphasis is on the corporeality of the resurrection as distinct from the Hellenistic survival of the soul.

The weighty role of judgment in the call to repentance demands the resurrection of both the just and the unjust (Acts 24:15).

b. Lk. 12:20. This statement simply means that the rich farmer will die, although there is perhaps a suggestion that the psyché̱ is a loan that God now demands back from him.

c. Lk. 21:19. This might refer to the preservation of earthly life but after v. 16 true and authentic life is probably meant, i.e., eternal life, although not in the sense of an immortal soul after the Greek fashion.

II. Paul.

l. Natural Life and True Life. Paul makes sparing use of psyché̱. He speaks about the attempt on Elijah's life in Rom. 11:3, refers to Epaphroditus hazarding his life in Phil. 2:30, and says that he and his helpers will give their lives (i.e., their time and energy as well as physical life) for the church in 1 Th. 2:8 (cf. Rom. 16:4). In 2 Cor. 12:15 he is ready to spend and be spent for the psychaí of his readers, i.e., that they might know the authentic life that comes from God and is lived responsibly before him.

2. Person. Paul has the individual person in mind in Rom. 2:9 and 13:1. In 2 Cor. 1:23 (cf. the pneúma of Rom. 1:9) he means the self that is aware of responsibility to God.

3. mía psyché̱. In Phil. 1:27, as a parallel to hén pneúma, this term lays more stress on the task that is to be achieved. pneúma may be parallel to psyché̱ in the believer, but there is no thought of a soul regenerated by the Spirit and detached from the body. The psyché̱ is physical life, or person, or the moral and spiritual person; Paul never assesses it negatively.

4. Colossians and Ephesians. psyché̱ bears a neutral sense in Col. 3:23; Eph. 6:6. Even in opposition to the Colossian heresy Paul does not develop a doctrine of the soul. He conducts the debate in terms of Christology, not anthropology.

5. Secularity of Usage. Paul never uses psyché̱ for the life that survives death. He sees eternal life wholly as a divine gift on the basis of a new creative act. It is future and heavenly. There is continuity with the earthly life, but this lies wholly with God, and is better denoted by pneúma than psyché̱.

III. Hebrews. The psychaí that grow weary in Heb. 12:3 are probably the normal forces of believers. The psychaí of 13:17, however, are the members described with reference to their spiritual lives. Leaders bear special responsibility for the psyché̱, for which they must give account at the judgment. What is meant is the whole person, or possibly the life before God. 10:39 has the latter in view; the preservation of this life means its attainment of the consummation through judgment and resurrection. Spiritual existence is also the point in 6:19. This stands under threat, but it has solid hope because Jesus has already entered the inner shrine behind the curtain. In 4:12 the word pierces both soul and spirit rather than dividing them. The verse does not teach trichotomy; it relates both soul and spirit to the inner person to which the word can penetrate.

IV. The Catholic Epistles.

1. John. 3 Jn. 2 distinguishes between general health and health of soul. psyché̱ is the true life before God that can be sound even in physical ill-health. Body and soul are not set in express antithesis, for the hope is that the two will be in harmony.

2. James. In 1:21 salvation embraces eschatological salvation and thus the psyché̱ is the life before God that comes to fulfilment in the resurrection. The same applies in 5:20, where thánatos may be either death or condemnation or both. The psyché̄ is the true life before God that is saved through the judgment that threatens it with death.

3. 1 Peter. In 3:20 we simply have a number, although with a hint of preservation by and for God. In 1:19 the psyché̄ is the individual life or person; its salvation is the eschatological goal of faith, but already on earth it is purified by obedience for love (v. 22). In 4:19 the psyché̄ might be the physical life, but in context it seems to refer to the life which the Creator takes into his keeping hands through death and fashions anew. Christ in 2:25 shepherds the faith-life of believers. In 2:11 psyché̄ is the life that is given by God and lived before him. Carnal desires war against it, so that we have here an antithesis of psyché̄ and sárx (similar to Paul's antithesis of pneúma and sárx). The psyché̄ is not unconditionally good, nor is it summoned to asceticism, but it must so live in the earthly sphere as to be at home in the heavenly sphere.

4. 2 Peter In 2:8, 14 psyché̄ is the person, living responsibly, distinguishing between good and evil, and hence exposed to temptation. In itself it is neutral; dikaía and astḗriktos qualify it positively or negatively.

V. Revelation.

1. Physical Life. Rev. 16:3 uses pása psyché̄ with zōḗs for "every living creature" (i.e., in the sea; cf. 8:9). "Life" is the meaning in 12:11—the life that the martyrs loved not even unto death.

2. Person. As in the OT, psyché̄ means "person" in 18:13. The addition anthrṓpōn shows that the use is not just numerical; the phrase expresses horror at the traffic in slaves, who are also human persons.

3. Life after Death. This sense is clearest in 6:9. The psychaí here are those that await God's righteous judgment prior to the resurrection. They are martyrs who enjoy self-awareness, may be seen in their white garments, but do not yet have the full life that comes with the new corporeality of the resurrection. In 20:4 the psychaí have attained to the final state after the first resurrection, so that obviously psyché̄ does not denote merely a provisional, noncorporeal state but embraces the whole person living in eschatological salvation.

*VI. NT Usage in Distinction from pneúma.

1. psyché̄ often denotes physical life. pneúma may be used for this too, but whereas the psyché̄ can be persecuted and slain, one can only hand back the pneúma to God. Only psyché̄, then, can refer to the purely natural life that can reach an end (cf. the contrast in 1 Cor. 15:45).

2. psyché̄ is always individual life, or the whole person, often as the locus of joy and sorrow or love and hate. In contrast pneúma for the human totality represents a special aspect, i.e., God's gift, and never characterizes either unbelievers or ethically negative impulses. psyché̄ can be the locus of faith, but as such it is interesting for Paul only inasmuch as God can use psychological faculties. Proclamation and edification take place through the pneúma.

3. psyché̄ is authentic life only as God gives it and one receives it from him. Whereas the problem with pneúma is that it tends to be seen as the inner spiritual life that we are given, the problem with psyché̄ is that it tends to be restricted to the physical sphere instead of embracing within this sphere the gift of God that transcends death.

4. As God's faithfulness does not end with death (cf. Ps. 49), so psyché̄ comes to signify a life that death does not extinguish. Later this is specifically the religious life that one must nurture as a gift, which implies responsibility. The continuity of the life of faith and the resurrection life does not reside in the divine indwelling but in the divine faithfulness. pneúma, too, can denote the departed believer, but in this context both terms refer, not to a surviving part, but to the total life given by God and lived out before him: a bodily but not a fleshly life. John develops psyché̄ to express the continuity, but Paul prefers pneúma, which stresses the continuity of the divine activity.

5. The NT does not use psyché̄ as a term for life in an intermediate state. Rev. 6:9 does not have this sense, nor does 2 Cor. 5:3, and at most Mt. 10:28 is debatable. Paul is wisely content to know that the dead are with Christ (Phil. 1:23). [E. SCHWEIZER, IX, 637-56]

E. Gnosticism.

1. Gnostic texts vary considerably in teaching and usage. A common feature is the view that the human self is part of the transcendent world that is entangled in this cosmos. The revealer discloses its true origin and frees it for a return home. In some texts the self is called the soul, and we find the corresponding pairs light/darkness, good/evil, spirit/matter, and soul/body.

2. Gnostics who use psyché̄ view it as the inner human core in a cosmos fashioned by pneumatic particles but sharply differentiated from the good world of light, to which only the pneúma belongs. The threefold structuring (pneúma, psyché̄, sóma) follows the philosophical model, but the union of the soul with matter is not now an act of the self-unfolding noús but involves alienation of the pneumatic particle. Natural and moral laws enslave the pneumatic self and keep it from entering the plḗrōma. The psyché̄ is the disputed area of redemption; it is good only insofar as it takes pneúma into itself.

3. The psychological terminology varies widely in detail. Valentinians refer to two souls. Others contrast psyché̄ with noús, pneúma, or lógos. Redemption applies strictly to the pneúma, but the psyché̄ may be included. For Basilides the psyché̄ is a bird, the pneúma its wings that enable it to soar. Popular Gnosticism uses the terms with no great exactitude.

4. a. Trichotomy. The Nag Hammadi texts give evidence of trichotomy, e.g., in speaking of the pneumatic, psychical, and earthly Adam, or the threefold resurrection of spirit, soul, and flesh.

b. Varied Use of psyché̄. Nag Hammadi texts also use psyché̄ in different ways. A basic distinction is between the cosmic and supercosmic soul. The latter is the pneúma, which is redeemed by its bridegroom, the life-giving Spirit. Another distinction is between immortal and mortal souls. The psyché̄, however, is usually the cosmic soul, which stands between the spirit and the body and may incline one way or the other; negative evaluation of this soul is common, and it cannot be redeemed without the pneúma.

c. The Soul's Destiny. The descent and reascent of the soul are described in various categories; its redemption is the great theme of Gnostic texts. Everything depends on whether the pneúma of life gains control over it. Some souls are pure and some are punished. The redeemer sent by the Father gives new life to the soul, frees it, and thus makes its reascent possible. Saved souls are in the ogdoad and sing praise in silence. [K.-W. TRÖGER, IX, 656-60] psychikós.

1. The Greek World. This term is common in religious and philosophical speech and then enters ordinary usage as the adjective of psyché̄. In 2 Macc. 4:37 psychikōs means "from the heart" or "very much” in intensification of a verb of emotion; Greek usually has ek psychḗs for this. In one instance psychikós also has the sense “brave” or “manly.” [A. DIHLE, IX, 661]

2. Judaism. The only instance is in 4 Macc. 1:32, but an important relation develops to choïkós (cf. 1 Cor. 15:46ff.) (cf. also in this connection sarkikós and pneumatikós). In Philo the soul is the earthly component. Whereas reason is neutral, the irrational impulses of the soul seduce us and bring us to grief. A negative estimation stands behind Philo’s statements.

3. The NT

a. 1 Cor. 15:44ff. psychḗ is ambiguous in the NT. It may denote either the true life that God gives or ordinary life that belongs to everyone. In the latter case the Spirit stands in sharp antithesis. Only when the Spirit is imparted either in time or eschatologically does that which is psychikós cease to be purely earthly. In 1 Cor. 15:44ff. Paul views impartation as eschatological. What is psychikós is not sinful as such but it is corruptible. Over against it is the risen Christ as life-giving Spirit. Our heavenly pneumatic being is still future. It is given to us only as God’s promise in Christ to faith. Continuity between what is psychikós and pneumatikós lies in the faithfulness of God through Christ. We shall bear the image of the heavenly, not as ourselves lifegiving spirit, but as spiritual body, for Christ alone is Creator Spirit.

b. 1 Cor. 2:14. Here again psychikós means natural humanity without the eschatological gift of the pneúma. If the unbeliever is psychikós, the believer who makes no progress is sarkikós. Being psychikós is not a higher stage, then, but it also does not involve the same censure. The psychikós becomes a sarkikós when confessing faith but remaining set on what is earthly, i.e., the sárx.

c. Jms. 3:15. In this verse psychikós describes what is earthly and closed to God’s world. In this case, however, demonic influence is involved and disorder results.

d. Jude 19. What is psychikós is equated here with what is ungodly. Without the Spirit’s aid the person who is psychikós will be the victim of desire and will cause division. [E. SCHWEIZER, IX, 661-63] anapsýchō.

1. The basic sense of this word is “to cool or refresh with a breath” or “to dry out.” In medicine treating a wound with fresh air is meant. The transferred use for “restoration” or “refreshment” either physical or spiritual is very old. [A. DIHLE, IX, 663-64]

2. In the LXX “to refresh oneself” means “to regain strength” (Ex. 23:12; Judg. 15:19; 2 Sam. 16:14; Ps. 39:13).

3. In the LXX the verb is always intransitive, but in the NT it is transitive in 2 Tim. 1:16 in the sense either of attending to the needs of Paul in prison or of bringing spiritual encouragement, or possibly both. [E. SCHWEIZER, IX, 664] anápsyxis.

1. This word means “cooling,” “drying out,” “refreshing,” “alleviation,” “relief,” or “rest.” [A. DIHLE, IX, 664]

2. The only NT instance is in Acts 3:20. The “times of refreshing” are the eschatological age of salvation which comes with Israel’s repentance. The context is one of admonition. To the large number of Jews already converted will be added believing Gentiles. The parousia will thus bring the perfecting of Israel. [E. SCHWEIZER, IX, 664-65]

dípsychos. This term (Jms. 1:8; 4:8) denotes the “divided” person. Behind it lies the OT thought of the divided heart (cf. Dt. 29:17; Ezek. 14:3ff.). Hermas is fond of the word and of the derived dipsychía. [E. SCHWEIZER, IX, 665] oligópsychos.

1. This rare word means “faint-hearted,” perhaps on the basis of physical weakness (cf. oligopsychía, meaning “short breath”).

2. Along with the related verb and noun the term occurs in the LXX with the nuances “despondent,” “cross,” “impatient,” “exhausted.” “Faint-hearted” or “anxious” occurs only in Sir. 4:9, and “short-tempered” seems to be the point in Prov. 14:29. The normal use is for “despondent” in a religious sense (Is. 25:5; 35:4). [G. BERTRAM, IX, 666]

3. In 1 Th. 5:14 the term suggests weakness of faith and may be compared with sýmpsychos in Phil. 2:2, isópsychos in 2:20, and eupsychṓ in 2:19 (but not ápsychos for a “lifeless” musical instrument in 1 Cor. 14:7). The reference is to inner spiritual vigor (or the lack of it) in relation to the task that God has set. [E. SCHWEIZER, IX, 666]

ōdín [birthpang], ōdínō [to suffer birthpangs]

A. Secular Greek. Of uncertain derivation, ōdínō means “to suffer birthpangs” and ōdínes are “birthpangs.” Homer uses the term figuratively for the sudden and violent pain of wounds. Plato relates the group to Socrates’ work as a midwife of knowledge. Aristotle reserves it for the natural process of birth. Plotinus finds for it both a cosmological and a psychological application. The emanation of lower hypostases is like a painful birth. In mythology the goddesses of fate are present at birth and rule over the pangs, which may be the cause of death. ōdís may denote the result of the pangs, i.e., “fruit” or “child.”

B. The LXX. The LXX introduces more subjective terms for the pains of childbirth and uses ōdínō and ōdínes for Hebrew terms that denote pregnancy as such. When Hebrew employs the metaphor of childbirth, the reference is more to the convulsive trembling than to the pain, and at issue are the anxiety and distress caused by war, affliction, or divine judgment. In Isaiah the concept expressed by ōdínō is that of national birth or rebirth (cf. 45:10; 51:1-2; 54:1 ff.). The image of travail points beyond itself as even in judgment there is expectation of new salvation. As God takes out of the natural womb (Ps. 22:9), so he takes out of the womb of suffering and death; he will not finally destroy (Jer. 17:7; Jon. 4:11).

C. Judaism.

1. Qumran, Ethiopian Enoch, and 4 Esdras. Qumran compares the sufferings of the poet to those of a woman in travail, but it is unclear who the woman or her child or children represent. The only sure point is that end-time sufferings are in view. The community lives under pressures that are a prelude to the messianic age. Eth. En. 62:4 refers to birthpangs in face of final judgment, and 4 Esdr. 4:42 uses the metaphor for the new birth of resurrection.

2. Philo. Philo expounds the OT birth stories allegorically. The soul receives the seed of divine wisdom, falls into labor, and bears a sound mind. If it tries to bear without God’s blessing, the result is a miscarriage or the birth of what is bad. The one soul may bear either Abel or Cain. Wisdom receives God's seed and gives birth to the sons of God, i.e., the world.

3. Josephus. Josephus uses ōdínes only on an OT basis for pregnancy or labor.

4. The Rabbinic Tradition. Many rabbis find the metaphor of travail in Ps. 18:4. Connected is the idea of the woes of the Messiah or the birthpangs of the messianic age, namely, unrest, war, plague, and famine. Study of the law and works of love afford protection against these afflictions.

D. The NT. 1 Th. 5:3 adopts the metaphor and uses the singular either collectively or with reference to the first and sudden pang. The point here is that destruction will unexpectedly overtake those who live in self-security. Afflictions will usher in the end time in Mk. 13:8, although when they occur one must not overhastily expect the end. Mt. 24:8 relates "beginning of sorrows" to all the eschatological woes that precede the new birth of the world; they indicate the imminence of the time of salvation. In Rom. 8:22 the afflictions are a cosmic event. All creation waits for the new birth of the world, the coming into being of a new heaven and a new earth. In Gal. 4:27 Paul quotes Is. 54:1: The woman who does not bear has many children, i.e., believers, through God's gracious miracle. Yet in 4:19 members of the church come to faith only through Paul's painful efforts on their behalf, which are like the pangs of labor. Rev. 12:2 offers the sign of the pregnant woman who cries out in her pain. Acts 2:24 refers to the new birth of the resurrection. The abyss cannot hold Christ any more than the womb can hold the child; God helps it to end the pains with the release of the Redeemer. The christological orientation fits in with the general picture of birthpangs as a sign both of end and of renewing, and therefore as an admonition and warning to the church.

E. The Apostolic Fathers and Apologists. In these works the OT and NT influence is limited to a few quotations that are handled in stereotyped fashion (cf. Pol. 1.2; 2 Clem. 2.1-2; Justin Apology 53.5; Dialogue 85.8-9 etc.). → lýpē, odýnē, páschō [G. BERTRAM, IX, 667-74]

hṓra [hour]

A. Nonbiblical Usage.

1. This word first means a "right, fixed, or favorable time," e.g., for sowing, marrying, etc. It may then be the "customary time" or a "set" or "appointed time."

2. A special use is for the "best" time. This may be the time of greatest bodily fitness, i.e., the "bloom of youth."

3. We then get the sense of "short stretch of time," or "hour" (cf. the "hour" of death, but also the last "moment").

B. The LXX. In the LXX we find the usual senses "fixed time," "time," "usual time," "appointed time," "short period of time." The meaning "hour" occurs only in works with no Hebrew original. The idea of imminence sometimes occurs (cf. pró hṓras, "prematurely," or katá tḗn hṓran taútēn, "now").

C. The NT.

1. In the NT we find "set time" in Lk. 14:17 (cf. the "hour" of prayer in Acts 3:1). In Rev. 9:15 a specific "hour" is set for an apocalyptic event. The hour may be an "hour of judgment" (14:7), an "hour to reap" (14:15), or an "hour of trial" (3:10). The content of the hour of Jn. 12:27 gives it special significance as "this hour"; "hour" can stand for the content (Mk. 14:35). The "hour" of dawn is the time to awake out of sleep and to act with vigilance (Rom. 13:11-12).

2. The expression hṓra tinós denotes the time for human suffering or action. "Her hour" is the hour when a woman is to bear her child in Jn. 16:21. Similarly Jesus fulfils the requirement of the hour that God has set for him, e.g., when he goes to the cross in 13:1. He knows that "his hour" has not yet come (7:30;

8:20). The thought is that of obedience to the divine will and purpose (cf. 2:4). Negatively the hour may be that of his opponents (16:4; cf. Lk. 22:53).

3. With “my time has come” we also find “the time has come,” i.e., God’s appointed time (Jn. 17:1; Mk. 14:41). In Lk. 22:14 the reference is to the time for the Passover (“when the hour [of the Passover] came”).

4. In Jn. 4:21, 23; 5:25, 28; 16:2, 25 the phrase “the time will come” intimates future events. “And now is” in 4:23 (cf. 16:32) shows that something is just at hand. eschátē hṓra is the “end time.”

5. hṓra can also denote a fixed time (cf. “from that time” in Mt. 9:22, or “in that moment” in 8:13, or “instantly” in Acts 16:18). God will give the right words “at the time” of trial (Mk. 13:11).

6. No one knows the day or hour of the parousia, not even the Son (Mk. 13:32). In this context “hour” may be simply a section of the day or night; it is not necessarily a twelfth part of the day. The Son comes unexpectedly; this is the point in Mt. 12:44. We do not know the day or hour of the bridegroom’s coming (25:13), nor when the thief comes (24:43). Watchfulness is thus demanded (Mk. 13:33ff.).

7. A strict “hour” is the meaning in Jn. 11:9. Except in Mt. 20:3, 5-6 the Synoptic Gospels give specific times only for the events of the passion (Mk. 15:25, 33-34; cf. Jn. 19:14). Jn. 1:39 and 4:52-53 give the times for particular reasons. Details of time also occur in Acts 10:3, 30; 23:23. Acts 5:7 and 19:34 mention periods of hours. Lk. 22:59 refers to a short time of about an hour. Contrast with “forever” occurs in Phlm. 15, and mían hṓran means “for a short time” in Rev. 17:12.

D. The Apostolic Fathers. In these works we find the meanings 1. “a set time” (Pol. 7.1); 2. an “hour” with specific content (Mart. Pol. 14.2); 3. the twelfth part of a day (Hermas Visions 3.1.2); 4. a “short time” in contrast to eternal life (Mart. Pol. 2.3); 5. (in the plural) a period of hours (Mart. Pol. 7.3); and 6. a “period of time” (Hermas Similitudes 6.4.4). [G. DELLING, IX, 675-81]

hōsanná [hosanna]

1. This word is usually seen as a transliteration of the Hebrew expression hôšî-‘â (-n)nā’, which is a cry for help (Ps. 118:25), which with the Hallel Psalms (113-118) comes into liturgical use, which, accompanied by the waving of branches at Tabernacles, then becomes a shout of jubilation in the solemn procession around the altar of burnt offering, and which echoes the messianic hope inasmuch as Ps. 118 sometimes finds a messianic interpretation.

2. The NT uses the term in the story of the entry into Jerusalem. The “blessed is he . . .” of Ps. 118:25 occurs with it in Mk. 11:9-10, and v. 10 brings out its messianic significance. The repetition of hōsanná points to the fulfilment of the messianic hope in Jesus. Luke omits the hōsanná, which Gentile readers would not understand, but has “peace on earth and glory in the highest” (cf. 2:14). Matthew retains the double hōsanná in shorter form (21:9). In a later repetition he emphasizes the “Son of David” (v. 15). When the authorities object, Jesus defends the cries of the children on the basis of Ps. 8:2; children are a model of true discipleship. In John the cry is the same as in Mark (Jn. 12:13); the addition “the King of Israel” shows precisely that “he who comes” is the Messiah.

3. As a liturgical cry hōsanná quickly finds a place in Christian worship (Did. 10.6). The church probably adopts it from the liturgical tradition of Judaism. It bears a christological and eschatological character (cf. Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 2.23.13-14, where it occurs in the story of the martyrdom of James, the Lord’s brother). The Gentile church, however, is not familiar with its original meaning, as may be seen from the explanation given by Clement of Alexandria in Paedagogus 1.5.12.5. [E. LOHSE, IX, 682-84]
